emoluments, to which he ardently aspired (as he himself tells us,) he gave himself up forever to the service of God alone. This therefore, is the reason, why in the first parable our Lord compared the kingdom of heaven to a treasure found without labour, and by chance; but in the other likened it to a pearl, sought after by a merchant, with great labour and diligence. It now only remains that the Christian soul, removing aside for a time all other occupations, should seriously consider with in herself, and before God, what is the nature of this business how useful, and how easy it is at the present time; but how difficult, or rather how impossible it will become, if worldly things occupy the attention. Truly, the children of this world would not omit the opportunity of purchasing a pearl which could be sold for many thousands of pounds. And shall the children of light be so imprudent as to refuse to purchase the “pearl” which will make them eternally rich and happy, and when they will neither be compelled to receive money in usury, nor to travel here and there to seek a purchaser, but it will be quite sufficient willingly to give what they possess, even if they had but two farthings. Wherefore, O Lord my God, let Thy light shine in my heart: grant that I may know the worth of Thy invaluable pearl, and at the same time the littleness of the price which is required of me to purchase it. Add, Lord, to thy mercies, that thou mayest not in vain show unto me so precious a pearl; and Thou who hast said, “Cast ye not your pearls before swine,” grant by Thy grace that if at any time I have been like unto swine, ignorant of the value of Thy pearl, and preferring the husks before it, I may now, enlightened and instructed by Thee, discover the pearl, and selling all my goods, purchase it with joy.

Chapter III

The Labourers In The Vineyard

THE third parable follows, concerning the “penny-a-day,” promised by the house holder to those labouring in the vineyard. This parable comes in St. Matthew (c. xx.) and, at first sight, the reward of eternal life appears to be greatly lessened in it, since what before was likened to a treasure and a precious pearl, is now compared to “a penny a-day.” But this comparison is used that the reward may agree with the toil and labour: for the similitude would be inappropriate if a great treasure, or a pearl, or sceptre, or royal diadem were promised to those labouring in the vineyard but for one day. But it can easily be proved, that the “penny” does not consist in the value of a few brass coins, but that it is a heavenly coin, abundantly sufficient for food and raiment during a whole eternity. The reward ought to correspond with the labour; but the toil of those labouring in the vineyard of Christ must not be estimated by the work alone; (for we should all say with the Apostle: “I reckon that the sufferings of this time are not worthy to be compared with the glory to come, that shall be revealed in us;”) but we must estimate the labour from the grace of God dwelling in the hearts of the just, which is a “fountain of living water” springing up into eternal life. And likewise from the virtue of charity, which is infused into us by the Holy Spirit that is given to us; but a crown of eternal life is prepared by God for them that love Him, as St. James writes. Likewise, from our union with Christ, who being the true vine, gives the greatest value to the fruit of living branches, and to the works of living members of His mystical body, of whom He is the head, and to whom He hath said: “Be glad and rejoice, for your reward is very great in heaven.” In fine, will not our Lord say at the last day, when the reward will be given to those that labour in the vineyard: “Come, ye blessed of my Father, possess you the kingdom prepared for you from the foundation of the world: For I was hungry, and ye gave me to eat” &c. Thus, works of charity especially relate to the labour by which we toil in the vineyard of the Lord. Behold, then, how precious this “penny” is, which is called by our Lord Himself a kingdom! Nor without reason is it called so, since it represents Christ no less than the treasure or pearl does. For on the coin is impressed the image of a prince, and words are inscribed on it, and the figure is round. Now, Christ is “the image of the invisible God,” and the “Word” of the eternal Father, “having neither beginning of days nor end of life,” which is signified by the round figure. And in fine, “All things obey money,” as Solomon saith: now, Christ is the “Lord of all,” as St. Peter testifieth in the Acts of the Apostles. Wherefore, the “penny” given to those labouring in the vineyard is Christ, true God, and by Him eternal life, according to St. John in his First Epistle: “And He hath given us understanding, that we may know the true God, and may be in his true Son. This is the true God, and life eternal.” (chap. v.) But let us consider to whom this precious reward is given, which, when once possessed, we shall no more stand in need of any thing else. “Call the labourers, and pay them their hire,” saith the Lord. The reward, therefore, will be given to those who labour without intermission, without negligence. But it will not be given to those standing in the market-place, idle, or engaged in fowling, hunting, or gambling: the reward will be bestowed on the deserving, not given gratis, and much less will it be given to the undeserving. When the Apostle saith, "The wages of sin is death; but the grace of God life everlasting," he therefore speaks, because, without the preventing grace of God, no one can do good so as to merit the reward of eternal life; but when grace is received, which is given "gratis," and not from our works, then the reward of good works will be eternal life. Thus St. Augustine speaks in his Epistle to Sixtus, a priest at Rome: "As death is the merited reward as it were of sin, so eternal life is the reward of virtue." But because the same reward is given to all, we must not suppose that, in the kingdom of heaven, all the rewards are alike. The coin signifies eternal life, whether God or Christ; now eternal life, that is, God and Christ, are common to all the saints. But, as the same sun is seen more clearly by the eagle than by other birds, and as the same fire gives more warmth to those that are near it than to those at a distance, so in eternal life one will see and enjoy God more clearly and sweetly than another; for, since there is a diversity of merit, so also will there be a diversity of reward. This may have been the reason why our Lord changed the order in the distribution of his payments, saying, "Call the labourers, and pay them their hire, beginning from the last even to the first. So shall the last be first, and the first last. For many are called, but few chosen." But these words relate to the grace of the New Testament, informing us that we are more happy than our fathers under the Old law, and therefore we should be grateful to God, and labour with more cheerfulness and diligence in his vineyard. The holy men that cultivated the vineyard of our Lord before the Ascension of Christ, such as Adam, Noah, Abraham, Moses, and other patriarchs and prophets, who were called at the first, third, sixth, and ninth hour laboured not only for a long time because they lived longer, but, even after death, they were expecting their reward for many centuries, and some for many thousands of years. The apostles, martyrs, and other labourers, who came to cultivate the vineyard at the eleventh hour, that is, at the last hour, according to the interpretation of St. John, laboured but for a few years, and immediately after death, having entered the kingdom of heaven, they received their reward. How great is this grace, by which, if a Christian wish, after enduring but very short labours, he can immediately ascend to that place, for which the most holy patriarchs and prophets sighed for so long a period! Not without cause did these ancient saints murmur as it were (though this seems to signify admiration rather than complaint) when they said: "These last have worked but one hour, and thou hast made them equal to us that have borne the burden of the day and the heats." But our Lord answered for us: "Friend, I do thee no wrong: didst thou not agree with me for a penny? Take what is thine, and go thy way: I will also give to this last, even as to thee." This answer does not mean that men under the new law receive by grace, and not by their justice, a reward equal to those under the Old law; but that they received a more abundant grace, by which they have no less laboured in the vineyard for a short time than the others did during a long period, and therefore they have justly received an equal, and even greater reward. The Apostles certainly laboured for a short time: but they brought forth the greatest fruit in the vineyard of the Lord. When did the patriarchs or prophets, having abandoned all temporal things, ever traverse almost the whole earth, and bring so many kingdoms of the Gentiles to the true worship of God? When, in those ancient times, did so numerous an army of martyrs endure every torment and the most cruel deaths for the true faith? When, in the Old Testament, were so many choirs of holy virgins found, who followed the spotless Lamb, and vowed and gave unto God their soul and body? Where were then so many pastors and doctors, who, watching over their flocks, fought against the wolves, that is, against heretics and pagans, by their most learned writings? Where, in fine, was so great a number of hermits and monks, and other religious men, who, emulating the life of angels, spent the day and night in the praise of God alone and in prayer? These and other examples of the most eminent virtue belong to the New Testament and its blessings, on account of which our Lord justly concludes the parable in these words: "Thus the last shall be first, and the first last. For many are called, but few are chosen;" that is, many have been called to cultivate the vineyard in all ages of the world, but few have been chosen to the grace of the New Testament, by which they have produced great fruit, and have in a short time received the greatest rewards. But we must not suppose that all who have been called at the eleventh hour, will receive a reward; but those only who have laboured, with their whole strength and for a short period, in the vineyard of the Lord. For many there are, who, knowing that this hour is the last, and that time is short, say not as they ought to do: "Our life is short, therefore let us diligently labour that, in so short a period, we may bring forth much fruit." But they speak as the foolish do in the Book of Wisdom: "They have said, reasoning with themselves, but not right: The time of our life is short and tedious, and in the end of a man there is no remedy, and no man hath been known to have returned from hell. Come, therefore, let us enjoy the good things that are present, and let us speedily use the creatures as in youth. Let us fill ourselves with costly wine and ointments; and let not the flower of the time pass by us. Let us crown our selves with roses, before they be withered: let no meadow escape our riot: let us every where leave tokens of joy, for this is our portion, and this our lot." (chap, ii.) Such is the language of those, who either know not God, or, acknowledging Him, deny Him by their works. And these are indeed so numerous, that to them may be referred the concluding words of the parable: "Many are called, but few are chosen." Many are called at the last hour, but few chosen, because few so labour as to be deserving of the reward. Woe therefore to us, who, being called at the last hour, spend the greater part of it in play and sleep, whilst we ought to be so careful of every moment as not to suffer one single portion of it to pass by unprofitably; for on these moments dependeth an eternity of happiness or of misery. And doubtless, in proportion as the grace granted to Christians under the New Law is greater, so much more grievously will they be punished who receive this grace in vain. And as the last shall be first in receiving the reward, because they laboured dili gently at the last hour; so also will the last be the first in receiving punishment, who shall neglect diligently to labour at the last hour.

Chapter IV

On The Talents

THE fourth parable is that in which our Lord thus speaks of the reward of beatitude: "Well done, good and faithful servant, because thou hast been faithful over a few things, I will place thee over many things: enter thou into the joy of thy Lord." (St. Matthew, chap. xxv. 21.) In these words two things are promised to faithful servants, the most ample power and the greatest joy: "I will place thee over many things;" and what these "many things" are, He explains in another place where it is said: "Blessed is that servant, whom, when his Lord shall come, he shall find so doing. Amen, I say to you, he shall place him over all his goods." (chap, xxiv. 46.) But what means being placed "over all the goods" of the Lord, except to receive power over all inferior things, and to be made a partaker of that sovereignty which God possesses over the whole universe? Who can comprehend the greatness of this power? What king or emperor upon earth can be compared with the least of the saints? But since man cannot possess such great power without having great care and trouble, therefore our Lord adds: "Enter into the joy of thy Lord." As if he wished to say, "As I make thee a partaker of the greatest power, so also do I make thee enjoy rest and pleasure, which no cares can destroy or dimmish." How great this "joy" will be, which is promised to the just in heaven, is quite inexplicable, nor shall we know it before we have experienced it. But yet, from the consideration of three words in the sentence, we may in some measure conceive how great will be the "joy." The first word is "enter;" for as it is not said, May the joy of thy Lord enter into thee, but enter thou into the joy of thy Lord, this is a proof that the joy will be greater than we can conceive. Wherefore, we shall enter into a great sea of divine and eternal joy, which will fill us within and without, and surround us on all sides. In this abundance of joy, what room will there be for sorrow? Another word is "into the joy," by which an indefinite joy concerning this or that good is not promised, but a joy absolutely pleasure itself, sweetness itself, delight itself. And doth not our whole soul dissolve as it were, being surrounded with such sweetness? But the third word, "of thy Lord," greatly increases this joy; for we shall enter, not into the joy which men or angels possess, but into that which God possesses, in whom are all infinite riches. Who can conceive what this joy of the Lord will be, but He who perfectly knoweth His own infinite goodness, and enjoys it in an infinite degree? And yet, Christian soul! what thou canst not now conceive, thou wilt experience, and taste, and eternally enjoy, if thou be a good and faithful servant. Let us now consider to whom these promises relate. They relate, without doubt, to those who have faithfully endeavoured to multiply the talents entrusted to them by God. The parable is drawn from a rich man, who went into a far country, and delivered his goods to his servants. And to one he gave five talents, and to another two, and to another one, commanding them all to multiply their talents by careful and prudent business. Various are the opinions of interpreters concerning the signification of these "talents;" Some understand by them "blessings" given gratis; others the Holy Scriptures; others the knowledge of external things acquired by the senses, is meant by the five talents; that the two talents signify understanding and action, and the one talent understanding alone: others, in fine, consider them to refer to natural gifts, such as genius and judgment, or to the spiritual ones of faith, hope, and charity. But all agree in this, that the multiplication of the talents consists in labouring diligently for our own salvation as well as that of others. But another explanation occurs to me, not repugnant to the others, and which altogether appears to agree with what our Lord says concerning the talents. And first, the talents are called "the goods of the Lord;" "He delivered to them his goods;" then the servants are commanded to multiply the talents: "Lord, thou didst deliver to me five talents, behold I have gained other five over and above." Thirdly, it is said, "He gave to every one according to his proper ability." Lastly, the talent is taken away from the wicked and slothful servant. I therefore understand by the talents the souls of faithful and pious men, entrusted to the care and fidelity of bishops. These are truly the "goods" of the Lord, which are not given to us, but only committed to our care to be multiplied. Our Lord did not say to Peter, "Feed thy sheep," but "Feed my sheep." Other things are our own goods, although bestowed by God, as genius, judgment, the Holy Scriptures, blessings given gratis, &c. But faithful and pious souls He calls His "goods," His vineyard, His family, His spouse: for these He came into the world, for their redemption He poured out His blood, to gain these He sent His apostles, to whom He said, "I will make you to be fishers of men." Now faithful souls are multiplied, when bishops convert sinners by word and by example. This St. Peter did when, after our Saviour had entrusted to him one hundred and twenty Christians, saying, "Feed my sheep," he converted on the day of Pentecost, by his first sermon, three thousand people, then five thousand, and afterwards many thousands. And St. Gregory Thaumaturgus, when made bishop of Neocesarea, found only seventeen Christians: but he so multiplied them, that when he was on the point of death only seventeen infidels were left in so large a city: this circumstance St. Gregory of Nyssa relates, in his Life of St. Gregory Thaumaturgus. But these talents are given to each one "according to his proper ability," For God who knoweth the strength that is, the prudence, knowledge, charity, and strength of all men, commits souls to those only who He thinks are fit to bear such a burden. And, therefore, no one ought to undertake the care of souls, and especially accept of the episcopacy, unless called by Him who gives the talents, according to the ability of each one. But if otherwise, we cannot wonder that many fall under the burden: neither will it be an excuse before God to say, that their shoulders were not equal to such a burden: He will answer, Who forced thee to bear a burden beyond thy strength? Didst thou not wish, and ask, and endeavour to obtain it? Now therefore thou shalt be cast out into the exterior darkness. In fine, the talent given to the slothful servant is taken away from him. And if we say, that the talents are the souls of the faithful, this will perfectly agree with the parable. For he who received only one talent, that is, the care of his own soul alone, will lose it if he neglect to take pro per care of it: the devil will make it his property. And as the blessed possess the liberty of the sons of God, by which they freely remain where they wish, and do whatever they desire; so on the contrary also, the wicked lose all liberty, and their hands and feet being bound, they can neither walk where they wish, nor do what ever they desire; but they are compelled to remain where they wish not, being unable to do what they wish: this is, to lose their soul. Wherefore this interpretation, in which by the talents faithful souls are understood, is quite consistent with the parable. But how the other opinions can be reconciled, it is no easy matter to teach: they are not, however, false on this account, or to be rejected, because it is not necessary to accommodate every explanation to the parable, as St. Chrysostom wisely remarks. "We shall still continue our exposition, not rejecting, as we have said, the exposition of others. Wherefore, our Lord has committed his talents to three sorts of men; to those who are perfect, such as bishops ought to be, He has given five talents, that is, a great number of people to take care of; to others less perfect, such as priests generally are, He has given two talents, that is, the fewer souls which are contained in a parish: but to others more rude and infirm, such as the common people, to each of them He has given one, that is, the care of his own soul, these also ought, as far as they can, by words of private exhortation and good example, to lead others from sin to the path of virtue, and in this way multiply the talent entrusted to them. And what is said of bishops and priests, ought also to be understood as relating to princes and magistrates, and fathers of families. Thus writes St. Augustine: "Every head of a family should be by his name, the paternal love of his family. For the sake of Christ and of eternal life, he should admonish, instruct, exhort, and connect all his dependants: he should manifest love to them, and likewise exercise discipline: thus in his own house he will fulfill in a certain degree, the spiritual office of a bishop." In this sense, Constantino the Great used to say, that he was a bishop out of the church, because he was solicitous that the church should be protected and extended: but yet, he did not usurp the ecclesiastical office. But lest any one should suppose that one man alone, or one class of men only is comprehended in this parable, because he alone who received the one talent was punished, we must know, that our Lord wishes us to understand the dangers to which superiors are exposed. For as at the last day he will reward those who do corporal works of mercy, and punish those who do them not; from which we know that greater will be the rewards of those who perform spiritual works of mercy, especially of the holy apostles and martyrs, and virgins of heroic virtue; and on the other hand, that greater will be the punishment of thieves, robbers, perjurers, and the sacrilegious, than those who give not alms to the poor: so also in this passage, because he who received the one talent which he might easily have multiplied, and yet did not, was most grievously punished, we must understand, that in proportion as bishops, pastors, and princes fail in this point, so will they be punished the more grievously, as the loss of many souls is greater than that of one. Let us hear what St. Augustine says on the danger of the ecclesiastical state: "Above all things, I beseech you piously and diligently to reflect, that in this life and especially at this time, nothing is more easy, pleasing, and acceptable to men, than the office of a bishop, priest, or deacon, if it be discharged in a careless or fawning manner; but before God nothing is more afflicting and offensive. Again, nothing in this life and especially at this time, is more difficult, laborious, and dangerous, than the office of a bishop, priest, or deacon; but before God nothing is more blessed, if it be fulfilled in the manner our great king commands." In the remaining part of this epistle he treats the subject in such a manner that I wish all ecclesiastics would attentively read it, and especially those who rashly aspire to the episcopacy or priesthood. For many when they have obtained what they asked for, and found what they sought after, either desert their flock, or being intent on other things, care little about attending to their flock and increasing the number of faithful and pious souls. On the night of the birth of our Saviour, the shepherds were keeping watch over their flocks: and if this was done for senseless sheep, by those who were a figure of the shepherds of the church, how much more ought it to be done by the shepherds of that flock, for which our Saviour when on earth, watched whole nights in prayer, not for Himself certainly, but for His sheep? And if the patriarch Jacob laboured so much for the flocks of his father-in-law, Laban, that he should say, "Day and night was I parched with heat, and with frost, and sleep departed from my eyes," what ought the shepherd of the flock of Christ to do, for which He shed His blood? And if the devil goeth about as a roaring lion seeking whom he may devour, is it not proper that the good shepherd should also go about, seeking whom to save? But it may be said, business connected with the Church often compels one to leave his flock. I admit this, when the business is important, and only a short time is spent in attending to it: otherwise great things are to be preferred before less, and the former should be performed by ourselves, the latter by others. For if business compels us to leave our much more important business, even dreadful wars, compel us not to leave our flock defenceless. The trumpet of St. Paul sounds forth: "Our wrestling is not against flesh and blood, but against principalities and powers, against the rulers of the world of this darkness, against the spirits of wickedness in the high places." (Ephesians vi. 12.) And if the general be absent, who shall teach the soldiers to extinguish the fiery darts of the most wicked one? Our Lord said to Peter, and through him to all pastors, "Feed my sheep:" He was silent on other things, to teach us that this duty was the chief duty. And in the consecration of a bishop it is said, Go, preach unto the people committed to thee; but on temporal matters nothing is added, that the bishop may be admonished, not to make temporal things equal to spiritual, much less to prefer the first before the latter. In fine, in the fourth council of Carthage, bishops are seriously commanded not to undertake by themselves the care of widows, minors, and strangers, but to entrust them to their arch-priest or deacon; not to undertake the settling of wills, not to engage in law-suits for transitory things, not to be occupied with domestic cares; but to attend only to reading, prayer, and preaching. Wherefore this council, composed of two hundred and fourteen bishops, at which St. Augustine was also present, wished that bishops should commit all temporal matters to others, that they might more freely attend to the care and increase of their flock. As this parable therefore shows us, that eternal happiness is an object especially to be desired, since it contains the highest power united with the greatest delight; so also it proves, that the means of arriving at this happiness, consists in labouring assiduously for the salvation of our own soul, and in seeking and procuring that of others. And they who refuse to endure this labour, are deprived not only of this happiness and pleasure, but are condemned to eternal torments in hell, for thus our Lord speaks: "The unprofitable servant cast ye out into the exterior darkness. There shall be weeping and gnashing of teeth." Here we should particularly notice, that the servant who is so severely punished, is not said to be wicked or impious, but only "unprofitable." Thus although a bishop, or priest, a prince, or magistrate, or head of a family, were free from other crimes, yet should he be unprofitable, that is, neglectful of his salvation and that of his subjects, he will be cast out into "the exterior darkness" &c. But if the unprofitable servant shall suffer this punishment, what will be done to the covetous, proud, luxurious servant, addicted to various vices? If the unprofitable servant be condemned, what an account will the impious prevaricator have to give to God, of the talents entrusted to him? Truly they that consider these things, will not seek after high places; and if they should be compelled to receive them, they will ever watch with fear and trembling, as having to give a most strict account of the souls entrusted to them.

Chapter V

The Parable Of The Supper

THE fifth parable, which is found in St. Luke, makes the happiness of the saints like to a great supper: and truly, not without reason. For in a nuptial or royal supper, everything is found that can delight the human sense, and exhibit the power, riches, and glory of this world. Wherefore, when king Assuerus ruled over a hundred and twenty-seven provinces, and wished to display the riches of the glory of his kingdom, and the greatness of his power, he found nothing more adapted for his purpose, than to prepare a most magnificent banquet. First, in a great banquet the eyes are delighted with the costly ornaments of the palace, with the numerous servants clad in beautiful and precious robes, with the gold and silver vases in which the viands are carried; the ears are delighted with various musical instruments, and the songs of many voices; the sense of smell is delighted with the odour of flowers, precious ointment, and scented water, &c.; the sense of taste with viands of every description, and precious wines from every land; in fine; the sense of touch is charmed by the softest and most elegant couches. Wherefore, as in a royal or nuptial banquet, nearly every corporal good is found that can be procured on earth, not without reason did our Lord, wishing to represent that "happiness" which in itself includes all good things, compare it to a great supper. Of this we read in the Apocalypse: "Blessed are they who are called to the nuptial supper of the Lamb." We may learn how great the supper of the Lord will be, from this circumstance, that the beauty of all the glorified bodies will be, the table on which the last service is placed. But so great is the sweetness of the last course, that when St. Peter once saw the body of the Lord resplendent as the sun, he said, "It is good for us to be here." And if these things be such, what will the supper itself be, which consists in the enjoyment of the divinity! In fine, all the good things of this world are nothing else than the rind and shell as it were, of the fruits of paradise. And if these parings be such, that men are enchanted with a love and desire for them, what will the fruit itself of paradise be! And if the fruit be such, what will the more solid and excellent food be! Truly it will be such, as always to be eaten without satiety, always to be desired. But we must not suppose, that the supper in heaven will be such as great princes give here on earth at their espousals; in heaven we shall be as the angels of God; "we shall neither marry, nor be married," nor shall we stand in need of food to support life. The supper therefore will consist of spiritual riches, and delights, and glory, and ornament, suitable to the state of the blessed. Riches and delights are mentioned in this life, because we see not things more excellent. But from these we may learn, that the spiritual supper will be so superior to our most splendid banquets, as heaven is to earth, and as God who will prepare it, is above all mortals in power and majesty. But some one will say, Why is the happiness of the saints compared to a supper, rather than to a dinner? The reason is this; because dinner is taken at mid-day and after it business is attended to till evening: but supper is taken towards evening, when all business is finished, and afterwards come rest and sleep. Wherefore in another parable which is found in St. Matthew, respecting the Incarnation of our Lord, dinner is introduced on account of the marriage which the king made for his son. The reason is, because our Lord's Incarnation, and the marriage with His spouse the Church, were commenced at mid-day, that is, a long while before the end of the world. After dinner, the redemption of the world, and the reconciliation of man with God, were celebrated. But when the bride shall be conducted to the palace of the bridegroom, and to the nuptial supper, all business will cease, and the sweetest sleep shall follow, that is, there will be eternal rest. This therefore is the reason, why the perfect glory of the blessed is compared to a supper, rather than to a dinner. But it will be useful to consider what we must do, in order to be admitted to the supper. This our Lord plainly teaches us in the parable, for He saith: "A certain man made a great supper and invited many And they began all at once to make excuse. The first said to him: I have bought a farm, and I must needs go out and see it: I pray thee, hold me excused. And another said: I have bought five yoke of oxen, and I go to try them: I pray thee hold me excused. And another said: I have married a wife, and therefore I cannot come." (St. Luke xiv.) How wonderful! Men are invited by God to the nuptial supper, and they refuse! What would they do if they were called to military service, or to undertake a long and dangerous journey? Such is the blindness of men, that they can scarcely be induced to believe what they do not see. But what is that which mortals prefer before the nuptial supper, that is, before their greatest, eternal good? Our Lord mentions three impediments to salvation, which of their own nature are not evil; but yet, too great an affection for them hinders our eternal salvation. To buy a farm, to try oxen, to marry a wife, are not sinful: but to prefer them before the kingdom of heaven, is an incredible blindness. And yet, there are many Christians who pursue temporal goods with such ardour; and honours, dignity, and power, signified in the purchase of the farm; and riches, signified by the oxen; and pleasure, by the marriage; that they spend days and nights in seeking and enjoying them, entirely forgetting those eternal rewards which God hath promised to them that love Him. And many are not content with purchasing farms, trying yokes of oxen, and marrying; but in order as it were, more completely to neglect their salvation, they seize the farms of other men, steal their oxen, and support concubines: nor do they ever consider what a misfortune it will be, for such husks of swine to be deprived of the supper of the Lord. Truly, if our Lord had promised to us worms of the earth, not a supper of infinite sweetness, but crumbs falling from that table; even then it would be advantageous for us to despise all temporal goods, that so we might possess those crumbs. What madness therefore is it, to prefer insignificant and fleeting pleasures, before this divine supper, which abounds with every eternal delight, and in which we shall sit down with the holy angels, and even with the King of Angels in heaven! After our Lord hath shown us what are the impediments to our being present at the great supper, He also added the means by which they may be removed: He continues in the parable: "Then the master of the house being angry, said to his servant: Go out quickly into the streets and lanes of the city, and bring in hither the poor and the feeble, and the blind and the lame." Because the rich were occupied in buying farms, and oxen, and marrying, they refused to attend the supper of their great Master. He therefore calls the poor, who have neither money to purchase farms and oxen, nor are able to support their wives, if they can find any. He calls the feeble, who cannot visit farms, nor buy oxen, nor marry wives: He calls the blind, who cannot see farms, nor manage oxen nor easily find a wife: He calls the lame, who cannot without the greatest difficulty, walk to a farm, manage oxen, or dance at a marriage. These therefore being free from every impediment by which the others are bound, and being admitted to the supper, ought justly to rejoice that God made them feeble, and blind, and lame. Many in this life complain, that they were born poor, or that they are often infirm, or blind, or lame, and they appear to be most unhappy thereat. But they know not what good things God hath prepared for them hereafter, on account of that very affliction which men call "misfortune:" but if they did know, they would certainly be glad and rejoice. No one ought to complain of the providence of God, but in all things give thanks to God the best of Fathers, who taketh care of us: to His will we should always resign ourselves. But although we must thus act, yet in this place those are properly considered poor, who are poor in spirit, not in riches; who are infirm, not in strength, but in confidence in themselves; who are blind, not in sight, but to craftiness; who are lame, not in their feet, but in their affections. I will explain my meaning more plainly. The poor who are admitted to the supper of the Lord, are those who hearing the words of the Apostle, do not wish to become rich: and if they possess money, do not hoard it up, nor spend it in vanity, but in doing what the Holy Spirit speaks by the mouth of David: "He hath distributed, he hath given to the poor; his justice remaineth for ever and ever." The infirm are those who confide not in their virtue, nor glory in their strength. The blind are they who truly believe what they do not see, especially as regards the rewards of the just, and the torments of the wicked. For he who is truly persuaded, that the rewards of the blessed are indeed most glorious and eternal, and the torments of the wicked most dreadful and everlasting, will not certainly be attached to the earth nor to its goods, but will fix his heart there, where alone is true joy. In fine, the lame are those and they can justly aspire to the supper of the Lord whose right foot is much longer than the left; that is, whose love of God and affection for eternal goods, are greater than the love of themselves and of temporal things, signified by the left foot. But let us consider the sentence of our great Master, against those who blindly and most foolishly despised His Supper: "But I say unto you, that none of those men that were invited shall taste of my supper." Our Lord knew well, that they who had been invited, and who through love for present goods despised the future ones as useless, would hunger after that supper with an incredible ardour when the senses of the flesh were extinct in death, and all earthly things had been removed: for the prophet David saith: "They shall return at evening, and shall suffer hunger like dogs; and shall go round about the city." (Psalm Iviii.) At evening, when the day of this present life is finished, they will return and repent, but their sorrow will be useless, and they will be hungry like mad dogs, and go round about the City of God, seeking to obtain, if they can, a few crumbs from that supper. But the sentence of the Lord is fixed “None of them shall taste of my supper”! if thou didst know, my soul, the meaning of these words, “None of them shall taste of my supper;” if thou couldst comprehend how great will be the hunger of those miserable men, and of what sweet food they will for ever be deprived! And what would they then give, if they could but taste of that for which they so ardently long? But nought will they obtain, even if the whole world were at their disposal, and they were willing to renounce it. Since then this is the case, let us be converted whilst we have time, whilst it is our day, whilst penance is profitable. Let us now hunger after that most delicious supper, not as mad and unclean dogs, who think of nothing but of their food, but as men endowed with reason; let us hunger after the food of eternal life, and the bread of angels, even that hidden manna “which no one knoweth but he that receiveth,” and which God Himself enjoyeth from eternity unto eternity. And let us so live in this our exile, as not to be in love with it, but to sigh after our true country. When we shall have arrived there, we shall not be obliged to “go round about” the city, but we shall enter the open gate; and being admitted to the supper of the Lord, we shall be filled with the bread of life and the water of wisdom, a most sweet and pleasant food.

Chapter VI

The Parable Of The Wise And Foolish Virgins

THE last parable is that which makes the happiness of the saints like to a royal marriage, to which ten virgins were invited, five being wise and five foolish. We shall first briefly explain who is the bride, and who the bridegroom; then how excellent a good is signified by the word “marriage;” and lastly, what is required for our attaining so great an object. First then, no one can doubt but that Christ is the bridegroom. This is expressed by St. John the Baptist, where speaking of Christ he says: “He that hath the bride, is the bridegroom; but the friend of the bridegroom, who standeth and heareth him, rejoiceth with joy because of the bride groom’s voice.” Our Lord Himself also intimates the same in the parable of the king who made a marriage for his son. The Apostle confirms the same, in his Epistle to the Corinthians: “I have espoused you to one husband, that I may present you as a chaste virgin to Christ.” So also does St. John in the Apocalypse: “Let us be glad and rejoice, and give glory to him; for the marriage of the Lamb is come, and his wife hath prepared herself:” and again, “Blessed are they that are called to the marriage supper of the Lamb.” It is equally certain, that the Church is the bride. This the Apostle clearly asserts in his Epistle to the Ephesians: “Therefore as the Church is subject to Christ, so also let the wives be to their husbands in all things. Husbands, love your wives, as Christ also loved the Church, and delivered himself up for it, that he might sanctify it For this cause shall a man leave his father and mother, and shall cleave to his wife, and they shall be two in one flesh. This is a great sacrament; but I speak in Christ and in the Church.” (chap. v. 24, &c.) But although the Church be the spouse of Christ, and the faithful be called the Sons of the Church, because by baptism she has brought them forth, as it were, for Christ; yet, because the Church is nothing more than an assembly of the faithful, therefore all pious souls are individual spouses, as the Church is an universal spouse. For not falsely doth the Church sing of holy virgins, “Come, spouse of Christ, and receive the crown which the Lord hath prepared for thee for ever.” But although holy virgins are, in a special manner, called spouses of Christ, because they have rejected a carnal marriage, in order to be spiritually married to Christ alone; yet other Christian souls are also “spouses” of Christ, for they are espoused to Him by faith, united to Him by charity, and aspire to a consummation of the spiritual marriage in the kingdom of heaven. But if we could sufficiently conceive what a good it will be for the human soul to be united with marriage in Christ, we should find nothing more honourable, nothing more useful, nothing more sweet, either in this world or in the next. Great is the glory, advantage, and sweetness in serving the King of kings; greater to be numbered amongst his friends and domestics; the greatest to be called a son of God and the brother of Christ. But to become the “spouse” of God, a partner of His throne, of His crown, and of all His titles, appears to me to be more than the greatest, if I may so speak. This it is of which our Lord speaks in Isaias concerning spiritual eunuchs: “I will give to them in my house, and within my walls, a name better than sons and daughters;” that is, I will give to them the name of a spouse. Who can comprehend, how noble, how honourable and sweet it will be, not only to behold God and to converse with him, but to become one spirit with Him, and to be transformed into Him? These are the words of the Apostle: “He who is joined to a harlot, is made one body But he who is joined to the Lord, is one spirit:” and again, “But we all beholding the glory of the Lord with open face, are transformed into the same image from glory to glory, as by the Spirit of the Lord.” (2 Epist. to the Corinth, iii. 18.) How great will be the pleasure, when being united to God and irradiated by the brightness of His countenance, we shall be transformed into His brightness, and made most like unto Him! “We shall be like to him,” saith St. John, “because we shall see him as he is.” We shall be like to Him, not only as images created according to His likeness; but like in glory, in beatitude, in happiness. St. Paul the apostle, in that wonderful rapture he had when he was caught up into paradise, heard secret words which it was not in the power of man to utter; and yet he was so absorbed in God, that he knew not whether he was in the body or out of the body. How great, therefore, will be that most happy union of the soul with God, when absorbed and immersed in the sea of His sweetness, she will be “one spirit” with God! So great will be the joy, that as St. Bernard says, “All other joy compared with it will be sorrow all sweetness will be bitterness; all honour, dishonour; whatever else, in fine, can delight us, will be troublesome.” But since this union of the most beautiful spouse with a blessed soul be ineffable, let us rather inquire from the present parable what are the conditions on which we can be admitted to this most happy marriage? These we shall learn from the qualities of the wise virgins, for they alone entered into the nuptials of the heavenly spouse. The qualities or conditions are five; first, that we be virgins; secondly, that we be prudent; thirdly, that we have our lamp lighted; fourthly, that we have oil in it; and lastly, that we watch, and by watching diligently await the coming of the bridegroom. As far as regards the first condition, the spouses of Christ ought all to be virgins, not necessarily in the flesh, but in faith and morals, as St. Augustine justly explains in his Sermon on these words of the Apostle: “I have espoused you to one husband, that I may present you as a chaste virgin to Christ.” By a chaste virgin he understands the whole Church of Corinth, in which it is evident that all were not virgins in the flesh, since the Apostle in his First Epistle admonishes married people of their duties. In this parable, therefore, all those are virgins who are not corrupted in their faith and morals, and who, declining from evil, do not defile their souls. But, because it is not sufficient for perfect justice to decline from evil, but also to do good, therefore the second condition is added, that we be prudent, not foolish. Nor must we think it sufficient, if we injure no one, nor kill any one, nor steal, nor bear false testimony; but we must consider our last end, and adopt the means to attain it. And because this end is eternal life, and the means the merit of good works, therefore the third condition is added, that our lamp be lighted, which signifies good works. This St. Augustine teaches in the above-mentioned place, and our Lord Himself, where He says: “So let your light shine before men, that they may see your good works, and glorify your Father who is in heaven.” But since good works spring from charity as from a root, and cannot be preserved unless nourished by the same charity, as a lamp necessarily goes out if oil be wanting; therefore, a fourth condition is required, that the prudent virgin always have oil in her lamp. St. Augustine teaches that charity is signified by oil, because, as oil is superior to all liquids, so charity is superior to all virtues, according to the Apostle: “And I show unto you yet a more excellent way;” and again: “And now there remain faith, hope, charity, these three; but the greater of these is charity.” If, therefore, we should prefer anything in our heart, or make it equal with charity, immediately she departs; for she ought either to have . the first place, and reign in our heart, or she will leave us. And because oil is a most subtile liquid, which easily ascends above other things, the power of the oil of charity is so great in ascending, that if it be poured out on the soul of a public sinner, immediately it draws that soul up, and of a sinner makes a saint, of a carnal man makes a spiritual man. I will even venture to say, that if this oil were poured on the souls of the damned, or could drop on the devils themselves, we should immediately behold them all ascend on high. And if, on the contrary, this oil were to desert the souls of the holy angels, apostles, martyrs, and virgins, they would quickly descend down into hell. Behold, then, the excellence of this oil, and how justly those virgins are called foolish who have not this oil. But there is also another reason why charity is signified by oil, because it maketh things that are hard and rough soft and pliable. This oil renders the yoke sweet, of which our Lord speaks, “My yoke is sweet.” What made the yoke of obedience sweet to the Apostles, of going into the whole world and preaching the Gospel to every creature, but the oil of charity? What made the yoke of patience sweet to the martyrs, to endure so great and unheard of torments, but the oil of charity? What made the yoke of poverty, of chastity, and of obedience, so sweet to many thousands of religious men and women, but the yoke of charity? No thing is more sweet to a lover than to show his love for his Beloved by doing or enduring great and difficult things for his sake. There now remaineth a fifth condition, which is the most important of all, being especially commanded by our Lord in this parable, viz., watchfulness: “Watch ye therefore, because you know not the clay nor the hour.” And in order that these words may be deeply impressed upon the hearts of the faithful, He constantly repeats “Watch;” and again, in St. Matthew: “Wherefore, be you also ready, because at what hour you know not the Son of man will come;” and in St. Mark: “Watch ye therefore, for you know not when the Lord of the house cometh: at even, or at midnight, or at the cock crowing, or in the morning; lest coming on a sudden, he find you sleeping. And what I say to you I say to all: Watch.” And in St. Luke: “Blessed are those servants whom the Lord when he cometh shall find watching.” And by the apostle Peter He speaketh: “Be prudent therefore, and watch in prayer;” and by St. Paul also: “Therefore let us not sleep, as others do; but let us watch and be sober;” and by St. John: “Behold I come as a thief: blessed is he that watcheth.” All these passages signify, that the coming of the Lord to judgment, whether at the end of the world, or at each one’s death in particular, is uncertain; and therefore God requires of us that we should always watch, waiting in expectation of His coming, that so He may find us prepared, and may not be compelled to exclude us, with the foolish virgins, from the marriage-feast. Wherefore, to “sleep” meaneth nothing more than to be careless of death and judgment, or so to live as never to care or think of so important a matter, on which dependeth eternal salvation. But corporal sleep is not forbidden the faithful, otherwise it would not be said in the parable, “They all slumbered and slept:” only forgetfulness and want of consideration are forbidden. Every Christian therefore, to whom the salvation of his soul is dear, ought every day, morning and evening, shutting the door of his heart against all other business, attentively consider that this day or night may possibly be his last: and therefore he should seriously watch, lest he be found unprepared. All men dislike the thought of death, and gladly turn their mind to the consideration of something else; but the sick man dislikes the bitter physic, and yet through love of life he willingly takes it. So also it behooves a prudent man to esteem the loss of his soul more than the fear of death; and therefore, again and again, he should think that there is no hour in which he may not die. For when this thought deeply descends into the bottom of our heart, it will soon change the whole and from, carnal make him spiritual, from a sinner a saint: so that he will no more fear, but love the coming of the Lord. Not without reason, then, does our Lord so frequently exhort us to watch, nor Ecclesiasticus to admonish us: “In all thy works remember thy last end, and thou shalt never sin.” (chap. vii.) For who, remembering that he is hastening to judgment, and that quickly he will have to stand before the divine tribunal, can dare to sin before his Judge? We are all hastening every moment to judgment; but yet, so great is human blindness, that even on the journey itself we offend our Judge, and most justly provoke His anger against us. Who is there, when condemned to suffer death, and being led out to execution, would laugh and joke, and speak of his former crimes, or of attaining dignities, and gaining money by traffic, unless he were mad? Now, we are all certainly condemned to death, nor can any son of Adam escape the sentence: our mortal life is nothing but a journey towards death: but yet, on this journey, which cannot be a long one, how do the generality of Christians act? What do they think of, what do they speak of, what are they busy about, but honours, riches, pleasures, and even wickedness, as if they would never die! And what is this but to sleep over serious things, and to watch over foolish things? Justly, then, doth our Lord cry out: “Watch, watch;” blessed are those who, excited by these words, reflect where they are, and whither they are going, and so endeavour to have their lamp burning and filled with oil, that when the cry shall be heard, “Behold the spouse cometh, go ye forth to meet him.” They may with joy run forth to meet the Bridegroom, and enter with him into the marriage. But woe to them who, forgetful of this, and deaf to the voice of God, shall be found sleeping with their lamps extinguished: being excluded from the delights of the marriage-feast, they will in vain exclaim, “Lord, Lord, open unto us.”

Chapter VII

On The Prize

HAVING explained a few of the parables which are to be found in the gospel, there now only remains the explanation of those names which are used in St. Paul’s First Epistle to the Corinthians; these are the “Prize” and “Crown.” Of the former the Apostle thus speaks: “Know you not that they that run in the race, all run indeed, but one receiveth the prize; so run that you may obtain.” (chap. ix. 24.) The same Apostle in his Epistle to the Corinthians teaches, that by the “prize” eternal happiness is signified; he says, “But one thing I do, forgetting the things that are behind, and stretching forth myself to those that are before, I press towards the mark, to the prize of the supernal vocation of God in Christ Jesus.” (chap. iii. 13, 14.) Wherefore the prize is in heaven, and to it the Almighty invites us by His Son Christ Jesus. The prize which the kings of this world offer us, is no very valuable object; but our “heavenly prize” is in every way most glorious, whether we consider God who promises it, a Prince of infinite power and glory, of whom the prophet sings, “Thy magnificence is elevated above the heavens;” or whether we remember, that the combatants are His children and the brothers of Christ, whom the King their Father, would not certainly invite to run in the race, unless the prize was so great that it might justly be desired, even by the sons of God. But it is more important for us to know, what is the meaning of running for the prize, and by what art we may so run as to be able to gain it. To run for the prize means nothing more, than faithfully to observe all the commandments of the Lord our God. That the “race” signifies the law of the Lord, David testifies where he says, “Blessed are the undefiled in the way, who walk in the law of the Lord I have run the way of thy commandments, when thou didst enlarge my heart.” (Psalm cxviii.) Wherefore, they who run “the way” of the commandments, run in the race for the prize. Now the art of so running that we may gain the prize, includes three points: First, we must not go out of the course, for they who do so, however quickly they may run, will never reach the goal, because they run not for the prize, but at an uncertainty. This the Apostle tells us he carefully avoided; “I therefore so run, not as at an uncertainty.” What is it to run out of the race, except not to run in the way of the commandments, and to turn aside to the right or to the left? For example: the law says, “Thou shalt love thy neighbour as thyself;” he that does this, runs in the race and for the prize. But he who loves his neighbour with so great a love as not to fear offending God for his sake, he turns aside to the right and runs out of the race; he runs not for the prize, but at an uncertainty. And the more benefits he bestows upon that individual who becomes an “idol” to him, the more does he wander, and the farther does he depart from the prize. But on the other hand, he that loves not his neighbour as much as he ought to do, and when he sees him in want, and “shuts up his bowels from him,” as St. John expresses it, then he turns aside to the left, and neither runs in the race nor for the prize, even though he should appear to perform many good works. We must, therefore, love our neighbours as ourselves, neither more nor less; that is, we ought so to act towards our neighbour, as to do to him, what we should wish to be done to ourselves. This is the explanation given by Christ our teacher, who gave the commandment. What I have said concerning the love of our neighbour, which is the positive command, may also be said of the negative commands. For he that steals, declines to the right of the commandment, “Thou shalt not steal,” and thus turns aside from the course; he however that steals not, but squanders away his own substance, declines to the left, and in like manner turns aside from the course. But the just man, who alone remains in the course, would no less depart from it if he stole, than if he squandered his goods, because liberality, which relates to justice, has two opposite vices, avarice and prodigality. The conclusion is, that he who wishes to remain in the race, must be entirely free from mortal sin. The second condition is, that he who wishes to gain the prize, must run quickly and with perseverance. He runs quickly, who observes the “commandments” with a fervent will, according to the words of the Psalmist, “Blessed is the man that feareth the Lord, in His commands he delights exceedingly;” and the Apostle says, “Fervent in spirit serving the Lord.” He runs with perseverance, who is never fatigued nor ceases running, knowing what is written, “He only that perseveres to the end shall be saved.” But to run quickly, not to be fatigued, nor to interrupt our course these seem almost contrary to one another, or at least very difficult; for he that runs quickly, is soon fatigued and ceases running; whilst he that wishes not to be tired, goes slowly and perseveres on his course at a moderate pace. These remarks are true, and therefore few arrive at the prize. It is, however, absolutely necessary for him that wishes to gain the prize, to run both quickly and with perseverance, because the time is short and the way is long. But if Christians wish to imitate those that run for a corruptible crown, they can easily run quickly and without intermission for “an incorruptible crown.” What do those do who contend for the corruptible prize? They carry nothing burthensome, they cast off their garments, that so they may run free and unencumbered. This, therefore, should Christians do; they should cast off the burthens of worldly cares, and the garments of carnal desires, or at least every inordinate affection to earthly goods. And when this is done, they must glory not in their own strength, but place all their hope in God; then they will not be fatigued by running quickly in the race. This is not my doctrine, but that of Isaias and St. Paul; the former thus speaks: “But they that hope in the Lord shall renew their strength; They shall run and not be weary, they shall walk and not faint.” (chap. xl. 31.) And the Apostle writes: “This therefore I say brethren, the time is short; it remaineth, that they also who have wives, be as if they had none. And they that weep, as though they wept not; and they that rejoice, as if they rejoiced not; and they that buy, as though they possessed not. And they that used this world, as if they used it not; for the fashion of this world passeth away.” (1 Epist. to Corinth, vii. 29.) By these words, the Apostle does not forbid Christians from marrying, nor from weeping in adversity, nor rejoicing in prosperity, nor purchasing necessary things, or using the goods of this world; but he admonishes us, in all these things to use that moderation, and to be as little attached to them, as if they did not belong to us. The devout Melania is an example for us in this respect; she was a noble Roman lady, of whom St. Jerome thus speaks in his Epitaph on Blosilla: “St.. Melania is a pattern of true nobility among the Christians of our time; for whilst the corpse of her husband was still warm, not yet being buried, she lost her two sons together. I am about to relate a thing almost incredible, but Christ is my witness it is not false. Who would not suppose that she would tear her hair, her garments, and strike her breast, like one mad? but not one tear did she shed, she stood unmoved, and throwing herself at the feet of Christ, as if she actually embraced Him, she smiled saying, “More freely shall I now serve thee, Lord, because thou hast delivered me from so great a burthen.” Thus St. Jerome, who by this example shows us who those are that have wives, and children, and other goods of this world, as if they had them not, in order that they might run for the prize more freely. But we have a still more moving example in holy Job, who in one day lost all his sons and daughters, as well as his whole substance; and thus he lay full of ulcers on a dunghill, who a little while before, was esteemed most happy among all the Orientals. And yet, as if all these misfortunes did not concern him, he uttered these words so full of wisdom: “Naked came I out of my mother’s womb, and naked shall I return thither; the Lord gave and the Lord hath taken away; as it hath pleased the Lord, so is it done; blessed be the name of the Lord.” (chap. i. 21.) In fine, St. Peter and the other Apostles who first followed Christ in running for the prize, that they might teach us what is required in the same race, thus speak: “Behold we have left all things, and have followed thee; what therefore shall we have?” our Lord approving what they had done, thus answers, clearly promising them the prize: “Amen, I say to you, that you who have followed me, in the regeneration, when the Son of man shall sit on the seat of his majesty, you also shall sit on twelve seats, judging the twelve tribes of Israel.” (St. Matthew xix. 28.) The third condition is, that he who wishes for the prize, must be united with Christ. For as the Apostle saith, “All run indeed, but one receiveth the prize;” now “this one” is doubtless our Saviour, who “hath rejoiced as a giant to run the way;” and of Him St. John speaks: “And no man hath ascended into heaven, but he that descended from heaven, the Son of man who is in heaven.” (chap. iii. 13.) But Christ hath not ascended alone, but with all those who were “one” with Him; that is, who were true and living members of His body, of which He is the head. Wherefore all who run labour in vain, even though they should give all their goods to the poor, and deliver their body to be burned, unless they are joined to Christ by faith and charity, and become one with Him, as He says in St. John, “That they may be one, as we also are one, I in them, and thou in me, that they may be made perfect in one.” (chap. xvii. 22.) But there is also another way of being united with Christ, which in a wonderful manner helps us to run quickly and with perseverance. Christ as man ran for the prize, although as God He is the “prize” itself; He is “true God and life eternal,” as St. John testifies; and this also our Saviour himself tells us, “I am the way, and the truth, and the life.” As the truth, He guides us; as the way, He leads us after Him; as the life, He brings us to Himself. In order to obtain the prize then, nothing is more useful than, for us never to turn away our eyes from Him, but to exclaim with the prophet: “My eyes are ever towards the Lord.” He that keeps the eye of his soul united with his prize, neither sees nor hears what his neighbours say or do, whether they smile or mock at him; he heeds not the opinions of others, whether they praise or dispraise him; but he says with David, “And I became as a man that heareth not;” and with the Apostle, “But to me it is a very small thing to be judged by you, or by man’s day.” The nearer he approaches the prize, the more does he see the greatness of it; and this greatness gives him additional strength, and induces him though wearied and fainting, not to interrupt his course. Wherefore, whoever aspires after this heavenly prize, must not turn aside from the course of the divine commands, he must run quickly and with perseverance; and being joined to Christ with true faith and charity, he must never turn away his eyes from the prize.

Chapter VIII On The Crown

THE last name given to eternal happiness, is “a crown of justice,” of which St. Paul thus speaks in the same chapter that he mentions the prize: “And every one that striveth for the mastery, refraineth himself from all things: and they indeed that they may receive a corruptible crown; but we an incorruptible one.” (1 Corinth, ix. 25.) In this passage by the word “mastery” is not meant the race in the course, but rather a contest or battle; and that this comparison is different from the former, the words following prove: “I therefore so run, not as at an uncertainty: I so fight, not as one beating the air:” and so also do these words addressed to Timothy: “I have fought a good fight, I have finished my course, I have kept my faith. As to the rest, there is laid up for me a crown of justice.” (2 to Timothy, iv. 7.) In both these passages St. Paul distinguishes the course from the fight; and in one of the comparisons he uses the word “prize,” and in the other the word crown,” which names are evidently distinct. Now by the “crown” is meant eternal happiness, and this is called by St. Paul “a crown of justice,” because it is given as a reward for good works. In St. James’s Epistle it is called “the crown of life,” because it comprehends life eternal. By St. Peter it is named “a never-fading crown of glory.” In fine, the prophet Isaias says: “In that day the Lord of hosts shall be a crown of glory, and a garland of joy to the residue of his people.”(xxviii. 5.) From this passage we may conclude, that the crown of which St. Paul speaks, and which is given to the victorious in battle, is a prize most high and noble, since God Himself will be the crown encircling and adorning the heads of the residue of His people that is, of those few among His people who shall gain the victory, by having been valiant in war. And as “many are called, but few are chosen” a truth evident from the testimony of Scripture; so the crown of the Saints will be the more glorious in the day of judgment, because so few will obtain it. Let us now consider what is the nature of the contest we are engaged in, and what we must do to gain the victory. The contest indeed is most terrible, and the struggle most dangerous, especially if it be compared with that contest in which men on earth engage, for a corruptible crown. The Apostle alludes to the games of the circus, which took place in the presence of the people. But the combatants fought with men like themselves, and used the same weapons, and were equally exposed to the danger of popular derision or ignominy. But Christians have to fight with enemies whom they see not, and by whom they themselves are observed: they are most numerous, strong, and crafty; their arms are not alike; the contest is carried on before God and his angels, and for a crown of life eternal, and at the risk of incurring everlasting death: in fine, the contest is not easy or imaginary, but real and most dreadful. Our antagonists are demons, whom the Scripture at one time names lions and at another, dragons and basilisks. And we also have traitors in our own houses that is, in our bodies, the concupiscence of the flesh which wars against the spirit, as St. Peter saith: “Dearly beloved, I beseech you as strangers and pilgrims, to refrain yourselves from carnal desires which war against the soul.” (1 Epist. xi.) Moreover, what is still most miserable, this contest takes place at the same time that we run in the race: and therefore the Apostle joins these two together that we may know how, whilst running for the prize, we are impeded throughout our whole course by these enemies, and hence that we must both run and fight at the same time.! if Christians did but consider these truths and know their true condition, truly they would not so easily squander away their time in temporal trifles, in jokes, plays, and banquets; in accumulating money and seeking after honours, as if their chief happiness consisted in these things: but they would listen to the Apostle crying out to them: “Therefore take unto you the armour of God, that you may be able to resist in the evil day, and to stand in all things perfect. Stand therefore, having your loins girt about with truth, and having on the breast-plate of justice. And in all things taking the shield of faith, wherewith you may be able to extinguish all the fiery darts of the most wicked one. And take unto you the helmet of salvation, and the sword of the Spirit, (which is the word of God.) By all prayer and supplication praying at all times in the Spirit.” &c. (Epist. to Ephesians, vi. 13, &c.)! What an exhortation is this; how full of terror how earnest! especially if we ponder on the words, “By all prayer and supplication, praying at all times.” And yet, how many of us so act as if we neither had to run in the race, nor fight in the battle! And now, I ask, what is to be done, that we prove victorious in such a dreadful contest? St. Paul tells us when he says: “And every one that striveth for the mastery, refraineth himself from all things: and they indeed that they may receive a corruptible crown; but we an incorruptible one.” The meaning of these words is this: those combatants, that they might obtain a corruptible crown, abstain from all those things which might weaken their body, and render them unfit to engage in such a ludicrous contest, viz., from excessive eating and drinking, from carnal delights, from domestic cares, and from all other things, however pleasant or useful, which might retard or prevent the victory. We therefore who labour for “an incorruptible crown,” ought much more to refrain from every thing that may weaken our soul, and render it unfit for that terrible fight, and for running the race in the course. And what things weaken the soul? Excessive eating, indulgence in sleep, too frequent visiting, hunting, boisterous laughter and singing; not reading good books, not praying, not meditating, not bewailing our sins, nor bringing forth worthy fruits of penance. From these ought we to abstain, if we wish our soul to be strong and fit to run in the race and fight in battle. "Take heed," saith our Saviour, "lest your hearts be overcharged with surfeiting and drunkenness, and the cares of this life, and that day come upon you suddenly." But on the other hand, the food of the soul which makes it strong, is fasting; the refreshment of the soul is prayer; the sleep of the soul holy contemplation; the purgation from noxious humours an humble confession of our sins; the joy and delight of the soul tears of compunction; and the triumph of the soul, the crucifixion of the flesh and the concupiscence thereof. "They that are Christ's," saith St. Paul, "have crucified their flesh, with the vices and concupiscences:" and again, "I so fight, not as one beating the air: but I chastise my body, and bring it into subjection, lest perhaps when I have preached to others, I myself should become a cast-away." Behold the true explanation of these words, "Every one that striveth for the mastery, refraineth himself from all things." I so fight, he says, in the contest that I abstain from all those things, which can please the body and which wage war against me; these are my carnal concupiscences. But by chastising my body by fastings and watchings, and other mortifications of the flesh, I reduce it into subjection that it may not rebel against the soul, nor serve my enemies. But who does not fear and tremble with his whole heart, when he remembers these words: "Lest perhaps when I have preached to others, I myself should become a cast-away?" If this vessel of election called by God Himself to be an Apostle, and who was rapt up into the third heaven, feared lest he should become a "cast-away," if he did not chastise his body and bring it into subjection, who amongst us will not also fear to be condemned, unless we crucify our flesh with its vices and concupiscences? This example of the Apostle ought truly to admonish all men, that they must not venture to hope for the crown, unless they be seriously converted; unless they bring forth worthy fruits of penance, and endeavour by every possible means to bring the flesh into subjection to the spirit. But how deplorable are the blindness and foolishness of the many, who mind not these things, nor abstain from what is unlawful, but live so securely as if they had received a most assured promise from God, that their salvation was certain! But this is only another proof, as we have already said, that few are saved, and "that many are called but few are chosen." Unto Thee then do I fly, good Lord! I am thy servant, and the son of thy hand maid: I desire with my whole soul that heavenly prize and most glorious crown, which Thou hast prepared and promised to those that love Thee. I know the greatness of the contest and the length of the course; I know my weakness, and I confess before Thee who searchest the reins and the heart, that I possess little or no virtue: neither am I ignorant of the great power and cruel hatred of my invisible enemies, who lament that we so insignificant are destined for that immense glory, from which they fell by pride. Enlighten my eyes that I never sleep in death; increase my strength, lest I faint on the way: may Thy grace defend me, lest at any time my enemy say: ] have prevailed against him. But what I ask for myself, I ask for all my Brethren also; and especially for those placed by Thee in high dignities, whether ecclesiastical or secular: their danger is so much the -greater, as their functions are more excellent. But the more glorious will be their crown, if they perform their duties properly; and on the other hand, the more terrible the punishment if through their fault those souls perish, whom Thou hast redeemed by Thy precious blood.

The Eternal Union Of The Blessed Spirits With God In The Vision Of The Eternal Birth Of The Son Of God

O HOLY Spirit, Eternal Love of the Father and of the Son, be merciful to my weakness!

We shall see God then, Face to face, beholding the Divine Essence in a very real Presence, with all Its Infinite Beauty, Power, Goodness, Wisdom and all other perfections. We shall realise the infinite knowledge of His Own Beauty which the Father has from all eternity, and which He expressed by the Word, Which, comprehending and representing all the Father's Perfection, could be no other than One with Him in the Godhead, the Glory equal, the Majesty co-eternal. Thus we behold the external and glorious generation of the Divine Word, by which He was eternally born in the Image and Likeness of God, a real and natural Likeness, without external accidents, inasmuch as all that is of God is substance, while all is interior, not exterior. Of one Substance with the Father; the Godhead, Glory, and Majesty all one, the Persons distinct. For how could God the Son be the true Image of His Father, if He did not possess the Father's Perfections? and how could He possess Infinite Perfections without being Himself Infinitely Perfect? and how could He be Infinitely Perfect, unless He were God? and how could He be God, and not be One with the Father?

So, then, God the Son is One with the Father in Substance, not confounding the Persons; He is of the Father, not made nor created, but begotten. The Father spoke, and the Word was. "The dew of Thy Birth is of the womb of the morning."

When S. Bernard was a boy at Chatillon-sur-Seine, he was waiting one Christmas Eve in church for the service to begin, and falling asleep, he beheld a very clear vision of the Birth of the Son of God, "coming forth as a Bridegroom out of His chamber;" and so mightily was he filled with joy and spiritual delight thereat, that henceforth, albeit continually sucking up the honey of Divine consolation, the Christmas solemnities had ever a very special attraction and meaning for him. Now if a mere mystical vision of the temporal Birth of the Son of God could so greatly kindle the heart of a child, what will it be when our hearts, enlightened by Heaven's Own Light, shall see the Eternal Generation of the Son of God, Light of light, Very God of Very God! Surely the soul so favoured will be drawn with incomprehensible attraction to that wondrous Grace, and will abide for ever inseparably united to It.

The Union Of The Blessed With God Through The Visilon Of The Holy Ghost's Production

HOW could it be but that the Father, beholding the Infinite Beauty and Excellence of His Essence in His Son, and the Son beholding the Father as the Source whence that Beauty rises, must be united in an Infinite Love? But this Love is not like the love of creatures, either mutual or to their Creator. The love of creatures comes from manifold emotions; that of the Godhead is the influence of one Breath of Father and Son, and from that inspiration the Holy Spirit proceeds. David says,"Behold, how good and joyful a thing it is, brethren, to dwell together in unity! It is like the precious ointment upon the head, that ran down unto the beard, even unto Aaron's beard, and went down to the skirts of his clothing." And if human love is so beautiful and glorious a sight, what will it be to behold the mutual Love of the Blessed Trinity, Father, Son, and Holy Ghost?

S. Gregory Nazianzen says that the great love and friendship between him and S. Basil was renowned all over Greece; and Tertullian records that even the heathen marvelled at the more than brotherly love of the early Christians. How marvellous, how glorious, then, the Eternal Love of the Godhead! Surely we shall be lost in the depths of wonder and marvel in the contemplation of that most glorious beatific vision!

Chapter XIV

The Holy Light Of Glory Will Serve For The Union Of The Blessed Spirits With God

THUS our human intelligence will behold the j Divine Essence without intermediary or veil, but not without some strengthening light enabling it to perceive and face so great and dazzling a Glory. The bat has sight suited for the dim twilight, but could not bear the brightness of noonday; and so we can perceive God's natural truths, and even to some extent His Supernatural Graces, by the light of faith, but we cannot attain to the vision of His Very Self. Therefore in His Eternal Love and Wisdom He prepares our mental capacity, strengthens and renders it fit to receive a vision so far exceeding our natural capabilities. The sun only reaches our eyes when veiled by its rays; but the illustration fails, in that whereas the natural sunshine dazzles our feeble sight, the sunshine of God's Glory will so strengthen and perfect our spiritual gaze that we shall be able to fix it upon Him in all His brightness without being blinded thereby.

Just as God has given us the light of reason whereby to see Him as the Author of nature, and the light of faith by which to know Him as the Source of grace, so He will give us the light of glory by which to behold Him as the Fountain of eternal life and blessing; a Fountain Which we shall not then behold afar off as now by faith, but Which we shall see by the light of glory, and into Which we shall be plunged for ever. Pliny says that those divers who seek pearls fill their mouths with oil before plunging into the sea, so that by means of its spread they may see more clearly beneath the waters. And when the happy soul plunges into the ocean of God's Essence, He will shed the sacred light of glory around, so that it shall see clearly amid "the light which no man can approach unto," and thus by the brightness of His Own Glory we shall be enabled to scan the brightness of the Godhead."With Thee is the well of Life, and in Thy Light we shall see light."

Chapter XV

There Will Be Different Degrees in the Union of The Blessed with God

NOW this light of glory will regulate the sight and contemplation of the blessed, and according as we have less or more of that holy brightness, we shall see less or more clearly and blessedly that Godhead wherein we shall attain to various degrees of glory. All souls in Paradise will behold all that Godhead, but none will behold It in Its entirety. For God, being One and Indivisible, cannot be seen, unless it be all seen; but inasmuch as God is Infinite, limitless, boundless in His Perfections, no capacity save His Own, which is Infinite, can entirely comprehend or perceive that Goodness which is Infinitely Essential and Essentially Infinite.

The visible sun, which is finite and limited, is all seen by us who gaze; but it is never totally seen by one or all. So with all our senses. Of many who listen to sweet music, while all hear, some do not hear so well, or with so great delight as others, according as their perceptions are more or less delicate. The manna of old was sweet to all who ate it, yet diversely so according to their appetites, while none fully tasted it, because it had as many flavours as there were tastes among the Israelites. So in Heaven we shall see and enjoy the Godhead fully, but none will see or enjoy Him wholly, for His Infinity will ever possess infinitely more excellence than we have capacity to appreciate; and we shall find joy and rest in knowing that however fully we satiate every longing of our heart in the enjoyment of His Boundless Goodness, still there must ever remain an infinitude of perfection which none save God Himself can ever know or comprehend.

Thus the fish enjoy the vast space of ocean, yet none ever see all shores, or shoot through all waters. Birds have the vast atmosphere at will, but none has ever winged its way through all space. So our souls will swim in the boundless ocean, or fly through the measureless space of the Divine Presence in infinite bliss, but their capacity for bliss must ever remain immeasurably below the Infinitude of that Presence.

They will marvel alike at the Infinite Beauty they behold, and at the depths thereof which are beyond their ken. How marvellous is that they see! yet how far more marvellous that which they see not! Yet they are absolutely satisfied with that which they behold, and content therewith, the knowledge of that which they cannot attain to being a mere subject of further admiration and adoration to them as they fall down and worship the Infinite Beauty of their Infinite God.

These eyes, that, dazzled now and weak,
At glancing motes in sunshine wink,
Shall see the King's full Glory break,
Nor from the blissful vision shrink.—John Keble.

An impudent slander, we take not away fasting, nor derogate any thing from the due estimation stand before God's judgment, his words are plain. Eiliorl. ad. virg. "Every one ia justified by the Lord, not of works, but of faith, for as the event of destiny is not in our power, but such as chance has brought, so the grace of our Lord is given, not as of merit of hire, but as of his will, whence have I so great merit, when mercy is 'my crown.'" And in the same Epistle ad Vercaleiaes, he saith, that unto God's judgment, "Only faith shall accompany you. Justice also shall be youi companion, if faith go before you." These places are sufficient to declare, that he speaketh of the fruiis of faith and repentance, not of the proper causes of justification and salvation, when he saith, "we wush away our sins by fasting," &c.

As the stars differ in glory, not according to their merits, but according to God's gift in their creation: so the bodies of Saints shall differ in glory, not according to their merits, but according to God's free gift in the resurrection.

Of Heaven and Hell

A Dialogue Between a Scholar and His Master

Shewing Whither the blessed and the damned Souls go when they depart from their Bodies; and How Heaven and Hell are in Man; Where the Angels and Devils dwell in this World's Time; How far Heaven and Hell are asunder; and What and Whence the Angels and Human Souls are; What the Body of Man is; and Why the Soul is capable of receiving Good and Evil; Of the Destruction of the World; Of Man's Body in and after the Resurrection; Where Heaven and Hell shall be; Of the Last Judgement; and Why the Strife in the Creature must be.

THE Scholar asked his Master, saying;
Whither goeth the Soul when the Body dieth?

His master answered him;
There is no Necessity for it to go any whither.

What not! said the inquisitive Junius:
Must not the Soul leave the Body at Death, and go either to Heaven or Hell?

It needs no going forth, replied the venerable Theophorus:
Only the outward mortal Life with the Body shall separate themselves from the Soul. The Soul hath Heaven and Hell within itself before, according as it is written, The Kingdom of God cometh not with Observation, neither shall they say, Lo here! or Lo there! For behold the Kingdom of God is within you. And which soever of the two, that is, either Heaven or Hell is manifested in it, in that the Soul standeth.

Here Junius said to his Master;

This is hard to understand. Doth it not enter into Heaven or Hell, as a Man entereth into a House; or as one goeth through a Hole or Casement, into an unknown Place; so goeth it not into another World?

The Master spake and said;

No. There is verily no such Kind of entering in; forasmuch as Heaven and Hell are everywhere, being universally co-extended.

How is that possible? said the Scholar.

What, can Heaven and Hell be here present, where we are now sitting? And if one of them might, can you make me believe that both should ever be here together?

Then spoke the Master in this Manner:

I have said that Heaven is everywhere present; and it is true. For God is in Heaven; and God is everywhere. I have said also, that Hell must be in like Manner everywhere; and that is also true. For the wicked One, who is the Devil, is in Hell; and the whole World, as the Apostle hath taught us, lieth in the wicked One, or the evil One; which is as much as to say, not only that the Devil is in the World, but also that the World is in the Devil; and if in the Devil, then in Hell too, because he is there. So Hell therefore is everywhere, as well as Heaven; which is the Thing that was to be proved.

The Scholar, startled hereat, said,

Pray make me to understand this.

To whom the Master said:

Understand then what Heaven is: It is but the Turning in of the Will into the Love of God. Wheresoever thou findest God manifesting himself in Love, there thou findest Heaven, without travelling for it so much as one Foot. And by this understand also what Hell is, and where it is. I say unto thee, it is but the Turning in of the Will into the Wrath of God. Wheresoever the Anger of God doth more or less manifest itself, there certainly is more or less of Hell, in whatsoever Place it be. So that it is but the Turning in of thy Will either into his Love, or into his Anger; and thou art accordingly either in Heaven or in Hell. Mark it well. And this now cometh to pass in this present Life, whereof St. Paul speaking, saith, Our Conversation is in Heaven. And the Lord Christ saith also; My Sheep hear my Voice, and I know them, and they follow me, and I give them the Eternal Life; and none shall pluck them out of my Hand. Observe, he saith not, I will give them — after this Life is ended; but I give them, that is, now — in the Time of this Life. And what else is this Gift of Christ to his Followers but an Eternity of Life; which for certain, can be nowhere but in Heaven. And also if Christ be certainly in Heaven, and they who follow him in the Regeneration are in his Hand, then are they where he is, and so cannot be out of Heaven: Yea, moreover none shall be able to pluck them out of Heaven, because it is he who holdeth them there, and they are in his Hand which nothing can resist. All therefore doth consist in the Turning in, or Entering of the Will into Heaven, by hearing the Voice of Christ, and both knowing him and following him. And so on the contrary it is also. Understandest thou this?

His Scholar said to him;

I think, in part, I do. But how cometh this entering of the Will into Heaven to pass?

The Master answered him;

This then I will endeavour to satisfy thee in; but thou must be very attentive to what I shall say unto thee. Know then, my Son, that when the Ground of the Will yieldeth itself up to God, then it sinketh out of its own Self, and out of and beyond all Ground and Place that is or can be imagined, into a certain unknown Deep, where God only is manifest, and where he only worketh and willeth. And then it becometh nothing to itself, as to its own working and willing; and so God worketh and willeth in it. And God dwells in this resigned Will; by which the Soul is sanctified, and so fitted to come into Divine Rest. Now in this Case when the Body breaketh, the Soul is thoroughly penetrated all over with the Divine Love, and so thoroughly illuminated with the Divine Light, even as a glowing hot Iron is by the Fire, by which being penetrated throughout, it loseth its Darkness and becometh bright and shining. Now this is the Hand of Christ, where God's Love thoroughly inhabiteth the Soul, and is in it a shining Light, and a new glorious Life. And then the Soul is in Heaven, and is a Temple of the Holy Ghost, and is itself the very Heaven of God, wherein he dwelleth. Lo, this is the entering of the Will into Heaven and how it cometh to pass.

Be pleased, Sir, to proceed, said the Scholar, and let me know how it fareth on the other Side.

The Master said:

The godly Soul, you see, is in the Hand of Christ, that is in Heaven, as he himself hath told us; and in what Manner this cometh to be so, you have also heard. But the ungodly Soul is not willing in this Lifetime to come into the Divine Resignation of its Will, or to enter into the Will of God; but goeth on still in its own Lust and Desire, in Vanity and Falsehood, and so entereth into the Will of the Devil. It receiveth thereupon into itself nothing but Wickedness; nothing but Lying, Pride, Covetousness, Envy, and Wrath; and thereinto it giveth up its Will and whole Desire. This is the Vanity of the Will; and this same Vanity or vain Shadow must also in like Manner be manifested in the Soul, which hath yielded up itself to be its Servant; and must work therein, even as the Love of God worketh in the regenerated Will, and penetrates it all over, as Fire doth Iron.

And it is not possible for this Soul to come into the Rest of God; because God's Anger is manifested in it, and worketh in it. Now when the Body is parted from this Soul, then beginneth the Eternal Melancholy and Despair; because it now findeth that it is become altogether Vanity, even a Vanity most vexatious to itself, and a distracting Fury, and a self-tormenting Abomination. Now it perceiveth itself disappointed of every Thing which it had before fancied, and blind, and naked, and wounded, and hungry, and thirsty; without the least Prospect of being ever relieved, or Obtaining so much as one Drop of Water of Eternal Life. And it feeleth itself to be a mere Devil to itself, and to be its own Vile Executioner and Tormentor; and is affrighted at its own ugly dark Form, appearing as a most hideous and monstrous Worm, and fain would flee from itself, if it could, but it cannot, being fast bound with the Chains of the Dark Nature, whereinto it had sunk itself when in the Flesh. And so not having learned nor accustomed itself to sink down into the Divine Grace, and being also strongly possessed with the Idea of God, as an Angry and Jealous God, the poor Soul is both afraid and ashamed to bring its Will into God, by which Deliverance might possibly come to it.

The Soul is afraid to do it, as Fearing to be consumed by so doing, under the Apprehension of the Deity as a mere devouring Fire. The Soul is also ashamed to do it, as being confounded at its own Nakedness and Monstrosity; and therefore would, if it were possible, hide itself from the Majesty of God, and cover its abominable Form from his most holy Eye, though by casting itself still deeper into the Darkness, wherefore then it will not enter into God; nay, it cannot enter with its false Will; yea, though it should strive to enter, yet it cannot enter into the Love, because of the Will which hath reigned in it. For such a Soul is thereby captivated in the Wrath; yea, is itself but mere Wrath, having by its false Desire, which it had awakened in itself, comprehended and shut up itself therewith, and so transformed itself into the Nature and Property thereof.

And since also the Light of God doth not shine in it, nor the Love of God incline it, the Soul is moreover a great Darkness, and is withal an anxious Fire-Source, carrying about a Hell within itself, and not being able to discern the least Glimpse of the Light of God, or to feel the least Spark of his love. Thus it dwelleth in itself as in Hell, and needeth no entering into Hell at all, or being carried thither; for in what Place soever it may be, so long as it is in itself, it is in the Hell. And though it should travel far, and cast itself many hundred thousand Leagues from its present Place, to be out of Hell; yet still would it remain in the Hellish Source and Darkness.

If this be so, how then cometh it, said the Scholar to Theophorus, that a Heavenly Soul doth not in the Time of this Life perfectly perceive the Heavenly Light and Joy; and the Soul which is without God in the World, doth not also here feel Hell, as well as hereafter? Why should they not both be perceived and felt as well in this Life as in the next, seeing that both of them are in Man, and one of them (as you have shown) worketh in every Man?

To whom Theophorus presently returneth this Answer:

The Kingdom of Heaven is in the Saints operative and manifestative of itself by Faith. They who carry God within them, and live by his Spirit, find the Kingdom of God in their Faith; and they feel the Love of God in their Faith, by which the Will hath given up itself into God, and is made Godlike. In a Word, all is transacted within them by Faith, which is to them the Evidence of the Eternal Invisibles, and a great Manifestation in their Spirit of this Divine Kingdom, which is within them. But their natural Life is nevertheless encompassed with Flesh and Blood; and this Standing in a Contrariety thereto, and being placed through the Fall in the Principle of God's Anger, and surrounded about with the World, which by no Means can be reconciled to Faith, these faithful Souls cannot but be very much exposed to Attacks from this World, wherein they are Sojourners; neither can they be insensible of their being thus compassed about with Flesh and Blood, and with this World's vain Lust, which ceaseth not continually to penetrate the outward mortal Life, and to tempt them in manifold Ways, even as it did Christ. Whence the World on one side, and Devil on the other, not without the Curse of God's Anger in Flesh and Blood, do thoroughly penetrate and sift the Life; whereby it cometh to pass that the Soul is often in Anxiety when these three are all set upon it together, and when Hell thus assaulteth the Life, and would manifest itself in the Soul. But the Soul hereupon sinketh down into the Hope of the Grace of God, and standeth like a beautiful Rose in the Midst of Thorns, until the Kingdom of this World shall fall from it in the Death of the Body; And then the Soul first becometh truly manifest in the Love of God, and in his Kingdom, which is the Kingdom of Love; having henceforth nothing more to hinder it. But during this Life she must walk with Christ in this World; and then Christ delivereth her out of her own Hell, by penetrating her with his Love throughout, and standing by her in Hell, and even changing her Hell into Heaven.

But in that thou moreover sayest, why do not the Souls which are without God feel Hell in this World? I answer; They bear it about with them in their wicked Consciences, but they know it not; because the World hath put out their Eyes, and its deadly Cup hath cast them likewise into a Sleep, a most fatal Sleep. Notwithstanding which it must be owned that the Wicked do frequently feel Hell within them during the Time of this mortal Life, though they may not apprehend that it is Hell, because of the earthly Vanity which cleaveth unto them from without, and the sensible Pleasures and Amusements wherewith they are intoxicated. And moreover it is to be noted, that the outward Life in every such one hath yet the Light of the outward Nature, which ruleth in that Life; and so the Pain of Hell cannot, so long as that hath Rule, be revealed.

But when the Body dieth or breaketh away, so as the Soul cannot any longer enjoy such temporal Pleasure and Delight, nor the Light of this outward World, which is wholly thereupon extinguished as to it; then the Soul stands in a eternal Hunger and Thirst after such Vanities as it was here in Love withal, but yet can reach nothing but that false Will, which it had impressed in itself while in the Body; and wherein it had abounded to its great Loss. And now whereas it had too much of its Will in this Life, and yet was not contented therewith, it hath after this Separation by Death, as little of it; which createth in it an everlasting Thirst after that which it can henceforth never more obtain, and causeth it to be in a perpetual anxious Lust after Vanity, according to its former Impression, and in a continual Rage of Hunger after those Sorts of Wickedness and Lewdness whereinto it was immersed, while being in the Flesh.

Fain would it do more Evil still, but that it hath not either wherein or wherewith to effect the Same, left to it; and therefore it doth perform this only in itself. All is now internally transacted, as if it were outward; and so the Ungodly Soul is tormented by those Furies which are in his own Mind, and begotten upon himself by himself. For he is verily become his own Devil and Tormentor; and that by which he sinned here, when the Shadow of this World is passed away, abideth still with him in the Impression, and is made his Prison and his Hell. But this hellish Hunger and Thirst cannot be fully manifested in the Soul, till the Body which ministered to the Soul what it lusted after, and with which the Soul was so bewitched, as to dote thereupon, and pursue all its Cravings, be stripped off from it.

I perceive then, said Junius to his Master, that the Soul having played the Wanton with the Body in all Voluptuousness, and having served the Lusts thereof during this Life, retaineth still the very same Inclinations and Affections which it had before; so that when it hath no more Opportunity nor Capacity to satisfy them; and when it finds it cannot, then Hell will open in that Soul, which before had been shut up, by Means of the outward Life in the Body, and of the Light of this World. Do I rightly understand?

Theophorus said,
It is very rightly understood by you. Go on.

On the other Hand, the Scholar went on,
I clearly perceive by what I have heard, that Heaven cannot but be in a loving Soul, which is possessed of God, and hath subdued thereby the Body to the Obedience of the Spirit in all Things, and perfectly immersed itself into the Will and Love of God. And when the Body dieth, and this Soul is hence redeemed from the Earth, it is now evident to me, that the Life of God which was hidden in it, will display itself gloriously, and Heaven will consequently be then manifested. But notwithstanding, if there be not also a local Heaven besides, and a local Hell, I am still at a loss where to place no small Part of the Creation, if not the greatest. For where must all the intellectual Inhabitants abide?

In their own Principle, answered the Master, whether it be of Light or of Darkness. For every created intellectual Being remaineth in its Deeds and Essences, in its Wonders and Properties, in its Life and Image; and therein it beholdeth and feeleth God, as who is everywhere, whether it be in the Love, or in the Wrath.

If it be in the Love of God, then beholdeth it God accordingly, and feeleth him as he is Love. But if it hath captivated itself in the Wrath of God, then it cannot behold God otherwise than in the wrathful Nature, nor perceive him otherwise than as an incensed and vindictive Spirit. All Places are alike to it, if it be in God's Love; and if it be not there, every Place is Hell alike. What Place can bound a Thought? Or what needeth any understanding Spirit to be kept here or there, in order to its Happiness or Misery? Verily, wheresoever it is, it is in the abyssal World, where there is neither End nor Limit. And whither, I pray, should it go? Since though it should go a thousand Miles off, or a thousand Times ten thousand Miles, and this ten thousand Times over, beyond the Bounds of the Universe, and into the imaginary Spaces above the Stars, yet it were then still in the very same Point from whence it went out. For God is the Place of Spirit; if it may be lawful to attribute to him such a Name, to which the Body hath a Relation: And in God there is no Limit; both near and afar off is here all one; and be it in his Love, or be it in his Anger, the abyssal Will of the Spirit is altogether unconfined. It is swift as Thought, passing through all Things; it is magical, and nothing corporeal or from without can let or obstruct it; it dwelleth in its Wonders, and they are its House.

Thus it is with every Intellectual, whether of the Order of Angels, or of human Souls; and you need not fear but there will be Room enough for them all, be they ever so many; and such also as shall best suit them, even according to their Election and Determination; and which may thence very well be called his own Place.

At which, said the Scholar;
I remember, indeed, that it is written concerning the great Traitor, that he went after Death to his own Place.

The Master here said:

The same is true of every Soul, when it departeth this mortal Life: And it is true in like Manner of every Angel, or Spirit whatsoever; which is necessarily determined by its own Choice. As God is everywhere, so also the Angels are everywhere; but each one in its own Principle, and in its own Property, or (if you had rather) in its own Place. The same Essence of God, which is as a Place to Spirits, is confessed to be everywhere; but the Appropriation, or Participation thereof is different to every one, according as each hath attracted magically in the Earnestness of the Will. The same Divine Essence which is with the Angels of God above, is with us also below: And the same Divine Nature which is with us, is likewise with them; but after different Manners and in different Degrees, communicated and participated.

And what I have said here of the Divine, is no less to be considered by you in the Participation of the Diabolical Essence and Nature, which is the Power of Darkness, as to the manifold Modes, Degrees, and Appropriations thereof in the false Will. In this World there is Strife between them: but when this World hath reached in any one the Limit, then the Principle catcheth that which is its own: and so the Soul receiveth Companions accordingly, that is, either Angels or Devils.

To whom the Scholar said again:

Heaven and Hell then being in us at Strife in the Time of this Life, and God himself being also thus near unto us, where can Angels and Devils dwell?

And the Master answered him thus:

Where thou dost not dwell as to thy Self-hood, and to thine own Will, there the holy Angels dwell with thee, and everywhere all over round about thee. Remember this well. On the contrary, where thou dwellest as to thyself, in Self-seeking, and Self-will, there to be sure the Devils will be with thee, and will take up their abode with thee, and dwell all over thee, and round about thee everywhere. Which God in his Mercy prevent.

I understand not this, said the Scholar, so perfectly well as I could wish. Be pleased to make it a little more clear to me.

The Master then spoke:

Mark well what I am going to say. Where the Will of God in any Thing willeth, there is God manifested; and in this very manifestation of God, the Angels do dwell. But where God in any Creature willeth not with the Will of that Creature, there God is not manifested to it, neither can he be; but dwelleth in himself, without the Co-operation and Subjection of the Creature to him in Humility. There God is an unmanifested God to the Creature. So the Angels dwell not with such a one; for wherever they dwell, there is the Glory of God; and they make his Glory. What then dwelleth in such a Creature as this? God dwelleth not therein; the Angels dwell not therein; God willeth not therein, the Angels also will not therein. The case is evidently this, in that Soul or Creature its own Will is without God's Will, and there the Devil dwelleth; and with him all whatever is without God, and without Christ. This is the Truth; lay it to Heart.

The Scholar:

It is possible I may ask several impertinent Questions; but I beseech you, good Sir, to have Patience with me, and to pity my Ignorance, if I ask what may appear to you perhaps ridiculous, or may not seem fit for me to expect an Answer to. For I have several Questions still to propound to you; but I am ashamed of my own Thoughts in this Matter.

The Master:

Be plain with me, and propose whatever is upon your Mind; yea, be not ashamed even to appear ridiculous, so that by Querying you may but become wiser.

The Scholar thanked his Master for this Liberty, and said:

How far then are Heaven and Hell asunder?

To whom he answered thus:

As far as Day and Night; or as far as Something and Nothing. They are in one another, and yet they are at the greatest Distance one from the other. Nay, the one of them is as nothing to the other; and yet notwithstanding they cause Joy and Grief to one another. Heaven is throughout the whole World, and it is also without the World over all, even everywhere that is, or that can be but so much as imagined. It filleth all; It is within all; It is without all; It encompasseth all; without Division, without Place; working by a Divine Manifestation, and flowing forth universally, but not going in the least out of itself. For it worketh only in itself, and is revealed, being one, and undivided in all. It appeareth only through the Manifestation of God; and never but in itself only: And in that Being which cometh into it, or in that wherein it is manifested, there also it is that God is manifested. Because Heaven is nothing else but a Manifestation or Revelation of the Eternal One, wherein all the Working and Willing is in quiet Love.

So in like Manner Hell also is through the whole World, and dwelleth and worketh but in itself, and in that wherein the Foundation of Hell is manifested, namely, in Self-hood, and in the False Will. The visible World hath both in it; and there is no Place but what Heaven and Hell may be found or revealed in it. Now Man as to his temporal Life, is only of the visible World; and therefore during the Time of this Life, he seeth not the spiritual World. For the outward World with its Substance, is a Cover to the spiritual World, even as the Body is to the Soul. But when the outward Man dieth, then the spiritual World, as to the Soul, which hath now its Covering taken away, is manifested either in the Eternal Light with the holy Angels, or in the Eternal Darkness, with the Devils.

The Scholar further queried:

What is an Angel, or a human Soul, that they can be thus manifested either in God's Love or Anger, either in Light or Darkness?

To whom Theophorus answered:

They come from one and the self-same Original: They are little Branches of the Divine Wisdom, of the Divine Will, sprung from the Divine Word, and made Objects of the Divine Love. They are out of the Ground of Eternity, whence Light and Darkness do spring: Darkness, which consisteth in the receiving of Self-Desire; and Light, which consisteth in Willing the same Thing with God. For in the conformity of the Will with God's Will, is Heaven; and wheresoever there is this Willing with God, there the Love of God is undoubtedly in the Working, and his Light will not fail to manifest itself. But in the Self-Attraction of the Soul's Desire, or in the Reception of Self into the Willing of any Spirit, angelical or human, the Will of God worketh difficultly, and is to that Soul or Spirit nought but Darkness; out of which, notwithstanding, the Light may be manifested. And this Darkness is the Hell of that Spirit wherein it is. For Heaven and Hell are nought else but a Manifestation of the Divine Will either in Light or Darkness, according to the Properties of the Spiritual World. [From the Beginning of the Supersensual Life to the Reference of this Note, was found among the Papers of the late Editor, in the Hand Writing of the truly pious and learned Mr. Law, who has so enlarged and elucidated it (as the Reader may see by comparing it with the Original) that probably he intended it for a separate Publication.]

What the Body of Man is; and why the Soul is capable of receiving Good and Evil.

Scholar.

WHAT then is the Body of Man?

Master.

It is the visible World; an Image and Quintessence, or Compound of all that the World is; and the visible World is a Manifestation of the inward spiritual World, come out of the eternal Light, and out of the eternal Darkness, out of the spiritual Compaction or Connection; and it is also an Image or Figure of Eternity, whereby Eternity hath made itself visible; where Self-Will and Resigned Will, viz. Evil and Good, work one with the other. Such a Substance is the outward Man. For God created Man of the outward World, and breathed into him the inward spiritual World for a Soul and intelligent Life; and therefore in the Things of the outward World, Man can receive and work Evil and Good.

Of the Destruction of the World; of Man's Body, in and after the Resurrection; where Heaven and Hell shall be; of the the Last Judgement; and wherefore the Strife in the Creature must be.

Scholar.

WHAT shall be after this World, when all Things perish and come to an End?

Master.

The material Substance only ceaseth; viz. the four Elements, the Sun, Moon, and Stars. And then the inward World will be wholly visible and manifest. But whatsoever hath been wrought by the Will or Spirit of a Man in this World's Time, whether evil or good shall not cease. I say, every such Work shall there separate itself in a spiritual Manner, either into the Eternal Light, or into the Eternal Darkness. For that which is born from each Man's Will shall penetrateth and passeth again into that which is like itself. And there the Darkness is called Hell, and is an eternal forgetting of all Good; and the Light is called the Kingdom of God, and is an eternal Joy in and to the Saints, who continually glorify and praise God, for having delivered them from the Torment of Evil.

The Last Judgement is but a Kindling of the Fire both of God's Love and Anger, in which the Matter of every Substance perisheth, and each Fire shall attract into itself its own, that is, the Substance that is like itself: Thus God's Fire of Love will draw into it whatsoever is born in the Love of God, or Love-Principle, in which also it shall burn after the Manner of Love, and yield itself into that Substance. But the Torment will draw into itself what is wrought in the Anger of God in Darkness, and consume the false Substance; and then there will remain only the painful aching Will in its own proper Nature, Image and Figure.

Scholar.

With what Matter and Form shall the human Body rise?

Master.

It is sown a natural gross and elementary Body, which in this Life-Time is like the outward Elements; yet in this gross Body there is a subtle Power and Virtue. As in the Earth also there is a subtle good Virtue, which is like the Sun, and is one and the same with the Sun; which also in the Beginning of Time did spring and proceed out of the Divine Power and Virtue, from whence all the good Virtue of the Body is likewise derived. This good Virtue of the mortal Body shall come again and live forever in a Kind of transparent crystalline material Property, in spiritual Flesh and Blood; as shall return also the good Virtue of the Earth, for the Earth likewise shall become crystalline, and the Divine Light shine in every Thing that hath a Being, Essence or Substance. And as the gross Earth shall perish and never return, so also the gross Flesh of Man shall perish and not live forever. But all Things must appear before the Judgement, and in the Judgement be separated by the Fire; yea, both the Earth, and also the Ashes of the human Body. For when God shall once move the spiritual World, every Spirit shall attract its spiritual Substance to itself. A good Spirit and Soul shall draw to itself its good Substance, and an evil one its evil Substance. But we must here understand by Substance, such a material Power and Virtue, the Essence of which is mere Virtue, like a material Tincture (such a Thing as hath all Figures, Colors, and Virtues in it, and is at the same Time transparent), the Grossness whereof shall have perished in all Things.

Scholar.

Shall we not rise again with our visible Bodies, and live in them forever?

Master.

When the visible World perisheth, then all that hath come out of it, and hath been external, shall perish with it. There shall remain of the World only the heavenly crystalline Nature and Form, and of Man also only the spiritual Earth; for Man shall be then wholly like the spiritual World, which as yet is hidden.

Scholar.

Shall there be Husband and Wife, or Children or Kindred, in the heavenly Life, or shall one associate with another, as they do in this Life?

Master.

Why art thou so fleshly-minded? There will be neither Husband nor Wife, but all will be like the Angels of God, viz. Masculine Virgins. There will be neither Son nor Daughter, Brother nor Sister, but all of one Stock and Kindred. For all are but One in Christ, as a Tree and its Branches are one, though distinct as Creatures; but God is All in All. Indeed, there will be spiritual Knowledge of what every one hath been, and done, but no Possessing or Enjoying, or Desire of Possessing earthly Things, or Enjoying fleshly Relations any more.

Scholar.

Shall they all have that Eternal Joy and Glorification alike?

Master.

The Scripture saith, Such as the People is, such is their God. And in another Place, With the holy thou art holy, and with the perverse thou art perverse. And St. Paul saith, In the Resurrection one shall differ from another in Glory, as do the Sun, Moon, and Stars. Therefore know, that the Blessed shall indeed all enjoy the Divine Working in and upon them; but their Virtue, and Illumination or Glory, shall be very different, according as they have been endued in this Life with different Measures and Degrees of Power and Virtue in their painful Working. For the painful Working of the Creature in this Lifetime is the opening and begetting of Divine Power, by which that Power is made movable and operative. Now those who have wrought with Christ in this Lifetime, and not in the Lust of the Flesh, shall have great Power and transcendent Glorification in and upon them. But others, who have only expected, and relied upon, an imputed Satisfaction, and in the meanwhile have served their Belly-God, and yet at last have turned, and obtained Grace; those, I say, shall not attain to so high a Degree of Power and Illumination. So that there will be as great a Difference of Degrees between them, as is between the Sun, Moon and Stars; or between the Flowers of the Field in their Varieties of Beauty, Power, and Virtue.

Scholar.

How shall the World be judged, and by whom?

Master.

Jesus Christ, that Word of God which became Man, shall by the Power of his Divine Stirring or Motion separate from himself all that belongeth not to him, and shall wholly manifest his Kingdom in the Place or Space where this World now is; for the separating Motion worketh all over the Universe, through all at once.

Scholar.

Whither shall the Devils and all the Damned be thrown, when the Place of this World is become the Kingdom of Christ, and such as shall be glorified? Shall they be cast out of the Place of this World? Or shall Christ have, and manifest his Dominion, out of the Sphere or Place of this World?

Master.

Hell shall remain in the Place or Sphere of this World everywhere, but hidden to the Kingdom of Heaven, as the Night is hidden in and to the Day. The Light shall shine forever in the Darkness, but the Darkness can never comprehend, or reach it. And the Light is the Kingdom of Christ; but the Darkness is Hell, wherein the Devils and the Wicked dwell; and thus they shall be suppressed by the Kingdom of Christ, and made his Footstool, viz. a Reproach.

Scholar.

How shall all People and Nations be brought to Judgement?

Master.

The Eternal Word of God, out of which every spiritual creaturely Life hath proceeded, will move itself at that Hour, according to Love and Anger, in every Life which is come out of the Eternity, and will draw every Creature before the Judgement of Christ, to be sentenced by this Motion of the World. The Life will then be manifested in all its Works, and every Soul shall see and feel its Judgement and Sentence in itself. For the Judgement is indeed immediately manifested in and to every Soul at the Departure of the Body; and the last Judgement is but a Return of the spiritual Body, and a Separation of the World, when the Evil shall be separated from the Good, in the substance of the World and of the human Body, and every Thing enters into its eternal Receptacle. And thus it is a Manifestation of the Mystery of God in every Substance and Life.

Scholar.

How will the Sentence be pronounced?

Master.

Here consider the Words of Christ. He will say to those on his Right-hand, Come, ye blessed of my Father, inherit the Kingdom prepared for you from the Foundation of the World. For I was hungry, and ye gave me Meat; I was thirsty, and ye gave me Drink; I was a Stranger, and ye took me in; naked, and ye clothed me. I was sick, and ye visited me, in Prison, and ye came unto me.

Then shall they answer him, saying, Lord, when saw we thee hungry, thirsty, a Stranger, naked, sick, or in Prison, and ministered thus unto thee?

Then shall the King answer and say unto them; Inasmuch as ye have done it unto one of the least of these my Brethren, ye have done it unto me.

And unto the Wicked on his Left-hand he will say,

Depart from me, ye Cursed, into everlasting Fire, prepared for the Devil and his Angels.

For I was hungry, thirsty, a Stranger, naked, sick, and in Prison, and ye ministered not unto me.

And they shall also answer him and say, When did we see thee thus, and ministered not unto thee?

And he will answer them, Verily I say unto you, inasmuch as ye have not done it unto one of the least of these, ye did it not to me.

And these shall depart into everlasting Punishment, but the Righteous into Life Eternal.

Scholar.

Loving Master, pray tell me why Christ saith, What you have done to the least of these, you have done to me; and what you have not done to them, neither have you done it to me. And how doth a Man in his Working, doeth it to Christ himself?

Master.

Christ dwelleth really and essentially in the Faith of those that wholly yield up themselves to him, and he giveth them his Flesh for Food, and his Blood for Drink; and thus he possesseth the Ground of their Faith, according to the interior or inward Man. And a True Christian is called a Branch of the Vine Christ, and a Christian, because Christ dwelleth spiritually in him; therefore whatsoever Good any shall do to such a Christian in his bodily Necessities, it is done to Christ himself, who dwelleth in him. For such a Christian is not his own, but is wholly resigned to Christ, and become his peculiar Possession, and consequently the good Deed is done to Christ himself.

Therefore also, whosoever shall withhold their Help from such a needy Christian, and forbear to serve him in his Necessity, they thrust Christ away from themselves, and despise him in his Members. When a poor Person that belongeth thus to Christ, asketh any Thing of thee, and thou deniest it him in his Necessity, thou deniest it to Christ himself. And whatsoever hurt any shall do to such a Christian, they do it to Christ himself. When any mock, scorn, revile, reject, or thrust away such a one, they do all that to Christ; but he that receiveth him, giveth him Meat and Drink, or Apparel, and assisteth him in his necessities, doth it likewise to Christ, and to a Fellow-Member of his own Body. Nay he even doth it to himself, if he be a True Christian; for we are all One in Christ, as a Tree and its Branches are.

Scholar.

How then will those subsist in the Day of that fierce Judgement, who afflict and vex the poor and distressed, and deprive them of their very Sweat; necessitating and constraining them by Force to submit to their Wills, and trampling upon them as their Footstools, only that they themselves may live in Pomp and Power, and spend the Fruits of this poor People's Sweat and Labour in Voluptuousness, Pride, and Vanity?

Master.

Christ suffereth in the Persecution of his Members. Therefore all the Wrong that such hard Exactors do to the poor Wretches under their Control, is done to Christ himself; and falleth under his severe Sentence and Judgement! And besides that, they help the Devil to augment his Kingdom; for by such Oppression of the Poor they draw them off from Christ, and make them seek unlawful Ways to fill their Bellies. Nay, they work for, and with the Devil himself, doing the very same Thing which he doth; who, without Intermission, opposeth the Kingdom of Christ, which consisteth only in Love. All these Oppressors, if they do not turn with their whole Hearts to Christ, and minister to, or serve him, must go into Hell-Fire, which is fed and kept alive by nothing else but such mere Self, as that which they have exercised over the Poor here.

Scholar.

But how will it fare with those, and how will they be able to stand that severe Trial, who in this Time do so fiercely contend about the Kingdom of Christ, and slander, revile, and persecute one another for their Religion, as they do?

Master.

All such have not yet known Christ; and they are but as a Type or Figure of Heaven and Hell, striving with each other for the Victory.

All rising, swelling Pride, which contendeth about Opinions, is an Image of Self. And whosoever hath not Faith and Humility, nor liveth in the Spirit of Christ, which is Love, is only armed with the Anger of God, and helpeth forward the Victory of the imaginary Self, that is, the Kingdom of Darkness, and the Anger of God. For at the Day of Judgement all Self shall be given to the Darkness, as shall also all the unprofitable Contentions of Men; in which they seek not after Love, but merely after their imaginary Self, that they may exalt themselves by exalting and establishing their Opinions; stirring up Princes to Wars for the Sake of the same, and by that Means occasioning the Desolation of whole Countries of People. All such Things belong to the Judgement, which will separate the false from the true; and then all Images or Opinions shall cease, and all the Children of God shall dwell forever in the Love of Christ, and that in them.

All whosoever in this Time of Strife, namely, from the Fall to the Resurrection, are not zealous in the Spirit of Christ, and desirous to promote Peace and Love, but seek and strive for themselves only, are of the Devil, and belong to the Pit of Darkness, and must consequently be separated from Christ. For in Heaven all serve God their Creator in humble Love.

Scholar.

Wherefore then doth God suffer such Strife and Contention to be in this Time?

Master.

The Life itself standeth in Strife, that it may be made manifest, sensible, and palpable, and that the Wisdom may be made separable and known.

The Strife also constituteth the eternal Joy of the Victory. For there will arise great Praise and Thanksgiving in the Saints from the experimental Sense and Knowledge that Christ in them hath overcome Darkness, and all the Self of Nature, and that they are at length totally delivered from the Strife; at which they shall rejoice eternally, when they shall know how the Wicked are recompensed. And therefore God suffereth all Souls to stand in the Free-Will, that the Eternal Dominion both of Love and Anger, of Light and Darkness, may be made manifest and known; and that every Life might cause and find its own Sentence in itself. For that which is now a Strife and Pain to the Saints in their wretched Warfare here, shall in the End be turned into great Joy to them; and that which hath been a Joy and Pleasure to ungodly Persons in this World, shall afterwards be turned into eternal Torment and Shame to them. Therefore the Joy of the Saints must arise to them out of Death, as the Light ariseth out of a Candle by the Destruction and Consumption of it in its Fire; that so the Life may be freed from the Painfulness of Nature, and possess another World.

And as the Light hath quite another Property than the Fire hath, for it giveth and yieldeth itself forth; whereas the Fire draweth in and consumeth itself; so the holy Life of Meekness springeth forth through the Death of Self-Will, and then God's Will of Love only ruleth, and doth all in all. For thus the Eternal One hath attained Feeling and Separability, and brought itself forth again with the Feeling, through Death in great Joyfulness; that there might be an Eternal Delight in the Infinite Unity, and an Eternal Cause of Joy; and therefore that which was before Painfulness, must now be the Ground and Cause of this Motion or stirring to the Manifestation of all Things. And herein lieth the Mystery of the hidden Wisdom of God.

Every one that asketh receiveth, every one that seeketh findeth; and to every one that knocketh it shall be opened. The Grace of our Lord Jesus Christ, and the Love of God, and the Communion of the Holy Ghost, be with us all. Amen.

We Deny Not This Difference Of Degrees Of Glory In Heaven; But That Frame, & That Scale Of These Degrees, Which They Have Set Up In Roman Church, We Do Deny

The Works of John Donne

(Published in London in 1839)

Volume 3 Sermon 73 (extracts)

This second part, you may also be pleased to remember, derives itself into two branches; first to inquire, whether this proposition assist that doctrine of disparity and degrees of glory in the saints in heaven; and then the right use which is to be made of the right sense of these words, In domo patris, In my Father's house there are many mansions. The occasion of the words will be the foundation of all; our Saviour Christ had said to his disciples in the chapter before, that he was to stay with them but a little while; that when he was gone, they should seek him, and not find him; and that whither he went, they could not follow: and when, upon that, Peter, who was always forwardest, and soonest scandalized, had pressed him with that question, Lord, whither goest thou? and received that answer, Whither I go thou canst not follow me now, but hereafter thou shalt follow me, lest the rest of the disciples, who were troubled with that which was formerly said, should be more affected with this, to hear that Peter should come, whither none of them might, to establish them all, as well as Peter, he says to them all, in the first verse of this chapter, Let not your hearts be troubled, for, (and here enters this proposition of our text, for their general establishment) in my Father's house are many mansions. So that, that these are words of consolation, is certain, but whether the consolation be placed in though disparity, and difference of degrees of glory in heaven, or no, is not so certain.

That there are degrees of glory in the saints in heaven, scarce any ever denied. Heaven is a kingdom, and Christ a king, and a popular parity agrees not with that state, with a monarchy. Heaven is a church, and Christ a high-priest, and such a parity agrees as ill with the Triumphant, as with the Militant church. In the Primitive church Joviuan denied this difference, and degrees of glory; and St. Hierome (Jerome) was so incensed, so inflamed for this, as if foundations had been shaken, and the common cause endangered. Indeed it was thus far the common cause, that all the fathers followed this chase, (if we may use that metaphor) and were never at a default: no one of the fathers, whom I have observed to touch upon this point, did ever deny this difference of degrees of glory. And therefore, as in the Primitive church, when that one man Jovinian, came to deny it, St. Hierome was vehement upon him, so when in the Reformation, one man (for I never found more than that one, one Schoufeldius) denies it too, I wonder the less, that another "(of the Reformation also) grows somewhat sharp towards him.

We deny not then this difference of degrees of glory in heaven; but that frame, and that scale of these degrees, which they have set up in the Roman church, we do deny. We must continue, and return often to that complaint against them, That they shake and endanger things near foundations, by their enormous superedifications, by their incommodious upper-buildings: that many things, which might be well enough accepted, and would be agreed by all, become justly suspicious, and really dangerous to the church, by their manifold consequences which they super-induce upon them: that many things, which in the sincerity of their beginning, and institution, were pious, and conduced to the exaltation of devotion, by their additions are become impious, and destroy devotion so far, as to divert it upon a wrong object. In this point which we have in hand, it is so; in these degrees of glory in heaven, that church, which treads all sovereign crowns in this world, under her feet, pretends to impart, and distribute crowns in heaven also of her own making: We find coronam auream, a crown of gold upon the head of that Son of man, who is also the Son of God, Christ Jesus, in the Revelation. And we find coronas aureas, particular crowns of gold, upon the heads of all the saints that stand about the throne, in the same book". And these crowns upon the saints are the emanations, and effluences of that crown which is upon Christ; the glory of the saints is the communication of his glory. But then, because in their translation, in the Vulgate edition of the Roman church, they find in Exodus that word aureolam, Facies coronam aureolam, Thou shalt make a lesser crown of gold; out of this diminutive, and mistaken word, they have established a doctrine, that besides those coronce entrece, those crowns of gold, which are communicated to all the saints from the crown of Christ, some saints have made to themselves, and produced out of their own extraordinary merits certain aureolas, certain lesser crowns of their own, whereas indeed the word in the original in that place of Exodus is zer zehab, which is a crown of gold, without any intimation of any such lesser crowns growing out of themselves. This then is their new alchymy; that whereas old alchymists pretend to make gold of coarser metals, these will make it of nothing; out of a suppositions word, which is not in the text, they have hammered and beat out these aureolas, these lesser crowns. And these aureolas they ascribe only to three sorts of persons, to virgins, to martyrs, to doctors.

Are then all the other saints without crowns? They must make shift with that beam which they have from the crown of Christ; for, for these additional crowns proceeding from themselves, they have none. And yet, say they, there are saints which have some additions growing out of themselves, though not aureolas, little crowns, and those they call fructus, peculiar fruits growing out of themselves; and for these fruits they distraint upon that place of Matthew, where Christ saith, That some brought forth fruit a hundred fold, some sixty, and some thirty; and the greater measure they ascribe to virgins, the sixty to widows, and the thirty to married persons, but only such married persons, as have lived continently in marriage. So then, to make this riddle of theirs as plain as the matter will admit, they place salvation itself, blessedness itself, (if a man will be content with that) in that union with God, which is common to all the saints: but then they conceive certain Dotes, as they call them, certain dispositions in this life, by which some have made themselves fitter to be united to God, in a nearer distance than an ordinary saint; and these dotes, these endowments, and dispositions here, produce those aureolas, and those fructus, those lesser crowns, and those measures of fruits, which are a particular joy, not that they are united to God, (for so every saint is) but that they had those dotes, those dispositions to take that particular way of being united to God, the way of virginity, the way of martyrdom, and the way of up reaching; for by this, they become Sancti Major es, as they call them, saints in favour, saints in office, and fitter to receive our petitions, and mediate between God and us, than those whom they call Mediocres, and Inferiores, saints of a middle form, or of an inferior rank. Yet these are so far provided for, by them too, that we must pray also to these inferior saints, either because I may have had a more particular interest in this life in that saint, than in a greater, and so the readiness, and the assiduity of that saint may recompense his want of power, or else, ad tollendum fastidium, lest a great saint should grow weary of me, if I trouble him every day, and for every trifle in heaven; and some other such reasons, it pleases them to assign, why though some saints have more power with God than others, yet we are bound to pray to all.

And thus they play with divinity, as though after they had troubled all states with political divinity, with their bulls, and breeves of rebus sic stantibus, that as long as things stood thus, this should be Catholic doctrine, and otherwise, when otherwise, and in this political divinity, Machiavel is their pope; and after they had perplexed understandings with philosophical divinity in the school, and in that divinity, Aristotle is their pope; they thought themselves in courtesy, or conscience bound, to recreate the world with poetical divinity, with such a heaven, and such a hell as would stand in their verses, and in this divinity, Virgil is their pope. And so, as Melancthon said, when he furthered the edition of the Alcoran, that he would have it printed, Ut vidtamus quale poema sit, That the world might see what a piece of poetry the Alcoran was; so I have stopped upon this point, that you might see what a piece of poetry they have made of this problematical point of divinity, the disparity, and degrees of glory in the saints in Heaven.

Be this then thus settled; in the matter, the difference of degrees of glory, we will not differ; in the manner, we would not differ so, as to induce a schism, if they would handle such points problematically, and no farther.

But when upon matter of fact they will induce matter of faith, when they will extend problematic divinity to dogmatical, when they will argue and conclude thus. It may be thus, therefore it must be thus, a man may be saved, though he believes this, therefore he cannot be saved except he believe this, when (in this point in hand) out of our acknowledgment of these degrees of glory in the saints they will establish the doctrine of merits, and of invocation of saints, then we must necessarily call them to the rule of all doctrines, the Scriptures. When they tell us historically, and upon historical obligation, and for a historical certitude, that Peter was at Rome, and that he was bishop of Rome, we are not so froward as to deny them that: but when upon his historical and personal being at Rome, they will build that mother article, of an universal supremacy over all the church, then we must necessarily call them to the rule, to the Scriptures, and to require them to prove both his being there, and his being bishop there, by the Scriptures, and either of these would trouble them; as it would trouble them, in our present case, to assign evident places of Scripture, for these degrees of glory in the saints of Heaven. For though we be far from denying the consentaneum est, that it is reasonable it should be, and likely it is so, and far from denying the pie creditur, that it may advance devotion, and exalt industry to believe that it is so, though we acknowledge a possibility, a probability, a very similitude, a very truth, and thus far a necessary truth, that our endeavours may flag and slacken, except we do embrace that help, that there are degrees of glory in Heaven, yet if we shall press for places of Scriptures, so evident, as must constitute an article of faith, there are perchance none to be found, to which very learned, and very reverend expositors have not given convenient interpretations, without inducing any such necessity.

At least, however other places of Scripture may seem to contribute more, this proposition of our text, In my Father's house are many mansions (though it have been applied to the proof of that) hath no inclination, no inclinableness that way. For in this text, our Saviour applies himself to his disciples, in that wherein they needed comfort, that Christ would go away, that they might not go too, that Peter had got a non-obstante, he might, and they might not, and Christ gives them that comfort, that all might, In my Fathers house are many mansions. When the apostle presents a great part of our Christian religion together, so as that he calls it a mystery, and a great mystery, yet he calls it a mystery without controversy; Without controversy great is the mystery of God manifested in the flesh, justified in the spirit, preached to the Gentiles, believed in the world, received into glory". When he presents matter of consolation, he would have it without controversy; to establish a disconsolate soul, there is always divinity enough, that was never drawn into controversy. I would pray? I find the spirit of God to dispose my heart, and my tongue, and mine eyes, and hands, and knees to pray? do I doubt to whom I should pray I To God, or to the saints? That prayer to God alone was sufficient, was never drawn into controversy. I would have something to rely and settle and establish my assurance upon; do I doubt whether upon Christ, or mine own, or other's merits? That to rely upon Christ alone was sufficient, was never drawn into controversy. At this time, Christ disposed himself to comfort his disciples in that wherein they needed comfort; now their discomfort, and their fear lay not in this, whether there were different degrees of glory in heaven, but their fear was, that Christ being gone, and having taken Peter, and none but him, there should be no room for them, and thereupon Christ says, Let not that trouble you, for, in my Fathers house are many mansions. And so we have done with the former branch of this last part, that it is piously done to believe these degrees of glory in heaven; that they have inconsiderately extended this problem in the Roman church; that no Scriptures are so evident as to induce a necessity in it; that this Scripture conduces not at all to it; and therefore we pass to our last consideration, the right use of the right sense of these words.

First then, Christ proposes in these words consolation; a work, than which none is more divine, nor more proper to God, nor to those instruments, whom he sends to work upon the souls and consciences of others. Who but myself can conceive the sweetness of that salutation, when the spirit of God says to me in a morning, Go forth to-day and preach, and preach consolation, preach peace, preach mercy, and spare my people, spare that people whom I have redeemed with my precious blood, and be not angry with them for ever; do not wound them, do not grind them, do not astonish them with the bitterness, with the heaviness, with the sharpness, with the consternation of my judgments. David proposes to himself, that he would sing of mercy, and of judgment; but it is of mercy first; and not of judgment at all, otherwise than it will come into a song, as joy and consolation is compatible with it. It hath fallen into disputation, and admitted argument, whether ever God inflicted punishment by his good angel; but that the good angels, the ministerial angels of the church, are properly his instruments, for conveying mercy, peace, consolation, never fell into question, never admitted opposition.

How heartily God seems to utter, and how delightfully to insist upon that, which he says in Isaiah, Gonsolamini, conso- lamini populum meum, Comfort ye, comfort ye my people, and Loquimini ad cor, Speak to the heart of Jerusalem, and tell her, thine iniquities are pardoned? How glad Christ seems that he had it for him, when he gives the sick man that comfort, Fill confide, my son be of good comfort, thy sins are forgiven thee? What a coronation is our taking of orders, by which God makes us a royal priesthood? And what an enthronization is the coming up into a pulpit, where God invests his servants with his ordinance, as with a cloud, and then presses that cloud with a Voe si non, woe be unto thee, if thou do not preach, and then enables him to preach peace, mercy, consolation, to the whole congregation. That God should appear in a cloud, upon the mercy seat, as he promises Moses he will do", that from so poor a man as stands here, wrapped up in clouds of infirmity, and in clouds of iniquity, God should drop rain, pour down his that dew with his honey, and crust that honied dew into manna, and multiply that manna into gomers, and fill those gomers every day, and give every particular man his gomer, give every soul in the congregation, consolation by me; that when I call to God for grace here, God should give me grace for grace, grace in a power to derive grace upon others, and that this oil, this balsamum, should flow to the hem of the garment, even upon them that stand under me; that when mine eyes look up to heaven," Psalm ci. 1. Isaiah XL. 1. 1? Levit. xvi. 2. the eyes of all should look up upon me, and God should open my mouth, to give them meat in due season; that I should not only be able to say, as Christ said to that poor soul, Confide fili, my son be of good comfort, but fratres et patres mei, my brethren, and my fathers, nay domini mei, and rex meus, my lords, and my king be of good comfort, your sins are forgiven you; that God should seal to me that patent, Itē predicatē omni creaturā, go and preach the gospel to every creature, be that creature what he will, that if God lead me into a congregation, as into his ark, where there are but eight souls, but a few disposed to a sense of his mercies, and all the rest (as in the ark) ignobler creatures, and of brutal natures and affections, that if I find a licentious goat, a supplanting fox, an usurious wolf; an ambitious lion, yet to that creature, to every creature I should preach the gospel of peace and consolation, and offer these creatures a metamorphosis, a transformation, a new creation in Christ Jesus, and thereby make my goat, and my fox, and my wolf, and my lion, to become semen Dei, the seed of God, and filium Dei, the child of God, and participem divinitus naturae, partaker of the divine nature itself; this is that which Christ is essentially in himself, this is that which ministerially and instrumentally he hath committed to me, to shed his consolation upon you, upon you all; not as his almoner to drop his consolation upon one soul, nor as his treasurer to issue his consolation to a whole congregation, but as his Ophir, as his Indies, to derive his gold, his precious consolation upon the king himself.

What would a good judge, a good-natured judge give in his circuit, what would you, in whose breasts the judgments of the Star-chamber, or other criminal courts are, give, that you had a warrant from the king, to change the sentence of blood into a pardon, where you found a delinquent penitent? How ruefully do we hear the prophets groan under that onus visionis, which they repeat so often, O the burden of my vision upon Judah, or upon Moab, or Damascus, or Babylon, or any place! Which is not only that that judgment would be a heavy burden upon that place, but that it was a heavy burden to them to denounce that judgment, even upon God's enemies. Our errand, our joy, our crown is consolation: for, if we consider the three Persons of the holy, blessed and glorious Trinity, and their working upon us, a third part of their work (if we may so speak) is consolation; the Father is power, the Son wisdom, and the Holy Ghost consolation: for the Holy Ghost is not in a vulture, that hovers over armies, and infected cities, and feeds upon carcasses, but the Holy Ghost is in a dove, that would not make a congregation a slaughter-house, but feeds upon corn, corn that hath in nature a disposition to a reviviscence, and a repullulation, and would imprint in you all, the consolation and sense of a possibility of returning to a new, and better life. God found me nothing, and of that nothing made me; Adam left me worse than God found me, worse than nothing, the child of wrath, corrupted with the leaven of original sin; Christ Jesus found me worse than Adam left me, not only soured with original, but spotted, and gangrened, and dead, and buried, and putrified in actual and habitual sins, and yet in that state redeemed me; and I make myself worse than Christ found me, and in an inordinate dejection of spirit, conceive a jealousy and suspicion, that his merit concerns not me, that his blood extends not to my sin; and in this last and worst state, the Holy Ghost finds me, the spirit of consolation, and he sends a Barnabas, a son of consolation unto me, a Barnabas to my sick bed side, a physician that comforts with hopes, and means of health, a Barnabas to my broken fortune, a potent and a loving friend, that assists the reparation, and the establishing of my state, a Barnabas into the pulpit, that restores and rectifies my conscience, and scatters, and dispels all those clouds that invested it, and infested it before. That unimaginable work of the creation were not ready for a Sabbath, though I be a creature, and a man, I could have no Sabbath, no rest, no peace of conscience; that unexpressible work of the redemption were not ready for that seal, which our Saviour set to it upon the cross, in the conswmationem eius; all were not finished that concerned me, if the Holy Ghost were not ready to deliver that which Christ sealed, and to witness that which were so delivered, that that spirit might ever testify to my spirit, that all that Christ Jesus said, and did, and suffered, was said, and done, and suffered for my soul. Consolation is not all, if we consider God, but if I consider myself, and my state, consolation is all.

Christ's meaning then in this place, was to establish in his disciples this consolation; but thus, Si quo minus, If it were not thus, I would tell you; if this were not true consolation, I would not delude you, I would not entertain you with false: for he is Deus omnium miseracionum, The God of all mercies, and yet he will not show mercy to them, who sin upon presumption; so he is Deus omnium consolationum, The God of all comforts, and yet will not comfort them, who rely upon the false, and miserable comforts of this world. How many, how very many of us do otherwise! Otherwise to others, otherwise to our own consciences! Delude all with false comforts! They would not suffer Christ himself to sleep upon a pillow in a storm, but they waked him with that, Master, carest not thou, though we perish? When will we wake any master, any upon whom we depend, and say, Master, carest not thou, though thou perish? We suffer others, whom we should instruct, and we suffer ourselves to pass on to the last gasp, and we never rebuke our consciences, till our consciences rebuke us at last, alas, it is otherwise, and you never told us.

Christ comforts then, he disputes not, that is not his way; he ministers true comfort, he flatters not, that is not his way; and in this true comfort, the first beam is, that that state which he promises them is a house, In my Father's house, &c. God hath a progress house, a removing house here upon earth, his house of prayer; at this hour, God enters into as many of these houses, as are opened for his service at this hour: but his standing house, his house of glory, is that in heaven, and that he promises them. God himself dwelt in tents in this world, and he gives them a house in heaven. A house, in the design and survey whereof, the Holy Ghost himself is figurative, the fathers wanton, and the schoolmen wild. The Holy Ghost, in describing this house, fills our contemplation with foundations, and walls, and gates, of gold, of precious stones, and all materials, that we can call precious". The Holy Ghost is figurative; and the fathers are wanton in their spiritual elegancies, such as that of St. Augustines, (if that book be his) Hiems horreus, jEstas torrens, and Virent prata, vernant sata, and such other harmonious, and melodious, and mellifluous cadences of these waters of life. But the schoolmen are wild; for as one author, who is afraid of admitting too great a hollowness in the earth, lest then the earth might not be said to be solid, pronounces that hell cannot possibly be above three thousand miles in compass, (and then one of the torments of hell will be the throng, for their 'bodies must be there, in their dimensions, as well as their souls) so when the schoolmen come to measure this house in heaven, (as they will measure it, and the master, God, and all his attributes, and tell us how almighty, and how infinite he is) they pronounce, that every soul in that house shall have more room to itself, than all this world is. We know not that; nor see we that the consolation lies in that; we rest in this, that it is a house, it hath a foundation, no earthquake shall shake it, it hath walls, no artillery shall batter it, it hath a roof, no tempest shall pierce it, it is a house that affords security, and that is one beam; and it is Domus Patris, His Father's house, a house in which he hath interest, and that is another beam of his consolation.

It was his Father's, and so his; and his, and so ours; for we are not joint purchasers of heaven with the saints, but we are co-heirs with Christ Jesus. We have not a place there, because they have done more than enough for themselves, but because he hath done enough for them and us too. By death we are gathered to our fathers in nature; and by death, through his mercy, gathered to his Father also. Where we shall have a full satisfaction, in that wherein St. Philip placed all satisfaction, Ostende nobis patrem, Lord, show us thy Father, and it is enough. We shall see his Father, and see him made ours in him.

And then a third beam of this consolation is, that in this house of his Father's, thus by him made ours, there are mansions; in which word, the consolation is not placed, (I do not say, that there is not truth in it) but the consolation is not placed in this, that some of these mansions are below, some above stairs, some better seated, better lighted, better vaulted, better fretted, better furnished than others; but only in this, that they are mansions; which word, in the original, and Latin, and our language, signifies a remaining, and denotes the perpetuity, the everlastingness of that state. A state but of one day, because no night shall overtake, or determine it, but such a day, as is not of a thousand years, which is the longest measure in the Scriptures, but of a thousand millions of millions of generations: Qui nee preceditur hesternis, nee excluditur crastino", A day that hath no pridie, nor postridie, yesterday doth not usher it in, nor tomorrow shall not drive it out. Methusalem, with all his hundreds of years, was but a mushroom of a night's growth, to this day, and all the four monarchies, with all their thousands of years, and all the powerful kings, and all the beautiful queens of this world, were but as a bed of flowers, some gathered at six, some at seven, some at eight, all in one morning, in respect of this day. In all the two -thousand years of nature, before the law given by Moses, and the two thousand years of law, before the Gospel given by Christ, and the two thousand of grace, which are running now, (of which last hour we have heard three quarters strike, more than fifteen hundred of this last two thousand spent) in all this six thousand, and in all those, which God may be pleased to add, in domo patris, in this house of his Father's, there was never heard quarter clock to strike, never seen minute glass to turn. So time less than itself would serve to express this time, which is intended in this word mansions; which is also exalted with another beam, that they are Multa, In my Father's house there are many mansions.

In this circumstance, an essential, a substantial circumstance, we would consider the joy of our society, and conversation in heaven, since society and conversation is one great element and ingredient into the joy, which we have in this world. We shall have an association with Christ himself; for what he is, it is his promise, that we also shall be. We shall have an association with the angels, and such a one, as we shall be such as they. We shall have an association with the saints, and not only so, to be such as they, but to be they: and with all who come from the East, and from the West, and from the North, and from the South-, and sit down with Abraham, and Isaac, and Jacob in the kingdom of heaven. Where we shall be so far from being enemies to one another, as that we shall not be strangers to one another: and so far from envying one another, as that all that every one hath, shall be every other's possession: where all souls shall be so entirely knit together, as if all were but one soul, and God so entirely knit to every soul, as if there were as many Gods as souls.

Be comforted then, says Christ to them, for this, which is a house, and not a ship, not subject to storms by the way, nor wrecks in the end, My Father's house, not a stranger's, in whom I had no interest, a house of mansions, a dwelling, not a sojourning, and of many mansions, not an abridgment, a model of a house, not a monastery of many cells, but an extension of many houses, into the city of the living God, This house shall be yours, though I depart from you. Christ is nearer us, when we behold him with the eyes of faith in heaven, than when we seek him in a piece of bread, or in a sacramental box here. Drive him not away from thee, by wrangling and disputing how he is present with thee; unnecessary doubts of his presence may induce fearful assurances of his absence: the best determination of the real presence is to be sure, that thou be really present with him, by an ascending faith: make sure thine own real presence, and doubt not of his: thou art not the farther from him, by his being gone thither before thee. No, nor though Peter be gone thither before thee neither, which was the other point, in which the apostles needed consolation; they were troubled that Christ would go, and none of them, and troubled that Peter might go, and none but he. What men soever God take into heaven before thee, though thy father that should give thee thy education, though thy pastor that should give thee thy instruction, though these men may be such in the state, and such in the church, as thou mayest think the church and state cannot subsist without them, discourage not thyself, neither admit a jealousy or suspicion of the providence and good purpose of God; for, as God hath his panier full of manna, and of quails, and can pour out tomorrow, though he have poured them out plentifully upon his friends before; so God hath his quiver full of arrows, and can shoot as powerfully, as heretofore, upon his enemies. I forbid them not St. Paul's wish, cupio dissolvi, to desire to be dissolved, therefore, that thou mayest be with Christ; I forbid thee not David's sigh, Hei mihi, Woe is me that I must dwell so long with them that love not peace! I only enjoin thee thy Saviour's Veruntamen, Yet not mine, but thy will, O Father, be done; that all thy wishes may have relation to his purposes, and all thy prayers may be inanimated with that, Lord manifest thy will unto me, and conform my will unto thine. So shalt thou not be affrighted, as though God aimed at thee, when he shoots about the mark, and thou seest a thousand fall at thy right hand, and ten thousand at thy left; nor discouraged as though God had left out thee, when thou seest him take others into garrison, and leave thee in the field, assume others to triumph, and leave thee in the battle still. For as Christ Jesus would have come down from heaven, to have died for thee, though there had been no soul to have been saved but thine; so is he gone up to heaven, to prepare a place for thee, though all the souls in this world were to be saved as well as thine. Trouble not thyself with dignity, and priority, and precedency in heaven, for consolation and devotion consist not in that, and thou wilt be the less troubled with dignity and priority, and precedency in this world, for rest and quietness consist not in that.

Fifteen Arguments In Favour Of Heavenly Degrees Of Glory, Each Of Which Carefully Refuted, & Twelve Arguments Against, Which He Defends, Concluding That Elect In Heaven Are Equal In Glory

Praelectiones

(summarized in Disley, Degrees of Glory)

The most detailed refutation of the concept of degrees of heavenly reward came from the pen of John Cameron, the influential Glaswegian Professor of Divinity at the University of Saumur. In his Praelectiones, of 1632, he sets out, at some length, fifteen arguments in favour of heavenly degrees of glory, each of which he carefully refutes, and twelve arguments against, which he defends, concluding that the elect in heaven are equal in glory. These are worth summarizing for the purposes of this article:

He dismisses as specious a number of scripturally based arguments which he sees as attributing to heaven a fallacious diversity of rewards among the saints, whereas the scriptural references, he argues, maintain rather the division between the saved and the damned: Thus, the contrast implied in the statement, 'God returns to each according to their works', based on Rom. 2: 6 (cf. 2 Cor. 5: 10), does not exist within the assembly of the pious themselves, but distinguishes the pious in heaven from the impious without.

Likewise, he dismisses the notion that the 144,000 virgin followers of the Lamb of Rev. 14: 1-4 imply that there are others who are not of this number and must therefore have less glory: the 144,000 comprise all the elect of God, and the rest are damned; the idea that 2 Cor. 9: 6—'He which soweth sparingly shall reap also sparingly; and he which soweth bountifully shall reap also bountifully— implies varying rewards is dismissed in favour of an interpretation which differentiates not between greater and lesser heavenly rewards, but between a reward in heaven and an empty reward in hell; and the idea that punishment is imposed according to merit in hell does not affect the fact that reward for the pious is free (gratuita), for nothing stops punishments being unequal, since not all are equally impious, whereas the same rules of merit do not apply to heaven, since the pious do not earn their reward.

Such an idea will not have the unfortunate practical effect of diminishing enthusiasm for good works, since, Cameron believes, those who are not deterred from evil by the love of God or the horrors of hell will not be allured by the hope of differing rewards within heaven. Cameron rejects a number of scripturally based arguments which appear to indicate varying degrees of reward in heaven by arguing that such passages pertain to this life, rather than to the next. Into this category falls the parable of the Word of God as the seed which produces in some thirtyfold, in some sixtyfold, and in some a hundredfold. Cameron insists that this parable refers to the efficacy of the Word in this life; similarly, the idea contained in Luke 9: 47, that he who makes himself most like a child will be 'maximus in regno coelorum', is refuted, since Cameron argues that the Apostles understood hereby not heaven 'quale est in coelis', but 'regnum coelorum, quale est in terris'; likewise, the Lord's promise that the Apostles would sit in judgement over the twelve tribes of Israel, is referred by Cameron to the Apostles' position within the constitution of the Church, rather than to heavenly status.

With Calvin, Veron, Cartwright, and his colleague Amyraut, Cameron refers 1 Cor. 15:41 to the difference between our earthly bodies and those with which we shall be furnished at the general resurrection, rather than to differences between those resurrected bodies. He refuses to admit any qualitative distinction between the brightness of the stars and the brightness of the firmament of Dan. 12: 3; that there are 'many mansions' in God's house does not prove a distinction of inheritance, but indicates rather the wealth and size of eternal life; he reminds his readers that Matthew's version of the parable of the Talents (Matt. 25: 14—30) tells of an equal reward given to each servant; he counters several arguments which are based upon the necessity of order and hierarchy; we will be similar to the angels, but we, as the limbs of Christ, shall not resemble them in their different ranks; the distinctions which exist among the pious in this life result either from their sins (which will not exist in heaven) or from their varying styles of daily living, which will not pertain to their heavenly existence; those who are equal in love will be endowed with the same dignity in body. (John Cameron, Praelectiones, ii, 325-34) (Disley, Degrees of Glory, 11-13)

Troisiesme Partie - De la Justice de Dieu

Chapitre IV - De l'Inégalité des Grâces Divines

C'est une condition commune à toutes les choses créées, de ne pouvoir estre dans la multitude, qu'elles ne soient dans la diversité, quoy que les grands rapports de leur physionomie & de leurs actions, tâchent de nous persuader qu'elles sont semblables. Les différences spécifiques ou individuelles qui les distinguent le plus les unes des autres, se tiennent cachées dans l'intérieur de l'astre qu'elles constituent néantmoins si nos yeux & nostre raison concertent pour juger parce qui paroist à l'extérieur, nous verrons nettement cette vérité, que le monde n'a point deux choses d'une égale perfection. Les Astres sont aussi différées en leurs grandeurs & en leurs lumières, qu'en leur vertu, les pierreries en leur éclat les oyseaux en leurs plumages en l'air & aux tons de leur musique ; les fleurs & leurs coloris, en leurs grandeurs, en leurs figures, en leurs parfums Tous les animaux qui nous paroissent semblables, à cause qu'ils sont de mesme espece, ont neantmoins de grandes diversités, par lesquelles ils se distinguent, & contractent leurs amours par sympathie.

Il nous suffit de sçavoir que cette diversité est une des Loix de la Nature, pour juger qu'elle est très-équitable: Aussi comme elle est le fondement de l'ordre & de la beauté, sans en rechercher la cause, & quand il ne seroit pas possible de la justifier, nous l'aimons par inclination. Que si âpres avoir veu par la police du monde, qu'il estoit absolument nécessaire que les perfections fussent inégales, la curiosité demande encore pourquoy certaines parties sont plus ou moins avantagées que les autres? Pourquoi estant dans la masse des choses possibles, & n'ayant aucun droict à l'estre par une égale négation, quelques-unes en ont esté tirées avec des préférences, & enrichies de plus précieuses qualitez? C'est où faute de raison nous sommes contraints de recourir à la volonté de Dieu, qui est la souveraine raison} & dire qu'il luy a plu en disposer de la sorte par une toute-puissante & très-juste liberté qui ne prend soy que d'elle-mesme. Si l'on demande pourquoy de plusieurs pierres d'égale bonté, & tirées de mesme carrière, quelques-unes sont employées aux murs d'un cabinet, aux portiques, aux manteaux de cheminées, les autres aux fondemens & aux offices d'un grand Palais; Pourquoi d'une mesme masse d'argent ou ferre en fait des vases, les uns qui sont à servir sur la table, les autres sous le lit, il en faut venir à la volonté des ouvriers, qui ont pu disposer à discrétion de ces matières, & qui en effet devoient nécessairement faire tomber l'inégalité sur quelques-unes, pour accomplir tout ce qui estoit de leur art. Supposé que les hommes dont on veut composer une République, ayent les messines habilitéz, le Législateur ne laissera pas d'en faire des Juges, des Soldats, des Marchands, & employer une mesme capacité en divers offices. De là, nous pouvons juger qu'il estoit fort convenable, mesme nécessaire, que Dieu départist une diversité de grâces aux hommes, pour faire un ordre dans le monde intellectuel, qui répondist à celui du monde inférieur, & qui eust du rapport avec ses Hiérarchies célestes dont les perfections sont différentes, comme nous l'avons vu au précédent Livre.

Ces personnes d'un mérite égal, qui ne seroient pas en mesme charge, auroient quelque sujets de plainte d'une inégalité, qui ne se pourroit excuser que par la nécessité de l'ordre, & par la considération d'un bien public. Mais représentez-vous que les hommes devant leur création n'avoient aucun droict à l'existence, ny par conséquent aucun mérite pour prétendre à un plus sublime degré de grâces. Dieu leur a donc fait une assez grande faveur de leur donner un estre si noble, & il dépcndoit purement de la libéralité, de leur départir des grâces à proportion de ce qu'il en vouloit faire réussir pour sa gloire, mais toujours suffisantes pour leur salut. Les Loix donnent la liberté à celui qui est maistre d'une chose, d'en disposer selon qu'il luy plaise. Un Prince ne seroit pas souverain, s'il ne pouvoit élever quelque favory, accorder des privilèges, des honneurs, des immunités. Dieu donc qui est une cause souverainement libre, ayant donné l'estre aux âmes raisonnables, sans aucun précédent mérite de leur part, les peut élever au degré de grâce qu'il luy plaist, dont le moindre leur est une très-grande faveur, puis qu'elles n'y avoient aucun droit.

Il ne faut point inférer de là, comme font les libertins, que sa Majesté Divine ayant fait naistre quelques-uns sous l'influence de Vénus, ou de Mars, ou de Saturne, que c'est leur bien de suivre les inclinations de leurs Planètes, comme s'ils gardoient en cela l'ordre de la vie qu'elle leur a prescrit les mettant au monde. Il est vray que c'est un bien pour cet homme d'avoir un tempérament qui l'incline aux voluptez, à la colère, ou à la mélancolie, non pas pour le suivre, mais pour le vaincre, & s'en faire des occasions de gloire, par le secours des grâces suffisantes qui luy sont données. Il se peut mesme servir de ces inclinations naturelles pour de bonnes fins, & en tirer de grands avantages pour la vertu quand elles sont bien conduites. Une humeur sanguine rend la personne plus disposée à concevoir les flâmes, & à ressentir les extases de l' divin, à s'acquitter des devoirs de la charité & à gagner les cœurs par une douceur qui se fait aimer, & qui donne beaucoup d'efficace aux bons exemples pour persuader le bien. La bile peut donner un zèle & un courage invincible dans les occasions où il faut rendre quelques combats. La mélancolie retire des conversations, d'où l'on ne sort ordinairement que plus pauvre de quelque vertu; elle persuade la solitude qui est l'élément de l'innocence, le lieu Saint où Dieu se communique plus familièrement à l'âme, le port qui nous défend du naufrage, le Ciel qui nous fait gouter les véritables félicités de cette vie. Si les hommes employent mal des forces que la vertu peut gagner à son party, c'est leur faute, & ils doivent en cela se plaindre de leur lâcheté, & non pas de la miséricorde de Dieu. Le veux que ces mouvemens sensitifs échappent quelquefois à la raison, & que leur impétuosité n'attende pas toujours ses ordres & neantmoins nous avons vu au Livre de l'Immortalité de l'Ame, qu'il est en n'est le pouvoir de contracter des habitudes qui surmontent ces inclinations, & qu'au reste ces surprises ne sont que des allarmes qui mettent la raison en défense devant qu'elle soit tombée dans le crime. Et puis nous demeurons sans excuse, si l'on considère les grâces que Dieu nous donne, plus fortes quand nous avons de plus grands besoins comme un bon père de famille fait servir des viandes de plus grand prix à un serviteur malade, qu'à son propre fils qui se porte bien.

Que si ces grâces ne montent pas jusques à ce point auquel par effet elles gagnent ce cœur endurcy, c'est que Dieu a vu dès l'éternité des prophanations que cette âme ingrate feroit de ses bienfaits, & qu'après lui avoir donné beaucoup plus qu'il ne luy falloit pour se convertir, elle a voulu se jeter dans le précipice, malgré tous les obstacles qui la retenoient. C'est une terre infertile, sur qui il ne falloit pas perdre plus de façons; un arbre sans fruit qui mérite d'être abandonné, après des soins qui dévoient le rendre meilleur; & la justice Divine ne s'exerceroit pas en cette vie, si elle ne punissoit les hommes déterminez au mal, par la soustraction de ses grâces extraordinaires, afin que cette perte spirituelle fuit du rapport à la qualité de leur délit; comme les pères châtient la désobéissance de leurs enfants par l'abdication; comme les Loix ôtent les charges publiques à ceux qui en abusent, comme elles privent ceux qui Veulent frauder une hérédité, de tout le droit qu'il sy pouvoient légitimement prétendre; comme elles punissent les calomnieux, d'infamie; comme elles condamnent les faux témoins à ne porter jamais aucun témoignage; comme elles chassent des Temples ceux qui en ont prophané les mystères.

Ces justes indignations du Ciel abandonnent les âmes ingrates à leurs appétits, & les laissent périr sous un vent qui le fit paroître favorable; c'est pourquoy nous les devons craindre incomparablement plus que le défaut de ces grâces, qui ont un grand éclat à l'extérieur, comme sont la beauté, l'éloquence, la subtilité de l'esprit, le don de faire des miracles, & autres semblables qui gagnent l'admiration des hommes. En effet il n'y a point d'esprit si peu raisonnable qui ne se sente pressé de rendre de grands respects à ces personnes qui paroissent entre nous, comme si elles estoient d'une condition céleste, & comme si elles avoient la Lieutenance de Dieu dans le monde. Qui ne s'étonnera de voir un homme qui parle des choses futures comme si elles luy estoient prescrites; qui appaise les orages d'un signe de main; qui calme les mers par une parole qui par un seul attouchement guérit des infirmités incurables à la Médecine; qui ressuscite à les morts &

enseigne à la Philosophie que Dieu peut accorder un retour de cette privation, un rapel de cet exil, contre les Loix ordinaires de la Nature? Les hommes le rendent encore recommandables par la science, qui est dans les esprits cc qu'est la beauté sur les visages & ces deux rares qualitez donnent une telle éminence aux personnes qui les possèdent, qu'il semble que toutes les autres soient nées pour leur rendre des respects & des services. Neantmoins ces faveurs ne font pas celles que nous devons le plus estimer, parce qu'elles ne supposent pas nécessairement l'amitié de Dieu: d'ordinaire elles nous sont accordées pour les employer au service de nostre prochain, elles nous rendent comptables & criminels, si au lieu d'en estre bons dispensateurs, nous en tirons des sentimens de vanité. La vraye grâce est celle qui nous donne de grandes aversions du vice, & assez de force pour nous en délivrer ; elle assujettit toutes les puissances de l'âme aux volontez de Dieu, & les tient prestes en tout temps & en toutes occasions à luy obéir. Quoy que les Loix ne permettent pas de tirer un interest de l'interest, neantmoins la bonté de Dieu donne cours á une sainte avance, quand il nous fait expérimenter qu'une grâce qu'il nous accorde pour récompense de quelque bonne oeuvre, estant bien ménagée, nous en peut mériter une autre, ainsi de suite, par un progresz qui ne prend fin que par le défaut de nostre volonté, & qui peut toujours croistre pour l'acquisition d'une gloire qui est infinie.

CHAPITRE V - De la Récompense des Bonnes Actions en l'Autre Vie, & de la Vision de Dieu

Cette prodigieuse diversité d'appétits qui partagent les œuvres des hommes, se rapporte à un souhait gênerai, d'estre dans une condition affranchie de toute misère, & bienheureuse par la jouissance de toute la félicité possible ; mais l'effet de ces sublimes prétentions ne nous est pas permis durant cette vie, où nous n'avons point de douceurs qui ne soient méfiées de ciel & où l'amour, l'ambition, l'avarice, ne donnent que des contentemens imaginaires, des peines & des inquiétudes véritables où les faveurs qui semblent nous élever, sont des fardeaux qui accablent où les passions se poussent & s'entrechoquent comme des flots de la mer, sans se donner d'autre repos que celui qui procède de l'impuissance. Enfin nous sommes icy dans un pais de désirs, il y en a donc un autre qui en réserve les satisfactions, & où ces grandes aviditez de nostre cœur doivent rencontrer un bien capable de les apaiser d'autant que ces souhaits de félicité commune á toute nostre espece, ne doivent pas estre inutiles, autrement l'homme qui est le plus noble, seroit la plus misérable des créatures, en ce que si la pierre ne tombe pas á l'infiny sans trouver un centre où elle s'arreste, si les plantes & les animaux obtiennent leurs fins, & si le monde leur fournit pleinement les objets de leurs appétits, il n'est pas à croire que nous eussions les pensées & les souhaits d'une parfaite félicité, si la jouissance nous en estoit impossible. Mille raisons que j'ay déduites au précédent Livre, nous persuadent que nostre âme n'est pas seulement créée pour donner la vie á un corps où ses bienfaits luy sont préjudiciables, & qui luy est une prison si obscure, qu'elle est contrainte d'en sortir autant qu'il luy est possible par les abstractions, pour avoir quelque connoissance de la vérité. J'ay fait voir que la vertu ne rencontre icy que des périls, des fatigues & des combats au lieu de triomphes, qu'elle s'impose des peines au lieu de se servir de récompense, qu'elle souffre tant de calamitez sous les persécutions de l'envie, & par une permission particulière du Ciel, qu'elle est l'objet ordinaire de nos compassions. D'où il faut nécessairement conclure que Dieu ne seroit pas juste, ny souverainement bon s'il ne lui donnoit un estât de gloire qui comprenne en abrégé, toute qu'il y a de bien & ses libéralisez ne seroient pas assez magnifiques, elles n'accomplissoient nos désirs en surmontant mesme nos espérances.

Il ne nous est pas possible d'avoir une parfaite idée de ce bienheureux estât, que nous n'avons pas expérimenté ; neantmoins entre les ignorances de nostre nature, nous pouvons connoistre que nostre intellect recherche une première vérité, & que nostre volonté soupire pour un souverain bien, de sorte que la gloire que nous espérons au Ciel, consiste en un parfait acquiescement de ces deux puissances en la vision de Dieu ; c'est à dire que nous jouirons de cette lumière primitive, de la première vérité, du Souverain estre intelligible qui se possède proprement par l'Intellect. Ce souverain Bonté pénétrera très-intimement l'essence de nos âmes, & s'y unissant par soy-mesme, sans l'entremise d'aucunes espèces, elle les comblera par cette étroite union, de joyes & de délices inconcevables. Sans ces discours, & sans ces longueurs qui accompagnent nos raisonnemens, une grande lumière nous montrera d'une vue toutes les verir & dans leurs principes. Une affluence de gloire nous fera jouir de tous les biens imaginables dans celui qui les comprend tous. Si au monde les plus belles choses deviennent fades quand elles sont ordinaires, & si l'amour y trouve plus de délices en la recherche qu'en la jouissance, c'est que l'âme s'abuse, & prend les premières impulsions de l'appétit, comme si elles avançaient au souverain bien; mais depuis qu'elle ne rencontre que des perfections finies dans son objet, elle prend le change, & cherche dans la diversité les satisfactions qu'une seule chose ne luy peut donner ; mais les bienheureux jouiront d'une félicité éternelle, sans que la continue leur puisse jamais donner de dégoût, parce que l'objet en est infiny ; & comme il comprend toutes les perfections possibles, avec une éminence qui ne s'y rencontreroit pas si elles estoient divisées en plusieurs sujets, il donne un acquiescement â tous nos désirs, & les tient attachez à soy avec une plus amoureuse nécessité, & plus de repos, que les choses matérielles n'en trouvent en leurs centres. Si l'on dit que la forme des Cieux est si parfaite, & qu'elle contente si fort les appétits g de la matière , qu'elle luy ose ses inclinations naturelles au changement ; Nous avons sujet de conclure que Dieu s'unissant aux âmes bienheureuses, les affranchira des inconstances qui leur estoient familières au monde, qu'il préviendra tous leurs souhaits par une surabondante satisfaction, qui ne leur laissera point lieu d'en concevoir de nouveaux, que les éclairant de sa lumière, il les rendra participans de Visa mutabilité de sa nature ; il ne remplira pas seulement, mais il étendra leurs puissances, & outre la proportion qu'elles ont avec luy, comme avec leur dernière fin, & l'une que objet de leur béatitude, il les fortifiera & leur donnera encore une plus grande capacité par les lumières de gloire.

Tous les Bienheureux posséderont ce souverain bien, mais différemment ; & comme les yeux qui voyent un mesme Soleil en supportent les lumières plus ou moins à proportion de leurs forces. Cette inégalité de gloire vient de l'inégalité du mérite , & ne faut point douter que la Justice Divine ne donne de plus belles palmes aux actions plus généreuses ; qu'elle ne réserve des récompenses particulières à la Force qui aura tenu contre tous les accidens de la Fortune ; à la Tempérance , qui surmonte les passions plus rebelles & plus insolentes contre la raison ; à la Charité qui expose courageusement ses interests pour soulager les nécessitez du prochain. Il y a donc divers ordres de Bienheureux aussi bien que d'Ange ; & cette équité qui donne la préséance aux plus grands mérites dans le gouvernement de l'Univers & de nos Estats, & se voit tres-entiere dans ce monde spirituel. Cependant ces saintes âmes entrent si fort dans les sentimens de la Justice divine, que quand il n'y auroit point de décret qui leur assignât leurs rangs, elles les prendroient d'elles-mesmes comme tres-justes & tres-convenables á leur portée & sans se piquer de jalousie contre les ordres supérieurs, comme un homme de médiocre taille ne souhaitera pas d'avoir l'habit d'un géant. Sedans l'économie de nos corps, le pied n'a pas l'ambition de se métamorphoser en teste mais au contraire elles se montrent intéressées dans la gloire des plus éminentes, elles y prennent part, & comme elles connoissent que Dieu mérite infiniment plus de gloire qu'elles ne luy en peuvent rendre, & qu'elles voyent des créatures qui s'acquittent plus parfaitement qu'elles de ce devoir, elles en conçoivent la mesme joye que nous, de rencontrer un excellent Peintre qui représente au naturel le visage, & un bon Orateur qui dresse les Eloges d'un Prince que nous aimons. Tellement que les Bienheureux jouissent, & de la gloire qui leur est propre, & de celle qui leur revient par complaisance : Ainsi rien ne manque à leur félicité, en ce que toutes les inégalitez semblent couvertes par ces reflexions de lumières, & par leur commun objet qui est infiny. Quelles consolations de se souvenir lors des pauvretes, des traverses, des maladies, qui nous auront esté des sujets pour mériter cette gloire ! Le temps des souffrances qui paroissoit long à nos sentimens durant cette vie, ne semblera qu'un moment en comparaison d'une éternité qui ne finira jamais si nous verrons lors ce que nous ignorons á cette heure, que les maladies de nos ames devoient estre secouées par ces remèdes ; qu'il ne nous faloit pas de moindres combats, pour tenir nos courages en exercice, que ces inspirations, ces lumières, ces saints mouvemens nous ont esté donnez à propos, comme des grâces aux criminels & qu'elles ont esté les vrais moyens que Dieu devoit employer pour nous sauver, sans contraindre nostre liberté, Justice admirable, qui ne laisse pas le moindre mérite de nostre vie, le moindre bon mouvement de nos coeurs sans récompense ; qui âpres nous avoir mis les armes en main pour combattre & âpres nous avoir donné des secours pour vaincre, nous conduit dans un estât de gloire, qui surpasse & nos espérances & nos mérites.

CHAPITRE VI - La Bonté Infinie de Dieu n'Empesche pas qu'Il ne Punisse les Péchez comme Il Récompense les Vertus

Voicy la seconde partie de la Justice distributive de Dieu, dont la plus-part des hommes ne voudroit point ouïr parler, comme d'une créance importune qui trouble les contentemens de cette vie par les appréhensions de l'autre -y ils voudroient qu'il leur fut permis de s'abandonner aux plaisirs des sens, de jouir l'impétuosité de leurs passions & de violer les Loix divines & humaines, sans estre coupables, ou qu'ils obtinssent par leurs dissolutions la mesme gloire que méritent les plus sublimes vertus. Je ne m'étonne pas si l'amour propre cherche ses avantages & l'abolition de ses crimes par des voyes injustes. Un bras pourry de gangrène résulte donc qu'il peut le fer qui le doit couper. Les debtors de mauvaise fby voudroient qu'il n'y eust aucunes actions en jugement ; point de saisies ny de geôles qui les contraignissent à payer leurs debtes. Le désir des criminels seroit qu'il n'y eust ny luges pour les condamner, ny peines aucunes qu'ils eussent souffrir. Ainsi ces ames engagées dans le poché, taschent à se défaire du sentiment de la Justice divine ; mais par un effort autant plus inutile qu'il leur est préjudiciable, puisque par ces fausses imaginations, ils perdent la crainte qui est la plus puissante machine pour les retirer du mal, & neantmoins ils n'évitent pas les peines deuës à leurs démérites, selon l'ordre établey de Dieu. Sa Providence qui a marqué l'écliptique pour le chemin du Soleil, & les deferens aux autres Planètes ; qui a voulu que des qualitez particulières servirent de dispositions aux formes, que la beauté résultat d'une certaine disposition des parties, a prescrit aux hommes des Loix, qui estant bien observées avec le secours de ses ' grâces, leur feroient mériter la béatitude. Ce n'est pas merveille si ceux qui prennent des chemins directement opposez, arrivent à un estât qui luy est contraire. Si l'on ne garde les règles propres á chacun des Arts, il est impossible d'obtenir la fin qu'ils promettent. Si l'on fait une course de bague, c'est á condition que ceux qui ne remporteront pas, seront exclus de l'honneur & du prix qui s'y propose. La Musique ne se forme que du concert des voix, qui suivent exactement les nottes de leur partie. Un vaisseau n'arrivera pas au port s'il s'expose aux vents qui l'en écartent. La Nature mesme qui aspire à la perfection, permet les Monstres dans les espèces les plus accomplies, lors que la matière se trouve indisposée pour de plus nobles effets. Ainsi Dieu veut le salut de tous les hommes, il propose la béatitude pour récompense de leurs vertus ; mais il veut qu'ils les pratiquent ; que pour estre heureux ils soient fidelles à l'observation de ses Loix : Il leur donne le secours général & particulier de ses grâces, s'ils en abusent, il n'y auroit non plus de justice à les sauver, qu'à donner les mesmes récompenses aux soldats qui ont pris la fuite faute de ecurr, qu'à ceux qui ont esté courageusement à l'attaque, & forcé la résistance de l'ennemy.

On dit contre cette vérité, qu'il n'y a point en Dieu ny de Justice commutative, parce qu'il n'y a point de proportion entre la gloire d'une éternité, & nos actions, dont la durée & le mérite sont de si peu d'étendue, ny aussi de Justice distributive, n'y ayant point de Loix qui l'obligent, comme les Magistrats, à la distribution des peines & des recompenses. Cette difficulté me semble si peu considérable, & si lcgere, qu'elle ne mérite point de réponse ; car qui ne sçait que le Prince n'est pas au moins juste, quand il décerne des couronnes à la vertu, encore qu'elles ne soient point taxées, & qu'il soit au-dessus des Loix qui en déterminent le prix? La Justice est une certaine proportion de la peine, ou de la récompense, avec les actions, qui est originaiement dans la nature des choses, & dans l'idée raisonnable du Législateur, dont la Loy n'est qu'une morte représentation. Or Dieu est une Justice vivante & primitive, c'est pourquoy il ne punit pas à cause qu'il y a une Loy qui le commande, mais parce qu'il veut punir par une volonté, qui n'est autre chose que la Justice mesme, dont le sentiment est gravé dedans nos cœurs, & que chacun reconnoist, quand il juge raisonnable que les crimes soient chastiez de quelques peines. Il est yray qu'il n'y a point d'égalité entre sa gloire & nos actions, á cause que tout le mérite qu'elles ont pour cette fin surnaturelle, dépend de ses grâces. Mais si ce n'est pas proprement une Justice distributive à l'égard des récompenses, au moins elle l'est à l'égard des peines, en ce que de nous-mesmes nous sommes capables de démériter. Nos ingratitudez contre un si grand bien-faicteur; nos rebellions contre nostre Souverain, nos désobéissancez à nostre Père céleste, nos sacrilèges contre sa divine Majesté, sont dignes de punition, & ont de soy du rapport aux supplices dont ils doivent estre chastiez en l'autre vie. De sorte que comme un esclave ne peut demander récompense des services qu'il rend selon le devoir de sa condition, & mérite neantmoins d'estre puny, s'il ne s'en acquitte pas. Ainsi les hommes peuvent justement estre punis de Dieu pour leurs péchez, encore qu'ils n'ayent aucun droict de demander la récompense de leurs bonnes œuvres, qui luy estant deuës par beaucoup de titres, n'acquièrent aucune obligation dessus luy.

Comme la Nature tire un bien du mal, quand elle fait servir les corruptions à de nouvelles naissances- le mouvement des Cieux, les éclipses, les exils, les rétrogradations des planètes, pour nous en tempérer les influences, qui seroient trop forces, si elles estoient arrestées. Ainsi Dieu tourne le mal de coulpe en un bien, & fait un ordre des déreglemens de l'esprit de l'homme, quand il les chastie, en ce qu'il abaisse cette volonté qui s'estoit insolemment soulevée contre lui, il la réduit au rang qu'elle doit tenir, il fait qu'elle souffre des peines qu'elle n'aime pas à cause qu'elle a méprisé ce qu'elle devoit aimer, & qu'elle perde dans ces supplices la liberté dont die ne s'estoit pas bien servie pour l'acquisition de la gloire. Cette Justice est un bien, comme nous le pouvons connoistre par nos propres inclinations naturelles, qui nous donnent une secrette complaisance quand on fait Persécution des parricides, des traistres à la ' Patrie, des boutefeux de l'Estat, & qui nous portent á confirmer les Arrests qui les ont condamnez. Si c'est un bien, elle doit estre en Dieu, veu principalement que son contraire choque nostre raison, qui ne peut approuver l'impunité des grands maléfices: Aussi tous les anciens Philosophes qui ont crû l'immortalité de l'ame, soustiennent un animement qu'il y a certains lieux de peine où sont précipitez celles qui n'ont pas expié leurs fautes durant cette vie, & quand les Poètes disent qu'elles sont jugées dans les Enfers, par Minos, AEacus, Râdamanthus, qui furent autrefois des Princes tres-justes, c'est pour exprimer plus sensiblement les Arrests inflexibles & formidables de la Justice de Dieu. Les punitions ne sont donc pas seulement bonnes, en considération de ce qu'elles épouvantent le vice, & en donnent de la crainte par leur exemple, mais principalement à cause qu'elles sont une des deux parties de la Justice, qu'elles occupent un des costez de sa balance, & que si le mérite élevé les bons à sa gloire, les crimes importans doivent abaisser ceux qui les ont commis dans la damnation. Cette Justice Oste, comme j'ay dit, elle établit une égalité, qui est une image de l'Unité divine: Aussi Boëce soutient que les meschans sont moins heureux dans la continue, que dans la punition de leurs crimes, parce que d'un mal elle en fait un bien.

L'amour propre nous flate par trop, quand en comparaison de ses tendresses il nous fait concevoir les Arrests de la Justice Divine, comme une espece de cruauté, il nous représente que nous sommes quelque chose de grand; & parce que nous nous aimons avec nos crimes, il voudroit engager Dieu dans les mesmes sentimens, le rendre aussi indulgent que nous, de nos fautes, c'est à dire qu'il n'eust point d'yeux pour les voir, de volonté, ny de puissance pour les punir. Je m'imagine que si les mouches & les puces avoient quelque ombre de raison, elles formeroient les mesmes plaintes de nous, & nous accuseroient de cruauté, de ce que pour nous venger d'une petite piqueur, nous leur osons une vie qui leur est si chère, & qui n'est plus réparable : neantmoins qui est l'homme de si foible esprit, qui pense commettre une injustice en ces actions, & qui ne les mette entre les indifférentes, parce que l'extrême inégalité qui est entre luy & ces bestioles, luy donne un droict sur leur vie, sans qu'elles en puissent demander raison, principalement lors qu'elles luy sont importunes? Hélas; nous sommes moins en comparaison de Dieu, que ne le sont les plus imparfaits de tous les insectes à nostre égard. Nous avons du rapport avec les vers & les moucherons, en ce qu'ils se réduisent sous le genre généralissime de Pestre catégorique : ils sont composez des mesmes elemens, ils digèrent, ils croissent, ils sentent aussi bien que nous ; ils ont des artifices que nous ne pouvons égaler ; enfin ce font des animaux, & le titre qu'on leur donne d'imparfaits, signifie si l'on l'examine bien, plus de pureté, de promptitude, de faveur des causes universelles en leur naissance.

Cette pensée nous doit tenir dans une abysine d'humilité, sans nous plaindre de la Justice de Dieu, & avec de profondes altérations de ses infinies miséricordes, Il destine tout le monde à nos usages, il nous donne un empire sur les animaux, il éclaire nostre raison de ses lumières, il échauffe nostre cœur de ses saintes flammes ; sa main est toujours preste á nous secourir, ses Anges à nous assister de leurs conseils; & cependant nous sommes ingrats jusques à nous rendre rebelles contre sa divine Majesté, & à preferer le désordre de nos appétits à l'accomplissement de ses volontez. N'est-ce pas un nouveau crime de luy vouloir donner d'autres sentimens que les siens, & de l'appeller injuste, parce qu'il punit des parricides & des sacrilèges ; avuons qu'il est nostre Créateur, nos ames tiennent immédiatement l'estre de sa main $ mais les mépris que les hommes font de cette faveur, les rend plus coupables, & la qualité de Père ne signifie pas moins la puissance & la Justice à punir, que l'amour pour obliger. Le Philosophe Aristippus fit une solennelle abdication d'un fils qui avait de mauvaises mœurs, & qui le rendit incorrigible à ses avis sur ce que quelques-uns qui ménageoient l'accommodement de cette affaire, luy représentèrent qu'il agissoit par cette rigueur contre une partie de lui-mesme : Ne crachons-nous pas, leur dit-il, les excréments qui viennent de nous? & ne seroit-ce pas une cruauté d'empescher un homme de se défaire des vermines incommodes au corps qui les a produit ? C'est pourquoy les anciennes Loix de Rome donnèrent aux Pères la puissance de vie & de mort sur leurs enfans, sans craindre qu'ils en abusassent, & avec cette créance, que l'amour qu'ils ont pour leur bien, est un juste contrepoids à la colère, qui les pourroit emporter au chastiment : Aussi quoy qu'elles ne permettent pas au mary de tuer sa femme surprise en adultère, parce que la jalousie aussi furieuse en ses entreprises, qu'elle est aveugle avec tous ses yeux d'Argus, peut prendre les moindres soupçons pour de légitimes sujets d'exercer sa rage: Mais, dit la Loy, la piété paternelle consulte pour le bien de ses enfans, elle arrête les précipitations des mouvemens sensitifs, de forte que son procédé demeure toujours dans les termes de la Justice. L'on noye & l'on étouffe les Monstres, parce qu'ils sont les péchez de la Nature contre les loix d'une espece ; & personne ne condamne les mères de cruauté, quand elles consentent qu'on délivre le monde de ces malheureuses productions. Les ames abandonnées dans le vice, sont des monstres qui n'ont rien de ressemblant à leur principe ; & s'il nous estoit permis de voir leur intérieur, nous jugerions que la Nature n'a point d'extravagances qui égalent leurs deformitez. Il ne faut donc point alléguer icy la bonté infinie de Dieu, comme si elle devoit servir d'excuse à ces péchez, puis qu'au contraire sa considération en augmente les démérites, & fait que les chastimens en sont tres-justes. Ingrates & malheureuses créatures, qui n'ont pas le sentiment de cette bonté quand elles l'offensent, & qui ne l'avouent de bouche, que quand on leur parle d'en estre punis, adjoûtant ainsi la mocquerie à leurs sacrilèges. Digne, certes, de souffrir comme un luge sévère, celui qu'elles n'ont pas voulu reconnoistre comme un Père plein de miséricorde.

La chaleur naturelle qui ne travaille que pour la vie, cause neantmoins des fièvres qui donnent la mort, quand elle trouve une plénitude de matière disposée à l'inflammation. Un mesme rayon de Soleil, sans rien changer de ses favorables vivifiantes qualitez qui ont fait naître la rose, la sèche, quand l'humidité vient à luy défaillir. Je pourrois dire de mesme, que la bonté de Dieu qui donne la gloire aux bonnes ames, condamne les Criminelles aux supplices, parce qu'elle doit produire des effets contraires sur des sujets opposez, demeurant toujours égale en soy, puisque Cette partie de Justice qui punit est un bien qui ne doit pas manquer à une bonté infinie, quand l'occasion le demande : Neantmoins ces comparaisons ne sont pas bien justes à cause que ces puissances naturelles agissent positivement en la corruption des sujets, c'est en effet le Soleil qui sèche la rose, & la chaleur naturelle qui cause l'incendie de la fièvre, mais ce n'est pas Dieu qui fait le péché, ny les peines qui le punissent. Il vous montre le chemin de la gloire, il vous donne des instructions qui Vous le persuadent, & des secours pour y avancer: que si vostre liberté prend des resolutions, & des routes toutes contraires, c'est elle-mesme, & non pas Dieu qui vous perte.

Si vous ne jouissez pas des lumières qui font la gloire des Bienheureux, c'est que vous vous estes volontairement précipitez dans une région de ténèbres, Les Anciens nous signifièrent cette vérité, quand ils dirent que les Cyclopes, qui habitoient les antres de la terre, forgeoient les foudres de Jupiter ; c'est à dire que les hommes esclaves des plaisirs du monde, arment eux-mesmes la main de Dieu, & font les auteurs des peines qu'ils souffrent. Ils tenoient encore que les foudres envoyez de Jupiter sont de bon augure, & ne causent point de mal. Ceci se vérifie par expérience, en ce qui est de l'air qui se montre couvert de nuages blancs, quelquefois avec de petits tonnerres qui réveillent la Nature fort à propos, quand le Planète Jupiter est maistre du Ciel, mais cela est encore plus vray par rapport dans l'ordre de la Justice Diurne, qui ne nous envoie des afflictions que pour nostre gloire, & pour tenir nos courages en exercice ; & quant aux peines que les damnez souffrent, ils en font les premières causes, & ce sont leurs mauvaises qualitez, semblables à celles des infortunes, d'où précèdent les foudres qui les écrasent.

Les Princes se portent à vanger les crimes par un double motif, & pour satisfaire aux devoirs de la Justice qui demande cette égalité, & pour réparer les injures qui ont esté faites : Aussi les Loix Romaines qui estoient exactes en la formalité des actions, en permettoient deux contre le larron ; l'une pour vendiquer ce qui avoit esté mal pris, & celle-là passoit jusques sur les héritiers ; & l'autre estoit personnelle; & consistoit en la peine devë à la gravité du crime. Ainsi les amendes, les confiscations, les punitions corporelles qui sont les plus rigoureuses, ne tendent pas à satisfaire aux parties intéressées, mais à punir un crime dont l'exercés devoit estre réduit par le chastiment, à l'égalité de la Justice ; d'où il faut conclure, qu'il est tres-équitable que Dieu punisse les crimes pour satisfaire à cette équité, quoy qu'ils ne portent aucun dommage à sa grandeur, & qu'il en puisse estre moins touché que le Ciel des flèches que nos foibles bras tirent contre luy. Au reste, la volonté qui s'est mise en devoir de l'exécution doit estre punie comme dans les crimes de leze Majesté ; qui doute que les pécheurs ne méritent tout ce qui se peut imaginer de peines, pour avoir attenté contre Dieu, & luy avoir ravy autant qu'ils pouvoient la gloire & les droits de son Empire?

Sa souveraine Sagesse a voulu donner aux hommes des Loix, avec des moyens proportionnez à leur nature, & qui fassent de fortes persuasions à Une liberté qui ne devoit pas estre violentée : Or comme nous sommes tres-sensibles à la douleur, & que la crainte fait prendre des résolutions extrêmes, qui ne fussent jamais entrées dans un esprit dégagé de ce sentiment, Dieu s'en est servy, & a joint les menaces de la damnation aux promesses de la Béatitude, pour gagner plus facilement nos coeurs ; c'est une digue contre les débordemens du péché, c'est un Fort dont les vertus se servent contre les attaques, & n'estait pas vray que dans les inclinations naturelles qu'ont les hommes de suivre le party des sens, il seroit inutile d'en publier les deffenses, s'il n'y avoit point de peines pour la transgression ? Le monde ne laisse pas de commettre ces grands désordres qui sont tous les jours gémir l'innocence & la pieté, quoy que les peines éternelles préparées aux crimes soient épouvantables : Que seroit-ce donc? Quelles calamitez, quels ravages, quelles désolations ne verrions-nous point entre les hommes, s'ils n'estoient un peu retenus par la crainte? Appellez-vous cette justice mauvaise, parce qu'elle ne favorise pas les meschans ? qu'elle leur assigne un estât conforme à leur démérite ? qu'elle sépare les ténèbres de la lumière, le vil du précieux? Qu'elle ne donne pas aux perfides & aux sacrilèges les couronnes de L'obéissance & de la Religion ? Qu'elle ne rend pas Dieu prévaricateur de la vérité, réfractaire à son jugement, lâche jusques á n'oser condamner ce qu'il condamne ? enfin qu'elle ne permet pas cet avantage aux pécheurs, d'usurper sa gloire, âpres avoir transgressé ses Loix ? Quoy que les âmes criminelles réclament icy, il est vray que la Justice de Dieu n'est pas seulement une espece, mais une protection de sa bonté, d'autant qu'elle ne se pourroit exercer, & ne seroit pas complete à nostre égard, comme j'ay dit, sans les effets de cette Justice. C'est elle qui nous le représente comme nostre Père, avec des soins charitables, qui demandent tous les amours de nostre cœur, & comme nostre Souverain, qui nous gouvernant avec ses Loix, doit estre respecté de nous avec toutes les humilitez possibles, aussi tous les préceptes de pieté se rapportent aux scntimens de l'amour & de la crainte de Dieu.

The Necessity Of Diligently Seeking The Saints' Rest

The saints' rest surprisingly neglected. The author mourns the neglect, and excites the reader to diligence, by considering, 1. The ends we aim at, the work we have to do, the shortness and uncertainty of our time, and the diligence of our enemies; 2. Our talents, mercies, relations to God, and our afflictions; 3. What assistance we have, what principles we profess, and our certainty never to do enough; 4. That every grace tends to diligence, and to trifle is lost labor; that much time is misspent and that our recompense and labor will be proportionable; 5. That striving is the divine appointment; all men do or will approve it; the best Christians, at death, lament their want of it; heaven is often lost for want of it, but never obtained without it; 6. God, Christ, and the Holy Spirit are in earnest; God is so in hearing and answering prayer; ministers in their instructions and exhortations; all the creatures in serving us; sinners in serving the devil, as we were once, and now are, in worldly things, and in heaven and hell all are in earnest.

If there be so certain and glorious a rest for the saints, why is there no more earnest seeking after it? One would think, if a man did but once hear of such unspeakable glory to be obtained, and believed what he heard, he would be transported with the vehemency of his desire after it, and would almost forget to eat and drink, and would care for nothing else, and speak of and inquire after nothing else, but how to get this treasure. And yet people who hear of it daily, and profess to believe it as a fundamental article of their faith, as little mind it, or labor for it, as if they had never heard of any such thing, or did not believe one word they hear. This reproof is applicable to the worldly-minded, to the profane multitude, to formal professors, and even to the godly themselves.

The worldly-minded are so taken up in seeking the things below, that they have neither heart nor time to seek this rest. O foolish sinners, “who hath bewitched you?” The world bewitches men into brute beasts, and draws them even to madness. See what riding and running, what scrambling and catching for a thing of nought, while eternal rest lies neglected! What contriving and caring to get a step higher in the world than their brethren, while they neglect the kingly dignity of the saints! What insatiable pursuit of fleshly pleasures, while they regard the praises of God, the joy of angels, as a tiresome burden! What unwearied diligence in raising their posterity, enlarging their possessions, (perhaps for a poor living from hand to mouth,) while judgment is drawing near! but how it shall go with them then, never brings them to one hour’s consideration! What rising early and sitting up late, and laboring from year to year, to maintain themselves and children in credit till they die! but what shall follow after they never think! Yet these men cry, “May we not be saved without so much ado?” How early do they rouse up their servants to their labor! but how seldom do they call them to prayer, or reading the Scriptures! What hath this world done for its lovers and friends, that it is so eagerly followed and painfully sought after, while Christ and heaven are neglected? or what will the world do for them for the time to come? The common entrance into it is through anguish and sorrow. The passage through it is with continual care and labor. The passage out of it is the sharpest of all. O unreasonable, deluded men! will mirth and pleasure stay by you? will gold and worldly glory prove fast friends to you in the time of your greatest need? Will they hear your cries in the day of your calamity? At the hour of your death will they either answer or relieve you? Will they go along with you to the other world, and bribe the Judge and bring you off clear, or purchase you a place among the blessed? Why then did the rich man want “a drop of water to cool his tongue?” Or are the sweet morsels of present delight and honor of more worth than eternal rest? And will they recompense the loss of that enduring treasure? Can there be the least hope of any of these? Ah, vile, deceitful world! how oft have we heard thy most faithful servants at last complaining, “O, the world hath deceived me, and undone me! It flattered me in my prosperity, but now it turns me off in my necessity. If I had as faithfully served Christ as I have served it, he would not have left me thus comfortless and hopeless.” Thus they complain; and yet succeeding sinners will take no warning.

As for the profane multitude, they will not be persuaded to be at so much pains for salvation as to perform the common outward duties of religion. If they have the Gospel preached in the town where they dwell, it may be they will give the hearing to it one part of the day, and stay at home the other; or if the master come to the congregation, yet part of his family must stay at home. If they have not the plain and powerful preaching of the Gospel, how few are there in a whole town who will travel a mile or two to hear abroad though they will go many miles to the market for provisions for their bodies! They know the Scripture is the law of God, by which they must be acquitted or condemned in the judgment; and that “the man is blessed who delights in the law of the Lord, and in his law doth meditate day and night;” yet will they not be at the pains to read a chapter once a day. If they carry a Bible to church, and neglect it all the week, this is the most use they make of it. Though they are commanded to pray without ceasing, and to pray always, yet they will neither pray constantly in their families nor in secret. Though Daniel would rather be cast to the lions than forbear praying three times a day in his house, where his enemies might hear him; yet these men will rather venture to be an eternal prey to Satan, the roaring lion, than thus seek their own safety. Or their cold and heartless prayers invite God to a denial: for among men it is taken for granted, that he who asks but slightly and seldom, cares not much for what he asks. They judge themselves unworthy of heaven, who think it not worth their more constant and earnest requests. If every door was marked where families do not, morning and evening, earnestly seek the Lord in prayer, and his wrath were poured out upon such prayerless families, our towns would be as places overthrown by the plague, the people being dead within, and the mark of judgment without: I fear, where one house would escape, ten would be marked out for death; and the very doors, as it were, cry, “Lord, have mercy upon us,” because the people would not pray themselves. But especially if we could see what men do in their secret chambers, how few would you find in a whole town that spend one quarter of an hour, morning and night, in earnest supplication to God for their souls! O how little do these men value eternal rest! Thus do they slothfully neglect all endeavors for their own welfare, except some public duty in the congregation, to which custom or credit engages them. Persuade them to read good books, learn the grounds of religion in their catechism, and sanctify the Lord's day in prayer, and meditation, and hearing the word, forbearing all worldly thoughts and speeches, and what a tedious life do they take this to be! as if they thought heaven were not worth doing so much for.

Another class are formal professors, who will be brought to any outward duty, but to the inward work of religion they will never be persuaded. They will preach, or hear, or read, or talk of heaven, or pray in their families, and take part with the persons or causes that are good, and desire to be esteemed among the godly; but you can never bring them to the more spiritual duties,—as to be constant and fervent in secret prayer and meditation; conscientious in self-examination; heavenly-minded; to watch over their hearts, words and ways; to mortify the flesh, and not make provision to fulfil its lusts; to love and heartily forgive an enemy, and prefer their brethren before themselves; to lay all they have, or do, at the feet of Christ, and prize his service and favor before all, to prepare to die and willingly leave all to go to Christ. Hypocrites will never be persuaded to any of these. If any hypocrite entertains the Gospel with joy, it is only in the surface of his soul; he never gives the seed any depth of earth: it changes his opinions, but never melts and new moulds his heart, nor sets up Christ there in full power and authority. As his religion lies most in opinion, so does his chief business and conversation. He is usually an ignorant, bold, conceited dealer in controversies, rather than an humble embracer of known truth with love and obedience. By his slighting the judgments and persons of others, and seldom talking with seriousness and humility of the great things of Christ, he shows his religion dwells in his brain, and not in his heart. The wind of temptation carries him away as a feather, because his heart is not established with Christ and grace. He never, in private conversation, humbly bewails his soul's imperfections, or tenderly acknowledges his unkindness to Christ; but gathers his greatest comfort from his being of such a persuasion or party. The like may be said of the worldly hypocrite, who chokes the Gospel with the thorns of worldly cares and desires. He is convinced that he must be religious, or he cannot be saved; and therefore he reads, and hears, and prays, and forsakes his former company and courses but he resolves to keep his hold of present things. His judgment may say, God is the chief good; but his heart and affections never said so. The world has more of his affections than God, and therefore it is his god. Though he does not run after opinions and novelties, like the world, yet he will be of that opinion which will best serve his worldly advantage. And as one whose spirits are enfeebled by some pestilential disease, so this man's spirits being possessed by the plague of a worldly disposition, how feeble is he in secret prayer! how superficial in examination and meditation! how poor in heart-watchings! how nothing at all in loving and walking with God, rejoicing in him, or desiring him! So that both these and many other sorts of hypocrites, though they will go with you in the easy outside of religion, yet will never be at the pains of inward and spiritual duties.

And even the godly themselves are too lazy seekers of their everlasting rest. Alas! what a disproportion is there between our light and heat, our profession and prosecution! Who makes such haste as if it were for heaven? How still we stand! how idly we work! how we talk, and jest, and trifle away our time! how deceitfully we perform the work of God! how we hear, as if we heard not! and pray, as if we prayed not! and examine, and meditate, and reprove sin, as if we did it not! and enjoy Christ, as if we enjoyed him not! as if we had learned to use the things of heaven as the apostle teacheth us to "use the things of the world!" What a frozen stupidity has benumbed us! We are dying, and we know it, and yet we stir not; we are at the door of eternal happiness or misery, and yet we perceive it not; death knocks, and we hear it not; God and Christ call and cry to us, "Today, if ye will hear my voice, harden not your hearts; work while it is day, for the night cometh, when none can work." Now ply your business, labor for your lives, lay out all your strength and time now or never! and yet we stir no more than if we were half asleep. What haste do death and judgment make! how fast do they come on! they are almost upon us, and yet what little haste we make! Lord, what a senseless, earthly, hellish thing is a hard head! Where is the man that is in earnest a Christian? Methinks men every where make but a trifle of their eternal state. They look after it but a little by the by; they do not make it the business of their lives. If I were not sick myself of the same disease, with what tears should I mix this ink! with what groans should I express these complaints! and with what heart-grief should I mourn over this universal deadness!

Do magistrates among us seriously perform their work? Are they zealous for God? Do they build up his house? Are they tender of his honor? Do they second the word and oppose sin and sinners, as the disturbers of our peace and the only cause of all our miseries? Do they improve all their power, wealth, and honor, and all their influence, for the greatest advantage to the kingdom of Christ, as men that must shortly give an account of their stewardship?

How few are the ministers who are serious in their work! Nay, how grievously do the very best fail in this! Do we cry out of men's disobedience to the Gospel "in the demonstration of the Spirit," and deal with sin as the destroying fire in our towns, and by force pull men out of it? Do we persuade our people as those should that "know the terrors of the Lord?" Do we press Christ, and regeneration, and faith, and holiness upon men, believing that, without these, they can never have life? Do our bowels yearn over the ignorant, careless, obstinate multitude? When we look them in the face, do our hearts melt over them, lest we should never see their faces in rest? Do we, as Paul, "tell them, weeping," of their fleshly and earthly disposition; "and teach them publicly, and from house to house, at all seasons, and with many tears?" And do we entreat them, as for their soul's salvation? Or rather, do we not study to gain the approbation of critical hearers; as if a minister's business were of no more weight but to tell a smooth tale for an hour, and look no more after the people till the next sermon? Does not carnal prudence control our fervor, and make our discourses lifeless on subjects the most piercing? How gently do we handle those sins which will so cruelly handle our people's souls! In a word, our want of seriousness about the things of heaven, charms the souls of men into formality, and brings them to this customary careless hearing, which undoes them. May the Lord pardon the great sin of the ministry in this thing and, in particular, my own!

And are the people more serious than magistrates or ministers? How can it be expected? Reader, look but to thyself and resolve the question. Ask conscience, and suffer it to tell thee truly. Hast thou set thy eternal rest before thine eyes, as the great business thou hast to do in this world? Hast thou watched and labored with all thy might, "that no man take thy crown?" Hast thou made haste, lest thou shouldst come too late, and die before thy work be done? Hast thou pressed on, through crowds of opposition, "toward the mark, for the prize of the high calling of God in Christ Jesus," till "reaching forth unto those things which are before?" Can conscience witness your secret cries, and groans, and tears? Can your family witness that you taught them the fear of the Lord, and warned them not to "go to that place of torment?" Can your minister witness that he has heard you cry out, "What shall I do to be saved?" and that you have followed him with complaints against your corruptions, and with earnest inquiries after the Lord? Can your neighbors about you witness that you reprove the ungodly, and take pains to save the souls of your brethren? Let all these witnesses judge this day between God and you, whether you are in earnest about eternal rest. You can tell by his work whether your servant has loitered, though you did not see him; so you may, by looking at your own work. Are your love to Christ, your faith, your zeal, and other graces, strong or weak? What are your joys? What is your assurance? Is all in order with you? Are you ready to die, if this should be the day? Do the souls among whom you have conversed bless you? Judge by this, and it will quickly appear whether you have been laborers or loiterers.

O blessed rest, how unworthily art thou neglected! O glorious kingdom, how art thou undervalued! Little know the careless sons of men what a state they so neglect. If they once knew it, they would surely be of another mind. I hope thou, reader, art sensible what a desperate thing it is to trifle about eternal rest, and how deeply thou hast been guilty of this thyself. And I hope, also, thou wilt not suffer this conviction to die. Should the physician tell thee, "If you will observe but one thing, I doubt not to cure your disease," wouldst thou not observe it? So I tell thee, if thou wilt observe but this one thing for thy soul, I make no doubt of thy salvation; shake off thy sloth, and put to all thy strength, and be a Christian indeed: I know not then what can hinder thy happiness. As far as thou art gone from God, seek him with all thy heart, and no doubt thou shalt find him. As unkind as thou hast been to Jesus Christ, seek him heartily, obey him unreservedly, and thy salvation is as sure as if thou hadst it already. But, full as Christ's satisfaction is, free as the promise is, large as the mercy of God is, if thou only talk of these when thou shouldst eagerly entertain them, thou wilt be never the better for them: and if thou loiter when thou shouldst labor, thou wilt lose the crown. Fall to work, then, speedily and seriously, and bless God that thou hast yet time to do it.

To show that I urge thee not without cause, I will here add a variety of animating considerations. Rouse up thy spirit, and, as Moses said to Israel, "set thy heart unto all the words which I testify unto thee this day; for it is not a vain thing, because it is your life." May the Lord open thy heart, and fasten his counsel effectually upon thee!

1. Consider how reasonable it is that our diligence should be answerable to the ends we aim at, to the work we have to do, to the shortness and uncertainty of our time, and to the contrary diligence of our enemies.

The ends of a Christian's desire and endeavors are so great that no human understanding can comprehend them. What is so excellent, so important, or so necessary as the glorifying of God, the salvation of our own and other men's souls, by escaping the torments of hell, and possessing the glory of heaven? And can a man be too much affected with things of such moment? Can he desire them too earnestly, or love them too strongly, or labor for them too diligently? Do not we know, that if our prayers prevail not, and our labor succeeds not, we are undone for ever?

The work of a Christian here is very great and various. The soul must be renewed; corruptions must be mortified; customs, temptations, and worldly interests must be conquered; flesh must be subdued; life, friends, and credit must be slighted; conscience, on good grounds, be quieted and assurance of pardon and salvation attained. Though God must give us these without our merit, yet he will not give them without our earnest seeking and labor. Besides, there is much knowledge to be acquired, many ordinances to be used and duties to be performed; every age, year and day, every place we come to, every person we deal with, every change of our condition, still require the renewing of our labor; wives, children, servants, neighbors, friends, enemies, all of them call for duty from us. Judge, then, whether men that have so much business lying upon their hands, should not exert themselves; and whether it be their wisdom either to delay or loiter.

Time passeth on. Yet a few days, and we shall be here no more. Many diseases are ready to assault us. We, that are now preaching, and hearing, and talking, and walking, must very shortly be carried and laid in the dust, and there left to the worms, in darkness and corruption; we are almost there already; we know not whether we shall have another sermon, or Sabbath, or hour. How active should they be who know they have so short a space for so great a work! And we have enemies that are always plotting and laboring for our destruction. How diligent is Satan in all kinds of temptations! Therefore "be sober, be vigilant; because your adversary the devil, as a roaring lion, walketh about, seeking whom he may devour; whom resist steadfast in the faith." How diligent are all the "ministers of Satan! false teachers, scoffers, persecutors," and our inbred corruptions, the most busy and diligent of all! Will a feeble resistance serve our turn? Should not we be more active for our own preservation than our enemies are for our ruin?

2. It should excite us to diligence, when we consider our talents and our mercies, our relation to God, and the afflictions he lays upon us.

The talents which we have received are many and great. What people breathing on earth have had plainer instructions, or more forcible persuasions, or more constant admonitions, in season and out of season? sermons, till we have been weary of them, and Sabbaths, till we have profaned them; excellent books in such plenty that we knew not which to read? What people have had God so near them? or have seen so much of Christ crucified before their eyes? or have had heaven and hell so open unto them? What speed should such a people make for heaven! how should they fly that are thus winged! and how swiftly should they sail that have wind and tide to help them! A small measure of grace becomes not such a people, nor will an ordinary diligence in the work of God excuse them.

All our lives have been filled with mercies. God hath mercifully poured out upon us the riches of sea and land, of heaven and earth. We are fed and clothed with mercy. We have mercies within and without. To number them, is to count the stars or the sands of the sea-shore. If there be any difference betwixt hell and earth, yea, or heaven and earth, then certainly we have received mercy. If the blood of the Son of God be mercy, then we are engaged to God by mercy. Shall God think nothing too much nor too good for us; and shall we think all too much that we do for him? When I compare my slow and unprofitable life with the frequent and wonderful mercies received, it shames me, it silences me, and leaves me inexcusable.

Besides our talents and mercies, our relations to God are most endearing. Are we his children, and do we not owe him our most tender affections and dutiful obedience? Are we “the spouse of Christ,” and should we not obey and love him? “If he be a Father, where is his honor? and if he be a Master where is his fear? We call him Master, and Lord, and we say well;” but if our industry be not answerable to our relations, we condemn ourselves in saying we are his children or his servants. How will the hard labor and daily toil which servants undergo to please their masters, judge and condemn those who will not labor so hard for their great Master? Surely there is no master like him; nor can any servants expect such fruit of their labors as his servants. And if we wander out of God’s way, or loiter in it, how is every creature ready to be his rod to bring us back or urge us on! Our sweetest mercies will become our sorrows. Rather than want a rod, the Lord will make us a scourge to ourselves; our diseased bodies shall make us groan; our perplexed minds shall make us restless; our conscience shall be as a scorpion in our bosom. And is it not easier to endure the labor than the spur? Had we rather be still afflicted, than be up and doing? And though they that do most, meet also with afflictions; yet surely, according to their peace of conscience and faithfulness to Christ, the bitterness of their cup is abated.

3. To quicken our diligence in our work, we should also consider what assistance we have, what principles we profess, and our certainty that we can never do too much.

For our assistance in the service of God, all the world are our servants. The sun, moon, and stars attend us with their light and influence. The earth, with all its furniture of plants and flowers, fruits, birds, and beasts; the sea, with its inhabitants; the air, the wind, the frost and snow, the heat and fire, the clouds and rain, all wait upon us while we do our work. Yea, “the angels are all our ministering spirits.” Nay more, the patience of God doth wait upon us; the Lord Jesus Christ waiteth in the offers of his blood; the Holy Spirit waiteth, by striving with our backward hearts; besides the ministers of the Gospel, who study and wait, preach and wait, pray and wait upon careless sinners. And is it not an intolerable crime for us to trifle, while angels and men, yea, the Lord himself, stand by and look on, and, as it were, hold us the candle while we do nothing? I beseech you, Christians, whenever you are praying, or reproving transgressors, or upon any duty, remember what assistance you have for your work, and then judge how you ought to perform it.

The principles we profess are, that God is the chief good; that all our happiness consists in his love, and therefore it should be valued and sought above all things; that he is our only Lord, and therefore chiefly to be served; that we must love him with all our heart, and soul, and strength; that our great business in the world is to glorify God and obtain salvation. Are these doctrines seen in our practice? or rather, do not our works deny what our words confess?

But, however our assistance and principles excite us to our work, we are sure we can never do too much. Could we “do all, we are unprofitable servants;” much more when we are sure to fail in all. No man can obey or serve God too much. Though all superstition, or service of our own devising, may be called a “being righteous over much;” yet, as long as we keep to the rule of the world, we can never be righteous too much. The world are mad with malice when they think that faithful diligence in the service of Christ is foolish singularity. The time is near, when they will easily confess that God could not be loved or served too much, and that no man can be too earnest to save his soul. We may easily do too much for the world, but we cannot for God.

4. Let us further consider that it is the nature of every grace to promote diligence, that trifling in the way to heaven is lost labor, that much precious time is already misspent, and that in proportion to our labor will be our recompense.

See the nature and tendency of every grace. If you loved God, you would think nothing too much that you could possibly do to serve him and please him. Love is quick and impatient, active and observant. If you loved Christ, you would keep his commandments, nor accuse them of too much strictness. If you had faith, it would quicken and encourage you. If you had the hope of glory, it would, as the spring in the watch, set all the wheels of your souls a-going. If you had the fear of God, it would rouse you out of your slothfulness. If you had zeal, it would inflame, and "eat you up." In what degree soever thou art sanctified, in the same degree thou wilt be serious and laborious in the work of God.

They that trifle lose their labor. Many, who, like Agrippa, are but almost Christians, will find, in the end, they shall be but almost saved. If two be running in a race, he that runs slowest loses both prize and labor. A man that is lifting at a weight, if he put not sufficient strength to it, had as good put none at all. How many duties have Christians lost for want of doing them thoroughly! "Many will seek to enter in, and shall not be able," who, if they had striven, might have been able. Therefore, put a little more diligence and strength, that all you have done already be not in vain.

Besides, is not much precious time already lost? With some of us, childhood and youth are gone; with some, their middle age also; and the time before us is very uncertain. What time have we slept, talked, and played away, or spent in worldly thoughts and cares! How little of our work is done! The time we have lost cannot be recalled; should we not, then, redeem and improve the little which remains? If a traveller sleep or trifle most of the day, he must travel so much faster in the evening, or fall short of his journey's end.

Doubt not but the recompense will be according to your labor. The seed which is buried and dead will bring forth a plentiful harvest. Whatever you do or suffer, everlasting rest will pay for all. There is no relenting of labors or sufferings in heaven. There no one says, "Would I had spared my pains, and prayed less, or been less strict, and done as the rest of my neighbors!" On the contrary, it will be their joy to look back upon their labors and tribulations, and to consider how the mighty power of God brought them through all. We may all say, as Paul, "I reckon that the sufferings" and labors "of this present time are not worthy to be compared with the glory which shall be revealed in us." We labor but for a moment; we shall rest for ever. Who would not put forth all his strength for one hour, when, for that hour's work, he may be a prince while he lives? "God is not unrighteous to forget our work and labor of love." Will not "all our tears be wiped away," and all the sorrow of our duties be then forgotten?

5. Nor does it less deserve to be considered, that striving is the divinely appointed way of salvation; that all men either do, or will approve it; that the best Christians, at death, lament their negligence; and that heaven itself is often lost for want of striving, but is never had on easier terms.

The sovereign wisdom of God has made striving necessary to salvation. Who knows the way to heaven better than the God of heaven? When men tell us we are too strict, whom do they accuse, God or us? If it were a fault, it would lie in him that commands, and not in us who obey. These are the men that ask us, whether we are wiser than all the world beside and yet they will pretend to be wiser than God. How can they reconcile their language with the laws of God? "The kingdom of heaven suffereth violence, and the violent take it by force. Strive to enter in at the strait gate; for many will seek to enter in, and shall not be able. Whatsoever thy hand findeth to do, do it with thy might; for there is no work, nor device, nor knowledge, nor wisdom, in the grave, whither thou goest. Work out your own salvation with fear and trembling. Give diligence to make your calling and election sure. If the righteous scarcely be saved, where shall the ungodly and the sinner appear?" Let them bring all the seeming reasons they can against the holy violence of the saints; this sufficeth me to confute them all, that God is of another mind, and he hath commanded me to do much more than I do; and though I could see no other reason for it, his will is reason enough. Who should make laws for us, but he that made us? and who should point out the way to heaven, but he that must bring us thither? and who should fix the terms of salvation, but he that bestows the gift of salvation? So that, let the world, the flesh, or the devil speak against a holy, laborious life, this is my answer, God hath commanded it. Nay, there never was, nor ever will be, a man but will approve such a life, and will one day justify the diligence of the saints. And who would not go that way which every man shall finally applaud? True, it is now "a way every where spoken against." But let me tell you, most that speak against it, in their judgments approve of it; and those that are now against it, will shortly be of another mind. If they come to heaven, their mind must be changed before they come there. If they go to hell, their judgment will then be altered whether they will or not. Remember this, you that love the opinion and way of the multitude. Why, then, will you not be of the opinion that all will be of? Why will you be of a judgment which you are sure, all of you, shortly to change? O that you were but as wise in this as those in hell!

Even the best of Christians, when they come to die, exceedingly lament their negligence. They then wish, "O that I had been a thousand times more holy, more heavenly, more laborious for my soul! The world accuses me for doing too much, but my own conscience accuses me for doing too little. It is far easier bearing the scoffs of the world than the lashes of conscience. I had rather be reproached by the devil for seeking salvation, than reproved of God for neglecting it." How do their failings thus wound and disquiet those who have been the wonder of the world for their heavenly conversation!

It is for want of diligence that heaven itself is lost. When they that have "heard the word, and anon with joy received it, and have done many things, and heard" the ministers of Christ gladly, shall yet perish, should not this rouse us out of our security? How far hath many a man followed Christ, and yet forsaken him when all worldly interests and hopes were to be renounced! God hath resolve that heaven shall not be had on easier terms. Rest must always follow labor. "Without holiness no man shall see the Lord." Seriousness is the very thing wherein consists our sincerity. If thou art not serious, thou art not a Christian. It is not only a high degree in Christianity, but the very life and essence of it. As fencers upon a stage differ from soldiers fighting for their lives, so hypocrites differ from serious Christians. If men could be saved without this serious diligence, they would never regard it; all the excellencies of God's ways would never entice them. But when God hath resolved, that, without serious diligence here, we shall not rest hereafter, is it not wisdom to exert ourselves to the uttermost?

6. But to persuade thee, if possible, reader, to be serious in thy endeavors for heaven, let me add more considerations: as, for instance, consider—

God is in earnest with you; and why should you not be so with him? In his commands, his threatenings, his promises, he means as he speaks. In his judgments he is serious. Was he not so when he drowned the world, when he consumed Sodom and Gomorrah, and when he scattered the Jews? Is it time, then, to trifle with God? Jesus Christ was serious in purchasing our redemption. In teaching, he neglected his meat and drink: in prayer, he continued all night: in doing good, his friends thought him beside himself: in suffering, he fasted forty days, was tempted, betrayed, spit upon, buffeted, crowned with thorns, sweat drops of blood, was crucified, pierced, died. There was no jesting in all this. And should we not be serious in seeking our own salvation?

The Holy Spirit is serious in soliciting us to be happy. His motions are frequent, pressing, and importunate. "He striveth with us." He is grieved when we resist him; and should we not be serious then, in obeying and yielding to his motions? God is serious in hearing our prayers, and bestowing his mercies. He is afflicted with us. He "regardeth every groan and sigh, and puts every tear into his bottle." The next time thou art in trouble thou wilt beg for a serious regard of thy prayers. And shall we expect real mercies when we are slight and superficial in the work of God?

The ministers of Christ are serious in exhorting and instructing you. They beg of God, and of you; and long more for the salvation of your souls than for any worldly good. If they kill themselves by their labor, or suffer martyrdom for preaching the Gospel, they think their lives are well bestowed, so that they prevail for the saving of your souls. And shall other men be so careful and self-denying for your salvation, and you be so careless and negligent of your own?

How diligent and serious are all the creatures in serving you! What haste makes the sun to compass the world! The fountains are always flowing for thy use; the rivers still running; spring and harvest keep their times. How hard does thy ox labor for thee from day to day! How speedily does thy horse travel with thee! And shalt thou only be negligent? Shall all these be so serious in serving thee, and thou so careless in thy service to God?

The servants of the world and the devil are serious and diligent. They work as if they could never do enough: they make haste, as if afraid of coming to hell too late: they bear down ministers, sermons, and all before them. And shall they be more diligent for damnation than thou for salvation? Hast thou not a better Master, sweeter employment, greater encouragements, and a better reward? Time was when thou wast serious thyself in serving Satan and the flesh, if it be not so yet. How eagerly didst thou follow thy sports, thy evil company, and sinful delights! And wilt thou not now be as earnest and violent for God? You are to this day in earnest about the things of this life. If you are sick or in pain, what serious complaints do you utter! If you are poor, how hard do you labor for a livelihood! And is not the business of your salvation of far greater moment?

There is no jesting in heaven or hell. The saints have a real happiness, and the damned a real misery. There are no remiss or sleepy praises in heaven, nor such lamentations in hell. All there are in earnest. When thou, reader, shalt come to death and judgment, O what deep, heart-piercing thoughts wilt thou have of eternity! Methinks I foresee thee already astonished to think how thou couldst possibly make so light of these things. Methinks I even hear thee crying out of thy stupidity and madness.

And now, reader, having laid down these undeniable arguments, I do, in the name of God, demand thy resolution: wilt thou yield obedience or not? I am confident thy conscience is convinced of thy duty. Darest thou now go on in thy common, careless course, against the plain evidence of reason and commands of God, and against the light of thy own conscience? Darest thou live as loosely, sin as boldly, and pray as seldom as before? Darest thou profane the Sabbath, slight the service of God, and think of thine everlasting state as carelessly as before? Or dost thou not rather resolve to “gird up the loins of thy mind,” and set thyself wholly to the work of thy salvation, and break through the oppositions, and slight the scoffs and persecutions of the world, and “lay aside every weight, and the sin which doth so easily beset thee, and run with patience the race that is before thee?” I hope these are thy full resolutions. Yet, because I know the obstinacy of the heart of man, and because I am solicitous that thy soul should live, I once more entreat thy attention to the following questions and I command thee from God, that thou stifle not thy conscience, nor resist conviction but answer them faithfully, and obey accordingly.

If; by being diligent in godliness, you could grow rich, get honor, or preferment in the world, be recovered from sickness, or live for ever in prosperity on earth, what lives would you lead, and what pains would you take in the service of God? And is not the saints’ rest a more excellent happiness than all this? If it were felony to break the Sabbath, neglect secret or family worship, or be loose in your lives, what manner of persons would you then be? And is not eternal death more terrible than temporal? If God usually punished with some present judgment every act of sin, as he did the lie of Ananias and Sapphira, what kind of lives would you lead? And is not eternal wrath far more terrible? If one of your acquaintance should come from the dead and tell you that he suffered the torments of hell for those sins you are guilty of, what manner of persons would you be afterwards? How much more should the warnings of God affright you? If you knew that this were the last day you had to live in the world, how would you spend it? And you know not but it may be your last, and are sure your last is near. If you had seen the general dissolution of the world, and all the pomp and glory of it consumed to ashes, what would such a sight persuade you to do? Such a sight you shall certainly see. If you had seen the judgment-seat, and the books opened, and the wicked stand trembling on the left hand of the Judge, and the godly rejoicing on the right hand, and their different sentences pronounced, what persons would you have been after such a sight! This sight you shall one day surely see. If you had seen hell open, and all the damned there in their endless torments; also heaven opened, as Stephen did, and all the saints there triumphing in glory; what a life would you lead after such sights! These you will see before it be long. If you had lain in hell but one year, or one day, or hour, and there felt the torments you now hear of; how seriously would you then speak of hell, and pray against it! And will you not take God's word for the truth of this, except you feel it? Or, if you had possessed the glory of heaven but one year, what pains would you take rather than be deprived of such incomparable glory!

Thus I have said enough, if not to stir up the sinner to a serious working out his salvation, yet at least to silence him, and leave him inexcusable at the judgment of God. Only as we do by our friends when they are dead, and our words and actions can do them no good, yet to testify our affection for them we weep and mourn, so will I also do for these unhappy souls. It makes my heart tremble to think how they will stand before the Lord, confounded and speechless! When he shall say, "Was the world, or Satan, a better friend to you than I? or had they done for you more than I had done? Try now whether they will save you, or recompense you for the loss of heaven, or be as good to you as I would have been"—what will the wretched sinner answer to any of this? But though man will not hear, we may hope in speaking to God:

"O thou that didst weep and groan in spirit over a dead Lazarus, pity these dead and senseless souls, till they are able to weep and groan in pity to themselves! As thou hast bid thy servants speak, so speak now thyself. They will hear thy voice speaking to their hearts, who will not hear mine speaking to their ears. Lord, thou hast long knocked at these hearts in vain; now break the doors and enter in."

To show the godly why they, above all men, should be laborious for heaven, I desire to ask them, What manner of persons should those be whom God hath chosen to be vessels of mercy? who have felt the smart of their negligence in their new birth, in their troubles of conscience, in their doubts and fears, and in other sharp afflictions? who have often confessed their sins of negligence to God in prayer? who have bound themselves to God by so many covenants? What manner of persons should they be who are near to God, as the children of his family; who have tasted such sweetness in diligent obedience; who are many of them so uncertain what shall everlastingly become of their souls? What manner of persons should they be in holiness, whose sanctification is so imperfect; whose lives and duties are so important to the saving or destroying a multitude of souls; and on whom the glory of the great God so much depends? Since these things are so, I charge thee, Christian, in thy Master's name, to consider and resolve the question, "What manner of persons ought we to be in all holy conversation and godliness?" And let thy life answer the question as well as thy tongue.

Les uns croient qu'il n'y aura dans le paradis qu'une même gloire et qu'une même félicité, qui sera égale et uniforme en tous ceux qui la posséderont. Leurs raisons principales sont: premièrement, que nous n'aurons point de gloire ni de félicité, qui ne nous ait été méritée parla mort et passion de notre Seigneur Jésus-Christ; et que, ce glorieux Sauveur l'ayant acquise également pour tous les élus, ils la posséderont tous au souverain degré. Secondement, que la sainteté de tous les bienheureux sera parfaite, et par conséquent qu'étant tous parfaitement saints, ils seront tous parfaitement et souverainement heureux. En troisième lieu, que notre Seigneur dit formellement et sans exception qu'ils reluiront au royaume de leur père comme le soleil ( Matt. i3. ), qui est le roi des astres et le plus lumineux de tous les corps célestes. En quatrième lieu, qu'ils sont représentés dans le ciel comme des rois, et comme ayant sur leurs têtes des couronnes d'or, et qu'il n'y a point d'inégalité entre tes rois, chacun d'eux possédant une gloire souveraine et une autorité indépendante. En cinquième lieu, que Jésus-Christ représente ce qui se fera à la fin du monde sous la parabole du père de famille, qui, au bout de la journée, donne un salaire égal à tous ceux qui ont travaillé en sa vigne. En sixième lieu, qu'il est dit en général ( i. Cor. t 3) que nous verrons face à face, et que nous le verrons tel qu'il est, et que c'est dans cette vision que consiste le souverain bien de l'homme. Enfin (2. Cor.i5), qu'après la résurrection Dieu sera tout en tous; et que c'est le comble de toute la gloire et de toutes les félicités imaginables.

D'autres estiment, au contraire, qu'il y aura dans le paradis une inégalité de gloire, et divers degrés de béatitude. Ils se fondent principalement sur deux passages de l'écriture sainte. L'un est au quatorzième de saint Jean, on notre Seigneur dit à ses apôtres: il y a plusieurs demeures dans la maison de mon père; et l'autre est au quinzième de la première aux Corinthiens, où Saint Paul, discourant de la béatitude des saints après la résurrection, dit: autre est la gloire du soleil, et autre la gloire de là lune, et autre la gloire des étoiles: car une étoile est différente d'une autre étoile en gloire, Il en sera de même de la résurrection des morts.

Il y en a qui ne se contentent pas de poser une inégalité de gloire et de béatitude, mais qui entreprennent d'en discourir avec autant de hardiesse, que si Dieu les avait admis dans le conseil de ses secrets éternels, et qu'il leur eût découvert les merveilles de la Jérusalem céleste, plus clairement qu'il ne fit autrefois à son disciple bien-aimé. Us ne disent pas seulement qu'il y aura divers degrés de gloire et de félicité, mais ils déterminent qui seront ceux qui obtiendront un tel ou un tel degrés et décident magistralement quelle sera la gloire des vierges, quelle sera celle des confesseurs et quelle sera celle des martyrs. Enfin, il se trouve des gens tellement enflés de la bonne opinion d'eux-mêmes, qu'ils font profession ou verte d'être du nombre de ceux qui aspirent aux plus hauts degrés de gloire et de béatitude.

Mais, quant à nous, nous estimons que la vérité se rencontre au milieu de ces extrêmes. Sans imposer de loi à la conscience de qui que ce soit, en un point dont la décision n'est pas nécessaire à salut, d'un côté, nous posons qu'il y aura dans le paradis divers degrés de gloire et de béatitude; mais, d'autre côté, nous nous garderons bien d'entreprendre de les décrire, et beaucoup plus encore d'en faire l'application et de déterminer qui possédera un tel ou un tel degré de gloire. Ce serait mettre notre couche au ciel, et avancer la main sur le fruit défendu. Au lieu de servir aux autres, nous nous perdrons nous-mêmes de gaieté de cœur. Car ceux qui, par une témérité audacieuse, veulent sonder la majesté, sont engloutis par gloire.

Et même, bien; que nous admettions ces divers degrés de gloire, nous dirons, sans offenser personne, qu'on ne saurait les prouver solidement par les passages qu'on allègue; et qu'il semble qu'ils ne concluent point du tout. Car, pour le i4.e de Saint Jean, notre Seigneur Jésus-Christ ne dit pas qu'il y a plusieurs étages ou plusieurs appartemens, dont es uns sont plus beaux et plus riches que les autres, mais simplement qu'il y a plusieurs demeures dans la maison de son père. L'intention de ce divin Sauveur est claire comme le jour. Il veut relever le courage abattu de ses apôtres et les consoler de son absence; et, pour cet effet, il les assure qu'il va loger dans une maison où il n'y a pas seulement de lieu pour lui, mais aussi pour eux et pour tous ceux qui viendront à croire en lui par leur ministère. Il s'en explique clairement au dix-septième chapitre du même évangile, où il parle à Dieu en Ces mots: père, mon désir est que là où je suis, ceux que tu mas donnés soient aussi avec moi, afin qu'ils contemplent ma gloire. Et, quant à ce qu'on allègue de la première aux Corinthiens, âmes dévotes, prenez la peine de lire le passage de l'Apôtre et de considérer avec une attention religieuse ce qui précède et ce qui suit. Vous trouverez qu'il n'est pas là question de comparer les saints glorifiés les uns avec les autres, mais de faire voir la différence qu'il y a entre nos corps, tels qu'ils sont en cette vie corruptible et mortelle, et ces mêmes corps après qu'ils auront revêtu l'incorruption et l'immortalité. Et, en effet, ayant dit: autre est la gloire du soleil, et autre la gloire de la lune et autre la gloire des étoiles; car une étoile est différente d'une autre étoile en gloire; il n'ajoute pas; ainsi, autre est la gloire d'une personne béatifiée, et autre est la gloire de l'autre; mais il dit: il en sera aussi de même en la résurrection des morts. Le corps est semé incorruption, il ressuscitera incorruptible: il est semé en déshonneur, il ressuscitera en gloire: il est semé en faiblesse, il ressuscitera en force: il est semé corps sensuel, U ressuscitera corps spirituel.

Qu'est-ce donc qui nous porte à croire ces divers degrés de gloire et de béatitude? C'est, premièrement, la considération des divers supplices des damnés. Car, comme il y a dans les enfers une diversité de peines et divers degrés de tourmens, il est bien vraisemblable qu'il y a dans le paradis une diversité de béatitude et divers degrés de gloire.

Secondement, Dieu, pour faire paraître sa sagesse, qui est diverse en toutes sortes, dispense tous se» biens et toutes ses richesses avec une, merveilleuse diversité et avec un ordre admirable et divin. Ainsi, voyez que dans la nature il a pris plaisir à répandre divers dons et diverses beautés. Par exemple, autre est l'odeur et la beauté de la rose, et autre celle du lys: autre est la splendeur des rubis et des diamans, autre est celle du soleil, de la lune et des étoiles. De même, il semble que, par dessus tous les cieux, il y doive avoir divers degrés de lumière et de gloire.

Il y a entre les anges des prérogatives d'honneur et de dignité. Et de là vient qu'il est parlé d'archanges, de trônes, de dominations, de principautés et de puissances (i. Thes. 4) Comme donc il y a entre les anges une diversité de gloire, il est bien vraisemblable qu'elle sera aussi entre les saints. De plus, comme, dans l'église militante, les grâces de Dieu sont fort diverses, et que les âmes des fidèles ne sont pas revêtues des mêmes qualités et n'ont pas un pareil ornement, et même, qu'il y a divers degrés de lumière, de connaissance, de foi, d'espérance, de charité et de sanctification; ainsi, il semble que, selon l'analogie de la foi, il doive y avoir dans l'église triomphante divers degrés de gloire et de béatitude, vu que la gloire n'est autre chose que la consommation et la perfection de la grâce. Cet argument est d'autant plus fort que, dans la parabole des talens, Jésus-Christ donne à ses serviteurs une gloire proportionnée aux richesses de sa grâce. Et que personne ne s'imagine qu'il est là question des faveurs que Dieu fait ici-bas à ceux qui le servent fidèlement; car. notre Seigneur parle de ce qu'il fera lorsqu'il viendra des cieux pour juger le monde; et il s'agit du temps auquel il dira à celui qui a fait profiter les talens de sa grâce (Matt. 8.): cela va bien, bon et fidèle serviteur; entre en la joie de ton Seigneur; et auquel il fera jeter le serviteur inutile dans les ténèbres de dehors, là où il y aura des pleurs et des grincemens de dents. J'ajoute à cela que l'apôtre Saint Paul, au troisième chapitre de sa première épître aux Corinthiens, représentant les ministres de l'évangile sous la comparaison de gens qui bâtissent sur le fondement de l'église, qui est notre Seigneur Jésus Christ, dit, que les uns y mettent du bois, du foin et du chaume, et que les autres y mettent de l'or, de l'argent, et des pierres précieuses. Il assure qu'ils seront sauvés les uns et les autres, parce qu'ils ont tous retenu le vrai et l'unique fondement: mais que d'ailleurs il y aura entre eux une grande diversité. Que ceux qui ont bâti du bois, du foin et du chaume, seront sauvés, toutefois comme par feu, c'est-à-dire, avec peine et avec difficulté. Et que, quant à ceux qui ont bâti de l'or, de l'argent et des pierres précieuses, non seulement ils seront sauvés comme les autres, mais que leur ouvrage subsistera, et, qui plus est, ils en recevront de la louange et de la récompense. D'où l'on peut conclure, à mou avis, que dans le ciel les récompenses seront fort diverses, et, par conséquent, qu'il y a une diversité de gloire.

Je ne dois pas omettre, sur ce sujet, ce que nous lisons en la deuxième aux Corinthiens, chapitre 9.: Celui qui sème chichement recueillera chichement; et celui qui sème libéralement, moissonnera aussi libéralement. Ce sont les paroles mêmes de l'apôtre Saint Paul, qui semblent prouver bien clairement l'inégalité de la gloire et des félicités qui se moissonnent dans le paradis. Mais ce qui est bien digne de considération est que la félicité du paradis nous est représentée sous la similitude d'un festin, où tous mangent d'une même viande, mais où les uns sont assis dans un lieu plus honorable que les autres. C'est ce qui me semble se pouvoir recueillir de ce que notre Seigneur dit ( Matt. 8. ) que plu- sieurs viendront d'orient et d'occident, et seront à table au royaume des cieus avec Abraham, Isaaq et Jacob; et de ce que l'âme de Lazare est portée par les anges au sein d'Abraham.

Enfin, pour établir cette opinion des divers degrés de gloire dans le paradis, je me fonde sur les paroles de Daniel, au douzième de ses révélations. Ce Saint Prophète, après avoir parlé en général de la félicité de tous les. fidèles qui ressusciteront en vie éternelle, pense à la gloire de ceux à qui Dieu a communiqué [ici-bas plus de lumière, et du ministère desquels il s'est servi pour amener plusieurs âmes au salut; et, entre ceux-là même, il semble poser divers degrés de gloire. Ceux, dit-il, qui auront été intelligens, luiront comme la splendeur de l'étendue; et ceux qui en auront amené plusieurs à justice, luiront comme les étoiles pour toujours et à perpétuité. De là, il semble que l'on veut tirer cette conséquence, que, comme autre est a lumière du firmament, et autre celle des étoiles qui y luisent; que même entre les étoiles il y a divers degrés de lumière: ainsi il y doit avoir divers degrés de gloire entre les bienheureux.

Quant à ce qu'on allègue contre ce sentiment, Que Jésus-Christ nous a mérité la gloire et la félicité du paradis, et que de là on infère que petto gloire et cette félicité doit être égale, j'avoue que ce raisonnement est fort considérable et qu'il est de grand poids. Et même je ne prétends pas le réfuter absolument; mais je me contente de proposer diverses choses à méditer aux ames religieuses et crétiennes qui liront cet écrit. La première est, que bien que le paradis nous ait été acquis par le sang de Jésus Christ,, et que nous ne puissions le mériter par nos meilleures œuvres, ni par nos plus douloureux martyres, puisque, quand nous aurions fait toutes les choses qui nous sont commandées, notre Seigneur vent que nous disions (Luc. i7): nous sommes des serviteurs inutiles, parce que, ce que nous étions obligés de faire, nous F avons fait; et que son saint apôtre nous assure (Rom. 8) que, tout bien compté, les souffrances du temps présent ne sont point à balancer contre la gloire qui doit être révélée en nous; néanmoins Dieu est si bon, si miséricordieux et si libéral, qu'il supporte nos défauts, et qu'il récompense comme père, et d'une récompense gratuite, toutes les bonnes œuvres de ses encans, et particulièrement celles de la charité; jusque-là que Jésus-Christ dit à ses apôtres, et en leurs personnes à tous les fidèles ( Marc. 9): quiconque vous donnera un verre d'eau à boire, parce que vous êtes à Christ, en vérité je vous dis qu'il ne perdra point son salaire. Et, parce que dans les pays orientaux on chauffe le breuvage et que la moindre assistance est dé donner à boire de l'eau froide, notre Seigneur dit aussi (Matt i0.): quiconque aura donné à boire un verre d'eau froide Seulement à un de ces petits, en qualité de disciple, en vérité je vous dis qu'il ne perdra point son salaire. Si celui qui donne un verre d'eau froide, pour l'amour de Dieu, en est récompensé dans le ciel, que ne doivent point espérer ceux qui, par un pur mouvement de charité, sont libéraux en aumônes?

C'est pourquoi, l'apôtre nous a dit ci-dessus (i. Cor. 9) que celui qui sème chichement, moissonnera aussi chichement, et que celui qui sème libéralement, moissonnera aussi libéralement. Et nous venons d'entendre le Prophète, qui nous assure que tous ceux qui, par la lumière de leur bonne doctrine et de leur sainteté de vie, conduisent plusieurs âmes au salut, luiront éternellement dans le ciel, comme autant d'astre brillans. Que si notre Seigneur récompensé avec ses grandes miséricordes ceux qui donnent de l'eau à ses enfans, de quelle gloire ne couronnera-t-il point ceux qui répandent leur sang pour sa querellé, et qui scellent par leur mort l'évangile de sa grâce? Cette parole est certaine, que si nous mourons avec Jésus-Christ, nous vivrons aussi avec lui; si nous souffrons avec lui, nous régnerons aussi avec lui. Mais ce qui me semble encore plus fort et plus concluant, c'est que toutes les grâces, que nous recevons en cette vie, sont des effets du Saint-Esprit, qui nous a été mérité parla croix <de notre Seigneur et acquis par son sang; et toutefois ces grâces-là sont fort diverses Si donc il y a divers degrés dans la grâce, pourquoi n'y en pourra-t-il pas avoir dans la gloire? Vu que l'une et l'autre nous a été acquise et méritée par un même prix, et que nous en devons toute a louange à la,mort et passion de notre Sauveur? Quant à l'argument que l'on tire,de la sainteté des bienheureux, j'avoue qu'il est aussi fort considérable, mais je ne le tiens pas invincible; car divers diamans peuvent être parfaits en leur espèce, parce que l'œuille plus plair-voyant n'y saurait remarquer aucun défaut; et néanmoins être différens de poids et de prix. Toutes les étoiles ont leur, pureté et leur lumière; et cependant une étoile est différente d'une autre étoile en gloire. Tous les anges du ciel sont parfaitement saints; néanmoins ils sont inégaux en gloire et en dignité, Ainsi, encore que tous les bienheureux soient saints d'une sainteté parfaite. cela, à mon avis, n'empêche pas ces divers degrés de gloire et cette béatitude.

Je confesse aussi que l'objection prise de ce qui est dit (Matt. i3) que les justes reluiront comme le soleil au royaume de leur père, a, beaucoup de force: mais je ne le trouve, pas convaincante, car si vous taillez en perfection des globes de cristal de diverses grosseurs, et que vous les exposez aux rayons du soleil, ils seront tous éclairés de toutes parts: chacun d'eux représentera, l'image de ce beau soleil qui les regarde; et il se pourra fort bien dire qu'ils reluisent tous comme le soleil. Mais cela n'empêchera pas que, selon leur diverses grosseurs, ils ne reçoivent plus ou moins de lumière, et que le soleil ne paraisse dans l'un de ces globes plus grand qu'en l'autre.

Quant à ce qu'on objecte, que la qualité de rois est donnée à tous les saints qu'il triomphent dans le ciel, je réponds que cela ne se doit pas prendre à la lettre; non plus que ce qu'ils sont représentés avec des couronnes d'or. Et même, en demeurant dans les termes de la comparaison, je puis dire que comme tous les rois, proprement ainsi nommés, ont une majesté souveraine, et qu'ils ne relèvent que de Dieu seul, mais que cependant les uns ont plus de pouvoir et plus de richesses que les autres: de même, tous les saints glorifiés ont une félicité souveraine, qui ne dépend que de Dieu seul, duquel ils la reçoivent immédiatement, mais cela n'empêche pas que les uns ne soient différents des autres dans la gloire.

Quant à l'argument que l'on tire de la parabole du père de famille, qui à la fin du jour récompense également tous ceux qui ont travaillé dans sa vigne, leur donnant à chacun un denier, je réponds qu'il en est des paraboles comme des tableaux, auxquels, outre, le dessein principal, il y a quantité de choses qui ne servent que pour la grâce et pour l'ornement, que s'il faut presser à la rigueur toutes les parties de cette parabole, il s'ensuivra qu'entre ceux qui seront sauvés il y en aura qui murmureront contre Dieu et qui porteront envie aux autres. Ce qui est ridicule seulement à penser. Le but de notre Seigneur n'est pas de parler de la gloire céleste, mais seulement de faire voir que ceux que Dieu appelle les premiers ne doivent pas mépriser les autres, parce que Dieu, qui fait de son bien ce que bon lui semble, peut les rendre égaux à eux, et même leur donner davantage. Enfin, je dis que, comme tous ceux que le père de famille envoie dans sa vigne, à quelque heure du jour que ce soit, reçoivent un denier; aussi, tous ceux que l'on appelle dans son église, d'une vocation efficace, en quelque temps qu'il les appelle, fût-ce même à l'heure de la mort, obtiendront de sa libéralité le denier mystique, c'est-à-dire, la vie éternelle avec le bon larron. Mais il ne s'ensuit pas de là, que dans cette vie bienheureuse il n'y ait divers degrés de béatitude et de gloire.

La plus grande difficulté, à mon avis, est en ce qu'on allègue que nous verrons Dieu face à face, et que Dieu sera toutes choses en tous (i. Cor. i5). Et toutefois, il se peut dire que, comme tous ceux qui seront en enfer seront à jamais privés de la vision de Dieu, mais que cela n'empêche pas qu'il n'y ait divers degrés de peines et de tourmens: ainsi tous ceux qui seront en paradis verront Dieu; mais cela n'empêche pas les divers degrés de gloire et de béatitude. Comme nous regardons tous le même soleil, mais nous en recevons les rayons diversement; de même, nous contemplerons tous un même Dieu, mais l'irradiation de sa face se recevra diversement, et elle produira divers effets. Il se peut dire aussi que, comme une infinité de vaisseaux, entrant dans une même mer, s'y remplissent de telle sorte, qu'en quelque façon il est vrai que la mer est toute en tous; et que cependant cela n'empêche pas qu'ils ne reçoivent plus ou moins de cette riche abondance: de même tous les saints entreront dans cette adorable mer de la divinité, et ils seront tous remplis de sa présence glorieuse, de sorte que Dieu sera tout en tous; mais cela n'empêchera pas qu'ils ne reçoivent une diverse mesure de ces eaux saillantes en vie éternelle. En un mot, comme Dieu jettera tous les réprouvés dans un même étang de souffre et de feu, mais cela n'empêchera pas les divers degrés de leurs peines; ainsi, Dieu abreuvera éternellement tous les fidèles à un même fleuve de délices, mais cela n'empêchera pas les divers degrés de leur félicité. Joint que ce passage: Dieu sera toutes choses en tous, peut être interprété: Dieu sera toutes choses à tous, c'est-à-dire, qu'il nous sera à tous, richesses, gloire, lumière, viande, breuvage, volupté, etc.; mais il ne s'ensuit pas, à mon avis, qu'il le doive être à tous également.

Que, si quelqu'un a d'autres pensées et d'autres raisonnements, je n'ai garde de le condamner, ni d'en entreprendre la réfutation: car j'estime que, lorsqu'il s'agit de la gloire et de la félicité de la vie éternelle, que Dieu a comme couvertes d'une nuée pour arrêter notre curiosité, nous n'en saurions parler avec trop de retenue et de modestie. Seulement j'ai à faire encore une remarque pour la consolation des bonnes et saintes âmes, qui ne soupirent qu'après le ciel et les joies du paradis. C'est qu'en posant les divers degrés de gloire, tels que nous les concevons, cela ne préjudicie en aucune façon à la parfaite béatitude de tous les bienheureux. Car, s'il m'est permis de me servir «encore une fois de la comparaison des rayons du soleil et des eaux de la mer, parce que je n'en sais point de plus propre, comme tous les yeux sains qui regardent le soleil sans nuage et sans voile, bien qu'ils reçoivent ses rayons diversement, en reçoivent tous assez pour se conduire, qu'ils ont tous de quoi se réjouir dans cette belle lumière qui les éclaire; et que, si quelques-uns en reçoivent une plus grande abondance, cela n'empêche pas les autres d'en être suffisamment éclairés: ainsi, toutes les âmes glorifiées contempleront, à face découverte, Dieu, qui est le père des lumières et le vrai soleil qui luit éternellement sur tous les cieux. Et si quelques-unes en reçoivent plus ou moins de lumière, cela n'importe point à leur souverain bonheur, vu qu'elles en recevront toutes autant qu'il leur en faut pour fendre leur joie accomplie et leur béatitude parfaite. Et comme, si vous plongez dans la mer des vaisseaux de diverse capacité, les uns recevront plus d'eau; et les autres; en recevront moins, mais ils en recevront tous assez pour se remplir, de telle sorte qu'il ne leur demeure rien de vide; et si le plus petit vaisseau avait de la connaissance et qu'il peut parler, l'auront grand tort de se plaindre de ce que les plus grands vaisseaux contiennent plus d'eau que ici, puisque en a tout ce qu'il en peut avoir et qu'il en saurait désirer; ainsi, les saints étant plongés dans cette inépuisable mer de gloire et de béatitude, en seront entièrement remplis, de sorte qu'ils n'auront plus rien à souhaiter, et ils seront tous, chacun selon sa portée, souverainement et parfaitement heureux. O âme chrétienne, si tu as autant de contentement et de plaisir que tu es capable d'en avoir, bien que d'autres en aient encore au-delà, tu n'en es pas moins heureuse. Il n'y a que Dieu seul, qui, comme il est infini en son essence, ait aussi la gloire et la félicité sans mesure. Mais cette source inépuisable de gloire et de félicité découlera éternellement sur toutes les âmes et sur tous les corps de tous les bienheureux, et les rassasiera à jamais de ses délices.

Some there are that inquire whether in paradise there shall be an equality, or an inequality, in glories and happinesses?

This question is more curious than necessary. For we need not inquire whether there shall be any more or less happy than ourselves. It should suffice us for our comfort, to know, that if We be true believers, and truly penitent; if we fear God as we ought, if we serve him with a religious mind until the last gasp; then in such a case we shall attain to the glory of the children of God, and possess them with a perfect and eternal happiness. Nevertheless, that we may seem to omit nothing which might give satisfaction to every believing soul, I shall examine this particular; but it shall be without advancing any new thing, which I have not seen in the gospel, nor learned from the true Doctor of our souls. I shall declare the opinion of the most learned upon this excellent subject. Afterwards I shall add my own, which I submit, as the rest of this treatise, to the judgment of the wiser and more learned persons, who are better acquainted than I am with the spiritual and heavenly enjoyments.

Some believe, that in paradise there shall be every where the same glory and happiness, equal and uniform in every person that shall enjoy it. Their principal reasons are,

First, That we can have no glory nor happiness, but that which hath been purchased for us by the death and passion of our Lord; and that as this glorious Saviour hath purchased this glory and happiness for all the elect equally, they shall all enjoy it in the highest degree and perfection.

Secondly, That the holiness of all the blessed shall be perfect; therefore, as they shall be all perfectly holy, they shall be all likewise perfectly happy in the same degree.

Thirdly, That our Saviour saith expressly, without any exception, "That the saints shall shine as the sun in the kingdom of their Father," Matt.xxiii. Now the sun is the king of the stars, and the brightest of all the heavenly bodies-

Fourthly, That the elect are represented in heaven as so many kings, having upon their heads crowns of gold, Rev. i. 4, 5. Now there is no inequality between kings; for each of them is in possession of sovereignty, and an independent and supreme authority.

Fifthly, That Jesus Christ represents to us the last transactions of the world, by the parable of a father of a family, who at the end of the day bestows the same salary upon every one that hath laboured in his vineyard, Matt. xx.

Sixthly, That it is said in general terms, "That we shall see God face to face; and that we shall see him as he is," 1 Cor. xiii. 1 John iii. And that in this blessed vision shall consist the chief happiness of man.

Lastly, That after the resurrection, "God shall be unto us all in all;" which expression declares the highest and most complete happiness, and glory.

Others think the contrary, that in heaven there shall be an Inequality of glory, and several degrees of happiness. This their opinion they strengthen chiefly with two passages of holy scripture \ the one in John xiv. where Christ saith to his apostles, "In my Father's house there are many mansions." The other is in 1 Cor. xv. where St. Paul, discoursing at large of the happiness of the saints after the resurrection, saith,

There is one glory of the sun, another glory of the moon, and another glory of the stars; for one star differeth from another star in glory: so also is the resurrection of the dead.

There are some that are not content to believe an inequality of glory and happiness, but undertake farther to discourse of this matter, with as much confidence, as if God had admitted them to the knowledge of his eternal secrets, as if he had discovered to them all the wonders of the heavenly Jerusalem, more plainly than to his beloved disciple. They tell us, that there shall be not only divers degrees of glory and happiness; but they affirm who they are that shall obtain such and such degrees. They determine absolutely, and prescribe what glory shall belong to virgins, what shall be that of confessors, and what shall be that of martyrs. In a word, some are so puffed up with an high conceit of themselves, and of their meritorious acts, that they make an open profession of being of the number of such as shall obtain the highest degrees of glory and happiness.

But my opinion is, that the truth is to be found between these two extremes.

I shall not prescribe a law to the consciences of any, in a matter whereof the decision is not absolutely necessary to salvation. Yet we may say, that in heaven there shall be divers degrees of glory and happiness, but we dare not describe them, nor venture to apply them to any person, or to tell who of us shall possess such and such degrees. This were a bold presumption against heaven, and an attempt upon the forbidden fruit. Instead of being serviceable to others, we should willfully lose ourselves. For such as are so audacious to search into the Divine Majesty, shall be swallowed up in his glory,

And though we verily believe degrees of glory, yet we may say, without offence to any person, that this belief is not to be established upon the forementioned passages, from whence we cannot make any such conclusion; for in St. John xiv. our Saviour saith not, that there are divers degrees of divine mansions, whereof some are richer and more glorious than others, but only, that in his Father's house there are many mansions. The meaning of our divine Saviour is. clear as the day; he had an intent to raise up the drooping courage of his holy apostles, and to comfort them in his absence; for that purpose he assures them, that he was going to lodge in an house, where there was not only room for himself, but also for them, and for all that shall believe in him through their teaching.

He expounds his words plainly in the xviith chapter of the same Gospel, where he speaks to God in this manner, "I will, that they also whom thou hast given me, be with me where I am, that they may behold my glory, which thou hast given me."

For the other text in 1 Cor. xv. I beseech you, devout souls, read over the apostle's words and consider, with a religious observation, what goes before, and what follows after. You shall find, that the apostle designs not to compare the saints the one with the other, but only to discover the difference which is between our bodies as they are in this corruptible and mortal life, and as they shall be when they shall have put on incorruption and immortality. Therefore, when he hath said, "There is one glory of the sun, another of the moon, another of the stars, for one star differeth from another star In glory;" he doth not say likewise, So shall be the glory of one blessed person differing from another; but he saith, "So shall be the resurrection from the dead -, the body is sown in corruption, it shall be raised in incorruption; it is sown in dishonour, it is raised in glory; it is sown in weakness, it is raised in power; it is sown a natural body, it is raised a spiritual body.

What is it therefore that may incline us to believe these divers degrees of glory and happiness? — I- answer,

First, The divers and different pains and punishments of the damned. For as in hell there shall be divers degrees of torments; likewise it is very probable, that in heaven there shall be divers degrees of happiness, and several degrees of glory.

Secondly, God, to declare his divine wisdom, which is various in all things, bestows at present all his blessings and riches with a wonderful variety, and admirable order. Thus you may see in nature, that God hath scattered up and down the world divers gifts and excellencies. For example, the smell and beauty of the rose is different from that of the lily; the brightness of the diamond is not like that of the ruby; the light of the sun differs from that of the moon and stars. It is very probable, that above all the heavens, there shall be divers degrees of light and glory. Among the holy angels, there are distinctions of honour, and some dignities are named, Archangels, Thrones, Dominions, Principalities, and Powers. As therefore amongst the angels there are divers degrees of glory, it is also very probable, that the same order shall be observed amongst the glorified in heaven. Besides, as in the church militant the graces of God differ very much, so the souls of the faithful are not the same in all respects; they have different qualities and excellencies; there are in them divers degrees of light, of knowledge, of faith, hope, charity, and holiness. Likewise, according to the analogy of faith, there shall be also, in the church glorified, divers degrees of glory and happiness; and the rather, because glory is nothing else but the completion and perfection of grace.

The reason is so much the stronger, because of the parable of the talents. Jesus Christ bestows upon his servants a glory proportionable to the former riches of his grace. None can imagine to the former riches of his grace. None can imagine, that the words relate to God's favours distributed to his children on earth; for our Lord speaks of that which he intends to do for them, when he shall come down from heaven to judge the world. The words relate to the time when he shall say to such as have well employed the talents of his mercy, "Well done, good and faithful servant; enter into the joy of thy Lord." They relate also to the time when he shall cause the unprofitable servant" to be cast into utter darkness, where there shall be weeping and gnashing of teeth." I ought not to forget what we read on this subject, 2 Cor. ix. "He which soweth sparingly, shall reap also sparingly; and he which soweth bountifully, shall reap also bountifully." They are St. Paul's words, which expressly declare an inequality of glory and happiness to be expected amongst the rewards in heaven.

It may be also worthy of our observation, that the felicities of heaven are represented to us by a feast, where all partake of the same meats, but some are advanced to a more honourable room than others. This, as I conceive, may be gathered from our Saviour's words, "Many shall come from the east, and from the west, and shall sit at table in the kingdom of heaven, with Abraham, Isaac, and Jacob." It may also be understood from that other passage, where Lazarus is carried by the holy angels into Abraham's bosom.

Lastly, I ground my opinion upon the xiith chapter of Daniel, where this blessed prophet, when he had spoken in general terms of the future happiness of the faithful, who shall rise to eternal life, he offers to mention some, on whom God hath bestowed more light upon earth, and whose ministry he hath made use of, to bring many souls to salvation; among these he seems to put divers degrees of glory: "They that are wise shall shine as the brightness of the firmament; and they that bring many to righteousness, as the stars for ever." From this text one may apparently conclude, that as the light of the firmament differs much from that of the bright stars; and as among the stars there is a diversity of light; in like manner there shall be divers and different degrees of glory amongst the blessed in heaven.

Now, in answer to that argument, That Jesus Christ hath purchased for us the glory and happiness of heaven, that therefore this glory and happiness should be equal, I confess this reason is weighty. I intend not absolutely to deny it; but I shall offer several things to the consideration of the pious and devout souls, who shall peruse this treatise.

First, That although the blood of Jesus Christ hath purchased for us heaven; and that we are not able to claim it by our most regenerate actions, or merit it by our most painful sufferings and martyrdom, because that when we have performed all that is commanded, our Saviour requires us to say, "We are unprofitable servants, because we have done nothing but what we are bound to do," Luke xvii. and because his holy apostle assures us, that "when all things are reckoned up, the sufferings of this present time are not worthy to be compared with the glory which shall be revealed to us," Rom. viii. Nevertheless, God is so good, merciful, and bountiful, that he bears with our imperfections, and he rewards as a Father, with a free reward, all the good works of his servants, chiefly the works of charity.

Therefore Jesus Christ tells his apostles, and generally all the faithful, "Whosoever shall give unto you to drink a cup of water, because you are Christ's, verily I say unto you, he shall not lose his reward." And because it is the custom of the eastern people to warm their drink, therefore to give a cup of cold water may be reckoned the smallest assistance, our Saviour saith, "Whosoever shall give unto one of these little ones to drink a cup of cold water only, in the name of a disciple, verily I say unto you, he shall not lose his reward," Matt. x. If such as bestow a cup of cold water for God's sake, are rewarded in heaven, what may not those bountiful souls expect there, who now spend their estates in charitable deeds?

Besides, we have heard a prophet tell us, that all such as by the light of their doctrines, and the holiness of their lives, lead many so-, Is to their salvation, shall shine for ever in heaven, as so many bright stars. It stands with reason; for if our Saviour will in his infinite mercy reward such a small kindness, as the gift of a draught of water to one of his children, they shall excel in glory, who spend for his sake, in his quarrel, every drop of their blood, and by their deaths confirm his holy gospel. This is a faithful saying, "If we die with Jesus Christ, we shall also live with him; if we suffer with him, we shall also reign with him." But that which seems to me yet stronger, which makes for this purpose, is, that all these spiritual graces which are bestowed upon us in this life, proceed from the Holy Ghost, purchased for us by the cross of our Lord Jesus Christ, and by his precious blood. Now these graces are different and various: therefore as there are divers degrees in grace, why should not there be also divers degrees of glory, since both have been purchased for us with the same price, by the death and passion of our Lord Jesus Christ.

The other argument, drawn from the happiness and perfection of the glorified, is rational, but not infallible. For several diamonds may be perfect in their kind, so that the clearest eye cannot take notice of any default; nevertheless they may differ in weight and price. All the stars have their perfection and light; nevertheless, one star differs from any other star in glory. All the angels of heaven are perfectly happy and holy; and yet there is a great inequality amongst them in glory and dignity. Likewise, although all the blessed shall attain to a perfect holiness, in my judgment, that cannot hinder the diversity of degrees of glory and happiness.

I acknowledge also, that the other objection, drawn from these words, "The just shall shine as the sun in the kingdom of their Father," is not to be despised, but it concludes nothing to the purpose. For if you should cut out excellently well some orbs of crystal, of different sizes, some greater, some less, and should put them all in the sun, they would be all full of light in every part, everyone would represent the beautiful image of that sun that looks upon them; so that it may be very well said of them all, that they shine as the sun. Nevertheless, according to their brightness and size, they receive more light, and the sun seems greater in the one than the other. To the other objection, That all the glorified in heaven are named kings; I answer, that it is not to be understood in a literal sense, no more than when it is said, that they had on their heads crowns of gold. That I may continue in the same comparison, I may say, That all kings have a sovereign majesty, which acknowledges none above it hut God, from whom it proceeds; and nevertheless some have a greater power and riches than others. Likewise all the glorified saints shall enjoy a sovereign and perfect happiness, and receive it immediately from God, but this cannot hinder them from differing from one another in glory. I answer next,

The other argument, taken out of the parable of the father of the family, who at the evening of the day rewarded equally nil his labourers, that had been employed in his vineyard, giving to every one of them a penny. That parables are as pictures, in which, besides the thing intended to be drawn, there are many particulars, which serve but as flourishes to adorn tie pieces. If we should consider every particular of this parable, we might conclude from hence, that, amongst such as shall be saved, there shall be some murmuring against God, who shall envy their companions; which is a gross absurdity to imagine. The design of our Saviour is not to speak of the equality of the glorified saints; but his intent is to shew, that those whom God calls first, should not despise the others; because God, who doth with his own what he pleaseth, is able to make them equal, and to bestow upon them the same advantages.

Lastly, As every one whom the good man of he shall be to us all riches, glory, light, meat, drink, pleasure, &c. In my judgment, we cannot conclude from hence, that he is to be in all equally.

If any have other thoughts, or is of another opinion, I shall not offer to condemn him, nor undertake to contradict him: For I conceive, that since Almighty God hath hid the glories 2nd happiness of heaven, and covered them over with a thick cloud, on purpose to limit our too curious inquiry, we cannot mention them with too much modesty and respect. Only I must make another remark for the comfort of devout souls, whose thoughts and minds are in heaven; that when we affirm, that there shall be different degrees of glory in paradise, we must not fancy that this shall be any prejudice to the perfect happiness of the glorified. For if I may once again make use of the comparison of the sun-beams, and of the waters of the sea, I cannot find any more proper for the purpose. As all eyes that look upon the clear sun, without cloud or mist, receive its rays in a different manner; yet they have all light enough to see to guide themselves, and to rejoice in this beautiful light that enlightens them; if some take in a greater measure of that light, this hinders not the rest from enjoying also a sufficiency: so shall it be with all the glorified souls, when they shall behold God the Father of lights, the true Sun that shall shine for ever and ever. If any of them shall have more or less of light, that shall not concern or prejudice their sovereign happiness, for every one of them shall enjoy as much as they shall be able to contain, or shall be necessary to complete their joy, and perfect their happiness. And a? when we cast into the sea many empty vessels, some greater, some less, the greater contains more water, and the lesser not so much; yet they all receive enough to be filled up to the brim. If the least of these vessels had the knowledge to speak, they would not complain of the greater, for containing more than they, Because they have all as much as they can either desire or expect; likewise when the saints shall be admitted into the bottomless sea of glory and happiness, they shall be filled all up to the brim, so that they shall not be able to desire any more. They shall be all, according to their different capacities, perfectly and entirely happy.

Consider therefore, Christian soul, that if thou enjoyest so much satisfaction and delight as thou art capable of, although others may have something more, thou art no less happy for their overplus. There is none but God alone, who, according to the infiniteness of his Being, possesseth an unmeasurable and infinite glory and happiness. This bottomless source of glory and bliss shall for ever and ever overflow all the glorified in heaven, and satisfy their souls with unspeakable delights.

You may ask, Christians, In what part of the great world shall God cause us to enjoy so many rare pleasures, and heavenly contentments? Where shall he discover so much glory and splendour? In what part doth he intend to shew so many divine marks of his gracious presence? — Answer, That this place is above the elemental world, above all the heavens, that appear before our eyes, and that roll about us. If we will understand this, we must remember that the holy scripture makes mention of three heavens. The first is the large extent of the air, distinguished by the Jearned into three regions. In this sense it is to be understood when it speaks of the birds of the air. The second heaven comprehends the heavenly spheres, the globes that are between the moon and the firmament, where are all the fixed stars, (and if beyond this there be any other sphere,) whereof the motion is so powerful and swift as to carry with it the inferior globes, and to cause them to roll round in the space of four-and- twenty hours. Of this heaven David speaks in Psalm xix. "The heavens declare the glory of God, and the firmament sheweth his handy-work; he hath put in them a tabernacle for the sun." Now, above all these heavenly spheres mentioned by the astronomers (some reckon up nine or ten, others more,) there is yet a third heaven spoken of by St. Paul, 2 Cor. TM. "I know, (saith he,) a man in Christ, which was taken up into the third heaven; I know that he was taken up into paradise, and heard words which cannot be spoken, which are not possible for man to utter." The holy apostle leaves no manner of difficulty; for the third heave he names paradise, where he heard unspeakable words, which are not possible to be uttered.

The celestial globes roll about continually, but this third heaven, for its excellency, is styled, the heaven; and is fixed in an eternal settlement. And as much as these beautiful orbs have a greater light and glory than the air, and the inferior bodies; so much the more doth this third heaven excel them.

It is my judgment that Solomon means this third heaven situate above all the rest, which exceeds them so much in beauty and glory, when he speaks to God "of the heavens, and of the heaven of heavens," 1 Kings viii. that is to say, the most excellent, the highest, and the most glorious of all the heavens, are not able to contain thee; and God himself declares by his holy prophets, "the heavens are my throne, and the earth is my footstool," Isa. Ixvi. For in this high heaven God hath placed his throne, where he discovers his glory, and the brightness of his luminous countenance. There the seraphims fly, and thousand thousands worship him, and ten thousand millions stand continually before him, Isa. vi. Dan. vii. Here the blessed soul of our Saviour Christ ascended as soon as it had left the body, according to what he promised the crucified thief, "Verily I say unto thee, this day shall thou be with me in paradise," Luke xxiii. Into this place our glorious Saviour entered, both in soul and body, after his resurrection; and here it was that St. Stephen saw him, when he cried out, "I see the heavens open, and Jesus Christ sitting at the right band of God," Acts vii. And to this place the souls of all such as die in his favour are carried up. Therefore such as die in his favour are carried up.

Therefore St. Paul to the Hebrews mentions, immediately after the thousands of angels, "the spirits of just men made perfect; and the church and congregation of the first-born, whose names are written in heaven." In short, it is the glorious seat, where we hope that God will receive us both in soul and body, at that day when we shall be taken up into the air, above the clouds of heaven, to be for ever with the Lord Jesus.

Seigneur mesme s'accommodant à ces inclinations & à cette portée de nos esprits, nous promis, comme il a cite dit cy-dessus, que nous y serons assis à table avec les anciens Patriarches. Mais neantmoins il y a grande apparence que comme quand Saint Pierre vit la transfiguration de Jésus Christ, il fut tellement englouti dans l'admiration de ces objets, qu'il en oublia tous ceux qu'il connoissoit ailleurs, & dit, Il est bon que nous soyons ici: ainsi lors que nous aurons l'âme remplie de cette chanté & de cette ioye que la Présence du Rédempteur & la vision de Dieu mesme doivent engendrer en nous, il ne nous souviendra plus guerres de toutes ces tendresses d'affections que nous expérimentons en la vie présente.

Je ne laisseray pourtant pas de remarquer icy deux choses qui font à cette matière.

La première est que l'Apostre écrivant aux Thessaloniens, & les voulant exhorter efficacement à quelque chose d'importance, leur parle de cet sorte:

Frères, nous vous prions par l'avènement de nostre Seigneur Jésus Christ, & par nostre recueil en luy.

C'est à dire, sans doute qu'il les conjure par Ce qu'il y peut avoir de plus glorieux & de plus souhaitable pour eux en l'advenement de nostre Sauveur, & par tout ce qu'il y doit avoir quelque jour de plus doux & de plus consolatoire en nostre sainte communion, lors que nous nous retrouverons ensemble, & que de toutes nos dispersions nous ferons ramassés à l'entour de luy. Ce qui semble signifier qu'il s'attend de jouir du contentement de leur présence, comme ils jouiront de la sienne, en la venue de nostre Seigneur. Or est-il malaisé de concevoir que cela se puis faire, s'il n'y a quelque reconnoissance des uns aux autres. J'estime donc, s'il est permis de dire ses sentimens en des choses dont nous avons peu d'éclaircissement en la Parole de Dieu, que cette mémoire intellectuelle laquelle est en nous, retenant la souvenance des choses générales qui luy ont esté commises, ni l'Apostre Saint Paul n'aura pas oublié qu'il a preeché l'Evangile aux Thessaloniens, ni les Thessaloniens n'auront pas oublié non plus que c'est par le ministère de Saint Paul qu'ils ont esté appelés à la communion de l'Evangile. Si donc Saint Paul a pour lors quelque chose de signalé, qui le fasse reconnoitre entre les Ministres de Christ, (& nous verrons tantost ce qui s'en peut dire) la souvenance pourra bien réveiller dans les Thessaloniens leurs anciennes affections, afin de s'approcher de Saint Paul, & luy donner, & recevoir de luy, autant que la gloire de leur condition le leur permettra, des témoignages réciproques de leur bienveillance. Et pource que nostre félicité ne sera pas pour cette journée là seulement, mais pour toute une éternité, & que cette éternité ne se passera pas en solitude, mais en une tres-douce & très agréable communication, qui doute qu'en une si longue suite de fidèles il ne se présente une infinité de rencontres, qui réveilleront en nous ces souvenances générales qui nous seront demeurées de ce que nous avons veu icy bas, & qui re-animeront par ce moyen nos affections envers les personnes que nous avons chéries tendrement en cette vie? Mais comme un pere qui aime également ses enfans, sente cette sienne dilection plus vive pour quelque temps envers celuy d'entr'eux qui revient de pays lointain après une bien longue absence, qu'envers ceux qui ont toujours esté prés de luy; puis quand le temps a appaisé cette extraordinaire émotion, il retourne à cette égalité d'affections dont il les embrasse: Ainsi cette joye que Saint Paul & les Thessaloniens auront de se trouver ensemble en l'apparition de Christ, n'empeschera pas qu'incontinent leur charité ne retourne à se partager également à tous les fidèles qu'ils verront avoir avec eux communion à la gloire du Sauveur du monde.

L'autre chose est qu'il semble que ce Saint Apostre ne veut pas que nous doutions qu'il n'ait quelque chose de signalé à l'advenement de Christ, qui le rende reconnoissable à ceux à qui il a annoncé l'Evangile du salut. Vous estes, dit-il aux Philippiens, ma joye & ma couronne au jour de Christ, & choses semblables. Façons de parler qui ont donné occasion à quelques uns de penser, qu'on en pouvoir prouver que la gloire sera inégalement partagée entre les fidèles au jour de Christ, pour ce qu'il ne peut pas convenir à tous de tenir de tels propos, & que l'Apostre a voulu designer par là qu'il y a quelque prérogative d'honneur réservée pour luy en cette journée. Certainement si les fidèles seront inegalemet partagés en la jouissance due la félicité de là haut, c'est chose qui pourroit mériter une considération bien attendue. Et la diversité des opinions des grands personnages sur ce sujet, monstre bien que les preuves qu'on allègue de part & d'autre, ne sont pas d'abord extrêmement évidentes. Quelle que soit l'ediface des raisons de ceux qui tiennent l'inégalité de la gloire des cieux, il et-ce qu'il n'y a aucun de nous que l'humilité n'oblige d'avoir ce sentiment bien avant imprimé en l'entendement, qu'il ne sera pas du nombre de ceux qui doivent estre ainsi avantagés par dessus leurs frères. Car l'éminence de la gloire est presupposée devoir estre la récompense de l'éminence des vertus, à l'occasion desquelles il ne nous est pas permis de nous estimer plus excellens que les autres. Or si ce sentiment est véritable, & confirmé par l'evenement en chacun de nous, il est difficile de comprendre en qui se trouvera vérifiée cette opinion, qu'il y en doit avoir quelques uns qui doivent avoir de grands précipus en cet héritage. Et si quelques uns y doivent estre plus avantageusement partagés, il faut qu'il y ait quelque notable variété en la dispensation de la volonté de Dieu touchant la gloire & ses degrés. Car pour obtenir la gloire mesme, Dieu nous ordonne expressément de croire que nous l'aurons, & plus nous le croirons fermement, & plus est-il certain qu'elle nous sera donnée. Au lieu que pour en obtenir les plus hauts degrés, il luy est plus agréable que nous ne les espérons pas, & pource que l'humilité qui nous empêche de les espérer une des plus excellentes vertus, moins nous croirons de les obtenir, plus sèra-t-il certain que nostre humilité en sera récompensée. Et dereches pour nous exciter a tendre àu souverain point des vertus, l'Escriture nous met le prix de la gloire devant les yeux; au lieu que pour parvenir à ses plus hauts degrés, il faut que nous en détournions nos esprits, l'humilité, qui est celle qui nous y fera monter plus haut, ne nous permettant pas d'y attacher nostre pensée. De forte que nous parviendrons à la gloire comme celuy qui court en lice, qui void le but où il tend; au lieu que nous parviendrons à ses plus hauts degrés comme les rameurs, qui tournent toujours le dos au port auquel en fin pourtant ils arrive.

Quoy qu'il en soit, car ce n'est pas encore icy proprement le lieu de parler de la gloire des cieux, mais de celle de la bien-heureuse journée du Sauveur du monde, je dis qu'il est certain que Dieu mettra quelque différence au témoignage qu'il rendra à ses serviteurs en cette journée-là, & que ceux qui outre tant de travaux qu'ils ont supportés, & tant de courses qu'ils ont faites pour l'avancement du règne de Jésus Christ, ont encore, comme S. Paul, passé par tant de calomnies icy-bas, recevront ce témoignage de la bouche de leur bon maistre, qu'ils ont esté serviteurs fideles & loyaux, & qu'ils ont mérité toute autre chose que les calomnies qu'ils ont éprouvées. Ce qui les fera reconnoistre alors, & je ne doute pas que les Apostres y soient particulièrement signalés entre les autres. Et s'il y a quel-cun maintenant, non qui soit à égalier aux Apostres en dons & en autorité, (car il n'y en a point eu, & n'y en aura point depuis eux), mais qui en passant par des épreuves aucunement semblables à celles qui les ont exercés, imite en ces combats l'exemple de leur piété, de leur zèle & de leur constance, j'estime qu'il ne fait pas mal de se consoler par cette espérance, que nostre Seigneur mettra toutes choses en évidence à son advenement. Tellement que si Athanase, & Basile, & Chrysostome entre les anciens, si Jean Hus, & Ierosme de Prague, & Vicles, & Luther, & Calvin, & tant d'autres bons serviteurs de Dieu, qui peuvent à l'égard de ces premiers estre contés entre les modernes, se sont au milieu des persécutions qu'ils ont souffertes & de dehors & de dedans, attendus à cette consolation, assurément ils ne se trouveront pas trompés en leur attente. Or ont eu ceux là plusieurs amis en cette vie qui les ont connus, & qui pourront avoir retenu la mémoire intellectuelle de cette connoissance. De sorte qu'il leur pourra bien arriver ce qui arrivera à S. Paul, en gardant neantmoins avec proportion l'inégalité qui est entre les choses moindres & les plus grandes.

Mais quoy qu'il doive estre de ces particularités de nostre félicité, en général elle sera telle en cette bienheureuse journée, que je n'ose entreprendre de la décrire, de peur d'en obscurcir la splendeur. Asseurement je diminuerois par la foiblesse de mes expressions, l'efficace de ce qu'en peut concevoir qui que ce soit, qui se mettra à considérer bien attentivement ce que je viens de dire de l'estat de chacun de nous, de l'estat du monde, & de celuy de toute l'Eglise.

Lastly, To provoke you to labor after higher degrees of holiness, consider that the more holiness you have here—the more happiness you shall have hereafter. The more grace you have on earth—the more glory you shall have in heaven. Now before I come to make good this argument—namely, that some saints shall partake of more glory in heaven than others shall—give me permission to premise these few things to prevent mistakes.

First, That the object of their happiness, which is the eternal blessed God—will be one and the same to all saints. All glorified saints shall have but one God among them all. God shall be no more one saint's God than he shall be every saint's God in heaven, etc.

Secondly, That the beatifical vision shall be seen by all the saints, and communicated to all the saints; they shall all have a happy and blessed fruition and possession of God. All the vessels of glory shall be filled to the brim with a clear sight of God, and with a full enjoyment of God; and yet doubtless, for all this, some saints shall apprehend more of God than others, and comprehend more of God than others, and enjoy more of God than others. Though all shall be filled with those everlasting springs of pleasure and delight that are at God's right hand, Psalm 16:11—yet some shall be able to take in more of those pleasures of paradise than others shall. Though all the widow's vessels were filled to the brim with oil—yet, doubtless, some being greater and larger than others, they accordingly contained more oil than others, 2 Kings 4:3-8; and so it will be with the saints when they come to heaven. There shall be no lack of glory to any of the saints in glory. All the saints shall be filled with glory—according to their capacity. If you bring a thousand vessels of different sizes to the sea, the sea fills them all. Though their sizes differ, and some are bigger, and others lesser—yet all are filled, every little vessel has its fill as well as the greater—just so, every saint shall have his fill of glory when he comes to glory; the felicity of every saint shall be perfect God will be all in all to all saints, Psalm 17:15.

Thirdly, All saints shall be freed from all evils alike; they shall all be freed from the aching head, and from the unbelieving heart; they shall all alike be free from the evil of sin, and from the evil of sufferings; there shall not be a saint in glory that shall ever feel a pricking brier or a grieving thorn, Ezek. 28:24; there all sorrow shall be removed from all their hearts, and all tears shall be wiped from all their eyes, Rev. 7:17.

Fourthly and lastly, The degrees of glory that saints shall have in heaven shall not be given out to them upon the account of their merits, or the dignity of their persons, or the worthiness of their works—but upon the account of God's mere mercy and grace, who in the day of retribution will delight to crown his own gifts, not our merits. And where he shall find the greatest measures of grace and holiness, there he will, of his own free mercy, bestow the greatest measure of glory. [When God crowns us, he does but crown his own gifts in us. Augustine.]

Well, friends, remember this, you must always carefully distinguish between the essence and substance of glory, and between degrees and measures of glory. Now the essence and substance of glory, which consists in the saints' full communion with God, and in their perfect conformity to God, and in their universal subjection to God, and in their everlasting fruition of God—is common to all the saints, so that no one saint shall have more of the essence and substance of glory than another has—yet the degrees and measures of glory shall be distributed to some more, to some less. Now that there shall be different degrees of glory in heaven, answerable to the different degrees of grace and holiness that the saints reach to here on earth, and that God will at last proportion his rewards according to the different degrees of labor, service, and sufferings of his people in this world, may be made evident,

1. By clear scriptures;
2. By arguments.

Now there are several SCRIPTURES that speaks out this truth. Take these for a taste:

[1.] First, 1 Cor. 3:8, "Now he who plants and he who waters are one: and every man shall receive his own reward according to his own labor." The apostle having compared his own and Apollos' work together, adds, "That both should receive their reward according to their work"—that is, as their work differed—just so, should their reward differ. Though they both preached one and the same doctrine, and had both one and the same design and purpose, namely, to bring in souls to Christ, and to build up souls to Christ—yet according to their different degrees of labor—just so, should be their different degrees of reward. Though no man should work in God's vineyard for nothing—yet he who was most faithful, diligent, and laborious in planting or in watering God's husbandry, should have the greatest reward. Paul and Apollos shall at last receive their different reward according to their different labor; or they shall each of them receive, according to their proper work.

[2.] A second scripture is 1 Cor. 15:41-42, "The sun has one kind of glory, while the moon and stars each have another kind. And even the stars differ from each other in their beauty and brightness. It is the same way for the resurrection of the dead." It is very observable that the comparison runs between the glorified condition of some saints that shall rise, and other some that shall rise in the great day. Just so, that look, as one star differs from another star in glory—just so, one saint shall differ from another saint in glory at the resurrection of the dead. Though every star is bright, shining, and glorious—yet some stars are more bright, shining, and glorious than others are. Just so, though every saint will shine gloriously in heaven—yet some saints shall have a greater luster, glory and shine upon them than others shall. Look! as some heavenly bodies are more glorious than others—just so, in the morning of the resurrection some saints shall be more glorious than others, etc.

[3.] A third scripture is 2 Cor. 9:6, "But this I say, He who sows sparingly shall reap sparingly; and he who sows bountifully shall reap bountifully." A sparing liberality shall be attended with a sparing reward, and a bounteous liberality shall be attended with a bounteous reward. Look! as the harvest answers the measure of seed that is sown—just so, that he who sows but little reaps but little, and he who sows much reaps much—just so, saints' reaping at last will be answerable to their sowing here. All men's charities shall at last be rewarded proportionable to the several degrees of it. He who gives a pound shall have a greater reward than he who gives a penny. He who sows thousands shall reap more than he who sows hundreds. He shall have the most plentiful crop in heaven, who has sowed most seed here on earth, etc. They shall have interest upon interest in heaven, who sow much on this side heaven.

[4.] A fourth scripture is Luke 19:12-20. Now in this parable you have a great Lord going into a far country; but before he goes he gives ten minas to ten of his servants to trade with until his return. Now upon his return, he who had increased his mina to ten minas was made ruler over ten cities, verse 17; and he who made five from his one mina was made ruler over five cities, verse 19. Here he who improved their mina most, received the greatest reward. The nobleman in this parable is our Lord Jesus Christ, who is truly and highly noble, he being co-eternal and co-equal with his Father, in respect of his deity; he was born a king, and is now King of kings, and Lord of lords, and Prince of the kings of the earth. The far country that he is gone to is heaven, for there he went at his ascension. Now when he shall return from heaven to judge the living and the dead, he will then bring men to an account, to a reckoning about their improvement of all the gifts and graces that he has entrusted them with; and, according to the different improvement that men shall make of their talents—just so, shall be their reward.

He who makes the greatest improvement of his mina, he shall have the greatest reward, he shall be ruler over ten cities, that is, he shall be very highly honored and exalted. And he who makes a lesser improvement, he shall have a lesser reward, he shall be ruler over five cities. He who makes a great improvement of a little, he shall, if I may so speak, sit at Christ's right hand; but he who makes a lesser improvement, he must be contented to sit at Christ's left hand. God will proportion out men's reward at last answerable to their improvement of that treasure which he has put into their hands. Yet this does not infer merit of works—but a gracious disposition in God to encourage his servants in a way of well-doing, etc.

[5.] A fifth scripture is Daniel 12:3, "Those who are wise will shine as bright as the sky, and those who turn many to righteousness will shine like stars forever." [From this very text, your English commentators conclude that there are degrees of glory in heaven, etc.] The glory of heaven is here laid out in shining terms, for look how gloriously the shining of stars does excel the shining of the sky. Just so, some saints shall as far outshine others in glory, as the stars do now outshine the sky. Look! as the stars are a more beautiful and glorious part of the orb than the sky is—just so, some saints shall have a great deal more beauty and glory upon them than others shall. And look, as there are different degrees of glory between the glory of the sky and the glory of the stars now—just so, there shall be different degrees of glory between one glorious saint and another at last. All the saints shall at last shine as the sky—but those who by their doctrine, instruction, and life, turn many to righteousness, these shall shine as the stars, forever and ever. Some of the highest seats in glory shall be for such "who turn sinners from darkness to light, and from the power of Satan to Jesus Christ," Acts 26:18.

It is very observable, that as the apostles were very eminent in this work—just so, Christ has given it under his own hand, that they shall sit upon twelve thrones, as so many kings, judging the twelve tribes of Israel, Mat. 19:28; Luke 22:28-29. They had done and suffered more for Christ than others, and therefore Christ will put a greater glory upon them than upon others. Though many learned men differ about the interpretation of those words, "you also shall sit upon twelve thrones, judging the twelve tribes of Israel"—therefore I dare not peremptorily conclude this or that to be the sense of them. Yet this is most plain and evident in the text, that the apostles are under a promise of some peculiar and more eminent degree of honor, glory, and dignity, than others are under.

Look! as their service to Christ was a special and eminent service—just so, Christ promises them a special and eminent reward. Every man of them shall have his particular throne, and everyone of them shall have the honor and dignity of judging—that is, of governing and ruling the twelve tribes of Israel. Look! as ambassadors and chief counselors and presidents have the highest and chief seats in the kingly assembly—just so, the apostles shall have the highest and the chief seats in the general assembly and church of the first-born in heaven, Heb. 12:22-23. They shall sit, as it were, on the throne, or on the bench, with Christ—so highly and greatly shall they be exalted.

If we cannot hit upon the exact meanings of the reward here promised—yet we may safely and easily gather from the description of it that there shall be different degrees of glory in Christ's kingdom of glory. The apostles followed Christ through great tribulations and afflictions, and they continued with him in all his temptations; they forsook all, to follow him; and after they had faithfully, laboriously, successfully, and very eminently served him—they made themselves an offering for him, as I have formerly showed you, and therefore Christ will at last in a more eminent way exalt them, and glorify them, than he will others who have never seen that of Christ, nor received that from Christ, nor done that for Christ, nor suffered that for Christ—as they have done.

Degrees of glory shall at last be proportioned out answerable to those degrees of service which in this life men have been drawn out to. Such a thing as this the apostle Paul does more than hint, if I mistake not, in 1 Thes. 2:19-20, "For what is our hope, or joy, or crown of rejoicing? Are not even you in the presence of our Lord Jesus Christ at his coming? For you are our glory and joy." The crown that Paul speaks of here is not that common crown of righteousness, nor that common crown of life and immortality, nor that common crown of glory which all the saints shall be crowned with at last; [2 Tim. 4:8; James 1:12; Rev. 2:10; 1 Pet. 5:4.] But he speaks here of an apostolic crown, of a special, peculiar crown, that should accrue to him upon the account of his serviceableness to their souls; and of this crown he speaks again in that Phil. 4:1, "Therefore, my brethren, my dearly beloved and longed for, my joy and crown, so stand fast in the Lord, my dearly beloved." He calls the Philippians his crown, and that partly because their spiritual growth, constancy, and perseverance was now his glory among other churches—but mainly because they should be his particular crown of rejoicing in the great day of our Lord Jesus. He knew that the Philippians' profit would be his crown and his advantage another day. The apostle alludes here to the custom of the Romans, who, as they had their common crowns of ivy and laurel, etc.—and these were such that their horses which won the race were often crowned with, which occasioned Theocritus to say, "See what poor things the world glories in; for, as their conquerors are crowned—just so, are their horses!" Just so, they had their peculiar, their special crowns, which were the rewards of their conquerors that had done special service for their country.

Just so, there are common crowns that belong to all the saints, as saints—as the crown of righteousness, the crown of life, and the crown of glory. And as there are these common crowns—just so, there are special and peculiar crowns, that they shall be crowned with, who are exercised in more high and excellent services than others have been employed in; and this is the crown that here the apostle speaks of. He knew very well that his reward should be answerable to his work, for though God never did, nor ever will, reward men for their works, as if they were the meritorious cause of the reward—yet he will for degrees reward them according to their works. There are peculiar crowns, special crowns, for those who have done peculiar and special services for Christ on earth.

[6.] A sixth scripture is Mat. 5:11-12, "Blessed are you when people insult you, persecute you and falsely say all kinds of evil against you because of me. Rejoice and be glad, because great is your reward in heaven." Suffering saints, persecuted saints, shall be sure of great rewards. God will reward his people, not only their innocence, integrity, patience, and courage under their sufferings—but the more their sufferings, revilings, and persecutions are multiplied in this world, the more shall their recompense and reward be multiplied in the eternal world. It is true, Christ has many lovers of his crown—but few bearers of his cross. All would reign with him—but few care to suffer for him. But yet it is as true on the one hand—namely, that those who bear most of his cross shall be greatest sharers in his crown; those who suffer most for him on earth shall be most blessed and rewarded by him when they come to heaven.

Look! as the consolation of the saints rises higher and higher in this world, even as their sufferings rise higher and higher, 2 Cor. 1:4-5—just so, the glory of the saints shall rise higher and higher in the eternal world, as their sufferings rise higher and higher in this world. Tertullian writes of the persecuted Christians who cry out, "Your cruelty is our glory, and the harder we are put to it, the greater shall be our reward in heaven!" One speaking of the martyrs said, "look how many sufferings they have—just so many crowns they shall have!" For every suffering—God shall set a crown on their heads. "By how much men's sufferings have been greater," says Chrysostom, "by so much the more their crown shall be bright and resplendent!"

"The greater conflicts and buffetings which any saint has endured, the greater shall be his reward, and the more ample shall be his glory," says Austin. As Christ has many crowns upon his head, suitable to the multitude of his sufferings and victories—just so, Christians at last shall have crowns suitable to the multitude of their sufferings, and suitable to those famous victories which they have gained over a tempting devil and a persecuting world, Rev. 19:7. Certainly it will be but justice, that they should receive the weightiest crown who have bore the heaviest cross, 1 John 5:4, and 2:13-14.

[7.] The seventh and last scripture that I shall produce is Mat. 10:41, "He who receives a prophet in the name of a prophet, shall receive a prophet's reward;" that is, say some, they shall be partakers of the same reward which is laid up for the prophets. Without all question, these two things lie fair in the text:

First, That there is some special and eminent degrees of reward due unto a prophet above other men. And,

Secondly, That he who shall entertain a prophet, and perform any offices of love and favor to him under that name and notion, he shall be partaker of that reward. He who receives a prophet, as he is God's messenger, and employed in his service, and sent about his errand, and not upon any carnal or worldly respects—he shall receive a prophet's reward; that is, he shall receive either such a reward as the prophet himself shall receive at last, or he shall receive such a large, ample, and noble recompense as is fit for one to receive, who received a prophet as coming from the Lord.

Look! as such who give an honorable reception to the ambassadors of kings or princes, do highly raise themselves in the favor and esteem of those kings or princes who had sent them—just so, those who receive the faithful prophets of the Lord, as the ambassadors of God, they shall be highly interested in the favor of God, and as nobly be rewarded by God.

I might produce several other scriptures that echo to the same purpose as these seven do—but enough is as good as a feast; as that Mark 6:20; John 14:2; Mat. 20:20-24.

I shall, therefore, in the second place come to the REASONS that may further evidence and confirm this great truth—namely, that there shall be different degrees of glory in heaven. Among many other reasons that might be given, I shall only give you these five.

[1.] First, There are diversities of degrees of angels in heaven. There are cherubim and seraphim, and there are angels and archangels. Now the cherubim and seraphim are a lower rank and order of angels, and the archangels are a higher rank and order of angels. And the apostle speaks clearly of several ranks and orders of invisible creatures in that Col. 1:16. Here you have an enumeration of thrones, dominions, principalities, and powers. And so in Eph. 1:21, "Far above all principalities, and powers, and might, and dominion." These principalities and powers are the blessed angels who minister before the Lord, and who are subordinate unto one another; and here they are reckoned up by ascending: power is above principality, and might above power, and dominion above might. To define those orders and degrees of angels with which God is environed, is a work too high and hard for me, and though the Papists and several schoolmen are so bold as to define their particular offices and orders—yet I dare not be wise above what is written. Where the Scripture is silent—I love to be silent; and where the Scripture has no tongue—there I desire to have no ears. [Mat. 9:34, and 12:34; Mark 3:22. The very supposition of order supposes inequality and disproportion.]

There is an order in HELL, an order among the devils, and therefore you read in three scriptures of the prince of devils, and so much also that expression imports that you have in that Mat. 25:41, "The devil and his angels," which intimates a prince among those unclean and damned spirits. Now shall there be order in hell and confusion in heaven? Shall there be order among the evil angels, and shall there not much more be order among the good angels? Certainly that God who is the God of order, and who has made all things in order, and who to this day keeps all things in order here below—will never allow the least disorder and confusion to be among those princes of glory who stand continually before him. He who denies order in heaven, denies heaven to be heaven; and he who grants order in heaven, grants degrees of glory in heaven. Though there is no difference between the angels in nature—the angelical nature being alike in all—yet in office, there is a great deal of difference in the glory of the angels, for God employs some of the heavenly host in more high, noble, and excellent services than others, and answerable thereunto shall their reward be. Though all angels shall share alike in the essential and substantial glory of heaven—yet there is an additional glory, an overplus of glory, which shall be conferred upon the angels, answerable to the several and various services that they have managed and engaged in.

Now the Scripture tells us plainly that "in heaven we shall be like the angels," Mat. 22:30; and therefore if there be degrees of angels, and if the angels in heaven shall have a different glory and reward, according to the work in which they have been employed, then the glory of the saints in respect of degrees shall be different also. But,

[2.] Secondly, There are degrees of torments in hell, and therefore, by the rule of contraries, there shall be degrees of glory in heaven. Now that there are degrees of torments in hell is most evident from several plain scriptures, as from Mat. 10:14-15, "If anyone will not welcome you or listen to your words, shake the dust off your feet when you leave that house or town. I assure you: It will be more tolerable on the day of judgment for the land of Sodom and Gomorrah than for that town." Sodom and Gomorrah shall have an easier and cooler hell than such cities shall have, which have despised the offers of grace, and the offers of mercy. [Contempt of Christ and his gospel, is worse than sodomy.] It is very observable, that the punishments that God in this life has inflicted upon the Jews for their contempt of Christ, and his everlasting gospel, have been more terrible than his raining hell out of heaven upon Sodom and Gomorrah: for suddenly, and in a moment, God consumed them, and burnt Sodom and Gomorrah up. But God has for above this sixteen hundred years been a-raining hell out of heaven upon the Jews; he has for a long time vexed them with all manner of adversity, and to this very day he has made them, all the world over, a spectacle of his dreadful severity. But all those plagues and punishments that the Jews have been and still are under, are but flea-bitings and scratches on the hand—compared to those dreadful and astonishing judgments which God, in the great day of account, will inflict upon all Christ refusers and gospel-despisers! "Whoever believes in the Son has eternal life, but whoever rejects the Son will not see life, for God's wrath remains on him." John 3:36

And so chapter 11:20-23, "Then Jesus began to denounce the cities in which most of his miracles had been performed, because they did not repent. "Woe to you, Korazin! Woe to you, Bethsaida! If the miracles that were performed in you had been performed in Tyre and Sidon, they would have repented long ago in sackcloth and ashes. But I tell you, it will be more tolerable for Tyre and Sidon on the day of judgment than for you. And you, Capernaum, will you be lifted up to the skies? No, you will go down to the depths. If the miracles that were performed in you had been performed in Sodom, it would have remained to this day!" The more mercy has been upon the bare knee entreating sinners to repent, the more earnest the Lord Jesus has been in wooing sinners to believe on him and to resign up themselves wholly and only to him, the more clearly and sweetly the everlasting gospel has sounded in sinners' ears, and the more near, and the more often heaven has been brought to sinners' doors—and yet they have bid defiance to all, and hardened themselves in their sins—with the greater violence and with the more dreadful vengeance shall such be plunged into the lowest hell.

And so in Mat. 23:14, "Woe unto you, scribes, Pharisees, and hypocrites, for you devour widows' houses, and for a pretense make long prayers; therefore you shall receive the greater damnation." Hypocrites shall be double damned; the hottest and the darkest place in hell is reserved for them. "Give him his portion with hypocrites;" for number and weight, there are no torments in hell, compared to the torments of hypocrites. Counterfeit sanctity is double iniquity, and therefore it is but justice that the hypocrite should have double torment.

And so in Luke 12:47, 48, "That servant who knows his master's will and does not get ready or does not do what his master wants, will be beaten with many blows. But the one who does not know and does things deserving punishment will be beaten with few blows. From everyone who has been given much, much will be demanded; and from the one who has been entrusted with much, much more will be asked." Sins against light and knowledge are sins against the noblest remedy. They waste and wound the conscience most, they most open sinners' mouths to blaspheme against God, and they most harden sinners' hearts in sinning against God; and every way they dare God most, and provoke God most—to strike with an iron rod, and to whip the knowing transgressor, not with rods, but with scorpions.

It is very observable, that the more light and knowledge men sin against in this world—the greater judgments God gives them up to, even in this life, Romans 1:21-23. Oh, how much more, then, will God in the great day give them up to the greatest judgments, who have given themselves up to the greatest sins! Certainly the professors of this age, yes, of this city, whether they go to heaven or hell, will be the greatest debtors that shall be in either place—the one to the free grace of God, and the other to his justice. That those who have most of hell in their mouths, and most of hell in their hearts, and most of hell in their lives—should have most of hell in their souls at last, is but justice.

I shall conclude this second argument with a saying of Augustine, "Look!" says he, "as in heaven one is more glorious than another—just so, in hell one shall be more miserable than another." Now if there be degrees of torments in hell, which I suppose the scriptures but now cited does undeniably prove, then, doubtless, there will be degrees of glory in heaven.

[3.] Thirdly, God in this life dispenses the gifts and graces of his Spirit unequally among his saints; to some he gives two talents, to others five, and to others ten. Hence it is you read both of a weak faith, and of a strong faith. "Why are you afraid, O you of little faith?" and, "O woman, great is your faith;" and, "Truly, I have not found so great faith, no, not in Israel." [Mat. 25, 8:10, 26, and 15:28.]

And hence it is that you read both of weak Christians, and of strong Christians. "He who is weak in the faith receive;" "another who is weak eats herbs;" "and to the weak, I became as weak, that I might win the weak;" "we then who are strong ought to bear the infirmities of the weak, and not to please ourselves;" "when I am weak, then am I strong." [Romans 14:1-2; 1 Cor. 9:22; 2 Cor. 12:10; Heb. 5:13-14; 1 Pet. 2:2, and 5:1.]

And hence it is that you read of babes, and of children, and of young men, and of old men, in the Scripture. Saints are of different growths. Some are but babes in gifts and grace, others are children, others young men, and others old men. God distributes the good things of this world unequally among the sons of men, as to some more, to others less; to some great things, to others little things; to some high things, to others low things. God unequally distributes spiritual blessings among his dearest children; to some he gives more light, to others less; to some a greater measure of love, to others a less; to some a greater degree of joy, to others a less, etc. Some saints shine in grace and holiness as the skies, and others shine in grace and holiness as the stars; some shine in grace and holiness as the moon, and others shine in grace and holiness as the sun; and all this springs from those different measures of grace and holiness which God bestows upon his people.

Now doubtless men may as well plead for equal degrees of grace—as they may for equal degrees of glory; they may as well plead for an equal share in the good things of this world—as they may plead for an equal share in the happiness and blessedness of the eternal world. Doubtless as God dispenses his gifts and graces unequally in this life—just so, he will dispense his rewards unequally in the next life. As men's gifts and graces are different here on earth—just so, their glory shall be different when they come to heaven. Without all question, they shall have the whitest and the largest robes of honor, and the heaviest and the brightest crowns of glory—whose souls are most richly adorned with grace, and whose lives are most eminently bespangled with holiness.

The more grace and holiness any saint has here, the more he is prepared and fitted for glory; and the more any saint is fitted for glory, the more that saint shall at last be filled with glory. The greatest measures of grace and holiness do most enlarge the soul, and widen the soul, and capacitate the soul—to take in the greatest measures of glory; and therefore the more grace, the more glory, the more holiness, the more happiness, a saint shall have at last. Certainly God will crown his own gracious works in his children proportionable to what they are—but they are different and unequally in all his children in respect of measures and degrees; and therefore God will set different crowns of glory upon the heads of his children at last. But,

[4.] Fourthly, Those who have more grace and holiness than others, they are more like God than others. They bear his glorious image in a greater print, they have a brighter character of God upon them, and they are the most lively picture of God in all the world.

Now we know, though parents love their children well, and wish all their children well, and provide for all their children well—yet commonly they love them most, and provide for them best, who resemble them most. Parents cannot but love those children most, and lay up for them most, who have most of themselves in them; and I cannot see how God can do otherwise than love them most, and provide for them best, who most resemble him to the life. The nature of God is a holy nature, and so there lies a holy necessity on his nature to love them most, who have most grace and holiness in them, Psalm 45:7.

Look! as it is natural to God to hate wickedness—just so, it is natural to God to love holiness; and as the higher men rise in wickedness, the more a holy God hates them—just so, the higher men rise in holiness, the more a holy God loves them. Now the more any are like God, and the more they are beloved by God, the higher doubtless in glory shall they be advanced by God. The best and the largest portion is laid up for that child that is most like his father. The more any man in holiness resembles God on earth, the greater and the larger portion of glory that man shall have when he comes to heaven. But,

[5.] Fifthly and lastly, To deny degrees of glory in heaven, and to say that God will not suit men's wages to their works, nor their rewards to their services, nor crown the highest improvements of grace with the highest degrees of glory, is to render useless many glorious exhortations which are scattered up and down in the Scripture. 1 Cor. 15:58, "Therefore, my beloved brethren, be steadfast, unmoveable, always abounding in the work of the Lord, forasmuch as you know that your labor is not in vain in the Lord." If this were not a truth that I have been all this while asserting, why then, when men meet with this exhortation, they may say, "Why, it is no great matter whether we are steadfast, unmoveable, and always abounding in the work of the Lord or not; for if we are, we shall never advance our reward in heaven, we shall never add pearls to our glorious crown, we shall never add one mite to our happiness and blessedness; and if we are not, we shall be as high in heaven, and our reward as great, and our crown as weighty, as theirs shall be who are steadfast, unmoveable, and always abounding in the work of the Lord." [2 Cor. 7:1, and 9:6; 2 Pet. 3:18; John 15:8; 2 Pet. 1:5-7.]

And so the denial of degrees of glory in heaven will take off also the edge of all those other exhortations of perfecting holiness, of sowing liberally, of growing in grace, of bringing forth much fruit, and of adding virtue to virtue, etc. Yes, this will cut the throat of all divine endeavors; for who will labor to be rich in grace, and to be much in service, and to abound in all the fruits of righteousness and holiness, when none of all this will turn to a man's advantage in the eternal world? If he who sows little shall have as great a harvest as he who sows much; if he who is dull and negligent in the work of the Lord shall have as great a reward as he who is active and abundant in the work of the Lord; if those trees of righteousness which bring forth much fruit shall have no greater a recompense than those trees of righteousness which bring forth many leaves of profession but little fruit, etc., who would sow much, and who would be active and abundant in the work of the Lord, and who would bring forth much fruit? truly but few, if any.

The truth that I have been laboring to make good, namely, that there shall be different degrees of glory in heaven, and that God will proportion men's reward to their work, and that he will measure out happiness and blessedness to them at last, according to the different measures of grace bestowed upon his people, and according to the work, service, and faithfulness of his people in this world; this truth, I say, held forth in its luster and glory, is a marvelous encouragement, and a mighty provocation to all sincere Christians—to labor after the highest pitches in Christianity, and to be very eminent in grace and holiness; for what man is there, who will not reason thus, "the more grace the more glory; the more holiness the more happiness; the more work the more wages; and the greater my service shall be here, the greater shall be my reward hereafter. Therefore, O my soul! grow in grace, perfect holiness, and abound in the work and service of the Lord, knowing that your labor shall not be in vain in the Lord." And thus I have given you the reasons that prove that there shall be degrees of glory in heaven.

Now I have nothing further to do upon this point—but to give a few brief answers to such OBJECTIONS as are commonly raised against this truth, that I have asserted and proved.

Objection 1. First, Some object and say, That one Christ bought us all, and that all our portions are bought by the precious blood of our Lord Jesus Christ, and that therefore all believers shall share alike in the inheritance of the saints in light. Now to this objection I shall answer,

[1.] First, That all saints shall be equal sharers in the substantial and essential glory of heaven, etc. But of this I have spoken before; and, therefore,

[2.] Secondly, Though a father buys a rich inheritance for all his children—yet this lays no necessity nor obligation at all upon him to allot to everyone of his children an equal portion. Just so, though our Lord Jesus Christ has by his blood purchased a rich inheritance for his children—yet this lays no necessity nor obligation at all upon Jesus Christ to divide this rich inheritance by equal portions among his children. It is true that Christ has purchased all with his blood; and it is as true that he may divide his purchase among his people as he pleases. If every man may do with his own as he pleases, why may not Christ? Must he needs be bound, when others are free?

[3.] Thirdly and lastly, I answer, That as it is true that the merits and satisfaction of Christ is the ground and foundation of our reward, and that alone which makes our works capable of a reward—just so, it is as true that our works are the subject to reward, and this is most agreeable to the compact that was made between Christ and his Father—that everlasting happiness and blessedness, that eternal glory and felicity, should be measured out to the saints according to their different measures of grace, and different degrees of service that they have been engaged in this world, and all this upon the credit of Christ's blood. Certainly there is nothing under heaven, below the blood of our Lord Jesus Christ, that can make differing works capable of a different reward.

The Papists are most sadly wrong, for they are so blind and bold as to affirm that the more grace any man has, the more glory he merits by his grace. These men make degrees of grace, and not the blood of Jesus Christ, to be the meritorious cause of degrees of glory; and therefore of all men I think they are furthest from glory. Certainly this is the believer's glory, and his crown of rejoicing, that all recompenses and rewards shall flow in upon him, not upon the account of his merits—but upon the account of Christ's blood; and thus much shall suffice to have spoken by way of answer to this objection.

Objection 2. But now, in the second place, I shall come to answer their grand and main objection; and that is taken from that parable in the 20th chapter of Matthew, where the kingdom of heaven is compared to a vineyard. Now in this parable there is mention made of a farmer that called several laborers into his vineyard, at several hours in the day; some he called at the first hour, and some he called at the third, and some at the ninth, and some at the eleventh. Now when they all came to receive their wages, the story tells us that he gave every man a penny, he gave every man an equal reward. Those who labored from the first hour, and those who labored from the third hour, and those who labored from the sixth hour of the day—had no greater a recompense than he who came in at the eleventh hour, and so had labored but one hour in the vineyard, and bore but little if any of the heat of the day. From whence the objectors conclude that there are no degrees of glory in heaven—but that all shall have glory alike, happiness and blessedness alike; every man shall have his penny, every man shall have an equal reward, and no man's penny in heaven shall be brighter or bigger than another's.

Now, by way of answer to this objection, give me permission to premise these three things:

First, That this parable of the householder, in giving to every man a penny, has no reference at all to heaven, nor to the reward, nor to the glory that shall be conferred upon the elect, and this I shall clearly and fully prove by these four following arguments:

[1.] First, This inferential particle, "for," in verse 1, shows that this parable is inserted to expound the former conclusion, namely, "that the first shall be last, and the last shall be first," and therefore the end of the parable is concluded with the repetition of the same sentence, verse 16, "the last shall be first, and the first shall be last." Christ by this parable would teach his hearers, that there is no reason why those who are first called in respect of time should boast or triumph over others, because he can easily call the uncalled at pleasure, and either make them equal with them, or else prefer them before those who are first. The scope of Christ in this parable is not to set forth the equality of celestial glory, it is not to prove that the happiness and blessedness of the saints shall be equal in heaven—but the very drift of the parable is to show, that those who are first called and converted have no cause at all to despise the uncalled and unconverted, or to trample upon them with the foot of pride, considering that they who are yet in their sins, and in an unconverted and unsanctified estate—may yet be called, and either made equal to them, or preferred before them. But,

[2.] Secondly, Interpreters do generally agree in this, that by the farmer we are to understand God himself, and by the laborers—men upon earth, and by the vineyard—the church of God; and several of them say, that by the five hours in the parable we are to understand the five ages of man.

First, By those who were called in the morning and sent into the vineyard, we are to understand those who in their childhood are called and converted; they are such who begin to seek the Lord, and to serve the Lord, even as soon as they are capable of the use of reason; as Samuel did, and as Josiah did, and as Timothy did.

Secondly, By those who are called at the third hour, we are to understand those who are converted and turned to the Lord in their youth, in the prime, the spring and morning of their days.

Thirdly, By those who were called at the sixth hour, we are to understand those who are turned to the Lord in their strength, and in their full and perfect age.

Fourthly, By those who were called at the ninth hour, we are to understand those who are converted and turned to the Lord in their declining age.

And fifthly, By those who were called at the eleventh hour, we are to understand those who are converted and turned to the Lord in their decrepit old age, when they have one foot in the grave, and there is but a short step between them and eternity, when, with the thief upon the cross, they are even ready to be turned off of the ladder of life.

Now the vineyard being the church, all that this parable proves is no more but this, that whether men are called into the vineyard of the church either sooner or later—either at the first hour, or at the ninth, or eleventh hour: yet this shall neither greaten nor lessen their reward; for if they are called at the first hour, their recompense shall be ever the greater upon that account, or if they are called at the eleventh hour, their reward shall be ever the lesser upon that account; the reward shall not be different according to the different times of men's being called and converted, and that this parable proves; but the reward shall be different according to the diversity of our works, and that my former arguments prove.

[3.] Thirdly, If the penny that everyone had in the parable be meant of glory, then it will roundly follow, that murmurers shall be saved and glorified as well as others, for the murmurers had their penny as well as the rest: verse 10-12, "But when the first came, they supposed that they should have received more, and they likewise received every man a penny. And when they had received it, they murmured against the good man of the house, saying, These last have wrought but one hour, and you have made them equal unto us, which have borne the burden and heat of the day." The Greek word which is here rendered murmured, signifies to grunt as swine grunt. They grumbled and grunted, and they grunted and grumbled; and pray tell me what should such swine as murmurers are do grunting and grumbling in heaven? doubtless the crown of glory is too bright, too noble, too glorious, and too weighty a crown to be set upon murmurers' heads. Heaven would be no heaven if there were but one grunter or murmurer there.

In heaven all the vessels of glory shall be full, and there shall not be the least shadow of envy or repining there. In the streets of that new Jerusalem above, none shall ever complain that others have too much, or that they themselves have too little. Every glorified saint shall sit down fully satisfied and contented with his portion there. Now should we understand the penny to be a glorified estate and condition, then this would unavoidably follow, that many shall be brought to a state of glory which are not elected, nor sanctified, nor prepared for glory; but this can never, nor must never be granted; and therefore without all question this parable does no way hold out that state of glory and felicity which all the called and chosen of God shall have at Christ's coming to judge the quick and the dead. But,

[4.] Fourthly, The penny that is here mentioned in this parable cannot, nor may not, be interpreted so as to signify an equality of glory, or an equality of happiness and blessedness, that the saints shall have in heaven, because such an interpretation, such an exposition, is cross and contrary to the common and received rules of interpreting and expounding of Scripture. Now, among other rules which are to be observed in the interpreting and expounding of Scripture, there are these two:

FIRST, You must so interpret and expound one text of Scripture, that you do not set it at strife and variance with another text of Scripture; for though there is a seeming contradiction between scripture and scripture—yet there is a blessed harmony and a glorious agreement between all the parts of Scripture. It is a very dangerous thing so to interpret Scripture as to raise contests and opposition between scriptures and scriptures; it is an evil thing to raise up scripture against scripture, and so to interpret one as to make it affront another. Woe to him who by his interpretations of Scripture proclaims the scriptures to be at open war among themselves. Now to interpret the penny in the parable so as to make it signify an equality of glory and happiness among the saints in heaven, is to set this scripture at variance and strife with all those scriptures that I have produced to prove an inequality in the glory and happiness of the saints in heaven, and therefore such an interpretation is rather to be abhorred than to be received. But,

SECONDLY, Another rule that is to be observed in the interpreting of Scripture is this—we must always interpret those scriptures which are more dark and mysterious, by those scriptures which are more plain and clear; and not interpret those scriptures which are plain and clear by those who are dark and mysterious, for this were to darken counsel by words without knowledge, Job 38:2.

Those who interpret the penny in the parable to signify an equality of glory among the saints in heaven, they transgress this second rule; for they must then interpret all those clear and plain scriptures that I have brought to prove degrees of glory in heaven by this dark and mysterious parable, whereas they should interpret this dark and mysterious parable, if I may so say, by those plain and clear scriptures that I have already cited; and therefore their interpretation must be rejected.

It is true, of some parables we may say as Gregory does, namely, that they rather require a practicer than an interpreter, Psalm 49:4, and 97:2; John 16:29. And it is as true that other parables are so dark, obscure, and mysterious, that we shall never understand them without the sweat of our brows and the beating of our brains, and such a parable this seems to be, and therefore we must interpret the parts of it rather by other clear scriptures, than to make clear and plain scriptures bow to this—which seems to have a veil upon it. And thus you see by these arguments, that the penny in the parable has no reference at all to heaven, nor to any equality of glory that shall be among the saints there.

Secondly, Chrysostom's counsel on the text should be eyed and followed. Says he, "We should not strain every particular of a parable—but only consider the scope of Christ in the propounding of it, and accordingly apply it." We look not on every particular color in a well-drawn picture—but on the whole piece. Just so, when we come to view a parable, it is enough that we cast our eye principally upon the general intention and scope of it. He who is very exact and curious to view and observe every particular circumstance about parables, may easily draw blood, instead of milk, out of the breasts of parables. Parables are like to the scroll which Ezekiel saw in a vision spread before him, which was written within and without; without the history was written, and within the mystery was written, Ezek. 2:10. Now though the outside, the history, of a parable be like the golden pot—yet the inside, the mystery, of a parable is like the manna that was hidden therein, and it is the manna, the manna, that we must seek after. It is our wisdom to cast a special eye upon the inside of parables, upon the mystical reference that parables have, than to lie poring upon the outside of parables.

Therefore, the scope of this parable is not to prove that there is an equality of glory in heaven—but to reprove the Jews, who, being called into the Lord's vineyard early in the morning, repined and murmured that the Gentiles, who were called in at the latter end of the day, who were called in some thousand years after them, that they should through the riches of grace have an equal share with them in the reward, and stand upon as good and as noble terms with God as themselves, who had so long bore the heat of the day. God, to show that his gifts, his grace, and his rewards are free, will give his pennies as well to those who have labored but a little—as to those who have labored much; and this is no prejudice at all to his truth and justice, that his grace is free. But,

Thirdly and lastly, That by the penny we cannot, nor we may not, understand everlasting happiness and blessedness—but some other reward that hypocrites may attain to as well as sincere-hearted Christians; and the reason is obvious: for he who was sent away for his envious grumbling and grunting, was sent away also with his penny, "take your penny and be packing." [Some by the penny do understand worldly honor, and the estimation and approbation of men.] By the penny some pious interpreters do understand some competent gift or other, whatever it were, which might be well managed and improved to advantage. The vineyard is the church, and everyone that is called to labor in the vineyard is called to labor in the use and improvement of ordinances. Now everyone that is laborious in the use of ordinances shall be sure to get something; no man shall kindle a fire on God's altar for nothing. And yet it many times comes to pass that those who have been called and converted long before others, do yet make no greater, nor any better earnings on it than those do, who have been called and converted long after them. He who is called at the first hour sometimes gets no more than he who is called at the eleventh hour. It is in the trade of Christianity, as it is in other trades. Now you know that many men who have been set up in this or that trade ten, nay twenty, years before others—yet they many times make no more earnings, no more advantage of their trade, than those who have set up but the other day, as we say.

Why, so many who have been called long to the trade of Christianity before others—yet they make no more earnings, no more advantage of that trade, than those who have been called to it but yesterday, as I may speak. His gifts, his gain, his earnings, who is called in at the eleventh hour of the day, is many times equal to his that was called in at the first hour of the day. Yes, I have formerly proved that sometimes many who are called later than others, do yet in gifts and grace excel those who were called long before them.

Now these objections being answered, that truth stands firm, like mount Zion, namely, that the more holiness you have here, the more happiness you shall have hereafter; the more grace you have here on earth, the more glory you shall have when you come to heaven.

or, the truth of the resurrection of the bodies, both of good and bad at the last day asserted, and proved by God's word

Fourth, Shew you something also of that with which the just shall be rewarded.

First then, those that shall be found in the day of their resurrection, when they shall have all their good things brought upon the stage; they I say, that then shall be found the people most laborious for God while here; they shall at that day enjoy the greatest portion of God, or shall be possessed with most of the glory of the Godhead then. For that is the portion of saints in general (Romans 8:17; Lamentations 3:24). And why shall he that doth most for God in this world, enjoy most of him in that which is to come? But because by doing and acting, the heart, and every faculty of the soul is enlarged, and more capacitated, whereby more room is made for glory. Every vessel of glory shall at that day be full of it; but every one will not be capable to contain a like measure; and so if they should have it communicated to them, would not be able to stand under it; for there is an eternal weight in the glory that saints shall then enjoy (2 Corinthians 4:17) and every vessel must be at that day filled – that is, have its heavenly load of it.

All Christians have not the same enjoyment of God in this life, neither indeed were they able to bear it if they had it (1 Corinthians 3:2). But those Christians that are most laborious for God in this world, they have already most of him in their souls, and that not only because diligence in God's ways, is the means whereby God communicates himself; but also because thereby the senses are made more strong, and able, by reason of use, to understand God, and to discern both good and evil (Hebrews 5:13, 14). To him that hath, to him shall be given, and he shall have more abundance (Matthew 13:11, 12). He that laid out his pound for his master, and gained ten therewith, he was made ruler over ten cities; but he that by his pound gained but five, he was made ruler over but five (Luke 19:16-19). Often, he that is best bred in his youth, he is best able to manage most, when he is a man, touching things of this life (Daniel 1:3, 4); but always he that is best bred, and that is most in the bosom of God, and that so acts for him here; he is the man that will be best able to enjoy most of God in the kingdom of heaven. It is observable that Paul saith,

Our – affliction – worketh for us a far more exceeding and eternal weight of glory (2 Corinthians 4:17)

Our afflictions do it, not only because there is laid up a reward for the afflicted, according to the measure of affliction; but because afflictions, and so every service of God, doth make the heart more deep, more experimental, more knowing and profound; and so more able to hold, contain, and bear more (Psalm 119:71)

Every man shall receive his own reward, according to his own labor (1 Corinthians 3:8)

And this is the reason of such sayings as these – Lay up for yourselves a good foundation against the time to come, that you may lay hold on eternal life (1 Timothy 6:19), which eternal life, is not the matter of our justification from sin in the sight of God; for that is done freely by grace, through faith in Christ's blood; (but here the apostle speaks of giving of alms) but it is the same that in the other place he calls "the far more exceeding and eternal weight of glory." And hence it is that he in his stirring them up to be diligent in good works, doth tell them, that he doth not exhort them to it because he wanted, but because he would have

"fruit that might abound to their account" (Philippians 4:17)

as he saith also in another place,

"Beloved brethren, be ye stedfast, unmoveable, always abounding in the work of the Lord, forasmuch as ye know that your labor is not in vain in the Lord" (1 Corinthians 15:58)

Therefore I say, the reward that the saints shall have at this day for all the good they have done, it is the enjoyment of God, according to their works: though they shall be freely justified and glorified without works.

Second, As the enjoyment of God at that day, will be to the saints, according to their works and doings – I speak not now of justification from sin – so will their praise and commendations at that day, be according to the same, and both of them their degrees of glory; for I say, as God by communicating of himself unto us at that day, will thereby glorify us, so also he will for the adding all things that may furnish with glory every way, cause to be proclaimed in the face of heaven, and in the presence of all the holy angels; everything that hath for God, his ways, and people, been done by us while here we have been.

"Whatsoever ye have spoken in darkness shall be heard in the light; and that which ye have spoken in the ear in closets shall be proclaimed upon the housetops" (Luke 12:2, 3)

Again, He that

"shall confess me," saith Christ, "before men, him will I confess also before my Father which is in heaven" (Matthew 10:32).

Now as he of whom Christ is ashamed when he comes in his glory, and in the glory of the holy angels, will then lie under inconceivable disgrace, shame, dishonor, and contempt: so he whom Christ shall confess, own, commend, and praise at that day, must needs have very great dignity, honor, and renown, "for then shall every man have praise of God" – to wit, according to his works (1 Corinthians 4:5). Now will Christ proclaim before thee and all others what thou hast done, and what thou hast suffered, what thou hast owned, and what thou hast withstood for his name (Mark 8:38). This is he that forsook his goods, his relations, his country, and life for me: this is the man that overcame the flatteries and threats, allurements and enticings, of a whole world for me; behold him, he is an Israelite indeed (John 1:47), the top man in his generation, "none like him in all the earth" (Job 1:8). It is said, that when king Ahasuerus had understanding of how good service Mordecai the Jew had done to and for him, he commanded that the royal apparel and the crown, with the horse that the king did ride on, should be given to him, and that he should with that crown, apparel, and horse, be had through the city, in the presence of all his nobles, and that proclamation should be made before him,

"Thus shall it be done unto the man whom the king delighteth to honor" (Esther 6:9-11).

Ahasuerus in this was a type to hold forth to the children of God, how kindly he will take all their labor and service of love, and how he will honor and dignify the same; as Christ saith, "Let your loins be girded about, and your lights burning; And ye yourselves like unto men that wait for their lord, when he will return from the wedding; that when he cometh and knocketh, they may open unto him immediately. Blessed are those servants, whom the lord when he cometh shall find watching: verily I say unto you, that he shall gird himself, and make them sit down to meat, and will come forth and serve them (Luke 12:35-57). The meaning is, that those souls that shall make it their business to honor the Lord Jesus Christ, in the day of their temptation; he will make it his business to honor and glorify them in the day of his glorification (John 12:26). "Verily, I say unto you, that he will make them sit down to meat, and shall come forth and serve them. If any man will serve me," saith he, "him will my Father honor." It hath been God's way in this world to proclaim the acts and doings of his saints in his word before all in this world, and he will do it in that which is to come (Mark 14:9; Revelation 3:4; Revelation 14:1-6).

Third, Another thing that shall be yet added to the glory of the saints, in the kingdom of their Savior, at his coming is, they shall every one of them then have his throne and place of degree on Christ's right hand, and on his left, in his glorious kingdom, according to the relation they stand in to Christ, as the members of his body; for as Christ will have a special eye on us, and a tender and affectionate heart, to recompense to the full every good thing that any man doth for his name in this world: so also he will have as great regard, that there be to every member of his body, the place, and state that is comely for every such member. When the mother of Zebedee's children petitioned our Savior that he would grant to her, that her two sons might sit, the one on his right hand, and the other on his left, in his kingdom: though he did not grant to her the request for her children, yet he affirmed that there would be places of degrees and honor in heaven, saying,

"To sit on my right hand, and on my left, is not mine to give, but it shall be given to them for whom it is prepared of my Father" (Matthew 20:20-23).

In the temple, there were chambers bigger and lesser, higher and lower, more inward and more outward: which chambers were types of the mansions that our Lord when he went away, told us he went to prepare for us.

"In my Father's house are many mansions: if it were not so, I would have told you. I go to prepare a place for you" (John 14:2,3).

The foot here, shall not have the place prepared for the eye, nor yet the hand, that which is prepared for the ear, but every one shall have his own place in the body of Christ, and the glory also prepared for such a relation. Order, as it is comely in earth, so much more in the kingdom of the God of order, in heaven; where all things shall be done in their utmost perfections. Here shall Enoch, Noah, Abraham, Moses, Joshua, David, with the prophets, have every one his place, according to the degree of Old Testament saints. As God said to Daniel,

"Go thou thy way till the end be: for thou shalt rest, and stand in thy lot at the end of the days" (Daniel 12:13).

And here also shall Peter, Paul, Timothy, and all other the church officers have their place, and heavenly state, according as God hath set them in the church in the New Testament. As Paul saith of the deacons,

"They that have used the office of a deacon well, purchase to themselves a good degree, and great boldness in the faith which is in Christ Jesus" (1 Timothy 3:13). And so of all other saints, be they here of what rank, quality, or place in the church soever, they shall have every one his state, his heavenly state, according as he standeth in the body. As he saith, seeing those members that are most feeble are necessary, to them shall be given "more abundant honor" (1 Corinthians 12:22,23). Of this heavenly order in the kingdom of Christ, when his saints are risen from the dead, was Solomon a notable type in his family, and among his servants and officers, who kept such exactness in the famous order in which he had placed all about him, that it did amaze and confound beholders. For "when the queen of Sheba had seen the wisdom of Solomon, and the house that he had built, and the meat of his table, and the sitting of his servants, and the attendance of his ministers, and their apparel; his cup-bearers also, and their apparel; and his ascent by which he went up into the house of the Lord, there was no more spirit in her" (2 Chronicles 9:3,4). "Glorious things are spoken of thee, O city of God" (Psalm 87:3).

Rule 4. Directing to the endeavour of a gradual improvement in such a disposedness of spirit (as will be found in any measure already attained) towards this blessedness. That 'tis blessedness begun which disposes to the consummate state of it. That we are therefore to endeavour the daily increase of our present knowledge of God, conformity to him, and the satisfiedness of our spirits therein.

4. Rule. That when we find ourselves in any disposition towards this blessedness, we endeavour a gradual improvement therein, to get the habitual temper of our spirits made daily more suitable to it. We must still remember we have not yet attained, and must therefore continue pressing forward " to this mark, for the prize of the high calling of God in Christ Jesus. That prize (not price, as we commonly misread it in our Bibles) of which the apostle here speaks, is (as may be seen by looking back to verse 8, 9, &c.) the same with the blessedness in the text. Such a knowledge of Christ, as should infer at last his participation with him in his state of glory; or of the resurrection of the dead. This is the ultimate term, the scope or end of that high calling of God in Christ; so 'tis also stated elsewhere. Who hath ii called us unto his eternal glory by Christ Jesus. Now we should therefore frequently recount how far short we are of this glory, and stir up our souls to more vigorous endeavours in order to it. Our suitableness to this blessedness stands in our having the elements and first principles of it in us; 'tis glory only that fits for glory; some previous sights and impressions of it, and a pleasant complacential relish thereof, that frame and attemper us by degrees to the full and Consummate state of it. This is that therefore we must endeavour, A growing knowledge of God, conformity to him, and satisfiedness of spirit therein. What we expect should be one day perfect, we must labour may be, in the meantime, always growing.

1. Our knowledge of God. The knowledge of him I here principally intend, is not notional and speculative, but (which is more ingredient to our blessedness, both inchoate and perfect) that of converse, that familiar knowledge which we usually express by the name of acquaintance. See that this knowledge of him be increased daily. Let us now use ourselves much with God. Our knowledge of him must aim at conformity to him; and how powerful a thing is converse in order hereto! How insensibly is it wont to transform men, and mould anew their spirits, language, garb, deportment 1 To be removed from the solitude or rudeness of the country to a city or university, what an alteration does it make 1 How is such a person divested by degrees of his rusticity, of his more uncomely and agrest manners! Objects we converse with, beget their image upon us; They walked after vanity, and became vain, said Jeremiah; and Solomon, a He that walketh with the wise, shall be wise. Walking is a usual expression of converse. So to converse with the holy is the way to be holy, with heaven the way to be heavenly, with God, the way to be God-like. Let us therefore make this our present business, much to acquaint ourselves with God. We count upon seeing him face to face, of being always in his presence beholding his glory; that speaketh very intimate acquaintance indeed. How shall we reach that pitch 1 What, to live now as strangers to him 1 Is that the way 1' The path of the righteous is as the shining light, that shineth more and more unto the perfect day. The text shows us the righteous man's end, To behold the glory of God's face, &c. 'tis easy to apprehend then, his way must needs have in it a growing brightness, as he comes still nearer this end. Every nearer approach to a lucid thing infers (to us) an increase of light from it. We should therefore be following on to know the Lord, and we shall see his going forth will be before us as the morning, f He will be still visiting us with renewed, increasing light, (for such is morning light, fresh and growing-light,) and ere long it will be perfect day. Labour we to improve our knowledge of God to such a degree of acquaintance as our present state can admit of: to be as inward with him as we can, to familiarize ourselves to him. His gospel aims at this, to make those that were afar off nigh. Far-distant objects we can have no distinct view of. He can give us little account of a person that hath only seen him afar off; so God beholds the proud afar off, that is, he will have no acquaintance with them: whereas with the humble he will be familiar; s he will dwell (as in a family) with them. So the ungodly behold God till he bring them in, and make them nigh; then they are no longer strangers, but of his family and household, now thoroughly acquainted. Several notes there are of a thorough acquaintance which we should endeavour may concur in our acquaintance with God, in that analogy which the case will bear:—To know his nature; or (as we would speak of a man) what will please and displease him, so as to be able in the whole course of our daily conversation to approve ourselves to him: to have the skill so to manage our conversation, as to continue a correspondence, not interrupted by any of our offensive unpleasing demeanours: to walk worthy of God unto all well-pleasing. It concerns us most to study and endeavour this practical knowledge of the nature of God; what trust, and love, and fear, and purity, &c. his faithfulness and greatness, his goodness and holiness, &c. do challenge from us: what may in our daily walking be agreeable, what repugnant, to the several attributes of his being. To know his secrets; to be as it were of the cabinet-council. ii (The word used by the Psalmist hath a peculiar significancy to that purpose; to signify, not only counsel, but a council, or the consensus of persons that consult together.) This is his gracious vouchsafement, to humble reverential souls. The secret of the Lord is with them that fear him; such acquaintance with him is to be sought, to know the (communicable) secrets both of his mind and heart. Of his mind; his truths, gospel-mysteries, that were kept secret from ages and generations. We have the mind of Christ. This is great inwardness. Of his heart; his love, his good-will, his kind bosom thoughts towards our souls. To know his methods, and the course of his dispensations towards the world, his church, and especially our own spirits. This is great knowledge of God, to have the skill to trace his footsteps, and observe by comparing times with times, that such a course he more usually holds; and accordingly, with great probability, collect from what we have seen and observed what we may expect. What order and succession there is of storms of wrath, to clouds of sin; and again of peaceful, lucid intervals, when such storms have inferred penitential tears. In what exigencies, and distresses, humble mourners may expect God's visits and consolations. To recount in how great extremities former experience hath taught us not to despair; and from such experience still to argue ourselves into fresh reviving hopes, when the state of things (whether public or private, outward or spiritual) seems forlorn. To know the proper seasons of address to him; and how to behave ourselves most acceptably in his presence, in what dispositions and postures of spirit we are fittest for his converse, so as to be able to come to him in a good hour, i in a time when he maybe found. To know his voice: this discovers acquaintance, k The ear trieth words, as the mouth tasteth meats. God's righteous ones, that are filled with the fruits of righteousness, do proportionably abound in i knowledge, and in all sense. They have quick, naked, unvitiated senses, to discern between good and evil; yea, and can have the suffrage of several senses concerning the same object; they have a kind of taste in their ear. They taste the good word of God, even in his previous workings on them. Being new-born, they are intimated to have tasted in the word how gracious the Lord is. As they grow up thereby, they have still a more judicious sense, and can more certainly distinguish, when God speaks to them, and when a stranger goes about to counterfeit his voice.» They can tell at first hearing, what is grateful and nutritive, what offensive and hurtful, to the divine life; what is harmonious and agreeable, what dissonant, to the gospel already received, so that an angel from heaven must expect no welcome, if he bring another. To know his inward motions and impulses; when his hand toucheth our hearts, to be able to say, This is the finger of God, there is something divine in this touch. » My beloved put in his hand by the hole of the door, and my bowels were moved. This speaks acquaintance, when the soul can say, I know his very touch; the least impression from him, I can distinguish it from thousands of objects that daily beat upon my heart. To understand his looks; to know the meaning of his aspects, and glances of the various casts, as it were, of his eye. r Such things intimate friends can, in a sort, talk by, with one another; I will guide thee by mine eye; that implies an intelligent teachable subject. We have now no full-eyed appearances of God; he shows himself, looks in upon us through the lattice, through a veil or a shadow, or a glass. That measure of acquaintance with him to be able to discern and own him in his appearances, is a great participation of heaven, utter unacquaintance with God is expressed by the denial of these two, Ye have neither heard his voice, nor seen his shape, John v. 37.

Finally, which brings us home to the text, to keep our eye intently fixed on him, not to understand his looks only as before, but to return our own. Intimate acquaintance (when such friends meet) is much expressed and improved by the eye, by a reciprocation of glances, or (which speaks more inwardness) more fixed views; when their eyes do even feed and feast upon each other. Thus we should endeavour to be as in a continual interview with God. How frequent mention have we of the fixed posture of his eye towards saints. To this man will I look; I have found out, q. d. that which shall be ever the delight of mine eye, do not divert me. Towards him I will look. What he speaks of the material temple is ultimately to be referred to that which is typified, i his church, his saints, united with his Christ, Mine eyes and my heart shall be there perpetually; and elsewhere, He withdraweth not his eyes from the righteous; he cannot (admirable grace) allow himself to look off, to turn aside his eye: and he seems impatient of the aversion of theirs, Let me see thy countenance, (saith he,) for it is comely.

Is it not much more reasonable it should be thus with us towards him 1 that we should be more delighted to behold real comeliness than he with what is so, only by his gracious vouchsafement and estimation 1 How careful Should we be, that our eye may at every turn meet his; that he never look toward us, and find it in the ends of the earth, carelessly wandering from him! How well doth it become us, 'to set the Lord always before us; to have our eye ever towards the Lord! This you see is the initial, leading thing in this blessedness of heaven. So it must have also a prime ingrediency into our heaven on earth. It is a part of celestial blessedness; but it is not peculiar to it. The present blessedness the righteous enjoy here is a participation of heaven. It hath something in it of every thing that is ingredient into that perfect blessedness. Our present knowledge of God is often expressed by vision, or sight, as we have had occasion to observe in many passages of Scripture. He hath given us such a visive power, and made it connatural to that heavenly creature, begotten of him, in all the true subjects of his blessedness. t We know that we are of God, and presently it follows, He hath given us an understanding to know him that is true. This new man is not born blind. The blessed God himself is become liable to the view of his regenerate, intellectual eye, clarified, and filled with vigour and spirit from himself. He therefore that hath made, that hath new-formed, this eye, shall not he be seen by it 1 shall not we turn it upon him! Why do not we more frequently bless our eye with that sight 1 This object (though of so high excellency and glory) will not hurt, but perfect and strengthen it. If they are refreshing, vital beams that issue from it. Sure we have no excuse that we eye God so little, i. e. that we mind him no more. Why have we so few thoughts of him in a day 1 What, to let so much time pass, and not spare him a look, a thought 1 Do we intend to employ ourselves an eternity in the visions of God, and is our present aversion from him, and intention upon vanity, our best preparation thereto 1 This loudly calls for redress. Shall God be waiting all the day, as on purpose to catch our eye, to intercept a look, and we studiously decline him, and still look another way, as of choice 1 And what is it but choice 1 Can we pretend a necessity to forget him all the day 1 How cheap is the expense of a look! How little would it cost us! And yet how much of duty might it express 1 how much of comfort and joy might it bring into us!

constant views of God! Herein we sin and suffer both at once, things both very unsuitable to heaven. Mindfulness of God is the living spring of all holy and pleasant affections and deportments towards him; sets all the wheels a going; makes the souls as the chariots of Aminadab. These wheels have their eyes also, are guided by mind, by an intellectual principle. Knowing, intelligent beings (as we also are by participation and according to our measure) so act mutually towards one another. We cannot move towards God but with an open eye, seeing him and our way towards him. If we close our eyes we stand still, or blindly run another course, we know not, whither. All sin is darkness, whether it be neglect of good, or doing of evil: its way is a way of darkness; as a course of holy motion is walking in the light. Our shutting our eyes towards God creates that darkness; surrounds us with a darkness comprehensive of all sin. Now is every thing of enjoined duty waived, and any evil done, that sinful nature prompts us to. Well might it be said, u He that sinneth hath not seen God. When we have made ourselves this darkness, we fall of course under Satan's empire, and are presently within his dominions. He is the prince of darkness, and can rule us now at his will. Perishing lost souls are such as in whom the god of this world hath blinded their minds.—To open their eyes, and turn them from darkness to light, is, to turn them also from the power of Satan unto God. What a hell of wickedness are we brought into, in the twinkling of an eye! . We are without God in the world, as if a man wink, though at noon-day he hath as it were put out the sun, 'tis with him as if there were no such thing. When we have banished God out of our sight and forgotten him, 'tis with us as if there were no God. If such a state grow habitual to us, (as we know every sinful aversion of our eye from God tends thereto,) what wickedness is there that will not lurk in this darkness 1 How often in Scripture is forgetting God used as a character, yea, as a paraphrase, a full, though summary expression of sin in general! as if the wickedness, the malignity, the very hell itself of sin, were wholly included (and not connoted only) here. Now consider this, (after so dreadful an enumeration, so black a catalogue,) all that forget God. And (as deep calleth to deep, one hell to another,) f The wicked shall be turned into hell, and all the people that forget God. That heap, that mass of wickedness, of pride, of persecution, cursing, blasphemy, 'deceit, and mischief, al! meet in one that hath not God in all his thoughts.

But who is so hardy to look the holy God in the face, and sin against him! What an astonishment is it, when he watches over present sin, or brings forth former sins out of secret darkness, and sets them in the light of his countenance! Who that understands any thing of the nature and majesty of God, dare call him for a witness of his sinning! The worst of men would find themselves under some restraint, could they but obtain of themselves, to sit down sometimes, and solemnly think of God. Much more would it prove an advantage to them, (whom I most intend,) such as sin within the nearer call and reach of mercy; that sin not to the utmost latitude; even such as lead the strictest lives, and are seldomer found to transgress. Are not their sins wont to begin with forgetting God? Did they eye God more, would they not sin less frequently, and with greater regret You his saints, that have made a covenant with him by sacrifice, that profess the greatest love and devoledness to him, and seem willing yourselves to become sacrifices, and lay down your lives for his sake; what, is it a harder thing to give him a look, a thought! or is it not too common a thing, without necessity, (and then not without injury,) to withhold these from him 1 Let us bethink ourselves, are not the principal distempers of our spirits, and disorders yet observable m our lives, to be referred hither 1 As to enjoined services; what should we venture on omissions, if we had God in our eye 1 or serve him with so declining, backward hearts 1 Should we dare to let pass a day, in the even whereof we might write down, Nothing done for God this day 1 Or should we serve him as a hard master, with sluggish, despondent spirits 1 The apostle forbids servants to serve with eye-service, as men-pleasers; meaning they should eye men less, and God more. Sure, as to him, our service is not enough eye-service. We probably eye men more than we should; but we do not eye him enough. Hence such hanging of hands, such feebleness of knees, such laziness and indifferency, so little of an active zeal and laborious diligence, so little fervency of spirit in serving the Lord. Hence also such an aversion to hazardous services, such fear of attempting any thing (though never so apparent important duty) that may prove costly, or hath danger in it. We look not to him that is invisible. And as to forbidden things; should we be so proud, so passionate, so earthly, so sensual, if we had God more in view? should we so much seek ourselves, and indulge our own wills and humours, drive a design with such solicitude and intention of mind for our private interests? Should we walk at such a latitude, and more consult our own inclination than our rule, allow ourselves in so much vanity of conversation, did we mind God as we ought? And do we not sensibly punish ourselves in this neglect? What a dismal chaos is this world while we see not God in it! To live destitute of a Divine presence, to discern no beam of the heavenly glory; to go up and down day by day, and perceive nothing of God, no glimmering, no appearance; this is disconsolate as well as sinful darkness. What can we make of creatures, what of the daily events of Providence, if we see not in them the glory of a Deity; if we do not contemplate and adore the Divine wisdom, power, and goodness, diffused every where? Our practical atheism, and in observance of God, make the world become to us the region and shadow of death, states us as among ghosts and spectres, makes all things look with a ghastly face, imprints death upon every thing we see, encircles us with gloomy, dreadful shades, and with uncomfortable apparitions. To behold the tragical spectacles always in view, the violent lusts, the rapine and rage of some, the calamitous sufferings, the miseries and ruins of others; to hear every corner resounding with the insultations of the oppressor, and the mournful groans of the oppressed; what a painful continuing death were it to be in the world without God! At the best, all things were but a vanishing scene, an image seen in the dark. The creation a thing the fashion whereof were passing away, the whole contexture and system of Providence were mere confusion, without the least concinnity or order; religion an acknowledged trifle, a mere mockery! What, to wink ourselves into so much darkness and desolation, and by sealing up our eyes against the Divine light and glory, to confirm so formidable miseries upon our own souls! How dreadfully shall we herein revenge our own folly, in nullifying him to ourselves, who is the all in all! Sure there is little of heaven in all this! But if now we open our eyes upon that all-comprehending glory, apply them to a steady intuition of God, how heavenly a life shall we then live in the world! To have God always in view, as the director and end of all our actions; to make our eye crave leave of God, to consult him ere we adventure upon any thing, and implore his guidance and blessing; upon all occasions to direct our prayers to him and look up, to make our eye wait his commanding look, ready to receive all intimations of his will; this is an angelic life. To be as those ministers of his that are always ready to do his pleasure; to make our eye do him homage, and express our dependence and trust; to approve ourselves in every thing to him, and act as always in his presence, observing still how his eye observes us, and exposing ourselves willingly to its inspection and search, contented always he should see through and through us; surely there is much of heaven in this life; so we should endeavour to live here. I cannot omit to give you this instruction in the words of a heathen. 'We ought, (saith he) so to live, as always within view, order our cogitations as if some one might or can look into the very inwards of our breast. For to what purpose is it, to hide any thing from man? from God nothing can be hid; he is continually present to our spirits, and fomes amidst our inmost thoughts, &c. This is to walk in the light, amidst a serene, placid, mild light, that infuses no unquiet thoughts, admits no guilty fears, nothing that can disturb or annoy us. To eye God in all our comforts, and observe the smiling aspects of his face, when he dispenses them to us; to eye him in all our afflictions, and consider the paternal wisdom that instructs us in them; how would this increase our mercies, and mitigate our troubles! To eye him in all his creatures, and observe the various prints of the Creator's glory stamped upon them; with how lively a lustre would it clothe the world, and make every thing look with a pleasant face! What a heaven were it to look upon God, as filling all in all! and how sweetly would it, ere-while, raise our souls into some such sweet seraphic strains, Holy, holy,—the whole earth is full of his glory! To eye him in his providences, and consider how all events are with infinite wisdom disposed into an apt subserviency to his holy will and ends; what difficulties would hence be solved! what seeming inconsistencies reconciled! and how much would it contribute to the ease and quiet of our minds! To eye him in his Christ, the express image of his person, the brightness of his glory; and in the Christian economy, the gospel revelation and ordinances, through which he manifests himself; to behold him in the posture wherein he saves souls, clad with the garments of salvation, girt with power, and apparelled with love, travelling in the greatness of his strength, mighty to save: to view him addressing himself to allure and win to him the hearts of sinners, when he discovers himself in Christ, upon that reconciling design, makes grace that brings salvation appear, teaching to deny ungodliness, &c. to behold him entering into human flesh, pitching his tabernacle among men, hanging out his ensigns of peace, laying his trains, spreading his net, the cords of a man, the bands of love: to see him in his Christ, ascending the cross, lifted up to draw all men to him; and consider that mighty love of justice and of souls, both so eminently conspicuous in that stupendous sacrifice; here to fix our eyes looking to Jesus, and beholding him whom we have pierced: to see his power and glory, as they were wont to be seen in his sanctuaries; to observe him in the solemnities of his worship, and the graceful postures wherein he holds communion with his saints, when he seats himself amidst them on the throne of grace, receives their addresses, dispenses the tokens and pledges of his love: into what transports might these visions put us every day!

Let us then stir, up our drowsy souls, open our heavy eyes, and turn them upon God, inure and habituate them to a constant view of his (yet veiled) face, that we may not see him only by casual glances, but as those that seek his face, and make it our business to gain a thorough knowledge of him. But let us remember, that all our present visions of God must aim at a further conformity to him; they must design imitation, not the satisfying of curiosity: our looking must not therefore be an inquisitive, busy prying into the unrevealed things of God. Carefully abstain from such over-bold presumptuous looks. But remember, we are to eye God as our pattern. Wherein he is to be so, he hath plainly enough revealed and proposed himself to us. And consider, this is the pattern, both to which we ought and to which we shall be conformed, if we make it our business; so will sense of duty and hope of success concur to fix our eye and keep it steady. Especially, let us endeavour to manage and guide our eye aright, in beholding him, that our sight of him may most effectually subserve this design of being like him; and herein nothing will be more conducive, than that our looks be qualified with—reverence, and—love.

1. Let them be reverential looks. "We shall never be careful to imitate a despised pattern, or that we think meanly of. When this is the intimate sense of our soul, Who is a God like unto thee in holiness 1 there is none holy as the Lord: this will set our powers on work; such sights will command and over-awe our souls into conformity to him. Subjects have sometimes affected to imitate the very imperfections and deformities of their adored prince. Let us greatness our thoughts of God. Look to him with a submissive, adoring eye. Let every look import worship and subjection. Who can stand before apprehended sovereign maiesty with such a temper of soul as shall signify an affront to it? This will make every thing as suitable to God, yield and render our souls susceptible of all divine and holy impressions.

2. Let them be friendly and (as far as may consist with that reverence) amorous looks. 'Tis natural to affect and endeavour likeness to them we love. Let love always sit in pur eye, and inspirit it; the will represent God always amiable, will infinitely commend us to his nature and attributes, and even ravish us into his likeness. The loving spouse often glories to wear her beloved husband's picture on her breast. The love of God will much more make us affect to bear his image in our hearts. His law is a true representation of him, and love is the fulfilling of that law, an exemplification of it in ourselves. Love will never enter a quarrel, nor admit of any disagreement with God. His more terrible appearances will be commendable in the eye of love. It thinks no evil. But so interprets and comments upon his severer aspects, whether through his law or providence, as to judge all amiable, and frame the soul to an answerable deportment.

2. In this way then let us endeavour a growing conformity unto God. It hath been much (and not unnecessarily) inculcated already, that the blessedness of the righteous hereafter, doth not consist merely in beholding an external, objective glory, but in being also glorified. They are happy by a participated glory; by being made like God, as well as seeing his glorious likeness; whereby the constitution of their spirits is changed and reduced to that excellent, harmonious, agreeable temper, that holy composure and peaceful state, from which blessedness is inseparable. As far as we are capable of blessedness in this world, it must be so with us here. Glory without us will not make us happy in heaven; much less will any thing without us make us happy on earth. 'Tis an idle dream, of sickly, crazy minds, that their blessedness consists in some external good, that is separable and distant from them; which therefore as they blindly guess, they uncertainly pursue; never aiming to become good, without which they can never know what it is to be blessed What felicity are men wont to imagine to themselves in this or that change of their outward condition! were their state such orsuch, then they were happy, and should desire no more. As the child's fancy suggests to it, if it were on the top of such a hill, it could touch the heavens, but when with much toil it hath got thither, it finds itself as far off as before. We have a shorter and more compendious way to it, would we allow ourselves to understand it. A right temper of mind involves blessedness in itself; 'tis this only change we need to endeavour. We wear out our days in vanity and misery, while we neglect this work, and busy ourselves to catch a fugitive shadow, that hovers about us. It can never be well, till our own souls be a heaven to us, and blessedness be a domestic, a home dwelling inhabitant there. Till we get a settled principle of holy quietude into our own breasts, and become the sons of peace, with whom the peace of God may find entrance and abode; till we have that treasure within us, that may render us insensible of any dependence on a foreign good, or fear of a foreign evil. Shall that be the boast and glory of a philosopher only, I carry all my goods with me wherever I go 1 and that, A virtuous, good man, is liable to no hurt 11i Seneca thinks "they discover a low spirit, that say, externals can add any thing (though but a very little) to the felicity of an honest mind; as if (saith he) men could not be content with the light of the sun without the help of a candle or a spark." And speaking of the constancy of the virtuous man, (saith he,) " They do ill that say, such an evil is tolerable to him, such a one intolerable, and that confine the greatness of his mind within certain bounds and limits. Adversity (he tells us) overcomes us, if it be not wholly overcome. Epicurus, (saith he,) the very patron of your sloth, acknowledges yet, that unhappy events can seldom disturb the mind of a virtuous person, (and he adds,) how had he almost uttered, the voice of a man! I pray, (saith he,) speak out a little more boldly, and say he is above them altogether."° Such apprehensions the more virtuous heathens have had of the efficacy and defensative power of moral goodness, however defective their notion might be of the thing itself. Hence Socrates the pagan martyr is reported to have cried out, (when those persons were persecuting him to death,) Anytus and Meletus can kill me, but they cannot hurt me. And Anaxarchus the philosopher, having sharply reprov'd Nicocreon, and being by him ordered to be beaten to death with iron mallets. bids, Strike on, strike on, thou mayest (saith he) » break in pieces this vessel of Anaxarchus, but Anaxarchus himself thou canst not touch.

Shall Christianity here confess itself outvied? Shall we, to the reproach of our religion, yield the day to pagan morality, and renew the occasion of the ancient complaint, 'that the faith of Christians is out-done by the teathen, infidelity? It is, I remember, the challenge of Cicilius in Minutius. " There is Socrates (saith he) the prince of wisdom, whosoever of you Christians is great enough to attempt it, let him imitate him if he can." Methinks we should be ambitious to tell the world in our lives, (for Christians should live great things, not speak them,) that a greater than Socrates is here: to let them see in us our represented pattern: to show forth higher virtues than those of Socrates; even his, who hath called us out of darkness into his glorious and marvellous light. Certain it is, that the sacred oracles of the gospel set before us a more excellent pattern, and speak things not less magnificent, but much more modest and perspicuous; with less pomp of words they give us a much clearer account of a far more excellent temper of mind, and prescribe the direct and certain way of attaining it. (Do but view over the many passages of Scripture occasionally glanced at, Chap. 7.) But we grope as in the dark for blessedness; we stumble at noon-day as in the night, and wander as if we had no eyes; we mistake our business, and lay the scene of a happy state at a great distance from us, in things which we cannot reach, and which if we could it were to little purpose.

Not to speak of greater sensualists, (whom at present I have less in my eye,) is there not a more refined sort of persons, that neglecting the great business of inspecting, and labouring to better and improve their spirits, are wholly taken up about the affairs of another sphere; that are more solicitous for better times, for a better world, than better spirits; that seem to think that all the happiness they are capable of on earth, is bound up in this or that external state of things 1 Not that the care of all public concernments should be laid aside; least of all, a just solicitude for the church's welfare: but that should not be pretended, when our own interest is the one thing with us. And when we are really solicitous about the church's interests, we should state them aright. God designs the afflictions of his people for their spiritual good, therefore that is a much greater good, than their exemption from suffering these evils; otherwise his means should cat up his end, and be more expensive than that will countervail; which were an imprudence no man of tolerable discretion 'would be guilty of. We should desire the outward prosperity of Sion, for it is a real good; but inasmuch as it hath in it the goodness, not of an end, but only (and that but sometimes neither) of a means; not a constant, but a mutual goodness; not a principal, but a lesser subordinate goodness; we must not desire it absolutely, nor chiefly, but with submissive limited desires. If our hearts are grieved to hear of the sufferings of the church of God in the world, but not of their sins; if we more sensibly regret, at any time, the persecutions and oppressions they undergo, than their spiritual distempers, their earthliness, pride, cold love to God, fervent animosities towards each other; it speaks an uninstructed carnal mind. We take no right measure of the interests of religion, or the church's welfare, and do most probably mistake ourselves as much in our judging of our own; and measure theirs by our own mistaken model.

And this is the mischievous cheat many put upon their own souls, and would obtrude too often upon others too; that overlooking the great design of the gospel, to transform men's spirits and change them into the Divine likeness, they think 'tis religion enough to espouse a party, and adopt an opinion; and then vogue themselves friends to religion according to the measure of their zeal for their own party or opinion; and give a very pregnant proof of that zeal, by magnifying or inveighing against the times, according as they favour or frown upon their empty, unspirited religion. It being indeed such (a secret consciousness whereof they herein bewray) as hath no other life in it, than what it owes to external favour and countenance. And therefore all public rebukes are justly apprehended mortal to it; whereas that substantial religion that adequately answers the design, and is animated by the spirit of the gospel, possesses the souls of them that own it, with a secure confidence, that it can live in any times, and hold their souls in life also. Hence they go on their way with a free unsolicitous cheerfulness, enjoying silently in their own bosoms that repose and rest which naturally results from a sound and well-composed temper of spirit. They know their happiness depends upon nothing without them. That they hold it by a better tenure than that of the world's courtesy, 'they can be quiet in the midst of storms, and abound in the want of all things. They can in patience possess their own souls, and in them a vital spring of true pleasure, when they are driven out of all other possessions. They know the living sense of these words, That the good man is satisfied from himself: That to be spiritually-minded is life and peace: That nothing can harm them that are followers of the good: That the way to see good days, is to keep their tongues from evil, and their lips from speaking guile, to depart from evil and do good, to seek peace and pursue it. They cannot live in bad times; they carry that about them that will make the worst days good to them. Surely they can never be happy in the best times, that cannot be so in any. Outward prosperity is quite besides the purpose to a distempered soul; when nothing else troubles, it will torment itself. Besides, we cannot command at pleasure the benign aspects of the world, the smiles of the times; we may wait a life's-time, and still find the same adverse posture of things towards us from without. What dotage is it to place our blessedness in something to us impossible, that lies wholly out of our power; and in order whereto we have nothing to do, but sit down and wish; and either faintly hope, or ragingly despair 1 We cannot change times and seasons, nor alter the course of the world, create new heavens and new earth. Would we not think ourselves mocked, if God should command us these things in order to our being happy 1 'Tis not our business, these are not the affairs of our own province (blessed be God 'tis not so large) further than as our bettering ourselves may conduce thereto, and this is that which we may do and ought, 'tis our proper work, in obedience and subordination to God as his instruments, to govern and cultivate our own spirits, to intend the affairs of that his kingdom in us, (where we are his authorized viceroys,) that consists in righteousness, and peace, and joy in the Holy Ghost. We can be benign to ourselves, if the world be not so to us; cherish and adorn our inward man; that though the outward man be exposed daily to perish, (which we cannot help, and therefore it concerns us not to take thought about it,) the inward may be renewed day by day. We can take care that our souls may prosper, that through our constant neglect they be not left to languish and pine away in their own iniquities. They may be daily fed with the heavenly hidden manna, arid with the fruits of the paradise of God; they may enjoy at home a continual feast, and with a holy freedom luxuriate in divine pleasures, the joys wherewith the strangers intermeddle not, if we be not unpropitious and unkind to ourselves.

And would we know wherein that sound and happy complexion of spirit lies, that hath so much of heaven in it: 'Tis a present gradual participation of the Divine likeness. It consists in being conformed to God; 'tis, as the moralist tells us, If one would give a short compendious model of it, such a temper of mind as becomes

God; or to give an account of it in his own words who prescribes it, and who is himself the highest pattern of this blessed frame, 'Tis to be transformed in the renewing of our minds, so as to be able to prove what is the good, and perfect, and acceptable will of God; that is, experimentally to find it in ourselves, impressed and wrought into our own spirits, so as to have the complacential relish and savour of its goodness, excellency, and pleasantness diffused through our souls. Where remember, this was written to such as were supposed saints; whence it must be understood, of a continued progressive transformation, a renewing of the inward man day by day (as is the apostle's expression elsewhere.) 'Tis a more perfect reception of the impress of God, revealing himself in the gospel; the growth and tendency of the new creature, begotten unto the eternal blessedness, towards its mature and most perfect state and stature in the fruition thereof.

And 'tis this I am now pressing; inasmuch as some account hath been already given (according as we can now imperfectly guess at it, and spell it out) what the constitution of the holy soul is in its glorified state, when it perfectly partakes the Divine likeness; that when we find in ourselves any principles and first elements of that blessed frame, we would endeavour the gradual improvement thereof, and be making towards that perfection. This therefore being our present work, let it be remembered wherein this participated likeness of God hath been said to consist, and labour now the nearest approach to that pitch and state. Your measures must be taken from what is most perfect, come now as near it as you can, and as that pagan's advise is; k" If yet thou art not Socrates, however, live as one that would fain be Socrates." Though yet thou art not perfect, live as one that aims at it, and would be so. Only it must be considered, that the conformity to God, of our present state, is in extent larger and more comprehensive than that of our future; though it be unspeakably less perfect in degree. For there is no moral excellency (that we have any present knowledge of) belonging to our glorified state, which is not in some degree necessarily to be found in saints on earth. But there are some things which the exigency of our present state makes necessary to us here, which will not be so in the state of glory; repentance, faith, as it respects the Mediator, in order to our future happiness; patience of injuries, pity to the distressed, &c. These things, and whatsoever else, whose objects cease, must be understood to cease with them. In short, here is requisite all that moral good which concerns both our end and way; there, what concerns our end only.

Yet is the whole compass of that gracious frame of spirit, requisite in this our present state, all comprehended in conformity to God. Partly, inasmuch as some of these graces which will cease hereafter in their exercise, as not having objects to draw them forth into act, have their pattern in some communicable attributes of God, which will cease also, as to their denomination and exercise; their objects then ceasing too, as his patience towards sinners, his mercy to the miserable. Partly inasmuch as other of those graces now required in us, though they correspond to nothing in God that is capable of the same name, as faith in a Saviour, repentance of sin, (which can have no place in God,) they yet answer to something in his nature, that goes under other names; and is the reason wherefore he requires such things in us. He hath in his nature that faithfulness and all-sufficient fulness, that challenges our faith; and that hatred of sin, which challenges our repentance for it, having been guilty of it. His very nature obliges him to require those things from us, the state of our case being considered. So that the sum even of our present duty lies in receiving this entire impression of the Divine likeness (in some part invariably and eternally necessary to us, in some part necessary with respect to our present state/) And herein is our present blessedness also involved. If therefore we have any design to better our condition in point of blessedness, it must be our business to endeavour after a fuller participation of that likeness, in all the particulars it comprehends. You can pitch your thoughts upon no part of it, which hath not an evident direct tendency to the repose and rest of your spirits. I shall commend only some few instances, that you may see how little reason and inducement a soul conformed to the holy will of God, hath to seek its comforts and contents elsewhere. Faith corresponds to the truth of God, as it respects divine revelations. How pleasant is it to give up our understandings to the conduct of so safe a guide; to the view of so admirable things as he reveals! It corresponds to his goodness, as it respects its offers. How delectable is it to be filling an empty soul from the Divine fullness. What pleasure attends the exercise of this faith towards the person of the Mediator, viewing him in all his glorious excellencies, receiving him in all his gracious communications by this eye and hand. How pleasant is it to exercise it in reference to another world! living by it in a daily prospect of eternity; in reference to this world, to live without care in a cheerful dependance on him that hath undertaken to care for us!

Repentance is that by which we become like the holy God; to whom our sin hath made us most unlike before. How sweet are kindly relentings, penitential tears, and the return of the soul to its God, and to a right mind! And who can conceive the ravishing pleasures of love to God! wherein we not only imitate, but ultimately unite with him who is love itself. How pleasant to let our souls dissolve here, and flow into the ocean, the element of love! Our fear corresponds to his excellent greatness. And is not (as it is part of the new creature in us) a tormenting servile passion, but a due respectfulness and observance of God; and there is no mean pleasure in that holy awful seriousness unto which it composes and forms our spirits. Our humility, as it respects him, answers his high excellency; as it respects our own inferiors, his gracious condescension. How pleasant is it to fall before him! And how connatural and agreeable to a good spirit, to stoop low, upon any occasion to do good! Sincerity is a most God-like excellency; an imitation of his truth, as grounded in his all-sufficiency; which sets him above the necessity or possibility of any advantage by collusion or deceit; and corresponds to his omniscieny and heart-searching eye. It heightens a man's spirit to a holy and generous boldness; makes him apprehend it beneath him to do an unworthy, dishonest action, that should need a palliation, or a concealment.<sup>i</sup> And gives him the continual pleasure of self-approbation to God, whom he chiefly studies and desires to please. Patience, a prime glory of the Divine Majesty, continues a man's possession of his own soul, his liberty, his dominion of himself. He is (if he can suffer nothing) a slave to his vilest and most sordid passions at home, his own base fear, and brutish anger, and effeminate grief, and to any man's lusts and humours besides that he apprehends can do him hurt. It keeps a man's soul in a peaceful calm, delivers him from (that most unnatural) self-torment, defeats the impotent malice of his most implacable enemy, who fain would vex him, but cannot. Justice, the great attribute of the judge of all the earth, as such; so far as the impression of it takes place among men, preserves the common peace of the world, and the private peace of each man in his own bosom, so that the former be not disturbed by doing of mutual injuries, nor the latter by the conscience of having done them. The brotherly love of fellow-Christians; the impression of that special love, which God bears to them all, admits them into one another's bosoms, and all the endearments and pleasures of a mutual communion. Love to enemies, the express image of our heavenly Father; by which we appear his children, begotten of him; overcomes evil by goodness, blunts the double edge of revenge; at least the sharper edge; (which is always towards the author of it;) secures ourselves from wounding impressions and resentments; turns keen anger into gentle pity; and substitutes mild pleasant forgiveness, in the room of the much uneasier thoughts and study of retaliation. Mercifulness toward the distressed, as our Father in heaven is merciful, heaps blessing upon our souls, and evidences our title to what we are to live by, the Divine mercy. A universal benignity and propension to do good to all: an imitation of the immense, diffusive goodness of God, is but kindness to ourselves, rewards itself by that greater pleasure is in giving than in receiving; and associates us with God in the blessedness of this work, as well as in the disposition to it; who exercises loving-kindness in the earth, because he delighteth therein.

Here are some of the things wherein consists than our conformity to the Divine nature and will, which is proper to our present state. And now, who can estimate the blessedness of such a soul! Can (in a word) the state of that soul be unhappy that is full of the Holy Ghost, full of love, joy, peace, long-suffering, gentleness, goodness, faith, meekness, temperance, those blessed fruits of that blessed Spirit! Blessedness is con-naturalized unto this soul; every thing doth its part, and all conspire to make it happy. This soul is a temple, a habitation of holiness. Here dwells a Deity in his glory. 'Tis a paradise, a garden of God. Here he walks and converses daily, delighted with its fragrant fruitfulness. He that hath those things and aboundeth, is not barren or unfruitful in the knowledge of our Lord and Saviour Jesus: he is the sun, and the knowledge of him the quickening beams that cherish and ripen these fruits. But the soul that lacketh these things is a desert, a habitation of devils. Here is stupid, disconsolate infidelity, inflexible obstinacy and resolvedness for hell, hatred and contempt of the Sovereign Majesty; whom yet, its secret misgiving thoughts tell it, will be too hard for it at last. Here is swollen pride and giddy vain-glory, disguised hypocrisy and pining envy, raging wrath and ravenous avarice, with what you can imagine besides, leading to misery and desolation.

You have then some prospect of a happy temper of spirit. It can now be no difficulty to you, to frame an idea of it in your thoughts, to get a notional image (or this likeness in the notion of it) into your minds; but that will avail you little, if you have not the real image also; that is, your spirits really fashioned and formed according thereto: if having the knowledge of these things, (as the pagan moralist's expression, before mentioned, is of virtuous rules and precepts,) they become not habitual to you, and your spirits be not transfigured in them. But now, I treat with such as are supposed to have some such real impressions, that they may be stirred up to endeavour a further perfecting of them. In order whereto, I shall add but this two-fold advice:

1. Be very careful that this living image (such you have been formerly told it is) may grow equally in every part. See that the impression of this likeness be entire, that it be not a maimed thing; if it be, God will never own it as his production. Integrity is the glory of a Christian; to be entire, lacking nothing. This is the soundness of heart that excludes a blushing consciousness and misgiving, exempts it from the fear of a shameful discovery. " Let my heart be sound in thy statutes, is paraphrased, by having respect to all God's commandments; to which is opposite, that being » partial in the law, spoken of by the prophet, by way of complaint concerning the priests of that time. A thing hateful in the eye of God, and as uncomfortable to ourselves, as to be without a leg or an arm. And see that it be preserved entire by a proportional and uniform growth, that fresh life and motion may daily appear in every limb of this heavenly new creature. How odious a deformity is it, when a show of moral virtues excludes godliness: And how much more odious (inasmuch as there is more impudent falsehood in it, and more dishonourable reflection upon God) when under a high pretence of godliness, any shall allow themselves in visible immorality 1 What, to be oppressive, envious, contentious, deceitful, proud, turbulent, wrathful, morose, malicious, fretful, and peevish, and yet a Christian! What serious person, that shall have no fairer representation of Christianity than such do give, would not be ready to say rather, If this be Christian religion, give me honest paganism? A Christian that hath received the proper, uniform, entire impress of the gospel of Christ, is the most meek, mild, calm, harmless thing in the world Never mention so venerable a name, if you will not be very jealous of the honour of it. Will you give God occasion to charge you, Wretch, I never had had this dishonour, if thou hadst never been called a Christian; thou art a Christian to no purpose, or to very bad; it does thee no good, and it injures me 1 But (which is more directly considerable as to our present purpose) the neglect and consequent decay of any gracious principle, infers a languor, a consumption and enfeeblement of all. Any such perverse disposition doth not affect that part only, is not only an impairment to the contrary gracious principle, but (as a cancer in some exterior part of the body) it gradually creeps up till it invade the vitals. Can the love of God live and grow in an unquiet, angry, uncharitable breast 1 Consider Jam. i. 26. 1 John iii. 17.

2. Be constantly intent upon this business of spiritual growth. Mind it as a design, make a solemn purposed business of it, your great daily business. You do not till your ground by chance, as a casual thing; but you do it industriously, and of set purpose. The apostle speaking of his own method of pursuing conformity to Christ, tells us, Phe did, in comparison, count all things else loss and dog's meat; he threw every thing else aside. Then next he recounts with himself, how far short he was; i not as if I had already attained, &c. (where by the way he intimates, that to stand still, and give over further endeavours, implies that gross absurdity, as if we thought ourselves to have attained already, to be already perfect; are we not ashamed to seem so conceited of ourselves 1) and then, ' still as he did attain in this pursuit he forgot what was behind; and held on his course with fresh and constant vigour, still reaching forth and pressing onward towards his designed mark.

In this great business we, alas! seem to dream. He that hath been observed ten or twenty years ago to be proud, and covetous, or passionate, still remains so, and we apprehend not the incongruity of it. What, always learning, and yet never come to the knowledge of the truth as it is in Jesus, to the putting off the old man, and putting on the new 1 Who would meddle with any profession upon such terms, to be always doing and yet to do nothing 1 Surely it must be imputed to this, we design not, we do not seriously intend the perfecting of holiness, to make a real progress in our way and work, and to get still nearer heaven, as we draw nearer to the end of our days on earth. We too contentedly confine ourselves within certain limits, and aim not, as we should, at a spiritual excellency. This is the temper of many that have long trodden the path of (at least an external) religion; they will go but their own pace, and that within a self-prescribed round or circle. They perform their stated task of religious exercises, and shun the grosser vices of the time; and resolve never to go higher: much like the character that was once given to a great man,<sup>1</sup> that he followed not the more eminent virtues, and yet that he hated vice. And 'tis a true censure that a ' barbarian is said to have given of that middle temper, that dull indifferency: What is equally distant from being the matter either of praise or punishment, is upon no terms to be accounted a virtue. At least, we drive not on a design of growth and self-improvement in our spiritual states with that constancy we ought; we are off and on , our spirits are not steadily intent u we are unstable as water, how can we excel 1 God hath not put us, sure, upon so fruitless a task, wherein our utmost labour and diligence shall profit nothing. Therefore strive more vigorously, and pray with more earnest importunity. Consider and plead it with God, that he hath set before thee the hope of such a state, wherein thou art to be perfectly like him; and shalt thou (that must hereafter be like God) be now like a clod of earth 1 Thou art now a child begotten of him; and though thou art yet in the minority, yet may not somewhat be spared out of so fair an estate, hereafter designed for thee, as that thou mayst now live worthy of such a Father, and suitable to thy expected inheritance.

3. And now, a contented, satisfied temper of spirit, as I have told you, results from the other two; and will therefore follow, of course, upon growing knowledge of God, and conformity to him, as the latter of these also doth upon the former. Yea, 'tis a part of our conformity to God; but a part consequent to the impression of the things mentioned under the former head, as knowledge also is a part previous and antecedent thereto. 'Tis in the state of glory we see something superadded. The likeness impressed is pre-supposed; satisfaction follows thereupon. The case is so too in our present state; contentment is spoken of as a thing consequent and superadded; godliness with contentment. A satisfied contented spirit, when 'tis the result of godliness, (of the Divine image impressed,) is indeed great gain. Yet as to this I shall only say these two things.

1. Be distinct and explicit in the proposal of it as an end. Religion doth not brutify men, but make men more rational. Its business is to guide them to blessedness. It must, therefore, pitch their eyes upon it, as the mark and end they are to aim at, and hold them intent there. 'Tis ingenuous and honourable to God, that we should expressly avow it. We come to him for satisfaction to our spirits, not knowing whither else to apply ourselves. We turn our eyes upon him, we lay open our souls to receive impressions from him, for this very end. This is an explicit acknowledgment of him as God, our highest sovereign good.

2. Actually apply and accommodate divine visions and communications to this purpose. Say, " O my soul, now come, solace thyself in this appearance of God; come, take thy allowed pleasure in such exertions of God, as thou dost now experience in thyself." Recount thy happiness; think how great it is, how rich thou art; on purpose that thy spirit may grow more daily into a satisfied, contented frame. Often bethink thyself, What is the great God doing for me, that he thus reveals and imparts himself to my soul 1 O how great things do those present pledges pre-signify to me that thou mayst still more and more like thy portion, and account it fallen in pleasant places, so as never to seek satisfaction in things of another kind; though thou must still continue expecting and desiring more of the same kind. And remember to this purpose, there cannot be a greater participation of the misery of hell before-hand, than a discontented spirit perpetually restless and weary of itself; nor of the blessedness of heaven, than in a well-pleased, satisfied, contented frame of spirit.

A Noticeable Feature Of Cocceius's Account Of Both Eternal Punishment & Eternal Glory Is That He Spoke Repeatedly In Terms Of Steps & Degrees Structural Elements In The Eschatology Of Johannes Cocceius

Calvin Theological Journal 34 (1999) 76-104

Cocceius further saw this period of worldwide peace for the church as an overture to the Parousia, the resurrection of all the dead, and the Last Judgment.<sup>64</sup> This resurrection of the dead is, moreover, the last abrogation of the covenant of works. He regarded this resurrection not only as an individual, personal occurrence, but also interpreted it salvation- historically. Preceding the last bodily resurrection, Cocceius distinguished, namely, a twofold spiritual resurrection (resurrectio spiritualis duplex), related to certain events in salvation history. The first spiritual resurrection related to the conversion of the Jews through the proclamation of the gospel. The second was the restoration of the world, which is subject to error and decay. The bodily resurrection would involve more than the pious. In accordance with tradition, Cocceius also spoke of the resurrection of the godless for judgment. Their eternal punishment would be in accordance with the threats of the covenant of works and would be undergone consciously and bodily. A noticeable feature of Cocceius's account of both the eternal punishment and the eternal glory is that he spoke repeatedly in terms of steps and degrees. (Note: see SD, §645-47; this gradation was fairly standard in the seventeenth century. Cocceius, however, stressed the fact that there will also be degrees in punishment. SD, §647: "Sunt & in poena gradus, Luc. 12.47. Vapulabit multis, paucis.")

It is finally worth mentioning in this regard how much attention Cocceius gave to the question of the meaning of the statement in 1 Corinthians 15:24-28 about the Son's handing over of the kingdom to the Father.

Cocceius's notion of degrees of glory, already mentioned earlier, should not be understood in terms of the merit of good works but rather as pertaining to the fruits of righteousness that each has brought forth during his or her lifetime. Therefore, the light of those who have brought many to righteousness will shine most brightly at the resurrection. This gradation is at the same time the manifestation of God's many-shaded wisdom.

Commentary on First Corinthians 15

Ver. 37. And if thou requires a more particular account, whether it be the same or another body, or whether it shall be any better after the resurrection than before, consider again that which thou sowest, whether when that is raised and springs up, it be not the same substance, and whether it be not much improved in qualities or no. Now the seed-corn which thou sowest and throwest into the earth, is not that body as to its form that shall be raised and spring up from it, the seed is but bare and naked grain, it may chance a corn of wheat, or of some other grain which is threshed and winnowed till its straw and chaff and all its coverings be taken clean off, like unto the dead body, when it is put into the grave, which is stripped of all its beauty and ornamental additions; but as well the naked corn as the body shall be raised up, and restored again in a far more comely and excellent form, the substance still remaining the very same.

Ver. 38. Which will plainly appear by pursuing the comparison, for the corn indeed is put into the ground naked and bare; But God, the first cause of this natural, as well as of the supernatural resurrection, He, I say, giveth it a body far more glorious, and better adorned with straw, ears, and other florid coverings, even As It hath pleased Him, as well to defend as to beautify it, and make it more fit to stand in that field where it must ripen. Yet though the corn be thus guarded and adorned, no man will say it is another sort of corn, for God gives to every sort of grain, And To every single seed of every sort, Its own proper body, so that wheat produces wheat, and the corn in the ear is of the same substance with that in the earth, only much improved in the form: even so the body, after the resurrection, is the same with that which was put in the grave, but freed from all its defects, and made far more glorious by God's almighty power, who doubtless will take as much care to repair and restore us, as he doth to raise up the corn which he only restores for our sakes.

Ver. 39. But we must not stretch this similitude too far, for though every sort of corn produces all its shoots of the same kind, yet we must not infer from thence, that because all bodies of men are alike when they are laid into the grave, therefore all, both good and bad, shall be alike when they are raised; for God can out of the same matter make great variety of forms. In the first creation there was but one sort of matter to make all creatures out of: and yet all flesh, which is the subject of the resurrection, and so the fittest instance here, is not the same flesh, though made out of the same matter; but there is one kind of flesh of men, which is most excellent, another flesh of beasts, another of fishes, and another of birds, which are of a meaner sort, yet each of them distinct from the other: even so out of the same matter of corrupted bodies, God shall make great difference between the righteous and the wicked in the resurrection, and they that see the diversity of forms among living creatures here cannot well doubt but God is able to make the like variety hereafter.

Ver. 40. And first to set out the difference that shall be between the bodies we have now and those we shall have then, and between the bodies of the good and the bad at the resurrection; you may consider there is not only variety among earthly things compared one with another, but there are also far greater differences between celestial bodies, such as the sun, moon, and stars, which represent our bodies in the future state, and the bodies of the righteous especially, And bodies terrestrial, such as trees, herbs, and fruits, which represent the bodies we all have here, and the bodies of the wicked after the resurrection. Now these heavenly and earthly bodies were all made of one matter, but The glory of The celestial is one sort of glory, even a bright incorruptible light, and the glory of the terrestrial is another sort of glory, a faint fading verdure; even so the bodies raised will be far more glorious than they were here, and those of the saints shall be far more glorious than those of the wicked, though the matter of both was the same when it came into God's hands.

Ver. 41. Secondly, there shall be a difference also among the righteous themselves at the resurrection, which we illustrate by considering the difference there is between these very celestial bodies, to which we have compared them, for there is one glory of the sun, the most illustrious of all, and another glory of the moon, which seems to be the next in magnitude and splendour, and another glory of the stars, which still seem less, though they be glorious also: yea, and there is a difference among these stars, some are bigger and others less, for one star differeth from another star in glory, though they be all lucid and shine in the same heaven; so also is there to be a difference between one righteous man and another in the resurrection of the dead: for though all shall be glorified, and all placed in the same heaven, yet according as they have done or suffered more or less for the name of Christ, so they shall have greater or less degrees of glory in the resurrection.

Ver. 42. But to make it still clearer that it is the same body which is raised, only far more glorious, you may observe the miserable estate in which death leaves it, and then you must confess it must be much improved before it can be capable of immortality; when it is sown, that is, cast into the grave and covered with earth, in order to its springing up again, it is in a state of corruption, and will be dissolved in a little time; but when by God's power it is raised to live in that life which hath no end, it is freed from that contrariety of humours which made it liable to perpetual decay, and put into a state capable of enduring for ever in incorruption, and yet it remains as to substance the same body still.

Ver. 43. When it is sown and put into the grave, it is a mean contemptible carcass, and is In a state of dishonour, being exposed to worms and mingled with dust; but when it is raised again to live with God in his kingdom, it shall then be In a state of glory, being made bright and most illustrious. When It is sown and cast into the earth, it is In a state of weakness, unable to move or to defend itself from dissolution; but when It is raised again to glorify God, it shall then be In a state of power, and able to exercise all its faculties better than ever it did before.

Ver. 44. When It is sown and laid into the grave, it is no more but a natural body, such as those we bear about here, consisting of flesh, blood, and bones; but when it is raised again to a celestial life, it is made a spiritual body, pure and unmixed, like those heavenly bodies which suffer no corruption. And that none may doubt that the same body may suffer this variety, even now we see there is a natural body, such as these on earth, and there is a spiritual body, such as those which are in heaven, and yet both made of the same first matter.

Ver. 45. Now that we shall have more glorious bodies for that more glorious state, is further evident from the two principles whence we derive them both; the first from our forefather Adam, the second from our incarnate Redeemer; And so It is Written, Gen. ii. 7, the first man Adam, from whom these natural bodies descend, was made of corruptible matter, and became a living soul, which being put into his mortal body, was to stay no longer there than till God recalled it, he having no power to give or continue life to any of his posterity. But Jesus Christ, from whom we must receive our spiritual bodies, though he was real man, and so is called the last Adam, yet is he very God still, and so was hade a quickening spirit, Rom. viii. 10, 11, having in himself a power to give a new and never-failing life to those he raises from the dead; and as the cause is more noble, so must the effect be also.

Ver. 46. And as Adam, the author of corruption, was first, and Christ incarnate the author of immortality, though far more excellent in dignity, yet came after in order of time; so shall it be in the two states derived from them. The state after the resurrection is the more excellent, howbeit that was not to be the first in order of time which is best, even the glorified body, which is spiritual, for we are not partakers of that as yet; But that corruptible body which is natural is the first, which we have at this present, and afterward, when we have laid down this, then we shall have a glorious body given us by Christ, even that which is spiritual, it being the usual method of Providence to begin first with that which is less perfect, and so to proceed to that which is better and more perfect.

Ver. 47. We must therefore be content at present with these infirmities which we have, hoping and patiently waiting for the better state, for, according to the difference of the originals, the exemplars must differ also; the first man, being made of dust, is of the earth, and consequently his nature is corruptible and earthy, apt to dissolve into the same principles of which it was compounded; and we can have no better a constitution here. But Christ, though being incarnate, he may be called the second man, yet he is able to give us a better being, as he is the Lords and eternal Son of God, who came down From heaven; and as he rendered his own human nature incorruptible, raising it from the grave by his divine power, so shall he do ours also. Ver. 48. While we are on earth, we must be like the first Adam; when we go to heaven, we shall be like the second: for As is the nature of the first, earthy, corruptible, and mortal, such are they that spring from him, even all that live in this world, they Are earthy, and must die and turn to corruption. But on the other side, as is the nature of the second, heavenly, glorious, and incorruptible, such are they also that are raised again by Him to live in the next world, they Are heavenly, glorious, and immortal, being suitable unto that place for which they are designed.

Ver. 49. It is true, we have not arrived to this excellent state yet, but we ought to believe our nature shall be advanced by Christ as much as ever it was degraded by Adam; and as we have already in this world borne the image of the earthy Adam, being liable to pains and diseases, to death and corruption, we ought firmly to expect that we shall also, in the world to come, bear the image of the heavenly Adam; that is, be raised again, and rendered like Him in glory, immortality, and incorruption.

Ver. 50. Finally, to confirm you in the hope of this blessed change, do but consider to what end the dead are raised, even to dwell in the kingdom of heaven; now this I say, brethren, must necessarily follow from that consideration, that flesh and blood, not only as that signifies sinfulness and evil inclinations', but (as we here understand it) for the very matter of these mortal bodies, as they are now, requiring meat and drink, rest and sleep, and as they are liable to diseases and death, this frame till it be altered and improved cannot inherit the Kingdom Of God, for that is the habitation only of glorified beings, nor is there any meat or drink there to supply such necessities as we have here: you cannot imagine such gross flesh should dwell there, neither doth a frail body, so liable to corruption as this is which we now bear, inherit that kingdom, where there is nothing but incorruption, for every thing must be suited to its proper place, and therefore our bodies must be glorified that they may live in a glorious place and an immortal state.

LXXVeme Jour - Confiance en Jésus-Christ Notre Intercesseur. Ibid.

Que voire cœur ne se trouble pas, qu'il ne craigne rien: il y a plusieurs demeures dans la maison de mon Père: je m'en vais vous préparer la place.

Les temps de trouble arrivaient: c'était l'heure de la puissance des ténèbres; les apôtres étaient déjà comme au milieu d'écarts troubles: Jésus-Christ leur avait déclaré qu'il allait être trahi et par l'un d'eux; il avait désigné le traître à quelques-uns, et ils l'avaient vu partir de la table et de la maison: il venait de leur dire le dernier adieu. Mes petits enfants, je m'en vais, et je ne serai plus avec vous: il leur faisait voir la violence de ses ennemis prête à éclater: sa sainte cène ne leur avait remis devant les yeux que du sang répandu, et un corps livré; et la tentation était tout ensemble, et si terrible, et si proche, que Pierre, le plus fervent, le plus hardi, le plus favorisé d'eux tous, y devait succomber jusqu'à renoncer à son maître; et cela dans la nuit même où ils allaient entrer. En cet état, il n'y avait rien de plus nécessaire que de les précautionner contre tant de troubles. C'est aussi à quoi se termine tout ce discours, jusqu'à la fin de ce chapitre: et après avoir dit dès le commencement: Ne vous troublez pas, ne craignez rien: il finit encore par les mêmes mots: Je vous donne ma paix, je vous laisse ma paix; que votre cœur ne se trouble pas, ne craignez pas; après quoi il termine ce discours, et se lève pour aller à la mort. Il faut donc entendre et peser toutes ces paroles. Par rapport à celle-ci: Ne vous troublez pas: nous verrons qu'au lieu de trouble, tout inspire la confiance aux apôtres. Ce qui leur causait le plus de trouble, c'est qu'en leur disant: Je m'en vais, il semblait ne leur laisser aucune espérance de le suivre: il les avait mis au rang des Juifs, qui semblaient exclus de cette grâce: Je m'en vit; et comme j'ai dit aux Juifs, vous ne sauriez venir où je vais.

Il est vrai qu'il avait dit à saint Pierre: vous ne pouvez encore me suivre, mais vous me suivrez après: par où il leur donnait quelque espérance; puisque saint Pierre devait le suivre un jour ou il allait, les autres semblaient aussi y être appelés. Mais pour ne leur laisser aucun doute: Il y a, dit-il, plusieurs demeures dans la maison de mon Père: il n'y en a pas seulement pour moi et pour Pierre; il y en a pour plusieurs, il y en a pour vous: Je m'en vais, mais c'est pour vous préparer la place; ne vous troublez donc pas; ne craignez rien, vous croyez en Dieu; c'est dans son royaume que votre demeure vous est préparée: Croyez aussi en moi; car c'est moi qui y vais préparer la place. Ne vous troublez donc pas, ne craignez rien. Croyez en moi comme vous vous croyez en Dieu, et tout est en sûreté pour vous.

Il y a plusieurs demeures dans la maison de mon Père; s'il n'en était pas ainsi, je vous le dirais.

Avec tant de bonté, avec tant d'amour, vous cacherais-je votre sort? Admirez et ressentez la tendresse de ces paroles: S'il n'en était pas ainsi, je vous le dirais. Ce n'est pas aux seuls apôtres qu'elles sont dites, c'est encore à nous. Répétons les encore un coup, et laissons-nous-en pénétrer: s'il n'en était pas ainsi, je vous le dirais; je ne vous veux rien cacher, et avant que de partir, je veux vous apprendre tous les secrets qui vous regardent. Ayant aimé les siens, il les a aimés jusqu'à la fin, et en s'en allant, il leur veut ôter tout sujet de crainte.

Si je m'en vais, c'est que je vais vous préparer une place. Jésus notre avant-coureur est entré pour nous; et c'est pour cela qu'il est appelé notre pontife selon l'ordre de Melchisédech. Nous avons un grand pontife qui a pénétré les cieus: il est entré dans ce sanctuaire éternel, dont l'entrée était interdite aux hommes à cause de leurs péchés. Il a percé au dedans du voile: et notre foi, notre espérance y entre après lui; car il nous est allé préparer la place, et c'est pour cela qu'il y entre.

Remettons-nous devant les yeux la structure de l'ancien temple, où était le lieu très saint, le Saint des saints, la partie du sanctuaire la plus intime, celle où était l'arche, où Dieu même avait établi sa résidence, lieu inaccessible à tout autre qu'au souverain pontife, qui encore n'y pouvait entrer qu'une fois l'an. Il était couvert d'un grand voile parsemé de chérubins, pour nous faire souvenir de ce chérubin qui, avec une épée flamboyante qu'il remuait d'une manière menaçante, gardait la porte du paradis «, pour empêcher nos premiers pères d'y entrer, après qu'ils en eurent été chassés. Ce voile sacré et ces chérubins répandus dessus, semblaient encore nous dire à l'entrée du sanctuaire: N'entrez pas; rien d'impur ne doit entrer en ce lieu; c'est la figure du ciel, où personne ne doit entrer jusqu'à ce que le souverain pontife en ait ouvert l'entrée. C'est là ce voile qui nous cachait la gloire de Dieu: c'est là ce voile qui nous rendait le sanctuaire inaccessible: c'est le voile qui nous marquait que nous étions interdits, impurs, incapables d'entrer jamais dans le Saint des saints: c'est ce voile qui fut déchiré de haut en bas par le milieu, et mis en deux parts, lorsque Jésus-Christ expira. La terre trembla en même temps; les tombeaux s'ouvrirent, et les morts ressuscitèrent, en témoignage que par la mort et par le sang de Jésus, le sanctuaire était ouvert, les morts recevaient la vie, l'interdit était levé, tout était changé pour les hommes.

Le pontife s'ouvrait l'entrée dans le sanctuaire par le sang des animaux; mais Jésus-Christ y devait entrer par son propre sang, par l'oblation de lui-même. Le pontife, avant que d'entrer dans le sanctuaire, offrait pour ses péchés et pour ceux du peuple; mais le vrai souverain pontife n'avait pas besoin d'offrir pour lui; et en qualité de Fils unique il entra dans le ciel par son propre droit naturel. Et c'est pourquoi n'offrant que pour nos péchés, c'est à nous qu'il ouvre l'entrée: Je m'en vais vous préparer la place.

Son sacerdoce s'exerce principalement dans le ciel; car s'il n'eût été sacrificateur que pour la terre, Une l'aurait point été du tout; puisqu'il y avait pour la terre un autre sacerdoce et d'autres victimes. Mais celui-ci, dont le sang est non seulement innocent et pur, mais encore infiniment précieux, commence à la vérité l'exercice de son sacerdoce sur la terre, où il fallait qu'il mourut pour les pécheurs; mais il le consomme dans le ciel, où il paraît pour nous devant la face de Dieu, où assis à la droite de la majesté de Dieu, il opère continuellement la rémission des péchés, en intercédant pour nous, et nous ouvrant la porte du ciel par le sang du Nouveau Testament répandu pour la rémission de nos péchés.

Ne soyons donc point troublés, ne craignons rien. Que peut faire le monde contre nous, que de nous chasser de notre pays, de notre maison, de toute la terre et de la vie? Mais quand nous perdrons tout cela, il y a plusieurs demeures dans le ciel: nous y avons notre place et une retraite assurée, où le monde et la puissance des ténèbres ne peut plus rien. Croyons donc en Dieu, qui nous y reçoit: mais croyons aussi en Jésus-Christ, qui nous y va préparer la place; adorons le sang de l'alliance par lequel il y est entré; adorons ses plaies, par lesquelles il intercède pour nous et nous ouvre l'entrée du ciel. Vous croyez en Dieu, croyez aussi en moi: car je suis Dieu, mais un Dieu homme, un Dieu qui ai été votre victime; un Dieu qui ai offert pour vous ce que j'ai pris de vous-mêmes: Croyez en Dieu, croyez en moi: après cela ne vous troublez pas, ne craignez rien. Si vous aviez quelque chose à craindre, et capable de vous troubler, ce seraient vos péchés qui crient contre vous, et ne vous permettent pas le repos de la conscience; mais ils sont purgés: Jésus-Christ a levé l'interdit, et il vous tend les bras du haut du ciel pour vous y recevoir. Quittez donc comme lui la chair et le sang; sacrifiez vos passions et vos désirs sensuels: c'est le sang qu'il vous faut répandre pour vous conformer à Jésus-Christ: ne craignez rien, ne vous troublez pas, encore un coup. Nous avons un souverain pontife qui a pénétré les deux: présentons-nous donc avec une entière, confiance devant le trône de la grâce, pour en être secourus dans nos besoins: devenons inébranlables dans la confession" de son saint nom. Mais ne soyons pas de ceux qui le confessent de bouche et le renoncent par leurs œuvres si nous le renonçons, il nous renoncera; et si nous lui sommes infidèles, la faute en sera en nous: car pour lui il est ferme dans ses paroles, et il ne se peut renoncer lui-même. Ne craignez donc rien, ne vous laissez troubler de rien: croyez en Dieu, croyez en Jésus-Christ, par qui vous avez accès auprès de Dieu.

The Gospel, whose great design is to direct us to our happiness, doth endustriously endeavor to root out evil in our minds, and to plant in its room a gentle, obsequious, and condescending disposition. For hither tend all those evangelical precepts which require us to become weak to the weak, that we may gain them (1st Corinthians 9:22), to bear with their infirmities (Romans 15:1), and support them and be patient towards them (1 Thess. 5:14), and, on the other hand, submit ourselves to our Elders (1 Peter 5:5) and to those that have the rule over us (Hebrews 13:17), to obey our Magistrates, our parents, and our masters; to be subject to principalities, and not speak evil of dignities; to honour kings, and submit to their laws and governors (1 Peter 2:13-14). In a word, to honour all men as they deserve (1 Peter 2:17), and to hold good men in reputation (Phil 2:19) and in honour to prefer one another (Romans 12:10).

The sense of all this is, to oblige us to treat all men as becomes us, in the rank and station we are placed in; to honour those that are our superiors whether in place or virtue; to give that modest deference to their judgements, that reverence to their persons, that respect to their virtues, that honour to their desires or commands, which the degree or kind of their superiority requires; to condescend to those that are our inferiors, and treat them with all the candour and ingenuity, sweetness and affability, that the respective distances of our state; to consult their conveniences, and do them all good offices, and pity and bear with their infirmities, so far as they are safely and wisely tolerable. By the constant practice of which our minds will be gradually cured of all that perverseness and surliness of temper, which indisposes us to the respective duties of our relations; of all that contempt and selfishness which renders to us averse to the proper duty of the superiors; and of all the self-conceit and impatience of command which indisposes us to the duty of inferiors.

And our wills being wrought once into an easy pliability either to submission or condescension, we are in a forward preparation of mind to live under the government of Heaven, where doubtless under God the Supreme Lord there are numberless degrees of superiority and inferiority. For some are said to reap sparingly, and some abundantly; some to be the rulers of five cities, and some of ten; some to be the least, and some the greatest in the Kingdom of Heaven; All of which implies that, in that blessed state, there is a great variety of degrees of glory and advancement. And indeed it cannot be otherwise in the nature of the thing; for our happiness consisting in the perfection of our natures, the more or less perfect we are, the more or less happy we must necessarily be; for every degree of goodness we obtain to, is a widening and enlargement of our souls for farther Degrees of Glory and Beatitude. And accordingly when we arrive at heaven, which is the element of beatitude, we shall all be filled according to the content and measure of our capacities, and drink in more or less of its rivers of pleasure, as we are more or less enlarged to contain them. So that according as we do more and more improve our selves in true goodness, we do naturally make more and more room in our souls for heaven, which doth always fill the vessels of glory of all sizes, and pour in happiness upon them till they all overflow and can contain no more.

Since therefore they are all of them entirely resigned to, and guided by right reason, there is no doubt but in these their different degrees of glory and dignity, they mutually behave themselves towards one another, as is most fit and becoming, since under God the head and King of their society, there is from the highest to the lowest a most exact and regular subordination of members, they do every one perform their parts and duties towards every one, in all those different stations of glory they are placed in, and consequently do submit and condescend to each other, according as they are of a superior or inferior class and order. So that if when we go from hence into the other world, we carry along with us a submissive and condescending frame of spirit, we shall be trained up, and predisposed to live under the blessed hierarchy of heaven; to hold a cheerful conformity to the laws and customs of it; and to render all the honors to those above, and all the condescension to those beneath us in glory, which statutes of that heavenly regiment do require; in doing whereof we shall all of us enjoy the most unspeakable content and felicity.

For though in the Kingdom of Heaven, as the kingdoms of the earth, there are numberless degrees of advancement and dignity, and one star there, as well as here, differeth from another star in glory; yet to freely, and cheerfully do they all condescend and submit to each other, in these their respective differences of rank and station, that in the widest distances of their state, and degrees of glory, they all maintain the dearest intimacies and familiarities with each other; and neither those that are superior are either envied for their height, or contemned for their familiarity, nor those that are inferior despised for their meanness or oppressed for their weakness. For in that blessed state, every one being best pleased with what becomes him, it is every one's joy to behave himself towards every one as best becomes the rank and degree he is placed in; and those that are below them, and those that are above, do glory in condescending to those that are below them, and those that are below, do triumph in submitting to those that are above them; thus in all those differences of glory and dignity between them, they alternately reverence their superiors, and condescend to their inferiors, with the same unforced freedom and alacrity, and so do eternally converse with one another (notwithstanding all their distances) with the greatest freedom, and most endearing familiarity.

(1699 Publication date, London)

One of Jane Lead's later published Prophetic Works, sent by God's Eternal Wisdom to reveal more about the internal First Resurrection, the State of Separated Souls, the Expectation of the Return of the Patriarchal Life, and the Manifestation of the Kingdom of Christ upon the Earth in the Nazarite Sons and Daughters of God.. This was made public in 1699.

This manuscript from the 17th century has been out of print for a very long time and has been generally inaccessible to the general public. It contains terminology and wording that are missing from modern edited versions.

This on-line reproduction presents the old manuscript "as close to the original as possible" — rendering the text and appearance of the 1699 printing without any interpretation or commentary, — both of which are here left for the Spirit of Truth, who will always provide for the seeking and humble in heart.

12. On the Fourth side of the Mountain, which lay Westward, was the great Secrets of the Deceased, the various Regions that they were lodged in, and the Glorious Mansions that did appertain to such as departed in a high degree of Perfection; with all the great Wonders of the great Weight and Glories of Eternity. It was told me, all of this was to be concealed yet, and shut up from the knowledge of the present Age of Time: And was but only peculiar to some that should have a Light, and discovery of these Marvelous things, as they were capable to take them in; Standing in the Passive meekness, and pure Faith-expectation for the accomplishment of all what has been here declared: For the time may be nearer, or further off, as we see the gathering into these Holy Courts may be, so hasten then we may, the Blessed approach of this Rising blissful Day, as in the Golden knot of Love we tyed and knit together are. Amen.

Now if it shall be asked, Where it is that this Mountain, and Holy Paradise shall be found? It is Answered, It is founded upon Holy Ground, where the Philadelphian Knot of Perfect Love-Unity hath sent forth their strong Perfumes, and attractive Powers to fetch in those that are to make up the full Number of the Heavenly Roll, that shall stand with the LAMB: in whose Princely Power and Spirit they shall obtain with Him to Reign. Even so: Amen. All this Confirm by the Seal of the Anointing Power.

13. THIS great Mystery and Secret, of the various degrees of the Deceased, and separated Souls, which opened on the fourth side of the Mountain, being permitted me to disclose to the Worthy and Believing, that desire to have so much of the Counsel of God made known, as has been revealed herein, to such as are weaned from the Mothers Breast of Tradition: even to them, it is given forth to know, what is reserved for the latter Ages of time. Now there were shewn to me seven States or Regions which were allotted to the Dead.

14. The first Order I shall mention, is of those that have Lived and Died in a most Wicked and Diabolical Spirit, without any Change or Repentance: Such as Blasphemers, Contemners of God, Apostates, &c. These have their places in the Tormenting, Anguishing Fire, of the dark Luciferian Kingdom, where they are to be Punished till the decreed Ages of Ages are expired, within those Spheres or Circles: Which is dreadful enough to endure, to fright all from coming here.

15. The second is of those, that have lived in the outward Birth after the Flesh, but know nothing of being Born again from out of the Dead and Earthly Image: Cleaving to this Worldly Principle, and extending their delight and love no farther than to what is Temporary, living wholly as without God in the World: These have their places in the lower and grosser part of the Airy Region. Where tho' they have not much Torment, yet on the other hand they have but little rest; and such lovers, they are of their Bodies that many of them visit their dead Corpses, and abide sometime with them, as finding more ease there than in that other place allotted them.

16. Now a third sort are of that Rank and Order, that have been believing in God and Christ, and under Conviction of their lost State without him, and who have made some progress in the Heavenly Warfare: Having gone so far as to live a Sober Rational Life, but have come short of that more inward and Spiritual work of Renovation, not having reached to Mortification and self Abnegation, but dying much short of it. Yet their Mansion is more pleasant, being in the upper part of the Airy Region, annexed to Paradise: Where they want not for Motives and Stirrings up to go on, and recover what they omitted and lost, while living in the Body.

17. As these Centers were opened and past before me, it was much upon me to be informed out of that depth of the Eternal Wisdom, that here opened it self, what became of all the Children that died, either in Infancy or Minority. Then the Vision open'd shewing me a very pleasant Flowery and delightful Sphere, with a wonderful bright Light, that covered it as a Firmament, and the word said, this is the Children's Sphere and Kingdom. It appeared like a little World fill'd up with them, from the Womb, to the stature of about 12 Years. This was inferiour to Paradise, but was appropriated to Wisdom; to be under her Government and Dominion, who appointed here several ministering Angels to Discipline, and Educate them, in the Faith of Jesus: For being stained with original Sin, they were to believe in and receive the Lamb of God as their Redeemer: And so, by Union with him, they become Virgins without Spot or Blemish. Hereby it was said that Wisdom did make out her self, in the Fathers new-created Wonders, in these Children being transplanted out from the Earthly, into the Divine and Spiritual Orb of Light.

18. Now the Three other Regions, (to wit, Paradise, Mount-Sion, and the New Jerusalem) I have already given an account of it in the Book of the Eight Worlds. I must pronounce, Happy and Blessed are they, that dye so fitly qualified, as immediately to pass through all these before-mention'd Regions, that none of them may detain them, but that (as an Arrow) swiftly they may fly into this more high degree of the Paradisiacal Sphere, for they shall not long rest here, before their Ascension shall be; where they shall see the King of Mount Sion, stretching out the Golden Cord, that shall draw them up to sit with him upon his Throne, which he has prepared for them; and so to rise from one Glory to another, till in the fullness of the Father's Glory, Christ shall install them, jointly with himself. The everlasting Gates of the New Jerusalem here open, and wide do stand: Which properly does belong to the high and lofty Majesty, as his Principal Seat or Mansion-house. Which he will in the concluding part of all Scenes make to descend, to fill the whole Creation, with the splendor of it's Glory: Even so, Amen.

19. But for caution, let none think they can reach to these two last degrees, at the passing out of the Body, but as Christ in them shall come to be grown up in a perfect Stature, covering them all over with his divine Nature. Which we hope and believe, may be wrought out effectually by the same Power that gave a Resurrection to his dead Body, and an Ascension to Glorification: in the Faith of which we wait and pray, for this perfect Day.

20. I was Considering and Recollecting with my self the manifold Mysteries, that among the Dead lay yet hid, which in these Ages past were to be concealed and shut up: but as the nearer approach is of the finishing of the fullness of Redemption, the Word of the Eternal Wisdom has been pleas'd to make known, what is beyond the present belief of the World: but to the Impartial seekers and Worthy inquirers the secrets that appertain to the States of separated Souls, may be communicated.

21. In the first place we are to consider how these three Ranks of such as have departed this World, short of Redemption, shall come to recover the Regeneration or Remaining part of the Work, which they might possibly have attained in this Life; for which end the Mediatorship of Christ was established by the Father, and continued in the Melchizedeck-Order. And as Souls are daily Dying in this imperfect State, so Christ is daily renewing the Efficacy of his Blood, that must still atone for them. It is also further made Manifest, that the great Saints that are made Kings and Priests, as they have Thrones, so they have Seats of Judgment, and are also made Saviours with their high Prince and Saviour, being of the same Merciful, and meek Nature, as joined and made one Spirit with him. And their intercession with him, is of acceptation and efficacy, for these their fellow Members that have lag'd behind, and lost their time either in this Life or in other Centres: So that it is laid for a Foundation-truth that the great Saints may help the less, whether in the higher World or the lower.

Now as it was queried in my self, so it may be by others how those that are departed, shall be brought to Repent and believe in Christ for Salvation? It was here shewn to me that there were There Prophets, Pastors and Teachers, that did exercise their Function and Office, as well as in these Regions below. For it is well to be understood, that this Converting and Regenerating work is to go forward on, till that which is perfect do so enter into every Member, that they come to be in Congruity with their perfect Head: who must see the full Fruit of the Travail of his Soul, throughout the whole Creation. For Christ the Head does not account himself perfect till every Member be cojoined with him. Therefore, also the high Saints do Sympathize with the groaning Creation, because till all are brought in, their Joy cannot be full.

If it be asked, What Scripture is there for this? I recommend the same that was open'd to me from the Revelations, Chap. 5.8. Where the 24 Elders were in Office to receive the Golden Vials of the Prayers of the Saints, and to pour them before the Throne. Whereby it is implied that the Prayers of the Saints, of a lesser degree may pass through them that are of a higher. Then another Scripture I shall superadd is that, 1Cor. 15.29. Where you find the Living, did enter into the Covenant of Baptism for the Dead; as being capable of helping them forward in their Process to Christ, by Concurrence and Union of Spirits with them. And had we more of this Concurrence of Spirits one with another, the Kingdom of our Lord had not been so long detained and kept back; but a quicker dispatch might have been made, but we are in hopes that as the day-Star shall more Universally arise in Hearts, this Light shall so spread it self, as that the knowledge of these great Mysteries shall find more kind entertainment in the World, that lyes Buried in so much Ignorance and Darkness. Then there will be less to do in those other Regions, because there will not so many dye in an imperfect State, and the Kingdom of Satan will be weakened and diminished thereby, who shall not be able to hold his dominion, either in this invisible dark Sphere or the visible Principle. I shall now conclude this Point with this Acclamation, Rejoice ye Heavens and shout ye lower parts of the Earth, for the Lord God Omnipotent is about to do Marvelous things, which shall be seen and admired by such as do long for, and Love his Appearance: Which approaching is still nearer and nearer. Even so come: Come, O Lord, in thy Kingdom, Power, and Glory; Amen.

First Thessalonians 2:19-20

For what is our hope, or joy, or crown of rejoicing? Are not even ye in the presence of our Lord Jesus Christ at his coming? For ye are our glory and joy.

Here, in the close of the chapter, St. Paul acquaints the Thessalonians with the true reason why he had such an endearing affection for them, and such a fervent desire to be present with them: they were his hope, his joy, his crown of rejoicing; that a, they were then the cause of his hope, not the ground and foundation of his hope: that Christ alone was; but their conversion by his ministry was, in concurrence with other things, a good ground of hope concerning his own salvation; ye are now my hope, my joy, and crown of rejoicing.

Where note, A very remarkable gradation in the words; he calls them his hope. his joy, and his crown of rejoicing. His hope, that is, the matter of his hope, that they should be saved; his joy, that is, the occasion of his joy, in their conversion by his ministry; and his crown of rejoicing in Christ's presence at his coming, that is, the fruit and success of his ministry amongst them would add to his crown, and redound to his glory, in the day of Christ.

Learn hence, that there are degrees of glory in heaven, probably according to the measures and degrees of service we have done for God on earth; there is, no doubt, an equality of glory there, as to the essentials, but not with respect to the accidentals; besides the joy and satisfaction which the ministers of Christ are partakers of, in heaven, in common with other glorified saints, they have an additional joy and glory from the success of their pious and painful labours, which God has crowned with (he conversion and edification of many souls. Lord! who could not study, spend, and be spent, in the service of such a master? Is it not worth all our labour and sufferings, to appear in the presence of Christ, accompanied with all those souls whom we have instrumentally either brought home or built up in the most holy faith, either converted, comforted, or confirmed in the way to heaven? To hear one spiritual child say, "Lord, this is the instrument by whom I believed;" another, "This is the minister by whom I was established;" a third, "This is he that quickened me by his example, and provoked me to love, and lo good works. O blessed be God that I ever saw his face, and heard his voice!" But, Lord! what will it be to hear thy blessed voice saying to us, "Well done, good and faithful servants, enter into the joy of me your Lord! I have kept an exact account of all your fervent prayers for your people, of all your instructive and persuasive sermons, of all your sighs and groans poured forth before me on behalf of those whom you would have persuaded to be happy, but could not. Every tear from your eye, and drop of sweat from your face, shall now meet with eternal recompense; you shall now find me, according to my promise, not unrighteous to forget your work and labour of love." O what a master do the ministers of Christ serve! Who would not sacrifice all that is dear for him, who has the assurance of such an exceeding and eternal weight of glory from him?

The Different Degrees of Bliss and Glory in Christ's Heavenly Kingdom answer to the Different Degrees of Grace Here Below; Several Objections Against this Doctrine are Answered

PETER i. 11: For so an entrance shall be ministered unto you abundantly into the everlasting kingdom of our Lord and Saviour Jesus Christ.

It is the great concern of every man, in the first place, to get the saving grace of God, and having gotten it, to proceed and increase in it; earnestly to reach after a principle of the divine life within himself, and having attained it, to cherish and improve it; to endeavour of evil (as we are all naturally and antecedently to the divine grace) to become truly good, and then every day to grow better; first to be sincere disciples of the holy Jesus, and then to aspire, study, and labour hard, to become great proficient in his divine school.

This latter duty, St. Peter earnestly and vehemently presseth on the converted Jews of the dispersion, to whom he writes, and in them upon all of us, in the verses preceding my text; where he exhorts them in the most emphatical expressions to an holy covetousness after spiritual riches, and to accumulate and heap up heavenly treasures with as much greediness, as the men of this world do their gold and silver: to add one grace to another, and one degree of each grace upon another, and to abound in virtue and good works. For after he had, ver. 4. minded them of the great design of Christianity, which is to make men partakers of the divine nature, by rescuing them from the corruption that is in the world through lust, i. e. to convert men from their evil and wicked courses, and to bring them to a state of grace and regeneration; and charitably supposing this to be already done in them, he proceeds to shew them their farther duty, ver. 5, 6, 7, 8. And besides this, giving all diligence, add to your faith virtue, and to virtue knowledge, and to knowledge temperance, and to temperance patience, and to patience godliness, and to godliness brotherly kindness, and to brotherly kindness charity. For if all these things be in you, and abound, they make you that ye shall neither be barren nor unfruitful in the knowledge of our Lord and Saviour Jesus Christ.

As if he had said, You have now, God be thanked, escaped the pollutions of the world, and are truly, I hope, converted to Christianity, and in baptism have been regenerated by the Holy Ghost; (that he means by their being made partakers of the divine nature.) This indeed is a very great achievement, and an invaluable mercy of God, vouchsafed to you; yet I beseech you, rest not here; but besides this, giving all diligence, add to your faith virtue, &c. So that the sum of his discourse is to press them first to truth in grace, and then to growth in grace; to acquire the divine virtues reckoned up by him, and then to abound in them. And to persuade them to this abounding in grace and virtue, he useth a very powerful motive and argument in the words of my text: for so an entrance shall be ministered unto you abundantly into the everlasting kingdom of our Lord and Saviour Jesus Christ.

As if he had said, If you thus abound in grace, you shall abound in glory; you shall not only come to heaven, or get just within the gate of that glorious region, (and yet happy is he that can arrive to be but a doorkeeper in the house of his heavenly Father,) but you shall have an abundant entrance into it; you shall go very far, and attain an higher pitch and degree of glory there. This is the plain and obvious sense of the words.

Not to spend time needlessly, or to trouble you with any farther preface, the text thus briefly explained and considered, with relation to the context, readily and of itself offers to us this proposition. There shall be degrees of bliss and glory in Christ's heavenly kingdom; and the more we abound in grace and good works here, the more abundant shall our reward be hereafter. This proposition I intend, with the divine assistance, for the theme and subject of my following discourse.

That this is no nice or fruitless speculation, fitted only to exercise the wits of men, or to entertain their curiosity, but a branch of that truth which is according to godliness a, as the apostle Paul expresseth it, Tit. i. 1. that is, a doctrine tending to the advancement and furtherance of piety and virtue amongst men, will be soon evident to any man that with any degree of serious attention shall consider it.

If this be a truth, it must needs be a useful one, pointed it, referring the words in the regeneration to that which went before, thus; Ye which have followed me in the regeneration: whereas they should be joined to the following words, thus: Ye which have followed me, in the regeneration when the Son of man shall sit in the throne of his glory, &c. In the regeneration; what is that? Not in baptism, nor in the regeneration or renewing of the Spirit, as some have fancied; for neither of these significations will make good sense in this place; but in the resurrection, which will be indeed a regeneration, or second generation of men to life, after that life which they had in their first generation was extinguished.

Which second generation, or production of men to life, is more properly the work of God, as being effected solely by his divine power, without the concurrence of any second causes; whereas in our first generation into the world our parents were instruments. Hence those words of the Psalmist concerning Christ, Psalm ii. 7. Thou art my Son; this day have I begotten thee, are said by St. Paul to be then fulfilled in him, when God raised him from the dead, Acts xiii. 32, 33. The promise which was made unto the fathers, God hath fulfilled the same unto us their children, in that he hath raised up Jesus again; as it is also written in the second Psalm, Thou art my Son, this day have I begotten thee.

And hence also, all the godly are said at the resurrection to become the children of God, upon the very account of their being then raised by God to a blessed immortal life, Luke xx. 36. They are called the children of God, being the children of the resurrection.

Well then! In or at the regeneration, or resurrection, when Christ shall sit in the throne of his glory, as the Judge of men and angels, it is promised to the twelve apostles, that they also shall sit upon twelve thrones, judging the twelve tribes of Israel. Concerning the full sense of which words, though there is some dispute, yet this is generally agreed among interpreters, and it is most evident from the context, that they express some singular and eminent glory, which the apostles should receive in the world to come, as the reward of their singular and eminent self-denial, in devoting themselves to Christ's Gospel. And though every saint shall in his degree be enthroned in the heavenly glory; yet here are twelve thrones of judicature and preeminence, answering to the twelve apostles then in being. Indeed Judas, one of the twelve, afterward fell from his office, and so lost his throne too. But this was through his own default, and our blessed Lord failed not in his promise. But the cursed traitor, by his horrid violation of the condition of it, forfeited his right therein. There being twelve apostles at that time to whom our Saviour spake these words, he saith they should sit upon twelve thrones; as if Judas also should have his throne to sit on; not that he thought the wretch should ever attain that throne, (for he knew him from the beginning to be a devil,) but because, if Judas had continued in the faithful discharge of his office, as the other apostles did, he should have had his throne, as the other apostles had theirs, as St. Chrysostom well observes; "for Christ speaks of his apostles, according to their "present righteousness," and not so much of their persons, as of their state and office. As if he should have said, The office of apostles, as it is an office of the highest service, labour, and difficulty, so it hath the highest reward propounded to it; insomuch that they who well perform it, shall be advanced to the most eminent thrones of glory in the life to come, and be nearest to myself the King of glory.

For, to sit upon thrones, judging (or governing, or being over) the twelve tribes of Israel, is a metaphorical expression, taken (as Grotius well observes upon the place) from the ancient state of the kingdom of Israel, in which the princes, or heads of the tribes, came nearest in dignity to the king's majesty, and in the public assemblies sat next to the royal throne in chairs of state made of ivory. So that it is manifest, Christ here promiseth his apostles an eminent degree of glory and dignity in his heavenly kingdom. And hence the language is different, which our Saviour useth, concerning the reward of those who should afterwards imitate the apostles, and follow them in their active and passive virtue, though hand "at a very humble distance." For of those in the next verse he saith, that they should receive an hundredfold, (a very ample and liberal reward of their self-denial, in whatsoever instance expressed,) and inherit everlasting life; but he doth not say, as of the apostles, that they shall sit upon thrones, judging the twelve tribes of Israel.

The next place we shall cite will give light to the former, and speaks more clearly to our present purpose. It is to be found in the very next chapter, the twentieth chapter of the same Gospel of St. Matthew, where we read, ver. 20, 21. that the mother of the sons of Zebedee, James and John, came with her two sons to Christ with this petition, Grant that these my two sons may sit, the one on thy right hand, and the other on the left, in thy kingdom. She had heard from her sons, that the apostles in general had a promise of a more eminent dignity in Christ's kingdom, like that of the princes or heads of the tribes in the kingdom of Israel, as hath been already noted. But she knew that even among the apostles themselves there would be degrees of dignity; as in the ancient kingdom of Israel, the two first places belonged to the princes of the tribes of Judah and Joseph; these two first places therefore she asks for her two sons in the kingdom of Christ. To-sit at the right hand of a king, according to the eastern custom, is the very next place of dignity to the king himself. Hence Solomon sitting on his royal throne commanded his mother to be set on his right hand, 1 Kings ii. 19.

Consequently the third place of dignity in the kingdom is described by sitting at the king's left hand; for accordingly as any man was greater in the kingdom, so in the public assemblies he sat nearer to the king. To this petition of Salome, our blessed Lord having first by the way given a check to her vanity, and her erroneous opinion about his kingdom, at length, ver. 23. he thus more directly answers, To sit on my right hand, and on my left, is not mine to give, but it shall be given to them for whom it is prepared of my Father. Christ speaks as man in the state of humiliation, referring all things of his kingdom (according to his manner) to his Father, from whom he received it. But as to our present purpose: our Saviour denies not that there shall be a right-hand and a left-hand place, as a first and second place of dignity, and consequently a third place, and so downwards, in his heavenly kingdom, yea, he plainly asserts, that there shall be such degrees of honour therein; but he only teacheth, that those places and degrees shall be distributed according to the pleasure of his Father, who best knows who are fittest for them; and that this pleasure of God was not yet to be made known, either to Salome and her sons, or to any of the sons of men; but the discovery of it to be reserved to the revelation of the righteous judgment of God at the last day. , So that this text very manifestly confirms the proposition; especially if we add the words of our Saviour presently afterwards in the same chapter, spoken upon the same occasion, ver. 26, 27. Whosoever will be great among you, let him be your minister: and whosoever will be chief among you, let him be your servant. For hence St. Jerom thus argues against Jovinian, "If we 'shall be equal in "heaven, we in vain humble ourselves here, that we "may be greater there." Indeed our Saviour in these words most plainly acknowledgeth, that there shall be some greater, some lesser, some first or chief, some inferior in his heavenly kingdom; and he shews that the only way to attain a preeminence hereafter, is by the lowest humility here, and by condescending to the meanest for their spiritual good and advantage.

The same doctrine is plainly taught us (whatever some learned men have fancied to the contrary) from the very scope of the parable of our Saviour, Luke xix. of the ten servants, who received of their lord, being to go into a far country, each of them a pound, to trade with till his return. At which time he that had increased his pound to ten pounds was made ruler over ten cities, ver. 16, 17. and he that gained but five pounds was made ruler over five cities, ver. 18, 19- the lord's reward bearing proportion to the several improvements made by his servants.

To the same sense and purpose very many of the ancient Fathers, and the most learned modern interpreters, generally expound those words of our Saviour, John xiv. 2. In my Father's house are many mansions. The multitude of mansions in heaven seems hardly intelligible, without admitting a difference of degrees in the heavenly glory. For if all the saints should be placed in one and the same degree or station of bliss, they would have all one and the same mansion in heaven; but in our heavenly Father's house there are many mansions, some higher, some lower, according to the measure of proficiency in virtue, which men have attained to in this life. So Clemens Alexandrinus, "There are "with the Lord many rewards and mansions, according to the proportion of men's lives c." So also Tertullian, "How are there many mansions "with the Father, but according to the variety of "merits" that is, (in the language of those writers,) the good works of men. So the Fathers of the church afterward alleged this text against Jovinian, who held a parity of rewards in the life to come.

Another common proof of this doctrine is taken out of the first Epistle to the Corinthians, chap. xv. 41, 42. There is one glory of the sun, and another glory of the moon, and another glory of the stars: for one star differeth from another star in glory. So also is the resurrection of the dead. It is true, in the context of this place, the manifest scope and intent of the apostle is to shew the vast difference between those bodies of ours that die and turn to corruption, and the glorious bodies we shall receive at the resurrection. But yet, in these words it seems plain, that the apostle riseth higher, and by the way sets forth the disparity that there will be at the resurrection, even among the glorified bodies of the saints; some shining with brighter, some with lesser rays of glory: as among the heavenly lights, some are more glorious than others. As if he should have said, .There is a difference, not only between the terrestrial and celestial bodies, but even the celestial bodies differ among themselves; the sun being the brightest of the heavenly lights, the moon in its appearance to us the next to it; and among the stars, some being more bright and conspicuous than others. So in the resurrection, not only the glorified bodies of the saints shall differ from their corruptible bodies they had here, but also among those glorified bodies themselves there shall be degrees of glory.

Unless we thus expound the apostle, it will be hard to give a tolerable account of his discourse in this place. For we must otherwise suppose, that he compares those bodies that are sown in corruption, the rotten stinking carcasses of men, to some of the glorious heavenly lights, though of a lesser magnitude; than which comparison, what can be more incongruous or absurd! Hence Tertullian in the place, in part already cited, thus understands the text, "How are there many mansions with the Father, unless it be according to the variety of men's "good works? How also shall one star differ from "another star in glory, but according to the diversity of rays or beams of lighte?" And as the greatest, so the best part of modern interpreters, acknowledge this exposition of the apostle's words to be true and genuine, yea and absolutely necessary.

But our last text of Scripture will put the matter out of all doubt, which we read 2 Cor. ix. 6. But this I say, He which soweth sparingly shall reap sparingly; and he which soweth bountifully shall reap also bountifully. It is certain, and confessed by all, that the design of the apostle in this place is to excite and stir up the Corinthians to a liberal charity towards their distressed brethren, and that his chief argument is contained in these words. It is confessed also, that in these words, to sow, signifies to do good works, particularly works of charity; to reap, to receive the reward, the future eternal reward of such works. Indeed the apostle elsewhere plainly interprets himself to this sense; viz Gal. vi. 8. He that soweth to his flesh shall of the flesh reap corruption; but he that soweth to the Spirit shall of the Spirit reap life everlasting. Where also the latter words manifestly respect in the first place works of charity and beneficence, particularly such as are exercised towards our spiritual teachers, as appears from ver. 6. Let him that is taught in the word communicate to him that teacheth in all good things.

Now our apostle, in the place alleged out of his Epistle to the Corinthians, expressly asserts, that as our sowing is more sparing or more liberal, so shall our reaping be also; the greater charity exercised by us in this world, the greater felicity and happiness attends us in the world to come: and so on the contrary, the thinner our seeds of charity are sown here, the lesser will be our harvest of glory hereafter. Nothing can be more express to our purpose than this testimony, and therefore I shall seek after no other or farther proofs from Scripture of the proposition I have undertaken to demonstrate.

But to these direct testimonies of Scripture, I shall only add, by way of overplus, one or two reasons, or arguments grounded on Scripture.

1. It is certain, that amongst the damned there will be an inequality of punishments, some suffering lesser, others greater degrees of torment; therefore it is highly reasonable to think, that in the opposite state of the blessed there will be also a disparity of rewards. The antecedent is determined, and beyond all contradiction asserted, by our Saviour himself. For speaking of the town or city that shall reject the Gospel preached to them by the apostles, he tells us, that it shall be more tolerable for the land of Sodom and Gomorrah in the day of judgment, than for that city, Matt. x. 15. And in the next chapter he assures us, that it shall be more tolerable for Tyre and Sidon in the day of judgment, than for Chorazin and Bethsaida, who had heard his doctrine and seen his miracles, and would be converted by neither of them; and that it shall be more tolerable for the land of Sodom, than for Capernaum, upon the same account, Matt. xi. 20—24. And most express are his words, Luke xii. 47. &c. And that servant, which knew his master's will, and prepared not himself, neither did according to his will, shall be beaten with many stripes. But he that knew not, and did commit things worthy of stripes, shall be beaten with few stripes. For unto whomsoever much is given, of him shall be much required: and to whom men have committed much, of him they will ask the more.

2. There are degrees of honour and glory among the angels in heaven, and though they are all of them glorious creatures, yet among them some are higher, some inferior in dignity, some are greater, others lesser; therefore we have reason to conclude, that there will be an order and gradation among the blessed saints of heaven likewise. For we are sure, that in the future state we shall be like unto the angels; and why not in this? Seeing in the angelical polity there are divers orders, ranks, and degrees, can we imagine that the communion of the saints in heaven shall be a levelled society? This is utterly incredible. Now the antecedent here again is most evident from Scripture; and though we dare not intrude ourselves into the things we have not seen, or imitate the temerity of that learned and sublime conjecturer Dionysius, who undertakes to reckon up exactly the several orders of the angelical hierarchy, as if he had seen a muster of the heavenly host before his eyes; yet that there are orders and degrees among the blessed angels, we may with all assurance affirm, having the plainest warrant of the holy text for the assertion. For we often read in Scripture, not only of angels, but also of archangels, i.e. chief angels, that have a pre-eminence above the rest. This is so known and confessed by every man, that we need not cite the texts wherein mention is made of them.

To these reasons we may add the consent of the catholic church in this question. It is certain, that it was ever held in the primitive church as an undoubted truth, that there shall be a disparity of rewards in the life to come; and that this was never called into question, until the conceited opinionist Jovinian, among his other paradoxes, ventured to broach the contrary doctrine. But how he was entertained for this by the most eminent doctors of the church of his age, St. Jerom, St. Austin, and others, we very well know. His obstinacy in this and other erroneous tenets, against the plainest evidence of Scripture and reason, hath placed him in the black catalogue of heretics.

And it is pity that amongst the reformed foreign divines there should be any found that should dare to patronise so exploded an error; especially if we consider the very weak arguments by which they endeavour to justify their dissent from the catholic church. To the brief examination of which arguments we are in the next place to proceed.

1. They say they cannot conceive how this doctrine can be maintained, without admitting with the papists the merit of good works. For if, as our labour is greater or lesser in God's service here, our reward shall be greater or lesser in the life to come; then there is a proportion observed between our labour or work, and the reward. And this necessarily infers the merit of our work or labour.

that this objection is founded on a plain mistake of the doctrine of Scripture, which we defend. For when we say with the holy Scriptures, that every man shall receive his own reward according to his own labour, we do not mean that there will be an exact proportion between a man's labour and his reward; for it is certain that the highest degree of grace can never equal the lowest degree of glory, nor can the best of saints by all that he can do deserve so much as to be a doorkeeper in the house of his heavenly Father: but the proportion here is between the work and reward of one good man, compared with the work and reward of another; and in this comparison the proportion is exact. A very learned Father of our church explains this by an apposite similitude, which I shall give you as near as may be in his own words translated. "Suppose," saith he, "three husbandmen to be employed in cultivating or dressing the field of some prince, one for one day only, another for three days, the third for six days. Now if the prince, out of his royal bounty, shall give to the first a thousand talents, to the second three thousand talents, to the third six thousand; it is evident that the reward is measured out to each of these according to the different measure of their labour: but yet it were ridiculous for a man hence to conclude, that the labour of him that wrought six days deserved six thousand talents, yea or so much as six talents, yea or so much as one talent, and so in the rest. After the same manner are we to conceive of the divine remuneration. For although we affirm, that God measures out to every man a different degree of glory, according to the different measure of his labour; yet it doth not follow from hence, that between the work and reward of one and the same man there is an equality of proportion; but only that between the different works and rewards of different men there is an equality of proportionality. If therefore the work of any man be compared with the reward of the same man, viz. eternal life, we may presently discern an infinite inequality between them; but if the works of different men and the rewards of different men be compared, according to the degrees of eminence in the same life eternal, there will appear an accurate proportionality. And this is to reward every man according to his own labour.

I need not say any more in answer to this argument, and shall therefore pass to the next.

2. They thus argue. The future glory of the saints is the purchase of Christ's righteousness, which is alike imputed to all true believers, and they have an equal share therein, and consequently they shall share equally in the future glory!

I answer,

The doctrine of the imputed righteousness of Christ, as it hath been too commonly taught and understood, hath been a fruitful mother of many pernicious and dangerous errors in divinity. In this objection, it is supposed, that the righteousness of Christ is so imputed to every believer, that it becomes formally his righteousness, and that upon the sole account thereof he hath a right to the future glory. And if this were true, if Christ's righteousness were thus ours, that righteousness being the most perfect righteousness, nothing less could answer it than the highest reward in heaven; and so indeed it would necessarily follow, that the future glory of all the saints should be alike and equal. But this supposition hath no foundation in Scripture, yea it is plainly false. And that it is so, if we had no other argument, the very doctrine we are now upon were sufficient to evince.

We have proved by very plain texts of Scripture, that there will be a disparity of rewards in the life to come, according to the disparity of men's graces and good works in this life; and from hence we may safely conclude, that the doctrine of those who teach that the perfect righteousness of Christ is formally the righteousness of every believer, and that thereupon he hath a right to the highest reward in heaven, is certainly false. Nay indeed, if that doctrine of theirs were true, a consequence would follow, which cannot be uttered without trembling, that every saint shall be equal to Christ in glory; Christ's righteousness being his, and so he having a right to whatsoever that righteousness deserved. But to answer more directly to the objection, there is nothing more certain, than that the future glory of the saints is the purchase of Christ's righteousness.

But how? By the meritorious obedience of Christ, in his life and death, a covenant of grace, mercy, and life eternal was procured, ratified, and established between God and the sinful sons of men; the condition of this covenant is faith working by love, or a faith fruitful of good works; and there is also sufficient grace promised to all that shall heartily seek it for the performance of that condition. It is from this covenant of infinite mercy in Christ Jesus alone that our imperfect good works have any ordination to so excellent a reward as the future glory; and it is the mercy, the rich mercy, the royal bounty and liberality of God, expressed in the same covenant, that assigns to greater degrees of grace here, greater degrees of glory hereafter. This is the plain truth.

But to be short, and to shew the perfect sophistry of this objection, I ask the objectors, whether they do not acknowledge that the present grace of the saints in this life is as well the purchase of Christ's righteousness, as their future glory? They must, they will, they do confess it. Now then, according to their argument it will follow, that all the saints have equal degrees of grace in this life, because they have an equal share in the righteousness of Christ, by which that grace was purchased; than which assertion nothing can be more notoriously false. This their argument therefore is a manifest fallacy.

3. Their last objection is taken from the parable of our Saviour, Matt. xx. 1. &c. where the kingdom of heaven, that is, the church of God, is compared to a vineyard, the master whereof went out in the morning to hire labourers, and agreed with them for a penny a day. Three hours after, or at the third hour, he went out and hired more; and so again at the sixth and ninth hours; yea at the eleventh hour he did likewise. And when they came all to receive their wages, he gave the last he had hired as much as he had agreed for with the first, viz. every one a penny, neither more nor less. Whence they infer that the future reward, signified by this penny, shall not be proportioned according to the difference of men's works, but be one and the same to all.

this parable belongs not at all to the matter in question, seeing the scope of it is to justify God's proceedings in the dispensation of his grace towards the church of the Jews, and that of the Gentiles; the latter of which was not called till a long time after the former; and though being so much junior to it, yet was made its equal in the benefits and blessings of God's gracious covenant. The Jews were first hired into the vineyard betimes in the morning, in the more early ages of the world, in the days of Abraham, with whom and his posterity God made a special covenant of grace and mercy; and in the after-ages, (which seem to be signified in the parable by the third, and sixth, and ninth hours,) at such times as the true religion was in danger to fail among them, he by extraordinary means and instruments raised and restored it again; as in the days of Moses and Elias, and after the captivity of Babylon. But the Gentiles were not called into the vineyard till the day was far spent, in the last time and dispensation; (undoubtedly signified in the parable by the eleventh hour;) and yet these, by the goodness of their heavenly Master, are admitted to the same privileges with the Israelites, and they receive the same reward which was promised to the Jews, with whom I the right hand of God, there will be many vessels (if I may use the common similitude) of different sizes and capacities, some greater, some lesser, but all of them shall be filled. This different, but in every one satisfactory perception of the future heavenly bliss, seems to have been typified and represented by the Israelites gathering of manna (that food of heaven) in the wilderness; of which we read, Exod. xvi. 18. that he that gathered much had nothing over, and he that gathered little had no lack: they gathered every man according to his own eating. To explain this as far as we are able, it is to be observed, that although whilst we are in this state of proficiency and running our race, it be not only lawful, but a laudable ambition and emulation in us, to strive to outstrip and excel each other in virtue, and so to gain the richer prize; yet when our race is finished, and the great Bpa/3«/Tij? or Judge of it hath given his award, and passed the decisive sentence, we must not, we shall not contend, but fully acquiesce and rest therein. And then the servant, who having increased his pound but to five more, shall hear his lord thus pronouncing, Well done thou good servant, be thou ruler over five cities: he, I say, shall be as well pleased and satisfied as the other servant, who, having made a double improvement, shall receive a proportionable reward, and have authority over ten cities.

Among the blessed in heaven there shall be no discontent or repining, no pride or disdain, no grudging or envy; but there shall be all contentment, all joy, all thankfulness, all love. They that are seated in the higher mansions of glory, shall not look down with contempt on those that are beneath them; nor shall these lift up an envious eye towards the other; but they shall perfectly love and delight in each other: and by an inexpressible union of sublimated charity, each shall make what the other enjoys his own, and all together shall make up in different notes one sweet harmonious concert in the praises of God, the fountain of their bliss. To this purpose is the saying of St. Austin on John xiv. 2. speaking of the different rewards of the blessed in heaven: It comes to pass through charity, that what each hath is common to all; for thus every man hath it also in himself, when he loves and rejoiceth in, and so enjoys in another, what himself hath not.

It is hard indeed for us mortals, whilst we dwell in these houses of clay, and are encumbered with the sinful inclinations and passions of this flesh, to conceive of this, and to comprehend the divine power of exalted love. But let us consider, why may not that be among the saints hereafter, which we are sure is among the holy angels now? In that celestial hierarchy, archangels and angels, cherubims and seraphims, and thrones, and the lower orders of those blessed spirits, disagree not among themselves, though they differ from one another in honour and dignity; but on the contrary, they perfectly love and delight in each other, and all in their God. And in their several stations, they readily and cheerfully execute the will and pleasure of their great Lord and Master, whose ministers they are; and all together make one family of love and peace, of joy and order, and one harmonious choir, in perfect concert, and with ravishing melody, sounding forth the praises of their heavenly King. And thus it shall be with the saints after the resurrection, when they shall be made like unto the angels, i. e. when they shall enjoy the same life immortal which the angels do, and be joined to them, and incorporated into their blessed society.

And now, lastly, to apply this whole discourse: Let us, by what hath been said, be excited and stirred up to a diligent, earnest, and zealous pursuit after an increase of virtue, and a greater proficiency in the ways of righteousness and holiness. Let us shun no labour that comes in our way, and is within our reach and compass, whereby we may glorify God, and do good to others; for we see, the more grace the more glory; and the greater and more industrious our labour in God's service hath been in this life, the greater and more copious and abundant shall our reward be in the life to come. We cannot be truly righteous overmuch, as the slothful world would persuade us, nor can there be any excess or superfluity in virtue, or in the habits and exercises of real piety and charity. How great soever our labour be in the business of religion, none of it shall be lost labour, or in vain in the Lord. Every degree of grace which we advance to here, shall raise us a degree higher in the future glory. And all the good works that ever we do, shall be recorded in the faithful register of the divine Omniscience, and not one of them shall be forgotten, or miss of its reward.

Oh! that this consideration might often and very deeply enter our thoughts! How would a vigorous sense of this truth awaken and rouse us out of our remissness and negligence in religion, that too often seizeth on us! How would this inspirit and animate us to generous attempts even of heroic virtue, which in this degenerate age are derided, as vain romantic enterprises!

How often at least would this thought call us from our idle solitude or unprofitable society, to our prayers and devotions! How many precious hours of our time would it rescue and redeem, from being misspent and lost in vanity and folly! How readily should we embrace, yea, how studiously should we seek after the opportunities of doing good! for indeed farther every such opportunity is an advantage offered us by the good providence of God, to enrich our souls, and to add to our heavenly store and treasure, the only true treasure, that shall never fail or be taken from us.

In a word, therefore, let us in the first place (as I said in the beginning of this discourse) take care to secure our being in a state of grace; for "it is a folly for him, that is not yet sure of life, to "contend for honour V And having done this, let us not rest here, but advance more and more in that blessed state, and go on to perfection.

I conclude with the words of St. Peter in the close of this Epistle, Grow in grace, and in the knowledge of our Lord and Saviour Jesus Christ. To him be glory now and for ever. Amen.

Discourse the Eighth

Matth. V. ver. x,xi, xij. Blessed are they which are persecuted for Righteousness sake, for theirs is the Kingdom of Heaven. Or, as it may be read from the Close, Great is their Reward in Heaven. It has been ever a great occasion of Dissatisfaction to some Men that there should be any such thing as Evil in the World. A greater yet, is that this Evil should often fall upon good, and sometimes upon the best of Men. But the greatest of all is, that not only good Men should meet with Evil, but that their very Goodness should betray them into it; that suffering should not only be the Portion of the Righteous, but that Men should suffer for the Sake of their Righteousness. It seems hard indeed that a Righteous Man should suffer, but much more that he should suffer for his being Righteous and that Affliction should not only be the Lot, but also the effect and Conference is his Virtue. For if Honesty and Integrity cannot be a Defense and Privilege against Evil, yet one would expect it should not be a Procurer of it, and that if the Man were not the better for his Virtue, yet at least he should not be the Worse. These have been always as perplexing appearances in the Moral, as any that arise in the Natural System of the World; a frequent Trouble and Discouragement to the Good and Pious, and a more frequent Occasion of Triumph to the Atheistical and Profane, who have railed from hence their most plausible Objections both against the Being and the Order of Divine Providence, which by these greatest Difficulties of it they have been encouraged either to Deny or to Condemn.

With the two first of these Difficulties I am not at present concerned, nor shall I determine of what force the last and greatest might be, were this the last state of things, and the All-concluding Scene of the World. Perhaps it might then be strong enough to conclude what some are now so weak as to wish and believe. But certainly with the supposition of an After-stats the Objection is so far from being Desperate, that I can fee nothing Difficult in it: And I think 'tis here sufficiently answered by that ample Compensation promised by our Saviour to all those whose faithful adherence to a good Cause, shall at any time engage them in Sufferings and Afflictions. For says he, Blessed are they which are persecuted for Righteousness sake, for theirs is the Kingdom of Heaven. Which last Words (as our Saviour afterwards explains them) contain not only a Promise of Heavenly Happiness in general, but of a greater Degree and Measure of it, and entitle the Sufferers for Religion, those who undergo Persecution for Righteousness sake, to a more than ordinary weight of Glory.

So that hence arise two Propositions to be distinctly considered: First, That there are Degrees in that Glory which shall be the Reward of Saints in Heaven. Secondly, That one of the Highest Degrees of it shall be the Reward of those who suffer Persecution for the sake of Righteousness. That there are Degrees of Glory, though by some much contested, is yet I think a most certain and unquestionable Truth. The certainty of which I shall endeavour to establish upon these few evident Principles. First, I consider that this must needs be the natural and necessary result of things. And here I desire only it may be granted me, That there are some certain Dispositions of Soul necessary to relish and enjoy the Happiness of Heaven. This I think is a Supposition that need not be disputed, since even to the enjoyment of sensible good there is requisite a proportion of Sense. The Ear must be tunably set to relish the Charms of Music, and the Palate must be rightly disposed to find any pleasure in the sweetest Delicacies. And if these grosser Objects that have a more natural Affinity with the Organs of Sense, and strike hard upon them, will not yet affect them without some more particular inward Preparation; there is greater reason to think that the Delights of Heaven that are so far above the Level of our Natures, so pure and so refined, cannot be tasted but by a suitable Disposition of Soul. The Necessity of which appears so great, that I am apt to think (as a late worthy Writer of our Church does) that the whole Moral Excellency of some Virtues is their Qualification for the Happiness of another State, they being of no great consequence to the present Order of this World.

Well then, if certain Dispositions of Soul be required to fit us for the Happiness of Heaven, then it follows, that the more disposed any Soul is for the Glories of Heaven, the more happy she must needs be in the enjoyment of them. And if so, then 'twill be necessary to say, either that all Souls are equally disposed, which would be to contradict the Sense and Experience of the whole World; or if one be better disposed than another, then in proportion one will also be more happy than another. The Consequence is plain and necessary. If there must be a Moral Qualification of Soul to fit a Man for Happiness, then certainly the more qualified the more happy. Which has made me often wonder at the self-inconsistency of those who allowing a virtuous Frame and Temper of Mind to be a Natural Disposition for Happiness, do yet deny greater Degrees of Glory to greater Degrees of Virtue. Indeed if a Moral Disposition of Soul did not fit us for Happiness, the case were otherwise; but since 'tis allowed to do that, I cannot conceive but that the Degrees of Happiness must follow the Degrees of Virtue. And indeed how can he that thinks at all, think otherwise, but that a Soul well purged and purified, that has undergone a long course of Mortification, till she is thoroughly awakened into the Divine Life and Likeness, and is arrived to the measure of the stature of the fulness of Christ, Eph. 4. 1 3 must find more Happiness in the Vision of God, than a Soul just pregnant with the Divine Form, and that carries away with her only the first Rudiments of Spiritual Life!

Certainly that Soul which is most like God will be most happy in the fruition of him. This is no more than what may be concluded from the mere natural necessity of things without having recourse to any Positive Order of God about it. But neither may that be supposed to be wanting. For, Secondly, I consider that the same may be concluded from the Justice and Goodness of God as well as from the Nature of things. And first, from his Justice. Not that there lies an Absolute and Antecedent Obligation upon God to bestow greater Rewards upon greater Saints; for if Eternal Life be ( as the Apostle represents it) the Gift of God, Rom. 6. 23. no doubt but the Degrees of it are so too. God cannot become a Debtor to Man, or to any other Creature, but by a free Act of his own. He may indeed oblige himself to us by a voluntary engagement, but we cannot pass any strict Obligation upon him by anything we can do; and to talk of Meriting in this Sense is no less than Blasphemy, and I can hardly believe that any Man that understood himself, ever thus held it.

But though God be not absolutely obliged to his Creatures, but only upon Supposition, and consequently cannot be Absolutely bound to reward greater Saints with greater Happiness, yet if we once suppose him to engage himself by Promise to be a Rewarder of Virtue in general; there will be all the reason in the World to think that by the same Promise he has also Virtually obliged himself to crown the greatest Virtues with the greatest Rewards. For since the reason why he engaged himself to be a Rewarder of good Men was not (as is already cautioned) any Absolute Merit of theirs, but only to show his great Love of Virtue and Goodness, 'tis reasonable to conclude that by the same Motives, and in pursuance of the same End, he also engaged himself to be a more liberal Rewarder of greater Saints. Since this is as necessary a means to show his Love to Virtue and Goodness as the other. And therefore though we should grant (which yet in the sequel will appear otherwise) that God had expressly promised only to be a Rewarder of Virtue in general, yet since the End and Reason of this His engagement was to show His great Love to Virtue, this would be warrant enough to conclude, That he had implicitly and virtually engaged Himself to have an equal regard to the several Degrees of Virtue, and to reward them after their respective Proportions.

But to rise higher yet, though God cannot be in Strict Justice obliged to reward the best of our Services but by an engagement of his own, much less to reward them with Eternal Happiness, yet I think there must be acknowledged a kind of Congruity or Becomingness on God's part so to do, even Antecedently to any Promise or Covenant. There is indeed no strict Obligation till after some Covenant; but there may, and I think must be a Congruity even before; For though there be at first no Proportion of Equivalence between our best Works and the Rewards of Heaven, and consequently no possible room for any strict Merit, yet I cannot but think with a Person of great Judgment and Moderation, that there is a proportion of Convergency; that is, as he afterwards explains it, though there be nothing strictly due from God to the Services of good Men, yet 'tis highly worthy of God to reward them; upon which account they also may be said to be worthy, according to that of the Apocalypse, They will walk with me in white, for they are worthy, Rev. 3. 4.

And indeed unless we will admit of this Congruity, I do not see how to justify the Senses of that Apostolical Maxim, He that comes to God, must believe that he is, and that he is a Rewarder of them that diligently seek him, Heb. 11 . 6. 'Tis plain that the Apostle here speaks of the Grounds of Natural Religion, and what should move and qualify a Heathen Man to make his first Addresses to God.

This he tells you is to believe the Being and the Providence of God, that he is, and that he is a Rewarder. But now how shall a Heathen Man believe that God is a Rewarder? By any Revelation of his? But that he is not yet supposed to admit. He must therefore conclude it by his own natural Reason, by considering the Idea and Nature of God, that which may naturally be known of him, and how becoming in is for so excellent a Being to reward those who apply themselves seriously and heartily to him.

Well then, if it be reasonable to believe upon the Stock of natural Principles that God is a Rewarder, without being allured of it by any Revelation (which is here supposed in the Heathen's Cafe) then it follows, that even antecedently to any Promise of God there is a great Congruity, though not a strict Obligation that he should be a Rewarder. For otherwise what ground could the Heathen Man have so to Conclude or Believe? This Congruity therefore must of necessity be allowed, however apt some may be to startle at it, when the Word Merit is put before it.

This is Prejudice, but the thing it self as I have here stated and explained it, is both innocent and necessary to be granted. And if there be such a Congruity that God should be a Rewarder in general, then by the same Proportion it follows that he should dispense his Rewards according to the Degrees of Virtue. There being certainly at least as much Congruity in this as in the other. And besides this, there is no reason to question but that the Goodness of God which is in it self infinite, and which is already supposed to exert it self so liberally as to reward the little and defective Services of a short Life with Eternal Glories, will also be a co-assistent with it self, as to reward those most, who have pressed forward to the highest Degrees of Sanctity. And were it not for this, I do not see what encouragement there is for Men to Excel in Virtue, which yet the Goodness of God obliges us to suppose.

For what should move a Man to be eminently good, considering how difficult it is to be so, and how little recompensed in this World; if it were not in order to a greater Reward hereafter? If it be said, that the least Degree of Glory is a sufficient encouragement for the greatest Degree of Virtue; I grant it is so, were that greatest Degree of Virtue the necessary Condition of it, without which the least Glory could not be obtained.

But since less will suffice for that (as must be admitted, unless you will say that all glorified Saints are equally good and virtuous) I do not see how there can be sufficient encouragement for higher Attainments, but only upon the Supposition of greatest Rewards. Which therefore from the Goodness as well as Justice of God there is good Reason to conclude.

Thirdly and lastly, From Principles of Reason I appeal to Holy Scripture, which I think will be found to speak as fully and plainly to this purpose as may reasonably be decreed. For there we find that God will render to every man according to his deeds, Rom.. 2. 6. And again, that every one shall receive the things done in his Body, according to that He hath done, whether it be good or bad, 2 Cor. 5. 10. And left this should be referred to the general Distribution of Rewards and Punishments, more expressly it is said, that he that sows sparingly shall reap also sparingly, and that "he that sows bountifully shall reap also bountifully" 2 Cor. 9. 6. The same again is expressly represented under the Parable of the Talents committed to the Management of Servants, who were severally rewarded according to their several Improvements, Luke . And though Parables are not allowed to conclude throughout, yet certainly as to the thing directly and purposely intended by them they are as conclusive as any other Forms of Speech, which in this Parable must be the different Dispensation of Rewards hereafter, or nothing. Again, the Scripture mentions different Seats of Glory, Joh. 14. 2. In my Father's house are many Mansions, says our Saviour, that is, Mansions of different Ranks and Orders; For 'twould have been but a small piece of News for our Saviour to have told his Disciples, that in Heaven there were a great many Mansions in number. Nor would this be so suitable to the Introduction of his Discourse, Let not your Hearts be troubled.

Again we read of particular Rewards belonging to a number of particular Characters, as of a Prophet's Reward, and a Righteous Man's Reward. He that receives a Prophet in the name of a Prophet, shall receive a Prophet's Reward, says our Saviour, Mat. 10. 41. Why a Prophet's Reward, if there be not some special Reward assigned to a Prophet? And again, 'tis plainly intimated that every Degree, and every Act of Virtue shall have, its proper Recompense, where 'tis said, Mat. 10. 42. Whosoever shall give to drink unto one of these my little ones A Cup of cold Water only in the Name of a Disciple shall in no wise lose his Reward.

To which purpose there is also a very express place in the Proverbs, Prov. 19. 17. He that hath pity on the poor, lendeth unto the Lord; and look what he layeth out it shall be paid him again. Where there is a Reward promised not only to Charity in general, but to every Degree of it. And if every Degree of Virtue shall be particularly rewarded, it evidently follows that the greater our Virtues are, the more abundant shall be our Reward, otherwise some Degrees of Virtue would go unrewarded, contrary to the Supposition.

To this it may be added, that a greater Degree of Blessedness is every where attributed to Patriarchs, Prophets and Apostles, &c. when their Glorification is expressed by their Sitting down in the Kingdom of God, and that of other Saints, by their sitting down with them in allusion to the Eastern manner of Feasting. This Privilege of a more eminent Seat is particularly assigned to Abraham, Isaac, and Jacob by our Saviour, when he tells us, Mat. 8. n. that Many shall come from the East and the West, and shall sit down with Abraham, Isaac and Jacob in the Kingdom of Heaven. And so again to the Apostles, Mat. 19.28. Verily I say unto you, that ye which have followed me in the regeneration, when the Son of Man shall sit in the Throne of his Glory, ye also shall sit upon Twelve Thrones. It cannot be denied but that this is meant of the Apostles only, and not of his Disciples at large, because of the Twelve Thrones. And why should Twelve of them only be specified, if they were not to be Thrones of an higher Order? Or what Extraordinary would our Saviour have promised to his Disciples? And this is further confirmed by St. John, who in the Description of the Heavenly Jerusalem, makes the Twelve Apostles the Foundations of the City. And the Wall of the City (says He) had twelve foundations, and, in them the Names of the twelve Apostles of the Lamb, Rev. 21.14, A place exactly parallel to that of the Twelve Thrones.

To dispatch all in a Word, the Condition of Saints in Glory is expressed in Scripture by their being Mat. 22. 30. and 'tis of it self reasonable to think that the same General Order and Proportion shall be observed in both these Sons of God, Angels and Men. But now 'tis most certain that the Angels have their different Orders and Hierarchies, being distinguished into Thrones and Dominions, Principalities and Powers, and into Angels and Arch- Angels, and that some of them fit nearer to the Throne of God than others. Whereupon the Talmudists call Michael the Arch-Angel, The Prince of Faces, or the Prince of the Presence, being (as they say) so near to the King of Heaven, as to be admitted to sit down by him, and register the good Actions of the Israelites. And says the Angel Gabriel of himself, I am Gabriel that sit and in the presence of God, Luk. 119. He distinguishes himself as much by his Station as by his Name. And the Vision of Isaiah represents one of the Angelic Orders covering their Faces with their Wings, which supposes them to be nearer than Ordinary to the Presence of God, so as not to be able to abide the Glory of it, without the help of a Veil.

Since therefore there is such a Variety in the Angelical Stations, and our future Condition is generally represented by theirs, this alone were enough to put us upon thinking that our Glorification must admit of the like gradual Diversity. And 'tis no more than what natural Order and Decency seems to require, that the Members of Christ's Mystical Body should retain the same Diversity in the other World that St. Paul ascribes to them in this, that there should still be an Eye and an Hand, an Head and a Foot, more Honourable and less Honourable Parts: i Cor. 12.

Whereof the Natural Heaven exhibits a very convenient Emblem, in which one Star differs from another Star in Glory. And after all, though there were no plain Proof to be had for this, yet there is such an obvious Congruity in the thing as would convince where it could not silence. And I believe there is no Man, though never so forward to raise Objections against what has been contended for, and to equalize the Glories of Heaven (for the other World has its Levelers as well as this) that could yet obtain Leave of his own Modesty to expect as bright a Crown as the Virgin Mary, or St. Paul.

Having thus far asserted the different Degrees of Glory, which I have the longer indited upon, because 'tis a very practical as well as notional Theory, being of great consequence to the encouragement of Heroic Goodness, I come now to consider the second thing proposed, that one of the Highest Degrees of Glory shall be the Reward of those who suffer Persecution for the sake of Righteousness, that is, of Martyrs. And here for the Eviction of this, having already shown that there are Degrees of Glory in proportion to the Degrees of Virtue, I think 'twill suffice to show that Martyrdom is one of the highest Degrees of Virtue. For the Argument reduced to Form will stand thus:

- An higher Degree of Virtue shall have an higher Degree of Glory
- But Martyrdom is an higher Degree of Virtue
- Therefore Martyrdom shall have an higher Degree of Glory

The first Proportion is what we have been proving hitherto. To infer the Conclusion therefore there needs only a Proof of the second. Here therefore my Business shall be to give a short representation of the Excellency of Martyrdom.

The Honour of Martyrdom was so great in the Primitive Church, that even the Commonness of it, which depredates every thing else, could not diminish from its Veneration. It was then thought of so great Excellence, as to supply the room of Baptism,, and the new Convert, whose early and sudden execution prevented his solemn Admission into the Christian Church, was yet esteemed a very good Member of Christ's Mystical Body, and numbered with his best Saints in Glory everlasting. The same Honour to Martyrs made them choose their Tombs for the places of their Devotion; and God himself was pleased to signalize his special regard to these his Saints, and to show how precious their Death was in his sight, by making the places of their Rest the Stage of his Miracles.

Nor is there any thing in all this more strange and extraordinary, than the Excellency of the Virtue it self which was thus honoured. A general representation of which is thus given by the Pen of a Celebrated Writer of the Roman Church (A Church which, by the way, has made more Martyrs, and has fewer than any in the World).

But she has dealt long enough in Blood, to be able to form an Idea of Martyrdom from the Martyrs which she has made. We see (says one of her Sons) nothing in the Church more noble than Martyrdom; the highest form of Virtue, the loft Expression of Charity; and when A Man has spilt his Blood and parted with his Life for Jesus Christ, there if not any inflame that can further be expressed, from his Love.

Lastly therefore may we acknowledge nothing more August in Religion than Martyrs. They Are the Heroes of Christianity, the gallant Men of this State, the Noblest Parts of this mystical Body. There is no greatness that gives not way to their Dignity; whatever we admire is below their worth, arid according to the Opinion of one of the wisest Fathers of the Church (he means St. Cyprian) "'tis more to be A Martyr than to be an Apostle. Neither hath any thing been ever more Honoured in the World. Heaven has wrought an Hundred Miracles to discover their Innocence, wild Beasts have reflected them, the Flames have seared their Garments, Tyrants have admired them, and many times their Executioners have become their Disciples, in so much that these renowned Champions had great reason to be afraid of Vain-glory, at the same time that God delivered them from Sorrow.

The Description is handsome and elegant; but what they Describe, they have left to our Church to Practice.

But more particularly and distinctly, to take the just Height of the Excellency of Martyrdom, we must first lay down a Measure whereby the Excellency of any Virtue is to be estimated. Now the Excellency of any Virtue may be measured either from the Goodness of the Object willed, or from the Degree of willing it. And two Persons that are equally Virtuous with respect to the good that is willed, may yet be very unequally so with respect to the Degree of Willing, because one may will the same Good, and the same degree of Good more intensely and affectionately than the other.

Thus for instance, Virginity may be said to be more excellent than a Conjugal Life, and that though you do suppose the States themselves to be equally Pure, because 'tis harder to preserve Virginal than Conjugal Chastity: So that though the Degrees of Purity be supposed the same in both States; yet because they are more strongly wiled in the one than in the other, the Virgin may be said to be more pure than the Conjugated Person; not, perhaps as a Lover of greater Purity, but as a stronger and more pertinacious Lover of the same, which he adheres to under more disadvantageous Circumstances; And this I take to be the Case of Martyrdom, whose general Excellency above other Virtues consists in the Degree of Inclination or Adhesion to good, which in the Martyr is supposed to be so strong as to determine him rather to suffer Death, and the utmost Extremity of it, than to transgress what he knows to be his Duty. And indeed if we consider how sweet Life is, and how naturally averse we are to Death even in the most easy, much more under the most terrifying Circumstances, it must needs be a very strong and peremptory adhesion to Virtue that shall engage a Man to quit his Life rather than his Innocence, and Dye rather than offend. But to be more particular yet. To recommend the excellency of Martyrdom there is a Concurrence of the greatest Virtues. The most eminent of which (for 'twere endless to reckon up all) are the greatest Faith, the greatest Love, and the greatest Courage.

First, The greatest faith

There is indeed no Faith like the Faith of a Martyr. This is that Faith which overcomes the World, and all that is terrible in it; That Faith to which all things are possible and nothing difficult, and that removes Fear, which is more than to remove Mountains. This is that Faith which is more especially the Substance of things hoped for, and the Argument or Demonstration of things not seen. This noble Definition of Faith is never so fully verified as in the Faith of a Martyr. This is that Faith that turns the End of the Perspective, and shortens the interval of Time, and makes the future World present, and represents Heaven open, and the Son of Man landing on the Right Hand of God ready to defend, and receive, and reward those that will be content to endure the Cross, and despite both the Shame and the Pain of it for his sake. And all this with such certainty and fulness of Persuasion, that 'tis ready to change its Nature, through too much Evidence, and to cease to be any longer Faith, and commence Science or Revelation. For indeed nothing less than this, than such a full down-bearing Persuasion can well enable a man to drink off this bitter Cup, and to be Baptized at this Bloody Font. It must certainly be a strange Degree of Affiance and Confidence which that Man has in God, who can resign up all that is good and pleasant, and submit himself to all that is evil and terrible in this World, and meet Death with all its Natural and Artificial Terrors, and trust God for his Reward in another Life. What a generous, victorious Faith is this! And what a noble Idea must such a Person have of God.

The Faith of Abraham is highly celebrated in Scripture for his readiness to offer up his Son at the Command of God. And no doubt 'twas a very rare and extraordinary Faith that could reconcile him to such an unnatural undertaking. But certainly the Faith of a Martyr is very much beyond this, as much as 'tis a higher act of Reliance to trust God with one's own Soul, and for one's Eternal Happiness, than for a Posterity to inherit a promised Land.

Secondly, The greatest Love

There is indeed no Love like the Love of a Martyr. This is that Love which is properly stronger than Death, and which is so perfect as to cast out or overcome all Fear. This is a Degree of Love truly Seraphic: and which comes the nearest of any to the Love of Angels and beatified Spirits. If there be any such thing as Seraphic Love in the World, this is it. Not only because 'tis bright and flaming, noble and generous, but because 'tis a Love that gets above all the Bodily Passions, silences all the motions of the lower Life, and makes the Man as if he were all Soul and Mind. More particularly, Martyrdom is the greatest Love of Virtue, and the greatest Love of God.

First, Martyrdom is the greatest Love of Virtue because that is valued at a higher rate than Life it self, which the Martyr will rather lose than Sin. Our Saviour makes it the greatest Instance of and Argument for Friend for a Man to lay down his Life for his Friend. And so doubtless it is. For 'tis then plain that the Man sets a greater value upon his Friend, than he does upon Life. And the like may be said of the Martyr, that he sets a higher value upon Virtue, than he does upon Life, which yet is so dear that (as one observes, who for our safety too well understands the secret Springs and Inclinations of Human Nature) All that a man has will he give for it, Job. 2. 4. And yet this very Life for which a Man will give all things, is by the Martyr given as a Sacrifice to His Innocence.

Secondly, Martyrdom is the greatest Love of God, because the Martyr sets so high a Price upon him, that he will choose rather to die than forfeit the enjoyment of his Favour and Blessedness, and may truly say with the Psalmist, Psal. 63.4. Thy loving kindness is better than Life. 'Tis an easy thing for a Man in a warm gutsy fit of Devotion, when the Evil day is far off, and no probable danger of any competition between his Religion and his Life, to say that he fees a greater Value upon the loving Kindness of God than upon Life. You know who did so. Though I should die with thee, yet I will not deny thee, that is, (to reduce the Words to a more Logical Order) I would rather die than deny thee. This is easily said, but not so easily done, as the Event too sadly showed.

But he that says he values the loving Kindness of God more than Life, and dies rather than forfeit it, may be believed. For what greater Love can there be than this, or what higher Instance or Trial of it? The greatest Love of God was to die for Man. God could not signalize his Love to Man by any higher instance than by dying for him; and the greatest Love of Man is to die for God.

Thirdly, The greatest Courage

For there is also no Courage like the Courage of a Martyr. He fears no Evil but only Sin and Damnation, which are just and reasonable Objects of Fear, and will undergo any other Evils to avoid these, which is the truest and the greatest Courage. For where is there any like it? I would not have the Man of Honour or Duelist, of all the Pretenders to Courage in the World, offer a Competition here. For 'tis most certain that he abuses the notion of Courage as well as that of Honour. His Courage is to dare to sin and be damned, that he may avoid the Reproach of Cowardice, that is, not to fear and avoid what with all possible concern he should, and to avoid what he started not. And if this be Courage, I must then confess that I do not know what is Cowardice.

But neither may the Military Man be a Competitor here. 'Tis I confess great and brave for a Man in a just and laudable Cause, for the Defense of his Prince and Country, to fall a Sacrifice at the Head of an Army. And the Herald's Office supposes as much. But there are also some Allays that qualify the Glory even of this Action. For the Man is supposed to be engaged with Multitudes and Numbers, which encourage as well as defend; and to fight in a Heat, when his Spirits are railed, and his Blood runs high, so as scarce to be able to feel a Shot or a Stab that shall be given him, and to want Opportunity of Retreat, and to be kept from reflecting upon his Danger by Noise, Tumult and Confusion, and to have the Spur of Emulation, and the Incentive of Anger, sometimes of Hatred and Revenge-, and which is more than all the rest, the Hopes of safe come-off at last. Believe me, this goes a great way, and I question whether among those that venture themselves in War, one of ten thousand would do so, if he knew beforehand that he should certainly die in the Field.

But now to have a Man go alone and in cold Blood to the Stake, or to the Scaffold; When in every Period of his Advance 'tis still in his Power by compliance to recede from his dreadful undertaking, and there calmly and deliberately submit himself to certain Execution, and feel himself die with all his Thoughts, Reflections and Passions about him; this is Courage indeed, and such a Noble Spectacle as might well deserve to be a Theatre to Angels and Men, yea even to God himself.

These are some of those great things that illustrate the excellency of Martyrdom, and show it to be: one of the highest Degrees of Virtue, and consequently that it is entitled to an higher Degree of Glory: Which the Scripture also expressly makes to be the Portion of Martyrs, who are said to endure tortures, and not to accept of deliverance, that they might obtain a better Resurrection, Heb.11. - A Better Resurrection, that is, a Resurrection to a Better State of Happiness, that being the only Measure whereby one Resurrection may be said to be Better than another. And. says the Angel to St. John concerning those who are clothed with white Robes, and had Palms in their Hands, Rev. 7. 14. These are they which came out of great Tribulation, and have washed their Robes, and made them white in the Blood of the Lamb. Therefore are they Before the Throne of God, and serve him day and night in his Temple. And he that sitteth on the Throne shall dwell Among them.

And now since there is a brighter Crown of Glory prepared for Martyrs, and those that suffer Persecution for the sake of Righteousness, all that further remains is to commend from the Premises these two Practical Inferences.

First, That we entertain no hard Thoughts of the Justice or Goodness of God for suffering so many severe Persecutions in the Christian Church, some whereof were violent, as under the Roman Emperors; some Fraudulent by Heretics, as Arias, Nestorius, &c. And some of a mixed nature, consisting both of Fraud and Violence, when both Temporal and Spiritual Power did combine together (as now in the Papal See) against the Lord and his Christ. I say we should learn from hence not to censure the ways of God for this, nor to charge him foolishly, since there is so plentiful a Reward laid up for those that suffer in the Cause of Righteousness.

Secondly, That we do fortify our selves with the Consideration of this Beatitude, That if God should ever honour us so far as to call us to the Trial of the Cross, we may be so true to God, to Religion, and to our own Souls, as to Suffer courageously and thankfully, ever looking up to that glorious Crown, that white Robe, and those Triumphant Palms which distinguish the Noble Army of Martyrs, who eternally sing Hymns and Praise to God for the Blessing of those Crosses, which now spring up into Crowns, and in bearing of which they find so great Reward.

Of the different Degrees of Glory and Happiness in Heaven

I PROCEED now to the fourth thing that I designed, which was to show that there are different degrees of glory and happiness in Heaven.

Men shall be rewarded in the next life, not only according to the kind and quality of their actions in this, considered in general as good and evil; and so good shall be rewarded to the good, and evil to the evil; (for thus our Saviour teaches, Matt. xvi. 27.) "The Son of Man shall come in the glory of his Father, with his angels, and shall reward every man according to his works:" and Rev. xxii. 12, 13, "Alpha and Omega, the beginning and the end, the first and the last," tells St. John, "behold I come quickly, and my reward is with me, to render to every man according as his works shall be;" and Rom. vi. 23, "The wages of sin is death;" but the degree of reward shall likewise be proportioned to the degrees of good and evil that men shall have done here on earth; that is, a more eminent degree of piety and holiness here, shall be rewarded with a proportionably greater share of glory and happiness hereafter; and greater and more heinous sins shall then be loaded with greater and heavier punishments.

I shall chiefly consider the former of these in this place; that good men shall hereafter receive in Heaven a reward proportionable to the degree of their holiness and obedience to GOD in this world. This is plainly asserted in abundance of places of the Holy Scriptures. I shall mention some of them. Thus saith the prophet Daniel, chap. xiii. 3, "They that be wise, shall shine as the brightness of the firmament, and they that turn many to righteousness, as the stars for ever and ever." Which is much the same with what St. Paul expressly affirms concerning the different glory of the saints at the resurrection, 1 Cor. xv. 41, 42. "There is one glory of the sun, and another glory of the moon, and another glory of the stars; for one star differeth from another star in glory: so also is the resurrection of the dead." In these words the Apostle, no doubt, sets forth the disparity that will be at the resurrection, even among the glorious bodies of the saints, some shining with brighter, and some with fainter rays of glory; as among the heavenly lights some are more glorious than others.

To the same sense have been generally expounded by many of the ancient fathers, and some of the most learned modern interpreters, those words of our Saviour, John xiv. 2, "In my Father's house are many mansions." ' The multitude of mansions in Heaven seems hardly intelligible, without admitting a difference of degrees in the heavenly glory. For if all the saints should be placed in one and the same degree of bliss, they would all have one and the same mansion in Heaven; but when it is said, that in our "heavenly Father's house there are many mansions," it cannot well be understood in any other sense, but that there are some higher, and some lower mansions, according to the measure of proficiency in virtue and goodness, which men have attained to in this life. Hence, says a learned father of the Church, There are with the Lord many rewards and mansions, according to the proportions of men's lives. And thus says another, "How are there many mansions with the Father, but according to the variety of the good works of men?" Hence also our Saviour promises to the Apostles, that at the great and general renovation of all things, "when CHRIST shall sit on the throne of his glory," as the judge of men and angels, "they also should sit upon twelve thrones, judging the twelve tribes of Israel," St. Matt. xix. 28. Intending, no doubt, thereby to express to them, ' That as the office of an apostle was an office of the highest service, labour, and difficulty; so they who should perform it well, should have the highest reward for so doing; should then be exalted also so as to sit in the next degree of glory and power to himself, the King of glory.'

This again is plainly intimated to us by our Saviour, in the parable of the talents, St. Luke xix. 15. "He that had gained ten talents, was made ruler over ten cities; and he that had gained five talents, was made ruler over five cities," ver. 16, 17, 18, 19. The reward which the LORD bestowed upon his servants bearing proportion to the several improvements made by each of them. And upon this principle, the Apostle St. Paul presses the Corinthians to be very liberal and bountiful to their distressed brethren, because according to the degree of their charity, would be the degree of their reward, 2 Cor. ix. 6. This, I say, " He that soweth sparingly, shall reap sparingly: and he that soweth bountifully shall reap also bountifully;" clearly implying, that the more good we do in this world, the more abundant shall be our reward in the next: and so, on the contrary, the thinner our seeds of charity, and other good works are sown here, the lesser will be our harvest of glory hereafter.

I think nothing can be spoken more plainly to this purpose than those places of Scripture which I have mentioned. Yet still, to add a further confirmation to it, it may not be amiss here to take notice, that though all the angels of Heaven are glorious creatures, yet there are among them some higher in dignity, and some lower; some are greater, and others are lesser; some are angels, and some are archangels, that is, chief angels, some that have a pre-eminence above the rest.

Now seeing we are sure that in the future state "we shall be like unto the angels," Luke xx. 36, why should we not be so in this respect also? seeing in the angelic polity, there are diverse orders, ranks, and degrees, why should we imagine that the communion of saints should be a levelled society? This is utterly incredible. And therefore, for these reasons, ' the Catholic Church has ever held it as an undoubted truth, that there shall be a disparity of rewards in the life to come.' Notwithstanding the plainness of the foregoing truth, some have thought fit to call it into question, alleging such reasons as the following for their so doing. ' First, That since the merits of CHRIST'S death, by which eternal life is purchased for all, are of virtue sufficient to purchase the highest degree of glory for them all; there is, therefore, they say, no doubt but that all will receive the same effect from them; that is, that all will be made partakers of the same degrees of glory, and no difference made between them in that respect.'

In answer to this, it may be said, that it is very true indeed that CHRIST is the common Saviour of all, his blood is alike sufficient, and was alike shed for the redemption of all; but it does not therefore follow, that the rewards purchased by that blood will be bestowed on all alike, any more than that the same degrees of holiness and sanctification will, through the efficacy of that blood, be alike communicated to all. For eternal life and happiness does not accrue to us, by way of necessary and natural result, but from the all-sufficient merits of CHRIST'S obedience and sufferings: but a covenant of grace, and mercy, and life eternal is thereby procured, . ratified, and established between GOD and the sons of men; and the condition of this covenant on their part, is faith working by love, or a faith fruitful of obedience and good works, and thus the Scripture has declared, that "CHRIST is the author of eternal salvation to them that believe and obey him:" and to them only. So that obedience is the condition to be performed on our part, and according to the degrees of our holiness and obedience, shall be the degrees of our happiness. ' It is indeed by this covenant of infinite mercy in CHRIST JESUS alone, that our imperfect good works are made a condition of so excellent a reward, as the future glory; for nothing that we can do, can possibly deserve so great a reward.

The highest degree of grace and goodness, can never be equal to the lowest degree of glory, so as to deserve it.

There being no proportion between an eternal reward, and a short momentary service, though it be that of the best saints. But it is the mercy, the rich mercy, the royal bounty and liberality of GOD, expressed in the same covenant, that assigns to greater degrees of grace and goodness here, greater degrees of glory hereafter. And accordingly it is declared in the several places of Scripture above mentioned, that thus it shall be.'

Another objection against the disparity of rewards in the life to come, is usually raised from the parable of the labourers in the vineyard, mentioned by our Saviour, St. Matt. xx. where it is said, That they that came in at the last hour, received as much as those that came in at the first, and had borne the heat and burden of the day. Whence they infer, that the future reward, signified by this penny, shall not be proportioned according to the difference of men's works, but be one and the same to all. In answer to this, it may truly be said, that this parable belongs not at all to the matter in question; as if thereby was designed to be shewn that all good men shall have equal degrees of glory in the other world: whereas the scope of it is plainly intended to another purpose, viz. to justify GOD'S proceedings in the dispensation of his grace towards the Church of the Jews, and that of the Gentiles; the former being greatly offended, and murmuring that the latter, who were called in the last age of the world, should partake of the benefits and blessings of the Messiah, equally with them, who were the ancient people of GOD. It not being here intended to be intimated to us, that all good men shall hereafter be admitted to equal degrees of glory in heaven; but only to show us, that the Gentiles, who were to be called long after the Jews, should be admitted to the same privileges, and made partakers of the same blessings which were promised the Jews, with whom the covenant was first made. It appearing thus plainly from the Holy Scriptures, that there shall be a disparity of rewards in the life to come, and that the degrees of men's happiness hereafter shall bear a proportion to the degrees of their holiness in this life; if any further proof of this were necessary, it might very well be supposed, both from the justice and equity of GOD, and from the reason of the thing itself.

From the former of these it may very well be supposed, that those good men, who by an early piety, and an uninterrupted course of goodness all their lives long, have excelled in the works of the Lord in this world, shall hereafter be distinguished and honoured with greater degrees of glory in the next. For though our Saviour does indeed say in general, Matt. xiii. 43, that "the righteous shall shine in the kingdom of their Father;" that is, that all the saints that are admitted to everlasting life, shall be glorious therein; yet, I hope, it is not at all improper to believe, but that such of them as had shewn an uncommon zeal for the glory of GOD, and were more eminent for sanctity; and were never in all their lives defiled by any great and enormous sins, shall be honoured above those in the heavenly mansions, who may possibly in their life-time, through the frailty of human nature, have been guilty of many such, though upon their true repentance for them' afterwards, GOD had been pleased of his infinite mercy, through the merits of their Saviour, to admit them to pardon first, and then to happiness. Will not they who have endured a great fight of afflictions, or who have gone through the fiery trial of martyrdom, have in Heaven more reason to rejoice, and be happier than others? inasmuch, as they will, according to St. Peter, 1 Epist. chap. iv. 13, be "partakers of CHRIST'S suffering, that when his glory shall be revealed," and be on that account "highly exalted," Phil. ii. 9, they may "be glad also with exceeding joy."

From the reasons of the thing indeed, it cannot well be otherwise, but that the more pure and holy men have been in this world, the more capable they will be of the happiness of the next, as being thereby the better prepared and disposed for a fuller enjoyment of GOD, wherein, no doubt, one great and substantial part of the happiness of Heaven will consist. ' For if a pure spiritual mind, free from all carnal lusts and passions, be absolutely necessary to put us into a fit capacity of relishing those refined joys that are above, it will from hence naturally follow, that the more spiritualized and exalted men's dispositions are, and the better prepared and fitted their souls are for the enjoyment of the heavenly pleasures, the more pleasing, delightful, and satisfactory will be their taste and perception of them; and consequently the greater, more enlarged, and comprehensive, will their happiness be.

The emanations of happiness indeed are diffused every where from GOD, as the common fountain of celestial bliss, and perhaps do fill all the saints alike; but then, though every capacity shall be filled, yet their capacities and dispositions for them being unequal, some may receive a greater measure and proportion of them than others; and so consequently be more happy than they are. Just as the light of the sun is the same, and yet its rays are received in a greater or lesser quantity, according to the make and texture of the body it shines upon.

I have now only this one thing more, which I think proper to take notice of on this head, and that is this, that though there shall be different degrees of glory in the life to come, yet this difference shall occasion no uneasiness among the saints above, but all shall be entirely happy: because to every saint in that blessed place, his own degree shall be to him a satisfactory beatitude. This has been thought to be represented to us by the Israelites' gathering of manna (that food of Heaven) in the wilderness, of which we read, Exod. xvi. 18, that "he that gathered much, had nothing over; and he that gathered little had no lack; they gathered every man according to his own eating." This may likewise be expressed by a common similitude, of many vessels of different sizes and capacities, some greater, and some lesser; when if all of them be filled, it is the same thing, one is not then fuller than another. So here; if the blessed saints above shall all receive their full proportion of happiness which GOD shall be pleased to dispense to them, according to their capacities, from those rivers of pleasure which flow from his right hand, there can be no reason to doubt, but that all will be entirely pleased and satisfied with that proportion. Even the lowest degree of happiness in those blessed mansions, being infinitely above what their utmost wishes, while here on earth, could have aspired after.

And then besides, though in this lower world indeed, such as are of meaner spirits, are more narrow-hearted, are apt to repine at the promotion of others, and to envy the felicity which they see them enjoy above themselves: yet among the blessed in Heaven, there are no such peevish and ill-natured qualities, as discontent and repining, pride and disdain, grudging or envy, but all are full of contentment, of joy, and of thankfulness. They shall all there be joined in such perfect love, that they who are seated in the higher mansions of glory, shall not look down with contempt or disdain on those that are beneath them; nor shall they that are below, lift up an envious eye towards those that are above them; ' but there shall be such a perfect harmony among them all, that each shall rejoice as much in the happiness of others, as in his own, and take as great delight therein, as if it really were so. And so altogether shall make up, though in different notes, one sweet harmonious concert in the praises of GOD, the fountain of their bliss.

For why may not this be so among the' saints hereafter, as we are sure it is among the holy angels now? We know that after the resurrection, the saints shall be made like unto the angels, and enjoy the same life immortal as they do, and be incorporated into their blessed society. ' Now in that celestial society, archangels and angels, cherubim and seraphim, thrones and dominions, and the lower orders of those blessed spirits, do not disagree among themselves, though they differ from one another in honour and dignity; but on the contrary, they perfectly love and delight in each other, and all in their GOD, being always ready in their several stations, cheerfully to execute the will and pleasure of their great LORD and Master, whose ministers they are; and do join all together, night and day, with inexpressible pleasure, in "giving blessing, honour, and glory, unto Him that sitteth upon the throne, and unto the Lamb for ever and ever." What the Consideration of these things does require from us.

There is one thing more, which, though it be not particularly mentioned in this answer, I would not entirely pass over, that is, what may be said to a question proposed by some, viz. Whether there are degrees of glory in heaven? The Papists not only maintain that there are, but pretend that greater degrees thereof shall be conferred on persons, in proportion to the merit of their good works here on earth; and therefore have assigned to them the highest places there, who have performed works of supererogation, by doing more than was strictly enjoined them by the of God. But all Protestant divines, who allow that there are degrees of glory in heaven, strenuously maintain that these are rewards of grace as every ingredient in the heavenly blessedness is supposed to be. And when this doctrine is made the subject of controversy among them; neither side ought to contend for their particular opinion, as though it was one of the most important articles of faith, or charge them who defend the other side of the question, as though they were maintaining something that was directly contrary to scripture, or of a pernicious consequence.

They, on, the other hand, who suppose that there are no degrees of glory in heaven, are afraid, that if they should assert the contrary, it would, in some measure, eclipse the glory of the grace of God, and givr; too much umbrago to the Popish doctrine of the merit of good works. But this all Protestant divines, as was but now observed, sufficiently fence against. And, inasmuch as it is farther argued against degrees of glory, that those external and relative privileges, which they enjoy, such as election, justification, and adoption, belong equally and alike to all saints; and the same price of redemption was paid for all, therefore their glory shall be equal: this method of reasoning will not appear very conclusive, if we consider that sanctification is as much the result of their being elected, justified, redeemed, and adopted, as their being glorified; but that appears not to be equal in all, therefore it does not follow from hence, that their glory, in a future state, shall be so. And though their objective blessedness, which consists in that infinite fulness of grace that there is in God, is inconsistent with any idea of degrees; yet it does not follow, that the communications resulting from hence, which are finite, shall be in a like degree; nor can it be inferred from hence, that if there are degrees of glory, the state of those who have the least degree, shall be imperfect in its kind, or have any thing in it which shall afford the least abatement of their happiness, or be the occasion of envy or uneasiness, as the superior excellencies of some, in this imperfect state, often, appear to be, since that is inconsistent with perfect holiness: nor is it to be supposed that there are any degrees, with respect to the deliverance of the saints from the sins, guilt, and miseries of this present life, which is equal in all; nor do they, who think that there are degrees of glory in heaven, in the least insinuate that every one shall not be perfectly filled and satisfied, in proportion to his receptive disposition; as a small vessel, put into the ocean, is equally full, in proportion to its capacity, with the largest; and therefore none of the saints will desire, nor, indeed, can contain more than God designs to communicate to them

As for that scripture which is sometimes brought in defence of this opinion, viz. the parable of the persons that were hired to work in the vineyard, in Matt. xx. 9. in which it is said, that they that rvere hired about the eleventh hour, received every man a fenny, which is as much as others received who were hired early in the morning, and had born the heat and burden of the day; that does not sufficiently prove it, since some of these labourers are represented as murmuring, and insinuating that they had wrong done them, to whom Christ replies, It thine eye evil, because 1 am good? and they are described as called, but not chosen, ver. 15, 16.

Therefore it is not designed to set forth the glory of heaven, but the temper and disposition of the Jewish church, who were partakers of the external blessings of the covenant of grace, and the gospel-church, as having equal privileges; so that the arguments generally insisted on.

Another scripture which is also brought to prove this doctrine, is in 1 Cor. xv. 41, 42. There is one glory of the sun, and another glory of the moon, and another glory of the stars; for one star differeth from another star in glory; so also is the resurrection of the dead; where the apostle is speaking concerning the happiness of the saints after the resurrection, whom he compares not with what they were when they left the world; for then had no glory, being sown in corruption and dishonour; but he seems to compare the glory of one saint, after the resurrection, with that of another; and accordingly he illustrates it by the brightness of the heavenly luminaries; every one of which has a glory superior to terrestrial bodies: nevertheless he seems to intimate, that if we compare them together, the glory of the one exceeds that of the other. Thus the glory of the least saint in heaven, is inconceivably greater than that of the greatest here on earth: it is, indeed, full and complete in its kind; yet when compared with the glory of others, it may in some circumstances fall short of it.

To prove that there are no degrees of glory in heaven, can hardly be reckoned sufficient to overthrow the contrary doctrine; especially if those other scriptures, that are often brought to prove that there are, be understood in the most obvious sense thereof; and they are such as these, viz, Daniel xii. 3. They that be wise shall shine as the brightness of the firmament; and they that turn many to righteousness as the stars for ever and ever; where the prophet speaks of those who excel in grace and usefulness in this world; and then considers them not only > wise, but as turning many to righteousness; whose glory, after the resurrection, of which he speaks in the foregoing verse, has something illustrious and distinguishing in it, which compared to the brightness of the firmament and stars. To this it is objected, that our Saviour, in Matt. xiii. 43. illustrates the happiness of all the glorified saints, whom he calls the righteous, by their shining as the sun; therefore the prophet Daniel means no other glory but what is common to all saints; and consequently there are no degrees of glory. But to this it may be replied, that our Saviour does not compare the glory of one of the saints in heaven, with that of another; but intimates, that the happiness of every one of them shall be inconceivably great, and very fitly illustrates it by the brightness of the sun; whereas the prophet is speaking of some that were honoured above others in their usefulness here; and then considers them as having peculiar degrees of glory conferred upon them hereafter, which is something more than what he had said in the foregoing verse, which is common to all the saints, when he speaks of them as awaking out of the dust to everlasting life.

There is another argument brought by some, to prove this doctrine, taken from the parable of the talents, in Matt. xxv. 14, & seq. in which the reward is proportioned to the respective improvement thereof; which seems to respect some blessings which they were to receive in another world; inasmuch as our Saviour compares himself to one that is travelling into a far country, and after a long time, returning and reckoning with his servants: by the former of which is meant, his ascension into heaven; and by the latter, his return to judgment; and consequently those regards which differ in degree, must respect some peculiar glory, which he will confer on his people in another world; and, indeed, the whole chapter seems to refer to the same thing. The former parable of the wise and foolish virgins denotes the behaviour of persons here, and the consequence thereof hereafter: and the latter part of the chapter expressly speaks of Christ's coming to judgment, and dealing with every one according to his works. If therefore the improvement of these talents respects some advantages that one is to expect above the other, it seems to intimate that there are degrees of glory.

Moreover, this is farther argued from those various degrees of grace that some have in this world above others, which is a peculiar honour bestowed on them, and is sometimes considered as the fruit and consequence of their right improvement of those graces which they had before received. And this may be considered as laying a foundation for greater praise; which argues that the soul shall be enlarged in proportion thereunto, so that it may give unto God the glory due to his name, as the result thereof. Therefore if we take an estimate of God's future, from his present dispensations, it not only removes some objections that are sometimes brought against this doctrine; but adds farther strength to those arguments taken from the scriptures before-mentioned, to prove it. But notwithstanding all that has been said, on this subject, it is the safest way for us to confess, that we know but little of the affairs of another world, and much less of the circumstances of glorified saints, considered as compared with one another. Nor are we to conclude, if there are degrees of glory, that the highest degree thereof is founded on the merit of what any have done or suffered for Christ; or, on the other hand, that the lowest is inconsistent with complete blessedness; which, shall be proportioned to their most enlarged desires, and as much as they are capable of containing. Thus concerning the question proposed by some, viz. Whether there are degrees of glory?

There is another which has some affinity with it, that I would not wholly pass over; namely, whether the saints in heaven shall not have some additional improvements, or make progressive advances in some things, which may be reckoned a farther ingredient in their future happiness? This is to be insisted on with the utmost caution, lest any thing should be advanced which is inconsistent with the complete blessedness, which they are immediately possessed of: however, I do not think that it will detract from it, if we should venture to assert, that the understanding of glorified saints shall receive very considerable improvements, from those objects which shall be presented to them, and the perpetual discoveries that will be made of the glorious mysteries of divine grace, whereby the whole scene of providence, and its subserviency to their eternal happiness, shall be opened, to raise their wonder, and enhance their praise. Since it is not inconsistent with the perfect blessedness of the angels, to desire to know more of this mystery, which they are said to look into, 1 Pet. i. 12. and inasmuch as their joy is increased by those few occasions, which daily present themselves; why may not the same be said with respect to the saints in heaven; especially if we consider that this will redound so much to the glory of God, as well as give us more raised ideas of that happiness which they shall be possessed of.

On The Resurrection of The Dead

Sermon CXXXIV—On the Resurrection of the Dead

(Published in 1732, published again in 1872)

Sermon CXXXIV.—On the Resurrection of the Dead.

" But some man will say, how are the dead raised up? and with what body do they come ." 1 Cor. xv, 35.

The apostle having, in the beginning of this chapter, firmly settled the truth of our Saviour's resurrection, adds, "Now if Christ be preached that he rose from the dead, how say some among you, that there is no resurrection of the dead?" It cannot now any longer seem impossible to you that God should raise the dead: since you have so plain an example of it in our Lord, who was dead and is alive; and the same power which raised Christ, must also be able to quicken our immortal bodies.

" But some man will say, how are the dead raised up 1 and with what body do they come?" How can these things be? How is it possible that these bodies should be raised again, and joined to their several souls which many thousands of years ago were either buried in the earth, or swallowed up in the sea, or devoured by fire?—which have mouldered into the finest dust,—that dust scattered over the face of the earth, dispersed as far as the heavens are wide;—nay, which has undergone ten thousand changes, has fattened the earth, become the food of other creatures, and these again the food of other men? How is it possible that all these little parts, which made up the body of Abraham, should be again ranged together, and, unmixed with the dust of other bodies, be all placed in the same order and posture that they were before, so as to make up the very self same body, which his soul at his death forsook? Ezekiel was indeed, in a vision, set down in a valley full of dry bones,"and he heard a noise, and behold a shaking, and the bones came together, bone to his bone; the sinews and the flesh came upon them, and the skin covered them above, and breath came into them, and they lived, and stood upon their feet." This might be in a vision. But that all this, and much more, should in time come to pass; that our bones after they are crumbled into dust, should really become living men;—that all the little parts whereof our bodies were made, should immediately, at a general summons, meet again, and every one challenge and possess its own place, till at last the whole be perfectly rebuilt:—that this, I say, should be done,—is so incredible a thing, that we cannot so much as have any notion of it. And we may observe, that the gentiles were most displeas'd with this article of the Christian faith: it was one of the last things the jonheathens believed; and it is to this day the chief objection to Christianity,"How are the dead raised up? With what body do they come?" In my discourse on these words, I shall do three things:—

I. I shall show, that the resurrection of the self same body that died and was buried, contains nothing in it incredible, or impossible.

II. I shall describe the difference which our Saviour makes between the qualities of a glorified, and a mortal body.

III. I shall draw some inferences from the whole.

1. I shall show, that the resurrection of the selfsame body that died, contains nothing in it incredible, or impossible.

But before I do this, it may be proper to mention some of the reasons upon which this article of our faith is built.

And 1. The plain notion of a resurrection requires, that the selfsame body that died should rise again. Nothing can be said to be raised again, but that very body that died. If God give to our souls at the last day a new body, this cannot be called the resurrection of our body; because that word plainly implies the fresh production of what was before.

2. There are many places of Scripture that plainly declare it. St. Paul, in the 53d verse of this chapter, tells us, that" This corruptible must put on incorruption, and this mortal must put on immortality." Now by this mortal, and this corruptible, can only be meant, that body which we now carry about with us, and shall one day lay down in the dust.

The mention which the Scripture makes of the places where the dead shall rise, farther shows, that the same body which died shall rise. Thus we read in Daniel:" Those that sleep in the dust of the earth shall awake; some to everlasting life, and some to shame and everlasting contempt." And, we may likewise observe, that the very phrase, of sleep and awake, implies, that when we rise again from the dead, our bodies will be as much the same as they are when we awake from sleep. Thus again our Lord affirms; John v, 28, 29," The hour is coming in which all that are in the graves shall hear his voice and shall come forth; they that have done good to the resurrection of life, and they that have done evil to the resurrection of damnation." Now if the same body do not rise again, what need is there of opening the graves at the end of the world? The graves can give up no bodies but those which were laid in them. If we were not to rise with the very same bodies that died, then they might rest for ever. To this we need only add that of St. Paul:" The Lord shall change this vile body, that it may be fashioned like unto his glorious body." Now this vile body, can be no other than that with which we are now clothed, which must be restored to life again.

That in all this, there is nothing incredible or impossible, I shall show, by proving these three things. 1. That it is possible for God to keep and preserve unmixed, from all other bodies, the particular dust into which our several bodies are dissolved, and can gather and join it again, how far soever dispersed asunder. 2. That God can form that dust, so gathered together, into the same body it was before. 3. That when he hath formed this body, he can enliven it with the same soul that before inhabited it.

1. God can distinguish and keep unmixed, from all other bodies, the particular dust into which our several bodies are dissolved, and can gather it together and join it again, how far soever dispersed asunder. God is infinite both in knowledge and power. He knoweth the number of the stars, and calleth them all by their names: he can tell the number of the sands on the sea shore: and is it at all incredible, that he should distinctly know the several particles of dust into which the bodies of men are mouldered, and plainly discern to whom they belong, and the various changes they have undergone? Why should it be thought strange, that he, who at the first formed us, whose eyes saw our substance yet being imperfect, from whom we were not hid when we were made in secret, and curiously wrought in the lowest parts of the earth, should know every part of our bodies, and every particle of dust whereof we were composed? The artist knows every part of the watch which he frames, and if it should fall in pieces, and the various parts of it lie in the greatest disorder and confusion, yet he can soon gather them together, and as easily distinguish one from another, as if every one had its particular mark. He knows the use of each, and can readily give it its proper place, and put them all exactly in the same figure and order they were before. And can we think that the Almighty Builder of the world, whose workmanship we are, does not know whereof we are made, or is not acquainted with the several parts of which this earthly tabernacle is composed? All these lay in one vast heap at the creation, till he separated them one from another, and framed them into those distinct bodies, whereof this beautiful world consists. ArH -i'v may not the same power collect the ruins of our corrupted bodies, v.uJ restore them to their former condition 1 All the parts into which men's bodies are dissolved, however they seem to us carelessly scattered over the face of the earth, are yet carefully laid up by God's wise disposal till the day of the restoration of all things. They are preserved in the waters and fires, in the birds and beasts, till the last trumpet shall summon them to their former habitation.

But, say they, "It may sometimes happen that several men's bodies may consist of the self same matter. For the bodies of men are often devoured by other animals, which are eaten by other men. Nay. there are nations which feed upon human flesh, consequently they borrow a great part of their bodies from other men. And if that which was part of one man's body, becomes afterwards part of another man's, how can both rise at the last day with the same bodies they had before?" To this it may easily be replied, that a very small part of what is eaten turns to nourishment, the far greater part goes away according to the order of nature. So that it is not at all impossible for God, who watches' over and governs all this, so to order things, that what is part of one man's body, though eaten by another, shall never turn to his nourishment, or if it does, that it shall wear off again, and some time before his death be separated from him', so that it may remain in a capacity of being restored at the last day to its former owner.

2. God can form this dust, so gathered together, into the same body it was before. And that it is possible all must own, who believe that God made Adam out of the dust of the earth. Therefore the bodies of men being dust after death, it is no other than it was before; and the same power that at the first made it of dust, may as easily remake it, when it is turned into dust again. Nay, it is no more wonderful, than the forming a human body in the womb, which is a thing we have daily experience of, and is doubtless as strange an instance of divine power as the resurrection of it can possibly be. And were it not so common a thing, we should be as hardly brought to think it possible, that such a beautiful fabric as the body of man is, with nerves and bones, flesh and veins, blood, and the several other parts whereof it consists, should be formed, as we know it is, as now we are, that hereafter it should be rebuilt when it has been crumbled into dust. Had we only heard of the wonderful production of the bodies of men, we should have been as ready to ask, How are men made, and with what bodies are they born >. as now, when we hear of the resurrection, How are the dead raised up, and with what bodies do they come?

3. When God hath raised this body, he can enliven it with the same soul that inhabited it before. And this we cannot pretend to say is impossible to be done, for it has been done already. Our Saviour himself was dead, rose again, and appeared alive to his disciples and others, who had lived with him many years, and were then fully convinced, that he was the same person they had seen die upon the cross.

Thus have I shown, that the resurrection of the same body is by no means impossible to God. That what he hath promised he is able also to perform, by that "mighty power by which he is able to subdue all things to himself." Though, therefore, we cannot exactly tell the manner how it shall be done, yet this ought not in the least to weaken our belief of this important article of our faith. It is enough, that he, to whom all things are possible, hath passed his word, that he will raise us again. Let those who presume to mock at the glorious hope of all good men, and are constantly raising objections against it, first try their skill upon the various appearances of nature. Let them explain every thing which they see happen in this world, before they talk of the difficulties of explaining the resurrection. Can they tell me how their own bodies were fashioned, and curiously wrought? Can they give me a plain account, by what orderly steps this glorious stately structure, which discovers so much workmanship and rare contrivance, was at first created? How was the first drop of blood made, and how came the heart and veins, and arteries to receive it? Of what, and by what means, were the nerves and fibres made? What fixed the little springs in their due places, and fitted them for the several uses for which they now serve? How was the brain distinguished from the other parts of the body, and filled with spirits to move and animate the whole? How came the body to be fenced with bones and sinews, to be clothed with skin and flesh, distinguished into various muscles? Let them but answer these few questions about the mechanism of our bodies, and I will answer all the difficulties concerning the resurrection of them. But if they cannot do this without having recourse to the infinite power and wisdom of the First Cause, let them know, that the same power and wisdom can reanimate it, after it is turned into dust. And that there is no reason for our doubting concerning the thing, because there are some circumstances belonging to it which we cannot perfectly comprehend, or give a distinct account of.

II. I now proceed to the second thing I proposed, which was, to describe the difference the Scripture makes between the qualities of a mortal, and of a glorified body.

The change which shall be made in our bodies at the resurrection, according to the Scripture account, will consist chiefly in these four things: 1. That our bodies shall be raised immortal and incorruptible. 2. That they shall be raised in glory. 3. That they shall be raised in power. 4. That they shall be raised spiritual bodies.

1. The body that we shall have at the resurrection, shall be immortal and incorruptible: "For this corruptible must put on incorruption, and this mortal must put on immortality." Now these words immortal and incorruptible, not only signify, that we shall die no more; for in that sense the damned are immortal and incorruptible; but that we shall be perfectly free from all the bodily evils which sin brought into the world. That our bodies shall not be subject to sickness, or pain, or any other inconveniences we are daily exposed to. This the Scripture calls "the redemption of our bodies;" the freeing them from all their maladies. Were we to receive them again, subject to all the frailties and miseries which we are forced to wrestle with, I much doubt whether a wise man, were he left to his choice, would willingly take his again;—whether he would not choose to let his still lie rotting in the grave, rather than to be again chained to such a cumbersome clod of earth. Such a resurrection would be, as a wise heathen calls it, "A resurrection to another sleep." It would look more like a redemption to death again, than a resurrection to life.

The best thing we can say of this house of earth, is, That it is ruinous building, and will not be long before it tumbles into dust; that it is not our home: we look for another house, eternal in the heavens. That we shall not always be confined here, but that in a little time we shall be delivered from the bondage of corruption, from this burden of flesh, into the glorious liberty of the sons of God. What frail things these bodies of ours are! How soon are they disordered! To what a troop of diseases, pains and other infirmities are they constantly subject! And how does the least distemper disturb our minds, and make life itself a burthen! Of how many parts do our bodies consist! And if one of these be disordered, the whole man suffers. If but one of these slender threads, whereof our flesh is made up, be stretched beyond its due proportion, or fretted by any sharp humour, or broken, what torment does it create! Nay, when our bodies are at the best, what pains do we take to answer their necessities, to provide for their sustenance, to preserve them in health, and to keep them tenantable, in some tolerable fitness for our souls' use! And what time we can spare from our labour is taken up in rest, and refreshing our jaded bodies, and fitting them for work again. How are we forced, even naturally, into the confines of death; even to cease to be;—at least to pass so many hours without any useful or reasonable thoughts, merely to keep them in repair! But our hope and comfort are, that we shall shortly be delivered from this burthen of flesh. When “God shall wipe away all tears from our eyes, and there shall be no more death, neither sorrow, nor crying, neither shall there be any more pain; for the former things are passed away.” Oh when shall we arrive at that happy land where no complaints were ever heard, where we shall all enjoy unin interrupted health both of body and mind, and never more be exposed to any of those inconveniences that disturb our present pilgrimage! When we shall have once passed from death unto life, we shall be eased of all the troublesome care of our bodies, which now takes up so much of our time and thoughts. We shall be set free from all those mean and tiresome labours which we must now undergo to support our lives. Yon robes of light, with which we shall be clothed at the resurrection of the just, will not stand in need of those careful provisions which it is so troublesome to us here either to procure, or to be without. But then, as our Lord tells us, “Those who shall be accounted worthy to obtain that world, neither marry nor are given in marriage, neither can they die any more, but they are equal to the angels.” Their bodies are neither subject to disease, nor want that daily sustenance, which these mortal bodies cannot be without. “Meats for the belly, and the belly for meats; but God will destroy both it and them.” This is that perfect happiness which all good men shall enjoy in the other world. A mind free from all trouble and guilt, in a body free from all pains: i. e. diseases. Thus our mortal bodies shall be raised immortal. They shall not only be always preserved from death, (for so these might be, if God pleased,) but the nature of them shall be wholly changed, so that they shall not retain the same seeds of mortality: they cannot die any more.

2. Our bodies shall be raised in glory. “Then shall the righteous shine as the sun in the kingdom of their Father.” A resemblance of this we have in the lustre of Moses's face, when he had conversed with God on the mount. His face shone so bright, that the children of Israel were afraid to come near him, till he threw a veil over it. And that extraordinary majesty of Stephen's face, seemed to be an earnest of his glory.” All that sat in the council, looking steadfastly on him, saw his face as it had been the face of an angel.” How then, if it shone so gloriously even on earth, will it shine in the other world, when his, and the bodies of all the saints, are made like unto Christ's glorious body! How glorious the body of Christ is, we may guess from his transfiguration. St. Peter, when he saw this, when our Lord's face shone as the sun, and his raiment became shining and white as snow, was so transported with joy and admiration, that he knew not what he said. When our Saviour discovered but a little of that glory which he now possesses, and which in due time he will impart in his followers, yet that little of it made the place seem a paradise; and the disciples thought, that they could wish for nothing better than always to live in such pure light, and enjoy so beautiful a sight. “It is good for us to be here: let us make three tabernacles.” Here let us fix our abode for ever. And if they thought it so happy only to be present with such heavenly bodies, and to behold them with their eyes, how much happier must it be to dwell in such glorious mansions, and to be themselves clothed with so much brightness!

This excellency of our heavenly bodies, will probably arise in a great measure from the happiness of our souls. The unspeakable joy that we then shall feel, will break through our bodies, and shine forth in our countenances. As the joy of the soul, even in this life, has some influence upon the countenance, by rendering it more open and cheerful: so Solomon tells us, “A man's wisdom makes his face to shine.” Virtue, as it refines a man's heart, so it makes his very looks more cheerful and lively.

3. Our bodies shall be raised in power. This expresses the sprightliness of our heavenly bodies, the nimbleness of their motion, by which they shall be obedient and able instruments of the soul. In this state our bodies are no better than clogs and fetters, which confine and restrain the freedom of the soul. The corruptible body presses down the soul, and the earthly tabernacle weighs down the mind. Our dull, sluggish, inactive bodies, are often unable, or backward, to obey the commands of the soul. But in the other life, "they that wait upon the Lord shall renew their strength; they shall mount up with wings as eagles, they shall run and not be weary, they shall walk and not faint." Or, as another expresses it, "they shall run to and fro like sparks among the stubble." The speed of their motion, shall be like that of devouring fire in stubble, and the height of it above the towering of an eagle; for they shall meet the Lord in the air, when he comes to judgment, and mount up with him into the highest heaven. This earthly body is slow and heavy in all its motions, listless and soon tired with action. But our heavenly bodies shall be as fire; as active and as nimble as our thoughts are.

4. Our bodies shall be raised spiritual bodies. Our spirits are now forced to serve our bodies, and to attend their leisure, and do greatly depend upon them for most of their actions. But our bodies shall then wholly serve our spirits, and minister to them, and depend upon them. So that, as by a natural body, we understand one fitted for this lower, sensible world, for this earthly state; so a spiritual body is one that is suited to a spiritual state, to an invisible world, to the life of angels. And, indeed, this is the principal difference between a mortal and a glorified body. This flesh is the most dangerous enemy we have: we therefore deny and renounce it in our baptism. It constantly tempts us to evil. Every sense is a snare to us. All its lusts and appetites are inordinate. It is ungovernable, and often rebels against reason. The law in our members wars against the law of our mind. When the spirit is willing, the flesh is weak; so that the best of men are forced to keep it under, and use it hardly, lest it should betray them into folly and misery. And how does it hinder us in all our devotions! How soon does it jade our minds when employed on holy things! How easily by its enchanting pleasures, does it divert them from those noble exercises! But when we have obtained the resurrection unto life, our bodies will be spiritualized, purified, and refined from their earthly grossness; then they will be fit instruments for the soul in all its divine and heavenly employment; we shall not be weary of singing praises to God through infinite ages.

Thus after what little we have been able to conceive of it, it sufficiently appears that a glorified body is infinitely more excellent and desirable than this vile body. The only thing that remains is,

III. To draw some inferences from the whole. And first, From what has been said, we may learn the best way of preparing ourselves to live in those heavenly bodies, which is by cleansing ourselves more and more from all earthly affections, and weaning ourselves from this body and all the pleasures that are peculiar to it. We should begin in this life, to loosen the knot between our souls and this mortal flesh: to refine our affections, and raise them from things below to things above: to take off<sup>1</sup> our thoughts and disengage them from present and sensible things, and accustom ourselves to think of, and converse with, things future and invisible; that so our souls, when they leave this earthly body, may be prepared for a spiritual one, as having beforehand tasted spiritual delights, and being in some degree acquainted with the things which we then shall meet with. A soul wholly taken up with this earthly body is not fit for the glorious mansions above. A sensual mind is so wedded to bodily pleasures, that it cannot enjoy itself without them, and it is not able to relish any other, though infinitely to be preferred before them. Nay, such as follow the inclinations of their fleshly appetites, are so far unfit for heavenly joys, that they would esteem it the greatest unhappiness to be clothed with a spiritual body. It would be like clothing a beggar in the robes of a king. Such glorious bodies would be uneasy to them, they would not know what to do in them, they would be glad to retire and put on their rags again. But when we are washed from the guilt of our sins, and cleansed from all filthiness of flesh and spirit, by faith in the Lord Jesus Christ, then we shall long to be dissolved, and to be with our exalted Saviour: we shall be always ready to take wing for the other world, where we shall at last have a body suited to our spiritual appetites.

2. From hence we may see how to account for the different degrees of glory in the heavenly world. For although all the children of God shall have glorious bodies, yet the glory of them all shall not be equal. "As one star differeth from another star in glory, so also is the resurrection of the dead." They shall all shine as stars, but those who, by a constant diligence in well doing, have attained to a higher measure of purity than others, shall shine more bright than others. They shall appear as more glorious stars. It is certain that the most heavenly bodies will be given to the most heavenly souls; so that this is no little encouragement to us to make the greatest progress we possibly can in the knowledge and love of God, since the more we are weaned from the things of the earth now, the more glorious will our bodies be at the resurrection.

3. Let this consideration engage us patiently to bear whatever troubles we may be exercised with in the present life. The time of our eternal redemption draweth nigh. Let us hold out a little longer, (3d all tears shall be wiped from our eyes, and we shall never sigh nor sorrow any more. And how soon shall we forget all we endured in this earthly tabernacle, when once we are clothed with that house which is from above? We are now but on our journey towards home, and so must expect to struggle with many difficulties; but it will not be long ere we come to our journey's end, and that will make amends for all. We shall then be in a quiet and safe harbour, out of the reach of all storms and dangers. We shall then be at home in our Father's house, no longer exposed to the inconveniences, which, so long as we abide abroad in these tents, we are subject to. And let us not forfeit all this happiness, for want of a little more patience. Only let us hold out to the end, and we shall receive an abundant recompense for all the trouble and uneasiness of our passage, which shall be endless rest and peace.

'Let this especially fortify us against the fear of death: it is now disarmed, and can do us no hurt. It divides us indeed from this body awhile, but it is only that we may receive it again more glorious. As God therefore said once to Jacob, "Fear not to go down into Egypt, for I will go down with thee, and will surely bring thee up again;" so I may say to all who are born of God, Fear not to go down into the grave: lay down your heads in the dust; for God will certainly bring you up again, and that in a much more glorious manner. Only "be ye steadfast and unmoveable, always abounding in the work of the Lord," and then let death prevail over, and pull down, this house of clay; since God hath undertaken to rear it up again, infinitely more beautiful strong and useful.

In these words may be observed two things,

1. The thing described, viz., Christ's Father's house. Christ spoke to his disciples in the foregoing chapter as one that was about to leave them. He told 'em, verse 31, "Now is the Son of Man glorified, and God is glorified in him," and then goes to giving of them counsel to live in unity and love one another, as one that was going from them. By which they seemed somewhat surprised and hardly knew what to make of it. And one of them, viz., Peter, asked him where he was going; verse 36, "Simon Peter said unto him, Lord whither goest thou?" Christ did not directly answer and tell him where he was going, but he signifies where in these words afterwards, in the verse 12, he tells 'em plainly that he was going to his Father.

2. We may observe the description given of it, viz., that in it there are many mansions. The disciples seemed very sorrowful at the news of Christ's going away, but Christ comforts 'em with that, that in his Father's house where he was going there was not only room for him, but room for them too. There were many mansions. There was not only a mansion there for him, but there were mansions enough for them all; there was room enough in heaven for them. When the disciples perceived that Christ was going away, they manifested a great desire to go with him, and particularly Peter. Peter in the latter part of the foregoing chapter asked him whither he went to that end that he might follow him. Christ told him that whither he went he could not follow him now, but that he should follow him afterwards. But Peter, not content with Christ, seemed to have a great mind to follow him now. "Lord," says he, "why cannot I follow thee now?" So that the disciples had a great mind still to be with Christ, and Christ in the words of the text intimates that they shall be with him. Christ signifies to 'em that he was going home to his Father's house, and he encourages 'em that they shall be with him there in due time, in that there were many mansions there. There was a mansion provided not only for him, but for them all (for Judas was not then present), and not only for them, but for all that should ever believe in him to the end of the world; and though he went before, he only went to prepare a place for them that should follow.

The text is a plain sentence; 'tis therefore needless to press any doctrine in other words from it: so that I shall build my discourse on the words of the text. There are two propositions contained in the words, viz.,

I. that heaven is God's house, and

II. that in this house of God there are many mansions.

Prop. I. Heaven is God's house. An house of public worship is an house where God's people meet from time to time to attend on God's ordinances, and that is set apart for that and is called God's house. The temple of Solomon was called God's house. God was represented as dwelling there. There he has his throne in the holy of holies, even the mercy seat over the ark and between the cherubims.

Sometimes the whole universe is represented in Scripture as God's house, built with various stories one above another: Amos 9:6, "It is he that buildeth his stories in the heaven;" and Psalm 104:3, "Who layeth the beams of his chambers in the waters." But the highest heaven is especially represented in Scripture as the house of God. As to other parts of the creation, God hath appointed them to inferior uses; but this part he has reserved for himself for his own abode. We are told that the heavens are the Lord's, but the earth he hath given to the sons of men. God, though he is everywhere present, is represented both in Old Testament and New as being in heaven in a special and peculiar manner. Heaven is the temple of God. Thus we read of God's temple in heaven, Revelation 15:5. Solomon's temple was a type of heaven. The apostle Paul in his epistle to the Hebrews does from time to time call heaven the holy of holies, as being the antitype not only of the temple of Solomon, but of the most holy place in that temple, which was the place of God's most immediate residence: Hebrews 9:12, "He entered in once into the holy place;" verse 24, "For Christ is not entered into the holy places made with hands, which are the figures of the true, but into heaven itself." Houses where assemblies of Christians worship God are in some respects figures of this house of God above. When God is worshipped in them in spirit and truth, they become the outworks of heaven and as it were its gates. As in houses of public worship here there are assemblies of Christians meeting to worship God, so in heaven there is a glorious assembly, or Church, continually worshipping God: Hebrews 12:22,23, "But ye are come unto mount Sion, [and unto] the city of the living God, the heavenly Jerusalem, and to an innumerable company of angels, to the general assembly and church of the firstborn, that are written in heaven."

Heaven is represented in Scripture as God's dwelling-house; Psalm 113:5, "Who is like [unto] the Lord our God, who dwelleth on high," and Psalm 123:1, "Unto thee I lift up mine eyes, O thou that dwellest in the heavens." Heaven is God's palace. 'Tis the house of the great King of the universe; there he has his throne, which is therefore represented as his house or temple; Psalm 11:4, "The Lord is in his holy temple; the Lord's throne is in heaven."

Heaven is the house where God dwells with his family. God is represented in Scripture as having a family; and though some of this family are now on earth, yet in so being they are abroad and not at home, but all going home: Ephesians 3:15, "Of whom the whole family in heaven and earth is named." Heaven is the place that God has built for himself and his children. God has many children, and the place designed for them is heaven; therefore the saints, being the children of God, are said to be of the household of God, Ephesians 2:19: "Now therefore ye are no more strangers and foreigners, but fellow-citizens with the saints, and of the household of God." God is represented as a householder or head of a family, and heaven is his house.

Heaven is the house not only where God hath his throne, but also where he doth as it were keep his table, where his children sit down with him at his table and where they are feasted in a royal manner becoming the children of so great a King: Luke 22:30, "That ye may eat and drink at my table in my kingdom;" Matthew 26:29, "But I say unto you, I will not drink henceforth of this fruit of the vine until that day when I drink it new with you in my Father's kingdom."

God is the King of kings, and heaven is the place where he keeps his court. There are his angels and archangels that as the nobles of his court do attend upon him.

Prop. II. There are many mansions in the house of God. By many mansions is meant many seats or places of abode. As it is a king's palace, there are many mansions. Kings' houses are wont to be built very large, with many stately rooms and apartments. So there are many mansions in God's house.

When this is spoken of heaven, it is chiefly to be understood in a figurative sense, and the following things seem to be taught us in it.

1. There is room in this house of God for great numbers. There is room in heaven for a vast multitude, yea, room enough for all mankind that are or ever shall be; Luke 14:22, "Lord it is done as thou hast commanded, and yet there is room."

It is not with the heavenly temple as it often is with houses of public worship in this world, that they fill up and become too small and scanty for those that would meet in them, so that there is not convenient room for all. There is room enough in our heavenly Father's house. This is partly what Christ intended in the words of the text, as is evident from the occasion of his speaking them. The disciples manifested a great desire to be where Christ was, and Christ therefore, to encourage them that it should be as they desired, tells them that in his Father's house where he was going were many mansions, i.e., room enough for them.

There is mercy enough in God to admit an innumerable multitude into heaven. There is mercy enough for all, and there is merit enough in Christ to purchase heavenly happiness for millions of millions, for all men that ever were, are or shall be. And there is a sufficiency in the fountain of heaven's happiness to supply and fill and satisfy all: and there is in all respects enough for the happiness of all.

2. There are sufficient and suitable accommodations for all the different sorts of persons that are in the world: for great and small, for high and low, rich and poor, wise and unwise, bond and free, persons of all nations and all conditions and circumstances, for those that have been great sinners as well as for moral livers; for weak saints and those that are babes in Christ as well as for those that are stronger and more grown in grace. There is in heaven a sufficiency for the happiness of every sort; there is a convenient accommodation for every creature that will hearken to the calls of the Gospel. None that will come to Christ, let his condition be what it will, need to fear but that Christ will provide a place suitable for him in heaven.

This seems to be another thing implied in Christ's words. The disciples were persons of very different condition from Christ: he was their Master, and there were his disciples; he was their Lord, and there were the servants; he was their Guide, and they were the followers; he was their Captain, and they the soldiers; he was the Shepherd, and they the sheep; [he was, as it were, the] Father, [and they the] children; he was the glorious, holy Son of God, they were the poor, sinful, corrupt men. But yet, though they were in such different circumstances from him, yet Christ encourages them that there shall not only be room in heaven for him, but for them too; for there were many mansions there. There was not only a mansion to accommodate the Lord, but the disciples also; not only the head, but the members; not only the Son of God, but those that are naturally poor, sinful, corrupt men: as in a king's palace there is not only a mansion or room of state built for the king himself and for his eldest son and heir, but there are many rooms, mansions for all his numerous household, children, attendants and servants.

3. It is further implied that heaven is a house that was actually built and prepared for a great multitude. When God made heaven in the beginning of the world, he intended it for an everlasting dwelling-place for a vast and innumerable multitude. When heaven was made, it was intended and prepared for all those particular persons that God had from eternity designed to save: Matthew 25:34, "Come, ye blessed [of my Father, inherit the Kingdom] prepared for you [from the foundation of the world]." And that is a very great and innumerable multitude: Revelation 7:9, "After this I beheld, and, lo, a great multitude which no man could number, of all nations, and kindreds, and peoples, and tongues, stood before the throne and before the Lamb, clothed with white robes." Heaven being built designedly for these was built accordingly; it was built so as most conveniently to accommodate all this multitude: as a house that is built for a great family is built large and with many rooms in it; as a palace that is built for a great king that keeps a great court with many attendants is built exceeding great with a great many apartments; and as an house of public worship that is built for a great congregation is built very large with many seats in it.

4. When it is said, ["In my father's house are many mansions"], it is meant that there are seats of various dignity and different degrees and circumstances of honor and happiness. There are many mansions in God's house because heaven is intended for various degrees of honor and blessedness. Some are designed to sit in higher places there than others; some are designed to be advanced to higher degrees of honor and glory than others are; and, therefore, there are various mansions, and some more honorable mansions and seats, in heaven than others. Though they are all seats of exceeding honor and blessedness yet some are more so than others.

Thus a palace is built. Though every part of the palace is magnificent as becomes the palace of a king, yet there are many apartments of various honor, and some are more stately and costly than others, according to the degree of dignity. There is one apartment that is the king's presence-chamber; there are other apartments for the next heir to the crown; there are others for other children; and others for their attendants and the great officers of the household: one for the high steward, and another for the chamberlain, and others for meaner officers and servants.

Another image of this was in Solomon's temple. There were many mansions of different degrees of honor and dignity. There was the holy of holies, where the ark was that was the place of God's immediate residence, where the high priest alone might come; and there was another apartment called the holy place, where the other priests might come; and next to that was the inner court of the temple, where the Levites were admitted: and there they had many chambers or mansions built for lodging-rooms for the priests; and next to that was the court of Israel where the people of Israel might come; and next to that was the court of the Gentiles where the Gentiles, those that were called the "Proselytes of the Gate," might come.

And we have an image of this in houses built for the worship of Christian assemblies. In such houses of God there are many seats of different honor and dignity, from the most honorable to the most inferior of the congregation.

Not that we are to understand the words of Christ so much in a literal sense, as that every saint in heaven was to have a certain seat or room or place of abode where he was to be locally fixed. 'Tis not the design of the Scriptures to inform us much about the external circumstances of heaven or the state of heaven locally considered; but we are to understand what Christ says chiefly in a spiritual sense. Persons shall be set in different degrees of honor and glory in heaven, as is abundantly manifested in Scripture: which may fitly be represented to our imaginations by there being different seats of honor, as it was in the temple, as it is in kings' courts. Some seats shall be nearer the throne than others. Some shall sit next to Christ in glory: Matthew 20:23, "To sit on my right hand and on my left, is not mine to give, but it shall be given to them for whom it is prepared of my Father."

Christ has doubtless respect to these different degrees of glory in the text. When he was going to heaven and the disciples were sorrowful at the thoughts of parting with their Lord, he lets them know that there are seats or mansions of various degrees of honor in his Father's house, that there was not only one for him, who was the Head of the Church and the elder brother, but also for them that were his disciples and younger brethren.

Christ also may probably have respect not only to different degrees of glory in heaven, but different circumstances. Though the employment and happiness of all the heavenly assembly shall in the general be the same, yet 'tis not improbable that there may be circumstantial difference. We know what their employment [is] in general, but not in particular. We know not how one may be employed to subserve and promote the happiness of another, and all to help one another. Some may there be set in one place for one office or employment, and others [in] another, as 'tis in the Church on earth. God hath set every one in the body as it hath pleased him; one is the eye, another the ear, another the head, etc. But because God has not been pleased expressly to reveal how it shall be in this respect, therefore I shall not insist upon it, but pass to make some improvement of what has been offered.

I. Here is encouragement for sinners that are concerned and exercised for the salvation of their souls, such as are afraid that they shall never go to heaven or be admitted to any place of abode there, and are sensible that they are hitherto in a doleful state and condition in that they are out of Christ, and so have no right to any inheritance in heaven, but are in danger of going to hell and having their place of eternal abode fixed there. You may be encouraged by what has been said, earnestly to seek heaven; for there are many mansions there. There is room enough there. Let your case be what it will, there is suitable provision there for you; and if you come to Christ, you need not fear that he will prepare a place for you; he'll see to it that you shall be well accommodated in heaven.

But II. I would improve this doctrine in a twofold exhortation.

1. Let all be hence exhorted earnestly to seek that they may be admitted to a mansion in heaven. You have heard that this is God's house; it is his temple. If David, when he was in the wilderness of Judah and in the land of Geshur and of the Philistines, so longed that he might again return into the land of Israel that he might have a place in the house of God here on earth, and prized a place there so much, though it was but that of a door-keeper, how great a happiness will it be to have a place in this heavenly temple of God! If they are looked upon as enjoying a high privilege that have a seat appointed them in kings' courts or in apartments in kings' palaces, especially those that have an abode there in the quality of the king's children, then how great a privilege will it be to have an apartment or mansion assigned to us in God's heavenly palace, and to have a place there as his children! How great is their glory and honor that are admitted to be of the household of God!

And seeing there are many mansions there, mansions enough for us all, our folly will be the greater if we neglect to seek a place in heaven, having our minds foolishly taken up about the worthless, fading things of this world. Here consider three things:

(1) How little a while you can have any mansion or place of abode in this world. Now you have a dwelling amongst the living. You have a house or mansion of your own, or at least one that is at present for your use, and now you have a seat in the house of God; but how little a while will this continue! In a very little while, and the place that now knows you in this world will know you no more. The habitation you have here will be empty of you; you will be carried dead out of it, or shall die at a distance from it, and never enter into it any more, or into any other abode in this world. Your mansion or place of abode in this world, however convenient or commodious it may be, is but as a tent that shall soon be taken down, but a lodge in a garden of cucumbers. Your stay is as it were but for a night. Your body itself is but a house of clay which will quickly moulder and tumble down, and you shall have no other habitation here in this world but the grave.

Thus God in his providence is putting you in mind by the repeated instances of death that have been in the town within the two weeks past, both in one house: in which death he has shown his dominion over old and young. The son was taken away first before the father, being in his full strength and flower of his days; and the father, who was then well and having no appearance of approaching death, followed in a few days: and their habitation and their seat in the house of God in this world will know them no more.

Take warning by these warnings of Providence to improve your time that you may have a mansion in heaven. We have a house of worship newly created amongst us which now you have a seat in, and probably are pleased with the ornaments of it; and though you have a place in so comely a house, yet you know not how little a while you shall have a place in this house of God. Here are a couple snatched away by death that had met in it but a few times, that have been snatched out of it before it was fully finished and never will have any more a seat in it. You know not how soon you may follow, and then of great importance will it be to you to have a seat in God's house above. Both of the persons lately deceased were much on their death-beds warning others to improve their precious time. The first of them was much in expressing his sense of the vast importance of an interest in Christ, as I was a witness, and was earnest in calling on others to improve their time, to be thorough, to get an interest in Christ, and seemed very desirous that young people might receive council and warning from him, as the words of a dying man, to do their utmost to make sure of conversion; and a little before he died left a request to me that I would warn the young people in his room. God had been warning of you in his death and the death of his father that so soon followed. The words of dying persons should be of special weight with us, for then they are in circumstances wherein they are most capable to look on things as they are and judge aright of 'em,--between both worlds as it were. Still that we must all be in.

Let our young people, therefore, take warning from hence, and don't be such fools as to neglect seeking a place and mansion in heaven. Young persons are especially apt to be taken with the pleasing things of this world. You are now, it may be, much pleased with hopes of your future circumstances in this world; [and you are now, it may be, much] pleased with the ornaments of that house of worship that you with others have a place in. But, alas, do you not too little consider how soon you may be taken away from all these things, and no more forever have any part in any mansion or house or enjoyment or happiness under the sun? Therefore let it be your main care to secure an everlasting habitation for hereafter.

(2) Consider when you die, if you have no mansion in the house of God in heaven, you must have your place of abode in the habitation of devils. There is no middle place between them, and when you go hence, you must go to one or the other of these. Some have a mansion prepared for them in heaven from the foundation [of the world]; others are sent away as cursed into everlasting burnings prepared for the [devil and his angels]. Consider how miserable those must be that shall have their habitation with devils to all eternity. Devils are foul spirits; God's great enemies. Their habitation is the blackness of darkness; a place of the utmost filthiness, abomination, darkness, disgrace and torment, O, how would you rather ten thousand times have no place of abode at all, have no being, than to have a place [with devils]!

(3) If you die unconverted, you will have the worse place in hell for having had a seat or place in God's house in this world. As there are many mansions, places of different degrees of honor in heaven, so there are various abodes and places or degrees of torment and misery in hell; and those will have the worst place there that [dying unconverted, have had the best place in God's house here]. Solomon speaks of a peculiarly awful sight that he had seen, that of a wicked man buried that had gone [from the place of the holy], Ecclesiastes 8:10. Such as have had a seat in God's house, have been in a sense exalted up to heaven, set on the gate of heaven, [if they die unconverted, shall be] cast down to hell.

2. The second exhortation that I would offer from what has been said is to seek a high place in heaven. Seeing there are many mansions of different degrees of honor and dignity in heaven, let us seek to obtain a mansion of distinguished glory. 'Tis revealed to us that there are different degrees of glory to that end that we might seek after the higher degrees. God offered high degrees of glory to that end, that we might seek them by eminent holiness and good works: 2 Corinthians 9:6, "He that sows sparingly [shall reap also sparingly; and he that soweth bountifully shall reap also bountifully]." It is not becoming persons to be over anxious about an high seat in God's house in this world, for that is the honor that is of men; but we can't too earnestly seek after an high seat in God's house above, by seeking eminent holiness, for that is the honor that is of God.

'Tis very little worth the while for us to pursue after honor in this world, where the greatest honor is but a bubble and will soon vanish away, and death will level all. Some have more stately houses than others, and some are in higher office than others, and some are richer than others and have higher seats in the meeting-house than others; but all graves are upon a level. One rotting, putrefying corpse is as ignoble as another; the worms are as bold with one carcass as another.

But the mansions in God's house above are everlasting mansions. Those that have seats allotted 'em there, whether of greater or lesser dignity, whether nearer or further from the throne, will hold 'em to all eternity. This is promised, Revelation 3:12: "Him that overcometh I will make him a pillar in the temple [of my God, and he shall go no more out]." If it be worth the while to desire and seek high seats in the meeting-house, where you are one day in a week, and where you shall never come but few days in all; if it be worth the while much to prize one seat above another in the house of worship only because it is the pew or seat that is ranked first in number, and to be seen here for a few days, how will it be worth the while to seek an high mansion in God's temple and in that glorious place that is the everlasting habitation of God and all his children! You that are pleased with your seats in this house because you are seated high or in a place that is looked upon honorable by those that sit round about, and because many can behold you, consider how short a time you will enjoy this pleasure. And if there be any that are not suited in their seats because they are too low for them, let them consider that it is but a very little while before it will [be] all one to you whether you have sat high or low here. But it will be of infinite and everlasting concern to you where your seat is in another world. Let your great concern be while in this world so to improve your opportunities in God's house in this world, whether you sit high or low, as that you may have a distinguished and glorious mansion in God's house in heaven, where you may be fixed in your place in that glorious assembly in an everlasting rest.

Let the main thing that we prize in God's house be, not the outward ornaments of it, or a high seat in it, but the word of God and his ordinances in it. And spend your time here in seeking Christ, that he may prepare a place for you in his Father's house, that when he comes again to this world, he may take you to himself, that where he is, there you may be also.

Volume 5:

(Excepts which discuss the likelihood that there are different degrees of glory in heaven)

I now proceed to the thing proposed, viz. To answer objections.

Objection 1

We frequently find promises of eternal life and salvation, and sometimes of justification itself, made to our own virtue and obedience. Eternal life is promised to obedience, in Rom. ii. 7. "To them who by patient continuance in well doing seek for glory, honour, and immortality, eternal life:" And the like in innumerable other places. And justification itself is promised to that virtue of a forgiving spirit or temper in us, Matt. vi. 14. "For, if ye forgive men their trespasses, your heavenly Father will also forgive you: but if you forgive not men their trespasses, neither will your Father forgive your trespasses." All allow that justification in great part consists in the forgiveness of sins.

To this I answer

1. These things being promised to our virtue and obedience, argues no more, than that there is a connection between them and evangelical obedience; which, I have already observed, is not the thing in dispute. All that can be proved by obedience and salvation being connected in the promise, is, that obedience and salvation are connected in fact; which nobody denies; and whether it be owned or denied, is, as has been shewn, nothing to the purpose. There is no need that an admission to a title to salvation, should be given on the account of our obedience, in order to the promises being true. If we find such a promise, that he that obeys shall be saved, or he that is holy shall be justified, all thru is needful, in order to such promises being true, is, that it be really so, that he that obeys shall be saved, and that holiness and justification shall indeed go together. That proposition may be a truth, that he that obeys shall be saved; because obedience and salvation are connected together in fact; and yet an acceptance to a title to salvation not be granted upon the account of any of our own virtue or obedience. What is a promise, but only a declaration of future truth, for the comfort and encouragement of the person to whom it is declared? Promises are conditional propositions; and, as has been already observed, it is not ibc thing in dispute, whether other things besides faith may not have the place of the condition in such propositions wherein pardon and salvation are the consequent.
2. Promises may rationally be made to signs and evidences of faith, and yet the thing promised not be upon the account of the sign, but the thing signified. Thus, for instance, human government may rationally make promises of such and such privileges to those that can shew such evidences of their being free of such a civty, or members of such a corporation, or descended of such a family; when it is not at all for the sake of that which is the evidence or sign, in itself considered, that they are admitted to such a privilege, but only and purely for the sake of that which it is an evidence of. And though God docs not stand, in need of signs to know whether we have true faith or not, yet our own consciences do; so that it is much for our comfort that promises are made to signs of faith. Finding in ourselves a forgiving temper and disposition, may be a most proper and natural evidence to our consciences, that our hearts have, in a sense of our own utter unworthiness, truly closed and fallen in with the way of free and infinitely gracious forgiveness of our sins by Jesus Christ; whence we may be enabled, with the greater comfort, to apply to ourselves the promises of forgiveness by Christ.
3. It has been just now shewn, how that acts of evangelical obedience are indeed concerned in our justification itself, and are not excluded from that condition that justification depends upon, without the least prejudice to that doctrine of justification by faith, without any goodness of our own, that has been maintained; and therefore it can be no objection against this doctrine, that we have sometimes in scripture promises of pardon and acceptance made to such acts of obedience.

4. Promises of particular benefits implied in justification and salvation, may especially be fitly made to such expressions and evidences of faith as they have a peculiar natural likeness and suitableness to. As forgiveness is promised to a forgiving spirit in us; obtaining mercy is fitly promised to mercifulness in us, and the like: and that upon several accounts, they are the most natural evidences of our heart's closing with those benefits by faith; for they do especially shew the sweet accord and consent that there is between the heart and these benefits; and by reason of the natural likeness that there is between the virtue and the benefit, the one has the greater tendency to bring the other to mind; the practice of the virtue tends the more to renew the sense, and refresh the hope of the blessing promised; and also to convince the conscience of the justice of being denied the benefit, if the duty be neglected. Besides the sense and manifestation of divine forgiveness in our own consciences — yea, and many exercises of God's forgiving mercy, (as it respects God's fatherly displeasure,) granted after justification, through the course of a Christian's life — may be given as the proper rewards of a forgiving spirit, and yet this not be at all to the prejudice of the doctrine we have maintained; as will more fully appear, when we come to answer another objection hereafter to be mentioned.

Objection 2

Our own obedience, and inherent holiness, is necessary to prepare men for heaven; and therefore is doubtless what recommends persons to God's acceptance, as the heirs of heaven.

To this I answer

1. Our own obedience being necessary, in order to a preparation for an actual bestowment of glory, is no argument that it is the thing upon the account of which we are accepted to a right to it. God may, and does do many things to prepare the saints for glory, after he has accepted them as the heirs of glory. A parent may do much to prepare a child for an inheritance in its education, after the child is an heir; yea, there are many things necessary to fit a child for the actual possession of the inheritance, yet not necessary in order to its having a right to the inheritance.
2. If every thing that is necessary to prepare men for glory must be the proper condition of justification, then perfect holiness is the condition of justification. Men must be made perfectly holy, before they are admitted to the enjoyment of the blessedness of heaven; for there must in no wise enter in there any spiritual defilement. And therefore, when a saint dies, he leaves all his sin and corruption when he leaves the body.

Objection 3

Our obedience is not only indissolubly connected with salvation, and preparatory to it, but the scripture expressly speaks of bestowing eternal blessings as rewards for the good deeds of the saints. Matt. x. 42. "Whosoever shall give to drink unto one of these little ones a cup of cold water only, in the name of a disciple, he shall in no wise lose his reward." I Cor. iii. 8. "Every man shall receive his own reward according to his own labour." And in many other places. This seems to militate against the doctrine that has been maintained, in two ways:

1. The bestowing a reward, carries in it a respect to a moral fitness in the thing rewarded to the reward; I he very notion of a reward being a benefit bestowed in testimony of acceptance of, and respect to, the goodness or amiableness of some qualification or work in the person rewarded. Besides, the scripture seems to explain itself in this matter, in Rev. iii. 4. "Thou hast a few names, even in Sardis, which have not defiled their garments; and they shall walk with me in white; for they are worthy." This is here given as the reason why they should have such a reward, "because they were worthy;" which, though we suppose it to imply no proper merit, yet it at least implies a moral fitness, or that the excellency of their virtue in God's sight recommends them to such a reward; which seems directly repugnant to what has been supposed, viz. that we are accepted, and approved of God, as the heirs of salvation, not out of regard to the excellency of our own virtue or goodness, or any moral merit therein to such a reward, but only on account of the dignity and moral fitness of Christ's righteousness.

2. Our being eternally rewarded for our own holiness and good works, necessarily supposes that our future happiness will be greater or smaller, in some proportion as our own holiness and obedience is more or less; and that there are different degrees of glory, according to different degrees of virtue and good works, is a doctrine very expressly and frequently taught us in scripture. But this seems quite inconsistent with the saints' all having their future blessedness as a reward of Christ's righteousness: For if Christ's righteousness be imputed to all, and this be what entitles each one to glory, then it is the same righteousness that entitles one to glory which entitles another. But if all have glory as the reward of the same righteousness, why have not all the same glory? Does not the same righteousness merit as much glory when imputed to one as when imputed to another?

Response

In answer to the first part of this objection, I would observe, that it does not argue that we are justified by our good deeds, that we shall have eternal blessings in reward for them; for it is in consequence of our justification, that our good deeds become rewardable with spiritual and eternal rewards. The acceptableness, and so the rewardableness of our virtue, is not antecedent to justification, but follows it, and is built entirely upon it; which is the reverse of what those in the adverse scheme of justification suppose, viz. that justification is built on the acceptableness and rewardableness of our virtue. They suppose that a saving interest in Christ is given as a reward of our virtue, or, (which is the same thing,) as a testimony of God's acceptance of our excellency in our virtue. But the contrary is true; that God's respect to our virtue as our amiableness in his sight, and his acceptance of it as rewardable, is entirely built on our interest in Christ already established. So that the relation to Christ, whereby believers in scripture language are said to be in Christ, is the very foundation of our virtues and good deeds being accepted of God, and so of their being rewarded; for a reward is a testimony of acceptance. For we, and all that we do, are accepted only in the beloved, Eph. i. 6. Our sacrifices are acceptable, only through our interest in him, and through his worthiness and preciousness being, as it were, made ours. I Pet. ii. 4, 5. "To whom coming as unto a living stone, disallowed indeed of men, but chosen of God, and precious. Ye also, as lively stones, are built up a spiritual house, an holy priesthood, to offer up spiritual sacrifices, acceptable to God by Jesus Christ." Here being actually built on this stone, precious to God, is mentioned as all the ground of the acceptableness of our good works to God, and their becoming also precious in his eyes. So, Heb. xiii. 21. "Make you perfect in every good work to do his will, working in you that which is well pleasing in his sight, through Jesus Christ." And hence are we directed, whatever we offer to God, to offer It in Christ's name, as expecting to have it accepted no other way, than from the value that God has to that name. Col. iii. 17." And whatsoever ye do in word or deed, do all in the name of the Lord Jesus, giving thanks to God and the Father by him."

To act in Christ's name, is to act under him as our head, and as having him to stand for us, and represent us to God-ward. The reason of this may be seen from what has been already said, to shew it is not meet that any thing in us should be accepted of God as any excellency of our persons, until we are actually in Christ, and justified through him. The loveliness of the virtue of fallen creatures is nothing in the sight of God, till he beholds them in Christ, and clothed with his righteousness.

1. Because till then we stand condemned before God, by his own holy law, to his utter rejection and abhorrence.
2. Because we are infinitely guilty before him; and the loveliness of our virtue bears no proportion to our guilt, and must therefore pass for nothing before a strict judge.
3. Because our good deeds and virtuous acts themselves are in a sense corrupt; and the hatefulness of the corruption of them, if we are beheld as we are in ourselves, or separate from Christ, infinitely outweighs the loveliness of the good that is in them.

So that if no other sin was considered but only that which attends the act of virtue itself, the loveliness vanishes into nothing in comparison of it; and therefore the virtue must pass for nothing, out of Christ. Not only are our best duties defiled, in being attended with the exercises of sin and corruption which precede, follow, and are intermingled with them: but even the holy acts themselves, and the gracious exercises of the godly, are defective. Though the act most simply considered is good, yet take the acts in their measure and dimensions, and the manner in which they are exerted, and they are sinfully defective: there is that defect in them that may well be called the corruption of them. That defect is properly sin, an expression of a vile sinfulness of heart, and what tends to provoke the just anger of God: not because the exercise of love and other grace is not equal to God's loveliness, for it is impossible the love of creatures (men or angels) should be so, but because the act is so very disproportionate to the occasion given for love or other grace, considering God's loveliness, the manifestation that is made of it, the exercises of kindness, the capacity of human nature, and our advantages (and the like) together. A negative expression of corruption may be as truly sin, and as just cause of provocation, as a positive. Thus if a worthy and excellent person should, from mere generosity and goodness, exceedingly lay out himself, with great expense and suffering save another's life, or redeem him from some extreme calamity; and if that other person should never thank him for it, or express the least gratitude any way, this would be a negative expression of his ingratitude and baseness; but it is equivalent to an act of ingratitude, or positive exercise of a base unworthy spirit; and is truly an expression of it, and brings as much blame as if he by some positive act had much injured another person. And so it would be, (only in a lesser degree,) if the gratitude was but very small, bearing no proportion to the benefit and obligation: as if, for so great and extraordinary a kindness, he should express no more gratitude than would have been becoming towards a person who had only given him a cup of water when thirsty, or shewn him the way in a journey when at a loss, or had done him some such small kindness. If he should come to his benefactor to express his gratitude, and should do after this manner, he might truly be said to act unworthily and odiously; he would shew a most ungrateful spirit. His doing after such a manner might justly be abhorred by all; and yet the gratitude, that little there is of it, most simply considered, and so far as it goes, is good. And so it is with respect to our exercise of love, and gratitude, and other graces, towards God; they are defectively corrupt and sinful, and, take them as they are, in their manner and measure, might justly be odious and provoking to God, and would necessarily be so, were we beheld out of Christ. For in that this defect is sin, it is infinitely hateful; and so the hatefulness of the very act infinitely outweighs the loveliness of it; because all sin has infinite hatefulness and heinousness; but our holiness has but little value and loveliness, as has been elsewhere demonstrated.

Hence, though it be true that the saints are rewarded for their good works, yet it is for Christ's sake only, and not for the excellency of their works in themselves considered or beheld separately from Christ; for so they have no excellency in God's sight, or acceptableness to him, as has now been shewn. It is acknowledged that God, in rewarding the holiness and good works of believers, does in some respect give them happiness as a testimony of his respect to the loveliness of their holiness and good works in his sight; for that is the very notion of a reward. But it is in a very different sense from what would have been if man had not fallen; which would have been to bestow eternal life on man, as a testimony of God's respect to the loveliness of what man did, considered as in itself, and as in man separately by himself, and not beheld as a member of Christ. In which sense also, the scheme of justification we are opposing necessarily supposes the excellency of our virtue to be respected and rewarded; for it supposes a saving interest in Christ itself to be given as a reward of it.

Two things come to pass, relating to the saints' reward for their inherent righteousness, by virtue of their relation to Christ.

1. The guilt of their persons is all done away, and the pollution and hatefulness that attends and is in their good works, is hid.
2. Their relation to Christ adds a positive value and dignity to their good works in God's sight.

That little holiness, and those faint and feeble acts of love, and other grace, receive an exceeding value in the sight of God, by virtue of God's beholding them as in Christ, and as it were members of one so infinitely worthy in his eyes; and that because God looks upon the persons as of greater dignity on this account. Isa. xliii. 4. "Since thou wast precious in my sight, thou hast been honourable." God, for Christ's sake, and because they are members of his own righteous and dear Son, sets an exceeding value upon their persons; and hence it follows, that he also sets a great value upon their good acts and offerings. The same love and obedience in a person of greater dignity and value in God's sight, is more valuable in his eyes than in one of less dignity. Love is valuable in proportion to the dignity of the person whose love it is; because, so far as any one gives his love to another, he gives himself, in that he gives his heart. But this is a more excellent offering, in proportion as the person whose self is offered is more worthy. Believers are become immensely more honourable in God's esteem by virtue of their relation to Christ, than man would have been considered as by himself, though he had been free from sin; as a mean person becomes more honourable when married to a king. Hence God will probably reward the little weak love, and poor and exceeding imperfect obedience of believers in Christ, with more glorious reward than he would have done Adam's perfect obedience. According to the tenor of the first covenant, the person was to be accepted and rewarded, only for the work's sake; but by the covenant of grace, the work is accepted and rewarded, only for the person's sake: the person being beheld antecedently as a member of Christ, and clothed with his righteousness. So that though the saint's inherent holiness is rewarded, yet this very reward is indeed not the less founded on the worthiness and righteousness of Christ. None of the value that their works have in his sight, nor any of the acceptance they have with him, is out of Christ, and out of his righteousness; but his worthiness as mediator is the prime and only foundation on which all is built, and the universal source whence all arises. God indeed doth great things out of regard to the saints' loveliness, but it is only as a secondary and derivative loveliness. When I speak of a derivative loveliness, I do not mean only that the qualifications themselves accepted as lovely, are derived from Christ, from his power and purchase, but that the acceptance of them as a loveliness, and all the value that is set upon them, and all their connection with the reward, is founded in, and derived from Christ's righteousness and worthiness.

If we suppose that not only higher degrees of glory in heaven, but heaven itself, is in some respect given in reward for the holiness and good works of the saints, in this secondary and derivative sense, it will not prejudice the doctrine we have maintained. It is no way impossible that God may bestow heaven's glory wholly out of respect to Christ's righteousness, and yet in reward for man's inherent holiness, in different respects, and different ways. It may be only Christ's righteousness that God has respect to, for its own sake, the independent acceptableness and dignity of it being sufficient of itself to recommend all that believe in Christ to a title to this glory; and so it may be only by this that persons enter into a title to heaven, or have their prime right to it; and yet God may also have respect to the saints' own holiness, for Christ's sake, and as deriving a value from Christ's merit, which he may testify in bestowing heaven upon them. The saints being beheld as members of Christ, their obedience is looked upon by God as something of Christ's, it being the obedience of the members of Christ; as the sufferings of the members of Christ are looked upon, in some respect, as the sufferings of Christ. Hence the apostle, speaking of his suffering, says, Col. i. 24. "Who now rejoice in my sufferings for you, and fill up that which is behind of the afflictions of Christ in my flesh." To the same purpose in Matt. xxv. 35, &c. "I was an hungered, naked, sick, and in prison," &c. And so that in Rev. xi. 8. "And their dead bodies shall lie in the street of the great city, which spiritually is called Sodom and Egypt, where also our Lord was crucified."

By the merit and righteousness of Christ, such favour of God towards the believer may be obtained, as that God may hereby be already, as it were, disposed to make them perfectly and eternally happy. But yet this does not hinder, but that God in his wisdom may choose to bestow this perfect and eternal happiness in this way, viz. in some respect as a reward of their holiness and obedience.

It is not impossible but that the blessedness may be bestowed as a reward for that which is done after that an interest is already obtained in that favour, which (to speak of God after the manner of men) disposes God to bestow the blessedness. Our heavenly Father may already have that favour for a child, whereby he may be thoroughly ready to give the child an inheritance, because he is his child; which he is by the purchase of Christ's righteousness: and yet that the Father may choose to bestow the inheritance on the child in a way of reward for his dutifulness, and behaving in a manner becoming a child. And so great a reward may not be judged more than a meet reward for his dutifulness; but that so great a reward is judged meet, does not arise from the excellency of the obedience absolutely considered, but from his standing in so near and honourable a relation to God, as that of a child, which is obtained only by the righteousness of Christ. And thus the reward, and the greatness of it, arises properly from the righteousness of Christ; though it be indeed in some sort the reward of their obedience. As a father might justly esteem the inheritance no more than a meet reward for the obedience of his child, and yet esteem it more than a meet reward for the obedience of a servant. The favour whence a believer's heavenly Father bestows the eternal inheritance, and his title as an heir, is founded in that relation he stands in to him as a child, purchased by Christ's righteousness; though he in wisdom chooses to bestow it in such a way, and therein to testify his acceptance of the amiableness of his obedience in Christ.

Believers having a title to heaven by faith antecedent to their obedience, or its being absolutely promised to them before, does not hinder but that the actual bestowment of heaven may also be a testimony of God's regard to their obedience, though performed afterwards. Thus it was with Abraham, the father and pattern of all believers: God bestowed upon him that blessing of multiplying his seed as the stars of heaven, and causing that in his seed all the families of the earth should be blessed, in reward for his obedience in offering up his son Isaac. Gen. xxii. 16 — 18. "And said, By myself have I sworn, saith the Lord, for because thou hast done this thing, and hast not withheld thy son, thine only son; that in blessing I will bless thee, and in multiplying I will multiply thy seed as the stars of heaven, and as the sand which is upon the sea shore; and thy seed shall possess the gate of his enemies; and in thy seed shall all the nations o'f the earth be blessed; because thou hast obeyed my voice." And yet the very same blessings had been from time to time promised to Abraham, in the most positive terms, and the promise, with great solemnity, confirmed and sealed to him; as chap. xii. 2, 3. chap. xiii. 16. chap. xv. 1, 4 — 7, fec.; chap. xvii. throughout; chap. xviii. 10, 18.

From what has been said we may easily solve the difficulty arising from that text in Rev. iii. 4. "They shall walk with me in white, for they are worthy;" which is parallel with that text in Luke xx. 35. "But they which shall be accounted worthy to obtain that world, and the resurrection from the dead." I allow (as in the objection) that this worthiness does doubtless denote a moral fitness to the reward, or that God looks on these glorious benefits as a meet testimony of his regard to the value which their persons and performances have in his sight.

1. God looks on these glorious benefits as a meet testimony of his regard to the value which their persons have in his sight. But he sets this value upon their persons purely for Christ's sake. They are such jewels, and have such preciousness in his eyes, only because they are beheld in Christ, and by reason of the worthiness of the head they are the members of, and the stock they are grafted into. And the value that God sets upon them on this account is so great, that God thinks meet, from regard to it, to admit them to such exceeding glory. The saints, on account of their relation to Christ, are such precious jewels in God's sight, that they are thought worthy of a place in his own crown. Mai. iii. 17. Zech. ix. 16. So far as the saints are said to be valuable in God's sight, on whatever account, so far may they properly be said to be worthy, or meet for that honour which is answerable to the value or price which God sets upon them. A child or wife of a prince is worthy to be treated with great honour; and therefore if a mean person should be adopted to be a child of a prince, or should be espoused to a prince, it would be proper to say, that she was worthy of such and such honour and respect, and there would be no force upon the words in saying, that she ought to have such respect paid her, for she is worthy, though it be only on account of her relation to the prince that she is so.
2. From the value God sets upon their persons, for the sake of Christ's worthiness, he also sets a high value on their virtue and performances. Their meek and quiet spirit is of great price in his sight. Their fruits are pleasant fruits, their offerings are an odour of sweet smell to him; and that because of the value he sets on their persons, as has been already observed and explained. This preciousness or high-valuableness of believers is a moral fitness to a reward; and yet this valuableness is all in the righteousness of Christ, that is the foundation of it. The thing respected is not excellency in them separately by themselves, or in their virtue by itself, but the value in God's account arises from other considerations; which is the natural import of Luke xx. 35. "They which shall be accounted worthy to obtain that world," &c. and Luke xxi. 36. "That ye may be accounted worthy to escape all these things that shall come to pass, and to stand before the Son of man." 2 Thess. i. 5. "That ye may be counted worthy of the kingdom of God, for which ye also suffer."

There is a vast difference between this scheme, and what is supposed in the scheme of those that oppose the doctrine of justification by faith alone. This lays the foundation of first acceptance with God, and all actual salvation consequent upon it, wholly in Christ and his righteousness. On the contrary, in their scheme, a regard to man's own excellency or virtue is supposed to be first, and to have the place of the first foundation in actual salvation, though not in that ineffectual redemption, which they suppose common to all. They lay the foundation of all discriminating salvation in man's own virtue and moral excellency. This is the very bottom stone in this affair; for they suppose that it is from regard to our virtue, that even a special interest in Christ itself is given. The foundation being thus contrary, the whole scheme becomes exceeding diverse and contrary; the one is an evangelical scheme, the other a legal one; the one is utterly inconsistent with our being justified by Christ's righteousness, the other not at all. From what has been said, we may understand, not only how the forgiveness of sin granted in justification is indissolubly connected 'with a forgiving spirit in us, but how there may be many exercises of forgiving mercy granted in reward for our forgiving those who trespass against us. For none will deny but that there are many acts of divine forgiveness towards the saints, that do not presuppose an unjustified state immediately preceding that forgiveness. None will deny, that saints who never fell from a justified state, yet commit many sins which God forgives afterwards, by laying aside his fatherly displeasure. This forgiveness may be in reward for our forgiveness, without any prejudice to the doctrine that has been maintained, as well as other mercies and blessings consequent on justification.

With respect to the second part of the objection, that relates to the different degrees of glory, and the seeming inconsistency there is in it, that the degrees of glory in different saints should be greater or lesser according to their inherent holiness and good works, and yet, that every one's glory should be purchased with the price of the very same imputed righteousness,

I answer

That Christ, by his righteousness, purchased for everyone complete and perfect happiness, according to his capacity. But this does not hinder but that the saints, being of various capacities, may have various degrees of happiness, and yet all their happiness be the fruit of Christ's purchase. Indeed it cannot be properly said that Christ purchased any particular degree of happiness, so that the value of Christ's righteousness in the sight of God, is sufficient to raise a believer so high in happiness and yet higher, and so that if the believer were made happier, it would exceed the value of Christ's righteousness; but in general, Christ purchased eternal life, or perfect happiness for all, according to their several capacities. The saints are as so many vessels of different sizes, cast into a sea of happiness, where every vessel is full; or all. But after all, it is left to God's sovereign pleasure to determine the largeness of the vessel; Christ's righteousness meddles not with this matter. Eph. iv. 4, 5, 6, 7. "There is one body, and one Spirit, even as ye are called in one hope of your calling; one Lord, one faith, one baptism," &c. — "But unto every one of us is given grace according to the measure of the gift of Christ." God may dispense in this matter according to what rule he pleases, not the less for what Christ has done: He may dispense either without condition, or upon what condition he pleases to fix. It is evident that Christ's righteousness meddles not with this matter; for what Christ did was to fulfil the covenant of works; but the covenant of works did not meddle at all with this.

If Adam had persevered in perfect obedience, he and his posterity would have had perfect and full happiness; every one's happiness would have so answered his capacity, that he would have been completely blessed; but God would have been at liberty to have made some of one capacity, and others of another, as he pleased. — The angels have obtained eternal life, or a state of confirmed glory, by a covenant of works, whose condition was perfect obedience; but yet some are higher in glory than others, according to the several capacities that God, according to his sovereign pleasure, hath given them. So that it being still left with God, notwithstanding the perfect obedience of the second Adam, to fix the degree of each one's capacity by what rule he pleases, he hath been pleased to fix the degree of capacity, and so of glory, by the proportion of the saints' grace and fruitfulness here. He gives higher degrees of glory in reward for higher degrees of holiness and good works, because it pleases him; and yet all the happiness of each saint is indeed the fruit of the purchase of Christ's obedience. If it had been but one man that Christ had obeyed and died for, and it had pleased God to make him of a very large capacity, Christ's perfect obedience would have purchased that his capacity should be filled, and then all his happiness might properly be said to be the fruit of Christ's perfect obedience; though, if he had been of a less capacity, he would not have had so much happiness by the same obedience; and yet would have had as much as Christ merited for him. Christ's righteousness meddles not with the degree of happiness, any otherwise than as he merits that it should be full and perfect, according to the capacity: And so it may be said to be concerned in the degree of happiness, as perfect is a degree with respect to imperfect; but it meddles not with degrees of perfect happiness. This matter may be yet better understood, if we consider that Christ and the whole church of saints are, as it were, one body, of which he is the head, and they members, of different place and capacity: Now the whole body, head and members, have communion in Christ's righteousness; they are all partakers of the benefit of it; Christ himself the head is rewarded for it, and every member is partaker of the benefit and reward. But it does by no means follow, that every part should equally partake of the benefit, but every part in proportion to its place and capacity; the head partakes of far more than other parts, and the more noble members partake of more than the inferior. As it is in a natural body that enjoys perfect health, the head, and the heart, and lungs, have a greater share of this health, they have it more seated in them, than the hands and feet, because they are parts of greater capacity; though the hands and feet are as much in perfect health as those nobler parts of the body. So it is in the mystical body of Christ, all the members are partakers of the benefit of the head; but it is according to the different capacity and place they have in the body; and God determines that place and capacity as he pleases; he makes whom he pleases the foot, and whom he pleases the hand, and whom he pleases the lungs, etc. 1 Cor. xii. 18. "God hath set the members every one of them in the body, as it hath pleased him." God efficaciously determines the place and capacity of every member, by the different degrees of grace and assistance in the improvement of it in this world. Those that he intends for the highest place in the body, he gives them most of his Spirit, the greatest share of the divine nature, the spirit and nature of Christ Jesus the head, and that assistance whereby they perform the most excellent works, and do most abound in them.

Of The Resurrection Of The Dead; And In What State They Will Be After They Are Risen, And What Sort Of Bodies They Will Have

Treatise Concerning the State of Departed Souls Before and At and After the Resurrection

Written originally in Latin by the late Rev. Dr. Thomas Burnet, Master of the Charter-House, Author of the "Theory of the Earth." Translated into English by Mr. Dennis. The Second Edition, Corrected. London: 1739

Chapter VII - Of The Resurrection Of The Dead; And In What State They Will Be After They Are Risen, And What Sort Of Bodies They Will Have.

THUS far we have already gone; but the Chapter of the greatest Consequence, and the most important Concern is still remaining, concerning the Resurrection of the Dead, and in what Condition they will find themselves after they are risen; in the handling which we shall follow our usual Method: In the first Place, we shall speak to the Thing itself, and afterwards to the Modes and Adjuncts of it, and that according to the Light we have receiv'd either from the sacred Writings, or from the Nature of the Things themselves.

As for the Thing itself, nothing is more clearly revealed than that in the whole Christian Doctrine: Both the Jews and the Gentiles had likewise some Idea of a future Resurrection, but an Idea that was general and confus'd. The former believ'd that the whole World would be reviv'd, and that every Individual of Mankind would, together with the World, be renew'd and reviv'd; and nothing is more commonly found than that among the Stoicks and the Platonicks: Nor was it only found among the Grecian Philosophers, but originally among those of the Eastern Nations, Egyptians, Chaldeans, Persians. Theopompus, in Laertius, says of the Magi, "That Men liv'd or would live a second Life, according to the Doctrine of the Magi."

As for what relates to the Jews, Moses in his Law taught them nothing expressly, either concerning the Resurrection of the Body, or the Immortality of the Soul; yet I make no Doubt but that both these were known to Moses and to some the Sages, instructed and by him, and conscious of the secret Doctrine. Afterwards this Doctrine was delivered Conjecturally, by some of the sacred Canonical Writers more clearly, and at length by Daniel the Prophet more perspicuously. But yet this Doctrine of Salvation was not to shine out with a full Meridian Glare, nor to be compleat in all its Parts, nor accomplished in all its Numbers, till the Days of the Messiah.

The Jews, for the most part, confine the resurrection to the Just, and to Israelites. Again, they seem to mean the first Resurrection to a terrestrial Life, and to have no further Notion of celestial Bodies. Some of their Rabbins suppose, likewise, that they are to rise again not only with the same Bodies, but in the same Cloaths also: But they confine all this to the Land of Canaan only, and say, that the Bodies of such Israelite as have died in foreign Countries shall return Home through some subterraneous Caverns, or at least that the Bone Luz shall do so; and from thence, as from its Seed, the whole Body shall grow up again.

In this, then, we Christians triumph, upon this joyful Message, that Death being conquer'd, and the infernal World overcome, we shall be brought and restor'd to Light, and to the Enjoyment of a blissful Immortality; not in the coarse Cloathing of these Carcases which now we carry about us, but in heavenly Bodies; nor living and conversing upon this Dunghill, where we at present languish, but above, in the Brightness of aetherial Regions, in the charming Seats and Society of Angels, through endless Ages happy. Lift up your Head, then, O ye Christians! raise your Minds and Thoughts to the Skies!

And since we have these Promises, let us cleanse ourselves from all Filthiness of the Flesh and Spirit, perfecting Holiness in the Fear of God (2 Corinth. 7:1).

Having succinctly made these Remarks, let us now with all our Diligence explore upon what Passages of sacred Scripture, upon what Authority divine, this so exalted Hope of the Christians, this animating, this inspiring Hope, is founded and depends.

In the first Place, Christ, himself often asserted that Men after Death would rise again, and often promised it to his; and affirm'd that the Power of doing it was in himself, as Lord of Life, and of Death: And that he was not unable to raise up others, he plainly demonstrates, in that he was able to raise up himself from the Dead. First he maintain'd the Resurrection against the Sadducees, and maintain'd it by the strongest Argument that could be drawn from the Mosaick Writings, which alone, by Persons of that Sect, were held authentick and canonical: Then he promises Rewards in "the Resurrection of the Just," to those who are Benefactors to the Needy and the Infirm, from whom in this Life they can expect no Compensation. But to his Disciples, and to those who lose every Thing that they had in this World, in order to become such, he promises Things, "at their second Birth," or "at their Resurrection," which are greater and more conspicuous. Besides he openly and clearly affirms that Dominion over Life and Death is in him, and that he, by his own Power, by his own Voice, will cause the Dead to arise from their Graves. First of all, in the Beginning of the Revelations, where in these Words he speaks to St. John:

I am the First and the Last; I am he that liveth and was dead; and, behold, I am alive for evermore, Amen, and have the Keys of Hell and of Death. (Rev. 1:17-18)

In the next Place, in the Gospel of the same St. John, he several Times says the same Thing, Chap. vi. ver. 40.

And this is the Will of him that sent me, that every one which seeth the Son, and believeth on him, may have everlasting Life: And I will raise him up at the last Day (John 6:40).

In the next Place, in the same Gospel of St. John, he says to Martha.

I am the Resurrection, and the Life: He that believeth in me, though he were dead, yet shall he live. And whosoever liveth, and believeth in me, shall never die (John 11: 25).

And lastly, in the fifth Chapter of the same Gospel, you will find both these in Conjunction:

As the Father hath Life in himself, so hath he given to the Son to have Life in himself. And hath given him Authority to execute Judgment also, because he is the Son of Man. Marvel not at this, for the Hour is Coming, when all that are in the Graves shall hear his Voice, and shall come forth; they that have done Good, to the Resurrection of Life, and they that have done Evil, to the Resurrection of Damnation (John 11: 26-27).

All these Things being taken from the Mouth of Christ himself, abundantly prove the future Resurrection of the Dead. But Faith is animated and confirmed when Facts corroborate Words; and he has given us many Examples, that he is able to perform what he hath promis'd us. Therefore Christ, when he was here upon Earth, did not only cause others to rise from the Dead, which I must confess was formerly done by the Prophets before him, but he likewise raised up himself from the Dead, after he had been crucify'd, dead, and buried; for, taking off the Bands of Death on the third Day, the Soul fled Back to its sacred Relicts, and inspir'd them with immortal Life.

'Tis in this that we Christians glory, in this Victory thus extorted from the last and most potent Enemy, from the King of Terrors. Did ever any of the Grecian Sages, or of the Oriental Magi, did ever any of the Philosophers of what Name or Nation soever, did ever any of the renown'd Legislators, or lastly, any of the sacred Prophets rise from the Dead, lay down his Life, and resume it? Was ever any of those victorious over Death, and return'd to the Living? No, only this our Captain, this our God, led Death and Hell in Triumph: And 'tis from this Conqueror only that we expect both a joyful Deliverance from Death, and a blissful Immortality.

Nor did this Resurrection from Death happen to Christ, as to one who never thought of it, who never hoped for it, who never in the least expected it, and as an Action performed by another's Power; He not only knew that this would happen, but he foretold it both to his Disciples and others, and foretold that it would happen within three Days after Mark his Death.

He said to the Jews, Destroy this Temple, and in three Days I will raise it up again. But he spoke of the Temple of his Body (John 2:19)

Says the interpreting Apostle. And his Accusers afterwards brought this Saying as a Crime against him. And the chief Priests and Pharisees remembring this, desired of Pilate that the Sepulchre might be guarded, &c. which was accordingly done. Besides, Christ had said something like this to the Jews before, when they desired from him a Token Of his divine Mission:

As Jonas was three Days and three Nights in the Body of the Whale, so will the Son of Man be three Days and three Nights in the Heart of the Earth (Matt. 12:40).

This is sufficiently plain, and the Angel reproaches the Women who came to seek the Body of Christ in the Sepulchre, after he was risen, with the Forgetfulness of those Things:

He is not here but is risen: Remember how he spake unto you when he was yet in Galilee, saying, the Son of Man must be delivered into the Hands of sinful Men, and be crucified, and the third Day rise again: And they remembered his Words, as likewise did his Disciples (Luke 24:6-8)

Nor did he only by Signs and Parables, but very often by express Words, foretel both his Death and his Resurrection, and that each of them would be spontaneous.

Therefore doth my Father love me, because I lay down my Life, that I might take it again; No Man taketh it from me, but I lay it down of myself: I have Power to lay it down, and I have Power to take it up again (John 10:18).

Then he says afterwards:

A little while and ye shall not see me; and again a little while and ye shall see me, because I go to the Father (John 16:16).

Which he afterwards shews is meant of his Death, and of his second Coming.

And this Power that he had, when he pleased to use it, of preserving his Life safe and inviolable, appeared as clear as the Meridian Sun in a bright Day, when his Enemies coming upon him, he all of a sudden rendered himself invisible, and them confounded and impotent. Nay, by the Virtue of his Look alone, by the very radiant Light of his Countenance, he terrify'd and dispirited those who came with a Design to destroy him. Lastly, in his Transfiguration upon the holy Mountain, he converted himself wholly into a vital Flame, as it were, into a refulgent Body, of Angelick Form, or rather of divine Glory. By which Transformation of his Body, he sufficiently shew'd, that he had Life in himself, and that it was in his Power, as often as it was his Pleasure, to trample up'on Death, and to swallow up all Mortality. And let me add, since 'tis to my Purpose, that in this his Glorification, bringing down Moses and Elias from Heaven, both living, and both immortal, he, in them, gave us Pledges and Examples of our own Immortality, and our future Resurrection; which appeared more openly afterwards, when upon the Resurrection of Christ, divers of the Saints rising together from the Dead with him, appeared to many in Jerusalem.

Lastly, That I may put an End to this Discourse, Christ did not only rise from the Dead, but he ascended likewise into Heaven. After he had gotten a Victory he triumph'd: And being carried in a radiant Cloud, as it were, in a triumphal Chariot, his Disciples beholding him with Astonishment, and Troops of Angels attending him, he returned to his ancient Seat, to what was his Country from all Eternity, and to God the Father. This is the only true Apotheosis, which the ancient Caesars, and the Heroes of old, and others renown'd in the Heathen World for their surpassing Merit, their Fortitude, and their Wisdom; all of them in vain affected. And now, since Christ our Saviour has said, and has done all this, both among the Living and the Dead, and reigns at length in the Heaven of Heavens endued with a glorious Body, 'Tis but just that We should believe what he has taught, and promised us concerning our own Resurrection to be certain, established, and unchangeable.

Having thus compendiously laid before you the Sayings, and the Actions of Christ, which relate to our Resurrection, the Apostolical Doctrine of the Resurrection follows concerning the same Subject, which being agreeable to what has been already said, is something more diffuse, and comprehends several Heads: But principally let us observe this, that the Resurrection of the Body is never attributed by the Apostles to natural Causes, or natural Power, but always to divine Operation; and very frequently to Christ our Lord, whom alone we have hitherto made the Author of this admirable Work. In that solemn Dissertation of St. Paul, concerning the future Resurrection of the Body, he makes Christ the Author of our Resurrection, both in the Beginning, Middle, and End of his Discourse; to which he gives so strict a Connexion with the Resurrection of our Lord, that they both must be granted or denied together: If Christ, says he, be preached that he rose from the Dead, how say some among you that there is no Resurrection of the Dead? where he supposes our Resurrection to be the undeniable Consequence of the Resurrection of Christ.

But then, says he, on the other Side, If there be no Resurrection of the Dead, then is Christ not risen: And therefore he very justly, in the Beginning of this Discourse, proves the Resurrection of Christ by Abundance of Testimonies, as the Foundation of his Doctrine and Institution concerning our own Resurrection.

Besides, he places the Root of all celestial Life in Christ, as in Adam the Root of all Mortality, whom, therefore, he makes the Type of Christ:

For as in Adam all Men die, so in Christ shall all he made alive (1 Cor. 15:22).

whom, therefore, he says, was made a quickning Spirit. Lastly, by the same Jesus Christ, he insults over Death and Hell, now conquer'd both, and disarm'd:

O Death! where is thy Sting? O Grave! where is thy Victory? Thanks be to God, who giveth us the Victory through Jesus Christ our Lord. For he had said before, For he must reign till he hath put all Enemies under his Feet: The last Enemy that shall be destroy'd, is Death (1Cor. 15:55)

But Death cannot be destroy'd but by an universal Resurrection.

Nor is it only in this Chapter, but in others, as often as Occasion offers itself, that he teaches us that the Cause and Origin of our Resurrection is founded in that of Christ, and that he, by his Resurrection, was constituted Lord of the Living and of the Dead, and of the future Judgment that is to succeed the Resurrection:

For ye are dead, and your Life is hid with Christ in God; but when Christ, who is our Life, shall appear, then shall ye also appear with him in Glory (Col. 3:3-4).

Says the same Apostle to the Colossians, Chap. iii. ver. 3, 4. And he says like wise to the Philippians:

For our Conversion is in Heaven, from whence also we look for the saviour, the Lord Jesus Christ, who shall change our vile Body, that it may be fashion'd like unto his glorious Body, according to the Working whereby he is able to subdue all Things to himself (Phil. 3:20).

These Testimonies of the Apostles require some farther Consideration: In the first Place then we must observe, that the Apostles, in their Preachings to the Jews and Gentiles after Christ was ascended, always began with this Assertion, that Christ was risen from the Dead: From whence they established the Christian Religion on a double Foundation, That Jesus of Nazareth was the Messiah; and likewise, what there was to be a future Resurrection from the Dead. While Jesus was upon Earth, he proved himself to be the Messiah by his Miracles, and the concurring Testimonies of the Prophets: But when he was risen from the Dead, and had ascended up into Heaven in the Sight of the Apostles, they thence took a new Argument to demonstrate, both that the same Jesus was the Messiah, and likewise farther, that the Hopes of Christians concerning a future Resurrection and eternal Life, were firmly founded on him; Hence in the Acts of the Apostles we find, that this Topick was always instilled upon by the first Apostolical Preachers of the Gospel, in all their Sermons.

I should be tedious if I should here produce more Passages (especially since they are sufficiently known,) to prove from Christ our Head, the First-born of the Dead, the first Fruits of those that Sleep (1Cor. 15:20.) to prove, I say, that from his Influence and his Power the Hope of our Resurrection depends; nor yet does it so far depend upon Christ, that it does likewise depend originally upon God the Father. Both Christ and his Apostles Often affirm that, It depends also in some Manner upon the Holy Ghost, and both concur in this divine Operation. So the Apostle to the Romans teaches us:

But if the Spirit of him that raised up Jesus from the Dead dwell in you, he, that raised up Christ from the Dead shall also quicken your mortal Bodies, by his Spirit that dwelleth in you (Romans 8:11).

Nor do I at all wonder, that the Father, the Son, and the Holy Ghost, would, in some manner, co-operate in the Resurrection of the Dead, since 'tis like a new Creation, when numberless Souls are all at once, from an invisible State, brought forth into Light, as it were, from nothing, and all of them re-invested with Bodies of their several Kinds; nay, the Souls themselves have, as it were, a Regeneration, a new Life, and a new World, and all Things around them new: And therefore the Apostle does, with a mighty Emphasis of Words, set forth all the mighty Power of God, as employed and exerted in producing this wonderful Work (Eph.. 1:19).

Hitherto we have set forth the Certainty or Stability of our Resurrection, and the efficient Causes of it from the sacred Writings: And all These are clearly reveal'd. Let us now proceed to Things that are less clearly and less expressly determin'd. And here the Question first offers itself which is propos'd by the Apostle, viz. With what Sort of Bodies Men shall rise again? How are the Dead raised up? or with what Body do they come? That we may answer this Question, and discover the Qualities of that Body with which we are to be cloath'd at the Resurrection, we must observe, in the first Place, what Powers and what Qualities the sacred Writers attribute to such a Body. Upon thus allowing These, which, upon the Testimony of the Scripture, we know belong to those Bodies, we are to enquire farther what other more particular Qualities, by a just Reasoning, may be deduced from them, and which may more nearly and intimately discover the Nature and physical Constitution of those Bodies. Lastly, we must consult the Nature of Things, which must be call'd in to our Aid, when we are enquiring into corporeal Beings, that we impute nothing, through our Ignorance, to the sacred Oracles, that is incongruous or absurd.

But that we may act compendiously, that Question of the Apostle, With what Bodies are we to arise? seems chiefly to include two Things: First, with what Body? that is, whether with an organical Body, and a Body like that which at present we carry about us; or whether with a Body that is inorganical, and of another Form, and another Order from that which we have at present. But secondly, with what Body? that is, whether with a gross and closely compacted Body, such as we now have, or with a thin, a loose, and a light one, resembling Air or Ether. One of These doubtful Points, you see, respects the Form of our future Body, and the other the Matter; and if we can give a good Account of both These, we shall, I presume, give a satisfactory Answer to the propounded Question.

Now 'tis from the sacred Writings that we must bring the Answer to both Parts of the Question; and not only from this Chapter of St. Paul to the Corinthians, but from every Passage where either Christ or his Apostles explain the Conditions of those Bodies which we shall enjoy in the Heavens. Of These Conditions some are general and common, which can discover nothing certain or definitive in this kind: Others are special and proper, which may be call'd Characters, or Characteristical Tokens; to which, if we diligently attend, they will bring us to a Discovery of the Form or the Matter of the Bodies of the Beatified. We will, as the nature of the Subject requires, divide These Characteristical Tokens into two Orders; the former of which will answer the first Part of the Question, and the latter the second Part. The four following sacred Characteristical Tokens seem to discover and to give us a View of the Form of our immortal Body, whether it is to be organical or inorganical.

First, it will have no Occasion for either Belly or Edibles; secondly, of Flesh and Blood it will not consist; thirdly, it will be a Body not made with Hands; and therefore fourthly, it will be a Body by which we shall be like to the Angels. Each of These four Characters must be examin'd apart from the rest, that we may be able to discern what Validity each of them has, how much is implied in it, and how far it extends.

As for the first, the Apostle speaks thus concerning it; Meats are for the Belly, and the Belly for Meats; but God shall abolish both it and them. But when will he abolish them? Not in this Life; therefore in the Life to come: Not in this mortal Body; therefore in the glorious and immortal Body. But if that Body will want a Belly, it will consequently want those Entrails, those Vessels, and all those Parts which are contain'd in the Cavity of that Belly. But all These being subtracted, what Sort of Body will remain, Why, a Body that is whose Parts are separated by empty Space; in short, a Body altogether imperfect, if we regard the Nature of an organical Body. And then, the Parts which are under the Belly will either be wanting, or will be of no Use; of which we shall say more hereafter. Lastly, the Thighs, the Legs, and Feet, are the necessary Instruments of Walking, and Walking is perform'd upon a Substance that is itself immoveable. But since in the Air, or in the Heavens, there is no immoveable Substance to tread on, there is neither Pavement, nor Porch, nor Gallery; there local Motion will be perform'd not after the Manner of Walking, but in the same Manner in which the Angels move. These lower Parts of the Body then will be all of them together abolish'd, as useless and superfluous.

Besides, where there is no Food, there can be no Nutrition; but several Faculties and several Organs were made on Purpose to be subservient to Nutrition, which must likewise be abolish'd, when our Food is: Such are the Organs of Taste, of Chewing and Swallowing; the Organs of Conception, of Sanctification, and those of Distribution; and not a few of the Glands are useful to Nutrition or Secretion. Now what organick Body can bear the Loss of so many Parts! and yet the Body which we are to have must endure it all, if we have rightly calculated. These numerous Parts, then, being thus separated, or cut off from the Body, let us next consider what we are to determine concerning Flesh and Blood, whether they too are like to perish together with those which are mention'd before.

After the Apostle had treated of the Qualities of blessed Bodies, at the End of that Discourse he adds;

But I say unto you, Brethren, that Flesh and Blood cannot inherit the Kingdom. of God (1Cor. 15:50)

The Apostle says absolutely they cannot. There is, it seems, some Repugnancy between the celestial State and the Conditions of Flesh and Blood; and therefore there is a Necessity that the Body, with which the Soul is invested in Heaven after the Resurrection, should be without Flesh, and without Blood.

But you will say, perhaps, that Flesh and Blood, in this Expression of the Apostle, are not to be literally understood, but mystically, or allegorically, as they denote the Works of the Flesh, or moral Purity and Impurity. To which I answer, first, that this is said without any Proof, and not only without any Proof, but against the receiv'd Rule of Interpreting; by which we are never to depart from the Letter, unless we are urg'd by Necessity from the Nature of the Thing, and of the Subject Matter; but here is no such Necessity. Besides, the rest of the Characteristical Marks are so agreeable to this, and so nearly related to it, (as will clearly appear by what is to follow,) that we are rather on the other Side urg'd by Necessity, a Necessity of retaining the literal Sense: For the Words that follow in the same Verse sufficiently shew, that Flesh and Blood are to be understood physically, and not morally; for that which follows is,

Neither doth Corruption inherit Incorruption (1Cor. 15:40).

Corruption is there understood physically; and the Apostle designs that we should understand this our corruptible Body; and by Incorruption an incorruptible State.

But, perhaps, you will attempt to elude the Force of this Answer another Way; you will say, perhaps, that Flesh and Blood, such as we have at present, cannot inherit the Kingdom of Heaven; but that another Sort of Flesh and Blood, such as we are to have after the Resurrection, may inherit it. But to answer effectually to this, the Apostle no where at this Rate distinguishes between two Kinds of Flesh and Blood, the corruptible Kind, and the incorruptible. He, indeed, mentions several Kinds of Flesh, as of Men, of Beasts, of Fish, and of Fowls, and all These are alike corruptible; but he no where makes mention of Flesh that is incorruptible, tho' a fair Occasion offers itself. He no where uses this Distinction among several others, Corruptible Flesh is one Thing, and Flesh incorruptible another Thing. On the contrary, he seems to suppose, or to take it for granted, that all Flesh and Blood are corruptible, and consequently lays down an universal Proposition, without Limitation or Distinction, Flesh and Blood cannot inherit the Kingdom of God, that is, a Body compos'd of Flesh and Blood: Corruption, in the latter Part of the Verse, answers exactly to Flesh and Blood in the former Part; and Incorruption in the latter Part, to the Kingdom of God in the former Part. They mingle Heaven and Earth together who at this Rate confound Corruptible and Incorruptible. Incorruptible Blood seems to me to be what Logicians call a Contradiction in adjecto: For the Stamina of the Blood are of a very dissolvable Texture and Mixture, and when they are dissolv'd, Corruption or Putrefaction follows. And the same Thing may be said of Flesh, which is nothing but Blood and similar Juices coagulated. But we shall say more of this Matter anon, when we treat of the Blood and the glorious Body of Christ.

These Things, in the mean while, being thus discuss'd, it appears to me to be sufficiently evident, that the Saying of the Apostle, that Flesh and Blood are incapable of possessing the Kingdom of Heaven, ought to be understood as it is pronounced, literally and universally; and that consequently our celestial and incorruptible Bodies will be void of Flesh and Blood, and likewise of all Organs and all Parts that are compos'd of Flesh and Blood; But if not only Blood is wanting, but the whole Frame and Structure of Flesh, nothing will remain but a sapless Skeleton, depriv'd of all the Ornament, the Beauty, and the Majesty of a human organick Body.

Hitherto we have prov'd, from the sacred Writings, that the Bodies of Saints in Heaven are not organical, with regard to their several Parts; now let us consult other Characteristical Marks that regard and comprehend the whole Body: As when our celestial Body is said by the Apostle to be “not made with hands”; and when, in regard to that Body, we are said to be “not made with hands”. As to the first, the Apostle, in that Passage to the Corinthians, forms a Comparison, and, as it were, an Antithesis, between the Body which we have at present, and that which we shall have hereafter in the Heavens. The Question is, therefore, what is his Meaning? or how that Word is to be interpreted? If you render it verbatim, “not made with Hands”, from that there will be no Antithesis between the Body which we are to have, and that which we have at present; for this latter is by no means made with Hands, nor by any human Art, but has its Source from liquid Seed; and from a minute Drop grows to a greater Mass, and to an admirable Frame, by a Force internal, and as it were divine, without the Assistance of any Hand, or the Co-operation of any Art of Man. Secondly, if you render it which seems to have a more extensive Signification, neither by this Means will you preserve the Antithesis or the Distinction from our present Body, which is equally, with the other, inartificial, it being natural both in its Rise and Increase: But yet the Body which we have at present, in another Regard, has the Appearance of an artificial Body, or of a Body mechanically fram'd, that is, as far as it is compos'd of numerous Parts of various Matter, aptly articulately join'd together, and, as it were, coagulated. This Way you constitute a mechanical or organical Fabrick, which may be said to be “made with Hands;” and according to this Analogy, “not made with hands” and “inorganical” have one and the same Meaning; by which Interpretation the Antithesis is preserved between the two Kinds of Bodies, that which we have at present, and the celestial; and we conclude, that the Bodies of the Blessed in Heaven are Bodies inorganical.

But tho' in this Passage of the Apostle the foresaid Antithesis is not both Ways express'd, yet in another Place both Parts of the Opposition or the Comparison are express'd: As in the Saying of Christ (Mark 14:58); “the Temple made with Hands,” is oppos'd to “the temple not made with Hands;” and Christ by both means his own Body, and calls that which he had when he was here upon Earth, “made with Hands,” and the other “not made with Hands;" in which Comparison the foresaid Antithesis can hardly be explain'd any other Way than we have explain'd it above. And the Apostle, in his Epistle to the Hebrews, Chapter 9 confirms this Explication, where he dwells upon this Similitude of the Tabernacle, to which he tacitly here alludes. And as Christ names the Temple, the Apostle calls the Tabernacle, or the Sanctuary, "made with hands", (Ver. 24.) to which our terrestrial Body answers. Then he calls the celestial Body of Christ "not made with hands" (Ver. n.) and adds, by Way of Exposition, that is to say, "not of this Building, or this Structure, but of a different Form from this terrestrial and organick Body." But concerning this Word, and this Character, we have sufficiently spoke.

The only remaining Characteristical is taken from the Equality upon which the Blessed in Heaven shall be with the Angels. Christ says to the Sadducees, that the Sons of the Resurrection shall be "like to the Angels", which, at first View, seems only to regard Marriages and Copulations, yet not to the Exclusion of other Things: So far from it, that Christ seems rather to have taken that Occasion to deliver a more general Sentence; by which the Equality of the Sons of the Resurrection with the Angels, both may and ought to be further extended: And it is actually further extended by St. Luke, who after this Manner delivers this Saying of Christ:

But they which shall be accounted worthy to obtain that World, and the Resurrection from the Dead, neither marry, nor are given in Marriage; neither can they die any more, for they are equal unto the Angels (Luke 20:36).

From These Words it appears to me to be evident, first, that the Angels have Bodies; then, that we shall have such Bodies as the Angels have, that is, inorganical Bodies.

The Sons of the Resurrection are the Sons of God, says Christ (Luke 20:36), as the Angels are called. I am not ignorant that the Expression, "Sons of God", is, in some Sense, to be applied to the Saints in this Life, namely, as they have received the Spirit of Adoption, and the certain Hope of a future Inheritance and Glory: But when 'tis spoken of a future Life, it seems to denote the Angelical State, according to this Saying of Christ here and in other Places (Matt. 5:9; John)

As to the first, if that Equality upon which the Blessed shall be with the Angels, consists only in the spiritual Part of each of them, and not in their Bodies; then, our Bodies may be mortal after the Resurrection, notwithstanding this Equality. But we are told by Christ, that by reason of this Equality we can die no more: This Equality, then, must regard the Bodies of each, or the corporeal Part of them; for we die, or are mortal, only with respect to the Body, whether in this Life or in the Life to come: Besides, this Immortality, or Equality with the Angels, concerning which Christ instructs us, are Privileges that accrue to us by arid after the Resurrection; but the Soul has been always immortal, from its Creation; and that Immortality that comes to us by and after the Resurrection, is the Immortality of the Body. 'Tis in this Respect, that we are equal to the Angels; for, in short, we would be like to the Angels rather before than after the Resurrection, if the Angels had not Bodies.

This St. Austin openly asserted: "Our Bodies," says he, "after the Resurrection, shall be such as are the Bodies of Angels;" at the Words, "Thou hast delivered my Soul from the lowermost Hell" And upon Psalm 110 not far from the Beginning, he calls our heavenly Body "an Angelical Body." Tertullian's Phrase is "Angelic Flesh" (de Refurr. Cam. e. S.6). And again, he calls it "a Change to an Angelical Substance" (Lib. iii. centra Marc. c. ult.) Lactantius calls it "a transformation into the Likeness of Angels" (Lib. vii c. 26). You may consult at your Leisure more Places of St. Austin that speak the same Sense, "of the Bodies of Fallen Angels, and those that are not fallen;" and others of like stature.

That the Angels are not naked spiritual Substances, but clothed with Bodies of their own Kind and Order, seems to be demonstrable to me from this, that they are to constitute the Attendance, and the Guard of Christ, upon the glorious Day of his Coming. They must of Necessity, then, be visible, and clothed with Bodies, and those of a more noble Order, that they may augment and accomplish the Majesty and the Magnificence of that celestial Pomp. Angels usually appear cloathed in bright Bodies. See the Places in Gerard. Tom. 9 f. 659. about the Middle. And what St. Jude says of them, that they left their proper Habitation, (ver. 6) may denote either their Bodies, or their corporeal Places.

Nor will you, I believe, presume to say, that they will have Bodies at that Time, but Bodies which they will borrow, compos'd of Air for that Occasion only; Bodies to be thrown off, and again dispers'd when the Pomp of the Spectacle is over: I believe you will hardly suffer this to be said, that Christ, indeed, will return with innumerable Attendance, but an Attendance of Phantoms only, with a thousand thousand transitory and fugitive Shadows, and idle empty Visions, and that such Angels as These in Masquerade surround the Throne of God (2 Cor. 40)

Besides, when in the sacred Writings 'tis said, that Satan sometimes transforms himself to an Angel of Light, that Metamorphosis supposes that an Angel of Light has some outward Form, and some visible Species, by which he is known and distinguished from the others. But that, be it what it will, he cannot possibly have unless he has a Body. And as for the evil Angels in general, when they are capable of Pain and Torment by Means of corporeal Fire, and are destin'd to suffer it, 'tis evident from this, that those degenerate Spirits have their Bodies, whatever those Bodies are. Besides, on the other Side, 'tis impossible there can be any Society, any Commerce, between the Good and the Holy Angels, and Saints, and beatified Spirits, unless both the one and the other are in some Manner visible and incorporated.

Lastly, Give me leave to ask one Question; Can any one of a sound understanding, and who has a just Estimation of the Works of God? can such a one upon considering the Thing seriously, believe sincerely, and from his Soul, that the Celestial and Etherial Regions, vast as they are, and almost boundless, can be without any visible intelligent Creature, without any Animal indued with Reason, except a few human Souls? What Wilds, what Solitudes, what, next to infinite Deserts, must such a one suppose that there are in the Nature of Things, which Space the good and the great God, wanted neither Power nor Goodness to replenish with proper Inhabitants? But if you are of Opinion with us, that Angels have Bodies proper to their Kind and Order, not, indeed, organical Bodies, (for what have Angels to do with Bones, with Joints, with Bowels, with Stomach, and with the Frame and Fabrick of Members?) but lucid and etherial ones, such as several of the Fathers were of Opinion that they had, as we have observed in another Place; and if you grant that ours will be like to These Angelick Bodies; from this Hypothesis Honour will redound to God the Creator of the Universe, to Heaven its Ornaments, its Majesty, and Magnificence, and Armies of illustrious Inhabitants, to us a Society and eternal Commerce with Angels, and an Equality, and Resemblance, and Relation to them, both by glorious Endowments of Body and Mind, and by blissful Immortality.

Hitherto we have answered the first Part of the Question propounded by the Apostle, which regards the Form of our immortal Bodies: Let us now proceed to the second Part, which comprehends the Matter of them, and the Qualities of that Matter.

Here, therefore, the Enquiry is to be, what Kind of Body we shall enjoy in the Heavens, whether a thick or solid one, like that which we carry about as at present, or a thin, a light, a refulgent, and a transparent one, like Light, or Ether, or Matter a-kin to the Heavens. In examining this Part of the Question, let us proceed in the same Method: that we used. If the first Part, by those sacred Characters, Of Tokens that are founded in the sacred Writings. But the Body of the Blessed in Heaven, is called by St. Paul, celestial, Spiritual, potent, glorious, and conformable to the glorious Body of Christ. When 'tis called celestial, that denotes the Matter of which 'tis composed: For as the Body which we have at present consists of terrestrial Matter; so the Body, which is called celestial, will consist of celestial Matter; or, as the Body of Adam was framed of Dust, or of terrestrial Clay; so, on the contrary, the Bodies of the Sons of God will be formed of celestial Matter, or Matter modify'd like it.

They shall also bear the Image of the heavenly. With respect to the Body in this Life, we are made like to Adam; and with respect to the Body in the other Life, we are made like to Christ. But if our celestial Body is to have the same Qualities or Modifications with the celestial Matter, then this Enquiry only remains, viz. what is the Nature of celestial Matter, or after what Manner is it modify'd? To which I answer, that 'tis not hard, nor solid, like Glass, or .Chrystal, or Ice, as some of the Ancients dreamt, but that 'tis as pure and thin, as the finest Air or Ether: And, consequently, our celestial Bodies will be of the same Nature.

Secondly, our celestial Body is called by the Apostle a spiritual Body: So it either signifies something void of all Matter, in which Signification it can be meant of no Body whatever; or it signifies some light and thin Body, like Wind, or Air, or Vapour: in which Sense likewise it is us'd by the Hebrews, and Spiritus Spirit, by the Latins, as when the thinner Parts or Particles of our Blood are call'd Spirits, whether they are animal or vital. Nor does that Word seem to me to be taken otherwise, when our Celestial Body is call'd a Spiritual Body, provided you add this as by Consequence, that the heavenly one will be more vivacious than this mortal Body, and that Man, who will be then made to an enlivening Spirit, will have the Power of preserving his own Body without Meat, or Drink, or Sleep, or those other Things which the animal Body of Adam wanted for its Support.

Thirdly, the Celestial Body is call'd potent and active: the Carcass is sown in Weakness, and it is raised in Power. The Power of the Body consists in Motion, or in the Power it has to move itself and other Things; that which moves itself from Place to Place easily and swiftly, is call'd powerful; and if besides it has the Force of moving other Bodies, it is on that Account thought the more powerful. But 'tis here to be observ'd, that a Body whose Parts are quiet, and adhere one to the other, hath no Power of its own of moving itself; for Motion among Bodies is produc'd only by Motion, or by a Body mov'd. There is, therefore, a Necessity that a Body to be active must have its Parts in Motion, as 'tis in Air, Wind, Flame, and Light. Indeed, hard and coherent Bodies, which suffer themselves to be bent, and are call'd elastick, resist, and recover their former Situation, and that with a great deal of Force: But then the Power of moving does not proceed from the hard Body, but from some other subtle Matter in Motion inclos'd in the hard Body. Besides, in Machines which are compos'd partly of Matter which is hard and firm, and partly of that which is fluid or volatile, the solid may be mov'd by the spirituous Parts, and the whole Compound be moved together, or any particular Part of it, as may be seen in the Motion of our own Bodies, or of any particular Member of them. But if within the hard Bodies there is no Matter in Motion, nor moveable Matter, neither its own nor foreign, it remains motionless in itself, and can never be mov'd, unless by external Force.

Now if These Things are rightly affirm'd and determin'd by us, it follows, that the Body which we are to have in the Heavens may be active and lively, it must not consist of a sluggish and spiritless Matter, as is the Matter of concrete Bodies, or Bodies whose Parts are coherent to one another, but of a Substance light, and vivid, and volatile; that so, in Obedience to the Command of the Mind, it may be easily carried to any Part, may pass through other Bodies, and may, at its own Pleasure, rarify or condense itself: In fine, the united Force of the Parts or Particles of which such a Body consists, must be exceedingly powerful; and if they are all directed the same Way, and to the same Object, they will penetrate or throw down every Thing that stands in their Way, like a Storm, or the Lightning of Thunder.

And here give me leave to add, that we ought not to wonder that it mould be in the Power of the Soul to guide and direct the Parts of this spirituous Body which Way soever it pleases; when even in this gross and heavy terrestrial Body, it sends forth the Spirits and the thinner Juices every Way into the Nerves and Muscles, according to the absolute Pleasure and Command of its own Will: And when all this spirituous Body is nothing but a Frame of congregated Spirits, and of the noblest Matter, 'tis but highly reasonable that we sould grant to a glorified Soul a plenary Power over such a Body; a Power of impelling, retaining, or guiding and directing its Parts which Way soever it pleases.

The fourth Character follows, by which the Bodies of the Blessed are styl'd glorious. That Word denotes something more excellent than Beauty only, or than Proportion of Parts, viz. a certain Light or Refulgency; nor can Matter or Body, be it ever so beautiful, appear glorious, unless 'tis illustrated with Light and Radiancy. Besides, the Word "Glory," wherever in the sacred Writings 'tis spoke, either of natural Bodies, or of Divine or Angelick Appearances, almost always denotes something resplendent and illustrious, as will immediately more fully appear. In the mean while, you see that in this very Chapter Mention is made of the Glory of the Stars, which consists in Light, and that in order to explain to us the Glory of our celestial Bodies. Lastly, the Prophet Daniel, discoursing of the Condition of the Righteous after the Resurrection, to lay it before us, has Recourse to the same Example of Stars, but applies that Example more strongly. Says he:

Many of those that now sleep in the Dust of the Earth will awake; some of them to Life eternal, and others to eternal Contempt and Reproach: And the Wise shall shine like the Splendor of the Firmament; and they that instruct many to Righteousness, like Stars to Millions of Ages (Daniel 12:2).

Christ mark'd the same State, the same Time, and the same Glory, when he said:

Then shall the Righteous shine forth like the Sun in the Kingdom of their Father (Matt. 13:43).

T'is evident that the same Glory is describ'd by the Prophet, by Christ, and by the Apostle, and that that Glory is a Participation of Light and Splendor.

But the Question may here be ask'd, Whether this Light and this Splendor are inherent in glorified Bodies? or whether they come from abroad, and are only reflected or transmitted, as in Gems or polish'd Metals, or in other solid Bodies? And yet, methinks, this too might be determin'd by the Examples brought from the Sun and the Stars. However, we shall examine this more fully in the following Character, by which our celestial Body is said to be form'd after the Manner of the glorious Body of Christ. In the mean while, this remains fix'd and establish'd, that the Bodies of the Blessed in Heaven are, in some measure, lucid and refulgent, and by consequence glorious.

And now comes the last and the most illustrious Character, of the Formation of our celestial bodies after the glorious Body of Christ. This Character confirms the former, and besides discovers to us, that the Light which those glorified Bodies emit, is inherent in them, and dwells in them, and proceeds from an internal Principle, as from an exhaustless Fountain: For Christ, when he was on the Earth, in his Transfiguration, render'd himself all Brightness, not by reflecting a borrowed Light, but from himself he emitted that Virtue which caused him to overflow with Glory, and to be immers'd in a Deluge of Light: His Face did shine as the Sun, and his Raiment was white as the Light: So says the Evangelist.

Then after his Resurrection he appeared in several Shapes, (Mark 16:2, Luke 24:16, John 20:15, C.f John 21:5.) render'd himself visible or invisible according to his Pleasure (Luke 24:31), and twice enter'd the Houses where his Disciples were, though the Doors were shut. and yet he appeared with Bones and with Flesh to his doubting Disciples, that he might convince them of the Truth of his Resurrection. And thus he shewed, by These several Tokens, that it was in his Power to resolve his Body into the thin and the volatile, and to reduce it at his Pleasure into a Body solid, and of adherent Parts.

Clement of Alexandria says (Strom. 6. f. 649), "For he eat not for the sake of his Body, which was sustain'd by divine Virtue, but left those he appeared to should entertain false Notions of him, as we find afterwards that some actually did, supposing him to have been no more than a Ghost or Apparition. Origin: "He ate after his Resurrection, and drank, and appeared cloathed, and offer'd himself to be felt, to convince his doubting Disciples of the Reality of his Resurrection; but yet he plainly discovers the Nature of his aerial and spiritual Body, by entering into the Room while the Doors were shut, and by his vanishing out of Sight at the Breaking of Bread."

There are be sides quoted, as of the same Opinion, many others. But it may be doubted now an incorruptible Body could receive the Impression of the Nails, and be touch'd by mortal Hands. But let not this shock thee; for this was by Permission only, by way of Condesension.) For a Body so thin and fine as to come in when the Doors were but, must be void of all gross Substance. But he shewed himself in that Manner for the Proof of the Resurrection.. St. Austin (de Civ. Dei), "We must believe, that the Brightness of the Body of Christ at his Resurrection, was rather hid from the Eyes of the Disciples, than really wanting in itself: For the weak Sight of Man could not have been able to have beheld so glorious a Form with that Stedfastness as was necessary for him to be known by. He would not be touch'd (John 20:17.) because It was not in a tangible State, being then return'd from the Dead."

Lastly, When he ascended into Heaven, with the Swiftness of a winged Angel, mounting to his native Seat, what was his Body? what was his Vehicle? It was light and rapid, as the fiery Chariot, in which Elias was formerly carried, when he ascended alive into Heaven. In like manner, when Christ was seen by St. John in the Isle of Patmos, His Eyes were as a Flame of Fire, and Feet like to fine Brass, as if they burned in a Furnace; as the Son of Man was seen (Dan. x.5) by the Prophet Daniel before. And lastly, he is at length to return in the same glorious, refulgent, flaming Form; otherwise he would hardly be visible both Night and Day a lost in the sublime Sky, to those who inhabit the Earth: Nay, even the Glory of the Father, with which 'tis said he is to appear, is this very refulgent Form, as the Father, or the Ancient of Days, is describ'd by the same (Dan. vii.) Prophet, with a luminous and flaming Majesty.

And to come to a Conclusion of this Point, I only desire to add, that the Glory of God, which is call'd by the Hebrews Sheichinah, and which is the majestical Presence of God, has always the Appearance of Light, or Flame, or of a resplendent Cloud; as in the Journeying out of Egypt, and in the Holy of Holies; and the same Thing which is called the Glory of God, is term'd likewise a Cloud, or a lucid Cloud (Num. 12:5, Num. 16:19, 42; Matt.17:5; 2 Pet. 1:17) and in many other Places in both Testaments, it appears, that the Glory of God, or his glorious Presence, is always shewn in some lucid, flaming, or fiery Matter; but the Body of Christ was the most excellent Residing Place of this Shechinah, of this divine Glory, and, as it were, the Sanctum Sanctorum in which it shone out most brightly; to which also the sacred Authors are often wont to allude, (Job. 1:14. Heb. 9:11;. Rev. 21:3). These Things being thus explain'd, it seems to be determin'd, that the glorious Body of Christ which he has in the Heavens, is like Flames, like .Ether, or like liquid Light, and that consequently our celestial Body will be of no dissimilar Matter, since 'tis to be conformable to his. And indeed, if we consult Reason and Philosophy, any other Kind of Matter can scarce subsist or sustain itself in the Heavens, and the ethereal Regions, where all Things are serene and pure, every Thing most fine and subtle. Lastly, since in the Rank and Order of Bodies, or in material Nature, we know nothing more excellent than Light or Flame, 'tis but just that we determine, that the glorious Body of Christ, and ours in Proportion, must consist of These till we find something that is more excellent and surpassing.

Perhaps, it may be here objected, that thus to explain the Glory of the Body of Christ in the Heavens would be foreign neither to Reason nor the sacred Writings, if it were not an Obstacle to the received Doctrine of the Flesh and Blood of Christ that are still remaining in his celestial Body: To which I answer, that the Fathers either had different Sentiments, or remain'd doubtful concerning this Point of the Flesh and Blood of the celestial Body of Christ. 'Tis very well known that all the Disciples of Origen deny it, and philosophize quite after another Manner. Besides, with the Fathers of the second Nicene Synod, among the Definitions and the Heads of the Constantinopolitan Council, (which is called the Council of the Iconoclasses or the Image-Breakers, which upon hearing them read over again, they approv'd of, was this:

Whoever does not confess that our Lord Jesus Christ, after his assuming the rational Nature and intellectual Flesh, is let down with God the Father, and that he will so likewise return, with paternal Majesty, to judge the Quick and Dead, not indeed with Flesh, but neither incorporeal; so that he may be seen of those by whom he was pierc'd; and that he remains God without the Grossness of Flesh, let him be accursed.

That Christ was set down at the Right Hand of his Father, and that he would at length hither return; but that he 'would not return in the Flesh, and yet not without a Body, that is, a subtle ratified Body: For it follows, that he may be seen by those who pierced him, and may remain God without the Grossness of the flesh, Can any Thing be more plain than this? For it must be observ'd, that These Words, which chiefly regard the Point of which we are treating, are the very Words of Gregory Nazianzen, speaking of the same Matter, viz. in his Fortieth Oration, towards the End, he says this concerning Christ. That the third Day he returned to Life, and ascended into Heaven; from whence he will return illustrious and glorious, to judge the Quick and the Dead; viz. no longer incarnated, and yet not wanting a Body, but having a Body more august and more divine, and such a Body as none but the Son of God can have; that he might both be seen by those who pierced him, and might remain a God without any corporeal Mass, or any carnal Grossness; or rather, by aliening These Doctrines as their own, they do themselves Credit and Honour. In vain the Popish Doctors labour to wrest These Words, to a metaphorical or figurative Sense, viz. to signify not the Substance of Flesh, but its Affections and Infirmities; but the Words which follow, as well in the said Councils as in Gregory Nazianzen; which in the Councils are, That he may remain a God without the Grossness of the Flesh; and in the Father, that God may remain without any corporeal Mass, without any fleshy Grossness: These Words, I say, plainly discover, that the Word is here taken physically, and according to its specifick Nature, as 'tis opposed to a thin and liquid Matter; and 'tis in this Sense, as you may plainly see, that Flesh is denied to be in the Body of Christ, by the Votes and Consents of These two celebrated Councils.

Lastly, I said that some of the Fathers were doubtful as to this Point, which is universally known by the Answer of St. Austin to .Concentius, who had propos'd this Question to him, Whether now the Body of Christ has Bones and Blood, and the other Lineaments of Flesh in it. To which Question, after that St. Austin has given a general and partial Answer, he adds:

Let not Faith be wanting, and no Doubt will remain, unless we ought to enquire concerning the Blood of Christ; because when he said, Feel and see, for a Spirit has not Flesh and Bones, he did not add Blood. Let not us, therefore, add to our Inquiry what he did not add to his Answer; and, if you please, let the Question have this compendious End, or else, perhaps, our more troublesome Enquirer, taking occasion from this mention of Blood, may press us further, and ask, if Blood, why not Phlegm, why not yellow and black Choler? of which four Humours the Physicians agree, that the Nature of Flesh is compos'd: But whatever any one adds, let him beware of adding Corruption, that he may preserve the Soundness and Chastity of his Faith.

Here, you see, St. Austin remains cautious and doubtful, and Consentius docile, but yet doubtful. Some, indeed, talk more boldly and grossly concerning the glorious Body of Christ. This I deny not; but some Things, at present, being balanced against others, let us proceed, if you please, on our Subject: For whatever has been determin'd, either by Councils or Fathers, it must yield to Reason and Scripture.

Secondly then, I say, or rather repeat from what was said before, that Flesh and Blood cannot, according to the Apostle, inherit the Kingdom of God. Their Words, if they are literally taken, and in their proper Signification, there is an end of the present Dispute, by the Assertion of our Lord himself: But that they ought to be received so in this Place, according to the received Laws of Interpreting, if I am not mistaken, has been above sufficiently demonstrated.

Thirdly, 'Tis repugnant both to Reason and the Nature of Things, that Flesh and Blood can be incorruptible: As the Body of Christ is now, so will our Body be hereafter in the Heavens. But you will, perhaps, answer, that Flesh and Blood, indeed, are not incorruptible in their own Nature, but that they may be render'd incorruptible, their specifick Nature being preserv'd and remaining. This is what I deny; yes, in this Part we differ: And lest Deceit should be lurking in Generals, let us, if you please, open the Matter succinctly, that the State of the Question may appear the more manifestly. Every Kind of Body has its Properties; of which some are accidental and mutable, others are essential and unchangeable, which being destroy'd or alter'd, that Portion of Matter will cease to be a Body of the same Kind and Nature which it was of before, but passes into another Class or Order of Bodies. For Example; When the Herbs which we eat are converted into Flesh and Blood, they are no longer Herbs, though the same Matter remains, but Flesh and Blood, Bodies of quite another Kind and another Nature. On the other Side, when Flesh and Blood are, in their Turns, converted into Herbs and Grass, which often happens when the Ground grows fat by the Blood of slaughter'd Bodies, thus alter'd, they cease to be Flesh and Blood. When Christ, in the Marriage of Cana, converted Water into Wine, the same Matter remain'd, but differently modified; and by reason of those new Modifications, lost both the Name and the Nature of Water.

Tell me then plainly, and leave the Sophister behind you, what Alteration do you require should be made in the Parts or Particles of Flesh and Blood, that from a corruptible Matter they may become incorruptible, and yet preserve the Nature of Flesh and Blood? Or, if you had rather, answer this Question: What are the Properties, what are the Conditions of Flesh and Blood, which you affirm to be essential to both, and from both inseparable? Yes, what are the Properties and the Conditions, which being preserved, Flesh and Blood remain? and which being destroyed, Flesh and Blood must either perish with them, or must pass into another Class of Bodies? If you answer, that that is unknown to you, then you confess that you know not whether that can be done, which yet you affirm is done, which seems to be the Part of a rash and a headstrong Man: Yet still let us try if, by some other Expedient, we can bring latent Truth to the Light. Tell me, then, what are the Principles, what are the Stamina of which Blood is compos'd? You know what are the Principles of Blood, which all receive and acknowledge, viz. Salt, Sulphur, Spirit, Earth, and Water. But 'tis equal to me whether you take These or other, provided they are known, determin'd, and terrestrial. In the mean time, These Things being thus laid down, I ask you, Is it your Opinion that These Parts and These Principles will remain in your Celestial Blood? Do you believe that the Body of Christ in Heaven is compos'd of Salt, Sulphur, Water, and Earth? Unless your Celestial Blood retains These Stamina, These fundamental Principles, it will be no longer Blood, unless equivocally and catechrestically, because it will not have the Substance of Blood; and if it retain These, it will not be a Body celestial and incorruptible.

For here we are to observe, that this Matter, this Substance of the Blood being thus laid down, the Form of it is to be compos'd of the due Mixture of these Parts and Principles: But now imagine what Mixture or Texture you please, it will be dissolvable; nay, it will be actually dissolv'd and dissipated by the celestial Matter surrounding it, and intermix'd with it, like Wood or Straw in our terrestrial Fire. 'Tis true, indeed, by means of Power divine, it may be preserv'd incorrupted, as may the Blood that we now have, or as the young Men formerly were in the Babylonian Furnace; but still it will be in its own Nature corruptible, provided 'tis compos'd of the same Elements, however mix'd, of which our Blood is constituted: And what we have said of Blood will hold good in proportion of Flesh likewise; so that there will be no Occasion for going over the Argument again, to shew the same of this latter. It will be sufficient to observe, that if Softness and Humidity remain, Corruptibility will likewise remain; but if it becomes hard and dry, it will then take the Nature of a Stone, or of Glass; or, at least, it will referable Mummy dried and hardened in the burning Sands of Arabia or Egypt. But it will be needless to dwell any longer on Things which are as repugnant to Reason, as they are to Faith.

In the mean time, the Summary and Conclusion of what has been said upon this Subject is this, That the glorious Body of Christ in the Heavens does not consist of any jointed Frame of Bones, of Flesh, and of Blood, Or of any of the Humours or Entrails of this present terrestrial Body, but that 'tis of a more excellent Matter, of a higher Nature, and Purity, and Perfection: That I may say all in a Word, it consists of Matter entirely Celestial, with respect both to its' Substance and Accidents. Lastly, the external and visible Glory of this Celestial Body will consist properly in this, That it will be refulgent, and by its own Powers illustrious; I say, by its own Rays, and not by any borrowed Light, either transmitted or reflected, but living and innate, like a Source of living Water. And of this refulgent Glory Christ gave a Specimen from Heaven, when he spoke to Saul, and did, by the Flaming of his Rays, as it were by Lightning, throw him prostrate on the Ground, blinded, and amaz'd, and confounded, says the Apostle:

The glorious Body of Christ pour'd out and diffus'd its Light, a Light more bright and more powerful than the Meridian Rays of the Sun. (Compare Acts 9:17, 27, Acts 22:6. and Acts 26:13).

This seems to me to be the proper Habit and State of the glorious Body of Christ; yet notwithstanding all this, we are willing to allow that it is, and always was in the Power of Christ to change his whole Body, or any Part of his Body, into whatever Form or whatever Temperament he pleas'd. When he was here upon Earth he walk'd upon the Sea, and it gave no way to his light Body. He was forty Days without Meat and without Drink, and had Power to render his Body impassive. He render'd it, likewise, thin, thick, heavy, light, dark, lucid, visible, or invisible, according to his Sovereign Pleasure: Much more has he now Power over his own Body in the Heavens, and can convert the Substance of it, that is obedient to his Commands, into Blood or any other Juice, into Phlegm or any other Concretion, according to his divine Will, and therefore fore the Dispute is not concerning that Point, nor concerning the Power of Christ, either over the external Elements, or over his own Body, but concerning his proper State, and his Form, that is said to be glorious and celestial: That, I say, is neither bony, nor fleshy, nor sanguinary, but a Mass of liquid Light, and of Air that glitters with its Radiency, like the brighter Stars of Heaven; as is most agreeable to his divine Dignity, and those etherial Regions where he chiefly resides.

Thus have I treated with all the Brevity, and all the Perspicuity, that I possibly could, of the Matter and Form of the Body of Christ in Heaven, and also of our own Bodies, which are to be made like unto his, by his divine Power and Influence. We have found upon Examination, that each of these is inorganic and inconcrete: And tho' this Examination has been founded upon Characters and Tokens drawn from the sacred Writings, and adjusted to the Nature of Things, yet are we so accustomed to gross Bodies, constituted of Flesh and Bones, and a Frame of solid Members, that we are scarce able to conceive any other Kind of animated Bodies, or to give our Assent to any Proofs whatever of them. But whoever is either moderately conversant in the Writings of the ancient philosophers, or has read what the Christian Fathers philosophically write concerning Angels and Demons, will without Difficulty get free from that Prejudice. Therefore I will presume to advise them, that they would first diligently enquire, whether Angels have Bodies? and if they have, what sort of Bodies theirs are? As for the First, you have the Suffrage and Consent of the ancient Fathers, and of the Grecians especially to that Opinion, that the Angels have Bodies, as we have shewn in another Place. Then what the Bodies of Angels are, you will learn from the same Grecian Fathers; and in several Places of St. Austin, among the Latins, as in the treatise de Gen. ad Lit. in his Epistles, in the Treatise de Civitate Dei, and in several other Places. You will find that they all teach us, that those Bodies are thin as the Air, or the pure Ether; but that the good Angels have the purer, and the grosser the evil ones. This Doctrine of the Fathers being received, and their, as it were, secondary Authority, (for the primary one is that of the sacred Scripture, and of Reason that bears Witness to it), that vulgar Prejudice will disappear and vanish, that there is one only Kind of animated Bodies, viz. the organical, and that which consists of concrete Matter, of Flesh, and of nervous Members, like our terrestrial Bodies. But there is another Genius of Bodies, of a celestial Kind and Order, such as the Bodies of Angels are, or such as ours will be, when we shall be like to the Angels. The gross, heavy, sluggish Bodies, such as we have at present, are in the lowest Class of Bodies, which immortal Minds, and rational Nature inhabit. And those which consist of a light, subtle, and moveable Matter, are a much nobler sort of animated Bodies, and are readier for Motion or for Dispatch in all the Actions, either of the Mind or the Body. Nay, even in this terrestrial Body, the thin, the subtle, and the fluid Part, which we call Spirits, is the proper Vehicle of the Soul, as the most nearly ally'd to it, These it commands, and these are the Instruments which it makes use of to move the Members of the Body: And the Affections and Operations of the Mind, depend upon the Subtilty, or the Grossness, the Plenty or the Want, the regular or irregular Motion of the Spirits, and are accordingly more or less powerful and vigorous. This System then and Collection of Spirits, and of thin and spiritous Matter, is the Seat of the Soul, and its primary and intimate Body; and this Covering of Skin and Flesh which we wear, is only used as a Shell or a Casket for the surer Preservation of it. Away then with that vulgar ridiculous Dotage, repugnant both to Philosophy, and to Theology, viz. that without the Trunk of a Body, and the Entrails which belong to it, no Body can be a fit Habitation for Souls, or for any spiritual Nature. A Spirit, says Christ, has not Flesh and Bones. He does not say that a Spirit is soft.

Certainly, if a Spirit had been without any kind of Body, it had been more ready for Christ to have said, and had been as much to the Purpose:

A Spirit has not a Body, as you see that I have.

Yet this he did not say, but:

A Spirit has not Flesh and Bones, you see that I have (Luke 24:39).

That is, a Spirit has not a gross, visible, and palpable Body, such as mine appears to be, both to your Sight and Touch. Lastly, the Philosophers in defining that Body, which they say good Men will have in a future State, or in Heaven, make use of the very same Words and Epithets, and Phrases, as the Apostle does in describing our future celestial Body. Paul calls this Body we are to have, a celestial or eternal one in the Heavens: They in like Manner oppose it to a terrestrial one. St. Paul calls it immortal and incorruptible; the Philosophers use Words of the same Signification. The Apostle compares it to the Stars; they call it “spiritual body”. He stiles it a lucid and glorious Body; they “a spiritual body”. In short, both describe it by the same common Epithet. 'Tis not to be questioned but that the same Kind of Bodies is meant on both Sides. But 'tis well known, that the Philosophers did not design a gross Body, mix'd up with Blood, much less any kind of hard organical Machine; but a “spiritual body,” as they call it, composed of a rarefy'd active form of Matter; so that this Body may be always of a like Nature with the Place, where the Souls are to reside; an Opinion which they are often repeating.

All Christians Should Follow His Example & Should Not Content Themselves With Thought That They Have Goodness Enough To Carry Them To Heaven, But Should Earnestly Seek High Degrees Of Glory; For Higher Degrees Of Glory Are Promised To Extraordinary Labors For God, For No Other Reason, But That We Should Seek Them
The Character of Paul an Example to Christians

In those earnest labors which he performed, he had respect to the recompense of the reward. He did it for an incorruptible crown. 1 Cor 9:25. He sought a high degree of glory, for he knew the more he labored the more he should be rewarded, as appears from what he tells the Corinthians. “He that soweth sparingly, shall reap also sparingly; and he that soweth bountifully, shall reap also bountifully.” And 1 Cor. 3:8, “Every man shall receive his own reward, according to his own labour.” That he had respect to that crown of glory, which is Master had promised, in those great labors and sufferings, is evident from what he says to Timothy, a little before his death. 2 Tim. 4:7, 8, “I have fought a good fight, I have finished my course, I have kept the faith; henceforth there is laid up for me a crown of righteousness, which the Lord, the righteous Judge, shall give me at that day; and not to me only, but unto all them also that love his appearing.” All Christians should follow his example in this also. They should not content themselves with the thought that they have goodness enough to carry them to heaven, but should earnestly seek high degrees of glory. For the higher degrees of glory are promised to extraordinary labors for God, for no other reason, but that we should seek them.

Essai sur la Felicite de la Vie a Venir (An Essay on the Felicity of the Life to Come)

A work appeared in Dublin, in 1748, entitled An Essay on the Felicity of the Life to Come, by C. L. de Villette, Minister of the French Church of St. Patrick in that city. It was a book of four hundred and forty pages, and was conducted by way of dialogue. In the latter part, the question concerning eternal punishment is introduced, the negative of which this author defends. Whether he did not believe in annihilation, is a question to which we can give no answer. "There is" said he, "much reason to believe, that during the two or three first ages of Christianity, the annihilation of the impenitently wicked was the generally received doctrine. They went even further than this. Every body knows that the great Origen admitted the restitution of the damned, without excepting the Devil. It has happened in more than one instance, that the errors of the Fathers have been received, while we have rejected their sound doctrines." XI & Dernier Dialogue

Theocrite:

Vous vous souvenez, sans doute, mes Amis, que j'ai à présent à r'assembler les principaux traits du tableau dispersez cà & là; A mettre ainsi tout à la fois sous les yeux ces merveilleux objets. Ceci ne sera donc qu'une Récapitulation, un extrait, de toutes mes Observations, & Réflexions, précédentes. Je me flatte que ce Tout ensemble fera plus d'effet; Ou du moins qu'il fera quelque plaisir au Lecteur en lui rappelant les endroits les plus interessans, & en les lui présentant dégagés de toute discussion.

Ici bas il y a de fâcheuses infirmités, des désavantages réels, attachés à notre corps. Ces infirmités, ces désavantages, viennent avec nous au Monde, & ne nous quittent qu'avec la Vie.

Nos Facultés corporelles, nos Sens, ont des imperfections. Il en résulte nécessairement divers inconveniens positifs.

Enfin nous sommes sujets aux maladies, aux douleurs, à la décadence: Notre Corps s'use, se déränge, se dissout: Nous mourons: Cela est inévitable.

Les fâcheuses infirmités, les désavantages inséparables de notre Constitution présente, sont—Les désagrèables suites de la Nourriture, & le Sommeil.

Les Effets de ces Infirmités sont frequens, incommodes: Le sommeil est une espèce de mort périodique, une interruption à la Pensée, & au Sentiment.

Nos Facultés corporelles, quand nous les comparons aux Facultés du même Genre dans d'autres Animaux, & surtout quand nous considérons le degré de perfection, auquel le Créateur pourroit porter ou ces mêmes Facultés, ou des Facultés analogues, nous paroissent d'une imperfection bien-humiliante.

Les inconveniens positifs, qui résultent de cette imperfection, & de la nature des Etres, qui nous environnent, ont lieu presque à toute heure. Nous nous mouvons avec lenteur & Nous ne saurions nous transporter un peu loin sans embarras, sans lassitude: Pour employer utilement notre souplesse, notre agilité, notre force, il faut que nous subissions des travaux, des peines, que l'on peut souvent appeller des Maux.

Nos Sens aussi sont bien défectueux: Il est des Saisons, des tems, & bien des heures, où l'Art ne sauroit suppléer à plein au défaut de la lumière du Soleil; Et souvent cette lumière, qui nous est si utile éblouit, affoiblit, nos yeux. La nécessité, où nous nous trouvons de réparer par notre industrie ce qui manque à nos

Facultez, & à nos Sens, démontre leur imperfection, & nous fait désirer quelque chose d'analogue, qui ne soit point sujet à toutes ces incommoditez.

Si le Goût, & l'Odorat, nous fournissent un grand nombre d'agréables Sensations par la multiplicité des favorables objets, qui les excitent, il arrive souvent que des objets contraires produisent un effet opposé. La disposition présente des choses amène de pareils desagrémens inévitablement, Si frequemment. Mais ce ne sont la que des riens en comparaison des Maladies, des Douleurs, de la Décadence de notre Corps, de sa Mortalité. Voilà les grands Maux, qui, sans l'addition d'aucun autre Mal peuvent faire de ce Monde présent une Vallée de misères.

Dans le Ciel nous serons affranchis de toutes ces infirmités naturelles, que j'ai appellées de fâcheuses sujétions. Les Viandes sont pour le Ventre, & le Ventre est pour les Viandes; Mais Dieu détruira l'un & l'autre, dit St. Paul.

S'il faut supposer des moyens de conserver, de réparer, de perfectionner, nos corps immortels, ces moyens seront, sans doute, si aisez, si prompts, si commodes, qu'on ne pourra les regarder comme des inconveniens: Peut être même seront ils si agréables qu'ils entreront dans le composé de notre Béatitude.

Le sommeil alors loin de nous être utile deviendrait en quelque sorte une usurpation des droits de l'Immortalité: Ce seroit autant de retranché sur une délicieuse existence. Nos corps donc, quoique délicatement, ou finement, organizez, subsisteront dans le même état, ou se r'établiront très promptement, & se perfectionneront de plus en plus, sans avoir besoin pour cela d'un usage embarrassant de quelque matière externe, ou d'aucun intervalle de repos.

Nous pourrons nous transporter d'un lieu à un autre avec une facilité, & une vitesse, qui peut être surpassera tout ce que nous connoissons ici bas de la Faculté Locomotive: Nous aurons les moyens les plus commodes, & les plus nombreux, pour vaincre la résistance des Corps. Telles seront, en un mot, notre agilité, notre adresse, & notre force, que nos travaux d'alors n'auront que ce doux degré de peine, qui dans bien des cas fait du travail un plaisir.

Nous aurons des Sensations de toutes les espèces, non seulement de celles qui servent principalement à nous procurer la connoissance des objets, mais aussi de celles, qui ne servent qu'à nos plaisirs: Il y en aura de semblables, ou analogues, à celles d'ici bas: Celles là seulement en seront retranchées, qui ne sont faites que pour la vie présente; et apparemment en leur place le Créateur en substituera un grand nombre d'autres, dont nous ne pouvons à présent avoir aucune idée.

Il faudra nécessairement, par exemple, que nous ayons un Sens analogue à la Vue. Mais, sans doute, il sera tout autrement parfait que notre Vue d'à présent; & ce qu'il y aura alors de semblable, ou d'analogue, à la lumière de ce monde, sera invariable, éternel. A des Créatures, qui ne dorment jamais, il ne faut point de nuit. Ce sera une lumière pure, égale, d'un éclat perpétuel, & dont nos yeux pourtant, alors faits exprès pour elle, ne seront ni éblouis, ni fatiguez. De même à l'égard de l'Ouïe, nous aurons aussi un sens analogue: Ce qui aujourd'hui nous procure le doux sentiment, & l'agréable idée, des sons accordans, harmonieux, ne doit point être détruit. Par la munificence infinie du Très-haut tout ce qui est si noble, si beau, si convenable à des Etres, qu'il a douez d'Intelligence, qu'il a rendus susceptibles de tant de sentimens exquis, sera infailliblement augmenté, perfectionné.

Quant aux sensations de toute autre espèce, nous serons environnez d'objets propres à les exciter. Tout inférieurs que de pareils plaisirs nous paroîtront alors à des plaisirs plus dignes de l'excellence de notre nature, ils ne laisseront pas que d'aider à compléter notre bonheur.

Ces Sensations, quelque nombreuses, quelque variées, qu'elles puissent être, n'ébranleront point l'admirable constitution de nos corps célestes.

Outre le plaisir, qu'elles nous seront par elles mêmes, elles serviront à donner prise, pour ainsi dire, à une multitude de ces aimable attentions, de ces soins obligeans, qui cimentent, qui animent, l'affection mutuelle.

Toujours soumises à notre Entendement épuré, Hors de toute concurrence avec nos Goûts Moraux; Purgées de tout leur venin, loin de nous jeter encore comme ici bas dans de honteux écarts, elles ne feront que répandre un doux assaisonnement sur nos généreuses actions, multiplier, diversifier, les agrémens de la Société.

Outre ce que je viens de dire des Sensations, il est à remarquer qu'il y a un état, qui n'a du rapport à aucun de nos Sens en particulier, mais qui les favorise tous: C'est cet état d'une aise complete, où l'on se trouve lorsqu'on jouit d'une santé entière, & qu'aucune intempérie de l'air, aucun Infecte, aucun des corps, qui environnent le nôtre, ne nous causent la moindre incommodité, & qu'au contraire tout conspire à nous flatter, à nous plaire: C'est plus qu'une simple tranquillité: Ce n'est pas du moins une tranquillité fade: Encore que l'on ne fasse pas attention à tel, ou tel, objet qui pourrait frapper agréablement quelqu'un de nos sens en particulier, on goûte un plaisir général, qui sans être vif a quelque chose de bien doux.

Nous devons supposer dans le Ciel un état analogue, mais très supérieur, à toute situation de cette nature, que l'on peut acquérir dans le monde présent.

Aujourd'hui les Maladies, les Douleurs, traversent fréquemment nos plus agréables, nos plus utiles occupations, nos plaisirs les plus chéris. Alors plus de ces tristes obstacles, plus de ces affligeantes interruptions: Nous serons entièrement à nous mêmes: Nous serons possesseurs à plein de tous nos Biens.

A présent l'affoiblissement inévitable de nos Facultez, de nos Sens, nous réduit à un état de langueur, d'ennui. Alors dans une jeunesse éternelle; & à la faveur d'un accroissement continuel de nos Facultez, & de nos Goûts, nos plaisirs s'affermiront, & seront toujours de nouveaux progrès en vivacité, & en étendue.

Ce que j'ai dit jusqu'à présent se rapporte tout à ces Avantages, ces Biens, ou ces Plaisirs, que je nomme Avantages, & Plaisirs, du Corps pour les distinguer de ceux qui supposent les Affections Morales, & la Reflexion. Ces derniers, que je nomme particulièrement les Biens, ou les Plaisirs, de l'Ame, sont d'un tout autre Ordre, d'un tout autre Prix. Ainsi notre Ame dans le Ciel auprès de notre bon Dieu parmi les saints glorifiez va nous présenter cette partie du tableau, qui est infiniment plus auguste, & plus effrayante, que l'autre.

Avant que de l'étaler il est nécessaire de vous y préparer par quelques observations qui seront comme des règles pour la placer dans son jour.

Quand on compare avec quelque exactitude les plaisirs Intellectuels, & Moraux, avec ceux des Sens on est surpris de trouver que ces derniers sont un si petit article de notre Félicité qu'à peine méritent ils d'être mis en ligne de compte; & (ce qui est bien singulier, bien digne de remarque) le sort de leur valeur, la seule chose, qui rend un grand nombre d'hommes si assollez de ces foibles plaisirs, c'est qu'en mille occasions ils servent de mobile aux plaisirs Intellectuels, & Moraux. En général les prodigieux écarts, où les hommes se jettent, les honteux excès, auxquels ils s'abandonnent, ont pour cause, non les Sens, comme on se le figure, faute d'observer les choses avec attention, mais la plus excellente de nos Facultez, celle de l'Agence, & les plus beaux Sentimens, savoir, le désir de s'élever, les affections généreuses, sociales. Les Libertins se trompent sur les Objets de leur Félicité: C'est par les plaisirs Intellectuels, & Moraux, que même les plus abrutis la cherchent sans s'en apercevoir. Les plaisirs des Sens sont par eux mêmes si peu capables de la leur procurer que les y réduire seroit les plonger dans un état déplorable.

Ainsi la perte de ces sortes de plaisirs, s'il falloit les perdre, devoit peu nous toucher, n'etoit qu'entre les mains de la sagesse ils deviennent des Instrumens, ou, comme je les ai déjà appellez, des occasions, des Mobiles, de plusieurs sentimens dignes de nous, dignes même des Habitans du Ciel. Certainement ce sont les plaisirs Intellectuels, & Moraux, qui forment les grandes sources, la Base, l'Essentiel, de notre béatitude.

C'est sur ce pied-là que nous devons considerer notre état dans le séjour de l'Immortalité: C'est avec cette favorable prévention que nous devons y envisager les Biens de l'Ame.

Commençons par les plaisirs Intellectuels

Les idées de ces plaisirs sont renfermées dans les idées générales Rapprendre, de savoir. Ce sont, & ce seront éternellement, des actes volontaires de notre Intelligence. Une science infuse ne nous contenteroit point.

Sans l'assaisonnement de l'Agence, ou du Moi, nous ne goûterions que très imparfaitement, très foiblement, le plaisir de satisfaire notre curiosité, ce vif désir de connoître, qui est né avec nous.

Les divers inconveniens, qui dans ce Monde-ci troublent, dérangent, l'acquisition des Connoissances, & en retardent les progrès, seront bannis du Ciel. Là les travaux nécessaires ne seront point rebutans par le trop de labeur: Là nos Facilitez, Talens, secours, auront toujours une exacte proportion avec l'objet, qu'il s'agira de découvrir. Là une ferme espérance de réussir dans nos curieuses entreprises nous facilitera les choses à ce point précis, où l'Etude, même l'Etude la plus appliquée, devient un plaisir: Là rien contre notre gré n'interrompra le cours de nos occupations: Là pour fournir à notre avide curiosité, à cet appétit dévorant qui renaît sans cesse, nous entreverrons dans le vaste Magasin de l'Univers, dans les profondeurs de l'infini, des provisions qui ne pourront jamais être épuisées: Là enfin aussi assurez d'une durée éternelle que nous le serons de l'existence de notre Créateur, & même de la nôtre, nous n'aurons pas à craindre qu'aucun obstacle dans l'univers puisse jamais borner cette admirable carrière de magnifiques connoissances, & de rapides progrès.

L'Etre suprême est, & sera toujours, le premier, le grand objet de nos Méditations.

Ici bas nous ne le voyons qu'obscurément: Mais alors nous le verrons face à face; Oui nous le connoîtrons avec une force, une facilité, une netteté de conception, infiniment supérieures à tout ce que le plus sublime génie peut espérer ici bas de la plus longue Etude. Les attributs de Dieu; & puis les merveilles innombrables de la création; La conduite de la Providence; Les grands desseins du Très-haut, tous ces objets si beaux, si variez, si grands, & dans l'Etude desquels nous sentons ici bas à tout moment la foiblesse de notre Intelligence, se montreront dans tout leur éclat: En Dieu, & par lui, nous verrons ce qu'à présent oeil ne sauroit voir; Nous entendrons ce qu'à présent oreille ne peut ouïr; Notre âme recevra ce qu'à présent elle ne peut recevoir.

Cette vaste connoissance ne s'arrêtera point à une glorieuse spéculation. Le sentiment de l'admiration, quelque vif que vous le fumes posiez, sera peut-être un des moindres .de ces sentimens délicieux, que nos découvertes exciteront en abondance.

En voilà assez sur les plaisirs Intellectuels. Je passe aux autres plaisirs de l'Ame.

Il y a de tous nos sentimens trois sources générales; Dieu — Nos semblables — & nous mêmes.

A l'aspect de l'immense thresor de plaisirs, dont Dieu nous aura mis en possession, notre admiration multipliée à l'infini nous agitera de mille mouvemens de reconnoissance, & d'amour. Par le souvenir du Passé ces obscuritez, ces Maux, sans nombre qui m'avoient tant de fois confondu, tourmenté, & qui ne pourront plus subsister que dans ma mémoire, serviront admirablement à relever le prix de mon bonheur, à m'en donner une jouissance exquise: Tout, jusqu'à cette sévérité apparente, qui nous étonne, & nous inquiète, tant sur la terre, tout dans la conduite passée de notre Père céleste, nous découvrira clairement, démonstrativement, qu'il n'y avoit que des soins généreux, des traits d'une prudence consommée, des moyens d'une subtilité à présent inconcevable, pour nous guider, nous engager, nous puiser, insensiblement à la béatitude, & pour animer nos plus doux sentimens à ce degré précis, au dessus duquel il manqueroit quelque chose à la félicité, dont nous sommes, ou pouvons devenir, susceptibles. Le retour à Dieu à chaque article de cette précieuse revue élèvera dans notre âme des ravhTemens, dont à présent nos plus heureuses expériences dans la piété ne peuvent nous donner qu'une légère idée.

Si nous étions toujours Sages, & Vertueux, nous goûterions très purement de cette vie la joye d'aimer notre bon Dieu; Mais les plus avancez dans la sanctification ont toujours divers reproches à se faire: La honte, & la frayeur, voilà principalement ce qui refroidit ce glorieux amour, & mêle beaucoup d'amertume à ses ineffables douceurs.

Dans le Ciel ce grand obstacle sera détruit: Dieu ayant une dernière fois, & pour toujours, mis arrière de lui toutes nos folies, toutes nos iniquités; Ayant accepté notre sincère repentance, & nos foibles efforts, voudra bien au moment de notre entrée dans le séjour de sa gloire prévenir par tous les témoignages de son affection paternelle tout ce qui pourvoit encore nous troubler: Il ne nous laissera pas le temps (pour ainsi dire) de r'amener dans nos âmes des sentimens douloureux, que sa bonté infinie veut bannir aux siècles des siècles

De nos réflexions sur le Passé nous procéderons naturellement à envisager le sort, qui nous est réservé dans l'Avenir; & de tout ce qui nous sera arrivé dans ce monde, mais surtout de notre bonheur d'alors, nous déduirons à-coup-feûr des conséquences prophétiques: Délectable anticipation des degrez de gloire, & de félicité, que nous ne posséderons pas encore.

Etre ainsi dans le port du valut c'est une situation, dont nous ne pouvons guère à présent concevoir tous les charmes parce qu'ici bas il n'y a rien qui en approche.

Placez auprès de Dieu; Honorez de son approbation; Ravis de son amour pour nous, & du nôtre pour lui, nous verrons par tout naître la félicité & pour nous, & pour nos semblables: Tout nous r'amènera à lui en nous traçant par tout les soins continuels de sa bonté. Nous verrons en lui, & dans l'aspec de toutes choses, le grand plan d'une Béatitude universelle; D'une Béatitude qui s'étend, qui croît, incessamment.

Selon la belle, & juste, expression de St Paul, Dieu sera Tout en Tous. Lui, qui a formé nos coeurs, qui en connoît tous les replis, tous les mouvemens, qui seul par conséquent sait en faire jouer à plein tous les respects, quel concours de plaisirs n'y portera-t-il pas! Quelle variété, quelle delicasie, quelle véhémence, ne créera-t-il pas dans nos heureux sentimens! Soit en se montrant, à nous à visage découvert, ou en nous parlant bouche à bouche, c'est à dire en se communiquant à nous sans réserve à proportion de notre capacité; Soit en donnant occasion à notre liberté, à notre Intelligence, à nos affections, de s'exercer selon nos souhaits, & pour notre plus grand Bien: Il remplira notre âme entière Elle sera comme inondée de la joye, que répandra dans tout l'Univers sa présence adorable: Tout ce qu'il y a de plus doux, de plus ravissant, dans l'Admiration, dans la Reconnoissance, dans l'Amour, dans la Confiance, dans l'espérance, ou plu stot l'assurance de voir un jour accomplis tous les généreux désirs, que forme Un coeur magnanime, un coeur plein de l'affection fraternelle; Dans la contemplation d'une diversité infinie d'Objets, de Biens, tous tôt, ou tard, à notre portée, tous faits pour nous, tous propres à contribuer par quelque endroit à nos plaisirs & Enfin dans l'idée d'un accroissement de grandeur, & de félicité, à jamais, tout cela nous le posséderons, nous le goûterons, sans mélange, & avec une vivacité, une force de sentiments, que nous n'avons point, & ne pouvons avoir, ici bas.

Nous sommes faits pour la Société Sans elle les autres agrémens de la vie deviendraient insipides. Mais dans ce monde-ci les Travers d'esprit, les Vices, des autres, & nos propres Défauts, dérangent, corrompent, nos Tendens naturelles. La plupart perdent presque l'idée du plaisir pur d'aimer: Encore plus laisse-t-on dépérir celui de désirer le Bien d'autrui sans autre vue que ce Bien-là.

Mais ceux-là même qui se font presque tout refferrez dans leur propre Individu, & laissent languir dans une profonde léthargie leurs affections généreuses, & sociales, ceux-là même les réveilleraient, leur donneraient bientôt une vigueur inconnue, si tout à coup ils se corrigeoient eux mêmes, & trouvoient en même tems tous les autres hommes devenus réellement estimable, & aimables. Ce sera-là notre cas dans le Ciel: Nous serons assurez de rencontrer dans chacun des Bienheureux précisément toutes les dispositions, toutes les affections, que nous voudrions qu'on eût pour nous. Nous portons tous en nous mêmes un désir naturel d'être estimez, & aimez: & là nous serons assurez de l'être: Le réciproque y sera infaillible.

Ici bas un conflit d'intérêts & Une multitude d'incidens, de mesentendus, d'obscuritez par rapport aux sentimens d'autrui envers nous; De difficulté dans nos affaires; En un mot, une infinité de circonstances, détruisent une affection mutuelle, ou la rendent foible, partielle; La bornent a un petit nombre d'Objets.

Là toutes les circonstances favoriseront cette douce affexion. Fortifiée par nos progrès en Connoissances, en Vertus, en aimables Sentimens; Animée par la présence de notre Père céleste, notre Père commun; Encouragée par tous les motifs imaginables; Libre de tout empêchement; A l'abri de toute froideur, elle sera pour tous les Habitans du Ciel plus ferme, plus touchante, que ce l'est aujourd'hui celle que nous avons pour un Ami intime. Nous aimerons un nombre innombrable d'Amis sans que l'un dérobe rien aux sentimens, qui seront dus à l'autre.

Je ne dis pas que nous les aimerons tous également: Cela n'est pas nécessaire: Aussi ne pensé-je pas que les amitié particulières soient bannies du Ciel. Si nous aimions tendrement ici bas des Personnes dignes de l'attachement d'un coeur plein de piété, & de vertu, espérance de les rejoindre après la mort, & de les aimer bien mieux que nous ne faisons; Mieux que d'autres avec qui nous n'avions point eu de liaisons, ne sera apparemment anéantie que comme le seront dans le sens de St Paul. la Foi, & la Connoissance, c'est à dire qu'elle ne finira que par la jouissance de ce que nous espérons.

La prè-eminence de quelques Etres, celle même de plusieurs de nos semblables; Les Talens, les Goûts particuliers & Certaines circonstances, & des Convenances singulières, ces Convenances qui sont si liantes, mettront nécessairement dans notre union fraternelle les varietez, qu'on observe aujourd'hui dans une Société d'Elite; Mais les diffèrens degrez de nos tendres sentimens envers les Bienheureux n'en altéreront ni la réalité ni la pureté, ni même la vivacité.

Il viendra peut-être dans l'esprit à bien des Gens que cette prè-eminence, cette supériorité de Talens, Se de Qualitez, ces Convenances singulières, dont je viens de parler, ne manqueront pas d'introduire, comme cela arrive si frequemment, si inévitablement, ici bas, les cruels sentimens de la Jalousie, de l'Envie. Non: Ils seront bannis du Ciel absolument, & pour jamais.

Chacun y sera content de son sort: Chacun l'aura se réjouir sincèrement de la béatitude d'autrui envisagée même comme supérieure: Loin d'en gémir en secret nous la serons réellement servir à notre propre félicité; Chacun ainsi s'appropriera en quelque sorte tout le bonheur du Ciel. — On ne peut se représenter que bien imparfaitement l'abondance, & la diversité, de plaisirs dont cela seul enrichit le séjour de l'immortalité; & ce vaste thresor, il n'y a que les célestes Vertus de l'Humilité, & de la Charité, qui puissent le former, & l'ouvrir.

Dans ce paisible séjour, parmi un nombre infini de Concitoyens, plus de craintes, plus de soupçons: Après cela plus de peine, plus de nécessité d'un concours de circonstances, pour travailler ces charmantes liaisons de nos coeurs: Au premier abord, de plein fault, à la seule vue d'un Habitant du Ciel, nous voilà mêlez, confondus: Nous ne sommes tous qu'un coeur, & qu'une âme: Par tout on s'empresse réciproquement à se procurer des plaisirs: Par tout on cherche à jouir, & on jouit aussitôt, de celui de s'entr'aimer.

Combien ce doux sentiment ne se renouvellera-t-il point! & puis que de feu, que d'attention, que de délicasie, que de sagacité, que de soins obligeans, pour éviter ce qui pourroit déplaire; Pour augmenter à l'envi notre félicité, toi la mienne, moi la tienne; Pour varier nos plaisirs!

La troisième source de nos sentimens est renfermée en nous mêmes.

La Liberté est un avantage inestimable: Elle seule peut produire cette satisfaction, sans laquelle les plus grands Biens perdroient presque tout leur prix. De là vient que les plaisirs Actifs sont infiniment supérieurs aux plaisirs Passifs. L'Agence, en un mot, est absolument nécessaire pour constituer un bonheur assorti à l'Etre Intelligent;

A égard de cette excellente prérogative, & de tous ses précieux effets, notre situation dans le ciel l'emportera au delà de toute comparaison sur tout ce qu'il peut y avoir ici bas de plus favorable, de plus heureux.

Arrêtons nous un moment à confiderer un plaisir pur, & sublime, que nous ne pourrions goûter si nous étions pas libres: C'est celui de l'Approbation de soi-même.

Le souvenir est une espèce de restitution du Passé. Rien de plus affreux que de se trouver dans une misère, vers laquelle on ne souvient que l'on s'est volontairement acheminé depuis longtems, & dans laquelle on vient de se plonger. Quel que soit le tourment qu'on endure, le plus fort du supplice vient toujours des justes reproches, que l'on le sait. & dans une situation heureuse, qu'on a amenée de loin par des soins, des travaux, pleins de circonspection, de prudence, d'assiduité, & de courage, ce qu'il y a de plus doux procède toujours de l'approbation de soi même.

Telle est notre sensibilité à ce qui est Beau, Bon, Raisonnable, qu'indépendamment des effets de nos choix, & de nos actions, nous retentons beaucoup de douleur, ou de plaisir, selon la conduite, que nous avons tenue.

Tel encore, par une conséquence naturelle, tel est le pouvoir de cette influence de l'approbation de soi-même qu'elle adoucit les plus grands Maux.

Enfin si attrayante est la gloire, si délicieux le plaisir, de s'estimer, de se louer, soi-même que quand nos Maux sont des suites de nos Vertus, comme cela arrive quelquefois parmi les désordres du Monde présent, alors en quelque forte ils changent de nature, ils cessent d'être des Maux; Oui, souvent, par exemple, il est vrai au pied de la lettre que par les louanges de la conscience ceux, que les autres hommes ont la fureur de persécuter pour la Droiture, c'est à dire à cause de leur candeur, de leur probité, de leur piété, sont actuellement heureux. Leurs souffrances sont absorbées dans leurs plaisirs: Ils ne les regardent plus même comme des souffrances: Ce sont de précieux moyens de leur développer à eux mêmes toute l'excellence de leurs âmes, d'y établir une vive, & solide, joye.

Au Ciel quelle satisfaction, quelle douceur, de repenser dans notre esprit les diverses tentations, que nous aurons surmontées, les divers Maux, que nous aurons soufferts, pour suivre constamment la route de cette félicité, que nous venons enfin d'atteindre!

Après cela plus de Maux: Nous posséderons à plein les fruits de nos soins, & de nos efforts: Plus de mélanges amers: Cette approbation de nous mêmes, qui n'étoit quelquefois, ou même ordinairement, qu'une consolation dans nos calamitez, deviendra un plaisir pur, & charmant.

Sur la terre, hélas! nous le connoissons mal, ce divin plaisir, parce-que nous ne travaillons point assez à acquérir tout entier.

Dans le Ciel ce ne sera pas seulement par rapport au Passé que nous pourrons sans réserve nous livrer à cette touchante joye: Nous l'anticiperons dans un à-venir éternel, bien assurez par avance de la conserver inviolablement, & de l'augmenter de plus en plus.

Ah! nous ne pouvons imaginer que fort confusément le ravissant bonheur, qui résultera de la confiante approbation de nous mêmes dans cette illustre Assemblée des Saints, où notre plus ardent désir sera toujours de nous avancer de gloire en gloire jusqu'à la parfaite stature de Christ.

Outre les heureux Sentimens, les plaisirs sans nombre, qui découleront des trois sources, que je viens d'indiquer, il y aura encore dans le Ciel bien des avantages, qui ne contribueront pas peu à compléter notre béatitude: Nous y aurons des occupations, toutes agréables, toutes dignes de nous.

Le sort de notre application, & de nos travaux, aura pour but de nous instruire nous mêmes, de nous perfectionner de plus en plus, & d'instruire aussi, de perfectionner, de rendre plus heureux, tous ceux qui seront au dessous de nous, ou à qui nous pourrons devenir utiles. Nous préférons cette Occupation-là à tout autre plaisir: Exercez à sacrifier des sensations, qui ne seront alors qu'une addition, un surabondant, à notre félicité, nous profiterons avec plaisir de l'occasion de les sacrifier aux sentimens généreux. De pareils sacrifices relèveront les charmes divins de ces beaux sentimens, de ces nobles travaux.

Une autre Occupation, qui tiendra le premier rang après les plus nécessaires, & qui même à quelques égards se mêle, se confond avec elles, c'est celle de louer Dieu, de chanter ses merveilles. Les Anges, & les Saints glorifiez, nous sont représentés dans l'Ecriture comme s'employant à cela continuellement.

Comme eux, avec eux, occupez premièrement à sentir une profonde admiration, une joye ineffable, certainement nous le serons aussi à tirer des copies d'une infinité de célestes objets A rassembler, à r'approcher de nous par mille ingénieuses peintures ce qui dans l'Univers nous aura paru le plus auguste, le plus touchant; A exposer ainsi aux yeux d'Autrui de magnifiques idées, & transmettre dans leur coeur des sentimens exquis.

Après cela les occupations inférieures, celles auxquelles on ne songe que quand on s'est suffisamment attaché à quelque plus grande affaire, celles-là aussi aboutiront toutes à des plaisirs, ou en seront elles mêmes, aussi bien que les plus importantes, sans autre différence que la nature, ou le degré, du plaisir.

Sur la terre Dieu nous donne l'avantage de créer en quelque sorte des objets en employant l'industrie, dont il nous a douez, & les matériaux, qu'il nous fournit.

Dans le Ciel nous aurons encore, sans doute, ce noble privilège, & nous l'aurons avec toute la supériorité, qu'y mettra celle de nos facultez, & des objets.

Il ne s'agira plus ni de labourage pour avoir du pain, ni d'édifices, ni de métiers, pour se garantir des injures de l'air. L'air, ou ce qu'il y aura d'analogue, aura toujours une température convenable à nos corps incorruptibles: Mais par tout, où l'art pourra embellir la Nature Partout, où l'attention, & l'étude, pourront nous procurer des découvertes curieuses, & utiles; Par tout, où la pénétration, les soins, & les travaux, pourront multiplier, perfectionner, les objets de nos Sens, dans tous ces lieux, dans toutes ces occasions-là nous mettrons la main à l'oeuvre avec cette satisfaction extrême qui accompagnera toutes nos entreprises: & tous nos compagnons de félicité concourront avec nous à faire d'admirables ouvrages.

Il y a quelques avantages qui sont impliquez, ou marquez distinctement, en plusieurs endroits de cet Essai; Mais qui méritent bien quelques réflexions à part. Je les envisage ici, & vais les présente, sous l'idée d'Accelloires à notre bonheur céleste.

Un premier, & grand Accelloire c'est notre Tranquillité, notre seûreté. Toutes larmes seront essuyees: Il n'y aura plus ni deuil ni tri, ni travail. Nos larmes seront essuyées: .-- Cela ne signifie pas seulement Nous serons confiiez; Mais toutes les sources de nos pleurs seront tariées.

Ici bas l'idée de notre mortalité, & de notre assujettissement aux douleurs corporelles, nous accompagne par tout. C'en est assez pour avilir, souvent même pour anéantir, les plaisirs de la fleur de nos jours.

Dans le Ciel plus rien à craindre ni des Élemens, maladies contagieuses, bêtes féroces, tremblemens de terre, ou autres bouleversemens de la nature, ni même de ces Ennemis, qui sont incomparablement plus nombreux, plus formidables, plus cruels, c'est & dire rien à craindre des autres Hommes, Là ils seront tous nos tendres Amis.

Peu de Gens peut être conçoivent bien toute la grandeur du plaisir d'une parfaite Seûreté; & cela parce qu'est impossible; d'en jouir sur la terre. Il y a bien dans la vie présente une tranquillité actuelle; Mais ce n'est pas, ce ne sauroit être celle, dont il s'apt, une tranquillité raisonnée.

Celle d'ici bas ne peut tenir un moment contre la réflexion. Dez que nous y pensons, nous la trouvons si mal appuyée qu'aussitôt. Nous la perdons, & ne pouvons la recouvrer qu'en cessant d'y réfléchir.

Dans le Ciel au contraire notre tranquillité s'affermira par nos méditations. La Raisson, la Vertu, la profonde connoissance que nous aurons de Dieu, notre ardent amour pour lui, notre affection mutuelle, banniront à pur, & à plein, toutes sortes d'inquiétudes: Ainsi pour établir une parfaite tranquillité nous n'aurons pas même besoin de cette constitution nouvelle, de ces favorables circonstances, qui concourront à nous rendre immortels, & invulnérables, ou nous mettront en état de prévenir, ou de réparer d'abord, le plus petit dérangement.

A l'idée de notre propre seûreté il faut joindre l'idée de la seûreté des Personnes qui nous seront chères, c'est à dire de tous les Habitans du Ciel. Il faut y joindre aussi l'idée de la seûreté de tous les objets utiles à notre bonheur.

Si heureusement constituez, si sages, & si bons, & vivant avec des Etres ou supérieurs, ou semblables à nous, par les affections généreuses, & sociales, nous serons à l'abri non seulement des grands revers, des pertes considérables; Mais même nous ne serons plus exposez à ces bizarreries, ces travers, qui troublent ici bas notre commerce avec les autres hommes: Sorte de seûreté beaucoup plus estimable qu'on ne la croiroit d'abord.

Il y a des inconveniens, qui semblent devoir naturellement accompagner la grandeur de notre béatitude; L'excellence de nos facultez, & les faveurs extraordinaires, que Dieu nous prodiguera. Mais certainement ils n'auront pas lieu: Non — Nous n'aurons point de dangereuses agitations: Notre vie sera une sérénité éternelle, une tranquillité délicieuse, qui toute parsemée des sentimens les plus vifs n'en sera pourtant point dérangée; & malgré l'irrésistibilité morale des motifs à persister dans les dispositions, les habitudes, qui seront notre bonheur, nous conserverons le privilège toujours essentiel d'être véritablement Agens, le plaisir du Moi, celui de l'approbation de soi-même: Autre seûreté d'un prix infini.

Un autre grand Accessoire c'est celui du progrès: Progrès dans toutes les qualitez avantageuses tant du corps que de âme

Ces deux Accessoires—Celui de la seûreté contre toutes sortes de dangers, & d'inconveniens, & celui du Progrès, sont si nécessaires à notre bonheur que sans eux les plus grands Biens deviendroient en partie des sources de Maux.

Sans la sûreté plus ces Biens seraient dignes de notre attachement, plus deviendrait affligeant le mal qui résulteroit de cette privation. Cela est évident.

A égard du progrès on peut de même par un moment de réflexion se convaincre de sa nécessité pour nous rendre parfaitement heureux. Si je désire de élever vers la perfection, & que la possibilité du progrès me soit refusée, n'est il pas certain que je serai rongé de ce désir? & conçoit on que je puisse m'empêcher de le former?

Un état fixe ne convient point à La Créature Intelligente. Les désirs sont essentiels à son bonheur: Sans eux le sort le plus doux deviendrait bientôt insipide. L'Espérance est toujours un Bien inestimable.

Dans le Ciel nous désirerons, nous espérons; Mais au lieu qu'ici bas souvent nos désirs sont fougueux, & qu'une juste crainte de ne pouvoir les satisfaire les change souvent en autant de douleurs, là ils n'auront que ce degré d'ardeur qui leur donne de la vivacité; & l'assurance de les contenter un jour en sera autant d'agréables sentimens.

N'avoir plus à redouter ces Maux de l'Esprit, qui viennent de nos péchez, c'est encore un excellent accessoire à notre félicité.

Ici bas nous sommes environnés de ces dangereux Ennemis de notre Ame, que l'on nomme des Tentations, Quelque allures que nous nous tenions de la victoire, nous avons encore à combattre: Nous sommes exposés à la surprise: Nous vivons dans les larmes. Quelle charmante paix donc, quelle aimable tranquillité, quand telles seront nos heures circonstances, telles nos forces spirituelles, qu'au lieu de tentations à craindre nous ne trouverons plus dans les objets que de quoi donner un doux exercice à nos Vertus!

Voilà les principaux objets du tableau de la Canaan céleste Il finit par les traits suivans, qui en donnent une idée générale: L'Age d'Or, les Champs Eliées, le jardin d'Eden, nous présentent des images bien riantes, bien effrayantes. Cependant on se tromperoit fort si on se figuroit qu'elles ressemblent beaucoup à notre Paradis. L'Homme ici bas, même dans état d'innocence, & avec toute l'approbation du Très-haut, ne pourrait être qu'au berceau de sa grandeur, & de sa félicité Il faut à tous les Etres créer une Enfance, une Discipline.

Si l'on suppose que dans le Ciel le premier grade des plus petits de ses Habitans ne sera pas à plusieurs égards extrêmement supérieur à ce qu'il pourroit y avoir de plus pur, de plus désirable, dans un jardin d'Eden, on supposera peut être vrai.

Mais dans un petit nombre de siècles nous nous élèverons si haut au dessus de tout ce que l'on peut concevoir de plus glorieux, & de plus aimable, dans un Paradis terrestre qu'il ne peut nous servir seulement à deviner ce que nous serons.

Tout ce que l'on sait ici bas qui n'a aucun rapport à notre état futur, je veux dire qui ne sauroit directement, ni indirectement, détruire quelque disposition contraire à celles, qu'il faut contracter pour être admis dans le séjour des saints glorifiés, ou nous faire acquérir, ou fortifier, quelque disposition nécessaire pour être heureux, ou plus heureux, dans la vie à-venir, tout cela dis-je, avec le succès le plus favorable n'aboutit qu'à nous procurer quelque petit Bien, quelque petit plaisir. De ce que vous le possédez en vérité je vous dis que vous avez reçu votre salaire; & je vous demande: Etes vous bien content? Cela remplit il votre âme? Votre joye est elle durable? Est elle seulement pure pendant qu'elle subsiste? Ne vous souvenez vous pas que de cette nuit votre âme pourrait vous être redemandée? Ne sentez vous pas au sort même de la jouissance de ce Bien, que vous avez tant désiré, & dont la recherche vous a peut-être occupé fort long tems, ne sentez vous pas que vous auriez pu employer vos soins, votre travail, beaucoup plus utilement?

Un pas vers le Ciel vaut mieux que mille démarches, qui n'ont pour but que la Fortune, & les plaisirs mondains. S'amasser des trésors au Ciel c'est là véritablement s'enrichir. Mêler la Vertu à tout ce que l'on fait; Ne la point perdre de vue, même dans vos récréations, c'est avancer chemin vers la solide félicité; C'est même en l'attendant jouir d'un bonheur préférable à tout autre bonheur de la vie présente

Il y a une vérité Théologique, ou Morale, que j'ignorois, ou dont je n'étois pas persuadé: On me la communique: On me la prouve clairement: J'en aperçois d'abord les heureuses suites. C'est un grand gain. Où faut il aller: De quels moyens faut il se servir pour faire des profits si réels, si considérables?

Il y a une sage réflexion, qui ne m'est pas venue dans l'esprit: Je la lis, ou je l'entens: Elle me frappe & Elle me touche vivement: Je désire plus ardemment que je ne saisois de devenir meilleur: J'y vais travailler sur-le-champ: Je le fais déjà en prenant la résolution de le faire: Je le fais avec un ^ele extraordinaire: Je réussirai; Cela est sûr: L'heureux événement! La précieuse réflexion! Où est ce Qui est ce, qui m'en suggèrera d'autres comme celle-là? Est il des spectacles, des Assemblées mondaines, des parties de plaisir, qui puissent entrer en concurrence avec elle?

J'ai fait voir qu'il y aura pour nous dans la Vie à-venir differens degrez de bonheur.

La récompense assignée à chacun répondra exactement aux soins, que chacun aura pris, aux efforts, que chacun aura faits, suivant le nombre des talens, qui lui auront été confiés. Il est vrai que par cette disposition il arrivera que celui, à qui le seigneur avoit confié dix talens, possédera une gloire, une félicité, supérieure à celle du serviteur, qui n'en avoit reçu que cinq. Les choses ne sauroient être autrement. Cette inégalité est absolument nécessaire pour l'harmonie, pour le plus grand Bien, de l'Univers pris dans son Tout. Mais dans un sens chacun sera également heureux, c'est à dire que chacun sera heureux à proportion de sa situation, & de sa capacité. Il le sera parfaitement s'il s'est parfaitement prévalu des avantages, qui lui avoient été accordés. D'où il arrivera souvent que, selon l'expression de notre Sauveur, les premiers seront les derniers, & les derniers seront les premiers: Ceux-là ne se sauveront que comme par feu, & seront placez aux dernière places du dernier rang, qui ayant reçu de Dieu les plus heureuses dispositions, les circonstances les plus avantageuses, les plus encourageantes, n'auront pas porté leurs Vertus à un degré approchant de celui qu'ils pourvoient atteindre; Pendant que Tel, qui est aujourd'hui confondu avec la foule, méprisé des Grands, & dont l'aimable coeur n'est presque connu, & prisé, que de Dieu seul, se trouvant revêtu de la robe de nocce la plus magnifique aux yeux du Juge suprême, recevra ordre de s'asseoir au haut bout de la table avec Abraham, Isaac, & Jacob.

Dieu pardonne abondamment, cela est certain: Il sauvera un grand nombre d'hommes bien imparfaits, sans contredit. Les nombreux dangers, auxquels on est exposé; La foiblesse de la Chair, & du Sang; Les fréquentes distractions, que les affaires humaines causent inévitablement; Divers malheurs de Tempérament, & de Circonstances; Tout cela fournira des excuses, que notre bon Père céleste dans Ses compassions infinies voudra bien accepter: Il nous recevra en grâce: Ou (pour parler conformément à une probable hypothèse, dont j'ai fait mention,) supposé que notre état à-venir soit principalement une suite naturelle des Dispositions que nous aurons contractées sur la Terre; Que les récompenses arbitraires, ou proprement ainsi nommées; ne fassent qu'une partie de notre félicité céleste, il n'en est pas moins vrai qu'à cause des obstacles, qui ici bas se sont opposés à notre sanctification, la petitesse, ou la lenteur, de nos progrès dans la Vertu ne nous exclurra point de la Béatitude. Non: De quelque façon que l'on conçoive l'oeconomie à-venir, la maxime suivante demeure certaine: Pourvu que le Coeur soit bon; Que nous ayons les qualités Morales absolument requièes, diverses fautes de surprise, de négligence, de foiblesse, ne nous seront pas juger indignes être aggregez à l'assemblée des Bienheureux; Ou ne rendront pas notre admission parmi eux incompatible avec leur béatitude, & la nôtre, & par conséquent n'obligeront point le Seigneur à nous la refuser.

C'est pourquoi, pour le dire en passant, avancer que les Payens d'un coeur honnête, & bon, qui n'étant pas dans des circonstances à pouvoir embrasser l'Evangile, l'ont ignoré, ou l'ont rejeté, n'entreront pas dans le Royaume des Cieux, c'est faire voir que l'on ne connoît ni la bonté de Dieu, ni l'ouvrage de notre Rédemption par Jésus Christ.

Je ne saurois marquer ici quelles sont ces qualitez Morales absolument requises. Je dirai seulement en général que de toutes les dispositions la plus essentielle, sans laquelle le séjour de l'immortalité devient inaccessible, c'est d'aimer sincèrement la Vertu. Voilà une doctrine bien consolante: Elle prévient toutes les frayeurs que nous causeroit l'idée des foiblessès humaines.

Mais voudriez vous vous en prévaloir & Voudriez vous en abuser, jusqu'à diminuer, ou ralentir, les progrès que vous pourriez faire dans la sanctification? Ah! pensez bien: Ne confondez point: N'avoir pas la sage émulation, la noble ambition, d'aspirer au plus haut grade & Se laisser aller à une certaine mollesse dans nos efforts; Etre sujet à des inadvertences dans nos soins & un mot, négliger sa sanctification jusqu'à un certain degré; Tout cela se concilie avec espérance de ne pas périr; Mais ce n'est qu'à condition que tout cela ne procède que d'une pesanteur de l'Esprit; D'une indolence naturelle, & des distractions, que les affaires de la vie présente rendent inévitables & Ou des surprises, et occasionnent le tempérament, & les circonstances. Car si cette bassette âme, si cette mollesse dans nôt efforts, si ces inadvertences dans nos soins, procèdent de trop d'attachement aux objets du monde & Si cette conduite est sensiblement volontaire, & sur tout si elle est préméditée, vous méritez une exclusion absolue.

Mais quand même dans ce cas si peu gratiable on ne s'attireroit pas infailliblement les horreurs de l'exclusion, pourroit on considérer un moment sans se couvrir d'ignominie que pour jouir quelques jours d'un vil Bien, d'un faux Bien, d'un phantôme de Bien, qui ne vaut pas le plus foible sentiment de la piété, on se relègue soi même parmi ce qu'il y a de plus obscur, de moins heureux, dans le Royaume céleste? Celui qui sème chichement recueillira aussi chichement. & faire une perte, ou manquer un profit, par rapport aux Biens du Ciel c'est une perte immense, & peut être une perte irréparable; Car quels que puissent être les progrès, que nous ferons dans la suite, cette distance fatale, que nous aurons laissée entre le Poind, où nous nous trouverons, & celui, où nous aurions pu parvenir, savons nous si nous la regagnerons jamais?

Oh! la Proposition étoit bien claire pour ceux qui avoient entendu ses discours; Il avoit eu occasion de faire voir que si les Médiants étoient reçus dans le Ciel il ne pourraient y être heureux eux mêmes, & troubleraient le bonheur de tous ses Habitans: De sorte que pour établir une Béatitude universelle, pure, & durable, il faut de toute nécessité que Dieu éloigne du séjour des Immortels tous les Pêcheurs obstinez: — On peut avoir les qualitez morales absolument requises; & quelque foibles, & lents, que soient les progrès dans la sanctification, on conserve Tes bonnes dispositions; On les perfectionne peu à peu: Ainsi cette lenteur, cette foiblesse, de nos progrès, n'empêchent pas qu'on ne puisse dans le ciel jouir soi même d'un degré de bonheur, & contribuer à celui des autres; Ou du moins s'abstenir d'y causer le moindre désordre.

Revelations XX:9

A great multitude—Of those who had happily finished their course. Such multitudes are afterward described, and still higher degrees of glory which they attain, after a sharp fight and magnificent victory, chap, xiv, 1; xv, 2; six, 1; xx, 4. There is an inconceivable variety in the degrees of reward in the other world. Let not any slothful one say, If I get to heaven at all, I will be content such a one may let heaven go altogether. In worldly things men are ambitious to get as high as they can. Christians have a far more noble ambition. The difference between the very highest and the lowest state in the world, is nothing to the smallest difference between the degrees of glory.

Whilst We Are Labouring After Christian Perfection, We Are Labouring For Eternity, Building To Ourselves Higher Stations In Joys Of Heaven A Practical Treatise on Christian Perfection

(First American Edition Published in Portsmouth in 1822)

Thirdly, Another motive to induce you to aspire after Christian 'perfection, may be taken from the double advantage of it, in this life, and that which is to come. The apostle thus exhorts the Corinthians, wherefore my beloved brethren, be ye stedfast, immoveable, always abounding in the work of the Lord; forasmuch as ye know, that our labour will not be vain in the Lord. This is an exhortation founded upon solid reason; for what can be so and reasonable, as to be always abounding in that work which will never be in vain? Whilst we are pleased with ourselves, or pleased with the world, we are pleased with vanity, and Our most prosperous labours of this kind are, as the Preacher saith, but vanity of vanities, all is vanity. But whilst we are labouring after Christian perfection, we are labouring for eternity, and building to ourselves higher stations in the joys of heaven. As one star differeth from another star in glory, so also is the resurrection of the dead: we shall surely rise to different degrees of glory, of joy and happiness in God, according to our different advancements in purity, holiness, and good works.

No degrees of mortification and self-denial, no' private prayers, no secret mournings, no instances of charity, no labour of love will ever be forgotten, but all treasured up to our everlasting comfort and refreshment. For though the rewards of the other life are free gifts of God; yet since he has assured us, that every man will be rewarded according to his works, it is certain, that our rewards will be as different as our works have been. Now stand still here a while, and ask yourself, whether you really believe this to be true, that the more perfect we make ourselves here, the more happy we shall be hereafter. If you do not believe this to be strictly true, you are but children in the knowledge of God and of religion. And if you do believe it to be true, is it possible to be awake, and not aspiring after Christian perfection? What can you think of, what can the world show you, that can make you any amends for the loss of any degree of virtue? Can any way of life make it reasonable for you, to die less perfect than you might have done? If you would now devote yourself to perfection, perhaps you must part with some friends, you must displease some relations, you must lay aside some designs, you must refrain from some pleasures, you must alter your life; nay, perhaps you must do more than this, you must expose yourself to the hatred of your friends, to the jest and ridicule of wits, and to the scorn and derision of worldly men. But had you not better do and suffer all this, than to die less perfect, less prepared for mansions of eternal glory? But indeed, the suffering all this, is suffering nothing.

For why should It signify any thing to you, what fools and madmen think of you? And surely it causes no wrong or rash judgment, to think those both fools and mad, who condemn what God approves, and like that which God condemns. But if you think this too much to be done, to obtain eternal glory, think on the other hand, what can be gained instead of it. Fancy yourself living in all the ease and pleasure that the world can give you, esteemed by your friends, undisturbed by your enemies, and gratifying all your natural tempers. If you could stand still in such a state, you might say that you had got something; but alas! every day that is added to such a life, is the same thing as a day taken from it, and shows you that so much happiness is gone from you; for be as happy as you will, you must see it all sinking away from you; you must feel yourself decline; you must see that your time shortens apace; you must hear of sudden deaths; you must fear sickness; you must both dread and desire old age; you must fall into the hands of death; you must either die in the painful, bitter sorrows of a deep repentance, or in a sad, gloomy despair, wishing for mountains to fall upon you, and seas to cover you. And is this a happiness to be chosen? Is this all that you can gain by neglecting God, by following your own desire, and not labouring after Christian perfection? Is it worth your while to separate yourself from God, to lose your share in the realms of light, to be thus happy, or I may better say. to be thus miserable, even in this life? You may be so blind and foolish, as not to think of these things s but it is impossible to think of them without labouring after Christian perfection. It may be you are too young, too happy, or too busy to be affected with these reflections'; but let me tell you, that all will be over before you are aware; your day will be spent, and leave you to such a night as that which surprised the foolish virgins. And at midnight there 'Kits a great cry made, Behold the bridegroom cometh, go ye out to meet him. The last hour will soon be with yon, when you will have nothing to look for, but your reward another life; when you will stand with nothing but eternity before you, and must begin to be something that will be your state for ever. I can no more reach heaven with my hands, than I can describe the sentiments that you will then have; you will then feel motions of heart that you never felt before; all your thoughts and reflections will pierce your soul, in a manner that you never before experienced; and you will feel the immortality of your nature by the depth and piercing vigour of your thoughts. You will then know what it is to die; you will then know, that you never knew it before, that you never thought worthily of it; but that divine thoughts are as new and amazing, as that state which follows them.

Let me therefore exhort you to come prepared to this time of trial; to look out for comfort, whilst the day is before you: to treasure up such a fund of good and pious works, as may make you able to bear that state, which cannot be borne without them.

Could I any way make you apprehend, how dying men feel the want of a pious life; how they lament time lost, health and strength squandered away in folly; how they look at eternity, and what they think of the rewards of another life, you would sooth find yourself one of those, who desire to live in the highest state of piety and perfection, that by this means you may grow old in peace, and die in full hopes of eternal glory.

The Glorious State of the Saints in Heaven

Works of John Gill

To describe this glorious state I confess is a task fitter for an angel than a man or for a glorified saint in heaven than for a poor, frail, mortal, sinful creature on earth. However, I shall make an attempt, though it be but a feeble one, under the direction and guidance and with the assistance of the sacred scriptures.

First, By observing those images by which the heavenly glory is represented; images which are taken from things the most grand and striking, of the greatest worth, value, and esteem among men.

1. It Is Represented By A House

But such an one as is not to be found any where on earth, a building of God, an house not made with hands, eternal in the heavens (2 Corinthians 5:1). It is not of this building, or of man's; it is built by him that built all things; it is a house whose builder and maker is God, and not man. There have been many men that have been famous for their skill in architecture and many fine buildings have been erected by them which have perpetuated their memory to many ages such as the temple built by Solomon, rebuilt by Zerubbabel, and repaired by Herod; concerning which the disciples said to Christ, Master, see what manner of stones, and what buildings are here (Mark 13:1)!

But, alas, what were those buildings to this we are speaking of! They were the holy places made with hands which were the figures of the true. This the true holy places themselves, not made with hands (Hebrews 9:23); not with the hands of men, but with the hands of God; not an erection of men's works, but the effect of divine grace, the pure, free-grace-gift of God through Jesus Christ our Lord. This house is in the heavens, and is opposed to the earthly house of our tabernacle; to these houses of clay which have their foundation in the dust; and it is called our house which is from heaven (2 Corinthians 5:2), being entirely of an heavenly kind and nature, and it is eternal. Some men build their houses here on earth in such manner, that they fancy they will continue forever to all generations (Psalm 49:11), but these, either through length of time, fall to decay, or are demolished by an enemy, or consumed by fire, or tumbled down by an earthquake; but this heavenly house always abides, and all the apartments in it are everlasting habitations (Luke 16:9): to which may be added, that this is Christ's Father's house, in which are many mansions (John 14:2); not only which he has built, but in which he dwells, and where he will have all his children; and it is our Father's house as well as Christ's, which makes it still more endearing. And a roomy one it is; there are many mansions, dwelling-places of rest, peace and joy in it; many, for the many ordained to eternal life; for the many justified by the obedience of Christ; for the many for whom his blood was shed for the remission of sins; for the many sons he brings to glory; yea, here is room enough for the innumerable company, chosen, redeemed, and called out of every kindred, tongue, people, and nation.

2. It Is Called An Inheritance

This enlarges the idea: for though, with some an inheritance may be but a single house, a mean cottage, a small pittance yet with others, it is an assemblage of wealth and riches: it consists of many houses, farms, estates, and possessions, of gold and silver, jewels and precious stones. Heaven is often spoken of as an inheritance, in allusion to the land of Canaan, which was distributed by lot for an inheritance to the children of Israel. Hence, says the apostle, in whom, speaking of Christ, we have obtained an inheritance, or a lot (Ephesians 1:11); an inheritance by lot; not that it is a casual thing, since it follows, being predestinated according to the good purpose of him, who worketh all things after the counsel of his own will; but because every saint has his lot, part, and portion in it; for it is an inheritance of the saints in light, and among all them which are sanctified (Colossians 1:12; Acts 20:32). There are many things in which Canaan and the heavenly glory agree, I have not time to attend to now, but only would observe, that the Israelites were brought into the possession of their inheritance, not by Moses, but by Joshua; so the saints are brought to heaven, not by the works of the law, or their obedience to that, but by Jesus, the great captain of their salvation.

Heaven is also called an inheritance, in allusion to inheritances among men, which are not acquired by labor and diligence, nor purchased with money, but bequeathed by relations and friends, and are transmitted from father to son. So the heavenly glory is not obtained by the works of men, though they naturally think they must do some good thing to inherit eternal life; nor is it to be purchased. If a man would give all the substance of his house for it, it would utterly be contemned: it is bequeathed, to saints by their heavenly Father, whose good pleasure it is to give them the kingdom (Luke 12:32). And this he gives by will, by testament, and which comes to them by, upon, and through the death of the testator Jesus Christ. And it solely belongs to children, if children, then heirs (Romans 8:17); not to servants, no not the ministering spirits, who minister for them who shall be, or rather who are heirs of salvation, or shall inherit it (Hebrews 1:14); much less to the children of the bondwoman, or to strangers; only to those who are predestinated to the adoption of children, or are fellow-citizens with the saints, and of the household of God.

This is an inheritance which is incorruptible, whereas all earthly inheritances are corruptible things; but this cannot be corrupted by any thing, by sin, or anything else. And none but incorruptible persons shall enjoy it. It is undefiled and will ever remain so and none that defileth, or is defiled shall ever possess it. It fadeth not away, nor the glory of it, as earthly inheritances through length of time do. It is reserved in the heavens, safe and secure for all the heirs of it and they are kept by the power of God for it (1 Peter 1:4). It is an eternal inheritance (Hebrews 9:15) out of the possession of which the right heirs will never be ejected.

3. The Glory Of The Saints In Heaven Is Expressed By A City

This still more enlarges the idea of it. [It is] a city whose builder and maker is God, and so infinitely beyond any thing of this kind on earth; a city which has foundations (Hebrews 11:10), more than one, the everlasting love of God, the unalterable covenant of grace, and the rock of ages, Jesus Christ; so that it stands firm and immovable and cannot be shaken and thrown down, as some cities of late have been by earthquakes: here no city is continuing, but in length of time falls to ruin; but this always abides. The glory of it cannot be expressed and described by men; the description of the city of the new Jerusalem seems to be hyperbolical and to exceed belief; the figures by which it is set forth are bold and strong; as that its wall is of jasper, its foundations precious stones, its gates of pearl, and the streets thereof of pure gold, transparent as glass (Revelation 21:18-21); and yet as bold and strong as these figures are, they fall short of setting forth the true and real grandeur of it.

4. The Heavenly State Is Signified By A Kingdom

This carries the idea of it higher still and gives a more exalted notion of it. Saints are kings, not titular and nominal ones; they have a kingdom now which cannot be moved and which lies in righteousness, peace, and joy in the Holy Ghost (Hebrews 12:28; Romans 14:17); and they are heirs of another, a kingdom prepared for them from the foundation of the world; a kingdom and glory, or a glorious kingdom, to which they are called and fitted for in effectual vocation; an everlasting kingdom, into which they will be introduced when time shall be no more with them (Matthew 25:35; 1 Thessalonians 2:12; 2 Peter 1:11); a kingdom that has all the regalia belonging to it.

The glory of this state is sometimes expressed by a crown, and is called a crown of life, even of eternal life and will be enjoyed forever; a crown of righteousness, which will be given by the righteous judge in a way of righteousness and according to the rules of justice; a crown of glory that fadeth not away; not like the garlands or crowns given to conquerors in the Olympic games, to which the allusion is, which were made sometimes of flowers and herbs, that soon withered away; they ran, they strove to obtain a corruptible crown, we an incorruptible one (Revelation 2:11; 2 Timothy 4:8; 1 Peter 5:4; 1 Corinthians 9:25).

The same is also expressed by a throne, another ensign or emblem of the glory of a kingdom; a throne of glory, or a glorious throne to which the saints are raised from the dunghill (1 Samuel 2:8) to sit upon and inherit, even the same throne Christ himself sits upon; for, says he, to him that overcometh will I grant to sit with me in my throne, even as I also overcame, and am set down with my Father on his throne (Revelation 3:21). How glorious and magnificent must this state be!

5. It Is Set Forth By Everything That Is Pleasing And Grateful To The Mind Or Striking To The Senses And By Such Things As Exceed All The Enjoyments Of Them In This World

Here the saints will sit down with Christ at his table and drink new wine with him in his Father's kingdom. Here they will pluck and eat of the fruit of the tree of life which stands in the midst of the paradise of God; that tree of life which bears twelve manner of fruits, yielded every month, the leaves of which are for the healing of the nations. Here they will drink of the river of divine pleasure that pure water of life proceeding out of the throne of God and the Lamb (Luke 22:18, 30; Revelation 2:7; 22:1-2).

Here they will see what eye hath not seen, hear what the ear hath not heard, nor have entered into the heart of man (1 Corinthians 2:9). The eye of man has seen many things on earth very grand and illustrious and what have been very entertaining to it, but it never saw such objects as will be seen in heaven. The ear of man has heard and been entertained with very pleasing sounds, very delightful music, vocal and instrumental, but it never heard such music as will be heard in heaven. The heart of man can conceive of more than it has either seen or heard, but it never conceived of such things as will be enjoyed in the world above.

Secondly, Our conceptions of the heavenly glory, at least of the greatness of it, may be aided and assisted by considering the epithets given unto it.

It Is Represented As An Unseen Glory

As consisting of things not seen (2 Corinthians 5:8) which are eternal; which faith and hope for the present have only concern with: faith is the substance of things hoped for, the evidence of things not seen (Hebrews 11:1). We have not so much as a glimpse of this glory but by faith; and hope is waiting for it as something yet unseen: “hope that is seen is not hope, for what a man seeth, why doth he yet hope for? but if we hope for that we see not, then do we with patience wait for it” (Romans 8:24, 25).

This Glory Is Also Future

Nothing as yet enjoyed is that; it is something to come, greater than ever has been possessed in this world; it is a glory that shall be revealed; it is grace, or that glory to be which is the perfection of grace, that is brought unto us, at the revelation of Christ when the saints shall appear with him in glory. At present, it does not appear what they shall be, but when he shall appear, they shall be like him, and see him as he is (Romans 8:18; Colossians 3:4; 1 John 3:2).

Moreover This Glory Is An Incomparable One

There is nothing in this world to be compared to it. All the wealth, riches and grandeur of it are trifling and empty things in comparison of it. The apostle has a strange expression at first sight upon this subject: “I reckon,” says he, “that the sufferings of this present time are not worthy to be compared with the glory which shall be revealed in us” (Romans 8:18). One would rather have thought he should have said, that all that can be desired and enjoyed in the present state are not to be compared or made mention of with the glory of the other world. But he instances in the sufferings of the saints, the purest part of their services, if they may be called so; and asserts that these are far from being meritorious of this glory, fall infinitely short of it, there being no proportion between them and that; they are light afflictions, this a weight of glory; they are for a moment, this eternal; and this is what supports the saints in their suffering circumstances and makes them choose affliction with the people of God, and to esteem reproach for Christ’s sake greater riches than the treasures in Egypt, having respect to the recompense of reward (Hebrews 11:25-26); which is of grace, and not of works; and causes them to take joyfully the spoiling of their goods, for the sake of Christ, knowing that they have in heaven a better and an enduring Substance (Hebrews 10:34).

Likewise This Glory Is Always The Same

The glory of this world passes away, but the glory of the world to come never will: is it a crown of glory? It is a never-fading one. Is it an inheritance? It is an inheritance that fadeth not away. When kingdoms, crowns and scepters are no more, and all that is great and glorious in this world, this will endure; for it is eternal glory (1 Peter 5:10). The God of all grace calls his people to [this] and will put them in the possession of [it]. The epithet is joined to all the images by which it is expressed. Is it a house? Is it eternal in the heavens? Is it a city? It is what continues forever. Is it a kingdom? It is an everlasting one. It is a being forever with the Lord and which raises and aggrandizes the idea of it.

Thirdly, We may obtain some further knowledge of the glory of heaven by considering what will be the enjoyment of the saints, both in the separate state of the soul before the resurrection and in its state with the body after it.

1. In Its Separate State Before The Resurrection

The soul of a saint as soon as separated from the body, as has been observed, will be immediately with Christ, and happy; it will enter into and enjoy the presence of God and Christ. And if the gracious presence of God is so desirable by his people now that they choose not to go any where without it, but say with Moses, “if thy presence go not with me, carry us not up hence” (Exodus 33:15); if this gives more joy and gladness than the increase of all worldly enjoyments; what will the glorious presence of the Lord be, in which presence is fullness of joy and at whose right hand are pleasures for evermore (Psalm 16:11), not to be conceived of? If the presence of Christ in his church is such as makes his tabernacles amiable and a day in his courts better than a thousand (Psalm 84:2, 10) elsewhere; if the enjoyment of him by his disciples at his transfiguration upon the mount was such as caused them to say, it is good for us to be here (Matthew 17:4); how glorious and happy must it be, to be forever with him in a state where there will be no more a separation from him nor interruption of communion with him? For in this state, the separate soul shall enjoy uninterrupted communion with Father, Son, and Spirit. If fellowship with the Father and with the Son causes saints now to exult and glory when they enjoy it; and if the communion of the Holy Ghost is so desirable and is prayed and wished for now, what will all this be in a state of perfection? If to sit with Christ at his table, when our spikenard sends forth the smell thereof and to be brought into Christ's banqueting house, where his banner over us is love (Song of Solomon 1:12; 2:4), under which we sup with him, and he with us, are so exceeding delightful and entertaining now; what will it be to sit down with him at his table in his kingdom and glory?

To which may be added, that there will be in this state not only communion with God, but conformity to him. Saints will be like him, as well as see him. If every view of the glory of Christ by faith is assimilating now and changes into the same image from glory to glory (2 Corinthians 3:18); what will a full view of him, a clear sight of him, do? Then will the great end of predestination, to be conformed to the image of the Son of God (Romans 8:29), be completely answered with respect to the soul; which in all its powers and faculties will bear a resemblance to Christ and be wholly swallowed up in him.

Its understanding will have a clear and unclouded discernment of him. The bias of the mind will be wholly towards him. The will will be entirely submitted to him. The affections will be in the strongest manner set upon him and things above; and the memory will be fully stored with divine and heavenly things. There will be nothing irregular and disagreeable in the soul in its motions, thoughts, and actions.

Besides all this, there will be a converse in this separate state with angels and the spirits of just men made perfect. How angels communicate their thoughts to and converse with each other, we know not; but no doubt they have ways and means by which they do and in the same way can communicate and converse with the souls of men, spirits like themselves; and these also one with another, which will be a considerable branch of the happiness of this separate state: in which also there will be perfect knowledge in the soul; perfect knowledge of God in his attributes, persons, and works, so far as a creature is capable of; perfect knowledge of the Son of God in his person, offices, and grace; perfect knowledge of the blessed Spirit; perfect knowledge of angels; perfect knowledge of one another, of which more hereafter; perfect knowledge of the providences of God, which have been intricate and obscure here, but now will be manifest; perfect knowledge of the doctrines of the gospel, of the mysteries of grace. Now we know and prophecy but in part, but then shall we know as we are known (1 Corinthians 13:9, 12).

There will be also perfect holiness. The soul will be entirely free from the being of sin as well as from the guilt and pollution of it. It will be wholly delivered from the body of sin and death, under which it now groans, and be without spot, or blemish, or any such thing – No sinful thought, no impure desire, nor any evil inclination or bias in it. And so there will be perfect peace of mind: if perfect peace is given to such as believe now, much more hereafter the end of such will be peace; when they die they enter into it, even into the joy of their Lord (Psalm 37:37; Isaiah 57:2; Matthew 25:21), which will be full, everlasting, and without interruption.

2. At The Resurrection There Will Be A Glory Upon The Body As Well As Upon The Soul

A glory equal to that of the sun, moon, and stars. This body, which is sown in the earth in corruption; a vile body, corrupted by sin, and now by death, and laid in corruption and dust, shall be raised in incorruption (1 Corinthians 15:41-44, 53, 54); no more to be corrupted by sin, or by diseases, or by death. This corruptible shall put on incorruption, and this mortal shall put on immortality, and death shall be swallowed up in victory; an entire conquest being obtained over it: and what is sown in dishonor and has lost all its beauty and glory and become nauseous and fit only to be the companion of worms shall be raised in glory; in the utmost perfection, beauty, and comeliness, fashioned like to the glorious body of Christ, and shine like the sun in the firmament of heaven. And what is sown in weakness, having lost all its strength and carried by others to the grave, shall be raised in power; strong and hale, able to subsist without food and to move itself from place to place, and will attend the service of God and the Lamb without weakness and weariness. There will be no more complaint of this kind: the spirit is willing, but the flesh is weak (Matthew 26:41); and what is sown a natural body, or an animal one, which while it lived was supported with animal food, and when it died, died as animals do, shall be raised a spiritual body; not turned into a spirit, for then it would not have flesh and bones, as it will have; but it will subsist as spirits do, without food, and the like, and no more die. Then it will be no encumbrance to the soul, as now, in spiritual services, but aiding and assisting to it in them, and be fitted for spiritual employments and to converse with spiritual objects; and thus will it continue forever.

3. In this conjunct state, when soul and body will be united together, there will be a fresh accession of glory to the whole man and new enjoyments possessed in a more large and sensible manner.

A. There Will Be What Is Commonly Called The Beatific Vision

Which though in part enjoyed before, will be now enlarged and will be both intellectual and corporal, according to the diversity of objects it will be concerned with.

(1) There will be the vision of God: now we walk by faith, then by sight; we shall see his face in righteousness, yea face to face, and even see him as he is (2 Corinthians 5:7; Psalm 17:15; 1 Corinthians 13:12; 1 John 3:2); not his essence and nature, so as to comprehend it; but shall have a clear and unclouded apprehension of his perfections and glory. We shall see God in all his persons; we shall see the Father of Christ and ours, who loved us with an everlasting love; who chose and blessed us with all spiritual blessings in his Son; who made a covenant with him and us in him, ordered in all things and sure; who laid help on him the mighty One, and sent him in the fulness of time, to be our Redeemer and Savior.

We shall see the Son of God himself, who became our surety, and is the Mediator between God and man; who assumed our nature, suffered and died in our room and stead; who rose again, ascended to heaven, is set down at the right hand of God, and will judge the world in righteousness. We shall see the glory of his divine person, with the eyes of our understanding fully enlightened and his glory as mediator of which we have little knowledge now, but then we shall have a clear understanding and discernment of it; yea in our flesh shall we see God, as Job says (Job 19:26, 27), and with our corporal eyes behold the glory of Christ's human body. We shall see that beautiful face that was once besmeared with sweat and blood, shine like the sun in its full strength; and those blessed temples that were crowned with thorns, crowned with glory and honor; and him whose hands and feet were pierced with nails, and covered with gore blood, holding the scepter of his kingdom, or walking in stately majesty, or sitting on his throne of glory.

We shall see the blessed Spirit, who convinced us of sin, righteousness, and judgment, and was our quickener and comforter; who led us into truth, and took of the things of Christ and showed them to us; who witnessed to our spirits that we were the children of God, and often assisted us in our prayers to him; was the earnest of our inheritance, and by whom we were sealed unto the day of redemption. We shall see him who began, and carried on, and perfected the work of grace in us; and that with the greatest pleasure and thankfulness.

(2) Saints will see all the holy angels in their shining forms, ranks, and orders; those thrones, dominions, principalities, and powers made by Christ, and subject to him: we shall see those sons of God, those morning-stars that sung together when the foundation of the earth was laid; those ten thousands of holy ones that made such a considerable figure in the apparatus at mount Sinai, when from the Lord's right hand went a fiery law; that multitude of the heavenly host that descended at Christ's incarnation, and sung "glory to God in the highest, on earth peace, and good-will to men;" that numerous company of them that attended our Lord at his ascension, and will be with him when he comes a second time to judge the world in righteousness. We shall see them bowing their heads while they adore the divine being and celebrate the perfections of his nature and clapping their wings while the heavenly arches resound their praises [with] those of glorified saints.

(3) The saints will see and know one another in this perfect state. The question was asked Luther a little before his death, whether we should know one another in the other world? To which he answered, by observing the case of Adam who knew Eve to be flesh of his flesh and bone of his bone, whom he had never seen before how did he know this? Says he, by the Spirit of God, by revelation; so, added he, shall we know parents, wives, children, in the other world, and that more perfectly. Besides, how did the apostles know Moses and Elias on the mount with Christ whom they had never seen before but by revelation? So the saints shall know one another in heaven; how otherwise can those whom gospel-ministers have been the instruments of their conversion and edification be their “joy and crown of rejoicing at the last day?” And indeed it seems necessary to the felicity of society to know one another; we are never quite free and easy in company when a stranger is in it we know not.

And it will undoubtedly give a pleasure not to be expressed to see and know those persons as then we shall. There we shall see the first man that was in the world, the head and representative of all mankind, and the figure of him that was to come, with Eve the mother of all living; we shall see this happy pair in a more exalted station than when in a state of innocence in Eden’s garden. There we shall see the first martyr whose blood was shed in the cause of religion, who by faith in the sacrifice of Christ, at that distance from it, offered a more excellent one than his brother.

There we shall see the man that saw two worlds, the old world that then was, and the present world that now is; who built an ark for the saving of himself and family, when the world of the ungodly was swept away with the deluge. There we shall see Abraham, Isaac, and Jacob with the rest of the patriarchs, both before and after the flood; and sit down with them in the kingdom of heaven. There we shall see Moses the meekest of men by whom the Lord did such wonders in the land of Ham and in the fields of Zoan, the lawgiver of Israel, who led them through the Red Sea and wilderness, to the border of Canaan’s land. There we shall see the man after God’s own heart, the sweet Psalmist of Israel, striking his harp to a higher note, to a better tune and to better purpose than when here on earth. There we shall see the evangelic prophet Isaiah, with the rest of his brethren the prophets, who prophesied beforehand of the sufferings of Christ and the glory that should follow.

There we shall see the forerunner and harbinger of Christ who prepared his way by preaching and baptizing and who so clearly pointed him out as “the Lamb of God that taketh away the sins of the world.” There we shall see the apostles of Christ, the companions of our dear Redeemer, who heard his doctrines, saw his miracles, and were witnesses of his sufferings, death, resurrection, and ascension to heaven; and were the instruments of spreading the Gospel through the several parts of the world and sealed it with their blood. There we shall see the wondrous man that was caught up into the third heaven, who heard words unspeakable, not lawful for a man to utter; who preached the gospel from Jerusalem round about to Illyricum and was the means of converting so many thousands of souls and of planting so many churches in the Gentile world. There we shall see all the confessors and martyrs of Jesus that have been in all ages; yea, “the general assembly and church of the first born, whose names are written in heaven;” the bride the Lamb’s wife, with the glory of God upon her; even the whole innumerable company of the chosen, redeemed, and called ones, clothed in white robes, and palms in their hands.

B. As In This State There Will Be An Enjoyment Of All That Is Good So A Freedom From All That Is Evil

There will be an entire deliverance from sin; the saints will no more groan, being burdened with it; the Canaanite will be no more in the land; or such sins and corruptions in the heart which are now thorns in the flesh and pricks in the eyes and sides of good men. There will be no more a pricking briar, or grieving thorn, through the heavenly land or any temptations of Satan to disturb and molest; the people of God will be out of the reach of his fiery darts. He found ways and means to get into the earthly paradise, to seduce our first parents: but he will never be able to get into the heavenly paradise; he is cast out and fallen from thence and will never reassume his place any more there. Nor will wicked men any more oppress them, there the wicked cease from troubling (Job 3:17); nor will their ears be offended any more with their oaths and blasphemies, or grieved with their filthy conversation; they will then be shut up in the pit of destruction and a vast chasm, a great gulf fixed between them, so that there will be no passing from one to the other. Nor will there be any afflictions attending the saints in this state. They will now be come out of great tribulations and shall hunger and thirst no more nor be annoyed and distressed with any outward calamity whatever. There will be no more pain or sorrow, diseases and death; nor will there be any inward distresses; no more fightings without, or fears within (2 Corinthians 7:5), about their state and condition; no more doubts nor questioning, nor misgivings of heart, nor unbelief; no more darkness and desertion, but “everlasting joy shall be upon them and sorrow and sighing shall flee away;” and there will be nothing but perfect rest, ease and peace.

C. The Employment Of The Saints In This State Deserves Notice And Will Be No Small Part Of Their Happiness

As their bodies will be raised and united to their souls, they will spend the happy hours and days of eternity in conversing with each other, in sitting, walking, and talking together about divine, spiritual, and heavenly things, and that in an audible manner. What language they will speak is not for us to say; it is highly probable, since tongues will cease (1 Corinthians 13:8), that the jargon of speech introduced at Babel will be no more, but that one language will be spoken by all, but what that will be, cannot be determined; perhaps a language more pure, more perfect, more elegant, more refined than ever was spoken by man on earth the saints will now be employed in serving the Lord continually, not by preaching, or hearing, or reading, or praying, or attending on ordinances as now, which will be no more, but in praising the Lord for all the benefits of his grace and goodness; they will sing the song of Moses and the Lamb; the songs of electing, redeeming, justifying, adopting, calling, sanctifying, and persevering grace; and this will be their work throughout an endless eternity.

In Puritan New England, with its abiding concern for things not of this world and its distrust of forms and ceremonies, one art flourished: the symbolic art of mortuary monument stonemasons. This carefully researched, beautifully illustrated work was the first to consider this art in depth as a meaningful aesthetic-spiritual expression. It is reissued for today's readers, with a new preface outlining changes in the field since the book appeared in 1966.

The use of sun orbs and stars had a rather specific meaning on the gravestone. Jonathan Edwards said:

The different glory of the sun, the moon and the stars represents the different glory of Christ and the glorified saints.

Heaven is Divided into Two Kingdoms

20. As there are infinite varieties in heaven, and no one society nor any one angel is exactly like any other, there are in heaven general, specific, and particular divisions. The general division is into two kingdoms, the specific into three heavens, and the particular into innumerable societies. Each of these will be treated of in what follows. The general division is said to be into kingdoms, because heaven is called "the kingdom of God."

21. There are angels that receive more interiorly the Divine that goes forth from the Lord, and others that receive it less interiorly; the former are called celestial angels, and the latter spiritual angels. Because of this difference heaven is divided into two kingdoms, one called the Celestial Kingdom, the other the Spiritual Kingdom.

22. As the angels that constitute the celestial kingdom receive the Divine of the Lord more interiorly they are called interior and also higher angels; and for the same reason the heavens that they constitute are called interior and higher heavens. They are called higher and lower, because these terms designate what is interior and what is exterior.

23. The love in which those are, who are in the celestial kingdom is called celestial love, and the love in which those are who are in the spiritual kingdom is called spiritual love. Celestial love is love to the Lord, and spiritual love is love towards the neighbor. And as all good pertains to love (for good to any one is what he loves) the good also of the other kingdom is called celestial, and the good of the other spiritual. Evidently, then, the two kingdoms are distinguished from each other in the same way as good of love to the Lord is distinguished from good of love towards the neighbor. And as the good of love to the Lord is an interior good, and that love is interior love, so the celestial angels are interior angels, and are called higher angels.

24. The celestial kingdom is called also the Lord's priestly kingdom, and in the Word "His dwelling-place;" while the spiritual kingdom is called His royal kingdom, and in the Word "His throne." And from the celestial Divine the Lord in the world was called "Jesus," while from the spiritual Divine He was called "Christ."

25. The angels in the Lord's celestial kingdom, from their more interior reception of the Divine of the Lord, far excel in wisdom and glory the angels that are in His spiritual kingdom; for they are in love to the Lord, and consequently are nearer and more closely conjoined to Him. These angels are such because they have received and continue to receive Divine truths at once in their life, and not first in memory and thought, as the spiritual angels do. Consequently they have Divine truths written in their hearts, and they perceive them, and as it were see them, in themselves; nor do they ever reason about them whether they are true or not. They are such as are described in Jeremiah:

I will put my law in their mind, and will write it in their heart. They shall teach no more everyone his friend and everyone his brother, saying, Know ye Jehovah. They shall know Me, from the least of them even to the greatest of them (31:33, 34).

And they are called in Isaiah:

Taught of Jehovah (54:13).

That the "taught of Jehovah" are those who are taught by the Lord He Himself teaches in John (6:45, 46).

26. It has been said that these angels have wisdom and glory above others for the reason that they have received and continue to receive Divine truths at once in their life. For as soon as they hear Divine truths, they will and do them, instead of storing them up in the memory and afterwards considering whether they are true. They know at once by influx from the Lord whether the truth they hear is true; for the Lord flows directly into man's willing, but mediately through his willing into his thinking. Or what is the same, the Lord flows directly into good, but mediately through good into truth. That is called good which belongs to the will and action therefrom, while that is called truth that belongs to the memory and to the thought therefrom ...

27. Because of this difference between the angels of the celestial kingdom and the angels of the spiritual kingdom they are not together, and have no interaction with each other. They are able to communicate only through intermediate angelic societies, which are called celestial-spiritual. Through these the celestial kingdom flows into the spiritual; and from this it comes to pass that although heaven is divided into two kingdoms it nevertheless makes one. The Lord always provides such intermediate angels through whom there is communication and conjunction.

28. As the angels of these two kingdoms will be fully treated of in what follows, particulars are here omitted.

There are Three Heavens

29. There are three heavens, entirely distinct from each other, an inmost or third, a middle or second, and an outmost or first. These have a like order and relation to each other as the highest part of man, or his head, the middle part, or body, and the lowest, or feet; or as the upper, the middle, and the lower stories of a house. In the same order is the Divine that goes forth and descends from the Lord; consequently heaven, from the necessity of order, is threefold.

30. The interiors of man, which belong to his mind and disposition, are also in like order. He has an inmost, a middle, and an outmost part; for when man was created all things of Divine order were brought together in him, so that he became Divine order in form, and consequently a heaven in miniature. For this reason also man, as regards his interiors, has communication with the heavens and comes after death among the angels, either among those of the inmost, or of the middle, or of the outmost heaven, in accordance with his reception of Divine good and truth from the Lord during his life in the world.

31. The Divine that flows in from the Lord and is received in the third or inmost heaven is called celestial, and in consequence the angels there are called celestial angels; the Divine that flows in from the Lord and is received in the second or middle heaven is called spiritual, and in consequence the angels there are called spiritual angels; while the Divine that flows in from the Lord and is received in the outmost or first heaven is called natural; but as the natural of that heaven is not like the natural of the world, but has the spiritual and the celestial within it, that heaven is called the spiritual-natural and the celestial-natural, and in consequence the angels there are called spiritual-natural and celestial-natural. Those who receive influx from the middle or second heaven, which is the spiritual heaven, are called spiritual-natural; and those who receive influx from the third or inmost heaven, which is the celestial heaven, are called celestial-natural. The spiritual-natural angels and the celestial-natural angels are distinct from each other; nevertheless they constitute one heaven, because they are in one degree.

32. In each heaven there is an internal and an external; those in the internal are called there internal angels, while those in the external are called external angels. The internal and the external in the heavens, or in each heaven, hold the same relation as the voluntary and intellectual in man—the internal corresponding to the voluntary, and the external to the intellectual. Everything voluntary has its intellectual; one cannot exist without the other. The voluntary may be compared to a flame and the intellectual to the light therefrom.

33. Let it be clearly understood that with the angels it is the interiors that cause them to be in one heaven or another; for as their interiors are more open to the Lord they are in a more interior heaven. There are three degrees of interiors in each angel and spirit, and also in man. Those in whom the third degree is opened are in the inmost heaven. Those in whom the second degree is opened, or only the first, are in the middle or in the outmost heaven. The interiors are opened by reception of Divine good and Divine truth. Those who are affected by Divine truths and admit them at once into the life, thus into the will and into action therefrom, are in the inmost or third heaven, and have their place there in accordance with their reception of good from affection for truth. Those who do not admit truths at once into the will but into the memory, and thence into the understanding, and from the understanding will and do them, are in the middle or second heaven. But those who live morally and who believe in a Divine, and who care very little about being taught, are in the outmost or first heaven. From this it is clear that the states of the interiors are what make heaven, and that heaven is within everyone, and not outside of him; as the Lord teaches when He says:

The kingdom of God cometh not with observation, neither shall they say, Lo here, or Lo there; for behold the kingdom of God ye have within you (Luke 17:20, 21).

34. Furthermore, all perfection increases towards interiors and decreases towards exteriors, since interiors are nearer to the Divine, and are in themselves pure, while exteriors are more remote from the Divine and are in themselves grosser. Intelligence, wisdom, love, everything good and the resulting happiness, are what constitute angelic perfection; but not happiness apart from these, for such happiness is external and not internal. Because in the angels of the inmost heaven the interiors have been opened in the third degree their perfection immeasurably surpasses the perfection of angels in the middle heaven, whose interiors have been opened in the second degree. So the perfection of these angels exceeds in like measure the perfection of angels of the outmost heaven.

35. Because of this distinction an angel of one heaven cannot go among the angels of another heaven, that is, no one can ascend from a lower heaven and no one can descend from a higher heaven. One ascending from a lower heaven is seized with a distress even to anguish, and is unable to see those who are there, still less to talk with them; while one descending from a higher heaven is deprived of his wisdom, stammers in his speech, and is in despair.

There were some from the outmost heaven who had not yet been taught that the interiors of angels are what constitute heaven, and who believed that they might come into a higher heavenly happiness by simply gaining access to a heaven where higher angels are. These were permitted to enter among such angels. But when they were there they could see no one, however much they searched, although there was a great multitude present; for the interiors of the newcomers not having been opened in the same degree as the interiors of the angels there, their sight was not so opened. Presently they were seized with such anguish of heart that they scarcely knew whether they were alive or not. Therefore they hastily betook themselves to the heaven from which they came, glad to get back among their like, and pledging themselves that they would no longer covet higher things than were in agreement with their life. Again, I have seen some let down from a higher heaven; and these were deprived of their wisdom until they no longer knew what their own heaven was.

It is otherwise when, as is often done, angels are raised up by the Lord out of a lower heaven into a higher that they may behold its glory; for then they are prepared beforehand, and are encompassed by intermediate angels, through whom they have communication with those they come among. From all this it is plain that the three heavens are entirely distinct from each other.

36. Those, however, who are in the same heaven can affiliate with any who are there; but the delights of such affiliation are measured by the kinships of good they have come into; of which more will be said in the following chapters.

37. But although the heavens are so distinct that there can be no companionship between the angels of one heaven and the angels of another, still the Lord joins all the heavens together by both direct and mediate influx-direct from Himself into all the heavens, and mediate from one heaven into another.<sup>{1}</sup> He thus makes the three heavens to be one, and all to be in such connection from the First to the Last that nothing unconnected is possible. Whatever is not connected through intermediates with the First can have no permanent existence, but is dissipated and becomes nothing.

38. Only he who knows how degrees are related to Divine order can comprehend how the heavens are distinct, or even what is meant by the internal and the external man. Most men in the world have no other idea of what is interior and what is exterior, or of what is higher and what is lower, than as something continuous, or coherent by continuity, from purer to grosser. But the relation of what is interior to what is exterior is discrete, not continuous. Degrees are of two kinds, those that are continuous and those that are not.

Continuous degrees are related like the degrees of the waning of a light from its bright blaze to darkness, or like the degrees of the decrease of vision from objects in the light to those in the shade, or like degrees of purity in the atmosphere from bottom to top. These degrees are determined by distance. On the other hand, degrees that are not continuous, but discrete, are distinguished like prior and posterior, like cause and effect, and like what produces and what is produced. Whoever looks into the matter will see that in each thing and all things in the whole world, whatever they are, there are such degrees of producing and compounding, that is, from one a second, and from that a third, and so on. Until one has acquired for himself a perception of these degrees he cannot possibly understand the differences between the heavens, nor between the interior and exterior faculties of man, nor the differences between the spiritual world and the natural world, nor between the spirit of man and his body. So neither can he understand the nature and source of correspondences and representations, or the nature of influx.

Sensual men do not apprehend these differences, for they make increase and decrease, even according to these degrees, to be continuous, and are therefore unable to conceive of what is spiritual otherwise than as a purer natural. And in consequence they remain outside of and a great way off from intelligence.

39. Finally, a certain arcanum respecting the angels of the three heavens, which has not hitherto come into any one's mind, because degrees have not been understood, may be related. In every angel and also in every man there is an inmost or highest degree, or an inmost or highest something, into which the Divine of the Lord primarily or proximately flows, and from which it disposes the other interiors in him that follow in accordance with the degrees of order. This inmost or highest degree may be called the entrance of the Lord to the angel or man, and His veriest dwelling-place in them. It is by virtue of this inmost or highest that a man is a man, and is distinguished from irrational animals, for these do not have it. From this it is that man, unlike the animals, is capable, in respect to all his interiors which pertain to his mind and disposition, of being raised up by the Lord to Himself, of believing in the Lord, of being moved by love to the Lord, and thereby beholding Him, and of receiving intelligence and wisdom, and speaking from reason. Also, it is by virtue of this that he lives to eternity. But what is arranged and provided by the Lord in this inmost does not distinctly flow into the perception of any angel, because it is above his thought and transcends his wisdom.

40. These now are the general truths respecting the three heavens; but in what follows each heaven will be particularly treated of.

The Heavens Consist of Innumerable Societies

41. The angels of each heaven are not together in one place, but are divided into larger and smaller societies in accordance with the differences of good of love and of faith in which they are, those who are in like good forming a single society. Goods in the heavens are in infinite variety, and each angel is as it were his own good.

42. Moreover, the angelic societies in the heavens are at a distance from each other as their goods differ in general and in particular. For in the spiritual world the only ground of distance is difference in the state of interiors, thus in the heavens difference in the states of love, those who differ much being far apart, and those who differ but little being but little apart, and likeness causing them to be together.

43. All who are in the same society are arranged in like manner in respect to each other; those who are more perfect, that is, who excel in good, thus in love, wisdom, and intelligence, being in the middle; those who are less pre-eminent being round about at a distance in accordance with the decrease of their perfection. The arrangement is like light diminishing from the middle to the circumference, those who are in the middle being in the greatest light, and those towards the circumference in less and less.

44. Like are drawn spontaneously as it were to their like; for with their like they are as if with their own and at home, but with others they are as if with strangers and abroad; also when with their like they are in their freedom, and consequently in every delight of life.

45. All this makes clear that all in the heavens are affiliated by good, and are distinguished according to the quality of the good. Nevertheless it is not the angels who thus affiliate themselves, but the Lord, from whom the good is. The Lord leads them, conjoins and separates them, and preserves them in freedom proportionate to their good. Thus He holds everyone in the life of his love and faith, of his intelligence and wisdom, and the resulting happiness.

46. Again, all who are in like good, even though they have never seen each other before, know each other, just as men in the world do their kinsmen, near relations, and friends; and for the reason that in the other life there are none but spiritual kinships, relationships, and friendships, thus such as spring from love and faith. This it has sometimes been granted me to see, when I have been in the spirit, and thus withdrawn from the body, and in the society of angels. Some of those I then saw seemed as if I had known them from childhood, but others as if not known at all. Those whom I seemed to have known from childhood were such as were in a state similar to that of my spirit; but those who seemed unknown were in a dissimilar state.

47. All who form the same angelic society resemble each other in countenance in a general way, but not in particulars. How these general resemblances are related to differences in particulars can in some measure be seen from like things in the world. It is well known that with every race there is a certain general resemblance of face and eyes, by which it is known and distinguished from all other races. This is still more true of different families. In the heavens this is much more fully the case, because there all the interior affections appear in and shine forth from the face, for there the face is the external and representative form of those affections. No one there can have any other face than that of his own affection. It was also shown how this general likeness is varied in particulars with individuals in the same society. A face like an angel's appeared to me, and this was varied in accordance with such affections for good and truth as are in those who belong to a single society. These changes went on for a long time, and I noticed that the same face in general continued as a ground work, all besides being what was derived and produced from that. Thus by means of this face the affections of the whole society were exhibited, whereby the faces of those in it are varied. For, as has been said above, the faces of angels are the forms of their interiors, thus of the affections that belong to their love and faith.

48. From this it also comes to pass that an angel who excels in wisdom instantly sees the quality of another from his face. In heaven no one can conceal his interiors by his expression, or feign, or really deceive and mislead by craft or hypocrisy. There are hypocrites who are experts in disguising their interiors and fashioning their exteriors into the form of that good in which those are who belong to a society, and who thus make themselves appear angels of light; and these sometimes insinuate themselves into a society; but they cannot stay there long, for they begin to suffer inward pain and torture, to grow livid in the face, and to become as it were lifeless. These changes arise from the contrariety of the life that flows in and affects them. Therefore they quickly cast themselves down into hell where their like are, and no longer want to ascend. These are such as are meant by the man found among the invited guests at the feast not clothed with a wedding garment, who was cast out into outer darkness (Matt. 22:11, seq.).

49. All the societies of heaven have communication with one another, though not by open interaction; for few go out of their own society into another, since going out of their own society is like going away from themselves or from their own life, and passing into another life which is less congenial. But all the societies communicate by an extension of the sphere that goes forth from the life of each. This sphere of the life is the sphere of the affections of love and faith. This sphere extends itself far and wide into the surrounding societies, and farther and wider in proportion as the affections are the more interior and perfect. In the measure of that extension do the angels have intelligence and wisdom. Those that are in the inmost heaven and in the middle of it have extension into the entire heavens; thus there is a sharing of all in heaven with each one, and of each one with all. But this extension will be considered more fully hereafter, where the form of heaven in accord with which the angelic societies are arranged, and also the wisdom and intelligence of angels, will be treated of, for in accordance with that form all extension of affections and thoughts proceeds.

50. It has been said above that in the heavens there are larger and smaller societies. The larger consist of myriads of angels, the smaller of some thousands, and the least of some hundreds. There are also some that dwell apart, house by house as it were, and family by family. Although these live in this scattered way, they are arranged in order like those who live in societies, the wiser in the middle and the more simple in the borders. Such are more closely under the Divine auspices of the Lord, and are the best of the angels.

Each Society is a Heaven in a Smaller Form, and Each Angel in the Smallest Form

51. Each society is a heaven in a smaller form, and each angel in the smallest form, because it is the good of love and of faith that makes heaven, and this good is in each society of heaven and in each angel of a society. It does not matter that this good everywhere differs and varies, it is still the good of heaven; and there is no difference except that heaven has one quality here and another there.

So when any one is raised up into any society of heaven he is said to come into heaven; and those who are there are said to be in heaven, and each one in his own. This is known to all in the other life; consequently those standing outside of or beneath heaven, when they see at a distance companies of angels, say that heaven is in this or that place. It is comparatively like civil and military officers and attendants in a royal palace or castle, who, although dwelling apart in their own quarters or chambers above and below, are yet in the same palace or castle, each in his own position in the royal service. This makes evident the meaning of the Lord's words, that: also what is meant by the dwelling-places of heaven, and the heavens of heavens, in the prophets.

52. That each society is a heaven in a smaller form can be seen from this also, that each society there has a heavenly form like that of heaven as a whole. In the whole heavens those who are superior to the rest are in the middle, with the less excellent round about in a decreasing order even to the borders (as stated in a preceding chapter, n. 43). It can be seen also from this, that the Lord directs all in the whole heaven as if they were a single angel; and the same is true of all in each society; and as a consequence an entire angelic society sometimes appears in angelic form like a single angel, as I have been permitted by the Lord to see. Moreover, when the Lord appears in the midst of the angels He does not appear as one surrounded by many, but the appearance is as a one, in an angelic form. This is why the Lord is called "an angel" in the Word, and why an entire society is so called. "Michael," "Gabriel," and "Raphael" are no other than angelic societies so named from their function.

53. As an entire society is a heaven in a smaller form, so an angel is a heaven in the smallest form. For heaven is not outside of the angel, but is within him, since the interior things which belong to his mind are arranged into the form of heaven, thus for the reception of all things of heaven that are outside of him. These also he receives according to the quality of the good that is in him from the Lord. It is from this that an angel is a heaven.

54. It can in no sense be said that heaven is outside of any one; it is within him. For it is in accordance with the heaven that is within him that each angel receives the heaven that is outside of him. This makes clear how greatly misled is he who believes that to come into heaven is simply to be taken up among angels, without regard to what one's interior life may be, thus that heaven is granted to each one by mercy apart from means; {1} when, in fact, unless heaven is within one, nothing of the heaven that is outside can flow in and be received. There are many spirits who have this idea. Because of this belief they have been taken up into heaven; but when they came there, because their interior life was contrary to the angelic life, their intellectual faculties began to be blinded until they became like fools; and they began to be tortured in their voluntary faculties until they became like madmen. In a word, if those that have lived wickedly come into heaven they gasp for breath and writhe about, like fishes out of water in the air, or like animals in ether in an airpump when the air has been exhausted. From this it can be seen that heaven is not outside of a man, but within him.

55. As everyone receives the heaven that is outside of him in accordance with the quality of the heaven that is within him, so in like manner does everyone receive the Lord, since it is the Divine of the Lord that makes heaven. And for this reason when the Lord becomes manifestly present in any society His appearance there is in accord with the quality of the good in which the society is, thus not the same in one society as in another. This diversity is not in the Lord; it is in the angels who behold Him from their own good, and thus in accordance with their good. And they are affected by His appearance in accordance with the quality of their love, those who love Him inmost being inmost affected, and those who love Him less being less affected; while the evil who are outside of heaven are tortured by His presence. When the Lord is seen in any society He is seen as an angel, but is distinguished from others by the Divine that shines through.

56. Again, heaven is where the Lord is acknowledged, believed in, and loved. Variety in worship of the Lord from the variety of good in different societies is not harmful, but beneficial, for the perfection of heaven is therefrom. This can scarcely be made clear to the comprehension without employing terms that are in common use in the learned world, and showing by means of these how unity, that it may be perfect, must be formed from variety. Every whole exists from various parts, since a whole without constituents is not anything; it has no form, and therefore no quality. But when a whole exists from various parts, and the various parts are in a perfect form, in which each attaches itself like a congenial friend to another in series, then the quality is perfect. So heaven is a whole from various parts arranged in a most perfect form, for the heavenly form is the most perfect of all forms. That this is the ground of all perfection is evident from the nature of all beauty, agreeableness and delight, by which the senses and the mind are affected; for these qualities spring and flow from no other source than the concert and harmony of many concordant and congenial parts, either coexisting in order or following in order, and never from a whole without many parts.

From this is the saying that variety gives delight; and the nature of variety, as is known, is what determines the delight. From all this it can be seen as in a mirror how perfection comes from variety even in heaven. For from the things that exist in the natural world the things of the spiritual world can be seen as in a mirror.

57. What has been said of heaven may be said also of the church, for the church is the Lord's heaven on earth. There are also many churches, each one of which is called a church, and so far as the good of love and faith reigns therein is a church. Here, too, the Lord out of various parts forms a unity, that is, one church out of many churches. And the like may be said of the man of the church in particular that is said of the church in general, namely, that the church is within man and not outside of him; and that every man is a church in whom the Lord is present in the good of love and of faith. Again, the same may be said of a man that has the church in him as of an angel that has heaven in him, namely, that he is a church in the smallest form, as an angel is a heaven in the smallest form; and furthermore that a man that has the church in him, equally with an angel, is a heaven. For man was created that he might come into heaven and become an angel; consequently he that has good from the Lord is a man angel. What man has in common with an angel and what he has in contrast with angels may be mentioned. It is granted to man, equally with the angel, to have his interiors conformed to the image of heaven, and to become, so far as he is in the good of love and faith, an image of heaven. But it is granted to man and not to angels to have his exteriors conform to the image of the world; and so far as he is in good to have the world in him subordinated to heaven and made to serve heaven. And then the Lord is present in him both in the world and in heaven just as if he were in his heaven. For the Lord is in His Divine order in both worlds, since God is order.

58. Finally it should be said that he who has heaven in himself has it not only in the largest or most general things pertaining to him but also in every least or particular thing, and that these least things repeat in an image the greatest. This comes from the fact that everyone is his own love, and is such as his ruling love is. That which reigns flows into the particulars and arranges them, and every where induces a likeness of itself. In the heavens love to the Lord is the ruling love, for there the Lord is loved above all things. Hence the Lord there is the All-in-all, flowing into all and each, arranging them, clothing them with a likeness of Himself, and making it to be heaven wherever He is. This is what makes an angel to be a heaven in the smallest form, a society to be a heaven in a larger form, and all the societies taken together a heaven in the largest form. That the Divine of the Lord is what makes heaven, and that He is the All-in-all, may be seen above.

The Sun in Heaven

116. In heaven neither the sun of the world, nor anything from that sun, is seen, because it is wholly natural. For nature has its beginning from that sun, and whatever is produced by means of it is called natural. But the spiritual, to which heaven belongs, is above nature and wholly distinct from what is natural; and there is no communication between the two except by correspondences. What the distinction between them is may be understood from what has been already said about degrees, and what the communication is from what has been said in the two preceding chapters about correspondences.

117. Although the sun of the world is not seen in heaven, nor anything from that sun, there is nevertheless a sun there, and light and heat, and all things that are in the world, with innumerable others, but not from a like origin; since the things in heaven are spiritual, and those in the world are natural. The sun of heaven is the Lord; the light there is the Divine truth and the heat the Divine good that go forth from the Lord as a sun. From this origin are all things that spring forth and are seen in the heavens. This light and heat and things existing therefrom in heaven will be treated of in the following chapters; in this chapter we will speak only of the sun there. In heaven the Lord is seen as a sun, for the reason that He is Divine love, from which all spiritual things, and by means of the sun of the world all natural things, have their existence. That love is what shines as a sun.

118. The Lord is seen in heaven as a sun, and is the sun of heaven The Lord is seen as a sun by those who are in His celestial kingdom, where love to Him reigns, and as a moon by those who are in His spiritual kingdom, where charity to the neighbor and faith reign. The Lord is seen as a sun at a middle height before the right eye, and as a moon before the left eye. The Lord is seen as a sun and as a moon.

119. This is why in the Word the Lord in respect to love is likened to the sun, and in respect to faith to the moon; also that the "sun" signifies love from the Lord to the Lord, and the "moon" signifies faith from the Lord in the Lord, as in the following passages:

The light of the moon shall be as the light of the sun, and the light of the sun shall be sevenfold, as the light of seven days (Isa. 30:26).

And when I shall extinguish thee I will cover the heavens and make the stars thereof dark; I will cover the sun with a cloud, and the moon shall not make her light to shine. All luminaries of light in the heavens will I make dark over thee, and I will set darkness upon thy land (Ezek 32:7, 8).

I will darken the sun in his going forth, and the moon shall not make her light to shine (Isa. 13:10)

The sun and the moon shall be darkened, and the stars shall withdraw their shining. The sun shall be turned into darkness and the moon into blood (Joel 2:2, 10, 31; 3:16).

The sun became black as sackcloth and hair, and the moon became as blood, and the stars fell unto the earth (Apoc. 6:12, 13).

Immediately after the affliction of those days the sun shall be darkened, and the moon shall not give her light, and the stars shall fall from heaven (Matt. 24:29).

And elsewhere. In these passages the "sun" signifies love, and the "moon" faith, and the "stars" knowledges of good and truth. These are said to be darkened, to lose their light, and to fall from heaven, when they are no more. That the Lord is seen as a sun in heaven is evident also from His appearance when transfigured before Peter, James, and John,

That His face did shine as the sun (Matt. 17:2).

These disciples thus saw the Lord when they were withdrawn from the body, and were in the light of heaven. It was because of this correspondence that the ancient people, with whom was a representative church, turned the face to the sun in the east when they were in Divine worship; and for the same reason they gave to their temples an eastern aspect.

120. How great the Divine love is and what it is can be seen by comparison with the sun of the world, that it is most ardent, if you will believe it, much more ardent than that sun. For this reason the Lord as a sun does not flow without mediums into the heavens, but the ardor of His love is gradually tempered on the way. These temperings appear as radiant belts about the sun; furthermore, the angels are veiled with a thin adapting cloud to prevent their being harmed by the influx. For this reason the heavens are more or less near in accordance with reception. As the higher heavens are in good of love they are nearest to the Lord as the sun; and as the lower heavens are in good of faith they are farther away from Him. But those that are in no good, like those in hell, are farthest away, at different distances in accordance with their opposition to good.

123. As it is from the Divine love that is in and from Him that the Lord appears in heaven like a sun, so all in the heavens are turned constantly to Him those in the celestial kingdom to Him as a sun and those in the spiritual kingdom to Him as a moon. But those that are in hell turn themselves to an opposite darkness and dense darkness, that is, they turn backwards, away from the Lord; and for the reason that all in the hells are in love of self and the world, thus antagonistic to the Lord. Those who turn themselves to the dense darkness that is in the place where this world's sun is are in the hells behind, and are called genii; while those that turn themselves to the darkness that is in the place of the moon are in the hells more in front, and are called spirits. This is why those in the hells are said to be in darkness, and those in the heavens in light, "darkness" signifying falsity from evil, and "light" truth from good.

They so turn themselves because all in the other life look towards what rules in their interiors, thus to their loves; and with angels and spirits the interiors determine the face; and in the spiritual world quarters are not fixed, as in the natural world, but are determined by the face. In respect to his spirit man turns himself in like manner as a spirit does, backwards from the Lord if he is in love of self and the world, and towards the Lord if he is in love to the Lord and the neighbor. But of this man is ignorant, because he is in the natural world where quarters are determined by the rising and setting of the sun. But as this cannot be easily comprehended by men it will be elucidated hereafter when Quarters, Space, and Time in Heaven are treated of.

124. Because the Lord is the sun of heaven and everything that is from Him looks to Him, He is also the common center, the source of all direction and determination. So, too, all things beneath are in His presence and under His auspices, both in the heavens and on the earths.

125. From all this what has been said and shown in previous chapters about the Lord may now be seen in clearer light, namely:

That He is the God of heaven

That it is His Divine that makes heaven

That the Lord's Divine in heaven is love to Him and charity towards the neighbor

That there is a correspondence of all things of the world with heaven, and through heaven with the Lord

Also that the sun and moon of the world are correspondences

But I proceed to the second particular.

II. The perfection of the spirits above, not only admits of a rich variety of entertainments, according to the various relish and inclination of the blessed, but it is such a perfection as^ allows of different degrees even in the same blessedness, according to the different capacities of spirits, and their different degrees of preparation. The word perfection does not always require equality,

If all the souls in heaven were of one mould, and make, and inclination, yet there may be different sizes of capacity even in the same genius, and a different degree of preparation for the same delights and enjoyments; therefore though all the spirits of the just were uniform in their natures and pleasures, and all perfect; yet one spirit may possess more happiness and glory than another, because it is more capacious of intellectual blessings, and better prepared for them. So when vessels of various size are thrown into the same ocean, there will be a great difference in the quantity of the liquid which they receive, though all might be full to the brim, and all made of the richest metal.

Now there is much evidence of this truth in the holy scripture. Our Saviour intimates such differences of rewards in several of his expressions. Mat. xix. 28. he promises the apostles, that they "shall sit on twelve thrones, judging the twelve tribes of Israel." And it is probable this may denote something of superior honour or dignity above the meanest of the saints. And even among the apostles themselves he seems to allow of a difference • for though he would not promise James and John to sit next to him, on his right hand and his left in his kingdom, Matt. xx. 20, &c. yet he does not deny that there are such distinct dignities, but says, "It shall be given to them for whom it is prepared of his Father," ver. 23.

Again, our Lord says, Matt. x. 41, 42. He that receives a prophet, and entertains him as a prophet, shall have a prophet's reward; and he that entertains a righteous man, agreeable to his character, and from a real esteem of his righteousness, shall have a righteous man's reward; and even the meanest sort' of entertainment, a cup of cold water given to a disciple, for the sake of his character, shall not go •without some reward. Here are three sorts or degrees of reward mentioned, extending to the life to come, as well as to this life; now though neither of them can be merited by works, but all are entirely conferred by grace, yet, as one observes here, "The Lord hath fixed a. proportion between the work and the reward; so that as one has different degrees of goodness, the other shall have different degrees of excellency"

Our Saviour assures us, that the torments of hell shall admit of various degrees and distinctions; some will be more exquisite and terrible than others; it shall be more tolerable for Sodom and Gomorrah in the day of judgment, who never sinned against half so much light, than it shall be for Chorazin, Bethsaida, and Capernaum, where Christ himself had preached his gospel, and confirmed it with most evident miracles, Matt. xi. 21—24. And the servants who did not the will of their Lord, shall be beaten with more or fewer stripes, according to their different degrees of knowledge and advantages of instruction; Luke xii. 47, 48. Now may we not by a parallel reasoning, suppose there will be various orders and degrees of reward in heaven, as well as punishment in hell; since there is scarce a greater variety among the degrees of wickedness among sinners on earth, than there is of holiness among the saints?

When the apostle is describing the glories of the body at the great resurrection, he seems to represent the differences of glory that shall be conferred on different saints, by the difference of the great luminaries of heaven; 1 Cor. xv. 41, 42. "There is one glory of the sun, another glory of the moon, and another glory of the stars; for one star differs from another in glory; so also is the resurrection of the dead."

The prophet Daniel led the way to this description, and the same spirit taught the apostle the same language; Dan. xii. 2, X. ".And many of them that sleep in the dust of the earth shall awake, some to everlasting: life, and some to shame and everlasting contempt; and they that be wise shall shine, (with common glory) as the brightness of the firmament; and they that turn many to righteousness, (shall have a peculiar lustre) as the stars for ever and ever." And if there be a difference in the visible glories of the saints at the resurrection, if those who turn many to righteousness shall sparkle, in that day, with brighter beams than those who are only wise for their own salvation; the same reason leads us to believe a difference of spiritual glory in the state of separate spirits, when the recompence of their labours is begun.

So, 1 Cor. iii. 8. "He that planteth, and he that watereth, are one; and every man shall receive his own reward according to his own labour." If all be rewarded alike, the apostle would not have said, Each man shall receive according to his own labour. Surely since there is a distinction of labours, there will be a distinction of rewards too.

And it is with this view the same apostle exhorts the Corinthians, 1 Cor. xv. 58. "Therefore, my beloved brethren, be ye stedfast, unmovable, always abounding in the work of the Lord, forasmuch as ye know that your labour is not in vain in the Lord." Now that great labour and diligence, that steadfastness in profession, and that zeal in practice, to which the apostle exhorts them, might seem to be in vain, if those who were far less laborious, less zealous, and less steadfast, should obtain an equal recompence.

It is upon the same principle that he encourages them to holy patience under afflictive trials, 2 Cor. iv. 17. when he says, "Our light affliction, which is but for a moment, worketh out for us a far more exceeding and eternal weight of glory; while we look not to the things which are seen, and temporal, but to the things invisible and eternal" Now if the saint, who was called to heaven almost as soon as he was made a Christian, and went through no sufferings, should possess the same weight of glory with the martyrs and confessors, under the long and tedious train of cruelties which they sustained from men, or painful trials from the hand of God; I cannot see how their afflictions could be said to work for them a far more exceeding weight of glory.

He urges them also to great degrees of liberality from the same motive; 2 Cor. ix. 6. "This I say, he that soweth sparingly, shall reap also sparingly, and he which soweth bountifully, shall also reap bountifully." Which words may reasonably be construed to signify the blessings of the life to come, as well as the blessings of the present life; for this apostle speaking of the same duty of liberality, expresses the same encouragement under the same metaphors; Gal. vi. 6, 7, 8, 9. "Let him that is taught in the word, communicate to him that teacheth in all good things. Be not deceived, God is not mocked; for whatsoever a man soweth, that shall he also reap: for he that soweth to his flesh, shall of the flesh reap corruption; but he that soweth to (he Spirit, shall of the Spirit reap life everlasting. And let us not be weary in well-doing, for in due season we shall reap, if we taint not." When God distributes the riches of his glory amongst the saints in heaven, he pours them out in a large and bountiful manner upon those who have distributed the good things of this life bountifully to the poor; but he rewards the narrow-souled Christian with a more sparing hand.

With the same design does the apostle encourage Christians to watchfulness against sin and heresy, as well as ministers to a solicitous care of their doctrine and preaching; 1 Cor iii 12, 13, 14, 15. If any man build gold, silver/or precious stones upon the true foundation Jesus Christ, and raise a glorious superstructure of faith and holiness, he shall receive a reward answerable to his skill and care in building; for his work shall stand, when it is tried by the fire of the judgment-day; but if he build wood, hay, and stubble upon it, evil inferences, and corrupt practices, or trifles, fruitless controversies, idle speculations, and vain ceremonies, his works shall be burnt, and he shall suffer loss, shall obtain a far less recompence, of his labour; yet, since he has laid Christ for the foundation, and has taught and practised the fundamental doctrines and duties of Christianity, though mingled with much folly and weakness, he himself shall be saved; yet in so hazardous a manner as a man that is saved by fire, who loses all his goods, and just escapes with his life.

When you hear St. Paul, or St. John, speaking of the last judgment, they give hints of the same distinction of rewards, 2 Cor. v. 10. "For we must all appear before the judgment-seat of Christ; that every one may receive the things done in his body, according to that he hath done, whether it be good or bad." Eph. vi. 8. "Whatsoever good thing any man doeth, the same shall he receive of the Lord, whether he be bond or free." Rev. xxii. 12. "And behold, I come quickly; and my reward is with me, to give every man according as his work shall be." Though the highest and holiest saint in heaven can claim nothing there by the way of merit (for it is our Lord Jesus Christ alone, who has purchased all those unknown blessings) yet he will distribute them according to the different characters and degrees of holiness which his saints possessed on earth; and those larger degrees of holiness were also the free gift of God our Saviour.

I have often represented it to my own thoughts under this comparison. Here is a race appointed; here are a thousand different prizes, purchased by some prince to be bestowed on the racers; and the prince himself gives them food and wine, according to what proportion he pleases, to strengthen and animate them for the race. Each has a particular stage appointed for him; some of shorter, and some of longer distance. When every racer comes to his own goal, he receives a prize in most exact proportion to his speed, diligence, and length of race; and the grace and the justice of the prince shine gloriously in such a distribution. Not the foremost of the racers can pretend to have merited the prize; for the prizes were all paid for by the prince himself; and it was he that appointed the race, and gave them spirit and strength to run; and yet there is a most equitable proportion observed in the reward, according to the labours of the race. Now this similitude represents the matter so agreeably to the apostle's way of speaking, when he compares the Christian life to a race, I Cor.- xi. 24, &c. Gal. v. 7. Phil. iii. 14. 2 Tim. iv. 7. Heb. xii. 1. that I think it may be called almost a scriptural description of the present subject.

The reason of man, and the light of nature, entirely concur with scripture in this point. The glory of heaven is prepared for those who are prepared for it in a state of grace, Rom. ix. 23. It is God who makes each of us meet for our own inheritance among the saints in light, Col. i. 12. and then he bestows on us that inheritance. As grace fits the soul for glory, so a larger degree of grace advances and widens the capacity of the soul, and prepares it to receive a larger degree of glory. The work of grace is but the means, the reward of glory is the end; now the wisdom of God always fits and adjusts the means in a due proportion to answer the end he designs: and the same wisdom ever makes the end answerable to the means he useth; and therefore he infuses more and higher glories into vessels more enlarged and better prepared.

Some of the spirits in heaven may be trained up by their stations and sacred services on earth, for more elevated employments and joys on high. Can we imagine that the soul of David, the sweet Psalmist, the prophet, and the king of Israel, is not fitted by all his labours and trials, all his raptures of faith, and love, and zeal, for some sublimer devotion and nobler business than his own infant child, the fruit of his adultery? And yet our divines have generally placed this child in heaven, because David ceased to mourn for him at his death, and said, that he himself should go to him; 2 Sam. xii. 20, 23. Deborah, the prophetess, judged Israel, she animated their armies, and sung their victories; is not Deborah engaged in some more illustrious employment among the heavenly tribes than good Dorcas may seem to be capable of, whose highest character upon record is, that she was full of alms-deeds, and made coats and garments for the poor? Acts ix. 36, 39. And yet perhaps Dorcas is prepared too for some greater enjoyments, some sweeter relish of mercy, or some special taste of the divine goodness, above Rahab the harlot; Rahab, whose younger character was lewd and infamous, and the best thing that we read of her is, that her faith under the present terror of the armies of Israel taught her once to cover and conceal their spies; and unless she made great advances afterward in grace, surely her place is not very high in glory.

The worship of heaven, and the joy that attends it, may be exceedingly different in degrees according to the different capacity of spirits, and yet all may be perfect and free from sinful defects. Does not the sparrow praise the Lord its Maker upon the ridge of a cottage, chirping in its native perfection? And yet the lark advances in her flight and her song as far above the sparrow, as the clouds are above the house-top.

Surely superior joys and glories must belong to superior powers and services.

Can we think that Abraham and Moses, who were trained up in converse with God face to face, as a man converses with his friend, and who followed him through the wilderness and unknown countries in a glorious exercise of faith, were not prepared for a greater intimacy with God, and nearer views of his glory in heaven, than Samson and Jephthah, those rude heroes, who being appointed of God for that service, spent their days in bloody work, in hewing down the Philistines and the Amorites? For we read little of their acquaintance with God, or converse with him, beside a petition now and then, or a vow for victory and for slaughter; and we should hardly have charity enough to believe they were saved, if St. Paul had not placed them among the examples of faith in his eleventh chapter to the Hebrews. Can we ever believe that the thief upon the cross, who spent his life in plundering and mischief, and made a single though sincere profession of the name of Jesus just in his dying hour, was prepared for the same high station and enjoyment it; paradise, so near the right hand of Christ, as the great apostle Paul, whose prayers and sermons, whose miracles of labour and suffering filled up and finished a long life, and honoured his Lord and Saviour more than all the twelve apostle-s besides? Can we imagine that the child that is just born into this world under the friendly shadow of the covenant of grace, and weeps and dies, and is taken to heaven, is fit to be possessor of the same glories, or raised to the same degree there, as the studious, the laborious, and the zealous Christian, that has lived above fourscore years on earth, and spent the greatest part of his life in the studies of religion, the exercises of piety, and the zealous and painful services of God and his country? Surely, if all these which I have named must have equal knowledge and joy in the future world, it is hard to find how such an exact equity shall be displayed in the distribution of final rewards, as the word of God so frequently describes.

Objection.

But in the parable of the labourers hired to work in the vineyard, Matt. xx. 9—12. does not every man receive his penny, they who were called at the first and third hour, and they who were called at the last? Were not their rewards all equal, those who had wrought but one hour, and those who had borne the burden and heat of the day?

Answer.

It is not the design of this parable to represent the final rewards of the saints at the day of judgment, but to shew that the nation of the Jews, who had been called to be the people of God above a thousand years before, and had borne the burden and heat of the day, i. e. the toil and bondage of many ceremonies, should have no preference in the esteem of God above the Gentiles, who were called at the last hour, or at the end of the Jewish dispensation; for it is said, ver. 16. "The last shall be first, and the first last," i. e. the Gentiles, who waited long ere the gospel was preached to them, shall be the first in receiving it; and the Jews, to whom it was first offered, from an inward scorn and pride shall reject it, or receive it but slowly; and Christ adds this confirmation of it, "for many be called, but few chosen," i. e. though multitudes of Jews were called to believe in Christ, that few accepted the call.

There is another reason why this parable cannot refer to the final rewards of heaven; because, ver. 11. it is said, "Some of them murmured against the good man of the house." Now there shall be no envy against their fellow-saints, nor murmuring against God in the heavenly state. But the Jews, And even the Jewish converts to Christianity, were ready often to murmur that the gospel should be preached to the Gentile world, and that the heathens should be brought into privileges equal with them selves,

Thus it sufficiently appears, from the frequent declarations of scripture as well as from the reason and equity of things, that the rewards of the future world shall be greatly distinguished according to the different degrees of holiness and service for God, even though every spirit there shall be perfect; nor is there any just and reasonable objection against it.

Is it certain then, that heaven has various degrees of happiness in it, and shall my spirit rest contented with the meanest place there, and the least and lowest measure? Hast thou no sacred ambition in thee, O my soul, to sit down with Abraham, Isaac, and Jacob? Or dost thou not aspire at least to the middle ranks of glorified saints, though perhaps thou mayest despair of those most exalted stations which are prepared for the spirits of chief renown, for Abraham and Moses of ancient time, and for the martyrs and the apostles of the Lamb? Wilt thou not stir up all the vigour of nature and grace within thee, to do great service for thy God and thy Saviour on earth, that thy reward in heaven may not be small? Wilt thou not run with zeal and patience the race that is set before thee, looking to the brightest cloud of witnesses, and reaching at some of the richer prizes? Remember that Jesus thy Judge is coming apace; he has rewards with him of every size, and the lustre and weight of thy crown shall most exactly correspond to thy sweat and labour.

But I must not dwell always on this head; I proceed therefore to the next.

11. The spirits of the just in heaven enjoy such a perfection as is consistent with perpetual changes of business and delights even in the same person or spirit. They may be always perfect, but in a rich and endless variety.

It is only God who possesses all possible excellencies, and powers, and happinesses at once, and therefore he alone is incapable of change; but creatures must possess and enjoy their delights in a succession, because they cannot possess and enjoy all that they are capable of at once. And according to this consideration the heavenly state is represented in scripture in various forms both of business and blessedness.

Sometimes it is described by seeing God, Matt. v. 8. by beholding him face to face, 1 Cor. xiii. 12. by being present with the Lord, 2 Cor. v. 8 by being where Christ is, to behold his glory, John xvii. 24. Sometimes the saints above are said to serve him as his servants, Rev. xxii. 3. Sometimes they are represented as worshipping before the throne, as being fed with the fruits of the tree of life, and drinking the living fountains of water, Her. vii. 15, 17. and xxii. 1, 2. and let it be noted that twelve manner of fruits grew on this tree, and they were new every month also. Sometimes they are held forth to us as singing a new song to God, and to the Lamb, Rev. xiv. 3. And at another time, they are described as wearing a crown of righteousness and glory, of sitting on the throne of Christ, of reigning for ever and ever, and ruling the nations with a rod of iron, 2 Tim. iv. 8. 1 Pet. v. 4. Rev. xxii. 5. and ii. 26, 27. And in another place our happiness is represented as sitting down with Abraham, Isaac, and Jacob, in the kingdom of heaven, Matt. viii. 11. Now surely this rich variety of language, whereby the heavenly state is proposed to us in scripture, must intend a variety of entertainments and employments, that may in some measure answer the glory of such expressions.

It is not only the powers of our understanding that shall be regaled and feasted in those happy regions with the blissful vision of God and Christ, but our active powers shall doubtless have their proper entertainments too. When angels are so variously and delightfully employed in service for God, in his several known and unknown worlds, we cannot suppose the spirits of just men shall be eternally confined to a sedentary state of inactive contemplation.

. Contemplation indeed is a noble pleasure, and the joy of it rises high when it is fixed on the sublimest objects, and when the faculties are all exalted and refined. But surely such a sight of God and our dear Redeemer as we shall enjoy above, will awaken and animate all the active and sprightly powers of the soul, and set all the springs of love and zeal at work in most illustrious instances of unknown and glorious duty.

I confess heaven is described as a place of rest, i. e. rest from sin and sorrow, rest from pain and weariness, rest from all the toilsome labours and conflicts that we endure in a state of trial; but it can never be such a rest as lays all our active powers asleep, or renders them useless in such a vital and active world. It would diminish the happiness of the saints in glory to be unemployed there. Those spirits who have tasted unknown delight and satisfaction in many long seasons of devotion, and in a thousand painful services for their blessed Lord on earth, can hardly bear the thoughts of paying no active duties, doing no work at all for him in heaven, where business is all over delight, and labour is all enjoyment. Surely his servants shall serve him there, as well as worship him. They shall serve him perhaps as priests in his temple, and as kings, or viceroy in his wide dominions; for they are made kings and priests unto God for ever, Rev. v. 10.

But let us dwell a little upon their active employments, and perhaps a close and attentive meditation may lead us into an unexpected view and notice of; their sacred commissions and embassies, their governments, and their holy conferences, as well as their acts of worship and adoration.

That heaven is a place or state of worship, is certain, and beyond all controversy; for this is a very frequent description of it in the word of God. And as the great God has been pleased to appoint different forms of worship to be practised by his saints and his churches under the different economies of his grace; so it is possible he may appoint peculiar forms of sacred magnificence to attend his own worship in the state of glory. Bowing the knee, and prostration of the body, are forms and postures of humility practised by earthly worshippers. Angels cover their faces and their feet with their wings, and cry, "Holy, holy, holy, Lord God of hosts!" Isa. vi. 2, 3. But what unknown and illustrious forms shall be consecrated by the appointment and authority of Christ, for the unbodied or the bodied saints in heaven to adorn their sacred offices, is above our reach to describe or to imagine.

Let us consider now what parts of worship the blessed are employed in.

The various parts of divine worship that are practised on earth, at least such as are included in natural religion, shall doubtless be performed in heaven too; and what other unknown worship of positive and celestial appointment shall belong to the heavenly state, is as much above our present conjecture, as the forms of it are.

Heaven is represented as full of praises. There is the most glorious and perfect celebration of God the Father and the Saviour in the upper world; and the highest praise is offered to them with the deepest humility.

The crowns of glory are cast down at their feet, and all the powers and perfections of God, with a1! his labours of creation, his cares of providence, and the sweeter mysteries of his grace, shall furnish noble matter for divine praise.

This work of praise is also exhibited in scripture, as attended with a song and heavenly melody. What there is in the world of separate spirits to answer the representations of harps and voices,, we know not. It is possible that spirits may be capable of some sort of harmony in their language, without a tongue, and without an ear, and there may be some inimitable and transporting modulation? of divine praise without the material instruments of string or wind. The soul itself by some philosophers is said to be mere harmony; and surely then it will not wait for it till the body be raised from the dust, nor live so long destitute of all melodious joys, or of that spiritual pleasure which shall supply the place of melody, till our organs of sense shall be restored to us again.

But is all heaven made up of praises? Is there no prayer there? Let us consider a little; what is prayer, but the desire of a created spirit in an humble manner made known to its Creator? Does not every saint above desire to know God, to love and serve him, to be employed for his honour, and to enjoy the eternal continuance of his love and its own felicity? May not each happy spirit in heaven exert these desires in a way of solemn address to the Divine Majesty? May not the happy soul acknowledge its dependence in this manner upon its Father and its God? Is there no place in the heart of a glorified saint for such humble addresses as these? Dews not every separate spirit there look and long for the resurrection, when it is certain that embodied spirits on earth who have received the first fruits of grace and glory, groan within themselves, waiting for the redemption of the body? Rom. viii. 23. And may we not suppose each holy soul sending a sacred and fervent wish after this glorious day, and lifting up a desire to its God about it, though without the uneasiness of a sigh or a groan? May it not under the influence of divine love breathe out the requests of its heart, and the expressions of its zeal for the glory and kingdom of Christ? May not the church above join with the churches below in this language, "Father, thy kingdom come, thy will be done on earth as it is in Heaven?" Are not the souls of the martyrs that were slain, represented to us as under the altar, crying with a loud voice, "How long, O Lord, holy and true Rev. vi, 9, 10. This looks like the voice of prayer in heaven.

Perhaps you will suppose there is no such service as hearing sermons, that there is no attendance upon the word of God there. But are we sure there are no such entertainments? Are there no lectures of divine wisdom and grace given to the younger spirits there, by spirits of a more exalted station? Or may not our Lord Jesus Christ himself be the everlasting teacher of his church? May he not at solemn seasons summon all heaven to hear him publish some new and surprising discoveries, which have never yet been made known to the ages of nature, or of grace, and are reserved to entertain the attention, and exalt the pleasure of spirits advanced to glory? Must we learn all by the mere contemplation of Christ's person? Does he never make use of speech to the instruction and joy of saints above?

Moses and Elijah came down once from heaven; to make a visit to Christ on mount Tabor, and the subject of their converse with him was his death and departure from this world, Luke ix. 31. Now since our Lord is ascended to heaven, are these holy souls;cut off from this divine pleasure? Is Jesus for ever silent? Does he converse with his glorified saints no more? And surely if he speak, the saints will hear and attend.

Or it may be that our blessed Lord (even though he is man) has some noble and unknown way of communicating- a long discourse, or a long train of ideas and discoveries to millions of blessed spirits at once, without the formalities of voice and language; and at some peculiar seasons he may thus instruct and delight his saints in heaven.

Thus it appears there may be something among the spirits of the just above, that is analogous to prayer and preaching, as well as praise.

O how beautiful are the pleasures of celestial worship! What unknown varieties of performance, what sublime ministrations there are, and glorious services, none can tell. And in all this variety, which may be performed in sweet succession, there is no wandering thought, no-cold affection, no divided heart,, no listless or indifferent worshipper. What we call rapture and extasy here on earth, is perhaps the constant and uninterrupted pleasure of the church on high in all their adorations.

But let the worship of the glorified spirits be never so various, yet I cannot persuade myself that mere direct acts or exercises of what we properly call worship, are their only and everlasting work.

The scripture tells us, there are certain seasons when the angels, those sons of God, come to present themselves before the Lord, Job i. 6. and ii. I. It is evident then, that the intervals of these seasons are spent in other employments; and when they present themselves before God, it does not sufficiently appear that mere adoration and praise is their only business at the throne. In the very place which I have cited, it seems more natural to suppose that these angelic spirits came thither rather to render an account of their several employments, and the success of their messages to other worlds And why may we not suppose such a blessed variety of employment among the spirits of men too?

This supposition has some countenance in the holy scripture. The angel or messenger who appeared to St. John, and shewed him various visions, by the order of Christ, forbids the apostle to worship him, for "I am thy fellow-servant, (said he) and of thy brethren the prophets, and of them which keep the sayings of this book;" Rev. xxii. 8, 9. These words naturally lead one to think, (hat though he appeared as a messenger from Christ, and in the form of an angel, yet he was really a departed saint, a brother, a fellow-prophet, perhaps the soul of David, or Isaiah, or Moses, who would count it an honour even in their state of glory to be thus employed by their exalted Lord; and they also keep or observe and wait for the accomplishment of the sayings of that book of the Revelations, as well as the churches of their brethren, the saints on earth.

I freely allow immediate divine worship to take up a good part of their everlasting day, their Sabbath; and therefore I suppose them to be often engaged, millions at once, in social worship; and sometimes acting apart, and raised in sublime meditation of God, or in a fixed vision of his blissful face, with an act of secret adoration, while their intellectual powers are almost lost in sweet amazement; sometimes they are entertaining themselves and their fellow-spirits with the graces and glories of the man Christ Jesus, the Lamb that was slain in the midst of the throne; but at other times they may 'be making a report to him of their faithful execution of some divine commission they received from him,, to be fulfilled either in heaven or in earth, or in unknown and distant worlds.

There may be other season! also, when they are not immediately addressing the throne, but are most delightfully engaged in recounting to each other the wondrous steps of providence, wisdom, and mercy, that seized them from the very borders of hell and despair, and brought them through a thousand dangers and difficulties to the possession of that fair inheritance. When the great God shall unravel the scheme of his own counsels, shall unfold every part of his mysterious conduct, and set before them the reason of every temptation they grappled with, and of every sorrow they felt here on earth, and with •what divine and-successful influence they all wrought together to train them up for heaven, what matter of surprising delight and charming conversation shall this furnish the saints with in that blessed •world? And now and then in the midst of their sacred dialogues, by a sympathy of soul they shall shout together in sweet harmony, and join their exalted songs to him that sits upon the throne and to the Lamb. "Not unto us, O Lord, not unto us, but to thy power, to thy wisdom, and to thine abounding mercy, be renown and honour to everlasting ages."

Nor is it improper or unpleasant to suppose that among the rest of their celestial conferences, they shall shew each other the fair and easy solution of those difficulties and deep problems in divinity, which had exercised and perplexed them here on earth, and divided them into little angry parties. They shall look back with holy shame on some of their learned and senseless distinctions, and be ready to wonder sometimes what trifles and impertinences had engaged them in dark and furious disputes. Darkness and entanglement shall vanish at once from many of those knotty points of controversy, when they behold them in the light of heaven: and the rest of them shall be matter of delightful instruction for superior spirits to bestow on those of lower rank, or on souls lately arrived at the regions of light.

In short, there is nothing written in the books of nature, the records of providence, or the sacred volumes of grace, but may minister materials at special seasons for the holy conference of the saints on high. No history nor prophecy, no doctrine nor duty, no command, nor promise, nor threatening in the Bible, but may recal the thoughts of the heavenly inhabitants, and engage them in sweet conversation. All things that relate to the affairs of past ages and past worlds, as well as the present regions of light and happiness where they dwell, may give them new themes of dialogue and mutual intercourse.

And though we are very little acquainted, whilst we are on earth, with any of the planetary worlds, besides that which we inhabit, yet who knows how our acquaintance may be extended hereafter amongst the various and distant globes? And what frequent and swift journeys we, may take thither, when we are disincumbered of the load of flesh and blood, or when our bodies are raised again, active and swift as sun-beams! Sometimes we may entertain our holy curiosity there, and find millions of new discoveries of divine power and divine contrivance in those unknown regions; and bring back from thence new lectures of divine wisdom, or tidings of the affairs of those provinces, to entertain our fellow-spirits, and to give new honours to God the Creator and the Sovereign. So a pious traveller in our lower world visits Africa or both the Indies; at his return he sits in a circle of attentive admirers, and recounts to them the wondrous products of those climates, and the customs and manners of those distant countries; he gratifies their curiosity with some foreign varieties, and feasts their eyes and their ears at once: then at the end of every story he breaks out into holy language, and adores the various riches and wisdom of God the Creator.

To proceed yet one step further. Since there are different degrees of glory, we may infer a variety of honours as well as delights prepared for the spirits of the just made perfect.

Some part of the happiness of heaven is described, in scripture by crowns and thrones, by royalty and kingly honours; why may we not then suppose, that such souls, whose sublimer graces have prepared them for such dignity and office, may rule the nations, even in a literal sense? Why may not those spirits that have past their trials in flesh and blood, and come off conquerors, why may they not sometimes be appointed visitors and superintendants over whole provinces of intelligent beings in lower regions, who are yet labouring in a state of probation? or perhaps they may be exalted to a presidency over inferior ranks of happy spirits, may shine bright amongst them as the morning-star, and lead on their holy armies to celestial work or worship. The scripture itself gives us a hint of such employments in the angelic world, and such presidencies over some parts of our world, or of their own. Do we not read of Gabriel and Michael, and their management of the affairs of Persia, and Greece, and Judah, in the book of Daniel? And it is an intimation of the same hierarchy, when some superior angel led on a multitude of the heavenly host to sing an hymn of praise at Bethlehem, when the Son of God was born there; Luke ii. 9, 13. Now if angels are thus dignified, may not human spirits unbodied have the same office? Our Saviour, when he rewards the faithful servant that had gained ten pounds, bids him take authority over ten cities; and he that had gained five, had five cities under his government; Luke six. 17, &c. so that this is not a mere random thought, or a wild invention of fancy, but patronized by the word of God.

Among the pleasures and engagements of the upper world, there shall be always something new and entertaining; for the works and the dominions of God are vast beyond all our comprehension. And what a perpetual change, what a glorious but improving rotation of businesses and joys shall succeed one another through the ages of eternity, we shall never know till we come amongst them. This thought leads me to the last particular, viz.

IV. The perfection which the blessed spirits enjoy, gives room for large additions and continual improvement.

Their knowledge and their joy may be called perfect, because there is no mixture of error or sorrow with it; and because it is sufficient every moment for the satisfaction of present desires, without an uneasiness of mind. But it may be doubted whether any creature ever was, or ever will be so perfect, that it is not capable of addition or growth in any excellency or enjoyment.

The Man Christ Jesus, in his present glorified state, has not such a perfection as this. He waits daily to see his Father's promises fulfilled to him; he waits till all things are put under him, and his enemies are made his actual footstool; but we know that all things are not yet put under him, Heb. ii, 8. i. e. All the nations are not yet subject to his spiritual kingdom, nor become obedient to his gospel. As fast as his kingdom grows on earth, so fast his honours and his joys arise; and he waits still for the complete union of all his members to himself the sacred head; he waits for the morning of the resurrection, when he shall be glorified in the bright and general assembly of his saints, and admired in all them that believe, 2 Thess. i. 10.

O that illustrious and magnificent appearance! That shining hour of jubilee, when the bodies of millions of saints shall awake out of the dust, and be released from their long dark prison! When they shall encompass and adore Jesus their Saviour and their God, and acknowledge their new life and immortal state to be owing to his painful and shameful death; when Noah, Abraham, and David, and all his pious progenitors shall bow and worship Jesus their Son and their Lord; when the holy army of martyrs, springing from the dust with palms of victory in their hands, shall ascribe their conquest and their triumph to the Lamb that was slain; when he shall present his whole church before the presence of his own and his Father's glory, without spot, and faultless, with exceeding joy! Can we imagine that Christ himself, even the Man Jesus, in the midst of all this magnificence and these honours, shall feel no new satisfaction, and have no relish of all this joy, above what he possessed while his church lay bleeding on earth, and this illustrious company were buried underground in the chains of death? And yet you will say Christ in heaven is made perfect in knowledge and in joy, but his perfection admits of improvement.

Now if the Head be not above the capacity of all growth and addition, surely the members cannot pretend to it. But I shall propose several more arguments for this truth in the following section.

I will not assert any thing in this matter, lest the manner of expression should offend weaker minds; but I desire leave to inquire, Whether those who know most of God do not love him best? Whether those who have the brightest and fullest visions of him, are not most transformed into his image, and made most nearly like to him? Now if the separate spirits in heaven are advanced to different degrees of divine knowledge, may they not in this sense have different degrees of holiness too? Is it not possible that one saint should love God more intensely than another, and be more impressed with his likeness, as he beholds more of his beauty? Is it not possible that a soul shall grow in the strength and fervour of its love and zeal for God, and be more exactly assimilated to him, as it gets nearer to God, and grows up into higher measures of acquaintance with him? Has not the angel Gabriel, the apostle Paul, and the glorified human nature of Christ in any respect more of holiness, or love, or likeness to God, than the meanest saint or angel in heaven? Is not their sublimer knowledge and nearness to God attended with proportionable rays of divine sanctity and glory? Is not the divine image in these exalted saints more complete than in the very lowest?

And yet we may boldly assert, that the meanest saint or angel there is so perfect in holiness, as to be free from all sin; there is nothing to be found in any spirit there, contrary to the nature or the will of God. So a soul released from the body may perhaps grow in likeness and love to God perpetually, and yet it may have no sinful defects either in its love or conformity to God from the first moment of its entrance into heaven.

I shall first illustrate this by two similitudes, and then propose a rational and clear account of it in a way of argument.

When the distant morning sun shines on a piece of polished metal, the metal reflects the face of the sun in perfection, when the sun just rises on it. But the same instruments coming directly under the meridian sunbeams, shall reflect the same image brighter and warmer; and yet every moment of this reflection from the morning to the highest noon, shall be perfect, i. e. without spot, without blemish, and without defect. Such perhaps is the holiness of all the saints in heaven.

Or shall I rather borrow a similitude from scripture, and say, the holiness of the spirits in heaven is compared to fine linen? Rev. xix. 8. "The line linen clean and white is the righteousness of the saints". Now though a garment may be perfectly clean without the least spot or stain, yet fine linen may grow whiter hourly, as it is bleached by the constant influence of the heavens. So though every spirit be perfectly cleansed and purified from all sin and defilement, yet it is not impossible that the degrees of its grace and holiness, or conformity to God, may grow brighter, and much improve by nearer approaches to God, longer acquaintance with him, and the continued influences of his majesty and love.

Now let me propose a rational account of this matter to the consideration of those, whose minds are raised above common prejudices.

The holiness of an innocent creature consists in attaining the knowledge of the nature and will of God, according to the utmost of its own present capacity, and the means of discovery which it enjoys, and in the various exercises of love to God in an exact proportion to its knowledge; or to express it briefly thus, An innocent creature is perfectly holy, when it knows and loves God to the utmost reach of its present powers. If this be done, there is no sinful defect, no guilty imperfection; and yet there may be almost an infinite difference in the various degrees of power and capacity, of knowledge and love, amongst innocent spirits: one spirit may be formed capable of knowing much more of his Maker than another, and may be favoured with richer discoveries. Now if every new divine discovery raise an equal proportion of love in the soul, then it is possible that any soul might be perfectly holy at its first entrance into heaven, and yet may make sublime advances in holiness hourly.

Can we suppose that innocent Adam, at his very formation in Paradise, knew all the wonders of divine wisdom and goodness, that ever he was designed to attain, had he lived sinless and immortal? And then can we believe, since his knowledge of his Maker's goodness and wisdom was to receive continual advances, that he should admire him no more, and love him no better after a thousand years' converse with him, than he did at his first creation? Now the case of the saints in heaven is much the same. The rule and measure of their duty is their knowledge, and the rule and measure of their knowledge is their own capacity, and their means of discovery. They never fall short of their duty, and therefore they have no sin; and thus their holiness may be every moment perfect, and yet perhaps every moment increasing, as their capacities, are enlarged, and receive new discoveries through all the ages of their immortality.

Happy souls, whose aspiring knowledge, and love, and zeal, move onward hourly, and get still nigher to their God! Surely while they behold his face in the unveiled beauties of his holiness, they shall love him with warmer zeal, and be more abundantly satisfied with his likeness; Psal. xvii. 15.

After all that I have said on this subject, some will insist on this objection, viz. Can there be any such thing as imperfection in heaven? Is it not said to be a perfect state? Now if the spirits above be always growing in excellency and holiness, then they are always defective and eternally imperfect; which is very hard to suppose concerning the saints in glory, and contrary to the very expression and letter of my text.

The answer to this is very easy, to all that will give their reason leave to exercise itself upon just ideas, and to think and argue beyond the chime of words. .

Perfection (as I told you before) is not to be taken here in an absolute, but in a comparative sense; nothing is absolutely perfect but God; and in comparison of God, the highest and most exalted of all creatures is, and will be eternally imperfect and defective; "The heavens are not pure in his sight, and he charges his angels with folly," Job iv. 18. Even the Man Christ Jesus shall for ever fall short of the perfection of the divine nature to which he is united, and in this sense will be imperfect for ever.

jj1- But where any creature has attained to such exalted degrees of excellency, as are far superior to what others have attained, it is the custom of the scripture to call them perfect, and that with a design to do honour to their character; so "Noah was a just man, and perfect in his generation," Gen. vi. 9. Job also has this honour done him, "He was perfect and upright," Job i. 1. And the saints on earth are called perfect in many parts of the word of God, even while they are here on earth, and have many defects and imperfections. So though it be literally true, that the saints in heaven are continually imperfect in comparison of God and Christ, and of what they themselves shall further attain; yet the scripture, which delights to do honour to them, chuses rather to call them perfect, because of the sublime degree of excellencies they possess above their fellow-saints on earth; and it is not fit for us to degrade them in our common language by the diminishing and abasing names of defect and imperfection, though their present perfection and excellency admits of everlasting increase.

If any man, after he has read this treatise thus far, and has duly weighed all the former arguments, can see force enough in this last objection to baffle or destroy them all, or can find terror enough in the mere sound of the word imperfect to forbid his assent; I desire he may not be disturbed in the possession of his own sentiments, till the sweet and surprising sensations of ever-growing felicity convince him, that heaven is a place of glorious improvement.

This shall suffice for the third general head of my discourse, wherein I have shewn, that the perfection of the spirits of the just is such a perfection as admits of a rich variety of employments and pleasures, according to the various taste and inclination of the blessed; it allows of their different degrees of felicity, according to their different capacities and preparations; it furnishes each blessed spirit with a frequent change of pleasures, and it gives room for perpetual increase.

We Reject With Abhorrence Popish Doctrine Of Diversity Of Glories As Founded In Diversity Of Merits

The question about degrees of glory in heaven is not necessary, but problematical. We reject with abhorrence the popish doctrine of diversity of glories, as founded in the diversity of merits: Nor is it questioned, among the orthodox, whether there be an equality of glory, as to the essentials. But only in respect to the accidentals, and concomitants; amongst which, they place the additional glory and joy of such ministers, whose faithful and prudent labours God hath blessed, and crowned with the conversion and edification of many souls.

And of this the apostle speaks, i Thess. ii. 19,20. "For what "is our hope, or joy, or crown of rejoicing? Are not even ye, in the presence of our Lord Jesus Christ at his coming? For ye are our glory and joy," Where we find a very remarkable gradation. He calls his Thessalonian converts his "hope, his joy, nay, his crown of rejoicing." His hope, that is, the matter of his hope, that they should be saved. His joy, as they had already given him abundant cause of joy, in their conversion to Christ by his ministry. And the "crown of his rejoicing in the presence of Christ, at his coming." This is an high praise, indeed! The meaning, I suppose, is, that the fruit and success of his ministry among them, would add to his crown, and redound to his glory in the day of Christ.

O brethren! who would not study and pray, spend and be spent, in the service of such a bountiful Master! Is it not worth all our labours and sufferings, to come with all those souls we instrumentally begat to Christ; and all that we edified, reduced, confirmed, and comforted in the way to heaven; and say, Lord, here am I, and the children thou hast given me. To have one spiritual child say, Lord, this is the minister, by whom I believed: Another, this is he, by whom I was edified, established, and comforted. This is the man that resolved my doubts, quickened my dying affections, reduced my soul, when wandering from the truth. O blessed be thy name, that I ever saw his face, and heard his voice.

What think we of this, brethren? But far beyond this; what will it be to hear Christ, the prince of pastors, say in that day, "Well done, thou good and faithful servant; thou hast been faithful over a few things, I will make thee master over many things: Enter thou into the joy of thy Lord," Mat. xxv. 21.

O sirs! We serve a good Master, who is not unrighteous to forget our work, and; labour of love for his name-sake. He keeps an exact account of all your fervent prayers, of all your instructive and persuasive sermons; and all your sighs, groans, and pantings, with every tear and drop of sweat, are placed like marginal notes against your labours in his book, in order to give a full reward.

The Millenium and Degrees of Glory

I am one of those old fashioned people who believe the doctrine of the Millennium, and that there will be two distinct resurrections of the dead: 1st, of the just, and second of the unjust; which last resurrection of the reprobate will not commence till a thousand years after the resurrection of the elect. In this glorious interval of a thousand years, Christ I apprehend, will reign in person over the kingdom of the just; and that during this dispensation, different degrees of glory will obtain, and every man shall receive his own reward according to his own labor, Corinthians 3:8. In the course of the present argument, I have been forced to take the doctrine of the Millennium for granted; time not allowing me to even intimate an hundredth part of the proof by which it is supported. I would only observe to those who have not considered that subject that it would be prudent in them to suspend their judgment about it, and not be too quick in determining against it, merely because it seems to lie out of the common road. As doctrines of this kind should not be admitted hastily, so they should not be rejected prematurely. "It is enough for us to know that a day will dawn when a period shall be put to every disorder under which nature at present labors, and the earth will become just what it was, perhaps considerably better than it was, ere sin destroyed the harmony and broke the balance of the well-according system. The stupendous accomplishment of this predestined restoration is largely and explicitly foretold, Revelation 20, where we read that the apostate angels shall be restrained by the coercive power of God, etc. The next chapter opens with acquainting us, that prior to the commencement of the Millennium, a new heaven, that is, a new body of surrounding air, and a new earth shall be prepared for the residence of Christ and his elect: 'I saw new heaven and a new earth; for the first heaven and the first earth were passed away;’ intimating that this terraqueous globe and its circumambient atmosphere will be so purified by the preceding general conflagration, as to be totally changed in their qualities, and divested of everything noxious or that can cause disgust and pain.

Oh, pray to Him for faith, and he who prepares your heart to call upon him will hearken to your cry. Throw yourself for eternal life on the merits of Jesus; and then, whether you believe the doctrine of the Millennium or not, you will certainly have a part in the blessedness of the state itself, and the second death shall have no power over you.

The following essay is extracted from a French book, entitled "Essai sur la Felicite de la Vie a Venir", by C. L. de Villette. The Translator has selected those parts alone which seemed most calculated to awaken such ideas of the life to come, as it appears to have been the author's principal aim to produce; and has ventured to make some alterations and additions.

To familiarize the joys of heaven to our imagination, without degrading them by too close a comparison with our present pleasures—to place them in such a point of view, as to warm the heart without dazzling the understanding;—to represent our occupations in the celestial abodes, as holding such affinity with our earthly pursuits, that, in order to be admitted to the privileges of the former, we must observe the strictest rectitude in the objects of the latter—to direct our views in every event beyond the narrow bounds of time, to a happy eternity, where that which is in part shall be swallowed up in that which is perfect;—these are the views of the Translator, as they evidently were those of the Author.

It must indeed be acknowledged, that, after all our endeavours to describe the joys of heaven, our mortal understanding can never acquire an adequate idea of that glorious state, in which we shall be partakers of the divine nature, and be conformed to the image of Christ. But nothing surely can so effectually detach us from low pursuits, and unworthy inclinations, or inspire the true Christian with gratitude and moderation in prosperity, with resignation and fortitude in adversity, with humble and ardent piety, universal benevolence, and every virtue becoming a being destined for immortality, and a possessor of the gospel of Christ, as the habit of reflecting on those superior enjoyments which the soul will experience, when, the veil of mortality being withdrawn, we shall see God "face to face," and partake of that "fulness of joy" which is in his presence for evermore

Introduction

To prove the superiority of our immortal to our mortal state; to assert that the body will be purified by death from its natural imperfections, and be raised spiritual and perfect, and that the faculties of the soul will acquire a nearer resemblance to that pure spirit from whom they proceed, would be an useless attempt; since to those who examine the words of eternal life, these truths are incontestably evident. But what the changes will be, which shall then take place in us, is seldom enquired; and they are by many people considered as inconceivable, not only in their degree, but in their nature also. That with regard to the former, they far exceed all which we can imagine, is clear from the words of Scripture: "Eye hath not seen, nor ear heard, neither have entered into the heart of man, the things which God hath prepared for them that love him." "Beloved, now are we the sons of God; but it doth not yet appear what we shall be." But I apply these passages to their degree alone; and it is the object of the following essay to prove, that the knowledge we have of the nature of the universe, and of the ways of God, as revealed to us in the gospel, may furnish us with strong reasons to be persuaded, that we shall possess in heaven our present faculties, and enjoy many of our present pleasures, though improved and refined beyond all human conception.

It may be alleged, that an acquaintance with the nature of that happiness, which we hope to enjoy in a future state, is of no importance to us, provided it really merits the most ardent desires of a rational creature; and that a perfect conviction, that he who knows and has power over all, will render us happy, forms a motive more than sufficient to induce us to undertake every thing, to sacrifice every thing, in obedience to his commands. Yet, if he permits us to discover, in some degree, what those rewards are which "he hath prepared for them that love him," our imagination will come in aid of our duty, and we shall meditate with transport on the scenes of future bliss, which in those moments of elevation, when the heart is lifted up to the Fountain of Happiness, we may in some measure be said to anticipate.

But, on the other hand, too distinct a view of the celestial regions would be productive of many evils. It would render this world a state of misery, by the impatience it would raise in us to arrive at that period, when mortality shall be swallowed up of life. Besides, our imagination, being thus forcibly captivated with such an enchanting prospect, must almost deprive us of the freedom of action in our pursuit of virtue. The motives to persevere in the great work of our salvation would be so strongly impressed on our minds, that those painful exertions which constitute our virtue, those trials which prove its constancy, would no longer deserve these titles; and we should derive no merit from actions, the rewards of which were set before us in a light too powerful to resist. This would destroy the source of one of our greatest pleasures.

We frequently complain of the difficulties attendant on all our attainments, both mental and corporeal; yet it may be easily proved, that in most cases this pretended cause for complaint ought to be a subject of gratitude. In every situation the Creator has provided for us a satisfaction and joy, resulting from our free agency, and from our own exertions. Even in our most trifling amusements, and yet more in those things on which our happiness principally depends, we could not be deprived of the privilege of deliberating, choosing, and acting with freedom, without losing what is most solid and precious in the benefits bestowed on us. Yet God, through the greatness of his mercy, has offered to our researches such an insight into the glories of his presence, as to induce us ardently to desire "an inheritance among the saints in light."

It is evident, from experience, that when we do not neglect our faculties, the knowledge we acquire, the virtuous affections, the happy inclinations, the laudable habits, which we fortify, are far more powerful than the counterpoise of criminal desires; and that our ideas of the great God, when we are frequently occupied in contemplating him, triumph considerably over all those in which the most fertile imagination can paint the objects of this world. If we have not too often, and too long, lost sight of these august ideas, they restrain the violence of our most impetuous passions, and divert the current of our most dangerous inclinations; till, by degrees, they change our whole heart, re-establish all our good dispositions, and plant virtue in all those secret recesses where vice had flourished before.

If it be true, that from our entrance into the world, from the commencement of our discipline, every thing points out to us the way of true felicity, and that, if at the first step we take the right path, every thing engages and encourages us more and more to pursue it; it is true also, (and it is a very remarkable and a very consoling observation) that God, infinitely wise and good, has hazarded our happiness no farther than was necessary to preserve our free-agency, the soul of all enjoyment.

It follows then, that thus supported by a sure and certain hope, we may be enabled to endure with patience unto the end all those trials of mortality which shall be succeeded by eternal happiness. Let us suppose all the evils we can suffer to be collected over us, those at least which we do not bring upon ourselves, they would occupy only a very small part of our life; they do not arrive altogether; they are blended with many comforts; they may be constantly alleviated by the pleasure of self-approbation, by the sentiment of an affectionate obedience, of an humble resignation, to the will of that adorable Being whom we love with our whole soul; and they are almost absorbed in that faith, which is as an anticipated possession of "things hoped for."

St. Peter lays it down as an evident fact, that a faithful Christian is also joyful. He does not say to those to whom he addresses his epistle,—“In believing on the Son of God I beseech you rejoice,”—but, “Ye do rejoice with joy unspeakable;” and it ought to be remarked, that at the time in which St. Peter wrote to them in this manner, they were threatened with various evils, from the absolute power of the Gentiles, and the implacable fury of the Jews.

In the moments of attentive meditation, a Christian cannot be insensible to the mercies of God in his beloved Son; and if he has not one of those extraordinary dispositions which nothing can move, he must be strongly affected by them. If we could constantly preserve this happy state of mind, we should be in the most desirable situation to which we could aspire here below; but this is not the case: the Christian, so lately penetrated with celestial joy, again becomes a feeble mortal, who mourns and rejoices for trifles. In spite of the resistance of the understanding, in spite of the ascendancy of the sublimest sentiments, the mechanism of our body, its unforeseen disorders, produce unhappy variations, which an over-strained severity regards as incompatible with zealous piety and solid virtue. Yet these humiliating inconsistencies will not prove that we do not love our heavenly Father and merciful Redeemer, that we do not trust and rejoice in him; but these glorious sentiments require to be frequently awakened, extended, and more firmly established.

Our natural eagerness after present pleasures, which so often leads us into folly, forms on this occasion a motive to employ all our cares, all our efforts, to perfect this important work. The tranquillity, the state of peace and contentment, which I have just mentioned, is an immediate actual blessing, and it is an inestimable one; it adds a charm to all our innocent pleasures, which infinitely surpasses their intrinsic value. Without that tranquillity, founded on an immoveable basis; without that permanent satisfaction which has its source in our own bosom, and depends on no exterior object; all which the world calls pleasure is generally accompanied by a frightful train of reproaches, regrets, and afflictions; while this happy state of mind can convert the most insignificant recreation, the most trifling amusement, into a real, a considerable blessing.

The most insipid day of the man who rejoices in God, is infinitely preferable to the most brilliant, the most fortunate day, of the ambitious or the voluptuous. But behold this man blessed from above; behold him either in “the courts of the Lord,” or in a chosen retreat, where, abstracting his thoughts from all terrestrial objects, and inviting those which constitute the measure of his heart to appear before his soul, he fills it with celestial joy; then you will exclaim with him, and with the Psalmist, “O Lord! A day in thy courts is better than a thousand elsewhere:” Then you will not be surprised at David’s ardent spiritual thirst after God, at the unutterable aspirations of St. Paul, at the unspeakable joy of St. Peter, at “that peace which passeth all understanding:” expressions which many regard either as poetically figurative, or as extravagancies proceeding from the warmth of an eastern imagination. It is true that the degree of this joy depends greatly upon the constitution, and upon the force and delicacy of certain faculties or qualities of the mind; consequently those who are susceptible of strong and lively emotions, would do wrong to judge from their own feelings of the reality, the sincerity, the constancy, or the piety of others; but those who cannot feel these emotions, ought not to confider as error or weakness, a sensibility so noble and so enviable.

Every one may, if I do not deceive myself, regard as moral truths the following propositions:

If that joy with which we are inspired by our love of God, and of his Son Jesus Christ, is not with the generality of Christians absolutely an unspeakable joy, at least it is sometimes ardent, and it almost constantly produces a state of peace, of confidence, of content, to which no situation merely worldly or terrestrial can approach. Sometimes indeed it may be suspended in the confusion of business, absorbed in the anguish of affliction, or banished for some moments by the petulant impatience of a quick and warm temper; but it soon regains its ascendancy, and re-establishes a prudent tranquillity. Where these effects do not appear, that Christian disposition does not exist; and those who do not possess it, and yet believe that they are Christians, deceive themselves, and take for real piety what has only the appearance of it; or those passions, “which war against the soul,” obtain frequent victories over their feeble virtue, and they abandon themselves to foolish projects and hurtful desires. In this case, assuredly they cannot expect to feel that celestial joy; and the same principles which ought to produce and nourish it, will cause in its place a dejection and terror, which even incredulity itself does not always experience. I do not mean to include those, who, with the sincerest piety, and the best dispositions, are afflicted with doubts and distractions. These are frequently owing to some corporeal disorder, which oppresses the faculties of the mind, and disturbs its tranquillity. Sometimes indeed the cause is unknown to us; but we may trust to that merciful Saviour, who has said, "Come unto me, all ye that labour, and are heavy laden, and I will give you rest." Those doubts which afflict us here, will be removed in a future state; though now we "know but in part," then shall we "know even as we are known." God "shall wipe away all tears from our eyes, and there shall be no more sorrow."

Secondly, If we would assure ourselves that our joy is solid, that it is adequate to the greatness of its cause, that it expresses how strongly we are affected by that faith which we profess to be planted in our hearts, how deeply we are penetrated with admiration, love, gratitude, confidence, and hope; let us beware of trusting to transient emotions; they may be deceitful. We can only judge of this joy from its ordinary and constant effects. The Christian in whom it dwells knows nothing, I do not only say which can equal it, but which can bear a comparison with it. He therefore makes a firm resolution to banish immediately all joy, with which this is inconsistent. He knows that it has its source, not in a fruitless contemplation of the favours of the Most High, and of his great designs for the happiness of the human race, but in an active admiration, a gratitude fruitful in good works, a pure taste for, and a firm attachment to, every thing laudable, honourable, just and amiable; in short, in employing his cares and exertions to cultivate and strengthen in himself all those noble principles of virtue which God has formed within him, and all the salutary knowledge which he has afforded him. When the least danger threatens his conscience, all the powers of his soul are exerted to avoid it. Animated also by his present happiness, he labours, not with painful efforts, but with joyful ardour, to establish and augment it; imploring that assisting grace, which will ever be vouchsafed to those who seek its aid with sincerity of heart and pious confidence. "If any of you lack wisdom, let him ask of God, who giveth to all men liberally, and upbraideth not; and it shall be given him." "He hath said, "I will never leave thee, nor forsake thee." So that we may boldly say, "the Lord is my helper, and I will not fear what man doeth unto me."

Part I

In a comparative view of our present and future state of existence, my observations will be chiefly comprised under two heads: Knowledge and Sentiment; the first relative to the powers of the understanding, the second to the affections of the heart. I shall first enlarge on the imperfections of these faculties, and of the pleasures which we derive from them in this life; and then endeavour to explain what their improvements will probably be in that which is to come.

I begin with the powers of the understanding.

The positive evils which attend our progress through this state of trial are sensibly felt by every human being. Pain and sickness, sorrow and disappointment, are at times the lot of all; but there are sufferings of a different kind, of which the most cultivated minds are most susceptible, as they are perceived and felt in proportion to the delicacy of our taste, and the improvement of our mental powers.

We may place in the rank of intellectual evils the natural imperfection of our faculties. Our understanding and memory are weak, and various inevitable impediments prevent us from employing these talents to the utmost. Established errors, instructors who teach ill, or (if we are reduced to proceed without a guide) the want of proper means to inform ourselves; and various circumstances of life, which prevent us from attaining those acquirements for which we have the greatest inclination; in a word, innumerable accidents, and unfavourable events, either turn us aside from the truth, or permit us to discern it only through an obscure and perplexing medium.

If any person would be surprised that there are so few people in the world who make a progress in elegant and useful knowledge, I entreat him only to consider how rare is the advantage of an uninterrupted and regular meditation; how many necessities or disorders derange or retard our researches.

By the tyranny of man also, we frequently find ourselves stopped in the career of the most sublime and interesting studies. The desire of knowledge is universal; and yet whole nations, as most all the nations of the world, shamefully enslaved by prejudice, and proud of their infatuation, persist with an invincible obstinacy in a dark and intricate path, and frequently only advance further into error; or, perhaps, satisfied with the labours of their predecessors, and abandoning themselves to an unmanly indolence, they enquire no further: they know already all which they desire. Not content with indulging this unworthy inactivity, they oppose the exertions of those noble individuals, who, animated by an ardent love of truth, dare to shake off such dishonourable and dangerous fetters, and endeavour to deliver others from them.

We may rank amongst mental evils those which, from the natural influence of the body upon the mind, are occasioned by corporeal disorders. Pain and sickness not only frequently betray us into a restlessness and impatience of spirit, which it requires the strictest watch over ourselves to avoid, but often, by deranging those finer plans which more immediately rest upon the mental powers, produce the most deplorable effects, and degrade the faculties of the immortal soul almost to a level with the instinct of the beasts that perish. To this we may add, that dejection of mind, that pensive sadness, the cause of which cannot be discovered either in the soul itself or in any external event; and which, therefore, can be supposed to proceed only from some corporeal derangement, which, without this grievous effect, would have remained imperceptible. We frequently see, and even more frequently than elsewhere, in these happy climates, where liberty and enlightened reason eminently prevail, persons of an excellent understanding, perfectly regular in their manners, rich in advantages both of nature and fortune,—fall into a deep melancholy, which they pronounce to be insurmountable. Nothing gives them pleasure: every thing wearies them. But are we very certain that no afflictive event has befallen them? Yes, they themselves confess it. Every thing around smiles upon them as before. It is, therefore, an internal and insensible disorder which thus affects their intellectual faculties. "The corruptible body presseth down the soul, and the earthly tabernacle weigheth down the mind that museth upon many things. And hardly do we guess aright at things that are upon earth; and with labour do we find the things that are before us: but the things that are in heaven who hath searched out?"

Particular circumstances vary infinitely the evils of the mind. It is very seldom that our business, our profession, our way of life, the persons with whom we are acquainted, the country which we inhabit, the fortune, the employment, the rank which we possess, answer to our inclinations and ideas. One man, whose destiny confines him in a country almost desert, thinks continually of the happiness which the citizen of a capital enjoys: whilst the same citizen, overpowered with business, and tormented with cares, envies the peaceable retreat of the inhabitant of the country.

But our greatest evils are caused by our passions. If we yield to them in the smallest degree, they become to the soul what violent paroxysms are to the body; and, however nobly we may subdue them, there is at least a time in which they make us suffer:—the time of combat.

Our desires and aversions, with regard to all kinds of advantages or evils, real or imaginary, are the sources of innumerable vexations and afflictions. They are often attended with alarms and fears, with regard both to the present life and to that which is to come. We fear for our possessions, reputation, health, and life; we interest ourselves for others; we fear the same evils for them; we place our desires on improper objects, and these desires torment us; we love what does not deserve our regard, and sooner or later we find reason to be ashamed of it; we regret excessively an object which could but very imperfectly contribute to our happiness; we fear that which may never happen, we hope for that which can scarcely ever happen. Ideas which strike the imagination, cause torments as real, and sometimes much more severe than the evil which we thus represent to ourselves would be in itself; and we are punished for encouraging extravagant hopes, by the disappointments which follow them. Add to these, dissensions, quarrels, jealousies, afflictions of every kind,

Which often, in this corrupt world, neither prudence nor probity can prevent; and lastly, the evils of conscience, infinitely more terrible than all the rest.

Frequently it is neither to our own follies, nor to those of others, that we owe our mental evils. This is a fact which I was unwilling to confound with the preceding general reflections. To be happy, we must have inclinations; and how often does it happen that it is not in our power to gratify them. Add to this, the well-grounded fear of many other real and inevitable evils; the actual loss of many advantages, which reason and the sweetest affections of the heart concur to render precious; and we shall confess, that the most moderate, cautious, and virtuous men, are exposed to numerous painful emotions.

Assuredly the spiritual part of our felicity (permit me to call it the health and ease of the soul) depends upon a much greater variety of circumstances, than the ease and health of the body, and its secret springs are much more delicate. In a long life, there are weeks, months, and sometimes years, which are not distinguished by any corporeal disorder; instead of which, few days pass over our heads unmarked by some mental pain or uneasiness. We may then venture to assert, that the evils of the mind are far more numerous, more various, and often much less supportable, than those of the body; and in considering them together, what could we think of the designs of the Creator, if our existence terminated with the present life?

But when "this corruptible shall have put on incorruption," when "this mortal shall have put on immortality," we shall be freed from all infirmities. Sickness and pain shall no more disturb our most useful occupations, our most innocent pleasures. Our senses being perfected to a degree of which we can at present form no idea, will convey to the soul an endless variety of delightful impressions. In the enjoyment of eternal youth and health, with our faculties and tastes in a state of continual improvement, our pleasures and our virtues will be continually increasing. Our pursuit of knowledge will no longer be attended with weariness or disgust; our virtues will no more be mixed with imperfections, nor our pleasures end in grief and disappointment. I intend to consider our comparative situation in this world and the next with a view to all these sources of enjoyment.

The pleasures most suitable to an intelligent creature, those which distinguish him from the brute, and form the essential part of his felicity, are the active pleasures: I mean those which he derives from the voluntary use of his faculties. What is it to be acquainted with an object? Assuredly it is not merely to have that idea of it which is imprest upon the soul by means of the senses, for in that case the brute would know as well or better than we do: it is when we reflect on the impression received, that we begin to know; that we free ourselves from the vile state of passive creatures, and rise to the honourable class of active beings: it is then, and then only, that the soul, enjoying the consciousness of its own dignity, finds in its actions a satisfaction, a variety of pleasure, which no sensation, no impression, merely as such, could possibly afford it. To reflect, to examine, is to will, to act freely; consequently the pleasure of acquiring and possessing knowledge is an intellectual, an active pleasure; calculated for a being endued with reason, and glorying in free agency. A state of mental repose is not consistent with the nature of a created intelligent being. We have no sooner attained to one degree of knowledge, than we aspire to the next. If we should find our progress suddenly limited by eternal barriers, our desires would continually torment us. We cannot enough admire the extent, the delicacy, of those arrangements which God has made for our felicity. Our faculties unfold, and our acquirements increase more and more. In comparison with the impetuosity of our desires, we seem to advance but slowly, yet still we do advance. This impetuosity is rendered excusable here below, by the shortness of our life, the uncertainty of every thing human, and our own Weakness. It is frequently necessary to facilitate our progress in various occupations and studies; yet it is generally attended with some degree of uneasiness, as it induces us to aspire after the attainment of perfections, before we can arrive at them by a natural progression, and consequently occasions us many mortifications.

But such is the importance of acquiring and possessing knowledge, that the wise and benevolent Creator impels us, almost irresistibly, to employ all our faculties in the pursuit of it. He has not only furnished us with the motive, which is produced by the idea of extensive utility annexed to such pursuits, (an idea which presents itself at first, and which opens and extends in proportion to our progress) but lest this motive should not be effectual, or should begin too late to operate on imperfect and mortal beings, he has given us a spring of action, influencing us continually from our earliest infancy; and this is curiosity.

The human understanding, expressly calculated to acquire knowledge, and introduced into the world destitute of it, no sooner exists than it exerts itself to learn. This natural curiosity is the first spring of all the efforts we make to inform ourselves. It is so powerful, that if destitute of objects worthy of its attention, it will employ itself upon trifles. Our understanding cannot remain inactive; that state is insupportable to it. To this it is owing, that when we have not early learnt to love those truths which are of some importance, we contrast the despicable habit of sending our intellectual powers in quest of a thousand trifles, and pry into the most insignificant affairs of our neighbours.

Curiosity is an intellectual appetite, which is scarcely appeased before it presses us again; and the pleasure of knowledge consists less in possessing than in acquiring it; which shows the necessity of a progression in knowledge, in order to render us happy; and to derive from this progression all the pleasure which can result from knowledge, it is necessary that we should always preserve our free agency, the use of our liberty, the voluntary exercise of our faculties. Our progress in knowledge is, in this case, a continual renovation of the pleasure of gratifying our intellectual appetite; and our enjoyment is increased by the flattering consideration, that it is the fruit of our own exertions.

But in order to animate us to seek after knowledge, and support us through our studies with cheerfulness, it is necessary that our exertions should not become disagreeable through too much labour; that our faculties, talents, and assistances, should always bear an exact proportion to the object in question; that a well-grounded hope of success should make every thing easy to us, just so far as that even the most attentive study may become a pleasure; that nothing should interrupt our occupations against our own inclinations; that we should have a glimpse, in the depths of infinity, of an inexhaustible fund to supply that intellectual appetite which is continually increasing; and above all, that we should be as certain of an eternal duration as we are of our own existence and of that of the Creator.

Let us consider, according to these ideas, our situation in this world with regard to knowledge; and from thence, in regulating our observations by the declarations or insinuations of the Scriptures, we may conjecture, in some degree, what will be our situation in heaven.

In many respects, our knowledge here below far exceeds what is necessary to direct us in providing for our natural wants; so much so, that if the Creator had limited our duration to the short space of human life, it would be impossible to comprehend with what design he could have given to man a capacity, which extends to innumerable speculations, not requisite for the supply of our necessities; and this is of itself a strong proof, that the present state is only the beginning, the infancy of our existence.

On the other hand, our understanding is in some respects so weak and imperfect, that even with regard to what it is necessary to know, in order to answer all our wants, we find ourselves impeded every moment.

This ignorance, by which we are mortified and afflicted, is absolutely necessary to our state of discipline, and to the government of our Sovereign ruler; and in this we must admire the wisdom of the Most High; but at present I am only to consider our knowledge itself, and certainly it is very imperfect. We must be sensible, that our efforts to penetrate into the depths of science, carry us but little beyond the outside, with regard to sublime speculations; though our intellectual powers eagerly aspire after innumerable objects, superior to those of this world, yet in every thing we see only part of the ways and works of God. Scarcely have we satisfied our curiosity on one point, before a thousand others present themselves, upon which we perceive with concern that we cannot satisfy it; our discoveries are never perfect, our exertions are often too fatiguing, our progress slow; in general we advance only by groping as in the dark; our pursuits are every moment interrupted, and we are often very uncertain of success. Not only the universe itself, but an insect, a plant, and even a single hair, offers to our curiosity matter for profound and often fruitless investigation. Far from being in danger of objects failing us, we are confounded by their abundance. Thousands of ages, of such a life as ours, would not suffice to glance slightly over the ten-thousandth part of them. But of what use to us is this excessive abundance, this astonishing profusion of exquisite gratifications, if we have scarcely time allowed us to taste a very few of them; unless the Creator, who places them before us, and who continually excites that appetite which he gave us, designs to bring us again to this magnificent banquet, and to allow us to enjoy it for ever?

In Heaven, through the goodness and power of Him who has created us, and who will raise us from the dead, our faculties will be endued with the precise degree of perfection requisite for our making a rapid progress in all intellectual attainments. I regard the resurrection of the body as an acknowledged fact, for I write to Christians; "but we will all be changed;" and we may reasonably suppose that change to consist, not only in a freedom from bodily infirmities, but in the attainment of a much more perfect organization. A blind man has no idea of the pleasure produced by sight, or a deaf man of the delights of harmony; and as we know that even in this world, there are sensations of which some individuals are entirely ignorant, surely it is not unreasonable to conclude, that our glorified bodies may be endued with new modes of perception, which may convey to the soul new sources of enjoyment, infinitely varied, and continually increasing, in an eternal progression of happiness. By attempting entirely to spiritualize our celestial existence, we reduce ourselves to the impossibility of forming the least idea of it; and while we acknowledge a resurrection of the body, we in fact deny it. To this cause, amongst others, is owing the coldness and indifference with which even the best people too often regard the joys of heaven; and the assertion, so often repeated, that we can form no idea at all of our future state. Yet we cannot reasonably complain of the unsatisfactoriousness of that information, which few of us endeavour to obtain; and it will not, I think, be difficult to prove, that in these researches, the Holy Scripture confirms the deductions of reason.

The expressions of St. Paul, Our body "raised in glory," which implies an inconceivable improvement of our organs; "then we shall see face to face;" "now we walk by faith, not by sight;" "now we know in part, but when that which is perfect is come, that which is in part shall be done away:"—the comparison which the same apostle makes between our present state, and that in which we shall be in heaven, "when I was a child, I spake as a child, I understood as a child, I thought as a child; but when I became a man, I put away childish things:"—what St. John says, in speaking of God, that "we shall see him as he is."—All these passages establish as so many infallible truths, the flattering ideas which mere reason ventures to present to us only as conjectures.

We shall see God face to face. Of what nature will be that view or that knowledge? Here it would be rash and absurd to conjecture; because, in order to be in a state to do it, we must be invested with the faculties requisite to conceive that kind of knowledge: that is, we must be now, what we shall be after a glorious resurrection. When Paul was caught up to Heaven in a miraculous ecstasy, he heard things which he declares to be "unspeakable." Thus with regard to the manner of the beatific vision, we are in a profound ignorance here below; but we may venture to assert, that we shall know God, and every other object, with a strength, a facility, a clearness of conception, infinitely superior to all which the finest capacity can hope for on earth, from the longest study. The soul, invested with a spiritual body, and thus provided with organs incomparably more perfect than those with which it is now connected, will have great advantages for acquiring knowledge, and making a rapid progress in it. The attributes of God, the conduct of his providence, his vast designs, and, as proceeding from them, the wonders of creation, of which we now discern only a small part; all these objects of infinite grandeur, beauty, variety, and importance, in the study of which we are every moment sensible of the weakness of our understandings, will be placed within the reach of our observation.

By the lustre of the heavenly ray with which God will enlighten us, a thousand admirable novelties will burst upon our sight; in him, and by him, we shall see all around us what at present eye cannot see, hear what at present ear cannot hear, and our hearts shall conceive what at present they cannot conceive.

Those who sail upon the ocean, some leagues from land, see only the coasts. Those who have the clearest eyes, with the best instruments, discern in this confused landscape only some objects, which are lost to others, and which strongly excite curiosity. Night comes on and veils the prospect from their sight. During their sleep the vessel approaches the port, and at sun-rise casts anchor. They land; a thousand beautiful and magnificent objects present themselves on every side, infinitely excelling all which the distant view had induced them to imagine.

Thus we shall enjoy in heaven, to a degree beyond all conception, the pleasures of novelty and surprise, of finding our curiosity satisfied, or at least ourselves provided with means to enable us to satisfy it: for if we were to suppose that God would display to us at once, all which we hope to know through eternity, this would be, according to my ideas, to suppose that he would rob our knowledge of one of its greatest charms.

In proportion as the truths we are to learn shall become more difficult to comprehend, we shall doubtless acquire talents adapted to them; and thus we shall go on from strength to strength, with regard to the pleasure of acquiring and possessing knowledge, as in every respect we shall rise from glory to glory. The studies requisite to advance in this manner will not be oppressive labours. The assistance which may be necessary to us, an infinite number of beings more intelligent than ourselves, and full of celestial goodness, will be eager to offer. If they are now "ministering spirits, sent forth to minister for them who shall be heirs of salvation, will they not then rejoice to associate with us, when, purified from the corruptions of mortality, we shall be "as the angels which are in heaven?" Our own efforts, provided they do not fatigue us, contribute much to our satisfaction. Our exertions being thus the source of our pleasure, nothing will discourage us; for can we fail to have a steadfast hope of success? Upon what could a fear of disappointment be founded? Whatever then may be the length of the attentions requisite to attain to a certain point, the hope, or rather assurance of success, will support, animate, and fill us with joy.

Our progress, always equal to our faculties, and not retarded by involuntary interruptions, will be great and rapid. In a world where we shall be freed from all the cares which are here requisite for our subsistence, our clothing, our lodging; where we shall sleep no more; where "there shall "be no more sorrow, nor crying, nor pain;" where all, far from molesting us, or deranging our plans of study, will favour them; it is evident that we must have undisturbed leisure to execute them.

At the same time, with such great advantages for enjoying all the pleasure of acquiring and possessing knowledge, and, notwithstanding the vast treasure of science which we shall have collected through myriads of ages,—we shall never lose for a moment that soothing idea, so necessary to the happiness of every being who values the pleasure of learning; that the source of this pleasure will never fail. In God, and the immensity of his works, there is an inexhaustible fund of materials to satisfy the most unbounded curiosity; but though assured that we shall never arrive at a period when there will be no more to learn, yet we shall still preserve a steadfast hope, that we shall perfectly understand all the objects which offer themselves for our investigation.

It may be objected, in answer to these observations on the extent of our capacities in a future state, and the means which will be afforded us for acquiring knowledge, that there will probably be some things, the entire comprehension of which will be reserved for God alone; as it is reasonable to suppose that the creature, however perfect, can never acquire complete ideas of every thing relative to the Deity; and, in that case, that we may feel our curiosity strongly excited, without being possessed of the means to satisfy it. But I believe, that when we shall have attained to such an exalted understanding, we may have all the discernment requisite to distinguish between what is to be known to the creature, and what to the Supreme Being alone; and, always able to regulate appetites which might corrupt us, we shall, without difficulty, prescribe to our curiosity the same limits, which will necessarily, from the nature of things, be prescribed to our knowledge. The most noble ambition would be extravagant, if it engaged a created being to desire to usurp the place of the greatest, the first of beings: this therefore will not happen: the most ardent imagination will not aspire so high. The most vehement curiosity will be repressed, the moment we shall perceive, that to attempt to penetrate further, would be to encroach upon the privileges of the Most High; to wish to be what He is, what He alone can be. Always humble and grateful, always joyfully submitting our own will to that of the great God, whom we shall love with all our soul, We shall no sooner arrive at those unfathomable depths, than retreating with respect, and acknowledging our dependence on him, we shall, without regret, turn all our attention and enquiries towards that multitude of objects, upon which we may innocently and successfully indulge our curiosity.

If then we are in the smallest degree susceptible of those pleasures which are the most worthy of a thinking being, the idea of seeing God as he is must excite very strong desires; and how natural is it to seek incessantly the means to fulfil those desires, and to employ those means without delay!

They are all comprehended in this word "holiness." Those alone will be admitted into the adorable presence of God, who labour sincerely and assiduously in the work of their sanctification. "Without holiness no man shall see the Lord:" "depart from me, ye that work iniquity."

To meditate on God as soon as we are capable of reasoning, to apply afterwards to that meditation more and more, is a sure path to holiness, and a most powerful incentive to exert every possible effort to practice it with diligence. Even an indistinct and limited knowledge of the wisdom and goodness of the Almighty, such a knowledge as we may acquire here below, should fill our hearts with comfort and joy. God, in the glories of the gospel dispensation, is the God of mercy, the God of peace. What measures of benignity! What effusions of grace! He is amiable, adorable, beyond all expression, all conception: our language has no terms, our hearts have no sentiments, adequate to this sublime subject.

We may reasonably suppose, that all the endeavours which we employ upon earth to know God, shall not be lost to us in heaven; and that those who in this world shall acquire the best knowledge of Him, will have, at their entrance into the habitations of glory, the qualities most requisite for seeing Him as he is.

Every man, who has not been bewildered by false information; who has steadfastly followed, through the interposing mists of error, those rays of light which God has diffused through the universe; and above all, he, who favoured with that shining light displayed in the gospel, shall constantly have employed it as a guide to direct him into the paths of truth: in a word, every man who, uninfluenced by prejudice, shall not have adopted any of those systems which give us false notions of our great God, notions injurious to the divine majesty, will have nothing to correct in the copy, which, faint as it is, now so much delights him. He sees God only as through a glass; he sees him only at a distance; yet at least his glass is true; if it represents the image faintly and darkly, it does not represent it falsely; but when he shall enter into the regions of bliss, before the throne of God, he shall see Him in the brightness of his glory. Happy here below, when we faintly discern him such as he is: how supremely blest shall we be, when we shall "behold him face to face; when we shall know, even as also we are known!"

Part II

I have as yet only considered what may satisfy our boundless curiosity in the knowledge which we shall have of God in the future state, but there are many other delightful sentiments with which this knowledge may inspire us.

When we contemplate objects which deserve our admiration, and which are besides connected with our self-love, or with our generous and social affections, then to the pleasure of admiring, are united various other pleasures which animate and extend it in proportion to the number and greatness of these objects. I will endeavour to illustrate this by a familiar example.

Let me suppose myself conducted into a palace, from thence into a garden, from thence into a beautiful country, where art and nature have united to form all which we can imagine pleasant, commodious, and lovely. I have leisure to admire the most striking beauties: I do so, with the indifference of a stranger, who is immediately to quit these charming scenes, where neither himself nor his friends have the least possession; but at the instant of my departure, my conductor stops to tell me, that all which I have just seen belongs to me and to my friends. I return: I remark with an extreme surprise, that even in the most trifling things, the most scrupulous attention has been paid to our taste; that even the smallest flower is disposed according to our fancy: then my admiration is raised to the highest degree: the little flower, artfully placed in that particular spot to gratify me, affords me a much more lively pleasure than I had felt before in the contemplation of all the enchanting beauties of this terrestrial paradise. But the emotions of my heart towards him to whose goodness I owe this magnificent present, are of a different nature, and diffuse over my soul the sweetest sentiments of love and gratitude.

This will be our case in heaven. At first astonished at the objects which will offer themselves to our observation on every side, and afterwards reflecting on the goodness of the Creator who has given them to us, and disposed our minds to enjoy them, we shall admire their several relations to our faculties; and a minute examination of these will increase our admiration to infinity, and continually awaken in our hearts a new emotion of gratitude and love.

To the prospect of this treasure of felicity which will be displayed before our enchanted eyes, will be added the recollection of all which God has done to secure the possession of it to us.

Is memory's magic only felt below?
Say, thro' what brighter realms me bids it flow;
To what pure spirits, in a nobler sphere,
She yields delight, but faintly imaged here.

We shall retrace, to a remote period, that amazing variety of combinations, circumstances, and events, which the providence of God has brought to pass to work out our salvation. Our particular reflections upon ourselves will soon extend to the whole human race. In unfolding the work of our redemption, which will then be completed, we shall by degrees discover the depths of that wisdom, and that love, which have shone forth in Jesus Christ, and which at present the angels themselves cannot totally penetrate. What here appears most obscure in the dispensations of Providence, what sometimes confounds, alarms, and discourages us, will then appear to have been evidently necessary to the divine system, and the most mysterious parts to have been the most skillfully contrived and disposed.

In the same manner, with regard to the evils of this life, of which we now sometimes complain so bitterly, which we support with such impatience, and which we every moment fear should betray us into injurious murmurs against our heavenly Father, we will perceive that to them we are in some degree indebted for our state of glory. With what joy will we then reflect on these favourable evils, these happy afflictions! What transports of love and gratitude to God will be excited by this retrospect of the past! We shall continually recur to this affecting idea, and dwell upon it with rapture. Formerly he had appeared to us a God who had pleasure in concealing himself, a father whose ambiguous dealings might render his affection uncertain; but then we shall perceive, that always inclined "to lift up the light of his countenance upon us," He had deferred it only 'till the proper time should arrive; that he had constantly been a watchful and impartial father, unchangeable in his vast and generous designs, which had ever been conducive to our happiness; but whom the steadfastness of his affection, and his profound knowledge of what would best contribute to our felicity, had engaged to impose upon us a discipline accommodated to our dispositions and our state upon earth, and which consequently had been sometimes severe. Regarding then, in the true point of view, all his conduct towards us, we shall discover an admirable union of the tenderest care, the most consummate prudence, and the most inimitable will, to guide and impel us insensibly towards a state of everlasting happiness. The pleasure of surprise, of a comparison between our present and our past situation, all the relief which our joy can receive from the most soothing reflections, we shall enjoy to the utmost. If our happiness would be complete in itself, without the aid of such a comparison, what vivacity of sentiment will it add to it! The contemplation of the dispensations of God, in every part of this retrospect, will raise in our soul's sentiments of gratitude and love, of which our happiest experiences in piety upon earth can give us but a faint idea.

When an event befalls us in this world which surpasses our hopes, if we connect with that event a firm persuasion that it is in a peculiar manner the effect of the approbation and favour with which God honours us, we shall have infinitely greater joy in that persuasion, than in the benefit itself which his providence has just bestowed upon us. The sentiments of affection and gratitude, which arise in our minds towards a benefactor worthy of all our veneration, all our attachment, are far superior in value to the gift which we receive from him. This gift is a pledge of his affection, and that consideration awakens all our own: that engaging idea is what principally renders it precious to us. This is true above all with regard to God; for besides the present advantage which we enjoy, besides the delightful sentiments of gratitude and love which it inspires, we may infer from it what are the designs of the Most High, and what will be his future dealing with us. His favour once obtained, we do not lose it but by our own fault; there is no caprice, no inconstancy, to be feared from God. What may we not then express and hope! What sweet emotions arise at once in our souls! And in heaven how clear, how convincing will this argument be!

Here below, besides that we are prevented from beholding, by the "clouds and darkness which are round about" our good God, the full perfection of that "righteousness and judgment which are the habitation of his throne;" and from tasting that joy unspeakable and full of glory, with which a clear perception of him would fill every heart; besides this obscurity, there is often another obstacle, incomparably more difficult to surmount, and which we ourselves create; this is sin. We are the same with regard to God, as we usually are with regard to our friends; as soon as we have acted ill towards them, or in any manner rendered ourselves less worthy of their affection, we immediately feel our own diminish. Frequently, in consequence of the injury which an unjust offender has committed, he hates the offended person more than he is hated by him.

Of all mental evils, the greatest and the most insupportable is remorse of conscience. To those who have been guilty of enormous crimes, it is a sensation of inexpressible anguish; but every species of guilt, every degree of sin, creates in the mind uneasiness and confusion, in proportion to the sentence which we pass upon our actions; and it is impossible to elude the judgment of our own conscience, or to render ourselves indifferent to its awful voice.

Shame, as well as remorse, is always revived by the sight of the person we have injured; it strikes through the heart, and we fly, we abhor, whatever awakens it. The idea of a witness of our unworthiness, especially when that witness is the person with regard to whom we are guilty, is a tormenting idea. If to shame be added a well-grounded fear of suffering the punishment deserved, we have then a complication of emotions which distract us. Such is our deplorable situation with regard to God, when we have trampled on his sacred laws, and despised his salutary counsels. The sentiments of soothing confidence, of sincere and ardent love, which we once felt towards him, are weakened by the flock of various opposite sentiments. This great God, who was the source of our tranquillity, of our consolation and joy, becomes a source of shame and fear; and if we are not diligent to suppress this frightful tumult in our souls, by sincere repentance and speedy amendment, we expose ourselves to the most formidable of all dangers, that of changing into aversion those sentiments of filial duty and affection which we once felt towards that adorable and almighty Being. If we were always wise and virtuous, we should taste here below, in a high degree, the pleasure of loving God; but even those who have made the greatest progress in the work of sanctification, have always sufficient cause to reproach themselves. This is what principally cools that celestial ardor, and mingles much bitterness with all its pleasures.

In heaven this great obstacle will be removed. If at first we should feel some degree of shame, on the recollection of the numerous weaknesses, omissions, and errors, which had interrupted the work of our sanctification, and should be confused at obtaining rewards so greatly surpassing all which we could reasonably expect from our cares and exertions; cares so continually interrupted, exertions frequently so languid; these painful reflections will immediately be alleviated by the propitious aspect of our heavenly father, and afterwards entirely absorbed in the profusion of his favours. Having once and for ever "cast away our sins," and ceased to "remember our iniquities;" having accepted our good intentions and our feeble endeavours, he will obviate at the moment of our entrance into glory, by every testimony of paternal affection, all which might give us uneasiness. Like the indulgent and tender father, in the affecting parable of the prodigal son; who, instead of uttering the least reproach to his returning penitent, was anxious to dry up his tears, hastened to embrace him, and bestowed upon him innumerable caresses and benefits; he will not leave us time to recall to our minds those painful sentiments which his ineffable goodness will exclude for ever and ever.

We are surrounded here below by those dangerous enemies of our soul, temptations. However important may be the advantages which we have obtained, and however firm may be our confidence in future victories, through the grace of God, yet we must still sustain the combat; we are exposed to surprise, and frequently, alas! we yield to it. We must live in a state of continual watchfulness, left in an unguarded moment we should be led astray from the path of duty; for our adversary, the devil, as a "roaring lion, walketh about, seeking whom he may devour." How delightful then will be that tranquillity and peace, which we shall enjoy, when such shall be our happy situation, such our spiritual strength, that, instead of temptations to guard against, we shall find in every object around us, something to afford an agreeable exercise to our virtue.

From all which has befallen us in this world, and above all, from the happiness we shall experience at our entrance into the next, we may deduce prophetic consequences, which will be a transporting anticipation of those degrees of glory and felicity, which we shall not at first possess. I am in the harbour of salvation, safe from a thousand dangers from which I have just escaped; they exist no longer, except in my remembrance. These dangers, formerly so terrible, now only form a strong contrast, which makes me feel more sensibly my present security. Tranquil and happy in the midst of my friends, I look forward only to pleasures, pure, infinitely varied, and eternal. We can conceive but very imperfectly the delights of such a situation; yet there are circumstances in this world, which may perhaps convey to the mind a faint idea of it. For example, you escape miraculously from a shipwreck; you land amidst the embraces of beloved friends, from whom you had been separated for many years, and whom you had scarcely hoped to meet again; you hear the sea still roaring behind you, but in vain; you find yourself in a peaceful and charming asylum, amidst the sweetest transports of the tenderest affection. "Such a deliverance," says the elegant and amiable Dr. Beattie, "will every good man meet with at last, when he is taken away from the evils of life, and awakes in the regions of everlasting peace; looking back on the world and its troubles with a surprise and satisfaction, familiar in kind, tho' far higher in degree, to that which we now feel, when we awake from a terrifying dream, and open our eyes upon the sweet serenity of a summer morning." All will be joy and exultation. The bitter streams which mingle with the sweets of this life, will then be totally dried up. No more remorse, no more shame or anxiety, shall there interrupt our felicity: (allow me to use some repetition and recapitulation, for we return with pleasure to such objects, and love to dwell upon them:) from reviewing in the records of the past the depths of the wisdom and mercy of God, we shall derive a thousand inexpressible pleasures. In reflecting on our passage through mortality, that dangerous passage, which, in spite of so many errors and wanderings, shall at length, through the indulgence and assistance of our heavenly Father, have conducted us to that happy abode; we shall find, not only in the best actions and most favourable events of our lives, but in our misfortunes, our dangers, and even in our failings, subjects for admiration and joy. On the other side, the immensity of that futurity to which we shall look forward, will be a boundless perspective, presenting a progressive succession, a constant and inexhaustible store of knowledge and pleasure, of amiable sentiments, and generous designs; which, uneclipsed, and uninterrupted, continually extend the amazing prospect, and augment the magnificent scene; ascending through a state of gradual, but constant improvement, to the centre of all glory and felicity; the throne of the Most High.

These prospects, so flattering to ourselves, will also include all the intelligent beings which surround us. Those beams of light and life, which proceed from the throne of the Lord, will have dispersed every cloud, and dispelled every shadow of death. They will diffuse around a perfect serenity, an ineffable and glorious joy.

It is not sufficient to be happy ourselves, or rather we cannot be happy alone: it is also necessary that all those should be made happy, who are capable of becoming so. What pleasure must a generous soul derive from contemplating the Supreme Being, continually establishing, without partiality, all the happiness which is suitable to every one, or of which every one is susceptible. But of this noble pleasure we are entirely destitute here below. None of our fellow creatures are perfectly happy, and a great number of them are in a state of suffering. This alone would be sufficient to render the happiness of the present life imperfect, even if it were a situation in other respects the most desirable. If, with the assurance of our own safety, we cannot connect that of the safety of the friends whom we love, our tranquillity must be very imperfect. But in heaven, our friends, (if they have not been totally unworthy of that name) our dearest friends, will be with us, in perfect security, in the presence of our great God. The power of pain and death over them, as well as over ourselves, will have ceased; and consequently all that dejection, and those variations of temper, which corporeal disorders sometimes occasion upon earth, will cease also; and amongst beings so wise, so good, so refined, both in body and soul, we shall enjoy an intercourse always undisturbed and always free.

Happy in ourselves and in our friends, we shall also rejoice in the felicity of all around us. To feel sincerely and forcibly the happiness of others, is in some measure to increase our own, in proportion to the number of the blessed. This will be more particularly considered when I speak of our sentiments in regard to our fellow-creatures; but it is principally to God, that all the various sentiments which I have mentioned must be referred. He will be the great object of our love, the strength of our confidence, and the source of all our happiness.

Every pleasure which we enjoy will continually recall our attention to Him, by constantly setting before us his tender cares: it will be in Him that we shall see the glorious plan of universal felicity, which shall increase through all eternity: in a word, according to the admirable expression of St. Paul, he will be "all in all." He will not only be the most essential object of all our attachment, the inexhaustible treasure, as well as the original cause, of our greatest pleasures; we shall not only trace his hand continually, in every new effect of his wisdom and beneficence, but He himself will penetrate even to the inmost recesses of our hearts. He has formed them, he sees them, and knows their most secret sentiments. It is He who has put in motion all the springs of our felicity, and it will be in his presence that we shall find fullness of joy. Nothing is too vast for his power, nothing too difficult for his wisdom, nothing too beneficent for his goodness. What a variety of delightful sentiments he will create in us, in manifesting himself to us as he is; and in giving room to our liberty, our understandings, and our affections, to exert themselves according to our wishes, and at the same time in the pursuit of our greatest good!

He shall be all in all! This great, this good God will fill our souls with that joy which his adorable presence will diffuse throughout the universe. All which is pleasing, all which is transporting, in admiration, in gratitude, in love, in confidence, in hope; in the anticipated accomplishment of the generous wishes formed by a noble heart, glowing with fraternal affection; in the prospect of an infinite variety of blessings, at which we shall sooner or later arrive, all adapted to contribute in some measure to our happiness; and finally in the prospect of an eternal augmentation of excellence and felicity;—all this we shall possess and enjoy without alloy, and with a warmth and energy of sentiment, which we neither feel, nor can feel, here below; for the Lord himself, from whom proceedeth "every good and every perfect gift," will be "the portion of our inheritance" to all eternity.

Part III

I Shall now make a few observations on those sentiments which will arise from our connexion with our fellow-creatures, and with the other inhabitants of the mansions of immortality.

We are so formed for society, that we cannot imagine happiness without it. The idea of an abode where it would be impossible for us to meet with any of our fellow creatures, a desert island for instance, upon which we might be cast by a shipwreck, has something in it melancholy and dreadful. In vain might that island be represented as the garden of Eden; this would have no influence upon us. But let us suppose that a second shipwreck should cast on the same coast two or three persons, possessed of talents and merit to deserve our esteem; this idea immediately diffuses over our heart consolation and joy. This pleasure does not arise from reflecting on the assistance which we may derive from each other, in procuring the necessaries of life. Though nature herself should have formed for us a commodious and agreeable habitation, tho' our food should spring up spontaneously, though the useful animals should come to us of their own accord, or suffer themselves to be taken and tamed without difficulty; all this could not compensate for the absence of every being upon whom we could fix that social affection by which our hearts are animated. All which might give us pleasure, if we were not alone, would in solitude become insipid and wearisome.

In solitude, what happiness, who can enjoy alone, or all enjoying, what contentment find? (John Milton)

It is not therefore because we could not subsist, or not without painful and continual exertions, that we love our fellow-creatures; but it is because our sentiments towards them, and theirs towards us, make them the principal sources of the great springs of our felicity. It is true that the caprices and vices of those with whom we are connected, frequently suspend, impede, and restrain, our natural affections; and sometimes change into aversion our strongest propensity towards friendship. Then these affections resemble affrighted birds; after a long and wavering flight, if they rest any where at last, it is without confidence, and every moment prepared to fly off again. That suspicious disposition is frequently very excessive; and it is generally owing in a great measure to ourselves.

In judging of the actions of others, and especially of such actions as are evidently doubtful, we are too apt to suffer ourselves to be biased by prejudice. Thus an understanding, on other occasions just and penetrating, may be deceived; and the error is more fatal as it is necessarily unjust and cruel. A man endued with excellent moral faculties, which he has assiduously cultivated, perceives instantaneously in every action what motives would on such an occasion infallibly have influenced himself. He discovers some just causes for suspicion, but his impartial mind is in a state to decide, according to the trusted rules of equity, whether the fact may be considered in the most advantageous light, or whether there is a strong foundation for doubt; and he concludes with humility, that at the worst it may be one of those actions in which some evil is blended with the good. But those observers, who yield imperceptibly to a secret jealousy, or who prefer the reputation of penetration to that of charity, have not recourse to laudable motives, if they can without them explain the mystery with an air of plausibility, or with the hope of pleasing the multitude; they confidently assert that such motives had no part in the action; and applauding themselves for such an ingenious discovery, they raise it as a trophy to their pride; for pride generally gives rise to that false policy, which makes us judge so rigorously of the actions of others; and if such is the weakness of human nature, that we must in one way or other deviate from the point of perfection, it is infinitely more for our own comfort, and for that of all around us, that we should err on the side of affection and benevolence. It is better to be exposed to the danger of deception, than to torment ourselves with subjects of suspicion, perhaps entirely imaginary.

Again: frequently possessed by some passion which prevents us from cultivating diligently these sweet affections, we suffer them to be enfeebled, 'till we render ourselves almost indefensible to them; our self-love becomes confined; it can no longer cherish even those sentiments which were the most calculated to gratify it. By thus neglecting, and leaving unexercised, our social and generous dispositions, we accustom ourselves by degrees to consider our fellow-creatures as so many instruments from which we may derive some advantage in the affairs of life; but we lose the idea of the pure pleasure of loving. Still more; we suffer to perish in our souls the sublime pleasure of desiring the happiness of others, without any interested view to our own: then we regard with indifference those who cannot render us any service, or contribute in any manner to our amusement. Confined within a narrow sphere, we do not extend our social affections beyond a small number of friends: perhaps there may be some who, strictly speaking, cannot be said to love any one of their fellow-creatures.

But even those who, partly through the faults of others, and partly through their own, are thus almost contracted within themselves, and suffer their generous and social affections to languish in total inaction; even they would reanimate them with a powerful energy, if all mankind should become really estimable and amiable, and should clearly appear so to them. You are informed that all who surround you are changed; that they are good and generous; that they love you sincerely and tenderly; and that even those strangers whom you see at a distance, are impatient to give you proofs of the affection which they feel towards you.

These obdurate hearts would be no longer inflexible; they would, with the most pleasing surprise, feel themselves affected with the same sentiments which they should find in all around them.

This will be our case in heaven. We shall be secure of meeting, in each of the blessed, with every disposition, every affection, every sentiment, which we would wish them to feel towards us.

We all have a natural desire to be esteemed and beloved. The fact is incontestable. This is an admirable motive to induce us to exert all our faculties in the most advantageous manner; to unite ourselves to each other by the tenderest friendship; to perform the most glorious actions. The wisdom and goodness of God are displayed in this disposition of our hearts. Here below, our own errors and frailties, and a great number of external objects; various accidents, the ignorance of other men, and their false judgments, often prevent us from gratifying that noble desire. But the worst of men cannot entirely divest themselves of regard for the approbation of their fellow creatures. That affection and esteem which by means of certain qualities and actions we may have lost with some, we endeavour to regain with others by different qualities and an altered conduct; but the success is always uncertain.

It will not be thus in heaven. All its inhabitants, being really estimable and amiable, will be constantly esteemed and beloved. We shall no longer be deceived, with regard either to the proper objects of esteem and friendship, or the proper means of inspiring them with the same sentiments towards ourselves.

Endued with the most excellent faculties, far more susceptible than we now are of moral pleasures; zealous imitators of the great God, whom we shall then see continually "face to face;" we shall love all who approach him; those innumerable beings who surround his throne, we shall love with a warmth, a delicacy, and a constancy, which we can but imperfectly conceive in this world. God loves us better, infinitely better, than the most tender father loves his only son. We shall learn of him our fraternal love: regarding all his creatures as his children, we shall feel for them that peculiar affection with which we are naturally inspired for every object, considered by those who are dear to us as worthy of theirs.

We shall love all our fellow-creatures, every intelligent being, for God, and in God. Every circumstance also will concur to promote our union and mutual affection.

Here it is quite otherwise; there are frequently jarring interests, misunderstandings, obscurities, and difficulties, in our affairs and our claims, discussions on property, oppressive customs, tyrannical prejudices on the point of honour, and false notions respecting the designs and sentiments of others: from hence arise fears and suspicions; and then, how much time is requisite, how many obstacles must be surmounted, in order to be secure of the regard of our fellow-creatures. Every one knows the danger we incur of making an improper choice, and of misplacing our confidence; and how difficult it is to prevent others from distrusting us.

There are also jealousies and wars between entire nations; the disadvantageous opinions, the enmities, which a trifle suddenly produces, are fomented and increased through succeeding ages; in a word, innumerable events, both public and private, destroy mutual affection, or render it feeble, partial, and limited.

However well disposed we may be, it is not possible for this affection to prevail in our hearts with all the force, and to all the extent, of which it is capable. Either from a deficiency of deserving objects, or from various accidental causes, it seldom happens, in the course of a long life, that we acquire more than two or three friends towards whom we can indulge it without constraint or diminution; some defect, some trifling circumfluence, restrains or interrupts it; and even in the happiest friendships, the impossibility of continually enjoying the society of all the objects of our affection, the necessity of separating from some in order to associate with others, render our tenderest connexions in this world sources of pain as well as of pleasure.

In the mutual services which we render to each other here below, there are generally several imperfections: perhaps we defer them too long; we do not extend them to the utmost; in conferring a favour we may fail to observe a proper delicacy, and give pain to the person obliged by our manner of bestowing a benefit; when we have been great benefactors, we are apt almost insensibly to assume an authority, which those who are the objects of our kindness feel, without venturing to complain of it.

On the other side, those who have received obligations though really equitable, and sincerely disposed to gratitude, are often deceived with regard to the true value of the favours bestowed: various suspicions respecting the motive of the benefit, some trifling error in the manner of conferring it, some inattention to that subtle essence which constitutes the gracious in word or action; or, finally, that ascendancy which the benefactor gains, and of which he sometimes makes an improper use: all these disturb and weaken gratitude, discourage and abate affection.

How uncommon is perfect mutual affection here below! Besides various subjects for reciprocal distrust, what a trifle disquiets us! And those almost imperceptible defects, which occasion slight mortifications, few people are sufficiently unprejudiced to discover clearly in themselves, or to bear with meekness and thankfulness to be told of them by others; and how few are there who can eradicate them entirely!

In conversation, and in our social recreations, many little difficulties arise, which greatly diminish the pleasure they might afford. Such are, the constraint often imposed upon us; our uncertainty of what attentions, or what subjects of discourse, would be the most acceptable; the reserve, the indifference, the ignorance of some; the excessive vivacity and arrogance of others; amusements ill chosen, in which we neglect and offend some person, because a separate interest interposes; a failure in respect; marked preferences, which render some indifferent, and raise jealousy and indignation in the hearts of others; frequently an impolite eagerness, which leads several persons to speak at the same time, to interrupt each other, or to suffer no one to be heard but themselves. By these means the most interesting conversations degenerate into broken sentences, without order, and without consistency; or change into tedious soliloquies, which reduce a man of taste to solitary meditation in the midst of a large company; as few people have attained to that perfect politeness which can give a long and uninterrupted attention to that which is disagreeable or uninteresting, notwithstanding it is so necessary to the real comfort of life: all this creates disgust, restlessness, impatience, and a desire to be elsewhere.

These, and a thousand grief's minute as these,
Corrode our comfort, and destroy our ease.

It would be an endless task to enumerate the various unpleasant circumstances which intrude themselves into society, even amongst those who have always the inclination to render it agreeable, and talents to enable them to do so.

That all these inconveniencies will be excluded from heaven, we shall be convinced, when we consider the difference of our faculties, sentiments, and situation there. An unbounded confidence, united hearts, souls open to each other, celestial benevolence; a sovereign contempt for those vain distinctions which flatter our confined imaginations here below; a pure and ardent affection, and in consequence of that, an unwearied endeavour to promote the happiness of our fellow-creatures, by gratifying to the utmost of our power their inclinations and tastes; inclinations well-regulated and amiable, tastes corrected and refined, and which we shall discover distinctly at the first interview: it appears evident to me, that with all these favourable circumstances, a real and reasonable politeness, that politeness which, proceeding from the heart where charity reigns, excludes all troublesome formalities, and exerts the most obliging attentions, will universally prevail amongst such beings as the inhabitants of heaven must be supposed to be.

Not only an opposition of interests can have no place there, but on the contrary, all our interests must necessarily be united. If the objects which might be profitable to us, were sufficiently abundant to be equally useful to us all; or if they were of such a nature, that each of us might obtain the possession of them, without destroying or diminishing that of others; if every one, satisfied with his own present pleasures, patiently waiting 'till his lawful exertions should procure greater for him, regarded those of others with no view but to congratulate them sincerely upon their enjoyment of them: in short, if the happiness of each individual, far from being prejudicial to others, augmented the felicity of all; and if every affection, con-centered in the Supreme Being, tended in conformity with his to promote that universal felicity, it is evident that each particular interest, instead of opposing the general advantage, would be closely connected with it; and that common interest would unite every heart by indissoluble bands.

This will be our situation in heaven; there our mutual affection, strengthened by our progress in knowledge and virtue, animated by the presence and by the love of God, encouraged by all around us, free from all impediments, and secure from all indifference,—will be more ardent and tender towards each individual of the blessed, than that which we now feel for the most beloved friend. Amongst so many millions of associates in felicity, we shall not exclude one from this universal regard; yet the multiplicity of the objects of our friendship will not diminish its force. We may be convinced of this, as we have many examples here below which in some measure prove it to us. A father and mother who have a numerous family, or a person who passes his life amidst a circle of chosen friends, may afford us these examples. The parents love their children, the friend his friends, without any individual depriving the rest of the sentiments due to them; they love them all sincerely and tenderly; they cannot lose one of them without feeling a severe pang. I do not say that they have an equal affection for them all; that is not necessary; and I am far from supporting that particular friendships will be excluded from heaven. There, probably, as well as upon earth, will be those singular affinities, and favourable concurrences, which, united with true merit, form those friendships, so intimate, so precious, and so uncommon, the mere idea of which is ever soothing to the soul. Will those who by the most diligent exertions have established such an union upon earth, lose the fruit of all their cares in the mansions of glory and happiness? Surely not.

There thy bright train, immortal friendship, soar,
No more to part, to mingle tears no more!
And, as the softening hand of time endears
The joys and sorrows of our infant years;
So there the soul, releas'd from human strife,
Smiles at the little cares and ills of life;
Its lights and pliaades, its sunshine and its flow'rs,
As at a dream that charm'd her vacant hours.

The imagination, ever active, ever inquisitive, loves to anticipate futurity, and to form airy scenes of happiness, which, when they relate to this world alone, frequently fade and vanish away. But when we extend our views to the realms of everlasting felicity, we may safely indulge ourselves in contemplating the enchanting prospects, which, founded on faith, and illuminated by hope, will become brighter on a nearer approach, increasing more and more unto the perfect day. We may anticipate the happiness we shall there derive from the renewal of our earthly friendships; and such reflections will console the afflicted heart, when every other comfort fails.

When a fond parent weeps over a departed child, what consolation can the world afford? Let us suppose that child to be the only son of his mother, and she a widow, in vain her friends attempt to soothe her sorrows; they cannot awaken in her soul those transporting sensations which the fond caresses of her child continually excited; sensations which only parents feel. But when she looks beyond the grave, when she contemplates her once suffering infant transformed into an angel of light, she submits with pious resignation to the will of her heavenly Father; while she meditates with rapture on that period, when her soul, disengaged from the fetters of mortality, shall ascend to the throne of God, and be welcomed to whose blissful regions by a glorious angel, once the innocent cause of her tears, but thenceforth the sweet companion and joyful promoter of her eternal felicity!

How often is a son deprived of an affectionate and virtuous father, at that early period of life, when, assailed by temptations, and deceived by false appearances, a prudent guardian is most requisite to guide his steps in safety through surrounding dangers. What must be the transport of such a father, when he shall meet his son entering into the regions of celestial peace, to receive the reward of a virtuous and holy life; and shall hear him acknowledge the advantages he had received from those principles of piety, and those examples of virtue, by which his paternal care had established his heart in the right way, during the years of childhood; which had influenced his conduct to the last moment of his mortal existence, had pointed out to him the path of life, and taught him to pass with religious courage through the valley of the shadow of death!

What must be the feelings of the pious pastor, when he shall meet those happy spirits over whom he had watched in this life with parental care and tenderness; to whom he had displayed, in their most attractive colours, the sacred doctrines of the gospel: the timid, whom he had inspired with confidence; the discontented, whom he had armed with patience; the despairing, whom he had soothed with hope; the ignorant, whom he had blest with instruction; the careless, whom he had awakened to watchfulness; the proud, whom he had converted to humility. How will he rejoice to behold their felicity, and to hear them acknowledge their gratitude to him, while with religious joy he shall behold in himself the accomplishment of that promise of scripture, "they that turn many to righteousness, shall shine as the stars for ever and ever."

Those whose precepts and example have extended beyond the short duration of their own life, and the narrow sphere in which they moved upon earth; whose writings have defended the truths of religion against the attacks of false philosophy, and asserted the cause of pure morality in defiance of licentious sophistry; will offer continual praises to the Lord who giveth wisdom, who enabled them to employ their talents to his glory; and whilst in heaven they rejoice in the effects of their labours, with those glorified spirits who had derived instruction from them upon earth, they will find confirmed this sacred truth, that "the fear of the Lord is the beginning of wisdom, and the praise of it endureth for ever."

Perhaps some difference of opinion, some unfortunate misunderstanding, had separated on earth those who once were tenderly attached to each other; circumstances, which could not be explained, had weakened esteem, and interrupted friendship; but when all the mists of error shall vanish before the light of truth, and the man whose conduct had been unjustly blamed in this world, shall be acknowledged by his gracious master as his good and faithful servant, With what rapture will that friendship be renewed, which no doubts, no suspicion, can ever more disturb: while those whose tender attachment, founded on mutual esteem, and confirmed by continual proofs of reciprocal affection, had remained unshaken, even by that stroke of death which separated them for a time, will, when they shall meet in the heavenly mansions, look forward to the everlasting enjoyment of those blessings which flow from the indulgence of the social affections, and above all, from virtuous friendship. They will fear no interruption to their felicity; for time, and all its attendant cares and sorrows, will be swallowed up in eternity, and perfect happiness will be their everlasting inheritance:

That holy calm, that harmony of mind,
Where purity and peace immingle charms.

Such an union supposes an assemblage on both sides of every virtue; a fervent piety and steadfast probity, an extent, a delicacy of benevolence, and of social affections, which, without being able absolutely to conquer defects and weaknesses, induce us without difficulty mutually to endure and pardon them. The general effects of these dispositions and sentiments will continue for ever; and why not then this particular intimacy, so similar to that which will unite every soul in heaven? Will not a connexion, founded on the same basis as our eternal felicity, endure like that for ever and ever? This pleasing hope constitutes here below the most soothing, the most solid consolation of those friends who are separated by death: it prevents this king of terrors, that terrible enemy of all those who live without hope, and without God in the world, from depriving us, by the very idea of his approach, of the transporting pleasures of friendship. We may believe that this sweet hope will not deceive us; but that, like all the others which are founded upon the goodness of God, and upon what there is in ourselves most laudable, and most worthy of his approbation, it will never be destroyed, until that which is perfect being come, that which is in part shall be done away and Faith be lost in sight, and hope in joy!

It appears from several texts of scripture, that a difference of rank prevails amongst the angels (See Rom. viii. 38. Ephes. i. 21. Col. i. 26); and the same difference between the blessed in heaven seems to be alluded to by our Saviour (Matt. xi. j1; xxv. 21 } 23. Also, Luke xix. i; 19).

The inequality of rank which we have reason to believe will be established amongst the glorified spirits, will not create envy or jealousy in our purified souls. These odious passions arise only from a conflict of real or of imaginary interests, and from the abuse of a noble ambition, which is inseparable from an intelligent being. But a conflict of real interests will have no place in heaven; and imaginary opposition will, without doubt, be equally excluded from thence, for it proceeds only from our errors. With regard to that ambition which is natural to us, that constant desire to exalt and improve ourselves, we ought to cherish and encourage it; but when we direct that improperly, which is in itself so worthy of us, when we suffer ourselves to be governed by an extravagant and impetuous imagination, we persuade ourselves that the exaltation of another debases us, that his superior felicity diminishes our own; and, judging only by a foolish comparison, we imagine that to prevent others from equalling or excelling us, is to advance ourselves, and that our happiness will be augmented, in proportion as theirs is diminished. These false and cruel ideas will not enter into the abode of the blessed; all will be rectified there, and the noblest sentiments will prevail in their utmost purity and lustre.

If envy were not totally eradicated from our minds, an equality of rank amongst the inhabitants of heaven would not prevent it from exerting its baneful influence: even if we were exalted far above all created beings, yet then the Creator himself would become the object of our envy, which, regardless of the height to which we had already attained, would still aspire to be supreme.

Yet all his good proved ill in me,
And wrought but malice; lifted up so high
I disdained subjection, and thought one step higher
Would set me highest. (Milton)

If in heaven we should be subject to envy, our felicity there would be infinitely more precarious, and frequently more imperfect, than that which we enjoy upon earth. The difference of degrees of dignity or pleasure here cannot be compared with that which we shall meet with there; or, in other words, the objects which we here regarded as objects of envy, will then be far more numerous and considerable.

There is generally in this world a balance of good and evil, which reduces our several lots almost to an equality. In heaven, on the contrary, there will probably be degrees of rank infinitely varied. It is true that there will not be any real evils; but an envious man would create as many imaginary ills as he should find beings superior to himself, and imaginary evils produce real misery, since then envy would necessarily be productive of unhappiness, it must be excluded from those peaceable realms, where God has fixed the throne of his glory, and where concord and mutual affection will be amongst the principal sources and supports of the universal felicity. And therefore that odious passion, as well as jealousy, covetousness, and all which are connected with it, are so expressly, so strongly, and so frequently pointed out in the scriptures, as incompatible with that purity of heart which shall make us heirs of the kingdom of heaven.

In the presence of God, and amidst the angels and glorified Saints, every one entirely free from these hateful sentiments, will be content with his lot; every one, will rejoice in the superior felicity of others. It belongs only to the heavenly virtues of humility and charity, to diffuse over our hearts, through all eternity, this admirable source of tranquillity and joy: we can form but a very imperfect idea of that treasure of happiness, that amazing variety of pleasures, with which this alone will enrich the mansions of immortality. One of my fellow creatures makes a discovery which delights him; I also enjoy it with him. Another, superior to us both, communicates to me some new augmentation of his grandeur and felicity; I participate in it in the same manner: thus I in some measure appropriate to myself all the happiness of heaven.

Here below, either because our generous sentiments are far inferior to those which we shall then possess, because the felicity of others as well as our own is too much blended with sorrow to claim great congratulations, or because that being too much occupied with our own affairs, and our own troubles, we can only receive slightly and transiently the agreeable impressions of an affectionate sympathy; those pleasures which we derive merely from our knowledge of the pleasures of others, are seldom very lively or very numerous. But these obstacles will cease in heaven: our hearts, purified and tranquil, having no other occupation than to indulge agreeable sentiments, will yield to them without reserve, and each of us shall enjoy the happiness of all the rest.

In this world there are few to whom we wish to display all the emotions of joy which we experience. Frequently we fear that our friends might find the subject frivolous, and enter into it with a degree of coldness and indifference which would give us pain; and if the person to whom we wish to open our whole soul, is much less happy than ourselves, we can scarcely avoid fearing that our lot might lead him to reflect upon his own, and might mingle with his joy a secret mortification. We may suspect that he is capable of some emotions of envy, because we feel a consciousness that we are so ourselves. But such doubts can have no place in heaven. After what I have said, to enlarge upon each particular would be only repetition.

The people of China and Japan imagine that it is impossible for us to be perfectly happy, whilst we see others excel us in talents, and surpass us in felicity. To reconcile this idea with the happiness of heaven, they suppose that, by an agreeable illusion, every one will there persuade himself that he is more favoured and more happy than the rest.

This proceeds from an ignorance, or at least a very imperfect knowledge, of the wonderful effects which are produced by those two excellent virtues, which shine forth with such lustre in the gospel,—humility and charity. Into what absurd mistakes do they fall respecting true happiness, when they attribute it to illusion and deceit! And what should we gain by this ridiculous stratagem? We should destroy one of the most abundant sources of our celestial pleasure.

God has given me a being, he has given me a soul; he offers me a felicity which is sufficient to gratify it entirely. Shall I counteract this felicity? Shall I mingle bitterness with it, because I know that there are spirits susceptible of more extensive happiness? Far from complaining of this, I admire his goodness the more; I give him thanks with the greatest sincerity for the blessings which he has bestowed on others; this gratitude constitutes a part of the very small return which it is in my power to make to him, for those he has bestowed on me.

My thankfulness towards him, my benevolence and tender affection towards all the rest of the blessed, who love me perhaps even to a greater degree than I love them, are essential parts of my happiness. Shall I envy their glory or felicity, because it is superior to my own? Ah, rather, how should I rejoice to be able to exalt them still higher! But I do enjoy this divine pleasure; my sentiments augment their happiness. I exercise their sublimest faculties; that which inclines my heart towards them, animates and increases their affection for me; they exert their talents to please me; I afford them the delightful employment of endeavouring to become useful to me. Thus they are indebted to me for a part of that joy which arises from being perfect in love, as I am indebted to them for the gratitude and affection with which they inspire me.

This is assuredly the light in which we shall consider these things in heaven, and such the sentiments which will prevail there.

Then there will be no necessity for a concurrence of circumstances to form this delightful union of hearts: at the first meeting, at the first sight of an inhabitant of heaven, we shall feel a mutual attachment, and shall be one heart and one spirit.

In the immense regions of immortality my curiosity leads me to seek those who are unknown to me; friends whom I have never seen. I arrive amongst them; immediately all press around me, and every one endeavours to the utmost of his power to procure me pleasure. My satisfaction animates their zeal; and their generous and tender joy is the most delightful source of mine. I meet, every where with innumerable multitudes, but never with an enemy. All those who see me, immediately wish to add to my happiness; it is their first idea, their prevailing inclination, their predominant passion. They know that my heart is inspired with the same sentiments towards them; we give reciprocal assurances of affectionate attachment, and enjoy the delightful pleasures of virtuous friendship.

This sweet sentiment will be continually augmenting; and what warmth, what delicacy, what wise and benevolent attentions, will be displayed to increase our mutual love, and to vary our mutual pleasures! One of the occupations to which we shall apply with the greatest ardour, will be to discover, and turn to advantage, every thing which can promote and extend the happiness of others.

In the present state of things it is not possible to conceive the degree of tranquillity, content, and pleasure, which will accompany that universal and reciprocal affection; especially if we suppose it infinitely more animated, as well as more pure, than it could be here below, even if all mankind were perfectly virtuous; and we must imagine that it will be so, in consequence of the great superiority of our celestial dispositions, of the additional motives which we shall then have, and of the many favourable circumstances which we shall there meet with.

If any person doubts whether these admirable sentiments of fraternal love will prevail in heaven, and desires a confirmation of it from scripture, he may be easily satisfied. I shall not insist upon the proofs which reason alone affords. All which I have said of our social dispositions, of our natural affections, of the principal sources of our pleasures, and of our ideas of the infinite number of the inhabitants of heaven, offer these proofs at first sight to every attentive person; but let us consider what light revelation affords to confirm our conjectures on this interesting subject.

After this I beheld, and lo! a great multitude, which no man could number, of all nations, and kindreds, and people, and tongues, stood before the throne and before the Lamb, clothed with white robes, and palms in their hands. They are before the throne of God, and serve him day and night in his temple; and he that sitteth on the throne shall dwell among them.

Ye are come unto mount Sion, and unto the city of the living God, the heavenly Jerusalem; and to an innumerable company of angels, to the general assembly and church of the first-born which are written in heaven, and to God the judge of all, and to the spirits of just men made perfect, and to Jesus the mediator of the new covenant.

If it be alledged that these passages do not absolutely express the mutual affection of the blessed, yet they certainly imply it; and even without admitting these as proofs, we shall still find as many as are necessary. St. Paul, in the epistle to the Ephesians, strongly expresses this spiritual union, by a metaphorical allusion to an edifice, firmly founded, founded, and elegantly constructed. "Now therefore ye are no more strangers and foreigners, but fellow-citizens with the saints, and of the household of God; and are built upon the foundation of the apostles and prophets, Jesus Christ himself being the chief corner stone; in whom all the building, fitly framed together, groweth. into an holy temple in the Lord: in whom ye also are builded together for an habitation of God, through the spirit." In the Epistle to the Colossians, he says, "Above all put on charity, which is the bond of perfectness. And let the peace of God rule in your hearts, to the which also ye are called in one body." St. John says, "He that loveth not, knoweth not God, for God is love; and he that dwelleth in love, dwelleth in God, and God in him." And St. Paul's admirable description of that "charity which never faileth," comprehends all the sentiments which I have particularized.

We may then conclude, that the social pleasures which we shall enjoy in heaven, will be uninterrupted and perfect; not producing that immoderate and impetuous joy which sometimes accompanies them here, and which is more frequently the effect of thoughtless levity, than the expression of real satisfaction; for true content is tranquil, and the most heartfelt pleasure serious; but our joy in heaven will be an eternal serenity, animated by the most delightful transports. No tumult, no confusion, none of that turbulent mirth which exhausts the spirits of those who feel it, and embarrasses and wearies those who feel it not; but an universal tranquillity, a sweet satisfaction; a joy, lively, yet calm; pleasures sensible and animated, but pure, and always accompanied with that amiable circumspection which a tender friendship inspires; sentiments exquisite and inexpressible, yet free from violence; sentiments which will impel us, not to introduce discord amidst the universal harmony of hearts, but to improve that harmony more and more, and to raise it to a degree of perfection, infinitely above the most enchanting image which the brightened imagination can trace. For we shall not "love in word, neither in tongue, but in deed, and in truth. We shall have fellowship one with another, and our fellowship will be with the Father, and with his son Jesus Christ."

Part IV

Let us now consider some of the celestial pleasures which we shall derive more immediately from our own reflections, and from some other circumstances which I have not had an opportunity of mentioning, and which will greatly add to our happiness in heaven.

Memory is a kind of restoration of the past: when we feel, or foresee as certain, effects of a distant cause, which no longer exists, this gives in some measure a new existence to that cause, and places it again before us. When this relates to an action which we have performed, and which it was in our own power to have avoided, the idea or recollection of that action is a present source of pleasing or of painful sentiments, according to the consequences of that conduct which we recall to our remembrance. No situation can be more dreadful, than a state of misery towards which we have voluntarily directed our steps for a long time, and into which we have at length plunged ourselves. Whatever may be the torment which we endure, our greatest suffering consists in the reproaches of our conscience. And in the same manner, in a happy situation, at which we have arrived by attentions and exertions, full of circumspection, prudence, and assiduity, some of our most agreeable reflections arise from self-approbation. The more difficulties we have surmounted, and the more dangers we have avoided, the more perfectly we enjoy the happiness acquired.

Such is our sensibility to what is proper and reasonable, that independently of the success of our actions, we feel pleasure or sorrow according to the conduct we have pursued. If we have done what ought naturally to bring upon us great misfortunes, as the loss of reputation, fortune, or health; and if, contrary to the common course of things, these misfortunes have not befallen us,—yet there still remains a severe punishment in our own breast; we are secretly of the esteem which the world expresses for us, we cannot help inwardly confessing that we have not deserved it; our possessions appear to us to be in some measure unjustly acquired; our health a blessing which we ought not to enjoy; at least we certainly do not experience the comfort and satisfaction which we should feel without these humiliating reflections. And if, instead of losing any thing, though we deserved to be deprived of all, we have on the contrary obtained rewards which were due only to qualities of which we have been entirely destitute, or to efforts which we have not exerted, we then profit with regret from the ignorance of our superiors, who, by exalting us, have perhaps been guilty of injustice towards a more worthy object. That reward, however great it may be, can afford us only inconsiderable pleasure, in comparison of what those who had deserved it would enjoy.

On the contrary, such is the power and influence of self-approbation, that it alleviates the greatest calamities. To be able to say with truth, "This is not my fault; I have acted with all possible prudence to avoid this misfortune; I have not departed from my integrity;" this disarms our sorrows of their sting, and almost converts them into comforts. So delightful is the pleasure of self-esteem and approbation, that when our misfortunes are the effects of our virtues, which sometimes happens amidst the disorders of the present world, then they change their nature and cease to be evils, Are we poor? Perhaps it is because we have restored to the right owners, though not compelled to it by the law, that wealth which our predecessors had gained by rapine and extortion; our poverty then becomes a treasure, of more value than thousands of gold and silver. If in the cause of religion or virtue we should lose friends or reputation, yet, "if our heart condemn us not, and we have confidence towards God," we may console ourselves for the loss of esteem and regard, with the soothing reflections arising from a good conscience; trusting that He to whom all hearts are open, will in a future world, when the mists of error shall be dispelled, bring forth our "righteousness as the light, and our just dealing as the noon-day."

With what pleasure shall we reflect in heaven upon the various temptations we have resisted, and the numerous evils we have endured, in pursuing with fortitude and perseverance the path tending towards that felicity, to which we have at length attained. Thus delightfully shall we enjoy the past, and, all evil having ceased, "God shall wipe away all tears from our eyes." We shall possess, without any abatement, the fruit of our cares and exertions; and that approbation of our own conscience, which on earth had seldom been greater than to afford us consolation in our calamities, shall become in heaven a pure and sensible pleasure; a pleasure which reason will no longer oppose, or humility condemn; for we are there no longer to "work out our own salvation with fear and trembling," but to obey the call of our glorified Master:— "Come ye blessed of my Father, inherit the kingdom prepared for you, from the foundation of the world."

More impressed with the beauty of virtue than we were, or could be, here below, we shall not only rejoice in our self-approbation, with regard to the past, but we shall anticipate this celestial pleasure in an everlasting futurity; for we shall be assured of preserving it inviolate, and of augmenting it continually, through eternal ages. Upon earth, alas! we feel this pleasure but very imperfectly. One day distinguished by some great victory over our own heart, one day on which we can reflect with self-approbation, is a truly valuable day, and may almost be compared to those which we shall pass in heaven. But through our negligence and weakness, these days seldom arrive, and even when they do, our joy is abated by some melancholy recollection of the past, and by the fear which it occasions that the next day may referable those numerous preceding ones, which have been stained with sin. We can, therefore, form but a faint idea of that transporting felicity which will proceed from the constant self-approbation which we shall enjoy in that illustrious assembly of saints, where our most ardent desire will be to advance "from glory to glory," "unto the measure of the stature of the fullness of Christ."

This boundless prospect of happiness will be enjoyed in perfect security. Here below the idea of our mortality, and of our subjection to corporeal pains, constantly accompanies us. We are sensible every moment that that some accident may arrive the next, to deprive us of the fleeting breath of life; and that however happily we may escape from the dangers which hover continually around us, yet in a short space of time we must necessarily become a prey to decay and death. Our occupations both of business and pleasure frequently lead us into perils; while terror and anxiety diminish our enjoyments, and intrude into almost every circumstance of life.

In heaven we shall no longer be subject to the wars of elements, or to those more terrible revolutions which arise from the passions of mankind, and bring in their train miseries and destruction; miseries more formidable, and destruction more frequent, than are produced by infectious diseases, ferocious animals, animals, overflowing seas, or contending storms.

Fate, armed with thunder, fire, and every plague,
That ruins, tortures, or distracts mankind,
And makes the happy wretched in an hour,
Overwhelms you not with woes so terrible
As your own wrath. (Armstrong)

The present state of things renders it impossible, even with the greatest care, to avoid misfortunes; and mankind are in general so indiscreet and inconsiderate, as not to reflect what evil their conduct may bring upon others. Is it surprising then, that, even without enmity, we are continually crossing and clashing with each other, and that our negligence occasions various evils, which a small degree of prudence would have prevented?

Without misfortune, what calamities!
And what hostilities, without a foe!
Nor are foes wanting to the best on earth.
But endless is the list of human ills,
And sighs might sooner fail, than cause to sigh.

But even in this life misfortunes would be much less frequent, if mankind were united by that bond of mutual affection, which our Saviour earnestly recommends to his disciples as their peculiar distinction. "By this shall all men know that ye are my disciples, if ye have love one to another." Such misfortunes cannot therefore have place in an abode where the tumults both of the natural and moral world will subside into peace, and we shall "love our neighbour as ourselves."

We cannot perhaps, here below, form an adequate idea of the pleasure arising from perfect security. It is impossible to enjoy such a state on earth, and therefore we cannot acquire a just idea of the satisfaction and joy which must accompany the assurance of an absolute exemption from all danger. We are so far from being able to acquire perfect tranquillity in this world, that, on the contrary, the moment we reflect on that which we do experience, it appears so ill-founded, that we immediately lose it, and can recover it only by ceasing to reflect. I am in health to-day, but am I certain that I shall be so to-morrow? The friend whose society is now so delightful to me, in a few days perhaps may be snatched from me by death. In short, if we were to meditate on all the probable dangers which threaten us every moment, upon what basis should we found our tranquillity? It is true, that many persons live without fear, even when they are threatened with various misfortunes; they are inattentive to the dangers which surround them, and this is frequently a real advantage; an advantage, which, if we did not all possess in some degree, our mortal life would be a state of constant suffering; and it is probably for this reason, that the Creator has concealed futurity from our view.

But the most fearless do not, neither can they, enjoy that rational tranquillity which proceeds from the conviction of being in a state of security which nothing can alter. Such a state is inconsistent with this life; and therefore it is evident that we cannot here enjoy that species of tranquillity, of which that state alone can be the source and foundation.

It is only by looking forward with confidence to a perfect and eternal state, that we can acquire real tranquillity here below. Notwithstanding our natural repugnance to pain, and every kind of adversity, such is the force of religion, that by her powerful influence we may conquer that repugnance, whenever it would interfere with our duty; and we shall not only prove our religious courage when we are called forth to active exertions, but we shall possess the more difficult virtue of passive fortitude, which will induce us to submit with patience and resignation to every apparent misfortune, and even to rejoice in it. Then only can we enjoy a tranquillity in some measure resembling the felicity of heaven, when "casting all our care" upon Providence, in the full assurance that "He careth for us," we build our confidence on this incontestable principle, that whenever God permits misfortunes to befall a virtuous man, it is only as the means of increasing his future happiness; because that, according to the admirable arrangements of his wisdom and goodness, "all things shall work together for good to them that love God."

In heaven, where pain and sorrow shall be no more, and "death shall be swallowed up in victory," we shall feel a sweet security that every danger is past, and that we shall enjoy for ever those pleasures which are at the right hand of God: treasures immortal and immutable, "eternal in the heavens, where neither moth nor rust doth corrupt, and where thieves do not break through nor steal."

This perfect security is so necessary to our felicity, that without it the greatest blessings would become in some measure the source of misery; and even the more deserving they were of our attachment, the more afflictive would be the evil resulting from the possible privation of them.

In the world to come our desires will not exceed their proper limits; and the assurance that they shall be gratified will render them agreeable sentiments, without any mixture of impatience. I have already remarked, that, in order to enjoy a felicity suited to our nature, we must have desires: a situation without them would be insipid. That which renders them painful is the fear of disappointment, which always accompanies them here; and fear produces impatience. But if we could banish fear, obtain a perfect command over ourselves, and consider seventy years as an almost imperceptible portion of our duration, impatience then would cease; and such will be our situation when we shall arrive in the mansions of immortality. There our desires, being always bounded by reason and virtue, will be always gratified: our love of pleasure will never be at variance with our sense of duty. Without doubt the principal aim of our application and exertions will be, to inform and improve ourselves more and more, and to embrace every opportunity of informing, improving, and rendering more happy, those of our fellow-citizens in the household of God, who may not have made so great a progress as ourselves, or to whom we can be in any degree useful. We shall joyfully sacrifice our own particular gratifications to our social and generous sentiments, whenever circumstances, or our own assertion and benevolence, require such a sacrifice; and this will greatly heighten the pleasure which we shall derive from our noble and exalted sentiments. Labour will be no longer necessary to procure us conveniences and comforts. We shall neither toil nor spin: for we shall dwell in "a city whose builder and maker is God;" we shall be clothed in that "fine linen which is the righteousness of saints;" and we shall eat of those "fruits and drink of that water of life," which shall be "in the midst of the new Jerusalem." Our occupations will therefore only be calculated to promote our felicity; but an attempt to particularize them would be absurd, since we are not sufficiently acquainted with the nature of our celestial sensations, the degree of our faculties, or the species of objects which we shall meet with in heaven. There are in nature innumerable mysteries which are impenetrable to mortal eyes, an infinity of wonderful connexions which our weak understandings cannot trace; we shall then perhaps penetrate those mysteries, and comprehend those connexions.

We may frequently employ ourselves in contemplating the glories of our heavenly abode, which will doubtless afford an everlasting subject for admiration. St. John has given us, in the Revelations, a sublime idea of the magnificence of that habitation, which will be, as he expresses it, "the tabernacle of God with men. The building of the wall of it was of jasper, and the city was pure gold, like unto clear glass; and the foundations of the wall of the city were garnished with all manner of precious stones. And the kings of the earth do bring their glory and honour into it, There shall be no night there; and they shall bring the glory and honour of the nations into it." This figurative description conveys to us, by metaphors adapted to our present conceptions, the most lofty ideas of the grandeur of that holy city, which shall be filled with the glory of God.

The noblest and most delightful of all our occupations will be, to praise and adore that gracious Being, who is the author and giver of every blessing. The angels and saints in heaven are represented to us as continually worshipping God, and ascribing unto Him "glory, and honour, and power." To see this perpetual adoration may appear wearisome; but how little do they understand those exquisite sentiments which arise from a continual meditation upon the felicity we enjoy, and an uninterrupted contemplation of that divine Benefactor from whom alone it proceeds. What transports of gratitude and love will fill our hearts, when we shall behold Him, who, having guided us with his "counsel" through the paths of time, has afterwards received us "to glory" in the mansions of eternity: having given us, who were dead in trespasses and sins, his only begotten Son, that whosoever believeth in him should not perish, "but have everlasting life."

I shall not enlarge further on the nature of our celestial felicity, but conclude with a few general observations.

A situation far inferior to that which I have endeavoured in some degree to describe, would appear to many persons a paradise worthy of our desires. There are in the present life tranquil and happy moments: for example; when in a fine day, in the society of chosen friends, far from the dreadful din of arms, surrounded by objects which flatter the senses, our mind unembarrassed by troublesome affairs, and our heart free from reproach, we enjoy an innocent and interesting conversation; or when in a peaceful and pleasing solitude, meditating without restraint, according to the bent of our dispositions, and the nature of our inclinations, or amusing ourselves with some other favourite occupation, we possess those pleasures which are peculiarly adapted to our turn of mind.

Let us suppose an entire security, a freedom from the usual evils of this life; let us admit a variety of pleasures, but not surpassing in degree those which I have just mentioned; let us suppose also, (for this is absolutely requisite) that we had no promise, nor even the least notion of another life infinitely preferable to the present; we should then look forward with sweet satisfaction to the eternal duration of such a state.

Now, if it be true, that with the single advantage of absolute tranquillity, that is to say, an exemption from all positive evil, and notwithstanding the impossibility of acquiring a proficiency in various sciences, as being incompatible with the present condition of human nature;—if it be true that, in such circumstances, a succession of moderate gratifications, but little varied, and which, at the end of a certain number of years, would be only repetitions of those pleasures which we had already enjoyed, could constitute a desirable paradise;—what idea ought we not to form of those celestial regions, where the least of our pleasures will surpass the most interesting earthly joy; where tranquillity will be accompanied with an endless progress, and the assurance of success in our studies; where we may expect varied and increasing enjoyments; and where consequently, eternity, far from introducing disgust and languor, will add to our glory and felicity a more ample and more exquisite delight?

The ancient heathen writers, and particularly the poets, have left us descriptions of their Elysian fields, and of the golden age. In the latter, simplicity of manners, innocence, peace, freedom from fatiguing occupations, a soil naturally fertile, and seasons mild and serene, constitute the greatest charms of the description. In the Elysian fields, the same images heightened and improved, an exemption from the humiliating necessities of our mortal state, some pleasures adapted to our nature, represent to us another golden age, but in some measure refined. These fictions, though extremely deceptive, interest the most insensible hearts. If we purify them from the mean, the gross, and the imperfect, which must necessarily accompany the description of objects, too nearly resembling those with which we are acquainted upon earth; and if we add to them various advantages which the heathens either could not imagine, or could not represent in all their extent and lustre, for want of ideas, sufficiently sublime, of the Divinity and his designs,—these descriptions may perhaps be regarded as faint sketches of the celestial felicity in its commencement.

What the holy scripture tells us concerning the garden of Eden, and the state in which we suppose mankind would have been, if neither our first parents, nor their posterity, had sinned, presents a very engaging image; yet this cannot give an adequate idea of our future paradise: "far happier place Than this of Eden, and far happier days." (Milton) Man here below, even in a state of innocence, and with the approbation of the Most High, could be only in the infancy of his dignity and happiness. Man, though innocent, would still be but man; the earth would be but a garden; though we should not be subject to death, we could not in this world enjoy immortality to that degree of which our nature would be capable. To confine immortals here below, would not be consistent with that unbounded love which the Almighty testifies towards his creatures: to enjoy a glorious and blissful immortality we must have been transported to some superior abode, or our present habitation must have been considerably improved, in order to be suitable to the purified nature of its inhabitants, when they were become equal unto the angels.

But the pleasures of our celestial paradise will not consist in a limited felicity, a small portion of joy, particles of happiness, (if I may be allowed the expression) of which we might form almost an adequate idea; but in an unbounded joy, surrounding us on every side; in a vast, an immense felicity, arising from pleasures innumerable and unlimited; in the eternal emanations of the power and goodness of the infinite Author of all, and in the "unsearchable riches of Christ;" our dwelling will be with God in boundless realms of bliss, and our society, with innumerable multitudes of intelligent beings, continually advancing, as well as ourselves, in wisdom, glory, and happiness.

With such hopes, and such prospects, we may not only "run with patience the race" which is set before us, but we may go on our way rejoicing:" looking unto "Jesus, the author and finisher of our faith; who, for the joy that was set before him, endured the cross, despising the shame, and is set down at the right hand of the throne of God. Angels, principalities, and powers, being made subject unto him."

Conclusion

To render this Essay more complete, I shall collect into one point of view, the principal objects of that glorious prospect which eternity opens before us, as a recapitulation and summary of my preceding observations and reflections; and if any of them have in the smallest degree engaged the attention of the reader, when only separately considered, I hope, that when thus united, and reflecting on each other a more glorious lustre, they will produce a greater effect, and make a more forcible and more lasting impression.

In heaven, our glorified bodies will be no longer subject to infirmity or decay: all positive evil will cease. Our faculties, being perfected to a degree of which we can at present form no idea, will bring to the soul an endless variety of delightful emotions. In the enjoyment of eternal youth and health, endued perhaps with modes of perception at present as incomprehensible to us as are the pleasures of vision to a man born blind, our senses will no longer be at variance with our reason: the corruptible body will no more press down the soul, but will be the instrument of its happiness. We shall enjoy the pleasure of acquiring and possessing knowledge, unallayed by any of those inconveniencies which accompany them on earth. Our faculties, talents, and assistances, will always be equal to the studies in which we shall employ them: a firm confidence of success in our enquiries and researches will make them so easy to us, that they will be productive of pleasure, unmixed with the slightest degree of fatigue; and being secure of an eternal duration,- we shall not fear any impediment to our advancement in those sublime attainments, which will be the objects of our pursuit in the realms of immortality.

The Supreme Being will always be the principal object of our meditations. Here below we see him darkly; but then we shall see him face to face. The attributes of God, the wonders of creation, the conduct of Providence, the great designs of the Most High, and all those beautiful, sublime, and infinitely diversified objects, in the contemplation of which we feel every moment the weakness of our earthly faculties, will be displayed before us in all their lustre.

At the sight of that immense store of pleasures, of which God will have given us possession, our boundless admiration will be accompanied with the sweetest emotions of gratitude and love. By the recollection of the past, those evils, which can exist no longer but in our memory, will be admirably instrumental in enhancing the value of our happiness, and procuring us a more exquisite enjoyment of it. During this delightful retrospect, we shall look up to that Being, who is the author and finisher of our faith, with transports of gratitude and love, of which our most ardent sensations of piety on earth can give us but a faint idea.

From reflecting on the past, we shall naturally proceed to meditate on the future, and to enjoy the delightful anticipation of those degrees of glory and felicity which we shall not at first possess. Admitted into the presence of God, honoured by his approbation, we shall see in Him, and in every thing around us, the great system of universal felicity: a felicity for ever extending, and for ever increasing. God, who knows our hearts, will place objects before us to exercise our noblest virtues, in all their variety, delicacy, and ardour. Happy in ourselves, and in the happiness of myriads of our fellow-creatures, exulting in the prospect of an eternal augmentation of excellence and felicity, we shall enjoy these inestimable blessings with a warmth, an energy of sentiment, which it is impossible to feel in this imperfect state.

We shall be secure of finding, in each of the blessed, every disposition and assertion towards us which can gratify our social feelings, and our natural desire to love and to be beloved. Strengthened by our progress in knowledge, in virtue, and in amiable sentiments; animated by the presence of our heavenly Father; free from all impediments; secure from all indifference; our affection for each individual of the blessed will be more ardent and tender, than that which we now feel for the most beloved friend: while we have the greatest reason to hope, that every tender and virtuous attachment formed on earth, is the object of it be really deserving of our esteem, will be renewed with augmented ardour, and be enjoyed for ever. No envy, no jealousy, can ever disturb our social happiness. Every one will be contented with his own lot, every one will sincerely rejoice in the superior exaltation of others; and thus we shall in some measure appropriate to ourselves all the happiness of heaven. At the first sight of a glorified spirit, we shall feel a reciprocal attachment; and shall for ever rejoice in the blessings of mutual love.

When we shall reflect on the numerous temptations we have overcome, and the various afflictions we have endured, in our progress towards that felicity to which we have at length attained, we shall enjoy the approbation of our own conscience; and that approbation which on earth had seldom been more than a consolation in adversity, will become in heaven a pure and delightful pleasure;—a pleasure which we shall anticipate in an everlasting futurity; for we shall be secure of preserving it inviolate, and of augmenting it continually, in the constant exercise of virtue.

All these blessings will be accompanied with the certainty that they are ours for ever. In heaven, where pain and sorrow are no more, and death is swallowed up in victory, we shall feel a sweet security that every danger is past: while futurity presents an endless perspective, a boundless field for the exercise of the noblest virtues, and the enjoyment of constantly increasing happiness.

Such are my ideas of the blessings of a future state. I flatter myself that I have not offered, under the sanction of the gospel, any propositions which are not either absolutely asserted, or clearly implied, in the sacred writings; and with regard to my conjectures, I have carefully endeavoured to hazard such only as, sounded on the attributes of God, on the nature of things in general, and on the constitution and situation of the human race in particular, appear to be extremely probable. If I am mistaken in any of these ideas, yet I cannot err in recommending the encouragement of those sentiments which they tend to excite, and the practice of those duties which they are calculated to enforce.

Our life in this world is only a preparation for the next; a state of trial, and of discipline; in which we ought, not only to avoid as much as possible every action which is displeasing to God, but also to acquire virtuous habits, and a taste for every thing which is rational, amiable, and worthy of a being who aspires to become hereafter equal unto the angels. By this principle we may try the value of all our pursuits, of all our pleasures. If our intellectual and moral improvements in this world tend to the perfecting our felicity in that which is to come, it necessarily follows that our most important business here below, is to enlighten our understanding, and to improve our heart; which may be as effectually accomplished by the active member of society, as by the sedentary recluse. Religion does not oblige us to renounce the common occupations, or the innocent pleasures of life. A proper attention to the former is often a great and important duty; and the latter are the showers which Providence has scattered, in the narrow, and often thorny path of virtue.

But let not the cares of this life engage our whole attention; let not pleasure be considered as our business. In a state which I have already called the infancy of our existence, our heavenly Father acts like a kind and tender parent; indulging us in every pleasure which is not contrary to our more important interests, but leading us to pursue such as will form our minds to happiness and virtue.

The father who consults the real good of his child, will cultivate his taste, his understanding, his virtuous affections, at the moment when he appears only felicitous to amuse him. The sports of infancy must not be cruel; they must not be such as feed the selfish passions, and counteract the great ends of education. Instruction may be united with pleasure, and reason may gain strength while fancy is amused. The tender guardian will never lose sight of the permanent advantage of his pupil; the child must remember that he is born to be a man.

Such is our situation on earth; and the comparison may give us a faint idea of the gracious designs of our heavenly Father. Since the bountiful hand of Providence has bestowed upon us innumerable blessings, and placed us in the midst of objects calculated to gratify our various tastes and inclinations, as far as is consistent with those great designs which regard our eternal felicity, we cannot surely render ourselves unacceptable to Him, when we enjoy with gratitude the gifts he has vouchsafed to offer us, or exult in the pleasing consequences of those virtues, which, by his grace, we have been enabled to perform. Let the rich and prosperous rejoice in the blessings which God has given them; the wealth which is spent in relieving distress, in encouraging science and virtue, or in promoting the innocent pleasures of society, and affording to a fellow-creature one agreeable hour, will not be lost. Whenever we contribute to the happiness of others, we cultivate sentiments which to all eternity will form a part of our own. Let philosophy extend its researches, let genius indulge the enthusiasm of a warm imagination; all that is beautiful, all that is sublime, in the productions of art, or the works of nature, all contribute to raise the mind to Him from whom they immediately or ultimately proceed, and to fix the attention on those more glorious scenes, where alone real perfection can be found.

And ye, whose hearts are formed to feel the sweet emotions of friendship and benevolence, to you I address myself with peculiar satisfaction. Let not the cold maxims of unfeeling skepticism check your enjoyment of pleasures in which angels share. The example, the positive command, of the great Author of our salvation, calls us to love one another. "The charities of father, son, and brother," the tender ties of friendship, the warm philanthropy, "which scarce collective man can fill," all are the glorious fruits of that religion of which the distinguishing characteristic is charity. Fear not the sorrows which, in this state of trial, will be blended with the highest transports which the human mind is capable of feeling. The object of your tenderest attachment may be doomed to suffer, may be removed from you by death; even the Saviour of the world wept for his Lazarus, and all his disciples must be ready to resign every blessing they enjoy, when they are called to take up the cross and follow him. But these light afflictions are but for a moment: the friends who are parted on earth will again unite in heaven to part no more: the gentle heart, which now bleeds at the sight of human miseries, will there enjoy for ever the enchanting spectacle of universal happiness.

These are pleasures which reason does not blush to own, and which religion does not forbid us to enjoy: and shall we exchange these pleasures for follies which disgrace our understanding, and vices which corrupt our heart; which afford no real satisfaction in possession, and which must soon perish forever? In a few years the delusive objects of vanity, avarice, and ambition, will lose their deceitful splendor; and all the glittering treasures, which are so often purchased at the expense of honour and virtue, will appear as contemptible to the poor wretch who now pursues them, as the toys which amused his infancy.

Thrones will then be toys,
And earth and sides seem dust upon the scale.

The Christian, whose faith is fixed upon the happiness of a future state, is prepared and enabled to support with unshaken constancy, and entire resignation to the will of God, the evils of the present life. The heaviest appear to him insignificant; the most lingering, but transient. Far from obstructing his progress towards the heavenly Canaan, they will advance and accelerate it. He submits, with religious patience and pious fortitude, to the deprivation of worldly consorts, while he trusts that he shall receive a recompense for them in the realms of purest happiness. To arrive in those regions of felicity, is the principal, is almost the sole object of his desires. One step in the way which leads to heaven, is productive of far greater advantages than a thousand directed only towards the acquisitions and pleasures of this world. Those "treasures" which are "laid up in heaven," are the only "true riches." To connect religion with every circumstance in life, to make it the companion of our gayest as well as our gravest hours, is to pursue the path which will conduct us to real and permanent felicity: it is to secure a present satisfaction, preferable to every other enjoyment our mortal slate can afford. The least important, as well as the most material blessings proceed equally from God, and require our grateful acknowledgments; and we cannot truly enjoy any pleasure which we do not sincerely believe to be authorized by Him "who giveth us richly all things to enjoy." The pursuit in which we cannot ask his protection must be criminal; the pleasure for which we dare not thank Him cannot be innocent. This habitual piety appears to be the proper offering of a Christian; who ought to be always employed in the service of God, and who fulfils his will, as much when he enjoys with gratitude the blessings he has given, as when he supports with fortitude the trials which are sent by the same all-gracious hand.

We are too apt to yield to indolence in virtue, and to negligence in piety; which may be productive of the most fatal consequences. They are the most common, and at the same time the most dangerous, spiritual diseases of the sincere Christian. They insensibly lay the soul asleep, and that sleep threatens us with death. The most religious man requires frequent admonitions and precautions against those enemies of his soul. On this account St. Peter thus addresses himself to his fellow-Christians: "I will not be negligent to put you always in remembrance of these things, though ye know them, and be established in the truth. Yea, I think it meet, as long as I am in this tabernacle, to stir you up by putting you in remembrance. Moreover, I will endeavour that ye may be able, after my decease, to have these things always in remembrance."

Let us then exert ourselves with courage, with ardour, and an uninterrupted perseverance, to acquire all the glory, all the felicity, of which we can be susceptible in the life to come: "forgetting those things that are behind, and reaching forth unto those things which are before, let us"press towards the mark, for the prize of the high calling of God in Christ Jesus." "Let us not faint; but, though our outward man perish, let us pray that the inward man may be renewed day by day. Then"our light affliction, which is but for a moment, shall work out for us "a far more exceeding and eternal weight of glory: while we look not at the things which are seen, but at the things which are not seen; for the things which are seen, are temporal, but the things which are not seen, are eternal."

THE END.

On the Starry Heavens

I perceive a great variety in the size and splendour of those gems of heaven. Some are of the first magnitude, others of an inferior order. Some glow with intense flames, others glimmer with fainter beams. Yet all are beautiful; all have their peculiar lustre, and distinct use; all tend, in their different degrees, to enamel the cope of heaven, and embroider the robe of night.

This circumstance is remarked by an author, whose sentiments are a source of wisdom, and the very standard of truth. "One star," says the apostle to the Gentiles, "differeth from another star in glory; so also is the resurrection of the dead." In the world above, are various degrees of happiness, various seats of honour. Some will rise to more illustrious distinctions and richer joys; some, like vessels of ample capacity, will admit more copious accessions of light and excellence. Yet there will be no want, no deficiency, in any; but a fulness both of divine satisfactions and personal perfections. Each will enjoy all the good, and be adorned with all the glory, that his heart can wish, or his condition receive. None will know what it is to envy. Not the least malevolence, nor the least selfishness, but everlasting friendship prevails, and a mutual complacency in each other's delight. Love, cordial love, will give every particular saint a participation of all the fruitions which are diffused through the whole assembly of the blessed. No one eclipses, but each reflects light upon his brother. A sweet interchange of rays subsists, all enlightened by the great fountain, and all enlightening one another; by which reciprocal communication of pleasure and amity, each will be continually receiving from, each incessantly adding to, the general felicity.

Happy, supremely happy they who are admitted into the celestial mansions. Better to be a door-keeper in those "ivory palaces," than to fill the most gorgeous throne on earth. The very lowest place at God's right hand is distinguished honour and consummate bliss. O! that we may, in some measure, anticipate that beatific state while we remain in our banishment below! May we, by rejoicing in the superior prosperity of another, make it our own! and, provided the general result is harmony, be content, be pleased, with whatsoever part is assigned to our share, in the universal choir of affairs.

Improvement (on First Corinthians 15)

Published in 1805 in Leeds, Great Britain

(Joseph Smith gave a copy of Philip Doddridge's "Sermons" to the Nauvoo Library in 1844)

41 There is an immense variety in the works of God, even in those which fall under the inspection of our senses, feeble and limited as they are, while we dwell in flesh and blood. you know, is not the same kind of flesh, but the flesh of man, and of cattle, and of fish, and of fowls, is different each from the other, in its form, qualities, and manner of being subsisted. [There are] also celestial bodies, and terrestrial bodies; but the glory of the celestial, and the terrestrial, are apparently differeth, and the brightest lustre the latter can have, is but a faint reflection of what is received from the former. And even in the glory of the celestial bodies there is also a wonderful variety: There is one superior and incomparable glory of the sun, which often shines with a lustre scarce to be endured; and another reflected and milder glory of the moon; and another glory of the stars, which as they appear to us, are far interior to either of the two great luminaries. And again, [one] star differeth from [another] star in glory, according to their respective magnitudes, in reference to which they are ranged by astronomers under different classes.

42 So [shall be] also the resurrection of the pious dead: another kind of glory shall appear, than human nature has known in its purest state, in any beauty of form or ornaments of dress. There shall indeed, as I intimated but now, be some difference in the degree of that glory, correspondent to the different excellencies in the characters of good men, on whom it is to pass: happy change; so that it may be said concerning the body of them all in general, it is sown, or committed, like seed to the ground, in corruption, just ready to putrify, and through various forms of putrefaction to be reduced to the dust: but it is raised in incorruption, so that no accident or disorder whatsoever shall be able to dissolve it again, or to threaten it in the least degree.

43 It is sown in dishonour, in a poor contemptible state, and under a kind of infamy, put upon it by the execution of God's first sentence against sin; but it is raised in glory, every part and trace of the curse being abolished, and itself being formed in such a manner as to make it appear that the King of heaven delights to honour the happy spirit on which he bestows such a dress. It is sown in weakness, absolutely incapable of any, even the lowest degree of action, or sensation, and deprived of those limited abilities which it possessed in this its mortal life: but it is raised in power, endowed with almost angelic degrees of strength, vigour and activity.

44 is sown an animal body, formed to the purposes of animal life in this present world: but it is raised a spiritual body, formed to a noble superiority to the mean gratifications of this imperfect state, and fitted to be the instrument of the soul, in the most exalted services of the spiritual and Divine life. For it is certain, that as there is an animal body, with which we are now by daily, and frequently, by unhappy experience, acquainted; so there is also a spiritual body: God can exalt and refine matter to a degree of purity and excellence to us unknown; and there are many bodies now existing so pure and active, as that in comparison they may be called spirits.

Solomon Chamberlain, for instance, had a vision, in or about the year 1807, of three heavens, graded hierarchically according to their differing degrees of glory. In another vision, in 1816, he learned that the true church was not upon the earth, but that it soon would be, and that its arrival would be connected with the publication of another book of scripture, much like the Bible. At about the time that the Book of Mormon was being printed, but before he had yet heard of it, Solomon was divinely led to the Smiths' neighborhood in upstate New York.

I was a stranger in that part of the country, a town where I never before had set my foot, and knew no one in the town. It was now about sundown, and my guide [the Spirit of the Lord] directed me to put up for the night, which I did to a farm house. In the morning, the people of the house asked me if I had heard of the Gold Bible. When they said Gold Bible, there was a power like electricity went from the top of my head to the end of my toes.

He went to the Smiths' home, where he met Joseph Smith's brother Hyrum and found that the revelations he had received agreed in precise detail with those granted to the Prophet. He was baptized by Joseph Smith in the waters of Seneca Lake shortly after the establishment of the Church (pp. 34-37).

Footnote: This account appears indirectly to conflict with the notion, advanced by some, that Joseph Smith got his idea of the three degrees of glory--an idea, incidentally, with roots deep in antiquity--not by revelation from the Lord, but by reading speculative books of the 1830s.

Discoursing of the different Degrees of Heavenly Glory; and of our mutual Knowledge of Each Other above.

As those, which never were at home, now, after much hearsay travelling toward it, ask in the way, what manner of house it is, what seat, what frame, what soil; so do we, in the passage to our glory. We are all pilgrims thither; yet so, as that some have looked into it afar, through the open windows of the Scripture. Go to, then: while others are enquiring about worldly dignities and earthly pleasures, let us two sweetly consult of the estate of our future happiness; yet without presumption, without curiosity.

Amongst this infinite choice of thoughts, it hath pleased you to limit our discourse to two heads.

You ask first, if the joys of the glorified Saints shall differ in degrees. I fear not to affirm it. There is one life of all; one felicity: but divers measures. Our heaven begins here; and here, varies in degree. One Christian enjoys God above another, according as his grace, as his faith is more: and heaven is still like itself; not other above, from that beneath. As our grace begins our glory, so it proportions it. Blessedness stands in the perfect operation of the best faculties, about the perfectest object; that is, in the vision, in the fruition of God. All his Saints see him; but some more clearly: as the same sun is seen of all eyes, not with equal strength. Such as the eye of our faith was, to see him that is invisible; such is the eye of our present apprehension, to see as we are seen. Who sees not, that our rewards are according to our works? not for them, as on merit: woe be to that soul, which hath but what it earneth: but after them, as their rule of proportion. And these, how sensibly unequal! One gives but a cup of cold water to a disciple: another gives his blood, for the Master.

Different works have different wages; not of desert, but of mercy: five talents well employed, carry away more recompence than two; yet both approved, both rewarded with their Master's joy. Who can stick at this, that knows those heavenly spirits, to whom we shall be like, are marshalled by their Maker into several ranks? he, that was rapt into their element, and saw their blessed orders, as from his own knowledge hath styled them, Thrones, Principalities, Powers, Dominions. If, in one part of this celestial family, the great Householder hath thus ordered it, why not in the other? yea, even in this he hath instanced; You shall sit on twelve thrones, and judge the twelve tribes of Israel: if he mean not some preeminence to his apostles, how doth he answer, how doth he satisfy them?

Yet more, Lazarus is in Abraham's bosom: therefore Abraham is more honoured than Lazarus. I shall need no more proofs; if from heaven you shall look down into the great gulf, and there see diversity of torments, according to the value of sins: equality of offences, you acknowledge an idle paradox of the Stoics: to hold unequal sins equally punished, were more absurd; and more injurious to God's justice: there is but one fire, which yet otherwise burns the straw; otherwise, wood and iron: he, that made and commands this dungeon, these tortures, tells us, that the wilfully disobedient shall smart with more stripes; the ignorant, with fewer.

Yet, so conceive of these heavenly degrees, that the least is glorious: so do these vessels differ, that all are full: there is no want in any; no envy. Let us strive for a place, not strive for the order: how can we wish to be more than happy?

Your other question is, of our mutual knowledge above; the hope whereof, you think, would give much contentment to the necessity of our parture: for, both we are loath not to know those whom we love; and we are glad to think we shall know them happy: whereof, if it may comfort you, I am no less confident. If I may not go so far, as, with the best of the Fathers, to say we shall know one another's thoughts, I dare say, our persons we shall: our knowledge, our memory are not there lost, but perfected. Yea, I fear not to say, we shall know, both our miseries past, and the present sufferings of the damned: it makes our happiness not a little the sweeter, to know that we were miserable, to know that others are and must be miserable. We shall know them; not feel them: take heed, that you clearly distinguish, betwixt speculation and experience: we are then far out of the reach of evils: we may see them, to comfort us; not to affect us. Who doubts, that these eyes shall see and know the Glorious Manhood of our Blessed Saviour, advanced above all the powers of heaven? and if one body, why not more? and if our Elder Brother, why no more of our spiritual fraternity? Yea, if the twelve thrones of those judges of Israel shall be conspicuous; how shall we not acknowledge them? And if these, who shall restrain us from more? You will easily grant, that our love can never fail: faith and hope give place to sight, to present fruition; for these are of things not seen: but love is perpetual; not of God only, but his Saints: for nothing ceases, but our earthly parts; nothing, but what savours of corruption: Christian love is a grace; and may well challenge a place in heaven: and what love is there, of what we know not? More plainly, If the three disciples in Tabor knew Moses and Elias, how much more shall we know them in God's Sion! Lastly, for it is a letter not a volume that I intended in this not necessary but likely discourse, that famous Parable can tell you, that those, which are in hell, may know singular and several persons, though distant in place: the rich Glutton knows Lazarus and Abraham. I hear what you say: "It is but a Parable:" neither will I press you with the contrary authority of Ambrose, Tertullian, Gregory, Jerome, or any Father; nor with that universal rule of Chrysostom, That those only are parables, where examples are expressed, and names concealed: I yield it; yet all holy parables have their truths, at least their possibilities: deny this, and you disable their use, wrong their Author: our Saviour never said ought was done, that cannot be; and shall then the damned retain ought, which the glorified lose? No man ever held that the soul was advantaged by torment. Comfort you, therefore, in this; you shall know, and be known.

But far be from hence all carnal and earthly thoughts; as if your affections should be, as below, doubled to your wife or child: nature hath no place in glory: here is no respect of blood; none, of marriage: this grosser acquaintance and plea, sure is for the Paradise of Turks, not the Heaven of Christians: here is, as no marriage, save betwixt the Lamb and his Spouse, the Church; so, no matrimonial affections: you shall rejoice in your glorified child; not as your child, but as glorified. In brief, let us so enquire of our company, that, above all things, we strive to be there ourselves; where, we are sure, if we have not what we imagined, we shall have more than we could imagine.

Different Degrees Of Lustre With Which Heavenly Bodies Appear, Afford Strong Presumption That They Are Specifically Unlike Each Other In Their Internal Constitutions, As In Their Magnitudes & Distances From One Another
Essay on the Identity and General Resurrection of the Human Body

We know not with any precision, how far quantity is included in our idea of body; nor can we determine how far sensible qualities may be removed, while the essence remains entire. Of these variations St. Paul tells us, That all flesh is not the same flesh; but there is one kind of flesh of man, another flesh of beasts, another of fishes, another of birds. There are also celestial bodies, and bodies terrestrial, (verses the thirty-ninth and fortieth).

Of eternal things we can have no conception but by comparison; and that which the apostle has made use of, is sufficiently satisfactory to assure us, that body may remain after many astonishing changes have passed upon it, of which in our present condition we can probably have no conception. That there is a specific difference in the flesh of animals, we cannot doubt. The flesh of snakes is totally distinct from that of men; and yet we are fully assured, that the denominating qualities still remain. In what the real difference actually consists, between these two species of animal substances, I take not upon me to determine; but I learn from the comparison this important lesson, that what changes soever our bodies may undergo, body, in all its essential properties, will still continue. And though they may be so far changed, from what they at present are, as the flesh of snakes is different from the flesh of men; so much so, that flesh and Hood, which cannot inherit the kingdom of God, shall be done away, yet that the human body will remain. We see in the comparison, that variations in the constitution are consistent with sameness of nature; and that the bodies which we have, will still be bodies, whether we consider them as terrestrial or celestial.

From contemplating those animal substances, which are specifically different, and yet essentially the same; the apostle proceeds in his comparison by an appeal to the masses of the universe, and the distinct sphere of glory which they exhibit. After having said, that there are bodies celestial, and bodies terrestrial, he observes, but the glory of the celestial is one, and the glory of the terrestrial is another. There is one glory of the sun, and another glory of the moon, and another glory of the stars, for one star differeth from another star in glory. So also is the resurrection of the dead (verses the fortieth and forty-second).

The different degrees of lustre, with which these heavenly bodies appear, afford strong presumption that they are specifically unlike each other in their internal constitutions, as in their magnitudes and distances from one another; some of them are luminous, some of them are opaque; and even those of the solar system, from their differences in their approximation to their common centre, demonstrate that their densities must be various, and that their constitutions must be unlike. Of the fixed stars we know but little; but, since variety is found in all those works of God which we have any opportunity of contemplating, it is unreasonable to suppose that variety is exclusively confined to the sphere which we inhabit. The productions of distant worlds may be as different from those with which we are acquainted, as the embryo in the womb is from the man in a state of maturity; or as the man in a state of maturity is from man in a future state.

The nature and constitution of the sun must be as distinct from the nature and constitution of those revolving bodies, which he invigorates and warms, as water is from marble; or as the air we breathe is from the ground on which we tread. The distinctions, which we contemplate, are not founded upon hypothetical possibility, but in many cases they are in actual existence. They differ from one another, in constitution and manner of existence; and serve to shew us what an infinite variety of forms omnipotent power is able to produce out of the same materials; or at least out of materials which only differ in sensible qualities from one another, while they are ultimately resolvable into one common essence.

Whatever differences may be presumed to exist between these heavenly bodies, either in situation, in magnitude, in density, in constitution, or in lustre; it must not be forgotten that in point of essence they are still the same. They claim their origin in the same common substance; they still sustain the general appellation of bodies, though some of them are more exalted than others; and though the glory which they emit is different in radiance, as well as differently diffused.

So also is the resurrection of the dead. The same body is capable of undergoing changes, equally surprising, with those variations which we have been contemplating in the bodies of the universe. The ductility of matter, when acted upon by omnipotent power, is so great, that the substance can bend to every thing which its essence does not preclude. And, whether we view it in the distinct species of fish, in bodies celestial, or in bodies terrestrial; we learn from each subject, to lessen our astonishment at those changes through which our bodies have to pass.

St. Paul having prepared us for the great event, by the enumeration of those facts to which he has appealed; proceeds to mark out the specific difference between those bodies which we now have, and those which we must have hereafter. It is sown in corruption, it is raised in incorruption 'it is sown in dishonour, it is raised in glory; it is sown in weakness, it is raised in power; it is sown a natural body, it is raised a spiritual body. There is a natural body, and there is a spiritual body (verses the forty-second and forty-fourth).

Through the preceding illustrative comparisons, which St. Paul had introduced, and the masterly application which he has made, we discover, so far as the scantiness of our ideas and the limitation of our capacities will afford, the important changes which await our bodies beyond the grave. The process of vegetation is still in view; and a state of dissolution seems to be that great alembic, through which our present bodies are to be refined, in order to that perfection which lies in a future state. To ask why these things are not more clearly revealed, is only to ask why God has not given to us those refined capacities, which are inapplicable to our condition; and which, if actually bestowed upon us, would make us no longer man. To comprehend, with minute exactness, the subject before us, and to form conceptions which are at once accurate and appropriate, may be reserved for us in that state, which will shortly be our portion, when mortality shall be swallowed up in life.

That our bodies are sown in corruption, is a fact so evident, that it requires no comment. And we may naturally conclude, from the expression of verse the forty-second, that the incorruption in which our bodies shall be raised, stands opposed to that corruption in which they are said to be sown. As therefore corruption implies decay, and so total separation of those parts which appear, when deposited in the earth; & we may naturally conceive that incorruption implies an exemption from that dissolution and decay, which are inseparable from all compounded bodies in our present state of existence. And, as a separation of all the component parts of our bodies, implies either a previous tendency in the parts themselves, or a certain power in some external cause, which communicates its impulses to produce these effects; so we may naturally infer, either that this internal tendency shall be totally removed, or that the body which shall be raised, will be placed beyond the influence of that power through which a separation of the parts was wrought.

That the body shall be placed beyond the influence of those external causes, which now impel it, has been proved in section the sixth, of the sixth chapter. And, as our future bodies must be material, and as matter in itself can have no tendencies when placed beyond the reach of all external causes either to motion or rest; no given particle, which shall then be placed in our bodies, shall ever remove from its station. And therefore the body, though composed of separable parts, shall be raised and preserved in a state of incorruption.

On these accounts we may easily conceive, how this body, which is sown in dishonour, shall be raised in glory; and why, though sown in weakness it shall be raised in power. Its state of incorruption is a state of glory, to the bodies of the righteous; and perpetuity of life, implies vigour and power, which never can decay. A removal from the influence of all external causes, must place the particles, of which our bodies shall be composed, beyond the reach of all constraint; and even give to each of them the power to adhere for ever. Thus weakness shall be exchanged for power, and dishonour for glory; when this corruptible, shall have put on incorruption, and this mortal shall have put on immortality.

That there is a natural body, and that there is a spiritual body, we are expressly told in verse the forty-fourth; but in what they shall specifically differ from each other, it is difficult to know. Of a spiritual body, in its strictest sense, we can certainly form no accurate, no consistent idea. The two words seem inapplicable to each other, and naturally introduce confusion into our thoughts: I am therefore inclined to imagine, that the expression is not to be taken in an absolute, but only in a comparative sense.

That matter can never become spirit, any more than spirit can become matter, will admit of no question; because according to those notions which we have of these substances, essences can never be exchanged with each other, any more than identity can be supposed to be transferred from one substance to another. A removal of the essence must be a destruction of the being; and a destruction of the being must inevitably prevent an exchange of nature. In fine, to suppose that matter can become spirit, or that spirit can become matter, its original nature still remaining, is an evident contradiction, and therefore never can be admitted.

But, though the supposition that matter can become spirit, and that spirit can become matter, involves an evident contradiction; it is not to be presumed, that we have any real knowledge of the internal essence of either. Many latent qualities may be concealed in both substances, which may unfold themselves in eternity, and point out an approximation to each other, in their sensible qualities, of which at present we can have no conception. And perhaps through those latent qualities, which have hitherto eluded the researches of philosophy, their nominal affinity may be so great, as to leave no distant qualities for finite discrimination.

Whether the nominal essences of substances can be so far changed, as to have no specific quality, through which we shall be able to distinguish the distinct identity of these substances, is a question which we feel ourselves incompetent to decide. It is, however, not improbable, that something analogous thereto will be the case. For, since we sow not that body which shall be, the change must be amazingly great; not only in the modification of its being, but also in its component parts. And therefore, when the resurrection of the body shall take place, all the known properties of matter may retire from our future perceptions, which without doubt, will be considerably changed, and become as invisible and unknown, as those latent properties now are, which are included in both matter and spirit.

The changes, which our organs and powers of perception must undergo, will without doubt considerably contribute towards the concealment of those sensible qualities, which, I have presumed, will undergo a change. If then our modes of perception shall be changed; if our bodily organs shall be changed; if our bodies themselves shall be changed, as well as all external objects, who can say what effects may not be produced by Sensible qualities, without all doubt, will vary; and a variation of sensible qualities in matter, in its approaches towards perfection, must increase its affinity towards spirit, and conduct it to those exalted regions, in which our contemplations are lost.

But, notwithstanding those important changes which our bodies shall undergo; they will without doubt be chiefly confined to those sensible qualities through which the identity of matter is at present known. Amidst these changes of our bodies, the real essence must be preserved entire; because our bodies will remain the same. The qualities may be changed, through the causes which have been mentioned, without affecting the essence of matter, whatever it may be; its refinement may render it so subtle, that to touch it will be difficult, and it may, though material, approximate to spirit.

The germ of future life, which we have already considered, dilated in all its parts, and diffused through those spaces which now bound the extremities of our corporeal being, may contain all the matter which shall survive the grave. If this be admitted, its expansion must make it subtle; and it is not improbable that, with an eye to this, St. Paul denominated that collection of matter which shall adhere to our souls hereafter, a spiritual body, to which it must in this case approach, through the mere exility of its nature.

In this view, the expression becomes at once intelligible and sublime. The boldness of the figure obtains sanction, from the subject to which it is applied; and perhaps the whole compass of language will scarcely have afforded an expression, so concise, so appropriate to the subject, and so sublime. We may therefore conclude with safety, that those bodies which shall be raised from the dust of death, whatever may be the internal constitution of their natures, or the whole mass of component parts; will be purged from those gross materials which now incorporate with their purer essence. And we may also learn from the language of St. Paul, that through those refinements which shall take place, the infinite distances which now lie between matter and spirit, will be so far overcome as the nature of their distinct essences will admit; and that matter shall be so far changed from its present condition, as to sustain a new appellation.

The view, which St. Paul appears to have taken, seems to have been this. He places our bodies in their present condition, at an inconceivable distance from spirit; and considers our future bodies as formed of refined materials, and standing between these vast extremes. In tracing their resemblance, from their sensible qualities, they evidently appeared to lie at a greater distance from what they are at present, than from pure spirit with which they were compared. And, in consequence of that resemblance, he selected his language, and denominated them spiritual bodies.

From fact, the apostle proceeds to order; and, after having pointed out the changes which shall take place, he states the progress of their accomplishment in the following words. Howbeit, that is not first which is spiritual, but that which is natural; and afterward that which is spiritual, (verse the forty sixth).

We learn from this passage, that the stages through which we pass are all progressive, from the commencement of being to the final consummation of that perfection which our bodies shall attain, when they shall for ever quit mortality, and become comparatively spiritual in their natures. Every stage therefore seems necessary in the grand movement of the whole: they are so many links in the chain of individual being, at once dependent and connective, and necessary in their several stations to the final result of all. The seminal parts are necessary to the embryo; the embryo to the perfect body; and the body to that material perfection, which shall be attained in another life. The manner of existence seems as necessary, as the condition in which it must appear in each of the intermediate stages. Life commences with the organic and vegetative mode; vegetative life soon loses itself in that which is animal; animal life subsides at the hour of death, and gives place to that life in which we shall neither marry nor be given in marriage, but in which we shall be as the angels of God. Thus, virtual existence shall issue in that which is formal; formal existence shall commence with an animal body; and finally issue in that body which St. Paul has denominated spiritual.

Nor can we conceive, that either of these stages or modes of existence can be suspended or changed. The progress is established by laws, which are immutable; and the order cannot be inverted. The parts in this progressive arrangement, are not only necessary in themselves to the perfection of being; but are essentially necessary in that particular station in which they are fixed. The establishment is fixed by the laws, which regulate and govern nature; and these laws must be repealed, before we can suppose the order of this process to be inverted. That, therefore, is not first which is spiritual, but that which is natural; and afterward that which is spiritual.

To this general principle, there seems, however, to be one remarkable exception, which is introduced in verse the fifty-first. Behold, I show you a mystery; we shall not all sleep, but we shall all be changed; in a moment, in the twinkling of an eye at the last trump.

That the exception to the general principle here spoken of, is an exemption from death, is evident, from the period to which the passage alludes; it is at the last trump. And, though the apostle introduces the first person in the plural number; yet we cannot suppose that as an individual he had any intention to include himself in the number of those, who should be exempted from the stroke of death. When, therefore, he says we shall not all sleep, but we shall all be changed, he must be supposed to allude to the body of Christians at last, in all ages of the world; or perhaps to the human race, whom he considers to be one family; and the exception must in that, or any view, apply to those who should be alive in the latest ages of the world, "when the swarm shall issue, and the hive shall burn."

But, though this remarkable exception shall take place, through which the last generation of the human race shall be exempted from the stroke of death, yet the change itself, which death produces, will not be dispensed with. For, though all shall not sleep, yet all shall be changed. The change seems absolutely necessary, by what means soever it may be produced, to the production of that spiritual body, which we have already considered. The change therefore, through which these last individuals of mankind may pass, must be, in its nature, equivalent to that which death, by a much slower and more gradual process, shall produce upon the great mass of the human race. It is a change, through which mortality shall be put off: and through which that extraneous matter, which) shall be. incorporated with those radical parts which, are destined for eternity, shall be thrown aside; that the germ or radical parts, separated from the rest, may be renewed in immortal vigour, to begin a mode of being which shall never end.

That this important change is in itself progressive, according to the general principle, it is natural to conceive both from reason and revelation; and the inequalities of those periods, during which the body shall repose in the grave, we have endeavoured to account for, in the third section of the fifth chapter. In that section, I have considered that no given period of duration is absolutely necessary for our continuance in the grave. The periods will be as various as the individuals; and yet the bodies of all will be as ready to quit their gloomy mansion, as soon as the trumpet shall utter its awful sound.

That these sentiments are congenial with those of St. Paul, is evident from verse fifty-first, which we now have under consideration. But inequalities of time do not bound the apostle's views. He proceeds farther, and tells us, that though all shall be changed, all shall not taste of death. It is true, he views it as an astonishing circumstance; and ushers it into view as a deviation from general principles, which we cannot easily comprehend. He tells us that it is a mystery, and as such it evidently appears. At the same time, it is a mystery that he has shewed us in point of fact, though the circumstances of its accomplishment be perfectly concealed. We see, with sufficient plainness that it must be so; but what the nature of that process may be, is not clearly revealed.

Of this, however, we are assured, that the change shall be instantaneous, instead of progressive; and perhaps one short moment will accomplish that work, which on some human bodies had been in a state of progression, for more than five thousand years. In a moment, in the twinkling of an eye, at the last trump, it shall be effected; and the change, which death administers through the medium of corruption, shall be accomplished without his aid.

With an eye to the process of nature, this point has been already considered, in the sixth section of the sixth chapter. The length of that period through which these bodies had passed, or in which they had lain in a seminal state, precluded a length of time in their final stage. But, philosophy could only assure us, that this stage must necessarily be short. The change which appeared absolutely necessary, required a period of duration, in order to its completion; and as nothing but the common process appeared necessary to its completion, philosophy directed our attention to the grave. St. Paul, however, instructed in a better school, has penetrated the cloud which hovered over our researches, and told us in a few words how the mighty work shall be performed. He has revealed to us that secret, which God had revealed to him; and told us that important mystery which must otherwise have been concealed. It is therefore from him we learn, that we shall not all sleep, but we shall be changed, in a moment, in the twinkling of an eye, at the last trump. For the trumpet shall sound, and the dead shall be raised incorruptible, and we shall be changed, (verse the fifty-second).

Hence then we learn from the verse last quoted, that in one awful moment, the sound of the trumpet, the change of the living, and the resurrection of the dead to a state of incorruptibility, shall take place. Human nature must then undergo its final renovation, and enter upon the commencement of that state of existence, which shall know nothing either of intermission, of change, or of termination. Of those bodies, which had mouldered in the grave, and passed through the process of corruption; and those which had sustained the changes which supplanted death, no difference will probably hereafter remain. In both cases, mortality is swallowed up of life; and every vestige of corruption is done away. No distinction can therefore remain between those bodies, which are totally delivered from its influence; and those which are exempted from it by passing through a mysterious change. In both cases, the germ of the future body must be preserved from destruction; and whether it collect around it any new particles or not, it will, without all doubt, put forth those latent powers which now are in an embryo state; while it will be dilated through all its parts, and be assimilated to that mode of existence, which spiritual substances enjoy.

But, amidst these changes which our bodies will sustain, there is one of peculiar import, which St. Paul has noticed in verse the fiftieth, in these words, Now this I say unto you, brethren, that flesh and blood cannot inherit the kingdom of God; neither doth corruption inherit incorruption.

We have, perhaps, included in this expression, the most astonishing alteration in the human body, that we can possibly conceive. It includes a change, which removes those parts that are necessary to our present state of existence; and concurs to place our bodies in that astonishing light, which the preceding paragraphs have been written to elucidate and confirm.

That the dead shall be raised incorruptible, is the plain language of the fifty-second verse; and it is evident that this verse must refer to the body; because nothing can be raised but that which had been previously sown; and that which had been sown could include nothing but the material part. If then the body shall rise again, and those of the righteous shall enter into the joy of their Lord; and if flesh and blood cannot inherit the kingdom of God; the consequence is inevitable, that flesh and blood conform no part of those bodies which shall survive the grave.

Of those human bodies, which shall be destitute of flesh and blood, we can form no adequate idea. The bones, were they to remain, would not be a human body; they would form but an unpleasant spectacle; and carry with them evident marks of mortality, if they were endued with life.

Flesh and blood cannot inherit the kingdom of God, nor corruption inherit incorruption.

2 Corinthians, v. 1.

For we know, that if our earthly house of this tabernacle were dissolved, we have a building of God, an house not made with hands, eternal in the heavens.

This passage presents to us in one view, the nature of our present earthly state, and the future object of the Christian's hope. The style is figurative; but the figures employed are both obvious and expressive. The body is represented as a house inhabited by the soul, or the thinking part of man. But it is an earthly house, a tabernacle, erected only for passing accommodation, and to be dissolved; to which is to succeed the future dwelling of the just in a building of God, an house not made with hands, eternal in the heavens. Here, then, are three great objects presented to our consideration. First, The nature of our present condition. Secondly, That succeeding state which is the object of good men's hope. Thirdly, The certain foundation of their hope; we know, that if our earthly house be dissolved, we have a building of God.

The text gives a full description of our present embodied state; as an earthly house, an earthly house of this tabernacle, and a tabernacle which is to be dissolved.

We dwell in an earthly house. Within this cottage of earth, is lodged that spiritual, immortal substance, into which God breathed the breath of life. So we are elsewhere said in Scripture, to have our foundation in the dust and to dwell in houses of clay. During its continuance in this humble abode, the soul may be justly considered as confined and imprisoned. It is restrained from the full exertion of its powers by many obstructions. It can perceive and act only by very imperfect organs. It looks abroad, as through the windows of the senses; and beholds truth as—through a glass darkly. It is beset with a numerous train of temptations to evil, which arise from bodily appetites. It is obliged to sympathize with the body in its wants; and is depressed with infirmities not its own. For it suffers from the frailty of those materials, of which its earthly house is compacted. It languishes and droops, along with the body; is wounded by its pains; and the slightest discomposure of bodily organs is sufficient to derange some of the highest operations of the soul.

All these circumstances bear the marks of a fallen and degraded state of human nature. The mansion in which the soul is lodged, corresponds so little with the powers and capacities of a rational immortal spirit, as gives us reason to think that the souls of good men were not designed to remain always thus confined. Such a state was calculated for answering the ends proposed by our condition of trial and probation in this life; but was not intended to be lasting and final. Accordingly, the Apostle, in his description, calls it the earthly house of this tabernacle; alluding to a wayfaring or sojourning state, where tabernacles or tents are occasionally erected for the accommodation of passengers. The same metaphor is here made use of, which is employed in several other passages of Scripture, where we are said to be strangers and sojourners on earth before God, as were all our fathers. This earth may be compared to a wide field spread with tents, where troops of pilgrims appear in succession, and pass away. They enter for a little into the tents prepared for them; and remain there to undergo their appointed probation. When that is finished, their tents are taken down, and they retire to make way for others, who come forward in their allotted order. Thus one generation passeth away, and another generation cometh; and the earthly house is to all no other than the house of their pilgrimage.

The earthly house of this tabernacle, the Apostle, proceeding in his description, tells us, is to be dissolved. Close as the union between the soul and body now appears to be, it is no more than a temporary union. It subsists only during the continuance of a tabernacle of dust, which, by its nature, is tending towards ruin. The dust must soon return to the dust, and the spirit to God who gave it. The dissolution of the earthly house of this tabernacle, is an event full of dismay to wicked men. Beyond that period, they see nothing but a dark unknown, which, as far as they can discern, is peopled with objects full of terror; even to the just, this dissolution is a serious and awful event. Providence has wisely appointed that, burdened as our present state is with various ills and frailties, we should, however, be naturally attached to it. Its final close is always attended with several melancholy ideas. Thou who now flourishest most in health and strength, must then have thy head laid low. From thy closing eyes, the light of the sun shall disappear for ever. That light shall continue to shine, the seasons to return, and the earth to flourish; but to thee no more, separated from the dwellings of men, and cut off from all thou wert accustomed to love, as though thou hadst never been—Such is the fate of man, considered merely as mortal; as dwelling in an earthly house which is about to be dissolved. The consolatory corrective of those humbling ideas, the ray that is to dissipate this gloom, we behold in the subsequent part of the text; that when this earthly house is dissolved, there is prepared for the righteous a building of God, an house not made with hands. But before proceeding to this part of the subject, let us pause for a little, and make some reflections on what has been already said.

Let the distinction between the soul and the body, which is so clearly marked in the text, be deeply imprinted on our minds. Few things in religion or morals are entitled to make a stronger impression than this distinction; and yet, with the bulk of men the impression it makes appears to be slight. They seem to think and act as if they consisted of no more than mere flesh and blood, and had no other concerns than what respect their embodied state. If their health be firm, if their senses be gratified, and their appetites indulged, all is well with them. Is not this to forget that the body is no more than an earthly house or tabernacle of the soul? The soul, that thinking part which they feel within them, and which it is impossible for them to confound with their flesh or their bones, is certainly far nobler than the tenement of clay which it inhabits.

The soul is the principle of all life, and knowledge, and action. The body is no more than its instrument or organ; and as much nobler as is the part which belongs to him who employs an instrument, than to the instrument which is employed, so much is the soul of greater dignity than the body. The one is only a frail and perishable machine; the other survives its ruin, and lives for ever.— During the time that the union continues between those two very different parts of our frame, I by no means say that it is incumbent upon us to disregard all that relates to the body. It is not possible, nor, though it were possible, would it be requisite or fit, for a man to act as if he were pure immaterial spirit. This is what the condition and laws of our nature permit not—But must not the greatest sensualist admit, that if the soul be the chief part of man, it must have interests of its own, which require to be carefully attended to? Can he imagine that he truly consults either his interest or his pleasure, if he employs the thinking part of his nature only to serve, and to minister to the bodily part? Must not this infer, not merely a degradation of the superior part, but an entire perversion of that whole constitution of nature which our Maker hath given us? Be assured, my brethren, that the soul hath a health and a sickness, hath pleasures and pains of its own, quite distinct from those of the body, and which have a powerful influence on the happiness or misery of man. He who pays no attention to these, and neglects all care of preserving the health and soundness of his soul, is not only preparing final misery for himself, when he shall enter into a disembodied estate, but is laying, even for his present state, the foundation of many a bitter distress. By folly and guilt he is wounding his spirit. Its wounds will often bleed when his body appears sound, and will give rise to inward pangs, which no animal comforts shall be able to assuage or heal.

When we impress our minds with a sense of this important distinction between the body and the soul, let us not forget, that closely united as they now are in our frame, their union is soon to terminate. The earthly house of this tabernacle is to be dissolved; but the soul which inhabits it remains. Let us therefore dwell in our earthly house with the sentiments of those who know they are about to dislodge. The endowments and improvements of the soul are the only possessions on which we can reckon as continuing to be our own. On every possession which belongs to our bodily estate, we ought to view this inscription as written by God: "This is an earthly house, which is tottering to its fall; This is a tabernacle which "is about to be taken down." Let us with pleasure turn our thoughts towards those higher prospects that are set before us, when this change shall have taken place in the human condition; which naturally brings us to the Head of Discourse—the great object of the hope of good men in a succeeding state. The earthly house is contrasted by the Apostle with a building of God; an house not made with hands: and the tabernacle which is to be dissolved, with a house eternal in the heavens.

The expressions here employed to signify what is promised to the righteous, a building of God, an house not made with hands, are expressions of a mysterious import. They suggest to us things which we cannot now conceive, far less describe. Into that house which is above, those habitations of eternity, no living man has entered, to explore them, and to report to us tidings of what he there beheld. A sacred veil conceals the mansions of glory. But, in general, these expressions of the Text plainly import that the spirits of good men shall, upon death, be translated from an imperfect to a glorious state. Whether we explain the building of God, the house not made with hands, to signify the incorruptible bodies which the just shall animate at the resurrection, or the habitations of celestial glory into which they enter, they are terms which convey ideas of high magnificence and felicity. This earth on which we dwell, is no more than an exterior region of the great kingdom of God. It is but an entrance, through which, after suitable preparation, we pass into the palace of an Almighty Sovereign. Admitted there, we may hope to behold far greater objects than we now can behold; and to enjoy in perfection those pleasures which we here view from afar, and pursue in vain. Such degrees of pleasure are allowed us at present as our state admits. But a state of trial required that pains should be intermixed with our pleasures, and that infirmity and distress should often be felt. The remains of our fall appear every where in our condition. The ruins of human nature present themselves on all hands. But when that which is perfect is come, that which is in part shall be done away. With the fall of the earthly house, all its rotten and corruptible materials shall disappear. It is sown in corruption, says the Apostle, speaking of the happy change made upon good men at the resurrection; it is raised in incorruption; it is sown in dishonour, it is raised in glory; it is sown in weakness, it is raised in power; it is sown a natural, it is raised a spiritual body:— for this corruptible shall put on incorruption, and this mortal put on immortality. Into that house not made with hands, that building of God, we have every reason to believe that there will be no room for such guests to intrude as care or sorrow. Nothing can be admitted to enter there, but what contributes to the full city of those whom the Almighty hath allowed to dwell in his presence, and to behold his face in righteousness.

Besides the glory and perfection of this future state, the text suggests its permanency. This house not made with hands, is a house eternal in the heavens. The tabernacle which we now inhabit, is every moment liable to fall: above, is the fixed mansion, the seat of perpetual rest. Beyond doubt, the certain prospect of death renders every thing inconsiderable which we here possess. Every enjoyment is saddened, when we think of its end approaching. We become sensible that we are always building on sand, never on a rock. Fluctuation and change characterise all that is around us; and at the moment when our attachment to any persons or objects is become the strongest, they are beginning to slide away from our hold. But in the mansions above, alteration and decay are unknown. Every thing there continues in a steady course. No schemes are there begun, and left unfinished; no pleasing connections just formed, and then broken off. The treasures possessed there shall never be diminished; the friends we enjoy there shall never die, and leave us to mourn. In those celestial regions, shines the sun that never sets; the calm reigns, which is never disturbed; the river of life flows with a stream which is always unruffled in its course.

Such are the prospects, imperfectly as we can now conceive them, which are set forth to good men in a future world. But how, it may be asked, shall we be satisfied that such prospects are not mere illusions with which our fancy flatters us. Upon what foundation rests this mighty edifice of hope, which the Apostle here rears up, for the consolation of Christians, and of which he speaks so confidently as to say, We know that if our earthly house of the tabernacle were dissolved, we have a building of God—To inquire into this was the proposed head of Discourse, to which we now proceed. And as the subject is in itself so important, and so pleasing to all good men, I shall take a view of the different kinds of evidence, upon which our faith of a happy immortality is grounded.

We must observe, in the first place, that the dissolution of the earthly tabernacle at death, affords no ground for thinking that the soul at the same time perishes, or is extinguished. I begin with this observation, because the strongest prejudices against the soul's immortality, arise from what is sometimes found to happen at that period. The soul and the body are at present united by the closest sympathy. When one suffers, the other is affected. Both seem to grow up together to the maturity of their powers; and together both seem often to decay. Such a shock is apparently suffered by the soul at death, as at first view might lead us to suspect that it was sharing the same fate with the body. Notwithstanding this, there are clear proofs that the body and the soul, though at present closely connected by divine appointment with one another, are, however, substances of different and dissimilar natures. Matter, of which the body is composed, is a substance altogether dead and passive, and cannot be put in motion without some external impulse. Whereas the soul hath within itself a principle of motion, activity, and life. Between the laws of matter, and the action of thought, there is so little resemblance, or rather so much opposition, „that mankind in general have agreed in holding the soul to be an immaterial substance; that is, a substance the nature of which we cannot explain or define, farther than that it is a substance quite distinct from matter. This being once admitted, it clearly follows, that since thought depends not on matter, from the dissolution of the material part, we have no ground to infer the destruction of the thinking part of man. As long as, by the ordination of the Creator, these different substances remain united, there is no wonder that the one should suffer from the disorder and indisposition of the other.

It is so far from following that the soul must cease to act on the dissolution of the body, that it seems rather to follow, that it will then act in a more perfect manner. In its present habitation, it is plainly limited and confined in its operations. When it is let loose from that earthly house, it is brought forth into greater liberty. To illustrate this by an instance which may be conceived as analogous: let us suppose a person shut up in an apartment, where he saw light only through some small windows. If these windows were foul or dimmed, he would see less: if they were altogether darkened, he could see none at all. But were he let out from this confinement into the open air, he would be so far from being deprived of sight, that though at first overpowered by a sudden glare, he would soon see around him much more completely than before. The senses are as so many windows or apertures, through which the soul at present exercises its powers of perception. If the senses are disordered, the powers of the soul will be obstructed. But once separated from its earthly tenement, the soul will then exercise its powers without obstruction; will act with greater liberty, and in a wider sphere. I admit this argument only goes as far as to show, that although the body perish, there remains with the soul a capacity for separate existence. Whether that existence shall be actually continued to it after death, must depend on the will of Him who gave it life, and who certainly at his pleasure can take that life away. It is necessary, therefore, to inquire into what we have any reason to believe, may be the intention of our Creator concerning a future life.

I argue then, in the next place, that if the soul were to perish when the body dies, the state of man would be altogether unsuitable to the wisdom and perfection of the Author of his being. Man would be the only creature that would seem to have been made in vain. All the other works of God are contrived to answer exactly the purposes for which they were made. They are either incapable of knowledge at all; or, they know nothing higher than the state in which they are placed. Their powers are perfectly suited and adjusted to their condition. But it is not so with man. He has every appearance of being framed for something higher and greater than what he here attains. He sees the narrow bounds within which he is here confined; knows and laments all the imperfections of his present state. His thirst for knowledge, his desire of happiness, all stretch beyond his earthly station. He searches in vain for adequate objects to gratify him. His nature is perpetually tending and aspiring towards the enjoyment of some more complete felicity than this world can afford. In the midst of all his searches and aspirations, he is suddenly cut off. He is but of yesterday, and to-morrow is gone. Often in the entrance, often in the bloom of life, when he had just begun to act his part, and to expand his powers, darkness is made to cover him.—Can we believe, that when this period is come, all is finally over with the best and the worthiest of mankind? Endowed with so noble an apparatus of rational powers, taught to form high views, and enlarged desires, were they brought forth for no other purpose, than to breathe this gross and impure air for a short space, and then to be cut off from all existence? All his other works, God hath made in weight, number, and measure; the hand of the Almighty artificer every where appears. But on man, his chief work here below, he would, upon this supposition, appear to have bestowed no attention; and after having erected a stately palace in this universe, framed with so much magnificence, and decorated with so much beauty, to have introduced man, in the guise of a neglected wanderer, to become its inhabitant.

Let us farther consider the confused and promiscuous distribution of good and evil in this life. The enjoyments of the world, such as they are, are far from being always bestowed on the virtuous and the worthy. On the contrary, the bitterest portion is often their lot. In the midst of infirmities, diseases, and sorrows, they are left to drag their life, while ease and affluence are allowed to the ungodly.—I must ask, if such an arrangement of things, owing to the ordination, or, at least, to the permission of Providence, be consonant to any ideas we can form of the wisdom and goodness of a Supreme Ruler, on the supposition of there being no future state?—. But, as soon as the immortality of the soul, and a state of future retribution are established, all difficulties vanish; the mystery is unravelled; supreme wisdom, justice, and goodness, are discovered to be only concealed for a little while behind the curtain. If that curtain were never to be withdrawn, and immortality never to appear, the ways of God would be utterly inexplicable to man. We would be obliged to conclude, that either a God did not exist; or, though he existed, that he was not possessed of such perfections as we now ascribe to him, if, when a worthy and pious man had spent his whole life in virtuous deeds, and perhaps had died a martyr to the cause of religion and truth; he should, after long and severe sufferings, perish finally, unrewarded and forgotten; no attention shown to him by the Almighty; no building of God erected for him; no house eternal prepared in the Heavens!

These reasonings are much strengthened by the belief that has ever prevailed among all mankind, of the soul's immortality. It is not an opinion that took its rise from the thin-spun speculations of some abstract philosophers. Never has any nation been discovered on the face of the earth so rude and barbarous, that, in the midst of their wildest superstitions, there was not cherished among them some expectations of a state after death, in which the virtuous were to enjoy happiness. So universal a consent in this belief, affords just ground to ascribe it to some innate principle implanted by God in the human breast. Had it no foundation in truth, we must suppose that the Creator found it necessary, for the purposes of his government, to carry on a principle of universal deception among his rational subjects. Many of the strongest passions of our nature are made to have a clear reference to a future existence of the soul. The love of fame, the ardent concern which so often prevails about futurity, all allude to somewhat in which men suppose themselves to be personally concerned, after death. The consciences both of the good and the bad, bear witness to a world that is to come. Seldom do men leave this world without some fears or hopes respecting it; some secret anticipations and presages of what is hereafter to befall them.

But though the reasonings which have been adduced to prove the immortality of the soul and a future state, are certainly of great weight, yet reasonings still they are, and no more, and in every human reasoning, suspicions may arise of some fallacy or error. In a point so momentous to us, as our existence after death, we never could, with absolute certainty and full satisfaction, have rested on any evidence except what was confirmed by the declaration of God himself.—For many and high blessings we are indebted to the Christian revelation; for none more than for its having brought life and immortality to light. The revelations made by God to the world in early ages, gave the first openings to this great article of faith and hope. In future periods, the light dawned more and more; but it was not until the sun of righteousness arose by the appearance of Christ on earth, that the great discovery was completed. Then, indeed, were made known the city of the living God, the new Jerusalem above, the mansions prepared for the spirits of just men made perfect. Nor was a state of future felicity only proclaimed by Christ and his apostles to good men, but was represented as purchased for them by the death of the Redeemer. / give, he was authorised to say, unto my sheep eternal life. In my father's house are many mansions. I go to prepare a place for you. Accordingly, he lay down in the grave; rose as the first fruits of them that slept; and ascending into Heaven, entered there within the vail, as the forerunner of his followers, to assure them of all being friendly and well-disposed towards them in those upper regions. All, therefore, who live and die in the faith and obedience of Jesus, are entitled to say with the Apostle, we know; not only we hope and we reason, but

We know, that if the earthly house of this tabernacle were dissolved, we have a building of God, an house not made with hands, eternal in the Heavens.

The first and most natural improvement of all that has been said, is to produce in our hearts the most lasting gratitude, love, and reverence, towards that great Benefactor of mankind, who not only hath made known and published the blessings of a future state to the righteous, but, by his great undertaking for their redemption, hath erected in their behalf the house eternal in the heavens. The next improvement we should make, is to conduct our own life and behaviour as becomes those who have an interest in this happiness and this hope. From such persons, assuredly, is to be expected a pure, correct, and dignified behaviour in every situation; not a contempt of the employments, nor a renunciation of all the comforts of their present life. Opinions that produce such effects are connected only with the spirit of superstition and false religion. But to them it belongs, in midst of the affairs, enticements, and temptations of the world, to regulate their conduct as becomes the heirs of a divine inheritance; never debasing themselves among what is mean, nor defiling themselves with what is corrupt in the present state; but serving God with that fidelity, and behaving to men with that steady magnanimity of virtue, that generous beneficence and humanity which suits immortal beings, who are aspiring to rise in a future state to the perfection of their nature, in the presence of God.

Introduction

In presenting my friends and the public this new periodical work, I deem it proper to state something of its object and design. The destitute situation of many societies in this and the adjoining States, require for their assistance, the most unremitting and best directed labors of those, whose lives, in the gospel ministry, are devoted to their service. Nothing, we believe, has a greater tendency to promote the general interest of mankind than friendly intercourse; and in no way can such intercourse be more advantageously supported, than by periodical publications. The different denominations of Christians among us, have clearly seen this, and generally availed themselves of its benefits. "The Herald of Life and Immortality" by brother Smith, and "The Universalist Magazine" by brother Ballou, are vehicles of much good information; but they cannot be made so easy of access to the brethren in this part of the country, as a publication among them. The usefulness (If those publications in the vicinity of Massachusetts, can afford no just argument against the existence of another in Vermont). The editor hopes none will have reason to complain that this work is not conducted with the moderation and candor that is suited to the dignity of the subjects it contains. He, however, wishes to have it understood, that he calculates this work on two general principles, to exclude every writer, who does not, in all points, agree with him. But each writer must consider himself Accountable to the public for the ideas which he advances. Communications from all denominations of Christians will receive a place, when the editor can have the privilege of assigning the real name of the author. But adverse sentiments to those of the editor will not be admitted to such a degree as to occupy a large portion of the Christian Repository. Its columns, according to what is promised in the title page, will be devoted, principally, to doctrine, morality, and religious intelligence, mostly original from the pen of the editor and others. Obitual notices, interesting anecdotes, and aphorisms will occasionally find a place. The selection will be the best that he can make from the authors that are and shall fall into his hands. Those pieces in the Christian Repository that have no signature, or where no credit is given, will be understood to be from the editor. His object, in the work, is to be governed by the language of inspiration. He calculates to avoid strife, and to disagree with none, but those whom, he thinks, disagree with the truth, and with themselves.

With these views, the editor has now only to add, that he solicits the patronage of his brethren, that this work, through the divine blessing of God, may be a mean of opening the eyes of the morally blind; giving strength to the feeble; fortitude to the doubtful and fearful; consolation to the sorrowful; that it may powerfully awaken from the slumber of sin, the careless and indifferent; and afford to all inquirers some useful lessons of instruction in heavenly and divine things.

Sermon, No. IV

1 Cor. xiii. IS. And now abideth faith hope, charity, these three; but the greatest of these is charity.

In this short sermon the discussion is proposed with reference to these three important articles; faith, hope, and charity.

I. Faith, in its most common-acceptation, is, an assent of the mind to, things communicated. An evangelical faith embraces, besides the bare assent of the mind, the objects believed in, embraced in gospel promises, with ardent desire and strong affection. This is a faith that works by love, and purifies the heart. Those things which address or present themselves immediately to the senses, are not considered the proper subjects of faith, but those which we are called upon to receive, by the testimony of such persons as have, in this manner, received them. Hence, besides the natural operation of faith in the mind, it always must have two essential properties; namely, evidence and object. This must be true of faith, whether it be spurious or genuine. But while true faith, is founded on real evidence, a false one is supported only by that which is imaginary. This imaginary evidence, so long as it appears real, will naturally strike the mind with the force of real evidence. Therefore, because a thing is believed, it is not an argument of its truth; neither because it is disbelieved, is it a proof of its falsity. Where evidence appears with any considerable energy, it will force an assent of the mind, whether the things believed in, be desirable or undesirable. It is equally as true, on the other side of the question, that where evidence does not appear, or cannot be found, faith cannot exist. But it is not always the case, that when evidence forces an assent to a proposition, that the mind embraces that proposition with affection. In such case faith is dead, and without works, being alone.

Should a query arise, how unbelief could ever be accounted sin, on these principles, the answer appears from the consideration, that the sin of unbelief consists in the negligent or wilful ignorance of the evidence, presented to substantiate important and interesting facts. Those things we feel to oppose, we lay, many times, continue to discredit or disbelieve by excluding the evidence from our notice. And we may sometimes persuade ourselves of the truth of something desirable, by giving all possible weight to every species of evidence in favor, and totally excluding from our inquiries, every thing of an opposite nature. By such a mode of procedure, where testimony appears to favor both sides of a question, we may frequently adopt and believe that side we please; but whether we hit on the right or wrong, we always do it in violence to sound reasoning. This, in doubtful or disputable cases, gives full weight to the testimony on both sides, and decides according to the balance.

The strong biases of mind in favor of preconceived opinions, we have reason to believe, often mislead us in our conclusions in theology; and this is one principal cause of the many errors in the Christian church. The object of faith can never be dependent on faith for its existence. What the gospel preaches to us, therefore, must be as true without our faith, as with it. If Jesus never proclaimed "good tidings of great joy which shall be unto all people," the strongest faith man could possess, would never make the proclamation of such tidings true. Some who hold the doctrine of particular election and reprobation, consider those who believe, elected, and those who disbelieve, reprobated. No idea could involve more confusion. The person that is an unbeliever is reprobated from all eternity; but should he be converted he is elected from all eternity! If he believe to day, he is one of the elect; if he fall into sin and unbelief to morrow, he is a reprobate; and both of these are the eternal decrees of God! But we know it cannot be true of one man, that he is elected to eternal life, or reprobated to endless misery, according as he believes or disbelieves. If the doctrine be true, he either must be elected or reprobated, independent of his faith. If he were elected when a sinner, he was elected when a sinner; and if reprobated when a sinner, he never could be elected. A decree from all eternity could not take place after man's creation, nor be determined by his moral actions.

Similar arguments may be used relative to God's love or hate mankind according as they believe in his love or hatred, it introduces a proposition that carries in itself evident marks of absurdity. If he love the believer and hate the unbeliever, the first believing that God loves him, the second believing that God hates him, how can the unbeliever's view be any more false than the believer's? And how can he be converted, seeing he holds the truth? And besides, how can a man be called an unbeliever when he believes the truth? But if God love the sinner, (as the scriptures expressly teach) and a man does not believe it, then he is an unbeliever. Because he holds not the truth.

II. Hope, like faith, always presupposes evidence, and embraces objects. Tho we are obliged to believe, when sufficient evidence is visible, altho the object be undesirable, we can never hope contrary to desire. There may likewise be a difference between hope and desire. A hope must always embrace a desire; but a desire does not always imply a hope. For the former must be founded on some degree of evidence; whereas the latter is only supported by the common energies of sensibility. The hope we have in Christ, being founded on the solemn promises of the living God, is "as an anchor of the soul," and amounts, on such strong testimony, to full assurance.

111. It is written, "the just shall live by faith," and "we are saved by hope," yet charity is greater than faith and hope. The modern acceptance of charity is the bestowment of alms; but it is commonly used in scripture to signify the principle, whence the fruits of benevolence proceed, rather than the fruits themselves. It has been noticed by many, that charity and love are anonymous terms, and are frequently made the translation of the same original. It was charity then in our heavenly Father that dictated the benevolent design of man's salvation. Through charity he sent his beloved Son, "not to condemn the world, but that the world through him might be saved." Charity in man is that ennobling principle which renders his character amiable, and clothes him with Christian graces.

The preeminence of charity, which the Apostle pronounces, over faith and hope, is seen in different ways. Charity is the more excellent in its nature; because, without it, the voice of the most celebrated orator would be but sounding brass or a tinkling cymbal; and the most splendid donations, mere ostentation arid show. It is the greater, because it is an everlasting principle, whereas faith and hope are not. St. Paul calls Jesus "the author and finisher" of our faith. We see then his testimony, that faith had a beginning, and must have an end. Reason teaches us the same is true of hope. When we receive the things hoped for, hope is finished in fruition, and if our hope be false, it must end in disappointment. Then when terrestrial things are no more; when the faithful receive the crown of life; and when the hope which is as an anchor of the soul, sure and stedfast, receives its anticipations; then will charity live, and bless the happy inhabitants of celestial glory.

We may consider charity greater than faith and hope, because it is an attribute of the Deity, exclusive of the others. Faith in the sense of credence, cannot belong to him, who absolutely knows all things; nor can he that enjoys the fulness of heaven and earth hope for that which he does not possess; for all things are his.

To the Editor of the Remembrancer.

Sir, The name of Mr. Sumner is so well and deservedly known by his several valuable publications, and his last Sermon on the "Encouragements of the Christian Minister," presents a view of these so interesting and instructive, that I feel very unwilling to find fault, where there is so much that deserves commendation and praise. The higher, however, a writer stands in the public estimation, the more important is it, that his errors, if errors, should be detected. In the Sermon above mentioned, there is the following passage: "The sinner, acknowledging his guilt, finds the necessity of applying to Him, who underwent the chastisement of our peace, and of being clothed in a righteousness which will bear the piercing scrutiny of Omniscience and of seeking that 'holiness without which no man shall see the Lord.' If Mr. S. means by this righteousness, the imputed righteousness of Christ, in which the sinner is hereafter to be clothed, I would beg to submit to his consideration, the following excellent passage from Bishop Bull's Sermon on the "Different Degrees of Bliss in Heaven." Vol. i. p. 180. 8vo. "They thus argue," says the Bishop (speaking of those who held a contrary opinion from himself on the subject,) "The future glory" See Phil. iii. 9. of the saints is the purchase of Christ's righteousness, which of the saints is the purchase of Christ's righteousness, which is alike imputed to all true believers, and they have an equal share therein, and consequently they shall share equally in the future glory." Answer: the doctrine of the imputed righteousness of Christ, as it hath been too commonly taught and understood, hath been a fruitful mother of many pernicious and dangerous errors in divinity. In the objection, it is supposed, that the righteousness of Christ is so imputed to every believer, that it becomes formally his righteousness, and that upon the sole account thereof he hath a right to the future glory. And if this were true, if Christ's righteousness were thus HIS, that righteousness, being the most perfect righteousness, nothing less could answer it than the highest reward in heaven; and so indeed it would necessarily follow, that the future glory of all the saints should be alike and equal. But the supposition hath no foundation in Scripture, yea, it is plainly false. And that it is so, if we had no other argument, the very doctrine we are now upon, were sufficient to evince. We have proved, by very plain texts of Scripture, that there will be a disparity of rewards in the life to come, according to the disparity of men's graces and good works in this life; and from hence we may safely conclude, that the doctrine of those who teach that the perfect righteousness of Christ is formally the righteousness of every believer, and that thereupon he hath a right to the highest reward in heaven, is certainly false. Nay, indeed, if that doctrine of theirs were true, a consequence would follow, which cannot be uttered without trembling, that every saint shall be equal to Christ in glory; Christ's righteousness being his, and so he having a right to whatsoever that righteousness deserved. "But answer more directly to the objection; there is nothing more certain, than that the future glory of the saints is the purchase of Christ righteousness.' But how? By the meritorious obedience of Christ in his life- and death, a covenant of grace, mercy, and life eternal was procured, ratified and established between God and the sinful sons of men; the condition of the covenant is 'faith working by love,' or faith fruitful of good works. And there is also sufficient grace promised to all that shall heartily seek it, for the performance of that condition. It is from the covenant of infinite mercy in Christ Jesus alone that our imperfect good works have any ordination to so excellent a reward as the future glory; and it is mercy, the rich mercy, the royal bounty and liberality of God expressed in the same covenant that assigns to greater degrees of grace here, greater degrees of glory hereafter. This is the plain truth." If, on the other hand, Mr. S. intends that Christian righteousness which all in its several degrees, according to the proportion of their faith, and the use of God's grace may attain unto; that righteousness springing out of a true and living faith in the Lord Jesus Christ which, albeit that it deserved not heaven, yet through the perfect righteousness, and atoning blood of Christ, that effectual seal of the covenant of grace, shall obtain heaven; or, in the excellent words of St. Paul, "make us meet to be partakers of the inheritance of the saints in light;" I think his words are liable to misconstruction, and I could wish he had expressed himself more fully. I can easily conceive how our righteousness, imperfect as it is, may be freely accepted for Christ's sake by Infinite Mercy; but not how it ever can be so perfect, as to bear "the piercing scrutiny of Omniscience."

Sermon 82: Degrees of Glory in Heaven

1 COR. xv. 41, 42: One star differeth from another star in glory. So also, is the resurrection of the dead.

How pleasant and animating is it to the Christian, to turn his thoughts occasionally from the sins and follies, the misery and anguish, which are found in this world, and fix them upon that blessed state reserved for the pious, into which guilt or wo shall never enter! How cheering, to meditate on the high occupations and sublime joys of those who, "having washed their robes, and made them white in the blood of the Lamb," now shout hallelujahs to his praise! And are all these redeemed sinners perfectly equal in splendour and felicity? Are there no different degrees of glory in heaven? This is the single question which we propose to examine in the ensuing discourse, and to which we are naturally led by the words of the text. "One star differeth from another star in glory; so also is the resurrection of the dead."

That there will be different degrees of glory among the redeemed, is a truth which is established alike by scripture and reason, and which, far from being a merely speculative point, must, when firmly believed, have a strong influence on our practice. Let us,

1. Explain and prove it.
2. Answer the objections which have been made against it, and,
3. Apply it for the regulation of our affections, and the conduct of our lives.

First:

When we maintain that our future glory will differ in degree, according to our holiness in this world, we are far from embracing the proud opinion of the papists, that this felicity, and these degrees of glory, are at all merited by our works. Even an innocent creature, much less a sinner, can merit nothing from the holy God. Our salvation must be, entirely of grace. But we say, that as the Lord has Displayed his abounding mercy and his love to holiness, by rewarding a short and imperfect obedience by an eternal and inconceivable glory, so it is accordant with these perfections, to confer higher degrees of this glory on those whose obedience has been more constant, and whose piety more ardent. We say, that while every temporal as well as celestial blessing flows from sovereign grace, through the blood of the cross, God has been pleased in his wisdom, to establish a certain chain and order in the distribution and the degree of his gifts; so that those who are most zealously engaged in his cause, and who do most for the Redeemer, shall wear a brighter crown, and be elevated to a higher glory than those who, though sincere, are more cold in their love, less engaged in his service.

While we maintain that there will be different degrees of glory, we allow that all will nevertheless be perfectly happy, and receive that degree of felicity which is commensurate with their faculties, and power of enjoyment; so that there shall be no grief, no envyings, no uneasy and distressing desires, in any who shall surround the throne of God, and of the Lamb.

While we maintain that there will be different degrees of glory, we also maintain that in many things their felicity will be common. It will be common in its object, the blessed God and adorable Redeemer; in its subject, all the powers of the glorified body and soul; in its duration, which will be eternal; in its security, since all the blest are sustained by the divine promise and faithfulness; in the full satisfaction of soul which all will possess.

After this explanation of the doctrine, let us confirm it. It is proved:

1. By all those passages of scripture which lay down, in general terms, the great rule of God's proceedings with the children of men. Thus says the apostle Paul, (2 Cor. v. 10.) "We must all appear before the judgment-seat of Christ, that every one may receive the things done in his body, according to that he hath done, whether it be good or bad." (Rom. ii. 6.) God "will render to every one according to his works." In 2 Cor. ix. 6. in speaking of benevolence to poor Christians, he lays down a general maxim: "He that soweth sparingly shall reap also sparingly, and he that soweth liberally, shall reap also liberally." That he here refers to the rewards of the future world, is evident from the manner in which he uses the same figure in Gal. vi. 7—9. "Whatsoever a man soweth that shall he also reap. For he that soweth to the flesh, shall of the flesh reap corruption; but he that soweth to the Spirit, shall of the Spirit reap life everlasting. Let us not be weary in well doing, for in due season we shall reap, if we faint not." Indeed, in most instances where this figure is used, our good or our bad actions are represented as the seed whence our future felicity or misery must spring. But if such be the general rule of God's conduct, if there will be a proportion between the future world and the present, there must be degrees of glory; there must be a higher station for the fervent and seraphic Christian, than for those who drag heavily along in the path to heaven, and are by their walk scarcely distinguishable from the men of the world..
2. We argue from the account which this same apostle gives of the different rewards which will be given to the ministers of the gospel. This remarkable and figurative description is found, I Cor. iii. 12 —15. He speaks of those preachers who preserve the only foundation which is laid, Christ Jesus; and he compares them to architects, who build upon this good foundation materials very different. The exhortations of some are like "gold, silver, or precious stones," and are calculated to animate, encourage, and cheer, those who hear them. Those of the others resemble "wood, hay, and stubble," and injure more than advance edification. In the awful day of scrutiny, when "every man's work shall be tried as with fire," the first of these classes, adds the apostle, "shall receive a reward," evidently implying, one proportioned to his faithfulness, zeal, and usefulness in the gospel. The others, "having their work burnt, shall suffer loss;" but having been founded on Jesus, the rock of ages; having preserved the essential truths of religion, notwithstanding the errors they may have taught through ignorance or mistake, they shall be saved, yet so as by fire; with a difficulty and danger resembling that of a person who escapes from his dwelling in flames, and only preserves his life, while his house is consumed, and his goods destroyed. In this representation of the apostle, do we not perceive that there are persons who obtain salvation, and yet have not the recompense which the wiser administrators of the word receive? And are we not authorized to conclude, that there will be the same difference between those who are hearers, according to the manner they have profited by the instructions given to them?

3. Is not this truth taught in Dan. xii. 3.? The prophet, having spoken of the two great classes into which men shall be divided at the general resurrection, when "some shall wake to everlasting life, and some to everlasting contempt," then declares the difference that shall appear even among the pious; "They that be wise shall shine as the brightness of the firmament; and they that turn many to righteousness, as the stars, for ever and ever." As there is a difference between the general brilliancy of the firmament, and the lustre of the stars, so there shall be a difference between those ordinary Christians who obtain felicity, and those zealous persons who have been the instruments of the conversion of many sinners.
4. Read the parable of the pounds in Luke xix. Our Saviour appears there fully to have decided this point. Under the emblem of a nobleman going into a far country to receive a kingdom, and giving to his ten servants ten pounds, to trade therewith till his return; he represents himself ascending into heaven to assume his kingdom, and committing to his servants many gifts with which to profit for their own salvation, and that of their neighbour, till he should return to judgment. Though nine of them had been diligent, they had been so in different degrees: they were all magnificently rewarded; and "because they had been faithful over few things, were made rulers over many things;" yet their reward was different. While he whose pound had gained ten was appointed over ten cities; he who had gained five was placed over five only. What could more fully show that while all believers shall "enter into the joy of their Lord," shall be surrounded by happiness and glory, there shall yet be various degrees of this glory?
5. The apostle Paul treating of the resurrection says, 1 Cor. xv. 41, 42, "There is one glory of the sun, and another glory of the moon, and another glory of the stars: for one star differeth from another star in glory. So also is the resurrection of the dead." Though he here speaks only of the difference in the glorified body, yet the same causes which render it fit for God to cause the glorified bodies of the saints to differ in brilliancy and lustre, make it proper for him to give different degrees of glory to their whole persons.
6. In perusing the scriptures, we find the patriarchs, the prophets, and the apostles, uniformly represented as occupying a more conspicuous situation in glory than ordinary believers. Are the felicities of heaven represented as a feast? Abraham, Isaac, and Jacob, there hold the most honourable station. Is it exhibited as a kingdom? The apostles are there to sit conspicuously upon twelve thrones, judging the twelve tribes of Israel. (Matt. xviii. 1—19. 28. Luke xxii. 30. Numerous similar expressions are used concerning them; and if these are to differ from other believers, because of their zeal and fidelity, must not believers, differ from each other? If a Paul shall shine more resplendent than a Watts, shall a Watts only occupy the station of one in whom the pulse of spiritual life scarcely beats?"
7. It is doubted by none that there will be degrees of punishment in hell; that some will there suffer more excruciating torments than others. But if the wicked are more punished in proportion to their crimes, must we not suppose that the saints are more rewarded in proportion to their virtues?
8. Let us carry still further this reasoning from analogy. Look at nature; and in what an infinite variety of methods do you see the Creator displaying his perfections? Look at the operations of grace; you see that "there are diversities of gifts, though but one Spirit." Look at Christians; how various in their attainments, their knowledge, their holiness, and joy, though all beloved by God! Look at the heavenly host; though all holy and happy, there are various orders among them -archangels, and angels, thrones, dominions, principalities, and powers. Should we not then suppose, that in analogy to the other works of God, there would be degrees of glory among the West?

9. Finally, the transactions of the judgment-day, and the nature of the future felicity confirm this truth. We learn from the twenty-fifth chapter of Matthew, that in the decisive day the Lord will with approbation publish the works of believers to the universe. Must not this approbation be various? Does not the sense and remembrance of it constitute one of the joys of heaven? Can the soul that has heard it from the Saviour whom he loves, ever forget it? One of the chief sources of heavenly felicity is the glorifying of God. But if his glory be dear to us, must we not be happier in proportion as we have glorified him here below? Can a Christian, that is "saved as by fire," have the same raptures of soul that are felt by Paul and his associates, to whom, as the instruments in the hand, is owing the introduction of Christianity in Europe; the ten thousand times ten thousand believers, who have in successive ages there flourished through the instrumentality of those taught by him and their descendants; and the disciples of Jesus in this new world, which received the light of the gospel from that quarter of the globe which was taught by the apostle?

Second:

Let us very briefly, in the Second place, consider the objections that have been made against this doctrine.

1. Perhaps the most plausible has been drawn from the parable of the labourers in Matt. xx. 1—15. You recollect that in that parable the householder sent labourers into his vineyard at different hours, all of whom, however, received at last the same recompense. But surely those who make this objection have never attended to the circumstances of the parable. How can the reward signify eternal life, since it is given to the murmurers and envious; to those who, in verse 14, are ordered to depart from their Lord; to those who were not satisfied with the portion given to them? The great scope and design of the parable are to repress the pride of the Jews, and show the propriety of the vocation of the Gentiles. It has no reference whatever to the future rewards of the pious.
2. "But," it has been said, "we are saved by grace, and not by works; our only title to glory is the purchase made by the atonement of the Redeemer. How, then, can our glory be proportioned to our works? Are not all believers, through the merits of Christ, alike justified and adopted, and must they not therefore be alike glorified?" My brethren, the Scripture is perfectly consistent with itself. It asserts the doctrines of grace, the only refuge of the perishing sinner. It asserts, also, the inequality of future glory. And do the blessings of God spring less from grace, because he has established a wise order in the distribution of them? We are called, justified, adopted, only through the merits of Christ; yet notwithstanding this, there are different degrees of holiness and comfort enjoyed by Christians upon earth; notwithstanding this, then, there may be different degrees of glory in the world which is to come. The objection is precisely as strong against a difference in sanctification, a fact which comes daily under our eyes, as against a difference in glorification.
3. "But," say the opposers of this doctrine, "as all the blessed are perfectly holy, they must all be perfectly and alike happy." The conclusion by no means follows. Are the angels alike elevated, because they are all perfectly holy? We know that there are distinctions among them. Would it not be almost blasphemy to say, that any creature was as happy as the blessed God, provided like him it could be perfectly holy? If two diamonds are of the same water and perfection, does it follow, that there may not be a difference in their weight and value?
4. "But they all derive their felicity from the same source, the beatific vision of God, and therefore their felicity must be equal." Though one of the chief constituents of hell is the deprivation of the vision of God, are therefore the punishments of the accursed equal? May we not view the same sun, and receive its rays differently? When vessels of different capacity cast into the same ocean, are filled by the same mass of waters, must the quantity they receive be alike?
5. "But the titles given to the redeemed are the same; they are all called kings, the sons of God, the spouse, the members of Christ." And are not these names given to believers, even while they are on earth? and, notwithstanding, do we not see a great diversity among them? Are all kings equal in power? Have all sons the same inheritance? Is not the robe of the spouse more richly embroidered in some parts than in others? Have all members of the body equal honour?

These, my brethren, are the principal objections against this doctrine. Let us now proceed, in the Third and last place, to a practical improvement of it.

Third:

1. It addresses the young. There is not one of you, my young friends, who does not intend to turn unto the Lord before you leave this world? There is not one of you that has formed the mad and guilty resolution to renounce the joys of heaven, and embrace the agonies of hell. But you resolve at present to devote yourselves to the world, and hereafter to think of religion. Let us suppose (and how many improbabilities are included in the supposition!) that these intentions are realized; that, after living many years in sin, you are not like so many others, given up to judicial hardness; that, after long contemning the offers of grace, and grieving the Holy Spirit, you are not abandoned by him; that, in a dying world, you are preserved in life by that God against whom you are in rebellion; that you are not surprised, as so many thousands now in hell have been surprised, before their promised and purposed return to God was accomplished: suppose all this, though I repeat, how many improbabilities are included in the supposition — yet still what irreparable losses will you have sustained, what sacrifices will you have made during your years of folly and vice! Instead of preparing for a higher glory, for a nearer approach and assimilation to God, you will have employed yourselves in plucking the jewels from that crown which might have sparkled on your brow, in diminishing the elevation to which you might have attained. Trifle no longer with things of eternal consequence; but in youth begin to aspire after high degrees of glory, honour, and immortality.
2. Let this subject solemnly address all who delay their repentance. You cry, To-morrow, and tomorrow; and thus many of you will continue to cry, till your last sickness seizes you, till you are laid on the bed of death. Even if you then preserve your reason and are sensible of your danger, what answer will you be able to give to conscience, when it shall ask you, what preparations you have made for eternity, what graces you have acquired, what holy duties you have performed? Is it not to mock God, to sin now with boldness, from the hope of conversion in our last hours? Is it not to trifle and sport with his grace, to expect from it a harvest, when we have never sown? I mistake; you have sown, and you shall reap; you have sown to the flesh, and of the flesh shall reap corruption; you have sown iniquity, you shall reap torment; you have sown sin, you shall reap death. Insult not the sanctity of God's attributes, by supposing that, after a criminal life, you will enjoy the rewards promised to holiness. Even if, by a miracle of grace, you should then be converted, (and such miracles are indeed rare, inconceivably more rare, than is ordinarily supposed,) yet still, how much glory and felicity will you have lost, by neglecting, during so many years, to lay up treasures in heaven! Delay not then, I beseech you by your everlasting interests, defer not for a moment longer your return to your God and your Redeemer.
3. This subject teaches us the unspeakable value of time, and the necessity of employing it in good works. Look at life in itself; it is but a shadow. Look at it as connected with a future world; it becomes of unutterable importance. Every thing we do gives a complexion to our eternal state. Here we receive the stamp and impression that shall endure for ever. Shall we then spend our days in idleness, in folly, in sin? Shall we not diligently improve every passing moment? Shall we not continually be scattering that seed, from which so glorious a harvest will spring? Yes; whilst we are cultivating our graces, mortifying our corruptions, instructing the ignorant, comforting the afflicted, protecting the oppressed, relieving the poor, and performing other acts of piety or benevolence, from Christian principles, we are doing that of which we shall hereafter reap the fruit; we are, in a sense, giving stability to our flying, vanishing hours, by employing them for the augmentation of our eternal happiness. But forget not, that, to produce this effect, these actions must proceed from proper and Christian principles. If our labours are attended with pharisaical pride; if we expect to merit heaven by our good deeds; if we are animated by a self-righteous spirit; we shall at the final day reap no harvest except that of shame and disappointment. But if, unfeignedly believing in Jesus, and renouncing our own righteousness, we perform these works from love to God, and gratitude to the Redeemer, we shall obtain so rich a recompense, as to display the immensity of divine grace, and the riches of divine goodness.

Let this subject, then, inspire us with a high and holy ambition. "Covet earnestly the best gifts," said the apostle; and in the spirit of his exhortation, we say to you, covet the highest places in heaven; aim to sit next to cherubim and seraphim; nay, if it were possible, strive to get in heaven the same place which John, the beloved disciple, held here on earth, to lean on the very bosom of Christ himself. By that increase of grace, which will proportionably increase glory; by continually exercising holiness, strive continually to adorn your crown, to irradiate your diadem of stars with a lustre that shall outshine the sun in its brightness; and to acquire much of that glory, the least measure of which is precious and inestimable.

And, with these high aims, mingle the deepest humility. Aspire to the greatest of God's blessings; but at the same time confess that you are unworthy of the least of them. Seek to shine like the seraphim in splendour and glory, and emulate them in deep prostration of soul, under a sense of your unworthiness before the holy God. Acknowledge, in the midst of your high anticipations, that it is only through the abounding grace of God, and the infinite merits of Jesus, that heaven has been opened for you, or for any of the children of men.

Surely, surely my children, an old age thus placid and venerable, is an object worthy of your desires; surely these peaceful recollections, these sublime prospects, amidst the dreariness of age, are deserving your exertions. Early piety will have a considerable influence on your eternal felicity.

In dwelling upon the two different and contrary states of heaven and hell, we are not to conceive of them as conditions of being, where all persons in the former will be equally happy, and all in the latter equally miserable. There are different degrees of glory in one, and different degrees of torment in the other. This is proved by scripture, and accords with reason. Grace is glory in the bud; glory is grace in a state of fructification; and as in the natural world, so it is in the spiritual one, where there is little blossom, there cannot be much fruit.

Life is the seedtime for eternity; what a man soweth, that shall he also reap, not only in kind, but degree. Late sowings, as well as scanty ones, are generally followed with short crops. The reward of the righteous is all of grace, but then that grace which rewards the righteous rather than the wicked, may, with equal consistency, reward righteousness according to its degrees. We cannot think that the reward of the dying thief, who was converted in the dark Valley of the shadow of death, will be equal to that of Timothy or of Paul, who spent a long and laborious life in the service of Christ. Nor is it to be imagined, that the crown of the aged convert will be as bright or as heavy, as that of the Christian who is converted in youth, and continues, into good old age, in a course of consistent piety.

Notes on John Chapter 14

Verse 1. Let not your heart be troubled

After having answered St. Peter's question, he addresses himself again to his disciples, and tells them not to be afflicted at his leaving them, nor to lose courage because of what he said concerning Peter's denying him; that if they reposed their confidence in God, he would protect them; and that, howsoever they might see him treated, they should believe in him more firmly, as his sufferings, death, and resurrection should be to them the most positive proof of his being the Messiah, the Saviour of the world.

Ye believe in God, believe also in me.

It is best to read both the verbs in the imperative mood:-Place your confidence in God, and in me as the Mediator between God and man, John 14:12-14; and expect the utmost support from God; but expect it all through me. The disciples began to lose all hope of a secular kingdom, and were discouraged in consequence: Christ promises them a spiritual and heavenly inheritance, and thus lifts up their drooping hearts.

Verse 2. In my Fathers house, Many mansions

Though I have said before that whither I am going ye cannot come now, yet do not think that we shall be for ever separated. I am going to that state of glory where there is not only a place of supreme eminence for myself, but also places for all my disciples;-various degrees of glory, suited to the various capacities and attainments of my followers.

Our Lord alludes here to the temple, which was called the house of God, in the precincts of which there were a great number of chambers, 1 Kings 6:5;; Ezra 8:29;; Jeremiah 35:2,4;; 36:10.

If not I would have told you.

If your places were not prepared in the kingdom of God, I would not have permitted you to have indulged a vain hope concerning future blessedness.

Verse 3. And if I go

And when I shall have gone and prepared a place for you-opened the kingdom of an eternal glory for your reception, and for the reception of all that shall die in the faith, I will come again, after my resurrection, and give you the fullest assurances of this state of blessedness; and confirm you in the faith, by my grace and the effusion of my Spirit. Dr. Lightfoot thinks, and with great probability too, that there is an allusion here to Numbers 10:33: And the ark of the Lord went before them to search out a resting place for them.

Comments on 1 Corinthians 15

Verse 40. There are also celestial bodies, and bodies terrestrial

The apostle certainly does not speak of celestial and terrestrial bodies in the sense in which we use those terms: we invariably mean by the former the sun, moon, planets, and stars; by the latter, masses of inanimate matter. But the apostle speaks of human beings, some of which were clothed with celestial, others with terrestrial bodies. It is very likely, therefore, that he means by the celestial bodies such as those refined human bodies with which Enoch, Elijah, and Christ himself, appear in the realms of glory: to which we may add the bodies of those saints which arose after our Lord's resurrection; and, after having appeared to many, doubtless were taken up to paradise. By terrestrial bodies we may understand those in which the saints now live.

But the glory of the celestial is one

The glory—the excellence, beauty, and perfection. Even the present frail human body possesses an indescribable degree of contrivance, art, economy, order, beauty, and excellence; but the celestial body, that in which Christ now appears, and according to which ours shall be raised, (3:21,) will exceed the excellence of this beyond all comparison. A glory or splendour will belong to that which does not belong to this: here there is a glory of excellence; there, there will be a glory of light and effulgence; for the bodies of the saints shall shine like the sun in the kingdom of their Father. See Matthew 13:43.

Verse 41. There is one glory of the sun

As if he had said: This may be illustrated by the present appearance of the celestial bodies which belong to our system. The sun has a greater degree of splendour than the moon; the moon than the planets; and the planets than the stars. And even in the fixed stars, one has a greater degree of splendour than another, which may proceed either from their different magnitudes, or from the comparative proximity of some of them to our earth; but from which of these causes, or from what other cause unknown, we cannot tell, as it is impossible to ascertain the distance of any of the fixed stars; even the nearest of them being too remote to afford any sensible parallax, without which their distances cannot be measured. See the concluding observations.

Verse 42. So also is the resurrection of the dead.

That is, the bodies of the dead, though all immortal, shall possess different degrees of splendour and glory, according to the state of holiness in which their respective souls were found. The rabbins have some crude notions concerning different degrees of glory, which the righteous shall possess in the kingdom of heaven. They make out seven degrees:

- "The first of which is possessed by tsaddi kim, the just, who observe the covenant of the holy, blessed God, and subjugate all evil affections."
- "The second is possessed by those who are yesharim, the upright; whose delight it is to walk in the ways of God and please him."
- "The third is for temimim, the perfect: those who, with integrity, walk in the ways of God, and do not curiously pry into his dispensations."
- "The fourth is for kedoshim, the holy ones; those who are the excellent of the earth, in whom is all God's delight." Psalms 16:3."
- "The fifth is for baaley teshubah, the chief of the penitents; who have broken through the brazen doors, and returned to the Lord."
- "The sixth is for tinukoth shel beith raban, the scholars and tender ones; who have not transgressed."
- "The seventh is for chasidim, the godly: and this is the innermost of all the departments."

These seven degrees require a comment by themselves.

There is a saying among the rabbins very like that of the apostle in this and the preceding verse Siphri, in Yalcut Simeoni, page 2, fol. 10: "The faces of the righteous shall be, in the world to come, like suns, moons, the heaven, stars, lightnings: and like the lilies and candlesticks of the temple."

It is sown in corruption

The body is buried in a state of degradation, decay, and corruption. The apostle uses the word sown to intimate that the body shall rise again, as a seed springs up that has been sown in the earth.

It is raised in incorruption

Being no more subject to corruption, dissolution, and death.

Verse 43. It is sown in dishonour

Being now stripped of all the glory it had as a machine, fearfully and wonderfully made by the hands of God; and also consigned to death and destruction because of sin. This is the most dishonourable circumstance.

It is raised in glory

It is raised a glorious body, because immortal, and for ever redeemed from the empire of death.

It is sown in weakness

The principles of dissolution, corruption, and decay, have prevailed over it; disease undermined it; and death made it his prey.

It is raised in power

To be no more liable to weakness, through labour; decay, by age; wasting, by disease; and dissolution, by death.

Verse 44. It is sown a natural body

An animal body, having a multiplicity of solids and fluids of different kinds, with different functions; composed of muscles, fibres, tendons, cartilages, bones, arteries, veins, nerves, blood, and various juices, requiring continual support from aliment; and hence the necessity of labour to provide food, and skill to prepare it; which food must be masticated, digested, and refined; what is proper for nourishment secreted, brought into the circulation, farther elaborated, and prepared to enter into the composition of every part; hence growth and nutrition; without which no organized body can possibly exist.

It is raised a spiritual body.

One perfect in all its parts; no longer dependent on natural productions for its support; being built up on indestructible principles, and existing in a region where there shall be no more death; no more causes of decay leading to dissolution; and consequently, no more necessity for food, nutrition, existence and spiritual support.

What the apostle says here is quite consistent with the views his countrymen had on this subject.

In Sohar Chadash, fol. 43, it is said: "So shall it be in the resurrection of the dead; only, the old uncleanness shall not be found."

R. Bechai, on the law, fol. 14, says: "When the godly shall arise, their bodies shall be pure and innocent; obedient to the instinct of the soul: there shall be no adversary, nor any evil disease."

Rab. Pinchas says: "The holy blessed God shall make the bodies of the righteous as beautiful as the body of Adam was when he entered into paradise."

Rab. Levi says: "When the soul is in heaven, it is clothed with celestial light; when it returns to the body, it shall have the same light; and then the body shall shine like the splendour of the firmament of heaven. Then shall men gain the knowledge of what is perfect." Sohar. Gen., fol. 69.

The Jews have an opinion that the os coxendicis, the lower joint of the backbone, survives the corruption of the body; and that it is out of this bone that the resurrection body is formed. In the place last quoted, fol. 70, we have the following teachings on this subject: "Let us borrow an example from what relates to the purifying of silver. First, the ore is cast into the burning furnace, that it may be separated from its earthly impurities; it is then silver, but not perfect silver. They put it into the furnace a second time, and then all its scoriae are separated from it, and it becomes perfect silver, without any adulteration. Thus does the holy blessed God: he first buries our bodies under the earth, where they putrefy and corrupt, that nothing remains but that one bone: from this a new body is produced, which is indeed a body, but not a perfect body. But in that great day, when all bodies are hidden in the earth, and the soul departs, then even that bone decays, and the body which was formed out of it remains, and is as the light of the sun, and the splendour of heaven. Thus, as the silver was purified, so is the body: and no imperfect mixture remains." See Schoettgen.

These things must not be treated as rabbinical dotages; the different similes used for the apostle have the same spirit and design: as the seed which is sown in the earth rots, and out of the germ contained in it God in his providence produces a root, stalk, leaves, ear, and a great numerical increase of grains; is it not likely that God, out of some essential parts of the body that now is, will produce the resurrection body; and will then give the soul a body as it pleaseth him; and so completely preserve the individuality of every human being, as he does of every grain; giving to each its own body? 1 Corinthians 15:38. that as surely as the grain of wheat shall produce wheat after it is cast in the earth, corrupts, and dies; so surely shall our bodies produce the same bodies as to their essential individuality. As the germination of seeds is produced by his wisdom and power, so shall the pure and perfect human body be in the resurrection. Hence he does not say the body is buried, but the body is sown; it is sown in weakness, it is sown in dishonour,

There is a natural body, and there is a spiritual body.

This very saying is found in so many words, in Yalcut Rubeni, fol. 126: "There are different kinds of men."

"There is a spiritual Adam, and there is also a corporeal Adam."

Verse 45. The first man Adam was made a living soul

These forms of expression are also common among the Jews: hence we find Adam harishon, "Adam the first;" and Adam kadmai, "Adam the last." They assert that there are two Adams: 1. The mystical heavenly Adam; and 2. The mystical earthly Adam. See Sohar Exod., fol. 29; and the several examples in Schoettgen. The apostle says this is written: The first man Adam was made a living soul: this is found Genesis 2:7, in the words nishmath chiyim, the breath of lives; which the apostle translates ἰψὺν ζῶντα, a living soul.

The last Adam-a quickening spirit.

This is also said to be written; but where, says Dr. Lightfoot, is this written in the whole sacred book? Schoettgen replies, In the very same verse, and in these words: vayehi ha-Adam le-nephesh chayah, and Adam became a living soul; which the apostle translates ἰψὺν ζῶντα, a quickening, or life-giving spirit. Among the cabalistic Jews nephesh is considered as implying greater dignity than nishma. The former may be considered as pointing out the rational, the latter the sensitive soul. All these references to Jewish opinions and forms of speech the apostle uses to convince them that the thing was possible; and that the resurrection of the body was generally credited by all their wise and learned men. The Jews, as Dr. Lightfoot observes, speak frequently of the Spirit of the Messiah; and they allow that it was this Spirit that moved on the face of the waters, Genesis 1:2. And they assert that the Messiah shall quicken those who dwell in the dust.

"It ought not to be passed by," says the same author, "that Adam, receiving from God the promise of Christ-The seed of the woman shall bruise the head of the serpent, and believing it, named his wife Chauvah, that is, life; so the Septuagint,. And Adam called the name of his wife, Life. What! Is she called Life that brought death into the world? But Adam perceived the last Adam exhibited to him in the promise, to be a quickening or life-giving spirit; and had brought in a better life of the soul; and should at last bring in a better life of the body. Hence is that saying, John 1:4: In HIM was LIFE."

Some contend that the first Adam and the last Adam mean the same person in two different states: the first man with the body of his creation; the same person with the body of his resurrection. See Clarke on 1 Corinthians 15:49.

Verse 46. That was not first which is spiritual

The natural or animal body, described 1 Corinthians 15:44, was the first; it was the body with which Adam was created. The spiritual body is the last, and is that with which the soul is to be clothed in the resurrection.

Verse 47. The first man is of the earth

That is: Adam's body was made out of the dust of the earth; and hence the apostle says he was of the dust; for the body was made aphar min ha-adamah, dust from the ground; Genesis 2:7.

The second man is-from heaven.

Heavenly, as several good MSS. and versions read. The resurrection body shall be of a heavenly nature, and not subject to decay or death. What is formed of earth must live after an earthly manner; must be nourished and supported by the earth: what is from heaven is of a spiritual nature; and shall have no farther connection with, nor dependence upon, earth. I conceive both these clauses to relate to man; and to point out the difference between the animal body and the spiritual body, or between the bodies which we now have and the bodies which we shall have in the resurrection. But can this be the meaning of the clause, the second man is the Lord from heaven? In the quotation I have omitted the Lord, on the following authorities: MANUSCRIPTS-BCDEFG, and two others. VERSIONS-Coptic, Aethiopic, Armenian in the margin, Vulgate, and Itala. FATHERS-Origen, who quotes it once and omits it once; Athanasius, Basil, the two Gregories, Nyssen and Nazianzen; Isidore, Cyril, Tertullian, Cyprian, Hilary, Zeno, Ambrose, Augustine, Jerome, Ambrosiaster, Philaster, Leo, Pacianus, Primasius, Sedulius, Bede, and others. See these authorities more at large in Wetstein. Some of the most eminent of modern critics leave out the word, and Tertullian says that it was put in by the heretic Marcion. I do think that the word is not legitimate in this place. The verse is read by the MSS., versions, and fathers referred to, thus: The first man is of the earth, earthy; the second man is of heaven, heavenly; being omitted and added. The first man and the second man of this verse are the same as the first Adam and the second Adam of 1 Corinthians 15:45, and it is not clear that Christ is meant in either place. Some suppose that there is a reference here to what Eve said when she brought forth Cain: I have gotten a man from the Lord, kanithi ish eth Yehovah, I have possessed or obtained a man, the Lord; that is, as Dr. Lightfoot explains it, that the Lord himself should become man: and he thinks that Eve had respect to the promise of Christ when she named her son; as Adam had when he named his wife. If Eve had this in view, we can only say she was sadly mistaken: indeed the conjecture is too refined.

The terms first man of the earth, and second man from heaven, are frequent among the Jews: the superior Adam; and Adam the inferior; that is, the earthly and the heavenly Adam: Adam before the resurrection, and Adam after it.

Verse 48. As is the earthy, from the earth, so are all his descendants; frail, decaying, and subject to death.

As is the heavenly

As is the heavenly state of Adam and all glorified beings, so shall be the state of all those who, at the resurrection, are found fit for glory.

Verse 49. And as we have borne the image of the earthy

As being descendants from Adam we have all been born in his likeness, and subject to the same kind of corruption, disgrace, and death; we shall also be raised to a life immortal, such as he now enjoys in the kingdom of God. This interpretation proceeds on the ground that what is here spoken belongs to Adam in his twofold state: viz. of mortality and immortality; of disgrace and honour; of earth and heaven.

But by many commentators the words are understood to refer to Adam and Christ, in 1 Corinthians 15:46-49. By these, Christ is called the second Adam, the quickening Spirit, the second man, and the heavenly; whose image of righteousness and true holiness we are to bear.

But when I consider, 1st. How all these terms are used and applied in the Jewish writings, it appears to me that as this was not their import among them, so it was not the design of Paul; and it would be very difficult to find any place where Jesus Christ is called the second Adam in either Old or New Testament. The discourse of the apostle, Romans 5:14-19, will not prove it, though in those verses there is a comparison drawn between Adam and Christ; but that comparison refers to the extent of the sin and condemnation brought upon all men by the transgression of the first; and the redemption purchased for all men by the sacrifice of the last; and the superabundant grace procured by that sacrifice. But here, the comparison most evidently is between the state of man in this mortal life, and his state after the resurrection. Here, all men are corrupt and mortal, and here, all men die. There, all men shall be incorrupt and immortal, and, whether holy or unholy, shall be eternally immortal.

Of the image of Adam, in his heavenly or paradisaical state, the rabbins talk largely: they say that "God created Adam with a double image, earthly and heavenly; that he was the most perfect of all beings; that his splendour shone from one extremity of the earth to the other; that all feared before him; that he knew all wisdom, both earthly and heavenly; but when he sinned, his glory was diminished, and his wisdom departed from him." Yalcut Rubeni, fol. 10.

They add farther, that "in the time in which Adam received the heavenly image, all creatures came to him, and acknowledged him king of the earth." Ibid., fol. 21.

2. From all this, and much more might be produced on the subject, (see Schoettgen,) it appears that the apostle follows, as far as it could comport with his design, the sentiments of his countrymen, and that he adopts their very phraseology; and that it is through the medium of these sentiments and this phraseology that he is to be understood and interpreted. Others may understand all these passages differently; and still consider them as a parallel between Adam and Christ, which is the general view of interpreters. The view which I have taken of them appears to me to be much more consistent with the nature of the discourse, and the scope and design of the apostle. The common opinion is orthodox: what I here propose is no heresy. There are many difficulties in the chapter, and not a few in the verses immediately under consideration.

Verse 50. Flesh and blood cannot inherit the kingdom

This is a Hebrew periphrasis for man, and man in his present state of infirmity and decay. Man, in his present state, cannot inherit the kingdom of God; his nature is not suited to that place; he could not, in his present weak state, endure an exceeding great and eternal weight of glory. Therefore, it is necessary that he should die, or be changed; that he should have a celestial body suited to the celestial state. The apostle is certainly not speaking of flesh and blood in a moral sense, to signify corruption of mind and heart; but in a natural sense; as such, flesh and blood cannot inherit glory, for the reasons already assigned.

Verse 51. I show you a mystery

That is, a thing which you have never known before. But what is this mystery? Why, that we shall not all sleep; we shall not all die; but we shall all be changed: of this the Jews had not distinct notions. For, as flesh and blood cannot inherit glory, and all shall not be found dead at the day of judgment, then all must be changed-undergo such a change that their bodies may become spiritual, like the bodies of those who shall be raised from the dead.

Verse 52. In a moment

In an atom; that is, an indivisible point of time. In the twinkling of an eye; as soon as a man can wink; which expressions show that this mighty work is to be done by the almighty power of God, as he does all his works, He calls, and it is done. The resurrection of all the dead, from the foundation of the world to that time, and the change of all the living then upon earth, shall be the work of a single moment.

At the last trump

This, as well as all the rest of the peculiar phraseology of this chapter, is merely Jewish, and we must go to the Jewish writers to know what is intended. On this subject, the rabbins use the very same expression. Thus Rabbi Akiba: "How shall the holy blessed God raise the dead? We are taught that God has a trumpet a thousand ells long, according to the ell of God: this trumpet he shall blow, so that the sound of it shall extend from one extremity of the earth to the other. At the first blast the earth shall be shaken; at the second, the dust shall be separated; at the third, the bones shall be gathered together; at the fourth, the members shall wax warm; at the fifth, the heads shall be covered with skin; at the sixth, the souls shall be rejoined to their bodies; at the seventh, all shall revive and stand clothed." See Wetstein. This tradition shows us what we are to understand by the last trump of the apostle; it is the seventh of Rab. Akiba, when the dead shall be all raised, and, being clothed upon with their eternal vehicles, they shall be ready to appear before the judgment seat of God.

For the trumpet shall sound

By this the apostle confirms the substance of the tradition, there shall be the sound of a trumpet on this great day; and this other scriptures teach: see Zechariah 9:14; Matthew 24:31;; John 5:25;; 1 Thessalonians 4:16, in which latter place, the apostle treats this subject among the Thessalonians, as he does here among the Corinthians. See the notes there.

Shall be raised incorruptible

Fully clothed with a new body, to die no more.

We shall be changed.

That is, those who shall then be found alive.

Verse 53. For this corruptible, cannot inherit glory;

therefore, there must be a refinement by death, or a change without it.

Verse 54. Death is swallowed up in victory.

These words are a quotation from Isaiah 25:8, where the Hebrew is billa hammaveth lanetsach: He (God) hath swallowed up death in victory; or, for ever. These words in the Septuagint are thus translated: Death having prevailed, or conquered, hath swallowed up. But in the version of Theodotion, the words are the same with those of the apostle. The Hebrew lanetsach the Septuagint sometimes translate in victory, but most commonly for ever; both, as Bishop Pearce observes, in such kind of phrases, signifying the same thing, because eternity conquers all things; and accordingly, in 2 Samuel 2:26, where the Septuagint have our English version has, Shall the sword devour FOR EVER? And the same may be seen in Job 36:7;; Lamentations 5:20;; Amos 1:11;; 8:7; from which authority the bishop translates the clause here, Death is swallowed up FOR EVER.

Death is here personified and represented as a devouring being, swallowing up all the generations of men; and by the resurrection of the body and the destruction of the empire of death, God is represented as swallowing him up; or that eternity gulps him down; so that he is endlessly lost and absorbed in its illimitable waste. How glorious a time to the righteous, when the inhabitant shall no more say, I am sick; when God shall have wiped away all tears from off all faces, and when there shall be no more death. This time must come. Hallelujah! The Lord God Omnipotent reigneth.

Verse 55. O death, where is thy sting? O grave, where is thy victory?

These words are generally supposed to be taken from Hosea 13:14, where the Hebrew text stands thus: ehi debareyca maueth; ehikatabca sheol: which we translate, O death! I will be thy plagues; O grave! I will be thy destruction; and which the Septuagint translate very nearly as the apostle, O death, where is thy revenge, or judicial process? O grave, where is thy sting? And it may be remarked that almost all the MSS., versions, and many of the fathers, interchange the two members of this sentence as they appear in the Septuagint, attributing victory to death; and the sting, to hades or the grave; only the Septuagint, probably by mistake or corruption of copyists, have dike, revenge or a judicial process, for nikos, victory: a mistake which the similarity of the words, both in letters and sound, might readily produce. We may observe, also, that the ehi (I will be) of the Hebrew text the Septuagint, and the apostle following them, have translated where, as if the word had been written where, the two last letters interchanged; but ehi, is rendered where in other places; and our translators, in the 10th verse of this same chapter 13:10) render ehi malca, "I will be thy king," but have this note in the margin, "Rather, where is thy king? King Hoshea being then in prison." The apostle, therefore, and the Septuagint, are sufficiently vindicated by the use of the word elsewhere: and the best Jewish commentators allow this use of the word. The Targum, Syriac, Arabic, Vulgate, and some MSS. of Kennicott and De Rossi, confirm this reading.

Having vindicated the translation, it is necessary to inquire into the meaning of the apostle's expressions. Both Death and Hades are here personified: Death is represented as having a sting, dagger, or goad, by which, like the driver of oxen, he is continually irritating and urging on; (these irritations are the diseases by which men are urged on till they fall into Hades, the empire of Death;) to Hades, victory is attributed, having overcome and conquered all human life, and subdued all to its own empire. By the transposition of these two members of the sentence, the victory is given to Death, who has extinguished all human life; and the sting is given to Hades, as in his empire the evil of death is fully displayed by the extinction of all animal life, and the destruction of all human bodies. We have often seen a personification of death in ancient paintings—a skeleton crowned, with a dart in his hand; probably taken from the apostle's description. The Jews represent the angel of death as having a sword, from which deadly drops of gall fall into the mouths of all men.

Hades, which we here translate grave, is generally understood to be the place of separate spirits. See Clarke on Matthew 11:23.

Verse 56. The sting of death is sin

The apostle explains himself particularly here: death could not have entered into the world if sin had not entered first; it was sin that not only introduced death, but has armed him with all his destroying force; the goad or dagger of death is sin; by this both body and soul are slain.

The strength of sin is the law.

The law of God forbids all transgression, and sentences those who commit it to temporal and eternal death. Sin has its controlling and binding power from the law. The law curses the transgressor, and provides no help for him; and if nothing else intervene, he must, through it, continue ever under the empire of death.

Verse 57. But thanks be to God

What the law could not do, because it is law, (and law cannot provide pardon,) is done by the Gospel of our Lord Jesus Christ: he has died to slay death; he has risen again to bring mankind from under the empire of hades. All this he has done through his mere unmerited mercy; and eternal thanks are due to God for this unspeakable gift. He has given us the victory over sin, Satan, death, the grave, and hell.

Verse 58. Be ye steadfast

a seat; be settled; confide in the truth of this doctrine of the resurrection, and every thing that pertains to it, as confidently as a man sits down on a SEAT, which he knows to be solid, firm, and safe; and on which he has often sat.

Unmovable

from negative, and to move away; let nothing shake your faith; let nothing move you away from this hope of the Gospel which is given unto you. What I tell you I receive from God; your false teachers cannot say so: in a declaration of God you may unshakingly confide.

Always abounding in the work of the Lord

The work of the Lord is obedience to his holy word; every believer in Christ is a workman of God. He that works not, to bring glory to God and good to man, is not acknowledged as a servant of Christ; and if he be not a servant, he is not a son; and if not a son, then not an heir. And he must not only work, but abound in that work; ever exceeding his former self; and this, not for a time, but always; beginning, continuing, and ending every act of life to God's glory and the good of his fellows.

Your labour is not in vain

Your labour in the Lord is not in vain; you must not only work, but you must labour-put forth all your strength; and you must work and labour in the Lord-under his direction, and by his influence; for without him ye can do nothing. And this labour cannot be in vain; you shall have a resurrection unto eternal life: not because you have laboured, but because Christ died and gave you grace to be faithful.

1. THE chapter through which the reader has passed is a chapter of great importance and difficulty; and on its difficulties much has been written in the preceding notes. Though I have used all the helps in my power to guide me in explaining it, I have, upon the whole, been obliged to think for myself, and claim only the praise of severe labour, ever directed by honest intention and an earnest desire to find out the truth.

2. There are many questions connected with the doctrine of the resurrection which I could not introduce here without writing a book instead of short notes on a very long chapter. On such subjects, I again beg leave to direct the reader to Mr. Samuel Drew's Essay on that subject.

3. One remark I cannot help making; the doctrine of the resurrection appears to have been thought of much more consequence among the primitive Christians than it is now! How is this? The apostles were continually insisting on it, and exciting the followers of God to diligence, obedience, and cheerfulness through it. And their successors in the present day seldom mention it! So apostles preached, and so primitive Christians believed; so we preach, and so our hearers believe. There is not a doctrine in the Gospel on which more stress is laid; and there is not a doctrine in the present system of preaching which is treated with more neglect!

4. Though all men shall rise again, yet it will be in widely different circumstances: some will rise to glory and honour; others to shame and everlasting contempt. Those alone who here received the salvation of God, and continued faithful unto death, shall have a resurrection to everlasting glory; not every believer, but every loving obedient believer, shall enter into the paradise of God, and have a body fashioned like unto his Lord's glorious body.

5. All glorified spirits will not have the same degree of glory. Two things will necessarily cause great difference: 1. The quantum of mind; and 2. The quantum of grace.

(1.) It is idle to suppose that God has made all human souls with the same capacities: he has not. There is an infinite diversity; he who has the greatest mind can know most, do most, suffer most, and enjoy most.

(2.) The quantum of grace will be another great cause of diversity and glory. He who received most of Christ here, and was most devoted to his service, shall have the nearest approach to him in his own kingdom. But all equally holy and equally faithful souls shall not have equal degrees of glory; for the glory will be according to the capacity of the mind, as well as the degree of grace and improvement. The greater the capacity, provided it be properly influenced by the grace of Christ, the greater will be the enjoyment.

6. That there will be great diversity in the states of glorified saints is the apostle's doctrine; and he illustrates it by the different degrees of splendour between the sun, moon, planets, and stars. This needs little application. There are some of the heavenly bodies that give heat, light, and splendour, as the SUN; and are of the utmost service to the world: some that give light, and comparative splendour, without heat, as the MOON; and yet are of very great use to mankind: others, again, which give a steady but not a splendid light, at the PLANETS; and are serviceable in their particular spheres: and lastly, others which twinkle in their respective systems, as the stars of different magnitudes.

7. One star, says the apostle, differs from another in glory, i.e. in splendour, according to what is called their different magnitudes. I will state a remarkable fact: The northern and southern hemispheres of the heavens have been divided into 102 constellations, and in these constellations Professor Bode has set down the places of 17,240 stars; simple, nebulous, conglobate, and double. The stars have been distinguished by their apparent magnitudes or rather splendour, into stars of the first, second, third, fourth, fifth, sixth, seventh, eighth, these 17,240, only sixteen are, by astronomers in general, agreed to be of the first magnitude, all of which are set down in the following catalogue, with some of those that are remarkable in the second, third, fourth, fifth, and sixth magnitudes. The reader will observe that the name of the constellation or star is first mentioned; the Greek letters, distinguished on maps and globes; and they are, by astronomers, referred to by these letters and numbers. My inferences follow the table.

Observations on the preceding Table. The five stars of the second magnitude in the above list, marked with an asterisk, are by some writers denominated of the first magnitude; and those named of the third, fourth, fifth, and sixth magnitudes, (the stars of the last-mentioned order being barely visible to the naked eye,) are such as the moon can occult, or make a near appulse to; except the last sixteen, in the column of stars of the third magnitude, and the last twenty-nine in that of the sixth magnitude, which never set in the latitude of London. The stars Algol and  $\hat{I}_j$  Ceti are set down according to their brightest appearance; the former varying from the second to the fourth magnitude every two days, 20 hours, 48 minutes, 58 seconds, 18 thirds, and 25 fourths; and the latter, from the second to the seventh, and sometimes to the tenth, every 331 days, 10 hours, and 19 minutes. The stars of the first magnitude, Capella and Lyra, never set in the latitude of London; Acharnar, Canopus,  $\hat{I}^2$  in Argo, and  $\hat{I}^\pm$  in the Cross and Centaur, never rise. Of the stars of the second magnitude in the preceding list,  $\hat{I}^2$  in Medusa's head, or Algol,  $\hat{I}^\pm$  in Perseus, the two Pointers, the Dragon's tail, and the Swan's tail, never set; the head of the Phoenix and the bright star in the Crane never rise. The stars marked with an asterisk in the third column are between the third and fourth magnitudes; and those in the last column with the same mark are between the fifth and sixth magnitudes. Stars fainter than those of the sixth magnitude cannot be discerned without the help of a glass, and are therefore called telescopic. The 2h, and 3h, in Aquarius, are of this last description, both of the seventh magnitude, and such as the moon can occult.

8. This subject, as far as it concerns the present place, admits of few remarks or reflections. It has already been observed, that, of all the stars which our best astronomers have been able to describe and lay down in tables and maps, only sixteen are of the first magnitude; i.e. appear more luminous than any other stars in the firmament: some, indeed, increase the number to twenty-one, by taking in Castor and Pollux, the upper Pointer, Atteer, or Atair, in the Eagle, and  $\hat{I}^2$  in the ship Argo, which I have placed among those of the second magnitude, because astronomers are not agreed on the subject, some ranking them with stars of the first magnitude, others, with stars of the second.

The reader is probably amazed at the paucity of large stars in the whole firmament of heaven! Will he permit me to carry his mind a little farther, and either stand astonished at or deplore with me the fact, that, out of the millions of Christians in the vicinity and splendour of the eternal Sun of righteousness, how very few are found of the first order! How very few can stand examination by the test laid down in the 13th chapter of this epistle! How very few love God with all their heart, soul, mind, and strength; and their neighbour as themselves! How few mature Christians are found in the Church! How few are, in all things, living for eternity! How little light, how little heat, and how little influence and activity are to be found among them that bear the name of Christ! How few stars of the FIRST magnitude will the Son of God have to deck the crown of his glory! Few are striving to excel in righteousness; and it seems to be a principal concern with many to find out how little grace they may have, and yet escape hell; how little conformity to the will of God they may have, and yet get to heaven! In the fear of God I register this testimony, that I have perceived it to be the labour of many to lower the standard of Christianity, and to soften down, or explain away, those promises of God that himself has linked with duties; and because they know that they cannot be saved by their good works, they are contented to have no good works at all: and thus the necessity of Christian obedience, and Christian holiness, makes no prominent part of some modern creeds. Let all those who retain the apostolic doctrine, that the blood of Christ cleanseth from all sin in this life, press every believer to go on to perfection, and expect to be saved, while here below, into the fulness of the blessing of the Gospel of Jesus. To all such my soul says, Labour to show yourselves approved unto God; workmen that need not be ashamed, rightly dividing the word of truth; and may the pleasure of the Lord prosper in your hands!-Amen.

Comments on 2nd Corinthians 12

Verse 2. I knew a man in Christ

I knew a Christian, or a Christian man; for to such alone God now revealed himself, for vision and prophecy had been shut up from the Jews.

Fourteen years ago

On what occasion or in what place this transaction took place we cannot tell; there are many conjectures among learned men concerning it, but of what utility can they be when every thing is so palpably uncertain? Allowing this epistle to have been written some time in the year 57, fourteen years counted backward will lead this transaction to the year 42 or 43, which was about the time that Barnabas brought Paul from Tarsus to Antioch, Acts 11:25,26, and when he and Paul were sent by the Church of Antioch with alms to the poor Christians at Jerusalem. It is very possible that, on this journey, or while in Jerusalem, he had this vision, which was intended to be the means of establishing him in the faith, and supporting him in the many trials and difficulties through which he was to pass. This vision the apostle had kept secret for fourteen years.

Whether in the body I cannot tell

That the apostle was in an ecstasy or trance, something like that of Peter, Acts 10:9, there is reason to believe; but we know that being carried literally into heaven was possible to the Almighty. But as he could not decide himself, it would be ridiculous in us to attempt it.

Caught up to the third heaven.

He appeared to have been carried up to this place; but whether bodily he could not tell, or whether the spirit were not separated for the time, and taken up to the third heaven, he could not tell.

The third heaven-

The Jews talk of seven heavens, and Mohammed has received the same from them; but these are not only fabulous but absurd. I shall enumerate those of the Jews.

- The Yelum, or curtain, "Which in the morning is folded up, and in the evening stretched out." Isaiah 40:22: He stretcheth out the heavens as a Curtain, and spreadeth them out as a tent to dwell in.
- The firmament, or Expanse, "In which the sun, moon, stars, and constellations are fixed." Genesis 1:17: And God placed them in the Firmament of heaven.
- The Clouds, or Aether, "Where the mill-stones are which grind the manna for the righteous." Psalms 78:23, Though he had commended the Clouds from above, and opened the doors of heaven, and had rained down manna,

- The Habitation, "Where Jerusalem, and the temple, and the altar, were constructed and where Michael the great prince stands and offers sacrifices." 1 Kings 8:13: I have surely built thee a House To Dwell In, a settled place for thee to abide in for ever. "But where is heaven so called?" Answer: In Isaiah 63:15: Look down from Heaven, and behold from the Habitation, , of thy holiness.
- The Dwelling-Place, "Where the troops of angels sing throughout the night, but are silent in the day time, because of the glory of the Israelites." Psalms 42:8: The Lord will command his loving-kindness in the day time, and in the night his song shall be with me. "But how is it proved that this means heaven?" Answer: From Deuteronomy 26:15. Look down from thy holy habitation, the Dwelling-Place of thy holiness; and from heaven, and bless thy people Israel.
- The Fixed Residence, "Where are the treasures of snow and hail, the repository of noxious dew, of drops, and whirlwinds; the grotto of exhalations," heavens thus denominated?" Answer: In 1 Kings 8:39,49, Then hear thou in Heaven Thy Dwelling-Place, Thy Fixed Residence.
- The Araboth, Where are justice, judgment, mercy, the treasures of life; peace and blessedness; the souls of the righteous, the souls and spirits which are reserved for the bodies yet to be formed, and the dew by which God is to vivify the dead." Psalms 89:14.; Isaiah 59:17.; Psalms 36:9.; Judges 6:24.; Psalms 24:4; 1 Samuel 25:29.; Isaiah 57:20: All of which are termed Araboth, Psalms 68:4. Extol him who rideth on the heavens, ba Araboth, by his name Jah.

All this is sufficiently unphilosophical, and in several cases ridiculous.

In the sacred writings three heavens only are mentioned. The first is the atmosphere, what appears to be intended by rekia, the firmament or expansion, Genesis 1:6. The second, the starry heaven; where are the sun, moon, planets, and stars; but these two are often expressed under the one term shamayim, the two heavens, or expansions, and in Genesis 1:17, they appear to be both expressed by rekia hashshamayim, the firmament of heaven. And, thirdly, the place of the blessed, or the throne of the Divine glory, probably expressed by the words shemei hashshamayim, the heavens of heavens. But on these subjects the Scripture affords us but little light; and on this distinction the reader is not desired to rely.

Much more may be seen in Schoettgen, who has exhausted the subject; and who has shown that ascending to heaven, or being caught up to heaven, is a form of speech among the Jewish writers to express the highest degrees of inspiration. They often say of Moses that he ascended on high, ascended on the firmament, ascended to heaven; where it is evident they mean only by it that he was favoured with the nearest intimacy with God, and the highest revelations relative to his will, understand St. Paul thus, it will remove much of the difficulty from this place; and perhaps the unspeakable words, 2 Corinthians 12:4, are thus to be understood. He had the most sublime communications from God, such as would be improper to mention, though it is very likely that we have the substance of these in his epistles. Indeed, the two epistles before us seem, in many places, to be the effect of most extraordinary revelations.

Verse 4. Caught up into paradise

The Jewish writers have no less than four paradises, as they have seven heavens; but it is needless to wade through their fables. On the word paradise See Clarke on Genesis 2:8. The Mohammedans call it [Arabic] jennet alferdoos, the garden of paradise, and say that God created it out of light, and that it is the habitation of the prophets and wise men.

Among Christian writers it generally means the place of the blessed, or the state of separate spirits. Whether the third heaven and paradise be the same place we cannot absolutely say; they probably are not; and it is likely that St. Paul, at the time referred to, had at least two of these raptures.

Alexander Campbell (1788 – 1866); Founder of Campbellite Restorationist Movement
The Three Kingdoms
The Christian Baptist

Reprint of the periodical "The Christian Baptist," originally published April 1829

The Jewish people were often called "the kingdom of God," because God was in a peculiar sense their King. For certain purposes he selected them, distinguished them, and took them under his own immediate protection. He gave them laws, ordinances, and customs, which had both a specific and general influence, and were preparatory to a new and better order of society. The new order of society which arises out of the belief of the gospel, is often called "the reign or kingdom of Heaven." In this kingdom the subjects enjoy more exalted blessings, and stand in new and heavenly relations unknown before the coming of the Messiah.— There is also the "kingdom of heaven, or glory," properly so called. This is the resilience of angels, the abode of the saints, and the mansions of glory. The gates of admission into these three kingdoms are different—Flesh, Faith, and Works. To be born of the flesh, or to be a descendant of Abraham, introduced a child into the first kingdom of God. To be born of water and spirit, through faith in Jesus Christ, brings men and women into the second kingdom. But neither flesh, faith, nor water, without good work, will introduce a man or woman into the third kingdom. The nature of these three kingdoms, the privileges enjoyed by the subjects, and the terms of admission, are very imperfectly understood in the present day. These kingdoms are unhappily confounded in the minds of many. Hence we find that what is affirmed of the nature, subjects, and terms of admission of one, is frequently applied to another. This is one of the roots of popery, and all the hierarchies in Christendom have sprung from it.

The nature of the kingdom of God amongst the Jews is very different from the nature of the kingdom of God amongst the Christians, and both are different from the kingdom of glory.— The subjects are just as different. Under the first they were carnal; all the descendants of Jacob, without regard to regeneration, were lawful subjects of the first kingdom. None can be subjects of the second unless born again; and flesh and blood cannot inherit the third and ultimate kingdom.

I have discovered that the objections offered against the scriptural design and import of Christian immersion, are based upon a misapprehension of the nature and privileges of these three kingdoms. Under the first there were various ablutions, purgations, and sin-offerings, which never perfected the conscience; but which, for the time being, served as symbols or types of a real purgation which would be enjoyed under the Reign of Heaven, or second kingdom.— These sacrifices did not cleanse the worshippers, else, as Paul reasons, the worshippers, once cleansed, would have no more consciousness of sine. Under the Christian economy a real remission of sins is constantly enjoyed by all the subjects or citizens, and, as Paul argues, where remission of sins is enjoyed no more sacrifice for sin is needed. Now if the Jews by faith foresaw through the symbols the shedding of Christ's blood, the question is, Why could they not by faith in his sacrifice enjoy, as well as we, the remission of sins? The sacrifice of Christ, viewed prospectively, was as efficacious as when viewed retrospectively, to effect the cleansing of the conscience. And could they not, through one sacrifice, have more clearly understood the design of Christ's sacrifice, than by so many sacrifices. But it is a provision in the constitution of the Christian kingdom which greatly distinguishes it from the Jewish, "that the sins and iniquities of the citizens shall be remembered no more." No daily, weekly, nor annual remembrances of sins under the reign of favor. This, faith in the sacrifice of Christ discovers, and submission to his institution puts us into the actual possession of that remission which never was enjoyed before.

Now, as Paul teaches, under the Constitution of the New Kingdom, remission of sins is a natural birthright. Hence every one, so soon as he enters the second or Christian kingdom, or is born of water and spirit, is pardoned and accepted. So that those who are born into the kingdom of heaven, or Christian kingdom, have peace with God, and sin cannot lord it over them; for they are not under law, but under favor.

But many say, "What will become of our Paidobaptist brethren, and millions more, if these things be so?" This is a stale objection which has been urged against every reformation in religion from the days of John Huss down to this century. I will, however, answer the interrogatory. They cannot enjoy the blessings of the second kingdom; in other words, they cannot have or enjoy that light, peace, liberty, and love, which are the national privileges of all who intelligently enter the kingdom of favor.

But the objector means, Can they enter into the third kingdom, or kingdom of glory? I am prepared to say that my opinion is, and it is but in opinion, that infants, idiots, and some Jews and Pagans may, without either faith or baptism, be brought into the third kingdom, merely in consequence of the sacrifice of Christ; and I doubt not but many Paidobaptists of all sects will be admitted into the kingdom of glory.— Indeed all they who obey Jesus Christ, through faith in his blood, according to their knowledge, I am of opinion will be introduced into that kingdom. But when we talk of the forgiveness of sins which comes to Christians through immersion, we have no regard to any other than the second kingdom, or the kingdom of favor. I repeat it again—there are three kingdoms: the Kingdom of Law, the Kingdom of Favor, and the Kingdom of Glory; each has a different constitution, different subjects, privileges, and terms of admission. And who is so blind, in the Christian kingdom, as not to see that more is necessary to eternal salvation or to admission into the everlasting kingdom, than either faith, regeneration, or immersion? A man can enter into the second kingdom by being born of water and the spirit; but he cannot enter into the third and ultimate kingdom through faith, immersion, or regeneration. Hence says the Judge, Come you blessed of my Father, and inherit the kingdom of glory. Because you believed? No. Because you were immersed? No. Because you were born again by the Holy Spirit? No—but because I know your good works, your piety, and humanity. I was hungry, and you fed me, &c.

The plain state of the case is this:—The blood of Abraham brought a man into the kingdom of law, and gave him an inheritance in Canaan. Being born not of blood, but through water and the Spirit of God, brings a person into the kingdom of favor; which is righteousness, peace, joy, and a holy spirit, with a future inheritance in prospect. But if the justified draw back, or the washed return to the mire, or if faith die and bring forth no fruits—into the kingdom of glory he cannot enter. Hence good works through faith, or springing from faith in Jesus, give a right to enter into the holy city—and this is a right springing from grace or favor:—"Blessed are they who keep his commandments that they may have a right to the tree of life and enter through the gates into the city." This right, as observed, springs from a constitution of favor. And while men are saved by grace, or brought into the second kingdom, (for all in it are said to be saved in the New Testament style) by favor, they cannot enter the heavenly kingdom, but by patient continuance in well doing. So stands the decree of the Lord Almighty as I understand the Oracles.

Those who desire the enjoyment of remission of sins, peace with God, and abundance of joy, can obtain them through submission to an institution of pure favor, as already defined. But when we speak of admission into the everlasting kingdom, we must have a due respect to those grand and fundamental principles so clearly propounded in the New Institution. We must discriminate between the kingdom of favor, and the kingdom of glory.

This is in anticipation of my essays on the Jewish and Christian Dispensations, and I am compelled to divulge so much of the views which I have to lay before my readers under more appropriate heads, and as the results of premises not yet developed: I say, I am compelled to cross the Jordan, and to pull a cluster of the grapes to show those who are halting between two opinions, that there is good fruit in the land to which I invite them. The following narrative will shed more light on the three kingdoms:—

The Narrative of Simeon

While musing upon the three kingdoms, I fancied myself in the kingdom of glory after the final judgment. Amongst my companions in that happy kingdom, I was introduced to one Simeon, a Jew, who had been converted to Christianity eight years after the resurrection of Jesus Christ. While in conversation on the wonders of redemption, Simeon gave us the following narrative. "I have been," said he, "a subject of these three kingdoms, and now I discern not only the true nature and design of each, but I am enraptured in contemplating the manifold wisdom developed in their respective constitutions. I was, when born of the flesh, born a citizen of the commonwealth of Israel. I was circumcised and made partaker of all the privileges of the first or prefatory kingdom of God. I distinctly remember all my views and feelings under that economy. When I waited at the altar and worshipped in the sanctuary, my conscience was often troubled, and its momentary pacifications were like the occasional appearances of the sun in a dark and cloudy day. If I felt peace at the altar, so soon as I mingled with my fellow-citizens, I contracted pollution, and my sin was ever before me; my iniquities took such hold upon me, that, at times, I could not lift up my eyes. Hopes and fears, joys and sorrows, alternated in my bosom. The thunders of Sinai and the flashing vengeance that destroyed in a moment thousands of my nation, often occurred to me. I prayed with fear and trembling. I expected a Redeemer, but knew not the nature of his redemption. But finally I believed that Jesus of Nazareth was he. I saw that his institution differed from that of Moses, as the sun excelled a star. I apprehended the reign of favor, and gladly became a citizen of the second kingdom. I was born of water and of the Spirit, and obtained a remission of sins, of which I had never formed an idea under the kingdom of law. The sacrifice of Jesus, and the divine testimony or assurance which I had from God our Father, in the proclamation of mercy, cured my conscience and implanted new life within me. I felt myself in a new kingdom, in a kingdom of favor. Sin did not now lord it over me as before, and my heart beat in unison with the favor which super-abounded; so that, in comparison of the former kingdom, my sun always shone in a bright and cloudless sky. If, in one thought, I felt myself seduced from the path of life, with the quickness of a glance of me mind, I remembered that Jesus died, and that I had died and been buried with him in his sacred institution. This always cured my conscience and gladdened my heart. I ran the race and finished my course. I slept in Jesus; and, lo! I awoke at the sound of the trumpet, and all my deeds came into remembrance, not one of them was forgotten by God. I was found worthy through conformity to that favor which brought me into the fold of God, to approach the tree of life. I have tasted its fruit and feel myself immortal. The contrast between the kingdom of law and the kingdom of favor prepared me to relish and to enjoy the contrast between the kingdom of favor and the kingdom of glory. And when I tell the wondrous story of nature and grace to those my companions who have come from the East and the West, from the North and the South, without circumcision or the proclamation of mercy through the gospel, their devotion in hearing and mine in telling, their joy in me, and my joy in them, swell our strains and raise our bliss to degrees ineffable and full of glory. I have been thrice born—once of the flesh, once of water and spirit, and once from the grave. Each birth brought me into a congenial society. My fellow citizens always resembled my nativity. I was surrounded once with the children of the flesh, then with those born from above, and now will thus be born from the ashes of the grave."

While proceeding to narrate some things I never before heard, my transports aroused me, but could not fancy again. Editor.

St. Philaret (Drozdov) of Moscow, russian icon. Source: days.ru[The large Russian Catechism of Philaret, approved by the holy Synod (although omitted by Kimmel in his Collection, and barely mentioned by Gass in his Greek Symbolics), is now the most authoritative doctrinal standard of the orthodox Græco-Russian Church, and has practically superseded the older Catechism, or Orthodox Confession of Mogila. Originally composed in Slavono-Russian, it was by authority translated into several languages. We have before us a Russian edition (Moscow, 1869), a Greek edition (Χριστιανικὴ κατ' ἕκτασιν κατήχησις τῆς ὀρθοδόξου, καθολικῆς καὶ ἀνατοικῆς ἐκκλησίας, Odessa, 1848), and a German edition (Ausführlicher christlicher Katechismus der orthodox-katholischen orientalischen Kirche, St. Petersburg, 1850).

The English translation here given was prepared by the Rev. R. W. Blackmore, B.A., formerly chaplain to the Russia Company in Kronstadt, and published at Aberdeen, 1845, in the work The Doctrine of the Russian Church. On comparing it with the authorized Greek and German translations, we found it faithful and idiomatic. The numbering of Questions, and the difference in type of Questions and Answers, are ours. In all other editions we have seen, the Questions are not numbered. As this Catechism has never before appeared in America, we thought it best to give it in full, although the Introduction and the First Part would be sufficient for this collection of doctrinal symbols.

On the Twelfth Article.

378. What is the life of the world to come?

The life that shall be after the resurrection of the dead and the general judgment of Christ.

379. What kind of life shall this be?

For those who believe, who love God, and do what is good, it shall be so happy that we can not now even conceive such happiness. It doth not yet appear what we shall be. 1 John iii. 2. I knew a man in Christ, says the Apostle Paul, who was caught up into Paradise, and heard unspeakable words, which it is not lawful for a man to utter. 2 Cor. xii. 2, 4.

380. Whence shall proceed this so great happiness?

From the contemplation of God in light and glory, and from union with him. For now we see through a glass darkly, but then face to face: now I know in part, but then shall I know, even as also I am known. 1 Cor. xiii. 12.

Then shall the righteous shine forth as the sun, in the kingdom of their Father. Matt. xiii. 43. God shall be all in all. 1 Cor. xv. 28.

381. Shall the body also share in the happiness of the soul?

Yes; it too will be glorified with the light of God, as Christ's body was at his transfiguration on Mount Tabor.

It is sown in dishonor, it is raised in glory. 1 Cor. xv. 43. As we have borne the image of the earthy, that is, of Adam, we shall also bear the image of the heavenly. 1 Cor. xv. 49.

382. Will all be equally happy?

No. There will be different degrees of happiness, in proportion as every one shall have here endured the fight of faith, love, and good works. There is one glory of the sun, and another glory of the moon, and another glory of the stars; for one star differeth from another star in glory. So also is the resurrection of the dead. 1 Cor. xv. 41, 42.

383. But what will be the lot of unbelievers and transgressors?

They will be given over to everlasting death--that is, to everlasting fire, to everlasting torment, with the devils.

Whosoever was not found written in the book of life was cast into the lake of fire. Rev. xx. 15. And, That is the second death. Rev. xx. 14. Depart from me, ye cursed, into everlasting fire, prepared for the devil and his angels. Matt. xxv. 41. And these shall go away into everlasting punishment, but the righteous into life eternal. Matt. xxv. 46. It is better for thee to enter into the kingdom of God with one eye, than having two eyes to be cast into hell fire: where their worm dieth not, and the fire is not quenched. Mark ix. 47, 48.

384. Why will such severity be used with sinners?

Not because God willed them to perish; but they of their own will perish, because they receive not the love of the truth, that they might be saved. 2 Thess. ii. 10.

385. Of what benefit will it be to us to meditate on death, on the resurrection, on the last judgment, on everlasting happiness, and on everlasting torment?

These meditations will assist us to abstain from sin, and to wean our affections from earthly things; they will console us for the absence or loss of worldly goods, incite us to keep our souls and bodies pure, to live to God and to eternity, and so to attain everlasting salvation.

1 The Greek and the German edition have the following addition: 'But those who freely accept the grace given them, who make good use of the means of grace granted unto them, and who walk in the appointed path of salvation, God has properly foreordained for salvation.'

On the Doctrine of Blessedness (Blessedness in the Life-to-Come Based on Following the Beatitudes)

435. What must we join with prayer in order to be grounded in the hope of salvation and blessedness?

Our own exertions for the attainment of blessedness.

Of this point the Lord himself says: Why call ye me Lord, Lord, and do not the things which I say? Luke vi. 46. Not every one that saith unto me Lord, Lord, shall enter into the kingdom of heaven, but he that doeth the will of my Father which is in heaven. Matt. vii. 21.

436. What doctrine may we take as our guide in these exertions?

The doctrine of our Lord Jesus Christ, which is briefly set forth in his Beatitudes, or sentences on blessedness.

437. How many such sentences are there? The nine following:

1. Blessed are the poor in spirit: for theirs is the kingdom of heaven.
2. Blessed are they that mourn: for they shall be comforted.
3. Blessed are the meek: for they shall inherit the earth.

4. Blessed are they which do hunger and thirst after righteousness: for they shall be filled.
5. Blessed are the merciful: for they shall obtain mercy.
6. Blessed are the pure in heart: for they shall see God.
7. Blessed are the peacemakers: for they shall be called the children of God.
8. Blessed are they which are persecuted for righteousness' sake: for theirs is the kingdom of heaven.
9. Blessed are ye, when men shall revile you, and persecute you, and shall say all manner of evil against you falsely, for my sake. Rejoice, and be exceeding glad: for great is your reward in heaven. Matt. v. 3-12.

438. What is to be observed of all these sentences in order to their right understanding?

This: that the Lord proposed in these sentences a doctrine for the attainment of blessedness, as is expressly said in the Gospel: He opened his mouth, and taught; but, being meek and lowly of heart, he proposed his doctrine not in the form of commandment, but of blessing, to those who should of their own free will receive and fulfill it. Consequently in each sentence or Beatitude we must consider, first, the doctrine or precept; secondly, the blessing or promise of reward.

On the First Beatitude.

439. What is the Lord's first precept of blessedness?

They who would be blessed must be poor in spirit.

440. What is it to be poor in spirit?

It is to have a spiritual conviction that we have nothing of our own, nothing but what God bestows upon us, and that we can do nothing good without God's help and grace, thus counting ourselves as nothing, and in all throwing ourselves upon the mercy of God; in brief, as St. Chrysostom explains it, spiritual poverty is humility. (Hom. in Matt. xv.)

441. Can the rich, too, be poor in spirit?

Doubtless they can: if they consider that visible riches are corruptible and soon pass away, and can never compensate for the want of spiritual goods. What is a man profited, if he gain the whole world, and lose his own soul for what shall a man give in exchange for his soul? Matt. xvi. 26.

442. May not bodily poverty serve to the perfection of spiritual?

It may, if the Christian choose it voluntarily, for God's sake. Of this, Jesus Christ himself said to the rich man: If thou wilt be perfect, go, sell that thou hast, and give to the poor, and thou shalt have treasure in heaven; and come and follow me. Matt. xix. 21.

443. What does our Lord promise to the poor in spirit?

The kingdom of heaven.

444. How is the kingdom of heaven theirs?

In the present life inwardly, and inchoately, by faith and hope; but in the life to come perfectly, by their being made partakers of everlasting blessedness.

On the Second Beatitude.

445. What is the Lord's second precept for blessedness?

They who would be blessed must mourn.

446. What is meant in this precept by the word mourn?

Sorrow and contrition of heart, with unfeigned tears, for that we so imperfectly and unworthily serve the Lord, or even rather deserve big anger by our sins, for godly sorrow worketh repentance unto salvation not to be repented of; but the sorrow of this world worketh death. 2 Cor. vii. 10.

447. What special promise does the Lord make to mourners?

That they shall be comforted.

448. What comfort is here to be understood?

That of grace, consisting in the pardon of sin, and in peace of conscience.

449. Why is this promise added to the precept for mourning?

In order that sorrow for sin may not reach to despair.
On the Third Beatitude.

450. What is the Lord's third precept for blessedness?

They who would be blessed must be meek.

451. What is meekness?

A quiet disposition of spirit, joined with care neither to offend any man, nor be offended at any thing one's self.

452. What are the special effects of Christian meekness?

These: that we never murmur against God, nor even against men, when any thing falls out against our wishes, nor give way to anger, nor set ourselves up.

453. What is promised by the Lord to the meek?

That they shall inherit the earth.

454. How are we to understand this promise?

As regards Christ's followers generally it is a prediction which has been literally fulfilled; for the ever-meek Christians, instead of being destroyed by the fury of the heathen, have inherited the universe which the heathen formerly possessed. But the further sense of this promise, as regards Christians both generally and individually, is this, that they shall receive an inheritance, as the Psalmist says, in the land of the living; that is, where men live and never die; in other words, that they shall receive everlasting blessedness. See Psalm xxvii. 13.

On the Fourth Beatitude.

455. What is the Lord's fourth precept for blessedness?

They who would be blessed must hunger and thirst after righteousness.

456. What is meant here by the word righteousness?

Though this word may well stand for every virtue which the Christian ought to desire even as his meat and drink, yet should we here specially understand that righteousness of which, in the book of Daniel, it is said, An everlasting righteousness shall be brought in; that is, the justification of guilty man through grace and faith in Jesus Christ. Dan. ix. 24.

The Apostle Paul speaks thus: The righteousness of God which is by faith of Jesus Christ unto all, and upon all them that believe; for there is no difference: for all have sinned, and come short of the glory of God/ being justified freely by his grace through the redemption that is in Christ Jesus, whom God hath set forth to be a propitiation through faith in his blood, to declare his righteousness for the remission of sins that are past. Rom. iii. 22-25.

457. Who are they that hunger and thirst after righteousness?

They who, while they love to do good, yet count not themselves righteous, nor rest on their own good works, but acknowledge themselves sinners, and guilty before God; and who, by the wish and prayer of faith, hunger and thirst after the justification of grace through Jesus Christ, as after spiritual meat and drink.

458. What does the Lord promise to them who hunger and thirst after righteousness?

That they shall be filled.

459. What is meant here by being filled?

As the filling or satisfying of the body produces, first, the cessation of the sense of hunger and thirst; secondly, the strengthening the body by food, so the filling of the soul means, first, the inward peace of the pardoned sinner; secondly, the acquisition of strength to do good, given by justifying grace. The perfect filling, however, of the soul created for the enjoyment of endless good is to follow in the life eternal, according to the words of the Psalmist: When I awake up after thy likeness, I shall be satisfied with it. Psalm xvii. 15.

On the Fifth Beatitude.

460. What is the Lord's fifth precept for blessedness?

They who would be blessed must be merciful.

461. How are we to fulfill this precept?

By works of mercy, corporal and spiritual; for, as St. Chrysostom says, the forms of mercy are manifold, and this commandment is broad. (Hom. in Matt. xv.)

462. Which are the corporal works of mercy t

1. To feed the hungry.
2. To give drink to the thirsty.
3. To clothe the naked, or such as have not necessary and decent clothing.
4. To visit them that are in prison.
5. To visit the sick, minister to them, and forward their recovery, or aid them to a Christian preparation for death.
6. To show hospitality to strangers.
7. To bury them that have died in poverty.

463. Which are the spiritual works of mercy?

1. By exhortation to convert the sinner from the error of his way. James v. 20.
2. To instruct the ignorant in truth and virtue.
3. To give our neighbor good and seasonable advice in difficulty, or in any danger of which he is unaware.
4. To pray for others to God.
5. To comfort the afflicted.
6. Not to return the evil which others may have done us.
7. To forgive injuries from our heart.

464. Is it not contrary to the precept of mercy for civil justice to punish criminals?

Not in the least; if this be done as of duty, and with a good intent, that is, in order to correct them, or to preserve the innocent from their crimes.

465. What does the Lord promise to the merciful?

That they shall obtain mercy.

466. What mercy is here to be understood?

That of being delivered from everlasting condemnation for sin at God's Judgment.

On the Sixth Beatitude.

467. What is the Lord's sixth precept for blessedness?

They who would be blessed must be pure in heart.

468. Is not purity of heart the same thing as sincerity?

Sincerity which feigns not any good dispositions foreign to the heart, but shows the really good dispositions of the heart by good deeds, is only the lowest degree of purity of heart. This last a man attains by constant and strict watchfulness over himself, driving away from his heart every unlawful wish and thought, and every affection for earthly things, and ever keeping there the remembrance of God and our Lord Jesus Christ with faith and charity.

469. What does the Lord promise to the pure in heart? That they shall see God.

470. How are we to understand this promise?

The Word of God compares the heart of man to the eye, and ascribes to perfect Christians enlightened, eyes of the heart. Eph. i. 18. As the eye that is clear can see the light, so the heart that is pure can behold God. But since the sight of God's countenance is the very source of everlasting blessedness, the promise of seeing God is the promise of the highest degree of everlasting blessedness.

On the Seventh Beatitude.

471. What is the Lord's seventh precept for blessedness?

They who would be blessed must be peace-makers.

472. How are we to fulfill this commandment?

We must live friendly with all men, and give no occasion for disagreement: if any arise, we must try all possible ways to put a stop to it, even by yielding our own right, unless this be against duty, or hurtful to any other: if others are at enmity, we must do all we can to reconcile them; and if we fail, we must pray to God for their reconciliation.

473. What does the Lord promise to peace-makers?

That they shall be called the Sons of God.

474. What is signified by this promise?

The sublimity both of their office and of their reward. Since in what they do they imitate the only-begotten Son of God, who came upon earth to reconcile fallen man with God's justice, they are for this promised the gracious name of Sons of God, and without doubt a degree of blessedness answering thereto.

On the Eighth Beatitude.

475. What is the Lord's eighth precept for blessedness?

They who would be blessed must be ready to endure persecution for righteousness' sake, without betraying it.

476. What qualities are required by this precept?

Love of righteousness, constancy and firmness in virtue, fortitude and patience, when one is subjected to calamity or danger for refusing to betray truth and virtue.

477. What does the Lord promise to those who are persecuted for righteousness' sake?

The kingdom of heaven, as if in recompense for what they lose through persecution; in like manner as the same is promised to the poor in spirit, to make up for the feeling of want and privation.

On the Ninth Beatitude.

478. What is the Lord's ninth precept for blessedness?

They who would be blessed must be ready to take with joy reproach, persecution, suffering, and death itself, for the name of Christ, and for the true orthodox faith.

479. What is the name for the course required by this precept?

The course of martyrdom.

480. What does the Lord promise for this course?

A great reward in heaven; that is, a special and high degree of blessedness.

Which version came first?

The versions in the Evening and Morning Star (first column) and in the Kirtland Revelations Book (second column) were produced the same year (1832). The Star was published in July, but we don't know the month or day that the KRB version was written. Both versions are copies, so regardless of which was produced first, we don't know which is closer to the "original."

But by comparing the changes, can we tell whether the EMS or KRB is closer to the 1835 D&C? This might suggest an evolution from the "earliest" to the "middle" to the final (D&C) version.

Priority of KRB

There are 31 instances in which Star and D&C agree against KRB, suggesting the Star is closer to the D&C, and KRB is therefore earlier. These instances are in purple except one occurrence of a word present in Star and D&C but missing in KRB. Roughly 40% (12) of these occur in the first 47% (56) of the revelation; 60% (19) occur in the last 43%.

In 1 instance KRB omits a word (he) that is present in the Star and is also omitted in the D&C. There is also 1 instance of unto in Star given as to in the KRB and D&C. These are in blue in the KRB (second column).

Note: Green/Red favors EMS; Purple favors KRB

Priority of EMS

Twenty-two times KRB ~~strikes out~~ text consistent with the Star and inserts new text which is also present in the D&C. All occur in the first 40% (48) of verses.

The Temple and Its Courts

The Temple at Jerusalem stood on Mount Moriah, on the ground David purchased of Araunah, the Jebusite. The first temple was built by Solomon in seven years, and finished B. C. 1004. It is described in the Book of Kings and Chronicles, and was destroyed by the Chaldeans, B. C. 588.

The second temple was built on the same site by Zerubbabel, but was far inferior in every respect: see Ezra iii. 12. It was profaned by Antiochus Epiphanes, in B. C. 163, and purified and repaired by Judas Maccabeus three years subsequently.

The Jewish writers note five things which had been in the first temple, but were wanting in the second. 1. The ark. 2. The shechinah, or manifestation of the Divine presence. 3. The sacred fire kindled from heaven. 4. The urim and thummim. 5. The spirit of prophecy. This latter, however, was not entirely wanting. Zechariah, Haggai, and Malachi, may all be accounted prophets of the second temple; the effusions of the Spirit on Zacharias, Simeon, and Anna, may also be enumerated, but especially the presence of our blessed Lord himself, whereby the latter house excelled the first in glory, as foretold by Haggai, ii. 9.

After the lapse of five centuries from its erection, this temple had become much decayed, when Herod the Great, some years before the birth of our Saviour, undertook to repair, or rather gradually to rebuild it, for nine years; fifty thousand workmen were employed, and no cost was spared to render it most magnificent. Josephus speaks in the strongest terms of its curious structure and beauty. The Jews continued to enlarge and ornament the temple long after Herod's death, so that in fact it had been forty and six years in building, before the time our Saviour spoke respecting it, John ii. 20.

When the great body of workmen were discharged, on the completion of these works, for want of employment, they began those tumults and seditions which ended in the destruction of the city, the temple, and the Jewish polity.

Besides the sanctuary, the temple contained numerous courts and piles of buildings, appropriated to a variety of purposes. To this vast number of apartments our Lord is supposed to allude, John xiv. 2, where he speaks of the many mansions in heaven. In mentioning the events which occurred in the temple, these courts and apartments are spoken of under the general denomination of the temple.

The second temple being erected on the same site as the first, was situated on a very hard rock, mostly encompassed by steep precipices. A part of the foundation was a wall of very large stones raised from the valley beneath, to a height of 450 feet, and in some places, as much as 700. The temple, strictly so-called, consisting only of the portico, the sanctuary, and the holy of holies, was but a small pile, surrounded by courts, making in the whole a square of about half a mile in circumference, or forming an area of about nineteen acres, according to others. The outer enclosure was entered by eight gates; the whole pile of building in each of these gates, according to Josephus, was about fifty feet in height, and eighteen wide, including the towers over the gateways. There were also buildings adjoining to all the gates. The gate called the Beautiful gate, Acts iii. 2, led from the outer to the inner courts. It was very splendid, and composed of Corinthian brass, the most valuable metallic composition in ancient times.

The first, or outer court, was the court of the gentiles, beyond which strangers were not allowed to pass. It was enclosed by a wall more than forty feet high, and surrounded on the inside by spacious porticoes or cloisters; above which were galleries or apartments supported by marble pillars. One of these ranges was called Solomon's porch or piazza, because it stood on the terrace that monarch built up from the valley beneath as already mentioned, to enlarge the area of the mountain. This terrace was the only work of Solomon in the second temple, and therefore retained the name of that prince: see John x. 23, Acts iii. 11. The south-east corner of the roof is supposed to have been the place from whence Satan endeavoured to persuade our Lord to cast himself down: see Matt. iv. 5. In this court, assigned to gentile proselytes, the Jews, who did not worship in it themselves, allowed the money changers, and sellers of animals for sacrifices, to take their stations; but our Lord drove them from thence, telling them that the temple was a house of prayer for all nations, and they had made it a den of thieves, sufficiently indicating the spirit in which their traffic was conducted.

The beautiful effect of the ranges of white marble pillars in the piazzas is described by Josephus, who says, "Their effect was incredible to those who never saw them, and an amazement to those who did. Each pillar was six cubits in diameter, and the width of the cloisters or covered walk was thirty cubits on three sides, but on the southern it was more than seventy cubits. A cubit was about twenty-one inches. The roof of a part of these cloisters was destroyed by the Romans, in a commotion which took place soon after the death of Herod the Great, but was repaired before the commencement of our Lord's ministry.

The inner courts were divided from the court of the gentiles by a space or terrace, called the Hil, or sacred fence, ten cubits wide, alluded to in the epistle to the Ephesians, ii. 13, 14. The outer wall of this was a fence of lattice work, three cubits high. The natural rock rising higher than in the outer court, the floor of this space was six cubits above that of the court of the gentiles; the ascent to the Hil was by twelve steps.

There were five steps, each half a cubit, from the terrace to the next court, called the court of the women, as females were not allowed to go further. It is designated by that name by Jewish writers, but in the scriptures it is called the new court, 2 Chron. xx. 5; the outer court, Ezek. xlvi. 21; and the treasury, John viii. 20. The Beautiful gate was on the east side of this enclosure. There were also nine other gates from the terrace or Hil, to the courts within it; they were richly adorned with gold and silver. This court was 135 cubits square, containing about an acre and a quarter. In each corner was a smaller court, with buildings, and the spaces between them were occupied on three sides by piazzas, with galleries above, where the women stood, divided into ranges or stories, the number of which is not mentioned, while the men stood on the area below.

Next was the court of Israel. This was fifteen steps, or seven cubits and a half higher than the court of the women, and it was enclosed by a wall, twenty five cubits high, on the inside. The principal entrance was by the gate Nicanor, under a stately tower. The gate itself was forty cubits in height, and so very heavy as to require twenty men to open and shut it. Among the prodigies before the destruction of Jerusalem, it is recorded that this gate was opened by some invisible power. The court of Israel, properly so called, appears only to have been a narrow space or piazza, eight cubits broad, the line of separation between this and the inner space, called the court of the priests, being marked by the pillars which supported the roof, and a railing between the pillars, called the ranges; 2 Kings xi. 8, 15. Here the Israelites stood while their sacrifices were burning on the altar. In this court, and that called the court of the women, the people were praying while Zacharias burned incense in the sanctuary, Luke i. 10: and on such occasions, especially on the sabbaths, the number of persons present was very great.

The court of the priests was within that of Israel, and inclosed thereby as a picture by a frame. Its floor was two cubits and a half higher, and was ascended by steps at the east end, which extended the whole width of the court. These steps formed a space eleven cubits broad, occupied by the musicians during the public services.

Immediately before the space stood the brazen altar, exactly on the spot where Araunah's threshing floor had been. In Herod's time it was larger than at any former period, being thirty-two cubits square at the base, and ten in height. A cubit at the south-east corner was cut off, showing the line which separated the tribe of Benjamin from that of Judah, that the whole of the altar might be in the former tribe. The priests ascended the altar by a gradually rising ascent. On the north side of the altar the sacrifices were slain.

Between the altar and the porch was a space of twenty-two cubits, which was considered peculiarly sacred. It is mentioned Ezek. viii. 16, Joel ii. 17, Matt. xxiii. 35.

The porch, or "portico, as "rebuilt by Herod, appears to have been 100 cubits in length, 128 in height, and 22 in breadth, forming a centre, the width of the body of the temple, and two wings. It was entered by an ascent of twelve steps from the court of the priests, extending nearly to the altar. Thus a person at the gates of the porch was twenty-four cubits and a half above the pavement of the court of the gentiles; an elevation which must have added to the impressive character of the building itself. This gate had no doors, but stood always open, that it might be, as Josephus says, an emblem of heaven. The entrance from the porch to the sanctuary was covered by a veil, or piece of richly wrought tapestry, embroidered with a golden vine laden with grapes. The porch contained the vestibule leading to the sanctuary, and numerous apartments used for various purposes.

The ground beneath the temple and its courts was excavated into a number of vaults and caverns; this was principally done lest any dead body should be buried immediately beneath the worshippers, as by passing over a grave, a Jew contracted ceremonial defilement. These vaults also served for many other purposes.

The holy place, or sanctuary, was the same length and breadth as that in Solomon's temple, but double the height, which allowed it to be lighted by windows in the upper part of the wall, over the chambers built round the sanctuary on the outside. In the holy place was the sacred furniture, similar to that of the first temple, and the whole was ornamented with much magnificence. The holy of holies was separated by a double veil, very thick and strong, which was rent at the time of our Lord's expiring on the cross. We need not go into detail respecting the interior of the sanctuary, or the articles it contained. The height was double that of Solomon's temple; and the outer walls, of white marble, are compared by Josephus to a mountain of snow white and glistening, while the gilded roof dazzled the eyes of the spectator who beheld it when the sun shone upon it. The roof was covered with gilded spikes, to prevent birds from settling thereon.

In the construction of the temple, many stones of a prodigious size were used; Josephus describes some as forty-five cubits long, five high, and six broad. The reader will remember the words of the disciples, "Master, see what stones (what great stones) and what buildings are here!" Mark xi. 1. How improbable our Lord's words, that not one of these stones should be left upon each other, must then have seemed! yet they were literally fulfilled, A.d. 70, in the same month, and on the same day of the month, that Solomon's temple had been destroyed. The superstitious reverence which the Jews attached to the temple, is strongly shown by their alleging against our Lord on his trial, the words he had said John ii. 19: "Destroy this temple, and in three days I will raise it up;" which they considered as contemptuous, and never forgot or forgave. See Matt, xxvii. 40; also Acts vi. 13, xxi. 28.

The tower, or castle of Antonia, stood on a steep rock at the north-west corner of the temple. It was built by John Hyrcanus, B.C. 135, on the site of a citadel erected by Antiochus Epiphanes, and used for keeping the sacred vestments and other articles. Herod the Great enlarged and repaired it. Antonia was both a palace and a fortification; a large body of Roman soldiers always were quartered there. It overlooked the two outer courts of the temple, and had communications with the cloisters by secret passages, so that it entirely commanded the temple, as well as the stairs from which the apostle Paul addressed the multitude; Acts xxi, 40. The castle at Norwich is supposed to have been built similar in form to that of Antonia.

As many circumstances related in the gospel history refer to the temple and its courts, the reader will be interested by having some idea of the wonderful structure; and the preceding description, it is hoped, will convey sufficient information. Minute accounts of the several parts, and the uses to which they were applied, will be found in Lightfoot, and other authors who have written on the subject; but in many respects they are founded upon conjecture. The usual plans of this edifice are drawn from descriptions in Josephus, and the Talmud, with some particulars recorded in scripture. As these descriptions are obscure in several parts, considerable difference will be observed in the plans of various authors.

Different Degrees Of Happiness Among The Blessed

Section I. Introduction.—Statement of the case of the sons of Zebedee, and doctrine of different degrees of future happiness founded thereon.

An inquiry into the future happiness of the blessed should seem to be incomplete and defective, if it omitted a notice of the doctrine, which ascribes DIFFERENT DEGREES of happiness to DIFFERENT INDIVIDUALS. An examination of this doctrine, therefore, will naturally follow our previous course of inquiry. The doctrine also is one of no trivial interest and moment in itself; but is calculated, I apprehend, in a high degree, to elevate the affections, and stimulate the exertions, of those Christians, who may be impressed with a well-founded and deep persuasion of its truth.

It is accordingly my purpose in the following chapter to consider the doctrine which teaches that different degrees of happiness will be bestowed on the blessed in a future life; and to state the scriptural ground on which I apprehend that it may be established. And then, supposing the doctrine to be true, it is my purpose to state the qualifications requisite in those who would attain to a superior degree of happiness: and the principles, according to which it will be bestowed by the bounty of God on the disciples of the Redeemer. May God, by his holy Spirit, dispose the minds both of the writer and the reader to a serious contemplation and a corresponding application of the truth,"that when Christ who is our life shall appear, then may we also appear with him in glory."

There are various independent passages in Holy Writ, which, in the progress of our examination, will be found to give support to the doctrine in question. But there is one passage in particular which appears to me possessed of special and singular efficacy in deciding the question before us in the affirmative. I propose, therefore, in the first place to state that passage, and to examine it more particularly; and then to confirm the doctrine conveyed in it by other corroborative observations.

The passage to which I allude is contained in the twentieth chapter of the Gospel according to St. Matthew, and, with some unimportant variations, in the tenth chapter of St. Mark's. In the former it runs in this wise."Then came to him the mother of Zebedee's children with her sons, worshipping him, and desiring a certain thing of him. And he said unto her, What wilt thou? She saith unto him, Grant that these my two sons may sit, the one on thy right hand, and the other on the left, in thy kingdom. But Jesus answered, and said, Ye know not what ye ask. Are ye able to drink of the cup that I shall drink of, and to be baptized with the baptism that I am baptized with? They say unto him, We are able. And he saith unto them, Ye shall drink indeed of my cup, and be baptized with the baptism that I am baptized with; but to sit on my right hand and on my left is not mine to give, but for whom it is prepared of my Father<sup>1</sup>." The reader will observe that I give the concluding clause without the additional words which are inserted into our translation, and which are indicated to be not in the original Greek by the Italick character, the customary index employed by our translators on all such occasions. Accordingly the sentence correctly runs, "to sit on my right hand, and on my left, is not mine to give, but," that is, except to those," for whom it is prepared of my Father." This correction does not immediately affect the particular subject of our present inquiry. But as, in referring hereafter to the text, I would wish to refer to it in its most correct form, I judge it advisable that this matter should be adjusted in the outset.

For a clearer understanding of this narrative, and for its application to our present inquiry, I now proceed to observe, that the royal character and state which had been ascribed to the promised Messiah by the Hebrew prophets, and the image of a kingdom under which his future dispensation had been foreshadowed, had impressed the Jews with an expectation, that our Lord, when he made his appearance upon earth in fulfilment of their national predictions, would establish a temporal sovereignty over the world. His apostles partook in this general prepossession and anticipation of their countrymen. They expected that the establishment of an earthly sovereignty would consummate his pretensions to superior wisdom, authority, and power: and they were with difficulty at length induced to surrender the flattering vision, which they had persisted in fondly cherishing during their Lord's ministry, that a season of national prosperity would succeed to that of their national humiliation and depression; and that the Messiah, however he might delay the restoration, would nevertheless eventually "restore again the kingdom to Israel."

Meanwhile that they, who had been the chosen, the constant, and generally the faithful attendants of their Lord through his lowlier course, should be partakers of his elevation, and be admitted to a proportionate share in the glory of his royal dignity, was a reasonable, perhaps, at least a natural expectation. The highest stations of honour in his kingdom, a nearer approach to his royal person, a more intimate communication of the imperial favour of their Lord, would naturally be an object of ambition with them all.

Such in effect was the consequence of their expectation of his temporal sovereignty. Hence the repeated disputes and strifes among them all in general," which should be accounted the greatest" in their Master's anticipated kingdom. And hence in particular the petition of two of the most favoured of their number, James and John, the sons of Zebedee, as recorded in the narrative before us: a petition expressive of their own most fervent desire, for from St. Mark's relation it appears to have been urged by themselves in person, and pressed upon the notice of the Saviour by the additional most lowly solicitation of their mother Salome, who, as St. Matthew relates," came to him worshipping him," and beseeching that he would "grant that these her two sons might sit, the one on his right hand, and the other on the left," or, according to the usage of worldly potentates, in the two stations of the highest power and dignity" in his kingdom."

To this petition of the two brethren their Lord made answer by a question on his part, relative to their qualifications for the solicited preeminence. "Ye know not what ye ask. Are ye able to drink of the cup that I shall drink of, and to be baptized with the baptism that I am baptized with?" alluding to that bitter cup of suffering, of which, in compliance with the awful dispensation of divine mercy and wisdom, he was about to drink: and to that agonizing baptism, wherewith he was soon to be baptized in his own blood. "They say unto him, We are able:" they probably did not perceive the full import of the question; or they presumed too confidently on their own resolution and strength.

But our Lord accepted this tender of their readiness to partake of his sufferings; and ratified it by a prediction of its fulfilment in their future destiny: "Ye shall drink indeed of my cup, and be baptized with the baptism that I am baptized with." But at the same time, adopting the phraseology of their petition, and leaving the proper exposition of it, and its liberation from the erroneous notions concerning a temporal kingdom, with which it was encumbered in the minds of the Apostles, to future opportunities, he added, "but to sit on my right hand, and on my left, is not mine to give, but for whom," or except to those for whom, "it is prepared of my Father." They appear to have supposed that the distinction which they sought would be bestowed by their Master absolutely and arbitrarily, in pursuance of a feeling of partiality and fondness for his followers, and in compliance with the importunity of friends and interested advocates, after the manner of earthly sovereigns: he gives them to understand, that the distinction which he should in reality bestow, would be bestowed upon very different principles, and agreeably to the general rules adapted to the perfections of the divine nature, and prescribed by God for the distribution of future glory and happiness.

And now, that we may apply this to our immediate purpose, the language employed by our blessed Lord in this memorable dialogue, appears clearly to warrant the opinion, that different degrees of felicity and glory are prepared for those, who shall be admitted to the fruition of the Godhead in a future state of existence.

The two brethren, we have seen, petitioned of their Lord to "grant that they might sit, the one on his right hand, and the other on the left, in his kingdom." Concerning the nature of the kingdom, in which these stations of preeminence were desired, he made no remark, leaving that to be unfolded in due time more clearly to their apprehension. But the existence of such stations as they desired, stations of distinguished and preeminent dignity, his answer appears to recognise: for he distinctly speaks of those to whom "it should be given," and "for whom it was prepared," "to sit on his right hand and on his left," in contradistinction as it should seem from those, to whom other stations would be assigned in his realm of glory. If the two apostles sought by their petition, as unquestionably they did seek, stations of dignified preeminence above their fellows in the Messiah's kingdom, though of that kingdom itself they mistook the nature; the answer of their Lord appears to be a manifest indication, that in his kingdom, rightly understood, stations of superior dignity would be assigned to some individuals over others, more nearly approaching to his own unparalleled state of elevation, and more intimately partaking of the enjoyment of his presence.

The Ambitious Disciples.

Rash was the tongue, and unadvisedly bold,
Which sought, Salome, for thy favour'd twain
More rash perhaps, and bolder, that which told
Of pow'r the Saviour's bitter cup to drain,
And, passing stretch of human strength, sustain
His bath baptismal. Lord, by thee enroll'd
Thy servant, grant me thy Almighty grace,
My destin'd portion of thy griefs to bear,
Ev'n what thou wilt! But chiefly grant, thy face
Within thy glory's realm to see, where'er
Most meet thy wisdom deems; whate'er the place,
It must be blest, for thou, my God, art there.

Section II: Doctrine of different degrees of future happiness, corroborated by other arguments.

The doctrine, that there will be different degrees of happiness and glory in the world to come, may be thought to derive satisfactory testimony from the foregoing declaration of our blessed Lord to the sons of Zebedee. It is confirmed by the following corroborative arguments, which are now to be submitted to the reader's consideration.

First, it is analogous to the constitution and course of nature, as settled by the will of divine Providence; wherein we perceive diversities of gifts, of administrations, and of operations; differences in the talents intrusted to different agents, and corresponding differences in the employments whereon they are exercised, and in the rewards wherewith they are recompensed: so that by the variety, which we actually perceive in the present state, we are prepared for a similar dispensation in the future.

It is agreeable also to the anticipations of reason, that from the Being, who is an all-wise, an all righteous, an all-bountiful Judge and "Rewarder of them that diligently seek him1," the most diligent, the most laborious, the most arduous, the most persevering efforts should be rewarded by the most distinguished success: that they who have "let their light shine" most brightly"before men, that they may see their good works most conspicuously, and most worthily "glorify their Father which is in heaven," should be admitted to the highest degree of favour by their heavenly Father: that them who have most delighted to "honour" God,"God" should be most delighted to "honour2:" that they, who have "hungered and thirsted" most intensely after their inheritance of righteousness and glory, should be most abundantly "filled3."

But what is of still more importance is the fact, that this notion of different degrees of glory in a future state, indicated, as we have seen with much clearness by our Lord in his dialogue with the sons of Zebedee, is in conformity with other intimations also in the Word Of God.

True, indeed, it is, that the happiness of that state is sometimes represented generally, and without any distinction among those who shall be advanced to its inheritance, under the lofty figures of "a kingdom4," and "a throne5," and "a crown of life6," "of righteousness," and "of glory8:" and we doubt not, that the very lowest inmate of that blissful abode, the very "door-keeper," if I may so express myself, "of the house of God9," will have ample reason to "rejoice, and be exceeding glad; for great will be his reward in heaven10." Still, while all who are admitted into that blessed state will doubtless find a sufficiency of fruition in "the joy of their Lord11," the Scriptures seem to sanction the opinion, that a preeminence of bliss and glory will be allotted to some over others.

If, on "the day of the revelation of the righteous judgment of God, he will render unto every man according to his deeds; to them who by patient continuance in well-doing seek for glory and honour, and immortality, eternal life;" and "glory, honour, and peace shall be recompensed to every man that worketh good:" it seems to follow from this rule of distribution, that the most abundant glory will be awarded to those, who by the most patient continuance in well-doing have been the most diligent in seeking it, and have wrought good the most abundantly.

If at "the judgment seat of Christ every one shall receive according to the good that he hath done in the body";" it should seem that the blessing, which every one is to receive, will be in some way apportioned to the good which he has done: conformably to the rule which is elsewhere stated by the Apostle,"Whatsoever a man soweth, that shall he also reap3;" and again,"He which soweth sparingly shall reap also sparingly; and he which soweth bountifully shall reap also bountifully4."

When the Saviour saith,"Behold, I come quickly, and my reward is with me, to give every man according as his work shall be5:" it should seem to be his purpose to announce, that a scale of recompence will be established ascending with the qualifications of those who are the objects of it; and that the reward of every man will be regulated by his previous work: conformably to the Apostle's position, that"every man shall receive his own reward according to his own labour1."

Not that any ground is here intended to be supplied for the notion, that whatever be the works of the best of men, or whatever be their reward, the former can establish a claim to a meritorious recompence, or the latter is to be regarded as the price of their deservings. Doubtless the reward is in every case to be ascribed to the free grace of God and the sole merits of the Redeemer. Nevertheless, speaking of the consequences of this dispensation of the divine love, we judge it to be the doctrine of Holy Writ, that the grace of God, for the sake of the Redeemer's merits, will apportion his reward according to the deeds of his servants.

In answer to the question of Peter,"Behold, we have forsaken all and followed thee: what shall we have therefore?" the Redeemer said unto his disciples,"Verily I say unto you, that ye which have followed me in the regeneration, when the Son of Man shall sit on the throne of his glory, ye also shall sit upon twelve thrones, judging the twelve tribes of Israel. And every one that hath forsaken houses, or brethren, or sisters, or father, or mother, or wife, or children, or lands, for my name's sake, shall receive an hundred fold, and shall inherit everlasting life<sup>2</sup>." Thus again then it seems to be announced, that the future reward shall be regulated according to the character and deeds of the person to be rewarded: that greater sacrifices for Christ's sake shall receive & greater remuneration.

Meanwhile, in further proof of the different degrees of dignity and bliss in a future state, let it be observed, that our Saviour on several occasions speaks, as of "the least" so of "the greatest and the chief in the kingdom of heaven<sup>1</sup>:" and that the "authority" described by him in the parable, as conferred, emblematically of the future reward of fidelity, upon the servant who was constituted ruler "over ten cities," appears to indicate a condition of preeminence over him who was made ruler only "overdue<sup>5</sup>."

Further, "our vile bodies," we are told, "shall be changed" at the appearance of the Saviour, and "shall be fashioned like unto his glorious body," in incorruption and honour: but we are likewise told, that "there is one glory of the sun, and another glory of the moon, and another glory of the stars: for one star differeth from another star in glory; so also is the resurrection of the dead<sup>3</sup>."

And, since "they which shall be accounted worthy to obtain that world and the resurrection from the dead," shall be "as the angels of God in heaven<sup>4</sup>," this similitude appears to imply different distinctions and degrees of rank among "the spirits of just men made perfect;" after the manner of the gradation which prevails among that "innumerable company<sup>5</sup>" of the Lord's hosts, ascending from the lowest order of "ministering spirits<sup>6</sup>," up to the princes of the celestial hierarchy, "whether they be thrones, or dominions, or principalities, or powers<sup>1</sup>."

Degrees Of Heavenly Happiness.

If loftier posts superior state declare;
More virtuous acts if ampler meeds requite;
If brightest crowns on noblest prowess light,
And well-sown fields a fuller harvest bear;
If thrones, dominions, princedoms, powers there are,
Which God's inferior hosts excel in might;
If day's bright orb outshine the lamp of night,
And Hesper's radiance the remotest star:
Then shall the younger brethren of the sky,
If right I scan the records of their fate,
In varied ranks of social harmony
God's mount encircle. Glorious is the state
Ev'n of the lowest there: but seats more nigh
The Sovereign's throne his greater servants wait.

Section III: Qualifications for higher degrees of happiness.

Having considered the grounds of the doctrine that there will be different degrees of happiness and glory in the life to come, I pass on to consider the Qualifications requisite for those, who would attain the highest degrees of honour in the Messiah's kingdom. And this consideration is the more deserving of our regard, and the more indispensable for every Christian, because, whilst the qualifications requisite for attaining the most eminent honours are in the most eminent degree requisite for those, who aspire to sit at the right hand and at the left of the Saviour in his kingdom, the diligent pursuit and the acquisition of the same qualifications, though in an inferior and less perfect degree, are necessary for those also, who will be admitted to fill the lowest stations in his kingdom. The holy city must be approached by the way of holiness. Superior degrees of excellence will be advanced, so we may humbly believe, through the merits of the Redeemer, to superior degrees of the Divine favour, and will occupy a preeminent station in the "many mansions of his Father's house V But the highway to it is one which the unclean shall not pass over: and" there shall in no wise enter into the city any thing that defileth, neither whatsoever worketh abomination or maketh a lie; but they which are written in the Lamb's book of life<sup>2</sup>."

With respect then to the qualifications in question, they have been anticipated in a general way in the foregoing section, where notice has been taken of higher degrees of happiness, as the consequence of the most diligent, laborious, arduous, and unwearied efforts in the service of God: of the most intense thirst after the promised inheritance of glory; of the most patient perseverance and the most abundant fruitfulness in well doing; of the greatest sacrifices for Christ's sake.

But for a fuller exposition of the subject, I would again advert to our Lord's dialogue with the sons of Zebedee. For therein our attention is directed to the nature of the qualifications requisite for those disciples of Christ, who desire to be admitted into the Saviour's future kingdom, and especially for those who aspire to stations of preeminence in that kingdom, by his question addressed to the two brethren, whose request has been made the foundation of our present reflections."Jesus answered and said, Ye know not what ye ask." Their view had been limited to the wished for object, instead of being extended to the qualifying means. To these latter, therefore, their thoughts were to be drawn by the ensuing inquiry,"Are ye able to drink of the cup that I shall drink of, and to be baptized with the baptism that I am baptized with?"

The "cup" of the Saviour, as we have already had occasion to notice, was that bitter cup of suffering which he was about to drink for man's salvation in compliance with the awful dispensation of the divine will: and the Saviour's "baptism" was that agonising sacrifice, wherein he was soon to be baptized in his own blood. And the question in its literal and primary bearing points to those losses and privations, to those mortifications and distresses, to which his first followers were exposed: when they were called on to "forsake houses, and brethren, and sisters, and father, and mother, and wife, and children, and lands for his sake and the gospel's<sup>1</sup>;" or, as elsewhere expressed,"for the kingdom of God's sake<sup>2</sup>:" and when, for his sake also and the gospel's, they were called on to suffer persecution under its various forms of false accusations and injurious revilings, of stripes, and bonds, and imprisonment, and banishment, and finally of a violent and cruel death. These are the persons to whom the language of our Saviour appears to point literally in the first place; and to indicate "the martyrs of Jesus<sup>1</sup>," "them that were slain for the word of God, and for the testimony which they held<sup>2</sup>," who "loved not their lives unto the death<sup>3</sup>," but who "came out of great tribulation, and washed their robes, and made them white in the blood of the Lamb<sup>4</sup>," as intitled to peculiar distinction "before the throne of God."

But the qualification may be regarded perhaps as of a less limited extent, and may be understood to comprehend those disciples of Christ also, who in after ages, for the sake of Christ and his gospel, and of the kingdom of Christ, should suffer persecution: whether such persecution might lead to the actual laying down of their lives in defence of the Christian verity; or might stop short of the last extremity of suffering, and thus not render necessary a "resistance unto blood<sup>5</sup>."

Or, again, in more peaceable times of the gospel, the conformity to the Saviour, intimated by the figurative expressions of the question, may probably be accomplished, not so much by a resolute and constant endurance of the perils of persecution, as by a patient, composed, and devout submission to those sufferings, which are more usually incidental to our nature and to our present state of existence.

Or, again, it may be the will of God for such conformity to be manifested, less by the patient endurance of extraordinary persecutions, or even by that of any intense degree of affliction, than by a strict imitation of the example of holiness which Christ has left us, in the general course of our Christian duty, and in a punctual following of his steps, notwithstanding the temptations of our spiritual enemies, through the ordinary offices of a "sober, righteous, and godly life<sup>1</sup>," and with the meekness and humility of "little children<sup>2</sup>."

Thus much indeed may be accounted certain, that an endeavour to "be conformed to the image of the Son of God<sup>3</sup>" through this season of discipline and probation, in such respects and to such a degree, as the state of life, in which it hath pleased God to place us, shall render practicable, is a necessary qualification for all those his disciples, who desire to be admitted to a participation of his glory. And the more completely the Christian can succeed by God's grace, in becoming "conformed to the image of his Son," by submitting with devout resignation to severer trials, if in the good pleasure of God severer trials await him; or, if not, by "patient continuance in well-doing," unterrified by the dangers, and unseduced by the allurements of the world; the more properly may he be said to "drink of the cup of which his Saviour drank, and to be baptized with the baptism which his Saviour was baptized with:" and the more lively hope may he reasonably cherish, that he is a partaker of the qualifications which are necessary for his admission to a station of eminence in his Saviour's everlasting kingdom.

Conformity To Christ's Example, The Way To His Glory.

Seek thou the image of the Lord to share,
And thou shall share his glory! If the will
Of God require thee thy heart's blood to spill
For him, a willing martyr; or to bear
Thy cross, thro' sickness, penury, and care,
And drink affliction's cup: or thro' the still Calm vale thy course of righteousness fulfil,
And his mild yoke in love and pureness wear:
Hold fast the Great Exemplar!—Blest are they,
Who stem serenely the world's uproar wild,
Nor fears dishearten them, nor pains dismay:
Nor they less blest, who, humbly as a child,
Far from the world pursue their blameless way,
And by the world's allurements undefil'd.

Section IV: Principle on which higher degrees of happiness will be bestowed.

And this leads us to a consideration of the Principle, according to which we presume that stations of eminence will be bestowed by the bounty of God through the merits and on the disciples of the Redeemer.

Here I would again advert to the circumstances of the narrative on which we have already commented; and to the condition of the two brethren, the sons of Zebedee, for whom, favoured as they were by the special notice and friendship of their Lord during his earthly ministry, special marks of distinction were sought by them and by their mother in their Lord's expected kingdom. Their request on this occasion was evidently founded on their experience of his previous personal regard: and it seems to have been their apprehension that the desired distinction would be conferred on those, whom their Lord should absolutely and arbitrarily choose to be the objects of it, actuated by a feeling of partiality and fondness for their persons, and induced moreover by the solicitations and importunity of their friends.

To correct this erroneous apprehension appears to have been our Lord's purpose; and to assure them that the preeminence in his kingdom would not be bestowed in such a manner and from such motives as they vainly imagined, but according to certain rules prescribed by Divine Providence for bestowing them. "To sit on my right hand and on my left is not mine to give, but for whom it is prepared of my Father." As if he had said, "Such preeminence in my kingdom is not mine to give," as you fondly suppose, by any absolute will of mine, or by any arbitrary selection of objects: by any undue partiality or fondness for the persons to be admitted; or out of any undue compliance with the earnest solicitation of others: "but" these rewards are regulated by the counsels of divine wisdom, which pervade the dispensation whereof I am the Mediator; and, accordingly, in the execution of my mediatorial office, it is mine to give it unto them for whom it is prepared of my Father."

Now, who are they, for whom future blessedness and glory are "prepared of his Father," he has not left us to conjecture, but has elsewhere graciously informed us.

They are they who love God: for "eye hath not seen, nor ear heard, neither have entered into the heart of man, the things which God hath prepared for them that love him<sup>1</sup>." They are they who love their brethren, the brethren of Christ as he is not ashamed to call them, and practise towards them the offices of benevolence and love: for this shall be the language addressed to them by the King, the Son of man, when he shall sit upon the throne of his glory, and all nations shall be gathered before him; "Come, ye blessed of my Father, inherit the kingdom prepared for you from the foundation of the world: for inasmuch as ye have done it unto one of the least of these my brethren, ye have done it unto me<sup>2</sup>." They are they, who on their passage through this terrestrial scene confess by their conduct that "they are strangers and pilgrims on the earth," and "desire a better country, that is, an heavenly: wherefore God is not ashamed to be called their God; for he hath prepared for them a city<sup>3</sup>."

These are they, for whom is prepared of the Father of our Lord Jesus Christ a future abode of blessedness and glory: these are they, to whom that abode shall be given by our Lord Jesus Christ himself. And according as they shall have been more distinguished for their love of God, for their gratitude to their Saviour testified by acts of benevolence to their brethren, and for their elevation above earthly things, and their devout aspiration after the things of heaven, the more distinguished, we may conceive, will be their recompence; the brighter will be "the crown of righteousness, which the Lord, the righteous Judge, shall give them in that day;" and the nearer will be their approximation to the glory of the Redeemer's throne.

In short, they who shall have "drunk" most deeply "of the cup" of Christ, and shall have been most thoroughly "baptized with his baptism," or, in other words, they who shall have been most perfectly "conformed to the image of the Son of God," and shall have been thus best qualified to attain preeminence in his kingdom, are also they, for whom, after a course of love to God and man, and of affection for things above, the glory of "sitting on his right hand and on his left" is prepared of his Father: a glory, which is prepared and will be bestowed, not in compliance with any partial favour, but in pursuance of that principle of divine wisdom and equity, which provides that the best things be "prepared" for those who are best prepared to receive them; and which has been propounded by the Judge himself in his own impressive annunciation, "He that is righteous, let him be righteous still; and he that is holy, let him be holy still. Behold I come quickly, and my reward is with me; to give every man according as his work shall be V

Happiness Prepared Of The Father For Christ's Disciples.

God for his own elect prepares a throne
Of glorious brightness: what the Sire prepares,
The Son bestows; so strict an union theirs,
In nature, substance, will, and actions one.
Would'st thou that throne of glory make thy own?
Purge off each earthly passion, that impairs
Thy heavenly likeness; to salvation's heirs
Perform the angel's part; and in the Son
Love God! The pure, the merciful, the meek,
The poor in spirit, and the rich in love,
Are his delight, his children. Such bespeak
The holy influence of the mystick Dove:
Such best below his heavenly kingdom seek,
Such come most near Him in the realm above.

Section V: Proper effect of the foregoing reflections.

The Proper Effect of such reflections, as have been now occupying our minds, is that the disciple of Christ should be animated with a very fervent desire and longing to "sit on the right hand or on the left" of his Master in his kingdom of glory; and accordingly should strive to invest himself, through the power of the Spirit of Christ, with that "conformity to Christ's image," which will qualify him for such a station of dignity; and to acquire those Christian graces of piety, charity, and spiritual-mindedness, for the possessors of which it is prepared.

The desire of preeminence is inherent in our nature; but the indulgence of it is too frequently an introduction to a disregard of the laws of God, to injurious treatment of our brethren, to a neglect of our blessed Saviour's example, to an abandonment of the graces and virtues of the Christian life.

Even where no positive disobedience to God's laws, and no positive injustice towards others, result from the indulgence of temporal ambition, its pursuits have a natural tendency to secularize the mind of its votary, to weigh and press it down to the things of earth, and to produce an indifference, a disinclination, a neglect, a contempt, for high and heavenly things.

Disappointment also and mortification are the frequent consequences of its efforts: whilst, after all, even where disappointment is avoided, and the object of pursuit is attained, how little satisfactory is the consequent enjoyment, how ill calculated to fill up the cravings of a reasonable soul, how transitory and perishable in its duration!

Nor is it without its accompaniment of painful reflection to the mind of a considerate and generous competitor, that whatever gratification prosperity may produce from the contemplation of his own success, very different feelings are the natural consequence of failure in those who have been defeated in the pursuit of the object, which he has succeeded in attaining.

But to the object of desire, which is held forth to the Christian disciple as the scope of his loftiest ambition, no such derogatory and depreciating considerations can be applied.

A desire to attain that object, as it is in full accordance with the will of our Creator, so does it lead, in its regular course, to an observance of his commandments, to active benevolence for our fellow-creatures, to a cultivation of all Christian graces, to an imitation of the example of Christ.

The more perfect and earnest is our desire for such preeminence in Christ's kingdom, the more is the soul elevated above a desire for earthly things, and partakes more of the nature of those high and heavenly things, to which it is lifted up and aspires.

The object itself is in its nature most valuable, in its duration eternal; calculated to satisfy the most longing hunger and thirst of a creature, formed in the image, after the likeness, of his Creator, and gifted with immortality.

And although the very notion which we are considering supposes a superiority of reward in some, and of course an inferiority in others, and although therefore we may ourselves not be foremost in the competition, or may be sensible that others have failed in their efforts for the most distinguished prize; yet will a sense of such difference not be liable to produce the painful effects, which follow the variable success of worldly competitions; for we may be sure that they, who earnestly strive after the highest stations, will not fail of obtaining a reward fully sufficient for their eventual satisfaction and delight: since of the "many mansions," which our blessed Lord has assured us that there "are in his Father's house," however some may be distinguished by circumstances of preeminence, there is none which will not secure for its possessor an abundance of joy. If a brighter crown await the martyred Apostle, who "fought the good fight, and finished his course," amid distresses, afflictions, and persecutions, "always bearing about in his body the dying of the Lord Jesus," and "always delivered unto death for Jesus' sake1;" still a crown of righteousness and of glory, incorruptible, eternal, and that fadeth not away, shall be given by "the Lord, the righteous Judge," not to him, the martyred Apostle only, but "unto all them also, who love the Lord's appearing2;" and who testify such their affection by "denying ungodliness and worldly lusts, and living soberly, righteously, and godly, in this present world."

The Christian's Aim.

Aim at the highest prize: if there thou fail,
Thou'lt haply reach to one not far below.
Strive first the goal to compass: if too slow
Thy speed, the attempt may ne'ertheless avail
The next best post to conquer. Let not quail
Eye, heart, or limb; but still right onward go:
The Judge shall heed thee, and a crown bestow,
And bid thy name the loud-voic'd herald hail.
To the wish'd mark one racer only came
Of old victorious: to intertwine his brow
One only grasp'd the crown, and won the game,
Isthmian or proud Olympian. Happier thou
Pursu'st thy course with no uncertain aim,
Secure to seize an amaranthine bough.

Section: Concluding Exhortation.

I Have thus completed the proposed inquiry concerning the different degrees of happiness which will probably be assigned to different individuals in a future state; and withal the general inquiry concerning the happiness of the blessed. And I would now conclude the subject, by leaving on the mind of the reader, in summary application of the whole, the Inference with which St. Paul concludes his sublime argument to the Corinthians upon the resurrection of the dead. "Therefore, my beloved brethren, be ye stedfast, unmoveable, always abounding in the work of the Lord, forasmuch as ye know that your labour is not in vain in the Lord."

"Be ye stedfast, unmoveable," in contemplating, in longing after, and in pursuing, "the things which God hath prepared for them that love him:" especially, "be ye stedfast, unmoveable," in setting before your eyes, as objects of your never-ceasing desire, the highest glories in the Redeemer's kingdom.

"Be ye stedfast, unmoveable," in endeavouring, by the grace of his Holy Spirit, to become qualified for partaking in those glories, by becoming conformed to the Redeemer's image.

"Be ye stedfast, unmoveable," in endeavouring to acquire that love of God and of your brethren in Christ Jesus, and that affection for things above, which are indispensable in those, for whom a participation of such glories is prepared of the Father.

Thus, "be ye always abounding in the work of the Lord; forasmuch as ye know that your labour is not in vain in the Lord;" but that it will be abundantly recompensed in that day, when the Son of man shall come in his glory to dispense "the kingdom prepared for the blessed of his Father from the foundation of the world1:" when "every man shall receive his own reward according to his own labour2;" when "the righteous shall shine forth as the sun in the kingdom of their Father8;" and "they that be wise shall shine as the brightness of the firmament; and they that turn many to righteousness as the stars for ever and Christian Ambition.

"Ambition is the vice of noble souls!"
If 'tis a vice, then let those souls beware,
Thrice noble tho' they be, and passing fair
In the world's eye, and high upon the scrolls,
Her favour'd minions where the world inrolls,
Lest it conduct to shame! Be thine the care,
Soldier of Christ, that nobler strife to dare,
Which the rash spirit of the world controls,

And makes ambition virtue! Be it thine
To win thy bright unfading diadem
By works of love!—Around his brows shall shine
In heaven from glory's source the purest beam,
Whose aspect here, with beauty most divine,
Reflects the image of the Good Supreme.

The following Collects, selected from our Book of Common Prayer, are recommended to the notice of the Reader, as applicable to the subjects of the foregoing Inquiry.

PRAYER

For the blessed hope of everlasting life through the Scriptures. (Collect for the Second Sunday in Advent.)

“Blessed Lord, who hast caused all Holy Scriptures to be written for our learning; Grant that > may in such wise hear them, read, mark, learn, and inwardly digest them; that by patience, and comfort of thy Holy Word, > may embrace, and ever hold fast, the blessed hope of everlasting life, which thou hast given TMe 5- in our Saviour Jesus Christ. Amen.”

PRAYER

For grace in this mortal life, in order to the life immortal. (Collect for the First Sunday in Advent.)

“Almighty God, give^j grace that ^\ may cast away the works of darkness, and put upon me \ the armour of light, now in the time of this mortal life, in which thy Son Jesus Christ came to visit us in great humility: that in the last day, when he shall come again in his glorious majesty, to judge both the quick and dead, may rise to the life immortal, through him who liveth and reigneth with thee and the Holy Ghost, now and ever. Amen.”

PRAYER

For God's guidance through temporal things. (Collect for the Fourth Sunday after Trinity.)

“O God, the protector of all that trust in thee, without whom nothing is strong, nothing is holy; increase and multiply upon us thy mercy: that thou being my ruler and guide, may so pass through things temporal, that we finally lose not the things eternal: Grant this, O heavenly Father, for Jesus Christ's sake our Lord. Amen.”

PRAYER

For God's grace and defence in this mortal life. (Collect from the Post Communion.)

“Assist mercifully, O Lord, in these supplications and prayers, and dispose the way of thy servant in the attainment of everlasting salvation; that, among all the changes and chances of this mortal life, we may ever be defended by thy most gracious and ready help; through Jesus Christ our Lord. Amen.”

PRAYER

For love of God.

(Collect for the Sixth Sunday after Trinity.)

“O God, who hast prepared for them that love thee such good things as pass man's understanding; pour into our hearts} such love toward thee that we, loving thee above all things, may obtain thy promises, which exceed all that we can desire; through Jesus Christ our Lord. Amen.”

PRAYER

For the enjoyment of God in Heaven. (Collect for the Epiphany.)

“O God, who by the leading of a star didst manifest thy only-begotten Son to the Gentiles; mercifully grant, that we, which know thee now by faith may after this life have the fruition of thy glorious Godhead; through Jesus Christ our Lord. Amen.”

PRAYER

For love of God's commandments. (Collect for the Fourteenth Sunday after Trinity.)

“Almighty and everlasting God, give unto us the increase of faith, hope, and charity; and that we may obtain that which thou dost promise, and make us to love that which thou dost command; through Jesus Christ our Lord. Amen”

PRAYER

For obedience to God's commandments. (Collect for the Eleventh Sunday after Trinity.)

“O God, who declarest thy Almighty power most chiefly in showing mercy and pity; mercifully grant unto us such a measure of thy grace, that we, running the way of thy commandments, may obtain thy gracious promises, and be made partakers of thy heavenly treasure; through Jesus Christ our Lord. Amen.”

For good desires. (Collect for Easter.)

“Almighty God, who through thine only-begotten Son Jesus Christ hast overcome death, and opened unto us the gate of everlasting life; we humbly beseech thee, that, as by thy special grace preventing thou dost put unto our good desires, so by thy continual help we may bring the same to good effect; through Jesus Christ our Lord, who liveth and reigneth with thee and the Holy Ghost, ever one God,

PRAYER

For heavenly-mindedness. (Collect for Ascension-Day.)

“Grant, we beseech thee, Almighty God, that we, like as do believe thy only-begotten Son, our Lord Jesus Christ to have ascended into the heavens; so we may also in heart and mind thither ascend, and with him continually dwell, who liveth and reigneth with thee and the Holy Ghost, one God, world without end. Amen.”

PRAYER

For grace to follow the Saints in virtue and godliness. (Collect for All-Saints' Day.)

“O Almighty God, who hast knit together thine elect in one communion and fellowship, in the mystical body of thy Son Christ our Lord; Grant grace so to follow thy blessed Saints in all virtuous and godly living, that we may come to those unspeakable joys, which thou hast prepared for them that unfeignedly love thee, through Jesus Christ our Lord. Amen.”

PRAYER

For likeness to Christ in purity and glory. (Collect for the Sixth Sunday after the Epiphany.)

“O God, whose blessed Son was manifested that he might destroy the works of the devil, and make us the sons of God, and heirs of eternal life; grant we beseech thee, that, having this hope, > us, we j b r we may purify ourselves even as he is pure; that when he shall appear again with power and great glory, may be made like unto him in his eternal and glorious kingdom; where with thee, O Father, and thee, O Holy Ghost, he liveth and reigneth, ever one God, world without end. Amen.”

PRAYER

For acceptance at the general resurrection. (Collect from the Burial-Service, and from that on the day of King Charles's Martyrdom.)

“O merciful God, the Father of our Lord Jesus Christ, who is the resurrection and the life; in whom whosoever believeth shall live, though he die; and whosoever liveth, and believeth in him, shall not die eternally; who also hath taught us by his holy Apostle St. Paul, not to be sorry, as men without hope, for them that sleep in him; > meekly beseech thee,

O Father, to raise us from the death of sin unto the life of righteousness. And teach us O Lord, so to number our days, that we may apply unto wisdom. And grant, that neither the splendour thing that is good in me may withdraw its eyes us^ i our I from looking upon myself as sinful dust and ashes; but that we may press forward towards the prize of the high calling that is before us with faith and patience, with humility and meekness, with mortification and self-denial, with charity and constant perseverance unto the end; that so, when we shall depart this life, may sleep in the Lord; and at the general resurrection in the last day may be found acceptable in thy sight; and receive that blessing, which thy well-beloved Son shall then pronounce to all that love and fear thee, saying, Come ye blessed children of my Father, receive the kingdom prepared for you from the beginning of the world. Grant this, we beseech thee, O merciful Father, through Jesus Christ, our Mediator and Redeemer.. Amen"

Letter I

My Dear Sir,

Your candid and patient attention is invited to a friendly discussion of the important question of divine rewards and punishments. You profess to be a universalist of the modern school. You believe that a perfect retribution takes place in this world. You believe that the righteous are always and equitably and fully rewarded by their righteousness in this mortal life. You believe that the wicked are always and equitably and fully punished by their wickedness, in their present existence. Not only so. You also believe that there will be no future retribution for the deeds done in the body. You believe that the righteous will not be rewarded hereafter by the righteousness which they have here acquired. You believe that the wicked will not be punished hereafter by the wickedness which they have here committed. In short you believe that the future condition of mankind will not be affected by the characters which they have here formed. You believe that all rational beings will be made pure and holy and happy when they enter upon the next conscious existence. You assure me that these two articles of your belief constitute the distinguishing features of modern, American universalism. And you request me to express my honest convictions on this controverted subject.

Now, my dear Sir, I firmly believe that your system of universalism has no foundation in fact or revelation. I will therefore frankly give you some of the reasons for my belief. In the following pages I will endeavor to illustrate the nature of temporal rewards and punishments; to prove that no perfect retribution takes place in this world; to explain the meaning of christian salvation; to produce some of the arguments from common sense and scripture in proof of a future righteous retribution; to refute the principal objections which your writers have made to this doctrine; to answer the arguments which they have adduced in support of your system; to state my objections to modern, American universalism, and to conclude with some remarks on the natural tendency of the different views of divine retribution. I shall aim to manifest my friendship by using great plainness of speech, and by declaring explicitly my opinions and impressions on the various questions that may arise. I know you will give my Letters a fair and thorough examination. I believe you will cheerfully renounce your present sentiments on the points at issue if I should prove them to be erroneous. I think you will gladly embrace whatever truth may be elicited and established by my remarks. And I may reasonably expect, that all the members of your denomination who think and judge for themselves, will peruse my observations with candor and attention, since some of your preachers have repeatedly called upon me to engage in this discussion.

In the first place, you will naturally inquire what I understand by divine rewards and punishments? In answer to this question I will appeal directly to your own experience and observation. I trust you have an undoubting faith in the infinite perfections of One universal Father. Has-not this impartial Parent given you existence? Has he not created you for happiness? Has he not endowed you with an animal, an intellectual, a moral nature, so that you may answer the design of your creation? Has he not admirably adapted all your appetites, passions, propensities, affections, corporeal and mental and religious capacities for the accomplishment of this glorious purpose? Has he not implanted in your bosom an unconquerable desire for higher degrees of enjoyment? Has he not mercifully provided all the necessary means for its gratification? Does he not wish you to be continually happy? And does he not do every thing which is consistent with your moral freedom to promote your happiness? Surely an affirmative answer must be returned to these several inquiries. How then can you secure happiness and avoid misery? In but one way. You must obey the laws of your nature. But whence arise these laws? Where are they recorded? How can we ascertain their adaptation? What is their extent? They originated with your heavenly Father when he created man in his own image. They are enstamped on your very constitution. They are indicated in the works of nature. They are plainly revealed in the gospel. They are known by experience to be adapted to your necessities. They extend to every principle of humanity; to all the relations you sustain towards your fellow men and your allwise Creator and benefactor. Hence there is a right course in every thing, and a wrong course in every thing. The right consists in thinking, feeling, believing, conversing, and acting in all things and at all times as your Maker designed you should think, feel, believe, converse and act under the existing circumstances. The wrong consists either in omitting these particulars, or in pursuing a different course in these several respects from what you were made to pursue. When you follow the right you obey in a greater or less degree the laws of your nature, and this obedience is generally attended or followed with more or less happiness. When you adhere to the wrong you disobey in a greater or less degree the laws of your nature, and this disobedience is generally attended or followed with more or less misery.

Now, my dear Sir, you know that this happiness is the natural consequence of your obedience. This happiness then is the natural retribution or the paying you for your righteousness. And this natural consequence, this natural retribution, I call the divine reward of your obedience to the laws of your nature. You also perceive that this misery is the natural consequence of your disobedience. This misery then is the natural retribution or the paying you for your wickedness. And this natural consequence, this natural retribution, I call the divine punishment of your disregard of the laws of your constitution. You must likewise observe that religion consists in conforming to the rule of right in all things and at all times; and that irreligion consists either in neglecting the right or in pursuing the wrong. The sole design of religion then is to enable you to receive happiness and avoid misery. To be a christian is to obey the laws of your nature, and happiness is the reward of your obedience. To be a sinner is to disregard these laws, and misery is the punishment of your transgression. Consequently we cannot receive the happiness for which we were created without obedience to the divine laws.

But perhaps you will inquire, why I call these rewards and punishments divine? Does our heavenly Father interpose to furnish happiness when we obey his laws and misery when we disobey them? Not directly, but through second causes. You know that he is the author of your constitution. You know that he has made you for holiness, and that all sin is directly contrary to your very nature. You know that you are a free agent and have power to choose and practise righteousness, and also to discover and avoid wickedness. You know that the righteous course is generally attended or followed with happiness, and the wicked course as generally attended or followed with misery. And you know that all this is the arrangement of divine providence. Consequently the happiness you enjoy when you have done righteously is as much divine as though the Deity had interposed directly to confer this reward for your obedience. And the misery you suffer when you have done wickedly is as much divine as though your Father had interfered directly to inflict this punishment for your transgression. Besides these rewards and punishments through second causes, the Almighty has occasionally interfered in a miraculous manner to punish the guilty and reward the innocent; and surely all such retributions are entitled to the name divine. I think you must understand what I mean by divine rewards and punishments. The natural or miraculous consequences of obedience to the laws of God I call divine rewards. The natural or miraculous consequences of transgression I call divine punishments. When these consequences are confined to this world I call them a temporal retribution; and when they extend beyond the grave I call them a future retribution. I conclude therefore that no candid and intelligent reader can mistake my meaning of the various phrases used in the present discussion.

Let me now endeavor to illustrate the nature of temporal rewards and punishments.

I. I will first direct your attention to the natural rewards of obedience, and to the natural punishments of transgression. I will arrange my remarks according to the different relations we sustain, and the corresponding duties we are under obligation to perform.

1. The duties which you owe to yourself are the first in order. You were made to enjoy uninterrupted happiness. You can secure this invaluable boon by conforming to whatever is right in every particular, and in avoiding whatever is wrong at all times and under all circumstances. It becomes your highest interest then to practise righteousness and shun iniquity, so that you may obtain the enjoyment for which you were created, and glorify your heavenly Father by living in all instances as he intended. Let me now give you a few illustrations of these remarks.

In the first place, you were made to enjoy uninterrupted health. If your parents and ancestors have obeyed the laws of their physical nature, you have doubtless inherited a perfect animal constitution, and are therefore prepared to enjoy more or less of the rewards of their obedience, and to transmit them to posterity. If they have disobeyed these laws, you have probably inherited an imperfect constitution, and must consequently suffer more or less of the punishments of their transgression, and transmit them much beyond the third and fourth generation. Whoever knows any thing of human nature must know that the iniquities of the fathers are visited upon their children. It will be sufficient in this place to mention the predisposition to the gout, scrofula, consumption and insanity. Now if you scrupulously obey the laws of your Maker which relate to your animal nature, you receive uninterrupted health; and the natural consequence of health is a high degree of satisfaction and a preparation for all the other rational enjoyments of life. If you disobey these laws you suffer the penalty; and the natural consequence of your transgression will consist in a greater or less degree of pain and sickness, and an unfitness for participation in the various blessings of life. Suppose then your constitution is perfect, and you endeavor to render the required obedience. You eat the right kind of food, at proper times and in suitable quantities. You will drink wholesome liquids, in moderate portions and at appointed seasons. You will take sufficient exercise, in various ways and at convenient hours. You will sleep no more nor less than nature requires. You will always regulate your dress according to the present temperature. You will avoid all improper exposure to heat or cold, to moisture or dryness, to impure air or contagious disease. You will shun every thing which can impart disease or give physical suffering. You will practise all things which were designed to increase your corporeal enjoyments, and preserve your animal functions in full vigor and strength. And what will be the natural consequence of this obedience to the laws of your constitution? Health, which is itself a source of happiness and a necessary qualification for enjoying the pleasures which arise from all other sources. This health then I pronounce the divine reward of your obedience.

Now suppose you should pay no particular regard to the laws of your physical being. You would eat unhealthy food, at improper times, and in quantities either too great or too small. You would drink injurious liquids, in excessive or scanty portions, and at periods the most irregular and dangerous. You would be unduly and unreasonably exposed to all the varieties of heat and cold, to moisture and dryness, and also to impure atmosphere and pestilential vapors. Your sleep and exercise would be neither regular nor productive of beneficial results. In short you would disregard all the known and necessary laws of health. And what would be the consequence of this disobedience? More or less pain and disease and sickness. You would be unqualified in a greater or less degree for the performance of your incumbent duties, and for rational enjoyment. Perhaps death itself would come suddenly and perhaps you would linger many years in wretchedness. All this suffering and loss I consider to be the divine punishment of your transgression. Now I believe it is as much a part of religion to obey these laws of your physical nature, as any other of your Father's requisitions. You must be convinced from your own experience and observation that the penalties of disobedience are severe and almost certain to be inflicted. I imagine there is more suffering from this one source of sinfulness than from the transgression of many other commands. And it is not merely the body that experiences the sad consequences of the wickedness. The mind very frequently feels itself guilty; the man is conscious of having knowingly done wrong; he sensibly realizes that he has unfitted himself for the performance of his necessary duties, and his compunctions of conscience are most poignant. And must not this consequence extend to the next existence? Although physical suffering may cease with the dissolution of the body, yet I can see no reason why the soul, which in many cases has been the sinner, which has suffered severely even here for its transgressions, must not hereafter lament its disobedience of the divine laws. This surely would be nothing more nor less than the natural consequence of its disregard of the commands of heaven. And must not he who has so preserved his health as to make great advances in knowledge and goodness feel rewarded by the consciousness of having done righteously and by the possession of high degrees of wisdom and holiness? Without pressing this question, I have said sufficient to illustrate one particular of temporal rewards and punishments.

In the second place, you were made to derive happiness from the proper gratification of your appetites. They are given you for this purpose in connexion with other important uses. You may secure this reward by observing rigidly the laws which your Creator has ordained for their regulation. Suppose then you should render perfect obedience. You would be temperate in the use of all nourishing food and drinks. You would abstain wholly from whatever is injurious or unhealthy. And what would be the natural consequence? You would possess a pure and delicate taste, and a keen and well regulated appetite. Your meals would afford you a high degree of pleasure. Their immediate and remote effects on your system would be pleasing and beneficial. Your animal nature would be nourished and invigorated. You would thus be qualified for intellectual and moral advancement. All this enjoyment and preparation for duty I pronounce the divine reward of your obedience.

Now suppose you should disregard the laws of temperance. Suppose you should become an intemperate drinker of ardent spirits. You would experience much pain and sickness. Your health would be injured and your constitution undermined. Your temper would become fretful and your mental powers would be enervated. Your moral feelings would be blunted and brutified, and your social affections wasted and destroyed. Your property would be dissipated, your family and friends disgraced, and your neighbors injured. You would be unfitted for the performance of your obligatory duties. You would not answer the design of your creation. Your enjoyments would be diminished and your misery increased in various ways. All this and much more would be the natural consequence of your intemperance. This suffering and degradation I consider the divine punishment for your disobedience. Now it is as much a part of duty to govern your appetites as to observe any other of the divine laws. Intemperance in both eating and drinking, but particularly in eating, is a crying sin of our land. Thousands and tens of thousands of immortal beings are annually hastened to the grave by an excessive gratification of the appetites. And it is not the physical nature alone which suffers from this wickedness. By no means. Let a man become intoxicated by accident and the natural consequences of drunkenness on his body cannot be avoided. But let him knowingly indulge to excess a second time, and he is so constituted that he will experience the most severe compunctions of conscience. Almost every confirmed drunkard in moments of soberness suffers the most excruciating mental agony. And what can prevent these consequences from extending to the next existence? It is the free soul which sins. And can the mind of man when in a sound state ever view intemperance with complacency? Can a person find satisfaction in meditating upon the injury which he inflicted upon himself, his friends and society? Can the recollection of a wasted and degraded life, of duties neglected and sins committed, afford comfort to a religious mind? Surely not. Then how can the drunkard escape from himself, from a remembrance of his aggravated wickedness, from the horror and remorse of a guilty and self-condemned conscience? On the contrary, must not the man who has qualified himself by strict temperance for a christian life ever rejoice in his successful resistance to temptation, and in his mental and moral attainments. I see not how these natural consequences can possibly be avoided. I have however said sufficient to illustrate another instance of temporal rewards and punishments.

In the third place, your mind was made to be educated. You may expand its powers almost indefinitely by discipline. You may acquire an unlimited degree of useful knowledge by industry and application. You may qualify yourself by education for the most exquisite intellectual enjoyment and the most distinguished usefulness. If then you obey the laws which regulate your mental operations you will find the greatest satisfaction in your obedience. The whole process of culture will be attended with a high degree of pleasure. Your increasing information will afford you great delight. And your ability to enjoy, and to communicate, and to benefit, will be the natural consequence of your application. This happiness and capacity for felicity, and mental and moral power, I call the divine reward of your obedience.

Now suppose you should altogether disregard the laws of your mind. You would spend no time in reading or meditation. You would acquire very little valuable instruction. You would be unfitted for many of the important duties of life. You would live and die in ignorance. And what would be the natural consequence of this course of transgression? You would lose all the pleasures which arise from mental cultivation, from valuable information, from intellectual power. And you would suffer many inconveniences and vexations for want of more education. And if you had wilfully abused your privileges, and wasted your time, and neglected the cultivation of your talents, you would experience many hours of self-condemnation and wretchedness. All this suffering, incapacity and loss of the purest enjoyments, I should consider the divine punishment of your disobedience. Now it is as much a part of christian duty to obey the laws which relate to the improvement of the mind as it is to observe any of the other precepts of the gospel. Almost infinite evils arise from this transgression. And what can prevent these consequences from extending to another world? You have seen the man whose youth was spent in idleness and dissipation, lamenting most bitterly his iniquity, and suffering most severely for his negligence and wickedness. And when he enters a spiritual life beyond the grave can he look with approbation on what he now condemns? Must he not feel more sensibly his ingratitude and sinfulness? Must not his wilful ignorance, which unfits him in some degree for the most refined pleasures of the soul on earth, equally disqualify him for the same enjoyments in heaven? On the contrary must not the individual who has done most for his own mental and moral advancement be best prepared for the enjoyment of mental and moral happiness? But on this ground, you will ask what must be the future conditions of the millions who die in utter ignorance. Look among savage nations, and although their ignorance is unavoidable, you perceive that they suffer the natural consequences of their disobedience to the laws of their intellectual nature. You notice the great enjoyments of which they are deprived, and the great wretchedness which they suffer, on account of this transgression. As their ignorance is not wilful but necessary they feel no compunctions of conscience; and surely they can feel none on this account when admitted to a brighter existence. And although they are unfitted for the higher degrees of celestial enjoyments, still is it not in the power of the universal Father to place them in the most favorable situations for improvement, so as eventually to equalize their advantages with those of the rest of mankind? If he can make such distinctions in this respect as now exist on earth, he surely can do the same thing in another world. And will not this course be necessary to establish his impartial and paternal character? I can pursue this topic no farther at present. Thus I have given you three illustrations of the duties which you owe to yourself. Several more might be sketched did my limits permit. These however are sufficient to convince you that obedience to the laws of your nature is generally attended or followed with more or less happiness; and that disobedience is usually attended or followed with more or less misery. Consequently you see the necessity of living righteously in every particular if you would secure the divine reward and avoid the divine punishment; and I believe you will find no way in which the natural consequences of your conduct can be prevented from attending you into another existence.

2. The duties which you owe your fellow men come next in order. You were made to love your brethren as yourself. You were created to do unto them in all things and at all times as you would have them do unto you. So far as you obey these laws of your nature, so far you secure the reward of your obedience. So far as you neglect or transgress these laws, so far you incur blame and punishment. Unless your obedience be perfect your happiness will be imperfect. It is your highest interest therefore to observe these laws, so as to secure the enjoyment for which you were created, promote the welfare of your equal fellows in which your own is more or less involved, and glorify your Father in heaven by living in these several particulars as he intended. Let me give you a few illustrations of these observations.

In the first place you were made to be honest in your dealings with your fellow men. You are surrounded with temptations to cheat and defraud. You have in your own mind motives to resistance sufficiently powerful. You have merely to place yourself in the situation of your neighbor and the victory is gained. Now would you desire your brother to deceive you in a bargain? Would you have him make you believe an article is of superior quality when he knows it is wholly worthless? Should you wish him to induce you to pay much more than the real value of the purchase? Are you willing he should defraud you in any manner whatever or to any amount however small? Certainly not. If then you are guilty of any of those sins which you would unhesitatingly condemn in him, do you not knowingly violate the law of benevolence? And what follows? You feel a degree of oppression at your heart. Your mind reproaches you for having wilfully done wrong. Your iniquity is sooner or later discovered. You resolve upon restoring some of your ill-gotten gains. You have not moral courage to carry your resolutions into execution. You despise yourself, and you fear many others have the same feelings towards you. You cannot look to heaven for a blessing upon such unhallowed means of obtaining property. Your character suffers in the estimation of your acquaintances. Little or no confidence is reposed in your integrity. You know very few if any real friends. In hours of reflection or danger or sickness, your dishonest dealings cause you the most painful reflections and the most fearful forebodings. All this and much more is the natural consequence of your iniquity; and all this I pronounce the divine punishment of your disobedience.

Now suppose you should be perfectly honest in all your transactions with your fellow men. Suppose you should do unto them in all your dealings as you would have them do unto you. You would speak the truth, and the whole truth, and nothing but the truth, on every occasion. And what would follow? You would feel a high degree of satisfaction in the consciousness of always doing right. You would experience an elevation of spirits too little known among men of business. You would daily seek the blessing of an omniscient Father on ' your labors, to whom you would appeal in proof of the sincerity of your intentions. You would look your customers in the face with an undaunted eye and an unblushing countenance. Your character would be respected by all, even the intriguing and deceitful. Unlimited confidence would be reposed in your word. Your business would be increased. And in times of self-examination, or affliction, or approaching dissolution, you would review your truly christian course with approbation. You would experience the smiles of an enlightened conscience. All this and much more is the natural consequence of your honesty; and all this I pronounce the divine reward of your obedience. And what can prevent these consequences from extending to another existence? Whatever the gospel authorizes you to regard with satisfaction in the hour of death must increase your enjoyment in a purer and more spiritual region. And if you condemn yourself for your dishonest and fraudulent practices when standing on the brink of the grave, if you then suffer the most exquisite torments on account of your unjust and sinful dealings, what is to change your views and feelings on your entrance into a state in which wickedness will appear in its true deformity? Can you then look with approbation on the many instances in which you deceived and injured your brethren? Will it give you happiness to remember how great riches you acquired by falsehood? I see no way in which you can escape these natural consequences of your obedience or transgression.

In the second place, you were made to obtain your living by some useful occupation. You may employ your body or your mind, or both in connexion. The philosopher in his study has done more for the advancement of the human family than thousands who have devoted themselves to manual employments. In what condition would the world have been, had not the inventions of printing, the mariner's compass, the machinery for cotton and woolen fabrics, and a thousand others, never been known? All useful employments are equally honorable, and the day laborer is as much entitled to respect for his honest industry as the overseer of the most complicated mechanism on earth. Suppose then you follow agriculture, the most ancient occupation of man, and without which all others must terminate. You secure health and competence. You escape a thousand temptations to which others are exposed. Many occurrences naturally lead your thoughts up through nature to the supreme ruler of the universe. You are not dependent on your fellow men for your daily bread. Circumstances conspire - to produce contentment, domestic enjoyment, and much mental and moral improvement. Now the result of all these things is rational happiness. This then I pronounce the divine reward of your obedience.

But suppose you should pursue a different course. Suppose you should endeavor to gain a subsistence by the useless and pernicious vice of gambling. While engaged in this business you do nothing to increase provision, clothing, or improvement in knowledge or goodness. On the contrary you aim to obtain the property of your neighbor without returning him any equivalent, or without his giving it to you as a present; and consequently what you receive is fraudulently acquired. You are taken from your family at unseasonable hours, and often return with a peevish and crabbed disposition. You set an example which you dare not let your children observe or imitate. You are tempted to indulge in lying, profanity, obscenity and excessive drinking. Your character is ruined in the estimation of all wise and christian persons. You are instrumental in seducing the promising youth from the paths of virtue and honest industry. You are accessory to the destruction of his moral principles, his brightest prospects for this world, and his best hopes for another. With all this accumulated load of guilt on your head, how can you enjoy a moment's real happiness? It is impossible. You cannot ask the blessing of your Father upon your undertaking. In your own soul you know it is a wicked and ruinous occupation. You can never look back with satisfaction either upon your gains or losses. You can never think of your habits and practices without severe compunctions, of conscience. You fear sickness and death and futurity. All this is the natural consequence of your iniquity; the divine punishment for your disobedience of the laws of your Creator. And can these consequences cease with the death of the body? Will you take delight in heaven in contemplating your wretched and depraved existence on earth? Will not the industrious and virtuous laborer who has done good to others find himself qualified for pure and holy pleasures? I put these questions to your common sense.

3. In the third place, you were made to love your neighbor as you love yourself. If this affection exists in your bosom it will manifest itself in your feelings, dispositions, conversation and conduct. How then would you discover your friendship for yourself? Would you endeavor to waste your property, injure your influence, and destroy your character? These are acts of the insane and wicked who hate their own existence. Suppose then you disregard this law of your nature; suppose you really hate your brother; the fruits of your enmity will appear in your behaviour. You will feel uneasy and restless whenever his name passes through your memory. You will be watching for opportunities to diminish his wealth or popularity or respect. You will throw out hints, insinuations and even direct charges respecting his purity or innocence or honesty or integrity. You will rejoice to hear of his misfortunes and his ill success in the business of life. In short your hatred will fill your bosom with more or less wretchedness. And besides this your fellow men will lose their respect for your character. They will receive your statements with caution. They will feel less kindly towards you, and be less ready to aid you in even your good undertakings. They will pity and in some instances despise you. All this and much more is the natural consequence of your wickedness; and all this I consider the divine punishment of your disobedience.

Now suppose you should strictly observe this divine command. You would regard your neighbor as a child - of your Father; equally dear by nature to your common parent, and entitled to equal rights and privileges and hopes. You would feel that your own happiness depended in no small degree on his mental, moral and temporal prosperity. You would accordingly regard his feelings, his property, his character, as sacred as your own. You would endeavor in every possible way to advance his best welfare. And what would follow? You would feel at ease in your own mind. You would derive improvement and enjoyment from your friendship. You would realize that you had one on whom you could depend in every situation. You would view your intercourse towards him with satisfaction. All this and much more would be the natural consequence of your affection; the divine reward of your obedience. And must not these consequences extend beyond the grave? Will you not renew your intimacy with the virtuous brother? Will not a recollection of your past kindness and love increase your celestial joys? Will you not be better prepared for the felicity of a heavenly existence? On the contrary, can you ever look with approbation upon your hatred and enmities? Will it afford you pleasure to remember your unchristian feelings and your infernal dispositions? I see no way in which you can ever become so perfect as not to loathe all ill will and revenge. I have given you a few specimens of the duties which we owe to our fellow men. Similar remarks might be made respecting the remainder did my limits permit. Sufficient however have been mentioned for all present purposes.

3. The duties which you owe to your heavenly Father are now to be considered. You were created to believe in one impartial parent; to love him with supreme affection; to worship him in spirit and truth; to confide in his goodness with implicit confidence; to remember his manifold blessings with lively gratitude; to submit to his various dispensations with cheerfulness, and to render unreserved obedience to his beneficial commands. If you comply with these requisitions of your nature, you secure the happiness for which you were created, and glorify your Maker by living in all things as he intended. In the first place, you were made to believe in the existence of One all-perfect Father. Many of your fellow men have not this belief. Some few in christian lands profess to have no faith in a Supreme Being. They have made themselves atheists either by false reasoning or depraved living. Their minds are in a state of confusion. They cannot give vent to the natural devotion of the human heart. All the works of creation are in disorder. They have no support in trials. They have no consolations in afflictions. They have no friend in danger, no hope in the grave, no Father in heaven. How deplorable their condition. There are others in heathen countries who believe in many gods. They worship idols of their own making or creation or deification. Some they flatter and some they fear; some they despise and some they imitate; and nothing but wretchedness is the natural result of their erroneous belief. There are others again who believe in the One true God, but have no correct views of his real character. They ascribe to him actions which would disgrace a human parent. They consider him as both partial and revengeful. They fear he will not deal so well with his own children as they should did they possess his power. And for these and other reasons they suffer many hours of anxiety and misery. In all these cases the unhappiness and degradation are the natural consequences of unbelief or misbelief; the divine punishment for their disobedience to the laws of their mental constitution.

Now if you believe the representations of your Savior respecting your heavenly Father, you will entertain correct notions of his character and perfections and government. You will regard him as a self-existent creator, preserver and benefactor. You will view him as the merciful parent of his human family. You believe that he loves all his children with an infinite affection; that he overrules the events of this world in wisdom and benevolence; and that he never afflicts in anger or wrath or resentment. You believe that he sent his well beloved son to be the Savior of the world. It gives you delight to meditate upon his unbounded benevolence. So long as you render him gratitude, affection and obedience you preserve an unfailing confidence in his unchangeable love. In hours of sickness and death you know that your friend and Father will be with you for your support and consolation. All this and much more is the natural consequence of your correct faith on this subject; the divine reward of your obedience to the laws of your intellectual and moral nature. And what can prevent these consequences from extending to another life? So far indeed as unbelief or misbelief are necessary no one can suffer the compunctions of conscience on their account either here or in the world to come. So far as any one has neglected or abused the light and evidence granted for his guidance, so far he must feel guilty and condemn his own wickedness. And so far as the true belief has aided any one in securing the happiness of this life and preparing for heaven, so far he carries the reward of his obedience in his own soul. Enough however has been said to illustrate this particular.

In the second place, you were made to love your heavenly Father supremely. Affections for this purpose have been implanted in your bosom. Motives to its cultivation are multiplied. You are free to conform to this law of your nature or to disregard its directions. Suppose you should neglect to cultivate the required affection. You would give your thoughts to earthly concerns. You would find the pleasures of this world transient and unsatisfactory. You would feel an aching void in your heart which no temporal blessings can ever supply. You would become uneasy, restless, discontented. You are not prepared for the changes and trials of life, and their occurrence brings dismay and anguish. All this and much more is the natural consequence of your neglect and ingratitude; the divine punishment of your disobedience.

But suppose you should endeavor to comply with the divine injunction. You will carefully study the works of your Father so as to have the evidence of his infinite perfections deeply impressed upon your mind. You will meditate upon the various displays of his goodness in the world around. You will contemplate his unspeakable love in appearing for the salvation of a perishing world. You will examine the descriptions given of his paternal character by your divine Savior. You will call to mind the favors you have received at his hands. You will often raise your thoughts to him in spiritual devotion. You will aim to see him in every thing and every thing in him. In this way you will acquire a pure and ardent love for the only true God. And this affection will give rise to all your conduct; will sustain you under the greatest afflictions; will animate you in the discharge of incumbent duties; will console you under the heaviest afflictions, and will render you happy in some degree at all times. All this and much more is the natural consequence of your love; the divine reward for your obedience to the laws which were given to regulate your affections. And can these consequences be prevented from extending to the other existence? Can he who has blasphemed the name of his maker, despised his providence, disregarded his commands, join at once with those who have learned by long practice to love and worship their heavenly father? Impossible. I have thus given you a few illustrations of the duties which we owe to our Creator. I might make similar remarks concerning the remainder did my limits permit; but enough has been said to explain the first division of my subject.

Thus, my dear sir, have I given you a few brief illustrations of the natural rewards of obedience, and the natural punishments of transgression. Now if you could prove that the laws of your nature are perfect in their operation; if you could prove that the obedient always enjoyed a full and equitable reward; if you could prove that the wicked always suffered a full and equitable punishment; still the argument for a future retribution would remain unaffected. For you know that the consequences of both goodness and wickedness extend far beyond the period of action. You know that the consequences of a virtuous or dissipated youth extend through the whole of mortal life. Now before you can convince me that there is to be no future retribution, you must establish the three following positions. You must prove that the present life has no connexion whatever with the next existence; and is not this supposition contrary to both reason and revelation? You must also prove that we shall have no remembrance in the next life of what took place on earth; and is not this also contrary to truth and scripture? You must likewise prove that we experience a moral change in our passage from this world to the other; and is not this likewise most absurd? As these positions never have been proved true, I trust they never will while sound reasoning is respected. But you cannot prove the first particular, that the laws of your nature are perfect in their operation. No; this cannot be accomplished. It is perfectly evident that various causes exist to modify their effects, so that the wicked are not always and fully punished, nor the righteous always and fully rewarded. Consequently a future retribution seems to my mind absolutely necessary to justify the ways of God to man. But as these topics will be more fully discussed hereafter I forbear, and request your continued attention to the remainder of the present subject.

II. I will now direct your attention to some instances of happiness and misery which are not generally considered to be the natural consequences of obedience and transgression. Some of these are undoubtedly caused by the miraculous interposition of our Father in favor of goodness and against wickedness. Some are evidently the natural consequences of human conduct either wholly or in part, and the necessary results of the ordinary operations of the natural laws of the Creator. And some are neither the natural consequences either of observing or disregarding the divine commands, nor the miraculous interpositions of Deity either for reward or punishment. Let me give you a few brief illustrations of these several assertions.

1. I will first notice some of those instances in which our heavenly Father has miraculously interfered to reward the righteous and punish the wicked. All the examples of this character which are mentioned in the bible I receive as certain facts; for I find sufficient evidence to satisfy my mind that the scriptures contain the record of a divine revelation. There may have been other cases of a similar nature which are not contained in the sacred writings; but as I have no convincing proof of a miraculous interference in any given instance, I must withhold my assent from all such relations.

In the first place, look at some of the instances in which our heavenly Father interfered miraculously for the preservation and happiness of his obedient children. Enoch and Elijah were translated to heaven without passing through the pangs of a temporal death. Joseph received supernatural aid to interpret dreams which paved the way for his future greatness and glory. Daniel remained unharmed in a den of lions. Shadrach, Meshach and Abednego, were uninjured in the midst of a burning fiery furnace. The Hebrews were conveyed through the Red Sea in safety. - Manna from heaven was given them for food. Constant use diminished not the widow's oil. Many of the believing received favors through the commissioned Savior. The prison doors were opened to the persecuted apostle. Now we must consider these and all similar cases recorded in scripture as miraculous interpositions of our Father, not merely to manifest his approbation of moral goodness, but to furnish satisfactory evidence of a divine revelation. Are the rewards of obedience equitably distributed in this world? Why then have not the righteous when in extreme danger and distress oflener received supernatural assistance? Here is surely strong indications of partiality, if this is the only state of retribution. In the second place, look at some of those instances in which our Father has miraculously interfered to punish the wicked. The antedeluvians were destroyed with a flood. The Egyptians were drowned in the Red Sea. The cities of the plain were overwhelmed with fire and brimstone. Korah and his company were swallowed by an earthquake. Ananias and Sapphira were instantly levelled with the dust. These and all similar examples recorded in the sacred writings must be considered miraculous interpositions of heaven. But for what purpose? As a punishment of the disobedient. Such is the declaration of revelation. But if your belief of no future retribution be true, these judgments cannot be called punishments. On the contrary I should consider them as miraculous rewards conferred on the depraved. Take the inhabitants of Sodom for an example. They were exceedingly wicked. Of course they were truly wretched. They were suddenly destroyed. They were thus saved from the many miserable hours which they must have experienced had they continued on earth. They escaped those severe compunctions of conscience which a review of their wasted and profligate life must have produced. They were relieved from the pains and agonies of a lingering and unhappy death. From these and other temporal sufferings they were taken by a momentary destruction. Now if this was the end of their sins and miseries; if they are never to endure another moment's pain and wretchedness; if they are to be pure and happy the instant they enter upon the next conscious existence, what did they lose by the overwhelming calamity? Nothing but punishment. What did they gain? A release from torment and an admission to unspeakable felicity. If this be the fact as you believe, must we not consider their destruction from the face of the earth a special favor of heaven? Surely it can be considered in no other light. What then do the scriptures mean by calling such events divine punishments? Not only so. On your own ground you cannot prove an acquitable retribution in this world. Why are so many cities which are equally wicked not specially favored with a sudden translation from degradation and indescribable suffering to celestial happiness? I have thus given you a specimen of what revelation pronounces divine rewards and punishments. Consider them in what light you please, and I believe you must admit that they furnish an unanswerable argument in proof of a future righteous retribution. 2. I will now notice some of those instances of preservation and destruction which individuals have denominated special or miraculous interpositions of our Father, but which I consider to be nothing more than the common results of the ordinary operations of the natural laws of our Creator. In order to convince me that any such occurrence is supernatural, you must first prove that the event could not have occurred in the ordinary course of Providence, such for instance as the raising to life of a dead man; and then you must also prove that some valuable purpose is to be answered by the interposition, such for example as establishing the truth of divine revelation. I do not think it will be possible to prove these two positions in any of those constantly occurring cases which people call special mercies and judgments. Let me refer you to a few examples of this description.

In the first place, look to some of those instances in which it is supposed our Father miraculously interfered to confer favors upon his children. As I have the autobiography of the late Dr. Adam Clarke now before me, and as he has been ranked the most learned man among the Methodists, I will select two examples from this publication. Listen to his own words. "Having occasion to bring home a sack of grain from a neighboring village; it was laid over the bare back of his horse, and to keep it steady he rode on the top; one end being much heavier than the other, he found it difficult to keep it on: at last it preponderated so much, that it fell, and he under it; his back happened to come in contact with a pointed stone; he was taken up apparently dead; a person attempted to draw some blood from his arm, but in vain, none would flow, and his face and neck turned quite black. He lay insensible for more than two hours, during the greater part of which time, he was not known even to breathe, so that all said he is dead. He was brought near the fire and rubbed with warm cloths; at length a plenteous flow of blood from the orifice in his arm, was the means of promoting that respiration which had been so long obstructed. All had given him over for dead, and even now that he began to breathe, but with an oppressive sense of the acutest pain, few entertained hopes that he could long survive this accident. In about twenty-four hours it was thought that he might in an easy chair be carried home, which was about a mile distant. He however utterly refused to get into the chair, but while the men carried it, held it with his right hand, and walked by its side, and thus reached his father's house; and in a short time, to the great surprise of all who had witnessed the accident, was completely restored. Had he not been designed for matters of great and high importance, it is not likely in the Ordinary course of nature he would have survived this accident." Now in this relation there is nothing more remarkable than what has occurred to hundreds of others; and I believe any scoundrel of the same bodily powers would have passed through the accident in the same favorable manner.

Let me present you another example from the same author. This is his own statement. "Mr. Wesley's time allotted for his visit to these Islands being expired, he purposed sailing for Southampton by the first fair wind, as he had appointed to be at Bristol on a particular day; but the wind continuing adverse, and an English brig touching at Guernsey on her way from France to Penzance they agreed for their passage, Mr. Clarke having obtained Mr. Wesley's permission to accompany them to England. They sailed out of Guernsey road on Thursday, the sixth of September," with a fine fair breeze; but in a short time, the wind which had continued slackening, died away, and afterwards rose up in that quarter which would have favored the passage to Southampton or Weymouth, had they been so bound. The contrary wind blew in to a tight breeze, and they were obliged to make frequent tacks, in order to clear the Island. Mr. Wesley was sitting reading in the cabin, and hearing the noise and bustle which were occasioned by putting about the vessel, to stand on her different tacks, he put his head above deck and inquired what was the matter? Being told the wind was become contrary, and the ship was obliged to tack, he said,—Then let us go to prayer. His own company, who were upon deck, walked down, and at his request Dr. Coke, Mr. Bradford, and Mr. Clarke went to prayer. After the latter had ended, Mr. Wesley broke out into fervent supplication, which seemed to be more the offspring of strong faith than mere desire, his words were remarkable, as well as the spirit, evident feeling, and manner in which they were uttered. The power of his petition was felt by all; he rose from his knees, made no kind of remark, but took up his book and continued his reading. Mr. Clarke went upon deck, and what was his surprise when he found the vessel standing her right course, with a steady breeze, which slackened not, till, carrying them at the rate of nine or ten knots an hour, they anchored safely near St. Michael's Mount, in Penzance bay. On the sudden and favorable change of wind Mr. Wesley made no remark; so fully did he expect to be heard, that he took for granted he was heard. Such answers to prayer he was in the habit of receiving; and therefore to him, the occurrence was not strange. Mr. Wesley was no ordinary man; every hour, every minute of his time was devoted to the great work which God had given him to do; and it is not to be wondered at that he was favored, and indeed accredited, with many signal interpositions of divine providence. Mr. Clarke himself has confessed, that high as his opinion was of Mr. Wesley's piety and faith, he had no hope that the wind which had long set in the opposite quarter, and which had just now changed in a very natural way, would immediately veer about, except by providential interference, to blow in a contrary direction. There were too many marked extraordinary circumstances in the case, to permit any attentive observer to suppose that the change had been effected by any natural or casual occurrence." Now if Mr. Clarke can prove that the wind would not have changed if Mr. Wesley's prayer had not been offered, then the first step will have been taken to establish a special providence; but this can never be done, and consequently we have no evidence in the case whatever. And to suppose that God Almighty had made John Wesley an "accredited" messenger of his providence requires a degree of credulity which I do not possess. These specimens are sufficient to show that no satisfactory proof exists in confirmation of modern miracles.

In the second place, look at the other side of the question. Instances have occurred in which individuals suppose that our Father interferes miraculously for the punishment and destruction of his children. Since I have selected the former examples from a Methodist book, I will still confine my remarks to the same denomination. When the unitarian church in this place was struck by lightning, some of the members of this sect pronounced it a special judgment. This was their calm and deliberate opinion. They believed that our Father had departed from his usual course to manifest his displeasure against our peculiar sentiments. Not long since the Methodist chapel in a neighboring town was struck in a similar manner and greatly damaged. Had it not been for the timely interference of human means the building would have been wholly destroyed. Now will they be consistent? Will they call this a special judgment, to manifest' the divine disapprobation of their distinguishing belief. Not only so. It is but a few years since a vessel which was conveying a large number of their missionaries with their families from one island to another, was wrecked and all the passengers drowned. A more distressing accident has scarcely ever been recorded. Did God interfere for their destruction? Is there not as much evidence of this as there is that he interfered to save the life of Clarke and hasten Wesley on his voyage? Precisely the same. Will it be so regarded? By no means. The truth of the case is simply this. When an unfortunate event happens to those who reject our creed we pronounce it a special interference of our Father' for their punishment. But when an occurrence precisely similar overwhelms any of our own denomination, we are ready to exclaim, whom the Lord loveth he chasteneth. Why may not the miser affirm that his property has been gained through the special assistance of divine Providence, since he has so far outreached his neighbors in the pursuit of wealth? Why may not the pirate attribute his success to the supernatural interference of heaven? I see no reason why they may not advance these claims with as much propriety as those religionists- who pronounce the natural results of their zeal and activity and impudence special mercies. No. It is not possible to prove that God now interferes in a miraculous manner either to reward the righteous or punish the wicked. This is not his mode of governing his rational creatures. A day of perfect retribution will yet arrive; and then those who have flourished by their iniquity will receive the recompense of their labors, and those who have been crushed by the oppression of the depraved will rise in their true dignity, and enjoy the rewards prepared for all who live sober, righteous and godly lives. I have said sufficient to show that we have no evidence of miracles at the present day, either for the reward of the holy or the punishment of the sinful.

3. I will thirdly refer you to some of those instances of prosperity and adversity which are evidently the natural consequences of human conduct either wholly or in part; and the necessary results of the ordinary operations of the divine laws. Under this head I should include all uncommon success in mercantile, civil or religious affairs; all pestilence, war and persecution; all earthquakes, famines and conflagrations. A few illustrations may be mentioned.

In the first place, look at the success of some sect of religionists. I will refer in this instance to those in our own land who are called christians. It is about thirty years since a few individuals renounced all sectarian names, discarded all human creeds, and began to preach the simple truths of Unitarian christianity. Their increase has been beyond all former example. They have now more than twelve hundred churches in this country, and for piety and morality they will bear an honorable comparison with any other denomination. Now has our Father given them any special assistance? Some are ready to answer this question in the affirmative. But for one I have no hesitation in giving a decided negative. All this success is the natural result of human instrumentality. The preachers adapted themselves to the condition and wants of the hearers. They talked to them in an earnest and plain and direct manner. They persevered with all becoming zeal; and they soon received the fruit of their labors. I might make similar remarks concerning the methodists. Not only so. If the same means are used to propagate false doctrines very considerable progress will be made. Look at the mormonites. They are most laborious and indefatigable in their exertions. They are making converts to their wild and absurd opinions even in our own vicinity. So in England the power of speaking unknown languages is increasing with fearful rapidity. And how did the Arabian impostor carry forward his ambitious designs? You may just as well consider the prevalence of his religion the result of special divine interposition as to regard the unusual advancement of any one christian sect to be a miraculous favor conferred on its votaries. In all such cases there is nothing more nor less than the natural consequences of great zeal, untiring perseverance and well selected means.

In the second place, look at the prevalence of the cholera. It has shown no partiality to opinions, but taken the hindoo, the mahoraetan, the jew, the christian and the infidel. It has however observed certain rules in its operation. Those who have violated the laws of their physical nature are the first victims and almost the only victims. Is this pestilence a special judgment for the punishment of mankind? So many have believed. I think the contrary. Had all men observed the laws of their animal constitution the cholera would never have prevailed. Most of the deaths which have occurred in this disease, I regard as the natural consequence of their disobedience. When contagion is increased by great mortality, and many are unfitted for resistance through the influence of fear, no doubt the innocent perish with the guilty. It is also evident that many have inherited weakly and sickly bodies from those who in some way or other violated the laws of their physical nature. So that after you have counted those on whom the vices of their progenitors were visited; and those who had injured their constitution either ignorantly or in a good cause; and those who had not received sufficient nourishing sustenance; and those who had abused their nature by excessive eating and drinking and licentiousness; and those whose unmanly fears prostrated them at once, you will find but a few victims of the cholera remaining. Had there been no disobedience I firmly believe there would have been little or none of this temporal punishment. But if your doctrine of no future retribution be true, I see not but we must regard the cholera as a special blessing to the miserable victims who have been hurried to the grave. Take the great multitude of prostitutes who have been swept away by its ravages. A more degraded, polluted, miserable, wretched class of human creatures cannot be imagined. They were constantly in a perfect earthly hell. Now if this is the end of all their sufferings; if they can look back with approbation and delight on their profligate lives; if they enjoy uninterrupted happiness; if their felicity is never to be disturbed by one pang of remorse on account of their unparalleled depravity; then I must regard the pestilence which hastened them from unutterable torments to heavenly glory a very special blessing to their souls. I see not how any benevolent person can take any other view of the subject, on your ground of belief. Although I do not consider any prevailing epidemic to be a miraculous interposition of our Father, yet I believe all events above our control are wisely ordered by his superintending providence. I could go on to make similar remarks respecting earthquakes and tornadoes, tempests of thunder and lightning and all the uncommon convulsions of nature. All these I regard as the natural result of the operation of divine laws, and not as a designed punishment for wickedness.

4. In the fourth place, look at those sufferings which are neither the natural consequences of disobedience to divine commands, nor miraculous interpositions for the punishment of wickedness. Read the history of the world; look abroad into society; enter into the retirement of domestic life; and you will be convinced that the innocent, the virtuous, the righteous have experienced the most severe, unceasing, excruciating sufferings. You will be convinced that these torments were inflicted by their fellow men, and not because they violated the laws of their maker, but for the very reason in many instances that they were pure and holy. How many christian wives are daily made miserable by their brutal and intemperate husbands? How many philanthropists have sacrificed their ease, their influence, their liberty, their life in the cause of suffering humanity? How many worthy reformers have been fined, tortured, imprisoned, and burned for their conscientious adherence to the principles of religious liberty? How many disinterested patriots have shared in toils and hardships and cruelties and death for the benefit of an ungrateful multitude. In every war how many of the innocent are made wretched by the crimes of the wicked? Time would fail me to mention the instances in which the just suffer the severest torments from the injustice of their brethren. Now how will you dispose of all these facts? Why have so many experienced such dreadful cruelties? Because they have transgressed the laws of their nature? By no means. They suffered on account of their very obedience. What benefit are they to receive for this indescribable anguish? Perhaps you will say that they may learn by their inflictions to put a firm trust in their heavenly Father, to be weaned from the vanities of this world, and to enjoy the smiles of an approving conscience. All this is very well. But if all men are to be rewarded according to their deeds, how can you call this an equal retribution? I see no way in which you can avoid this difficulty on your scheme but to affirm that these individuals were great sufferers only because they were great sinners. This is the language of Job's comforters; and if it was incorrect in ancient days I know not that the lapse of ages has converted it into truth. Admit the fact of a future righteous retribution and the difficulty vanishes; and without admitting this truth you cannot possibly reconcile the unparalleled sufferings of the righteous with the justice of your heavenly Father.

But are the persecutors always punished in exact accordance with their wickedness? Surely not. For many really believe they are doing God service in their abominable cruelties, and consequently they receive the approbation instead of the reproaches of their own conscience. Others are too hardened in sin to suffer any compunctions on account of their crimes. Now in order to make rewards and punishments equal the merits and deserts of all mankind, must there not be another existence, where the secrets of all hearts shall be exposed; where all circumstances shall be considered; where the blinded bigot shall confess the truth; where the right and the wrong of their present course shall be manifested to every soul, and where every one shall be rewarded and punished according to the deeds done in the body. As I shall have occasion to discuss this subject more fully hereafter I will not dwell longer on this point. I have given you such illustrations of my views of divine rewards and punishments as my limits will permit. Many very important questions I have left altogether untouched. Many more I have but briefly and superficially examined. And none have been treated with that fulness which they really demand. I have said enough however to give you some insight into my opinions on the various topics connected with this branch of my discussion. And I hope you will examine my remarks and statements and conclusions with all proper freedom and boldness, and embrace whatever of truth may have been elicited and established.

The Three Degrees of Glory

D&C Section 76

A vision given to Joseph Smith the Prophet and Sidney Rigdon, at Hiram, Ohio, February 16, 1832. HC 1: 245–252. Prefacing his record of this vision the Prophet wrote: “Upon my return from Amherst conference, I resumed the translation of the Scriptures. From sundry revelations which had been received, it was apparent that many important points touching the salvation of man had been taken from the Bible, or lost before it was compiled. It appeared self-evident from what truths were left, that if God rewarded every one according to the deeds done in the body, the term ‘Heaven,’ as intended for the Saints’ eternal home, must include more kingdoms than one. Accordingly, while translating St. John’s Gospel, myself and Elder Rigdon saw the following vision.” It was after the Prophet had translated John 5: 29 that this vision was given.

1. Hear, O ye heavens, and give ear, O earth, and rejoice ye inhabitants thereof, for the Lord is God, and beside him there is no Savior.
2. Great is his wisdom, marvelous are his ways, and the extent of his doings none can find out.
3. His purposes fail not, neither are there any who can stay his hand.
4. From eternity to eternity he is the same, and his years never fail.
5. For thus saith the Lord—I, the Lord, am merciful and gracious unto those who fear me, and delight to honor those who serve me in righteousness and in truth unto the end.
6. Great shall be their reward and eternal shall be their glory.
7. And to them will I reveal all mysteries, yea, all the hidden mysteries of my kingdom from days of old, and for ages to come, will I make known unto them the good pleasure of my will concerning all things pertaining to my kingdom.
8. Yea, even the wonders of eternity shall they know, and things to come will I show them, even the things of many generations.
9. And their wisdom shall be great, and their understanding reach to heaven; and before them the wisdom of the wise shall perish, and the understanding of the prudent shall come to naught.
10. For by my Spirit will I enlighten them, and by my power will I make known unto them the secrets of my will—yea, even those things which eye has not seen, nor ear heard, nor yet entered into the heart of man.

11. We, Joseph Smith, Jun., and Sidney Rigdon, being in the Spirit on the sixteenth day of February, in the year of our Lord one thousand eight hundred and thirty-two—
12. By the power of the Spirit our eyes were opened and our understandings were enlightened, so as to see and understand the things of God—
13. Even those things which were from the beginning before the world was, which were ordained of the Father, through his Only Begotten Son, who was in the bosom of the Father, even from the beginning;
14. Of whom we bear record; and the record which we bear is the fulness of the gospel of Jesus Christ, who is the Son, whom we saw and with whom we conversed in the heavenly vision.
15. For while we were doing the work of translation, which the Lord had appointed unto us, we came to the twenty-ninth verse of the fifth chapter of John, which was given unto us as follows—
16. Speaking of the resurrection of the dead, concerning those who shall hear the voice of the Son of Man:
17. And shall come forth; they who have done good, in the resurrection of the just; and they who have done evil, in the resurrection of the unjust.
18. Now this caused us to marvel, for it was given unto us of the Spirit.
19. And while we meditated upon these things, the Lord touched the eyes of our understandings and they were opened, and the glory of the Lord shone round about.
20. And we beheld the glory of the Son, on the right hand of the Father, and received of his fulness;
21. And saw the holy angels, and them who are sanctified before his throne, worshiping God, and the Lamb, who worship him forever and ever.
22. And now, after the many testimonies which have been given of him, this is the testimony, last of all, which we give of him: That he lives!
23. For we saw him, even on the right hand of God; and we heard the voice bearing record that he is the Only Begotten of the Father—
24. That by him, and through him, and of him, the worlds are and were created, and the inhabitants thereof are begotten sons and daughters unto God.

25. And this we saw also, and bear record, that an angel of God who was in authority in the presence of God, who rebelled against the Only Begotten Son whom the Father loved and who was in the bosom of the Father, was thrust down from the presence of God and the Son,
26. And was called Perdition, for the heavens wept over him—he was Lucifer, a son of the morning. And we beheld, and lo, he is fallen! is fallen, even a son of the morning!
27. And while we were yet in the Spirit, the Lord commanded us that we should write the vision; for we beheld Satan, that old serpent, even the devil, who rebelled against God, and sought to take the kingdom of our God and his Christ—
28. Wherefore, he maketh war with the saints of God, and encompasseth them round about.
29. And we saw a vision of the sufferings of those with whom he made war and overcame, for thus came the voice of the Lord unto us:
30. Thus saith the Lord concerning all those who know my power, and have been made partakers thereof, and suffered themselves through the power of the devil to be overcome, and to deny the truth and defy my power—
31. They are they who are the sons of perdition, of whom I say that it had been better for them never to have been born;
32. For they are vessels of wrath, doomed to suffer the wrath of God, with the devil and his angels in eternity;
33. Concerning whom I have said there is no forgiveness in this world nor in the world to come—
34. Having denied the Holy Spirit after having received it, and having denied the Only Begotten Son of the Father, having crucified him unto themselves and put him to an open shame.
35. These are they who shall go away into the lake of fire and brimstone, with the devil and his angels—
36. And the only ones on whom the second death shall have any power;
37. Yea, verily, the only ones who shall not be redeemed in the due time of the Lord, after the sufferings of his wrath.

38. For all the rest shall be brought forth by the resurrection of the dead, through the triumph and the glory of the Lamb, who was slain, who was in the bosom of the Father before the worlds were made.
39. And this is the gospel, the glad tidings, which the voice out of the heavens bore record unto us—
40. That he came into the world, even Jesus, to be crucified for the world, and to bear the sins of the world, and to sanctify the world, and to cleanse it from all unrighteousness;
41. That through him all might be saved whom the Father had put into his power and made by him;
42. Who glorifies the Father, and saves all the works of his hands, except those sons of perdition who deny the Son after the Father has revealed him.

43. Wherefore, he saves all except them—they shall go away into everlasting punishment, which is endless punishment, which is eternal punishment, to reign with the devil and his angels in eternity, where their worm dieth not, and the fire is not quenched, which is their torment—
44. And the end thereof, neither the place thereof, nor their torment, no man knows;
45. Neither was it revealed, neither is, neither will be revealed unto man, except to them who are made partakers thereof;
46. Nevertheless, I, the Lord, show it by vision unto many, but straightway shut it up again;
47. Wherefore, the end, the width, the height, the depth, and the misery thereof, they understand not, neither any man except those who are ordained unto this condemnation.
48. And we heard the voice, saying: Write the vision, for lo, this is the end of the vision of the sufferings of the ungodly.

49. And again we bear record—for we saw and heard, and this is the testimony of the gospel of Christ concerning them who shall come forth in the resurrection of the just—
50. They are they who received the testimony of Jesus, and believed on his name and were baptized after the manner of his burial, being buried in the water in his name, and this according to the commandment which he has given—
51. That by keeping the commandments they might be washed and cleansed from all their sins, and receive the Holy Spirit by the laying on of the hands of him who is ordained and sealed unto this power;
52. And who overcome by faith, and are sealed by the Holy Spirit of promise, which the Father sheds forth upon all those who are just and true.
53. They are they who are the church of the Firstborn.
54. They are they into whose hands the Father has given all things—
55. They are they who are priests and kings, who have received of his fulness, and of his glory;
56. And are priests of the Most High, after the order of Melchizedek, which was after the order of Enoch, which was after the order of the Only Begotten Son.
57. Wherefore, as it is written, they are gods, even the sons of cGod—
58. Wherefore, all things are theirs, whether life or death, or things present, or things to come, all are theirs and they are Christ's, and Christ is God's.
59. And they shall overcome all things.
60. Wherefore, let no man glory in man, but rather let him glory in God, who shall subdue all enemies under his feet.
61. These shall dwell in the presence of God and his Christ forever and ever.
62. These are they whom he shall bring with him, when he shall come in the clouds of heaven to reign on the earth over his people.
63. These are they who shall have part in the first resurrection.
64. These are they who shall come forth in the resurrection of the just.
65. These are they who are come unto Mount Zion, and unto the city of the living God, the heavenly place, the holiest of all.
66. These are they who have come to an innumerable company of angels, to the general assembly and church of Enoch, and of the Firstborn.
67. These are they whose names are written in heaven, where God and Christ are the judge of all.

68. These are they who are just men made perfect through Jesus the mediator of the new covenant, who wrought out this perfect atonement through the shedding of his own blood.
69. These are they whose bodies are celestial, whose glory is that of the sun, even the glory of God, the highest of all, whose glory the sun of the firmament is written of as being typical.
70. And again, we saw the terrestrial world, and behold and lo, these are they who are of the terrestrial, whose glory differs from that of the church of the Firstborn who have received the fulness of the Father, even as that of the moon differs from the sun in the firmament.
71. Behold, these are they who died without law;
72. And also they who are the spirits of men kept in prison, whom the Son visited, and preached the gospel unto them, that they might be judged according to men in the flesh;
73. Who received not the testimony of Jesus in the flesh, but afterwards received it.
74. These are they who are honorable men of the earth, who were blinded by the craftiness of men.
75. These are they who receive of his glory, but not of his fulness.
76. These are they who receive of the presence of the Son, but not of the fulness of the Father.
77. Wherefore, they are bodies terrestrial, and not bodies celestial, and differ in glory as the moon differs from the sun.
78. These are they who are not valiant in the testimony of Jesus; wherefore, they obtain not the crown over the kingdom of our God.
79. And now this is the end of the vision which we saw of the terrestrial, that the Lord commanded us to write while we were yet in the Spirit.
80. And again, we saw the glory of the telestial, which glory is that of the lesser, even as the glory of the stars differs from that of the glory of the moon in the firmament.
81. These are they who received not the gospel of Christ, neither the testimony of Jesus.
82. These are they who deny not the Holy Spirit.
83. These are they who are thrust down to hell.
84. These are they who shall not be redeemed from the devil until the blast resurrection, until the Lord, even Christ the Lamb, shall have finished his work.
85. These are they who receive not of his fulness in the eternal world, but of the Holy Spirit through the ministration of the terrestrial;
86. And the terrestrial through the ministration of the celestial.
87. And also the telestial receive it of the administering of angels who are appointed to minister for them, or who are appointed to be ministering spirits for them; for they shall be heirs of salvation.
88. And thus we saw, in the heavenly vision, the glory of the telestial, which surpasses all understanding;
89. And no man knows it except him to whom God has revealed it.
90. And thus we saw the glory of the terrestrial which excels in all things the glory of the telestial, even in glory, and in power, and in might, and in dominion.
91. And thus we saw the glory of the celestial, which excels in all things—where God, even the Father, reigns upon his throne forever and ever;
92. Before whose throne all things bow in humble reverence, and give him glory forever and ever.
93. They who dwell in his presence are the church of the Firstborn; and they see as they are seen, and know as they are known, having received of his fulness and of his grace;
94. And he makes them equal in power, and in might, and in dominion.
95. And the glory of the celestial is one, even as the glory of the sun is one.
96. And the glory of the terrestrial is one, even as the glory of the moon is one.

97. And the glory of the teſtial is one, even as the glory of the ſtars is one; for as one ſtar differs from another ſtar in glory, even ſo differs one from another in glory in the teſtial world;
98. For theſe are they who are of Paul, and of Apollos, and of Cephas.
99. Theſe are they who ſay they are ſome of one and ſome of another—ſome of Chriſt and ſome of John, and ſome of Moſes, and ſome of Elias, and ſome of Eſaias, and ſome of Iſaiah, and ſome of Enoch;
100. But received not the goſpel, neither the teſtimony of Jeſus, neither the prophets, neither the everlaſting covenant.
101. Laſt of all, theſe all are they who will not be gathered with the ſaints, to be caught up unto the church of the Firſtborn, and received into the cloud.
102. Theſe are they who are liars, and ſorcerers, and adulterers, and whoremongers, and whoſoever loves and makes a lie.
103. Theſe are they who ſuffer the wrath of God on earth.
104. Theſe are they who ſuffer the vengeance of eternal fire.
105. Theſe are they who are caſt down to hell and ſuffer the wrath of Almighty God, until the fulneſs of times, when Chriſt ſhall have ſubdued all enemies under his feet, and ſhall have perfected his work;
106. When he ſhall deliver up the kingdom, and preſent it unto the Father, ſpotleſs, ſaying: I have overcome and have trodden the wine-pret alone, even the wine-pret of the fierceneſs of the wrath of Almighty God.
107. Then ſhall he be crowned with the crown of his glory, to ſit on the throne of his power to reign forever and ever.
108. But behold, and lo, we ſaw the glory and the inhabitants of the teſtial world, that they were as innumerable as the ſtars in the firmament of heaven, or as the ſand upon the ſeaſhore;
109. And heard the voice of the Lord ſaying: Theſe all ſhall bow the knee, and every tongue ſhall confeſs to him who ſits upon the throne forever and ever;
110. For they ſhall be judged according to their works, and every man ſhall receive according to his own works, his own dominion, in the manſions which are prepared;
111. And they ſhall be ſervants of the Moſt High; but where God and Chriſt dwell they cannot come, worlds without end.
112. This is the end of the viſion which we ſaw, which we were commanded to write while we were yet in the Spirit.
113. But great and marvelous are the works of the Lord, and the mysteries of his kingdom which he ſhewed unto us, which ſurpaſs all underſtanding in glory, and in might, and in dominion;
114. Which he commanded us we ſhould not write while we were yet in the Spirit, and are not lawful for man to utter;
115. Neither is man capable to make them known, for they are only to be ſeen and underſtood by the power of the Holy Spirit, which God beſtows on thoſe who love him, and purify themſelves before him;
116. To whom he grants this privilege of ſeeing and knowing for themſelves;
117. That through the power and manifeſtation of the Spirit, while in the fleſh, they may be able to bear his preſence in the world of glory.
118. And to God and the Lamb be glory, and honor, and dominion forever and ever. Amen.

Sermon CCXII

OUR Lord Jesus Christ was a perfect man. This we must believe as confidently as we believe his divinity, else we shall have confused ideas of many portions of divine truth. And as he was a perfect man, and would be in all things a pattern of what his people should be, he must have a perfect religious character, and perform the Christian duties, as far as they would be applicable to his exalted nature. Hence, we often find him engaged in prayer.

Whatever difficulty there may be in the idea of a divine Redeemer's praying, the fact we are bound to believe. In his inferior character as Mediator, he acted by commission from the Father, and would take instructions from him, and put confidence in him. When the last scene was coming on, and he knew that soon he must hang upon the tree, he offered that memorable prayer, from which the text is selected. He prayed most tenderly for his people; and among the first blessings asked, he prayed for their sanctification, through the truth.

There cluster about this subject many interesting questions, to some of which I purpose to turn your attention.

1. What do the Scriptures mean by sanctification? Sometimes, it means being set apart to sacred use. Thus every seventh day is sanctified."God blessed the seventh day, and sanctified it." Thus the tabernacle and temple, the priests, and altars, and sacrifices, and all the sacred things of the Jewish dispensation, were sanctified.

God speaks of sanctifying his name, which he does when by his judgments he rebukes the gainsayers, and stills their blasphemies. He thus convinces men that he is holy.

I could name many other uses of the term sanctification; but its principal use, and that intended in the text, is, in application to the work of rendering an unholy creature holy. Men are by nature unholy. They exercise forbidden affections, and do not put forth the affections that God requires. The prayer of Christ in the text was, that his followers, through the instrumentality of truth, might be made what God requires them to be; having the affections of the heart, and, of course, the deeds of the life, conformable to the divine law.

2. Another question may here very properly be,—When does this holiness begin? And the answer is obvious: It begins at the moment of regeneration. Till then, all the exercises are unholy; for "the carnal mind is enmity against God." Nor is there any degree of alarm, or any amount of conviction, that can generate one holy affection in the heart, previously to this period. Of course all the prayers offered, and all the exertions made, prior to this change, are unregenerate prayers and exertions. Nor can it be believed, consistently with correct scripture views, that, anterior to this moment, there is any approximation toward correct feeling. No alarm, nor the most distinct conviction, can bring an unregenerate man to feel any more correctly toward God, or any holy object, than he did in a state of carelessness and security. And although we would not pretend to say that the divine influence in the hour of awakening may not restrain the sinner, and hold him back from the blasphemous thoughts and affections which he might otherwise put-forth, yet in all this there is no holiness.

And then it may be a question whether the sinner, under alarm, does not wax worse and worse, till the moment of passing from death unto life. If he has more light—if he sees more distinctly the objects of his implacable hatred, does he not obviously rise in his hatred, till it is changed into love? This point, however, it is not my object to press. We must concede that holiness begins when the heart is changed.

3. Is it always small in its beginning? Does that text in which the kingdom of God is compared to a grain of mustard seed, and that other where it is compared to leaven, teach us that grace in the heart is thus small at the first? Or do they illustrate the primitive smallness of the Christian church, and its ultimate growth and enlargement? They may be meant to apply in both cases; but aside from these texts, we are taught unequivocally in the Scriptures that the believer is, at the first, sanctified but in a small degree, and that he "grows in grace" till he arrives at the fulness of the stature of a perfect man in Christ Jesus. He is, at the first, a"babe, and has need of milk, and not of strong meat." Afterwards, he"forgets the things that are behind, and reaches forth to those things that are before, and presses toward the mark for the prize of the high calling of God in Christ Jesus." The light that has shined in upon him shines"brighter and brighter unto the perfect day." Hence, we gather, that though the work of regeneration is from its very nature instantaneous, the work of sanctification is progressive, and is, at the first, comparatively small.

4. But how will this comport with what believers have thought was their experience—that at the first they felt a glow of holy affection, which they termed their first love, which afterward they lost? And the Scriptures, they have supposed, favored the idea."Thus saith the Lord, I remember thee, the kindness of thy youth, the love of thine espousals, when thou wentest after me in the wilderness, in a land that was not sown." But was that love of espousals, thus accredited to Israel, all holy love? Or was it not, in great part at least, merely that natural joy which might arise from the comfort, and pride, and novelty of their emancipation? It surely soon vanished, and they murmured, and made them gods, under whose guidance they purposed to return to Egypt. And that whole congregation, you know, died in the wilderness. They were, evidently, as a body, destitute of holiness; hence their love of espousals must be explained as something else than delight in God.

But why may not the same be said often of that joy with which the heart of the new-born seems to overflow? Can we be allowed to believe it is all holy love to God? There can be, as yet, but little knowledge of God, or of truth. Hence that strong affection can hardly be allowed to flow wholly from objects so dimly seen. Is there not often far greater probability, that it is the mere effusion of animal affection? Or, at least, that it has far more of nature in it than of grace. There may not seem, afterward, the same hilarity; but is there not more knowledge of truth and duty, and more stability in the ways of God, more fixed principles of action, more humility, and more undeviating confidence in the Savior?

In which position would the believer most readily go to the stake, and lay down his life for his Master? when, during the first month of his regeneracy, he fills the air with his song? or, when a few years afterward, he has learned the corruption of his heart, and at times, perhaps, hardly dare hope that he is born of God? May not the joy abate, and there be, at the same time, an increase of that principle of holiness that develops a heavenly mind? Surely it is the believer of continued experience, and not the man renewed but yesterday, that is rooted and grounded in the truth, and who cannot be driven about with every wind of doctrine. Whether this question is decided right, however, I wish each one to judge for himself.

5. Another question arising out of this subject is—does the good man at all times advance in holiness? and are we so to understand that text,"The righteous shall hold on his way?" Here, perhaps, again, it is not easy to come at what we are sure is truth. I have believed that it is otherwise, and that, while there are times when the good man progresses rapidly, there are other times when he makes no progress, and others, again, when the progress of holiness, if I may so speak, is backward. Thus Israel, sometimes, bent their track directly to the promised land at other times did not move for many days, and at other times marched retrograde. So we have seen the plant spring up and grow as if life was in it, and then perhaps for weeks seem stationary, and then again withering under drought, and seemingly about toperish. Whether these analogies may teach us truth, or mislead us, still I have believed it thus with the child of God. And the only position contested, I believe is, whether the Christian is ever in the way to do himself essential injury. That broad promise,"All things shall work together for good to them that love God," has been used as implying the negative. That the promise is true, and that the full import of it will be accomplished, there cannot be a doubt. But what is its import? Does God merely promise, in this precious text, that all the events of his providence shall conspire to bring his people to a higher seat in heaven? Or does he promise all this, and more too, that their very backsliding shall conspire to the same result? Would he promise, that if they forsake him, and sin by going after their idols, this very sin shall tend to purify them! Would it be safe to trust a wandering believer with such a promise in his hand? Is it reasonable to believe that it will tend to the health and growth of the heavenly mind, to have it wounded, and polluted, and ensnared by transgression? Have we any assurance that Peter and David might not have reached a nobler Christian stature, if they had stood firm in the hour of temptation? I confess, I think there is no such assurance.

Do not facts warrant us to believe that Christian minds, of the same powers and opportunities, have made different degrees of advance in the ways of God? The one is seen to climb the steeps of Zion, with brisk and steady step, and far outgo the other, while to us there appears no reason why the other might not have led in the enterprise. The professor who comes at length to the grave in old age, and, as we hope, a believer, but who can look back upon whole years of relapse and of wandering, has he those marks of maturity, and that animating hope, and that strong and conquering faith, seen in the man who moved steadily on in the ways of God, till his Master called him? You are thinking, perhaps, while you read, of two old men, contemporaries who died, it may be, in the same year, members of the same communion, the one having hardly deviated from the path of life an hour, while the other has seemed to be alternately a Christian or a worldling, as the times were. Now which of them seemed manifestly to fall asleep in Jesus, while the other was saved perhaps, though as by fire? You have all answered me. Pass through our churches, and tell me where is the venerated man of God, who is to the world around him a walking conscience, and carries heaven on his brow, in whose life there have not been some dark seasons of marked, and guilty, and hurtful relapse? Let me say, I do not believe that the Christian does make uniform progress in holiness, but does sometimes become stationary, and sometimes retrograde in the heavenly road.

6. Are we then to believe, that while every Christian in heaven will be perfect, there will still be a difference in their Christian stature, and their amount of enjoyment proportioned to their industry in acquiring holiness in the present life? On this point there can be very little doubt. There will be a difference in heaven among redeemed spirits, as one star differeth from another star in glory. Doubtless God will have employment for them all in his kingdom. As in a building there is a variety of materials, places to fill requiring more and less strength, but all necessary; so in that mystic temple whose lopstone is to be laid in heaven with shouting, Grace ,grace, unto it, there may be required, to give it its greatest strength and beauty, souls of very different capacities.

7. It is then obvious that we are ourselves selecting the position we shall occupy in heaven, if any. On our industry will depend our growth; and on our growth our station in the kingdom of the Redeemer. And how can men be indifferent what is the position they shall hold among the redeemed in heaven! Increasing holiness bears its present fruits, gives its immediate as well as its future rewards. In what other enterprise, then, shall we be so ambitious to succeed as in this? If there is any one thing surprising above all others, it is that believers in Christ should be slow to put on his image. The Psalmist would never be satisfied till he awaked from death in the likeness of his Redeemer. There is surely no joy like that which is begotten by a holy temper: hence, how can one who has tasted this joy, find any other pleasures, which, for a single hour, can become its substitute?

Let me close by presenting a few motives to engaging with ardor in this heavenly enterprise.

1. I have hinted that we shall be happy in proportion as we are holy. We are mistaken in supposing that any particular circumstances are requisite to render us happy. There is but one thing requisite, likeness to Jesus Christ. And this is a happiness within the reach of us all, in proportion as we are willing to exercise his temper, and copy his example, and put on his image. Hence that rich and precious intimation, "Christ in you the hope of glory."

2. We shall be useful, other things being equal, in proportion as we are holy. No good man can be satisfied who feels himself to be living to no purpose. Find me the Christian who is never happy, and, sure as life, he is never useful. He is a cumberer of the ground, and can never reflect on the day that has gone by with pleasure. The man who is not aiming to bless his generation may dig after comforts, but he can never find them. He may read all the promises over, day by day, but there will not be found a word of consolation for him. He might derive more from some act of real Christian benevolence, than he does from a whole Bible full of consolations: and to be holy is the way to be useful. To follow Christ has an eloquence in it that no exhortation, nor argument, can hold out. "Be ye followers of me, as dear children."

3. There is dignity and character in being holy, that nothing else can produce. What man is great, like him who walks in the consciousness of exercising the same affections that Christ does? In what matter should not men feel indifferent, rather than be willing to be losers in this mighty concern? How can it seem a small thing, whether we put on, or not, the character that glows in the view of heaven? the character that he wears who receives the homage of all the redeemed, and is adored by cherubim and seraphim? How comparatively trifling a matter is it, that we are honorable in the estimation of those who judge according to the outward appearance. The apostle could say to his enemies, It is a small thing that I should be judged of you, or of man's judgment. How noble his character, while he thus regarded supremely the inward adornings of holiness? Would we then aim at character,—character that will stand the test when worlds are burned up,—let us press on after HOLINESS.

The Gift of God, Which is Eternal Life, Contrasted with the Wages of Sin, Which is Death, and Closed with a Number of Objections Against Universalism

“For the wages of sin is death; but the gift of God is eternal life, through Jesus Christ our Lord.”—Rom. vi., 23.

In the last two lectures upon this text we have spoken of sin and its wages. We have seen how exceedingly offensive it is to God, and destructive to the happiness of his creature man. That all the evil we suffer in this world is its consequence; and that all the suffering of the finally impenitent in the world to come is its just punishment; which punishment is “sorer” than any it is possible for us to endure in this life, death itself not excepted; for “it is a fearful thing to fall into the hands of the living God.”

But fearful and dreadful as will be the condition of all such as die in their sins, yet there is no necessity of a soul's perishing, for God has made an ample provision for our salvation.

“The trumpet of the gospel sounds
With an inviting voice.”

God is not willing that any should perish, but that all should come to repentance. His bowels of compassion yearn over us; his goodness is as an “unbounded sea, where all our thoughts are drowned;” and “vast as eternity his love.” He invites us to his embrace. Thousands have accepted the invitation, and found a hearty welcome; and still he is saying to the wandering sons and daughters of men, “come, for yet there is room.” Fallen as we are, polluted as we have made ourselves by our sins, there is yet hope; for this is a faithful saying and worthy of all acceptation, that Christ Jesus has come into the world to save the chief of sinners. We need not die for ever. The water of life is abundant. “Its streams the whole creation reach, so plenteous is the store”—and may be obtained “without money and without price.”

“Here we may wash our spotted souls

From crimes of deepest die."

Our text contains an epitome of the dreadful displeasure of Jehovah against sin. Its "wages is death." It also contains an announcement of the rich and ample provisions of the gospel, by which sin may be destroyed and its punishment prevented; and it is moreover a glorious exhibition of Divine benevolence to a world of sinners lost. "The gift of God is eternal life, through Jesus Christ our Lord."

In this lecture we shall confine our remarks to this latter division of the text, and inquire,

I. What we are to understand by eternal life.

II. By what proof we know that it is the gift of God.

III We shall inquire unto whom is it given.

I. Eternal life. This is the consummation of all the benefits derived from the life, death, resurrection, and intercessions of the Lord Jesus Christ, and is directly the opposite of the penalty of the Divine law, to which we have exposed ourselves by transgression. "For if by one man's offence death reigned by one, much more they which receive abundance of grace and of the gift of righteousness shall reign in life by one, Jesus Christ"—Rom. v., 17.

The antithesis which the Scriptures exhibit between the penalty of the law and this great and glorious gift of God through Jesus Christ is perfect, and will hold good throughout. The penalty of the law is death—the gift of God is life.

It may not be inappropriate to remark that death implies a separation (Eccl. xii., 7), and life a union. Natural life is the union of the soul and body, but natural death is their dissolution. Spiritual life is the union of the soul with God in time, and eternal life is the union of the soul with God in eternity. Spiritual death is the separation of the soul from the enjoyment of God in time, and eternal death is the separation of the soul from the enjoyment of God in eternity. To die a natural death while spiritually alive secures, as its consequence, eternal life; so also to die a natural death while "dead in trespasses and sins" secures, as its inevitable consequence, eternal death. Eternal death, therefore, is as naturally the result of an unholy heart and life as it is its punishment. And, vice versa, eternal life is as much the certain result of a holy heart and life as it is the gift of God.

To establish this position it is only necessary for us to examine a few antithetical passages of Scripture, where the contrast is drawn between the punishment of sin and the reward of holiness, and we shall at once perceive that they are diametrically opposed one to the other. The first passage which we shall examine is found in Prov. xiv., 32: "The wicked is driven away in his wickedness, but the righteous hath hope in his death." The following particulars are suggested as the doctrine of this text.

1. That the righteous at death have hope, because they are righteous.

2. The wicked at death have no hope, because they are wicked.

3. That the righteous, because they have hope in death, go willingly into the other world, and may even "desire to depart and be with Christ."

4. That the wicked, because they have no hope in death, go into eternity reluctantly. They are driven away. How true is this! And how many instances of sinners dying in all the horrors of despair might be cited to confirm this solemn truth!

“At that dread moment how the frantic soul
Raves round the walls of her clay tenement,
Runs to each avenue, and shrieks for help,
But shrieks in vain!
A little longer! ah! A little longer
Might she but stay to wash away her crimes,
And fit her for her passage! Moving sight!
Her very eyes weep blood, and every sigh
She heaves is big with horror! But the foe,
Like a stanch murderer, steady to his purpose,
Pursues her close through every lane of life,
Nor misses once the track, but presses on,
Till, forced at last to the tremendous verge,
At once she sinks!”

Again: Matt, vii., 13, 14: “Enter ye in at the strait gate: for wide is the gate and broad is the way that leadeth to destruction, and many there be which go in thereat; because strait is the gate and narrow is the way that leadeth unto life, and few there be that find it.” Here is a perfect antithetical text. The wide gate is put in opposition to the strait gate; the broad way to the narrow way; the end of the broad way to the end of the narrow way; and the many that enter the broad way and go down to destruction to the few that enter the narrow way and go up to life eternal.

You will take notice that as all the parts of this text are put in opposition one to the other, of course the destruction which is the end of the broad way must be contrasted with the life which is the end of the narrow way; which life is eternal: consequently, the destruction must be eternal death, “soul and body in hell.”—Matt. it., 28.

Once more: “He that believeth on the Son hath everlasting life, and he that believeth not the Son shall not see life, but the wrath of God abideth on him.”—John iii., 36. To understand this passage we will inquire,

1. What is promised to them that believe on the Son of God? The text says “everlasting life.”
2. What is threatened to them who believe not the Son? The text says, first, that they “shall not see (enjoy) life;” and, second, “but the wrath of God abideth on them.”
3. The threatening to the unbeliever is the perfect contrast to the promise made to the believer. Now God has promised that the believer shall never die. “Whosoever liveth and believeth on me shall never die.”—John xi., 26. Who does not understand this passage as containing the promise that the believer shall live for ever? By a parity of reasoning we conclude that when God says to the unbeliever “he shall not see life, but the wrath of God abideth on him,” he threatens him with eternal death. Therefore it follows, that as the believer will certainly obtain everlasting life, so the unbeliever will certainly be denied this great gift of God, and suffer the pains of eternal death.

We will now introduce a few texts from the book of Revelations. We are perfectly aware that Universalists will try hard to destroy the force of these passages by saying that the Apocalypse is a very figurative book, and of doubtful interpretation; that it has no reference to another world, but to the destruction of Jerusalem, the fate of Judaism, and the like. But this is a mere quibble by which to destroy the force of truth. That some parts of this book are figurative and highly prophetic, we admit; but the scope and design of it are very plain, and many of its parts are easy of interpretation. Universalists must acknowledge that the three first chapters, which contain the seven letters addressed to the churches of Asia, are not very dark and mysterious. Almost any person of common sense can understand their general meaning without much difficulty. The remaining chapters contain predictions which will not be completely fulfilled until time shall end, and the destinies of the family of Adam be determined by "the Judge of all the earth." To say, therefore, that we cannot understand any part of Revelations is as far from the truth as to say that we understand all parts of it.

One of the quotations which I now make is an extract from the letter addressed to the church at Smyrna. It reads thus: "He that overcometh shall not be hurt with the second death."—Rev. ii., 11. Now what death is this? Is it the death of the body? No, for that is the first death. "To be cast into the lake of fire and brimstone is the second death."—Rev. xxi., 8. "For blessed and holy is he that hath part in the first resurrection; on such the second death hath no power."—Rev. xx., 6. Hath no power for what? John says, "Hath no power to hurt them. For they shall not be shut out of heaven, nor be cast into the lake of fire and brimstone; but obtain eternal life." Such, therefore, as do not overcome sin are not holy, and have no part in the first resurrection, shall be hurt with the second death; that is, they shall die for ever.

We come now to the consideration of a part of the commission to preach the gospel which Jesus Christ gave to his apostles. "He that believeth and is baptized shall be saved; and he that believeth not shall be damned."—Mark xvi., 15, 16.

1. What does this salvation embrace? A deliverance from sin, and grace to help in time of need in this world; and in the world to come a deliverance from the consequences of sin and the enjoyment of eternal life. It begins here and ends in heaven. "The water that I shall give him shall be in him a well of water, springing up into everlasting life."—John iv., 14.

2. What is the damnation of them that believe not? It is to remain guilty and condemned in this world; "for he that believeth not is condemned already," John iii., 18, and in the world to come to continue under this condemnation, and suffer all the consequences of sin; which will be an exclusion from heaven; the wrath of God; the undying worm; the vengeance of eternal or unquenchable fire; and a share with the blasphemer, who, Christ hath said, "is in danger of eternal damnation."—Mark iii., 29.

Another: "He that soweth to the flesh shall of the flesh reap corruption; but he that soweth to the spirit shall of the spirit reap life everlasting."—Gal. vi., 8. Let us look at this text.

1. What is it to sow to the flesh? It is to live after the flesh, follow its sinful inclinations, or do its works. "Now the works of the flesh are these: adultery," &c.—Gal. v., 19-21.

2. What is it to sow to the spirit? It is to live after the spirit, following its holy emotions, and having its fruits. "Now the fruit of the spirit is love, joy," &c.—Gal. v., 22, 23.

3. To live after the spirit or sow to it is life everlasting. To live after the flesh or sow to it is its opposite, which is everlasting death. So St. Paul teaches here and elsewhere, for he says, "If ye live after the flesh ye shall die: but if ye through the spirit do mortify the deeds of the body ye shall live."—Rom. viii., 13.

The plain and obvious meaning of this text is, that those who live after the flesh are separated from God. It excludes them from the enjoyment of the Divine favour here and also in the world to come; while those who live after the spirit take up their cross daily, deny themselves, and thus mortify the deeds of the body, shall enjoy the favour of God in this world and in the world to come. The one is everlasting death, the other is everlasting life.

We might multiply passages of Scripture of the same import with those already quoted, if we deemed it necessary, but we think it is not; we shall therefore close this part of our lecture by looking at the antithesis in the context, and also in our text.

In the context, St. Paul says to his converted brethren, "When ye were the servants of sin ye were free from righteousness; what fruit had ye then in those things whereof ye are now ashamed, for the end of those things is death? But now, being made free from sin, and become servants of God, ye have your fruit unto holiness, and the end everlasting life. For the wages of sin is death." Every unprejudiced mind must perceive that the apostle contrasts their character and condition with what they were previous to their conversion to God.

1. Previous to their conversion they were free from righteousness, but now free from sin.

2. They were once the servants of sin, but now they are the servants of righteousness.

3. They then had their fruit unto uncleanness, but now unto holiness.

4. The end of their sinful practices, and the end of their holy walk, are here contrasted as perfect opposites; and as the one is everlasting life, so the other must be everlasting death. This conclusion is irresistible to all but such as are biased with the dogma of Universalism, and are determined not to be convinced of their errors.

We come now to consider our text. "For the wages of sin is death; but the gift of God is eternal life, through Jesus Christ our Lord." "Here," says Mr. Sawyer, "it will be perceived, are three pairs of antithetic terms: 1. Wages is contrasted with gift. 2. Sin is contrasted with God. 3. Death is contrasted with eternal life." All this we freely grant. For, 1. Sin is opposed to God, to his law, will, government, holiness, and purity. 2. The wages of sin is just the opposite of the gift of God; for the sinner justly deserves all the punishment he receives for his sins. It is his "wages." But the righteous obtain the blessings of grace here and the rewards of glory hereafter, as the "gift of God." They say it is "not of works of righteousness which we have done, but according to his mercy hath he saved us, by the washing of regeneration and the renewing of the Holy Ghost."

3. The death mentioned in the text as the "wages of sin" is the opposite of "the gift of God," which is "eternal life." We have remarked that death is a separation from God, and life is a union with God. Eternal life, therefore, is an eternal union with God in glory, and its opposite must be an eternal separation from God, which is endless death; and is precisely what St. Paul declares shall be the doom of the wicked at the great day. "They shall be punished with everlasting destruction from the presence of the Lord and the glory of his power."

With one more remark we shall dismiss this proposition. That is, as eternal death is the separation from God and the glory of his power, and a punishment of everlasting destruction, it must be a deprivation of all the positive good which we are capacitated to enjoy and the infliction of all the positive evil which we are capable of enduring. And so, also, eternal life must be the exemption of all evil, both moral and natural, and the enjoyment of all possible good, according to the capacities with which God has endowed us by nature and grace. . . .

II. Eternal life is the gift of God. It is not of ourselves, for it is obtained "through Jesus Christ our Lord."

1. He is its great fountain. "This the record that God has given to us eternal life, and this life is in his Son."—1 John v., 11. He purchased it for us when he was "delivered for our offences, and rose again for our justification." For "when we were yet without strength, in due time Christ died for the ungodly. He was made sin (a sin-offering) for us, that we might be made the righteousness of God in him." And hence "grace reigns, through righteousness, unto eternal life, through Jesus Christ our Lord."—Rom. v., 21.

2. Jesus Christ prepares the soul for the enjoyment of eternal life. This he does by the efficacy of his own blood, which "cleanseth from all sin," and the operations of his holy spirit, which "convinceth of sin," leads to repentance, sanctifies and renews our fallen natures, and "makes us meet to be partakers of the inheritance of the saints in light."—Col. i., 12-14. Hence "he is the author of eternal salvation to all that obey him."

3. The soul that is prepared for, Jesus Christ crowns with, eternal life. It is his prerogative to give it to his people. Christ said to Peter, "there is no man that hath left houses, &c;., for my sake and the gospel's, but he shall receive a hundred fold now in this time—and in the world to come eternal life."—Mark x., 28, 30. To his flock he said, "I will give unto you eternal life."

4. His people receive eternal life as "the gift of God." Hence it is not the reward of works. We are rewarded "according to our works," but not for our works. All who are made holy are constituted worthy of eternal life, through the merits of Jesus Christ, who "saves his people from" (not in) "their sins;" and hath said, "Ye shall walk with me in white, for ye are worthy."

But you may ask, as the Scriptures teach us that we shall be rewarded according to our works, what is eternal life but this reward? We answer, that there are degrees of glory among the saints in heaven, "as one star differeth from another star in glory." Eternal life entitles us to an admittance into heaven, and is heaven itself. But the reward of our works will be an increase of our happiness in heaven. "He that giveth a cup of cold water to a disciple" (which, in the days of persecution, was not a small favour) "shall not lose his reward." For feeding the poor, Christ says, "thou shall be recompensed at the resurrection of the just." Many of the martyrs "were tortured, not accepting deliverance, that they might obtain a better resurrection."—Heb. xi., 35. "They that turn many to righteousness shall shine as the stars for ever and ever."—Dan. xii., 3.

What an encouragement is this view of the subject to all such as spend their days in the service of God! Such shall obtain eternal life, and, besides, receive a reward according to all their labours and sufferings for Christ's sake; while those who are just saved will have no stars in their crown, no sheaves to bring with joy to the heavenly garner, and but little or no reward in another world. It is true that all who enter heaven will be happy, and enjoy all that their capacity will permit; but how limited must their capacity be who are just saved, in comparison with the capacity of those who have grown old in the service of God, and graduated through every variety of Christian experience, from that of babes in Christ to fathers and mothers in Israel; and through the course of their lives have been instrumental in the conversion and salvation of hundreds of immortal souls, and exerted an influence which remains after they are dead and in heaven, and which may be the means of bringing thousands more to glory!

All who die in infancy will obtain the gift of eternal life through the merits of Jesus Christ. Such not being moral agents, are saved unconditionally.

We come now, in the last place, to inquire,

III. Unto whom will eternal life be given? To this very important inquiry we reply, that it will not be given to all the human family indiscriminately.

1. It is not promised to all men, either directly or indirectly. We challenge the whole world to produce a single passage of Holy Writ which contains the promise or assurance that God will give to each member of the family of Adam eternal life. It is true that Universalists appeal to the Bible, and quote many passages from it which, with some, pass for a confirmation of the truth of their doctrine; but they misapply and pervert the word of God. We will examine some of their favourite texts, and then we shall be able to judge for ourselves.

The first passage which we will examine you may find in Isaiah xlv., 23: "Unto me every knee shall bow, every tongue shall swear." If this text refers to the gospel, and is fulfilled in this world, it is only a declaration of what God will have men do in order to be saved. It does not say that they shall infallibly bow the knee and confess to God; but they shall do this if they are saved. You will perceive that this construction of the text is not unreasonable if you will read the 24th verse: "Surely shall one say, In the Lord have I righteousness and strength; even to him shall men come; and all that are incensed against him shall be ashamed." Now if the text means that all men do bow the knee and confess to God in this world, then it is' not true; for there are multitudes who never bow the knee, and never confess to God.

If the text is not fulfilled in this world, as, perhaps, Universalists may say, then we ask, to what period are we to look for its fulfilment? This question we are prepared to answer from unerring inspiration. St. Paul quotes it, and applies it to the judgment. "We shall all stand before the judgment seat of Christ; for it is written, As I live, saith the Lord, every knee shall bow to me, and every tongue shall confess to God. So, then, every one of us shall give account of himself to God."—Rom. xiv., 10-12. You will remark that the apostle, by fixing the fulfilment of this prophecy at the judgment! Makes it prove just the reverse of what the Universalists teach. For they deny the doctrine of a future judgment altogether; and this they must do, or renounce their theory. But St. Paul turns the force of this text against them, and declares that "every one of us shall give account of himself to God." Then "every knee will bow" to the judge, but it will be too late for the sinner to obtain mercy. "Every tongue will also confess to God," but it will be too late to obtain forgiveness of sins; Jesus Christ will then be the "Judge of the quick and dead," but not the "mediator between God and men," as he is now.

The next which comes under our notice you may read in Isaiah, xxv., 6-8: "And in this mountain shall the Lord of hosts make unto all people a feast—and he will destroy in this mountain the face of the covering cast over all people, and the veil that is spread over all nations. He will swallow up death in victory, and the Lord God will wipe away tears from off all faces."

Now if this passage can be of any possible service to Universalists, it must refer to the Gospel; otherwise it belongs entirely to this world, and has nothing to do with the world to come. We are willing to allow that it is a prediction concerning the church of Christ, and the provisions and blessings received and enjoyed within her pale. To understand this text, we will take it up part by part.

1. What does this feast represent! It represents the rich and ample provisions of the gospel of Christ, which are made for all people, and which our Lord himself calls a feast.—Matt. xxii., 2-13; Luke xiv., 16-24.

2. The place where this feast is provided. "In this mountain." The church of God, which St. Paul calls "Mount Zion."—Heb. xii., 22.

3. The blessings there to be enjoyed. These are,

1. The forgiveness of sins. He will destroy in this mountain the face of the covering cast over all people. An allusion to the custom of ancient nations covering the faces of criminals condemned to die; when pardoned their faces were uncovered.

Jesus Christ has saved all the human family from the guilt of the first sin. "The free gift has come upon all men unto justification of life."—Rom. v., 18. And he also pardons every actual transgressor who "with the mouth makes confession unto salvation, and with the heart believeth unto righteousness."

2. Light is another blessing to be enjoyed in this mountain. "He will destroy the veil" of ignorance "that is cast over all nations." By the light of the Gospel moral darkness will be destroyed, and this glorious light shall shine more and more, until the knowledge of the Lord shall, "like a sea of glory," cover the whole earth, and this veil of darkness be entirely destroyed.

3. Victory over death is achieved and obtained in this mountain. "He shall swallow up death in victory." Jesus died, and entered into the dominions of death, that he might conquer this last enemy of man, and become the first fruit of them that slept. Victory over death is one of the richest blessings he imparts to his children: 1. He saves them from tormenting fears of death by washing away their sin, and thus extracting its sting.—1 Cor. xv., 56, 57. 2. He will give them victory over death itself at the resurrection. "So when this corruptible shall have put on incorruption, and this mortal shall have put on immortality, then shall be brought to pass the saying that is written, Death is swallowed up in victory."—Verse 54.

4. In this mountain a deliverance from sorrow is also obtained. "And the Lord God will wipe away tears from off all faces." 1. He will wipe away the tears of guilty distress by pardon; and, 2. The tears of suffering mortality by taking all such to Heaven, where "they shall hunger no more, neither shall they thirst any more; for the Lamb shall lead them to fountains of living water, and God shall wipe away all tears from their eyes."

All these blessings, therefore: pardon, divine light, victory over death, and a deliverance from all sorrow, are enjoyed in "God's holy mountain," and not extended to all the world; nor will they be thus extended until "it shall come to pass that the mountain of the Lord's house shall be established in the top of the mountains, and shall be exalted above the hills; and all nations shall flow unto it."—Isaiah ii., 2.

We will now look into the New Testament, and examine John iii., 17. "God sent not his Son into the world to condemn the world, but that the world through him might be saved." The word might qualifies the sense of this passage, and implies the possibility, but not the certainty of the salvation of all men.

Again: 1 Tim. iv., 10, "Who is the Saviour of all men, especially of them that believe." This text speaks of a general and special salvation. Two inquiries will bring it fairly before us. 1. From what does Jesus Christ save all men? 2. From what does he save them that believe?

1. Jesus Christ has saved all men from nonexistence. As all men sinned seminally, and not actually, in Adam, so all men, if Christ had not interposed to save them, would have been punished seminally as they sinned; that is, Adam and Eve would have been cut off in their sins, and, of course, their posterity would never have existed. "We are bought with a price," and owe our existence to the interposition of the Lord Jesus Christ.

2. Jesus Christ saves all men from the guilt and punishment of original sin. None are now condemned, none are punished, for Adam's sin. Romans v.

3. He saves all men from total deprivation of Divine influence. Through Jesus Christ the Holy Spirit has been given to the world, "to convince it of sin, of righteousness, and of judgment. He is the true light, which enlighteneth every man that cometh into the world."

4. Christ saves all men from total despair. He has placed man once more on the eligible ground of probation, and made us "prisoners of hope." None need despair of salvation who will improve his gracious day of visitation. Here the general salvation ends. But Christ saves them that believe "especially." 1. From the love of sin; 2. The guilt of sin; 3. Power of sin; 4. Pollution of sin, and, 5. From the consequences of sin; part in this life, and perfectly in the life to come. If this text had said that Jesus Christ is the Saviour of all men "especially," and there ended, then it might be of some importance to the Universalist's cause; .but this important word especially happens to belong to the last member of the text—"them that believe."

Once more: In Rom. xi., 26, it is said, "So all Israel shall be saved." Admitting, for argument's sake, that "all Israel" means all the descendants of the patriarchs, it does not prove enough for Universalists. For what will become of the poor Gentiles? Nowhere does the Bible say that all the Gentiles shall be saved; but neither does the apostle mean that all the descendants of the patriarchs shall be saved. This will appear by reading the whole chapter, which treats of the calling of the Gentiles nationally to a participation of the blessings of the Gospel, and the rejection of the Jews nationally, because they rejected Christ. In consequence of which they were judicially blinded as a nation, though there were individual exceptions; "for blindness in part hath happened unto Israel, and a remnant shall be saved." The apostle furthermore informs us that this blindness and obduracy would continue upon them as a people until the "fulness of the Gentiles would come in:" then they will receive the Gospel as a nation, and "so all Israel shall" then "be saved." Any one not prejudiced must see at once that Paul does not mean "all Israel" that have ever lived, but those who are alive when the Gentile world is converted, and the Gospel has its universal dissemination.

Another passage: 1 Tim. ii., 4, "Who will have all men to be saved, and to come unto the knowledge of the truth." Our opponents say that this text is a positive affirmation that God will save all men, and if any are finally lost, then his word must fail. I would ask, does not God assert with equal positiveness that he will have all men come unto the knowledge of the truth? And do all men come unto the knowledge of the truth? You say that to come unto the knowledge of the truth all must believe in Universalism. But do all men believe in Universalism? No, certainly not; for the author of these lectures does not. Here is one exception. Many to whom he has delivered them are not Universalists. Hundreds and thousands of others do not believe the doctrine. Besides, many thousands more live and die total unbelievers in Divine revelation; and millions of the family of Adam never heard the Gospel at all, while hundreds of millions more are to this day totally ignorant of its contents. Now have, or do, all these come unto the knowledge of the truth? Certainly not. Has God lied? This blasphemous conclusion must follow if the Universalist's construction of this text be admitted. What, then, can be its true meaning? We answer, that it is God's will "that all should be saved;" and hence the apostle in the context exhorts "that prayer be made for all men." But can we resist the will of God? We can in those things which belong to our salvation. St. Stephen said to the Jews, "ye do always resist the Holy Ghost; as your fathers did, so do ye." To the same people Christ said, "how oft would I have gathered you—but ye would not. Ye will not come unto me that ye might have life." God's will is to save us upon the terms of the Gospel; but we are moral agents, and can resist his will, and "choose death in the error of our ways."

We will introduce one more passage of Scripture before we close this lecture. It is a text which Universalists sometimes try hard to press into their service, though very useless to them when rightly understood. The passage is in Rev. v., 23, and reads thus: "And every creature which is in heaven, and on the earth, and under the earth, and such as are in the sea, and all that are in them, heard I saying, Blessing, honour, glory, and power be unto him that sitteth upon the throne, and unto the Lamb for ever and ever." But a cursory view of the chapter from which this text is taken is sufficient to satisfy any one that it is not a description of the final state of mankind or the happiness of heaven; and hence can be of no possible service to the Universalists. For if any part of this chapter refers to the happiness of heaven, it must be that which is included in verses 9 and 10, containing the song of those who are redeemed and saved out of every kindred, and nation, and tongue. To this song the angels are represented as responding; see verse II, 12; and in this response of the angels, creation personified, both animate and inanimate, is represented as uniting, verse 13. Now surely all these creatures are not in heaven; for in that case the men upon earth, the beasts of the field, reptiles of every description, the fish of the sea, the hidden treasures of the sand, fowl of every wing, and insects of every kind would be there. "For all on the earth, and under the earth, and such as are in the sea, and all that are in them," would embrace all the animal tribes to which I have referred, and more than these. That all which are in heaven and upon earth, &c., as the creatures of an almighty Being, who has created, provides for, and superintends them by his wise and holy providence, praise him, there can be no doubt. "For all his works praise him—the heavens declare his glory, and the firmament showeth forth his handy-work." The towering "cedar of Lebanon, the hyssop that springeth out of the wall," and the animal tribes, from the most noble down to the insignificant insect, all unite in praise to the great Creator, saying, "the hand that made us is Divine." But this is neither the happiness of heaven nor the song of the redeemed. I shall now conclude what I have to say with the words of Mr. Wesley in his notes upon this text. He says, "Every creature in the whole universe, good or bad, in the heaven, on the earth, under the earth, on the sea—with these four regions of the world agrees the fourfold word of praise. What is in heaven says blessing; what is on earth, honour; what is under the earth, glory; and what is on the sea, strength is unto him. This praise from all creatures begins before the opening of the first seal; but it continues from that time to eternity, according to the capacity of each. His enemies must acknowledge his glory; but those in heaven say, Blessed be God and the Lamb."

We believe that we have examined the most prominent texts of Scripture which are employed by our opponents to prove their doctrine, and we are obliged to conclude that not one of them, when properly explained, contains the least semblance of a promise that all men will indiscriminately go to heaven. We shall now consider,

2. That God has instructed us that certain classes of mankind are positively denied an admittance into heaven, or the gift of eternal life.

1. The classes of mankind that shall not inherit the kingdom of God. Gal. v., 19-21: The works of the flesh are enumerated under sixteen different heads; and, it is added, "that they that do such things shall not inherit the kingdom of God."

Again: 1 Cor. vi., 9, 10: The following are excluded from heaven. "The unrighteous, fornicators, idolaters, adulterers, effeminate, the abusers of themselves with mankind, thieves, covetous, drunkards, revilers, extortioners." Of all these the apostle says, "they shall not inherit the kingdom of God." Universalists say that they shall. Inspiration says they shall not. Which must we believe? Which is true? "Let God be true." Though we have proved our position beyond the power of successful contradiction, we will remark upon a few more texts, which will at least show how very explicit the Scriptures are upon this subject. I refer the reader to John viii., 21-23: "I go my way, and ye shall seek me, and ye shall die in your sins; whither I go ye cannot come—ye are from beneath, I am from above; ye are of this world, I am not of this world. I said therefore unto you, that ye shall die in your sins: for if ye believe not that I am he, ye shall die in your sins." These words were addressed to the unbelieving Jews, and teach us,

1. That Christ was going to heaven, where he assured his disciples they should be received.

2. That unbelievers could not be received in heaven, because they could not be saved from their sins and qualified for its enjoyment.

3. That those Jews to whom Christ addressed himself were unbelievers, because they rejected him as the Messiah; and, therefore, as they could not be saved from their sins, he said to them, "ye shall die in your sins," and "whither I go ye cannot come." This perfectly accords with what Christ taught upon other occasions, and what he commands his ministers to teach to the end of the world. "He that believeth not the Son shall not see life, but the wrath of God abideth on him. He that believeth not shall be damned." Now if our opponents can find any way for the unbeliever to gain an admittance into heaven, it must be in direct opposition to the doctrines of Christ, and therefore by another gospel. For the Gospel of Christ for ever excludes all such from the inheritance of eternal life. We now inquire,

3. Unto whom has God promised the gift of eternal life? We answer, to all who repent, believe, and obey the Gospel. Christ has made a full atonement for our sins, and extended its saving benefits to mankind upon certain conditions. None who have arrived at years of accountability are saved irresistibly or unconditionally, as the Bible abundantly shows in all the examples of conversion therein recorded. I know that the conversion of Saul of Tarsus is sometimes cited. But his conversion to God was far from being unconditional or irresistible; and if you will carefully read Acts be. and xxvii., which contain his own account of it, you will perceive that he was irresistibly awakened, as all sinners are; that he was not then "disobedient to the heavenly vision," as too many are; but that he began at once to pray for mercy, as every poor sinner must do, if he ever receives the pardon of his sins; and that he continued in prayer for three days, at which time God said to Ananias, "behold, he prayeth." And when he came to Saul by the direction of the Lord, he said, "arise, and be baptized, and wash away thy sins." Now if Saul had been truly converted to God at the time when he was struck down to the earth by a supernatural light from heaven, his sins must have been taken away at that moment, and he made happy in the Lord. But this was not the fact; his sins were washed away when he was baptized by the hands of the servant of the Lord. Then, when the guilt was removed from his burdened conscience, the scales fell from his eyes, and he was made to rejoice in the God of his salvation.

That our salvation is conditional, the explicit language of the Scriptures clearly teaches. A few texts will be sufficient to establish this point. Acts iii., 19: "Repent ye, therefore, and be converted, that your sins may be blotted out." On the day of Pentecost, when many were pricked to their hearts and cried, "men and brethren, what must we do?" Peter said, "Repent, and be baptized, every one of you, in the name of Jesus Christ, for the remission of sins, and ye shall receive the gift of the Holy Ghost."—Acts ii., 38. John iii., 16: "God so loved the world that he gave his only begotten Son, that whosoever believeth in him should not perish, but have everlasting life." Acts x., 43: "To him give all the prophets witness, that through his name whosoever believeth in him shall receive the remission of sins." Hence when the jailer inquired, "what must I do to be saved?" Paul said, "believe on the Lord Jesus Christ, and thou shall be saved."—Acts xvi., 31. Passages of the above class might be cited to almost any extent; but these are sufficient to prove that salvation is conditional, and must be entirely satisfactory to all such as will accept of Scripture testimony by which to decide the question.

We will conclude what we have to say upon this chapter by remarking, that a compliance with the conditions, or terms, of the Gospel, changes the state of the sinner in law before God as his Judge, and his character before him as his Father. He is no longer an unrighteous person; but he is justified, sanctified, and saved through faith in the precious blood of Jesus Christ, and becomes "a fellow-citizen of the saints and the household of God. He has not received the spirit of bondage again to fear, but the spirit of adoption, whereby he cries Abba, Father. For the Spirit itself beareth witness with his spirit, that he is a child of God. And if a child, then an heir of God, and a joint heir with Jesus Christ to an inheritance incorruptible, undefiled, that fadeth not away, reserved in heaven for those who are kept by the power of God, through faith, unto salvation."

If this be a correct view of this subject, what will be the end of them that obey not the Gospel of God? If eternal life will be given to none but the people of God, or Christ's sheep, "who hear his voice and follow him, taking up their cross daily, and denying themselves of all ungodliness and worldly lusts, living soberly, righteously, and godly in this present evil world;" and "by patient continuance in well-doing seek for glory, honour, immortality"—I say, if eternal life will only be given to such, what will become of sinners, "the fearful, the unbelieving, and the abominable" of the earth? "Tribulation and anguish must be their portion when they shall see Abraham, Isaac, and Jacob, with all the holy prophets, in the kingdom of God, and they themselves be thrust out into outer darkness, where there shall be weeping and gnashing of teeth."

We shall now conclude this lecture by briefly stating some of our leading objections to Universalism.

1. It destroys man's moral agency, and, by consequence, makes the holy, just, and good God the author of all the sin and misery in the world. This we have proved in the first lecture.
2. It sets aside the atonement of Jesus Christ altogether, and makes man suffer the full punishment of his crimes in this world. Hence, if men enter the kingdom of heaven, it must be without Christ or his salvation, and the song of the redeemed be rendered null and void for ever. This we have proved in the second lecture.
3. It represents the Almighty as a cruel and tyrannical being; inflicting punishment upon the innocent for the sins of the guilty; and unjust in punishing the innocent, and letting the guilty pass unpunished. This we have also proved in the second lecture.
4. It makes no just distinction between the righteous and the wicked. It ranks the children of God and the children of the wicked one in the same class, and makes them fellow-heirs of the same promises and of the same heaven. Its prayer is, "gather thou my soul with sinners, and my life with bloody men."
5. Universalism does no good. It brings no sinners to repentance. It never "reasons with them upon temperance, righteousness, and judgment to come." It never causes sinners to tremble on account of their sins and exposure to God's wrath. It never prompts men to exclaim, "what must we do to be saved?" It does not make men "contrite in spirit," and lead them to mourn on account of sin. It produces no revivals of religion. In short, it never was the means of saving one sinner from his sins. Therefore it is not of God. If it were, he would own and bless it. But he does not, he never did, and never will own it as his truth. He never will bless it in the conversion and salvation of sinners. It is from beneath, not from above.

6. It does immense evil. It grieves the righteous and strengthens the hands of the wicked. "With lies ye have made the heart of the righteous sad, whom I have not made sad, and strengthened the hands of the wicked, that he should not return from his wicked way, by promising him life."— Ezek. xiii., 22, 23. It cries peace, peace, when God has not spoken peace. It builds up the sinner in his sins, and often makes him" at least "twofold more the child of hell than he was before." As long as sinners cleave to Universalism, so long will they cleave to their sins. The important doctrines of repentance, faith, and holiness preached to them will be labour lost as long as they remain established Universalists. As Dr. Fisk remarks,

"The plain language of this doctrine is, you ought not to be wicked, it is true; but if you are, God will love you just as well. Nay, it is impossible for you, however rebellious you may be, to forfeit his love. Heaven shall be yours; fear not. In the midst of all your blasphemies, and all your uncleanness, and all your excesses; yea, in your extortions, your robberies, your murders, rejoice and be exceeding glad, for heaven, with all its weight of glory, is yours.

" Now is there nothing in all this to encourage the sinner in his course 1 In other words, is there anything in this system to counteract the temptations of Satan, the blandishments of the world, and the rage of sinful passions? We might instance several towns where, in the opinion of the judicious, immoralities have increased by the introduction and preaching of these sentiments. We might inquire, where has there been a revival of the work of grace by the preaching of this doctrine? Where has there been a reformation of morals by the preaching of Universalism? We acknowledge that there are moral men and religious men who profess to believe this doctrine. But has Universalism made them so? We believe not. But rather that where none can be produced whom it has made better, many may be found whom it has made worse."

7. Universalism is unscriptural. This is a weighty objection, and deserves to be very seriously considered; because none other can stand if this does not. Let this doctrine be fairly proved by the word of God, and all should embrace it. The Bible must be our text-book, and by it we must try our faith and practice. When it says we are wrong we cannot be right, and when it pronounces us right we cannot be wrong. In these lectures the sacred book has been our only guide; to this test we have brought Universalism, and by it we decide that it is anti-scriptural. It appears plausible only as it is successful in perverting this only and all-sufficient rule of faith and practice. The repeating of a few texts, first, as they are in the Bible, and, secondly, as they should stand in the creed of the Universalist, will be sufficient to convince the reader that this conclusion is not without a good and substantial reason.

We might easily increase the number of texts by which to show the reader how Universalism perverts the Scriptures, but those already quoted will suffice. They are before you, and we solemnly believe the construction just. The left-hand column is the Bible contradicting Universalism; the right hand column is Universalism contradicting the Bible. If this be so, can any be so unwise as to risk his eternal all upon a system which stands upon such a sandy foundation, and can only be sustained by palpable perversions of the word of God? I cannot be a Universalist so long as I believe the Bible; and I would not preach it if I believed it, unless I could first be convinced of the infallibility of my own judgment. There is one thing, however, for which I commend the Universalists; that is, they are not animated by a very active spirit of missionary zeal.

They content themselves with home. They do not send out their missionaries to Africa and other unhealthy climes, where they will be exposed to sufferings and death. For this I commend them. For the poor heathen are as well off without them as they would be with them in this world; and for the world to come, it can be a matter of no importance if Universalism be true.

8. The apostles and primitive ministers of the Gospel cannot have believed in Universalism. Of this fact we are convinced not only by the doctrines they preached, from which we have placed copious extracts before the reader, but by their conduct, the manner of their reception by the people, and the effects which their preaching wrought upon those who heard it attentively. Can any one believe that the apostles would have submitted to nakedness, cold, hunger, thirst, disgrace, poverty, bonds, imprisonments and martyrdom, for preaching the gospel of Universalism? Can any one believe that the people would have inflicted these punishments or sufferings upon them for publishing the glad tidings that all should surely be admitted into the kingdom of Heaven? And can any one believe that under the preaching of these glad tidings some should "tremble," others, "pricked to the heart, cry out, ' men and brethren, what must we do?' "and others fall prostrate at their feet and say, "Sirs, what must we do to be saved?" The most devoted men of God received the apostles with open arms, and gave every demonstration that was possible of their love and attachment to them. But the wicked hated them, and did all they could to injure M2 them, and prevent their spreading the doctrines of the Gospel. And do the most devoted Christians receive and encourage Universalism? Do wicked men hate the doctrine, and do all that they can to prevent its dissemination? Let the world look on and judge. Again: Let the reader compare the effects which follow the preaching of Universalism with those which follow the preaching of such as believe in the future and endless punishment of the wicked, and determine for himself which most resembles the effects produced under the preaching of the apostles. Do any tremble, weep, cry to God for mercy, and rejoice in the pardoning love of God, under the preaching of Universalism? We believe none. Did they under the preaching of the apostles? We answer that they did. Do we see at the present day any such effects under the ministry of those who believe in the endless punishment of the finally impenitent? We do. As certainly, therefore, as an effect must follow a cause, Universalism is not the doctrine which the apostles preached and believed. 9. It encourages men to sin. And if it is true, the more sin the better, because thereby our admittance into heaven will be hastened. Universalists must admit that the wicked antediluvians were admitted into heaven long before righteous Noah and his family; the filthy Sodomites long before righteous Lot; the wicked Canaanites before many of the people of God; Judas Iscariot before his Lord; and lying Ananias and Sapphira before the Apostle Peter, at whose feet they fell dead. For if Noah, Lot, and all those others had been wicked, they would have gone to heaven with them who were cut off, and taken thither by the visitation of God; but they were righteous, and therefore had to continue many years longer in this world of sin and suffering. Their wicked neighbours, because of their wickedness, rested in heaven; while they, because they were righteous, continued to suffer here. What an encouragement to sin! Only sin to such an extent as to provoke the Almighty to cut you off by death, and then he will take you immediately to heaven; or, if this course does not suit you, you have still a shorter way of getting there; you can take your choice, the rope, the razor, the pistol, the river, or the poisonous drug. By either of these you can end all your sufferings, and be in heaven in a few moments, whenever you may choose. And if this were true, how could it be wrong to do so? Would God condemn you, if he received you into heaven? None are condemned there, whatever may have been the means by which they obtained an entrance.

If our opponents deny these conclusions, then they deny their own doctrine, and, of course, give up Universalism.

10. Universalism is opposed to experimental religion. It derides the tears of the penitent sinner and the experience of the genuine believer. It makes religion to exist altogether in the head, and not at all in the heart. Believe in Universalism— this is the Alpha and Omega of their religion. As a people, they know nothing of experimental godliness. Their expectations of heaven are not founded on a preparation for its enjoyment by being made holy here, but upon the mere belief that all men will be admitted there. Those of them who are said to die in the triumphs of faith are those who brave it out to the last, and die in the faith of Universalism. To one of these, a pious friend of the writer said, "Sir, have you any hope of heaven if Universalism be not true?" To which he frankly replied, "I have not." This was all the religion the poor man had. But he died in the triumphs of faith. So said his friends.

Christians may commit and believe errors, I acknowledge, but they are not fundamental errors. In the essentials of religion all Christians agree. But Universalists do not generally, if at all, believe in the essentials of religion. I ask, then, can they possess it? To persuade a Universalist to repent of his sins, and become a decided and devoted Christian, you must first shake his faith in his doctrine. Until this is done, your labour is vain. Hence most, if not all, embrace Universalism as a substitute for the religion of the Bible.

11. Universalism is opposed by genuine Christians and opposed to them. If Universalism were true Christianity, it would be held in fellowship by real Christians. But it is not. It is considered by them to be a dangerous doctrine, and deleterious to the morals and happiness of mankind. If they who believe it are true Christians, why are they so ready to publish, and even magnify, the faults of professing Christians? Why do they turn their hands against the righteous, and with an air of triumph exult when Zion mourns over the backslidings of her people? Are they prompted to this by true charity, which covers a multitude of sins? Never. If they are true Christians, why do they not strengthen the hands of the righteous instead of the wicked? Why do they not employ all their energies to bring the wickedness of the wicked to an end? Why do they not labour to effect their conversion to God, and save them from their sins? The Saviour has answered these inquiries: "He that is not for me is against me. A kingdom divided against itself cannot stand."

12. Universalism often fatally deceives the ignorant. They quote Scripture. This passes with the ignorant for argument. Are their quotations appropriate, and do they harmonize with the general tenure of the Scriptures, are questions which the intelligent may ask, but the ignorant seldom think thus far. They take the simple fact for demonstration, instead of looking to the language and meaning of the passages thus quoted, and upon the strength of it live and die without religion, and lose their souls for ever. How awfully responsible, and dreadfully to be deprecated, must be the condition of their teachers!

13. Universalism often fails in the hour of danger and death. Its promises are not to be relied upon. They have often been broken. It is a treacherous system. I would not trust it for worlds. It has deceived many, and may deceive more. It promises much, but performs little. It has led many by mere flattery down to the borders of the grave, and promised to be with them, and support them in that trying hour, but it has lied to them. And when eternity has come in view, and their consciences have been awakened just in time to give them a fearful anticipation of judgment, this transformed angel has taken its everlasting flight from the poor, deceived, and despairing sinner, leaving him to exclaim in bitter anguish, "The harvest is past, the summer is ended, and I am not saved." Oh cruel monster this! "Thou child of the devil, thou enemy of all righteousness, how long wilt thou continue to pervert the right ways of the Lord!"

True religion never forsakes its votaries when they come to die. Many have I seen upon their dying beds, and even in the agonies of death, rejoicing with joy unspeakable and full of glory. I have seen an affectionate wife and tender mother, surrounded by her weeping husband and children, with a smile upon her countenance, saying, "Come, Lord Jesus, let not thy chariot wheels delay. I am ready. I have fought the good fight, I have finished my course, and kept the faith, and now there is laid up for me a crown of righteousness. 'Hark, they whisper—angels say, sister spirit, come away. Lend, lend your wings; I mount, I fly. Oh death! where is thy sting? oh grave! where is thy victory?' "This is the triumph of faith; this is a religion that never fails. Universalism never makes, but loses many converts upon a dying bed, while true religion makes many converts there, and loses none. The true Christian is safe, even if Universalism be true; but the Universalist is lost for ever if his doctrine be false. Our only safe course, therefore, is to obtain a change of heart. "Ye must be born again." Come, then, to Christ; seek and obtain it upon the terms of the Gospel, and you shall be happy here; and hereafter God will give you eternal life, through Jesus Christ our Lord. Amen.

Letter XVII

Dear Sir—I now pass to the consideration of your third lecture, in which you contrast “the gift of God which is eternal life, with the wages of sin which is death.”

After alluding to the horrible miseries which await the sinner in a future state, and which you have so abundantly proved in your preceding lectures, you are pleased to say—“But fearful and dreadful as will be the condition of all such as die in their sins, yet there is no necessity for a soul's perishing, for God has made an ample provision for our salvation.” You then add divers scraps of poetry, setting forth in glowing colors the goodness and love of God, and the anxiety he feels for the happiness of the human race.

This is certainly very well, but you must allow me to doubt whether it is any thing better than mere declamation, and employed most incongruously with the whole tenor and spirit of your system. With all your free agency, you have no belief in man's ability to turn himself, and, unaided by revelation and the accompanying spirit of God, to work out his own salvation. Now you cannot be ignorant that four thousand years of idolatry and darkness passed away before the true light shined upon the world; and that during this period almost countless millions of human beings lived and died, not only destitute of “the means of grace,” but even of the knowledge of the only living and true God. Since the Christian era, in like manner, the number of those who have had the offers of the gospel have constituted but a very small portion of the world, and even now only about one fourth part of the inhabitants of the earth know any thing of Christianity and the way of salvation. All the rest, with the whole race who lived before Christ, one little people alone excepted, must necessarily go down to hell! According to this, your theory, perhaps one in a thousand of those who have already lived, may be saved, and not more than one in five hundred has even had the slightest opportunity “To 'scape from hell and fly to heaven.”

And yet the pastor of the Willet street church tells us with all becoming gravity, that “there is no necessity for a soul's perishing”—that “we need not die.” The water of life is abundant.

Its streams the whole creation reach, So plenteous is the store! “

Astonishing, indeed, is such language in the lips of one who knows, or who ought to know, that it contains scarcely a semblance of truth. What is it but something worse than folly, to assert that God is not willing that any should perish, while at the same time it is acknowledged that Jesus Christ is the only name under heaven given among men whereby a soul can be saved, and yet that millions of millions have died in their sins without ever hearing or having the possibility of hearing that name?

In this lecture you institute three inquiries: “1. What are we to understand by eternal life? 2. By what proof do we know that it is the gift of God? 3. We shall inquire unto whom it is given.” Eternal life you define to be “the consummation of all the benefits derived from the life, death, resurrection and intercessions of the Lord Jesus Christ, and is directly the opposite of the penalty of the divine law.” You add, “the antithesis which the Scriptures exhibit between the penalty of the law, and this great and glorious gift of God through Jesus Christ, is perfect and will hold good throughout. The penalty of the law is death—the gift of God is life.” That is, “death” is in all respects equal to “eternal life;” and a consequence, man merits by the least sin he can commit, a punishment that is throughout the perfect opposite of "the great and glorious gift of God through Jesus Christ!" Or to make the conclusion still more obvious, man is able to do himself as much evil in one instant, as Almighty God can confer good upon him throughout eternity!! This is the doctrine of the orthodox world, and the necessary inference from its interpretation of that much abused text of Scripture, Rom. vi. 23. The absurdity of such a consequence is too obvious, one would think, to avoid being seen, but it is also too important for the support of that amiable dogma, endless misery, to be rejected. It matters little in what light it is viewed; for it either brings the Omnipotent down to the level of man, or else it exalts man to a kind of equality with God. It represents man to be as capable of doing an endless and infinite evil, as God himself is of doing an endless and infinite good. I regard this as not merely absurd, but as blasphemous. It is an insult alike to reason, and every sentiment of purity and reverence. It is contempt thrown upon the word of God and the character of its Author.

When will the Christian world have ceased to indulge in these wretched puerilities, and be willing to interpret the word of divine truth in a manner worthy of itself?

In the passage of Scripture under consideration, there is, as I observed in my sermon upon it, three pairs of antithetical terms: 1. Wages is contrasted with gift. 2. Sin, personified, is contrasted with God. 3. Death is contrasted with eternal life.. Now every one knows that because wages is contrasted with gift, it is by no means necessary to suppose that the gift is just equal in all respects and only equal to the wages. So sin is contrasted with God, but he would deserve a home in the mad house who should thence argue that sin, considered as a personal being, is altogether equal to the Almighty. The truth is, these antithetical terms are properly used by the apostle; they are not merely elegant, but give great force to the expression; the contrast, however, does not consist in the perfect equality of the objects contrasted, but in the opposition or dissimilarity of their nature.

But, as if the apostle anticipated the abuses that would be heaped upon his language, and was anxious to provide against them, he himself introduced the word eternal in connexion with life, to show that, while in its nature it was the opposite of death, it indefinitely, perhaps I should say infinitely surpassed it in point of duration.

If the doctrine of eternal death which you so ardently advocate, is true, is it not a matter of wonder that not one of the inspired writers ever once mentioned it? Of eternal life the New Testament writers spoke familiarly and constantly. They contrasted it in many instances with death, but never with eternal death. I ask you, I ask any believer in endless misery, to account for this fact. Were the apostles so familiar with the modern doctrine of antithesis, and with the interpretations it receives, as to think it unnecessary to express themselves fully on this point, and thus left it to the ingenuity of their readers to form as best they could their faith in endless torments? Or were they so parsimonious of words that they could never afford to write eternal in connexion with death? Some explanation of this remarkable fact should be furnished, that we may know how to account for its existence. If the inspired writers believed in eternal death, why have they not mentioned it? If they did not, what is your authority for believing it?

You are good enough to furnish us with six or seven instances of antithesis for the purpose of showing its nature, and also aiding you in explaining the passage we have now been considering. I shall not stop to examine them or to follow you in your winding way over and about them, because with all your exposition they add nothing to Rom vi. 23. Indeed, this is by far the most favorable passage in the Bible for proving the doctrine of eternal death. And if you cannot find and establish that doctrine here, it is in vain for you to appeal to other texts.

Still I cannot but smile at your array of antithetical passages of Scripture introduced to sustain your favorite doctrine. I am unable, however, with my best efforts to see how you extract endless misery from this proverb—"The wicked is driven away in his wickedness, but the righteous hath hope in his death;" or how you make it out from Matt. vii. 13, 14, where "destruction" is contrasted with "life." True, you very kindly aid our Savior by changing "life" into "life eternal," and of course construe "destruction" to mean nothing more nor less than "eternal death, 'soul and body in hell.'" With such talents for interpreting Scripture, you can hardly fail of succeeding in any undertaking. He who can prove the doctrine of eternal death, needs entertain no fears of discomfiture, let him assume what absurdity he may.

You close your observations under the first head of your discourse with the remark that, "as eternal death is the separation from God and the glory of his power, and a punishment of everlasting destruction, it must be a deprivation of all positive good which we are capacitated to enjoy, and the infliction of all the positive evil which we are capable of enduring." I cannot avoid comparing this with what you told us in your second lecture, that God "recognizes man as a free moral agent, and that he will never deprive him of this necessary constituent of his moral nature for the purpose of making him either holy and happy, or sinful and miserable:" and that God "will hereafter make him just as holy and happy as he can." If depriving the sinner of all positive good which he is capable of enjoying, and inflicting upon him all the positive evil which he is capable of suffering, be doing the best by the poor creatures that God can do, you would confer a favor by informing me what would be the worst. And I should also acknowledge my obligations if you would inform me what is the difference between the best that your GOD can hereafter do to the sinner, and the worst that your DEVIL could do. I have thought on this subject considerably, and must confess that I cannot see much difference between the effects of infinite goodness and love in this case, and infinite malignity: that is, if such a being as the Devil had the sole disposal of sinners, and were inclined to do the very worst that the Devil himself could do, it would still be much the same as what "the Father of mercies and God of all grace" actually will do, while in accordance with his infinite compassion, he makes them "just as happy as he can." Perhaps if you were to prosecute this train of thought you might be led with the good and orthodox Dr. Emmons, to conclude that infinite goodness is rather more terrible than infinite malice would be; at all events, I would advise you to institute the curious inquiry whether in the course of these lectures, you have not sometimes introduced the character of the devil under the name of God. So small a mistake as this might, I think, be easily made by you, though I do not propose that it would wholly vitiate the argument.

Under your second head in this lecture, you attempt to prove that "eternal" life is the gift of God. It is not of ourselves, for it is obtained through Jesus Christ our Lord." He purchased it for us, and "prepares the soul" for its enjoyment, by the efficacy of his own blood and the operations of his holy spirit." Eternal life, you tell us, is not the reward of works. "We are rewarded according to our works, but not for our works." A very nice distinction; rather too nice to be seen or conceived. But does not this apply to our evil, as well as our good acts. Is there not indeed the same evidence to prove that the sinner shall be rewarded according to, but not/or his works, as there is that the righteous shall? Again, if our happiness and misery throughout eternity be only according to our works here, I am afraid, Br. Remington, that we shall have little to boast of. I know not how it may be with your perfect Methodists, but we Universalists are constrained to believe that we are very well rewarded in this world for all the good we do here; and that the inheritance which is incorruptible and undefiled, and that fadeth not away, reserved for us in heaven, will be a gift, not a reward, and a gift too, according to the love and grace of God, and not according to our poor and imperfect works in this present life.

You tell us "There are degrees of glory among the saints in heaven, as one star differeth from another star in glory! Eternal life entitles us to an admittance into heaven, and is heaven itself. But the reward of our works will be an increase of our happiness in heaven." This is a very pleasing doctrine, no doubt, and must greatly encourage your perfectionists, who thus have a fair prospect of attaining "the uppermost rooms" and "the chief seats" in our Father's house. But I fear these disinterested Christians will yet be disappointed. It is not quite clear to my mind that heaven is to be awarded to mortals either for or according to their works.— The apostle speaks, 2 Tim. i. 9, of God "who hath saved us and called us with a holy calling, not according to our works, but according to his own purpose and grace." And perhaps what was thus begun, "not according to our works," will be finished as it was begun, according to the divine purpose and grace. And should this suspicion happen to be well founded, instead of being distinguished as special favorites in heaven, you may find yourselves at last, much in the condition of certain men in the parable, "who supposed that they should have received more than their fellows, but likewise received every man a penny. And when they had received it, they murmured against the good man of the house, saying, These last have wrought but one hour, and thou hast made them equal unto us, which have borne the burden and heat of the day." The reply to these very natural and grievous complaints was just, if it was not satisfactory. "But he answered one of them and said, friend, I do thee no wrong; didst not thou agree with me for a penny? . Take that thine is, and go thy way; I will give unto this last even as unto thee. Is it not lawful for me to do what I Will with mine own? Is thine eye evil because I am good?"

Of one thing, Br. Remington, we may rest assured; God, the judge of all the earth, will do right. We shall be rewarded and punished according to our works. No good act and no evil act will be permitted to escape the all-seeing eye, and the equitable retributions of a holy and just God. But that our good works here are to make us great and exalt us to dignity in heaven and through eternity, is not so clear nor so consonant with the spirit of the gospel. As ever, yours, Thomas J. ST. JOHN, xiv. 1, 2, 3, 4.

Let not your heart be troubled: ye believe in God, believe also in me. In my Father's house are many mansions: if it were not so, I would have told you. I go to prepare a place for you. And if I go and prepare a place for you, I will come again and receive you unto myself: that where I am, there ye may be also. And whither I go ye know, and the way ye know.

If we consider the character and circumstances of the eleven disciples, we cannot be surprised at their having been troubled in heart. Their views and expectations were opposed. Our blessed Lord had washed their feet, taught them humility, announced the betrayer, enjoined mutual love, given intimation of his departure from them, and predicted that Peter would deny Him. What conflicting emotions must all this have produced in bosoms so strongly pre-occupied as theirs were with worldly calculations! Their hopes might have been raised by the triumphant entry into Jerusalem; but these were now destroyed; and grief became the prevailing feeling. Our Lord knew their distress, and administered to them the purest consolation, by unfolding the nature of his kingdom, and pouring upon their spirits some of the brightest beams of evangelical truth.

If you entertain false notions and prejudices respecting the gospel, as though it were gloomy, forbidding, and repulsive, we would urge you to study such a passage of Scripture as the text, in order that you may see the utter injustice of your present views and feelings. The language of our Lord to his disciples is also his language to his faithful followers in all ages: and if we rightly meditate on the sublime declarations and consolatory assurances which are here advanced, we shall see something of the glory of the gospel and of the happiness of its true disciples.

I. Let us briefly examine these verses in reference to our Lord's immediate followers.

'Let not your heart be troubled.'—'Let not your souls be distressed; let them not be thrown into confusion by any thing that I have advanced, or may yet advance.'—The information which He had given them of his approaching departure had produced its natural effect. They were troubled by it. Their views of worldly grandeur were vanishing away as unsubstantial dreams. Nor was this all; for they were to be deprived of their Master's presence; and what could they then expect from the Jews but contempt, ridicule, and persecution? Our Lord saw their perplexity, and addressed them in consolatory words.

'Ye believe in God, believe also in me;' or, 'Believe in God, believe also in me.'—He reminds them of faith, the fundamental and sustaining principle in religion. He leads them at once to the source of strength and comfort. He shows them the basis of the true Christian character,—confidence or trust in God, who would never forsake them, and confidence or trust in Himself, through whom, as the Mediator, and from whom, as the living Head of the Church, all spiritual blessings were to be derived. He taught them that religion is principle—a life of faith; and that, when He was removed from them as to bodily presence, they were to believe in God, in Christ, and in all the discoveries and declarations which had been made to them.

'In my Father's house are many mansions.' Our Lord passes from the principal to its ultimate object. He guides the thoughts of his disciples from earth to heaven; from the visible to the invisible world; from the transitory to the eternal state. By the expression, his 'Father's house,' heaven is meant: and in the expression, 'many mansions,' He alludes to the palaces of earthly potentates, or to the Jewish temple, which had chambers round about it: probably intimating that in the world of blessedness there is ample room for the saints in their various orders, according to their different measures of attainment in pious excellence.

'If it were not so, I would have told you.' He, in fact, assures them that He was no deceiver, and that there was no ground for the sceptical notions of the Sadducees respecting a future state. If there were not an abiding after-state, He asserts that He would not have allowed them to cherish vain expectations. Convinced, therefore, of his veracity, they might direct their minds to the sublimest contemplation of futurity, whatever were the trials and sorrows of the present state.

'I go to prepare a place for you.' It is as though He had said, 'I am going to the cross, to the grave, and afterwards to the spiritual world, where I shall not be unmindful of you, but shall be engaged in those effectual services on your behalf which will insure your eternal happiness.'—How well suited was this assurance to revive the drooping spirits of the disciples—and especially at a future period, when they understood the office of our Lord above as a perpetual Intercessor!

'And if I go and prepare a place for you, I will come again, and receive you unto myself; that were I am, there ye may be also.' Our Lord had spoken of separation, and He now speaks of reunion. When he had completed his work He would come again, and receive them into that close and intimate alliance with Himself which would constitute their bliss through eternity: they would behold his glory and share his happiness. His immediate society was what they wished to enjoy; and here a renewal of it, in a more exalted state, as also in a more glorious form, is promised to them.

'And whither I go ye know; and the way ye know.' That is, 'After the instructions which I have given you, I must not suppose that you are ignorant as to the place where I am going, and as to the way which leads to that blissful abode.' Thus they were reprov'd in gentle terms for their worldly views, and an opportunity was given them of obtaining further information.

In this manner, then, our blessed Saviour condescended to regard the infirmities and to comfort the hearts of his disciples, in the season of their trouble and perplexity. Every sentence was as a healing balm, to soothe the anguish of the wounded heart.

II. We now examine these verses as they are applicable to all true Christians. And here we offer a few remarks on their troubles and on their consolations.

1. The Troubles of real believers.

The life of man is a pilgrimage in a vale of tears; and however he may indulge in mirth and pleasure, he cannot change the character of human existence. He may banish serious reflection from his mind; he may amuse himself with dreams and fancies: but he will be more or less familiar with change and disappointment, with vexation, pain, and grief.—But we are to speak about the truly pious; about those by whom the doctrines of the gospel are known and its power felt; who love God, enjoy his favour, and strive to do his will. And are these persons exempted from trouble and sorrow? Certainly not. They escape, it is true, many of the sufferings which wicked men bring upon themselves; but yet they share the common lot of human beings; and, in addition to the ordinary trials of life, they have those which are peculiar to themselves, as the servants of Christ. All that comes under the description of spiritual trial properly speaking, is a matter not known and not felt by the world, who are 'dead in trespasses and sins,' but which is very familiar to those who are really alive to good and evil. If the pious calculated, at the beginning of a religious life, on the enjoyment of a bright and peaceful day, yet they soon learn, in the plain and sober path of experience, that life has dark as well as bright shades, tumult as well as tranquillity; and, in short, that the Christian course is labour, not rest; warfare, not repose; hope, rather than fruition; a journey through a wilderness, not a walk in a paradise.

There may be seasons of peculiar trial and sorrow in the life of a true believer. The day may occasionally be very tempestuous—the path thorny, the burden heavy, the conflict severe. There may be fightings without, and fears within. He may be visited with some trying dispensation: and when all around him is bright and peaceful, the rains may descend, the floods come, the winds blow; and although they cannot overturn him, for his foundation is upon a rock, yet trouble, sadness, and anguish may abound for a season. Job is not the only man who has lamented the sudden loss of property and of children. Naomi is not the only woman who has said, or has had occasion to say, 'Call me not Naomi; call me Mara; for the Almighty hath dealt very bitterly with me.' The Psalmist is not the only person who has said, 'Thy wrath lieth hard upon me, and thou hast afflicted me with all thy waves.' 'Out of the depths have I cried unto thee, O Lord.'

We only thus glance at the troubles of real believers. They are liable to affliction to mind, body, and estate: nay, more, as the children of God they must expect affliction: 'for whom the Lord loveth he chasteneth, and scourgeth every son whom he receiveth. If ye endure chastening, God dealeth with you as with sons: for what son is he whom the father chasteneth not?' But we observe,

2. The Consolations of true believers.

In their troubles and sorrows they are not left forlorn and destitute. 'Believe in God, believe also in me.' The great religious principle, a sure trust in God, is their support and comfort. Trust in God as the gracious Father, and trust in Christ as the only Mediator—here is the life, strength, and peace of the real Christian.

Look on the man of the world in the day of temporal trial; and he knows not whither to direct to his view, but is as a vessel that is left in a dark night to the mercy of the winds and waves. He may be careless and obdurate; or he may be light and trifling; or he may be alarmed and terrified; or he may be gloomy and sullen; or he may be peevish and querulous. One man may have speculative notions and pride, and he manifests a spurious fortitude, and accounts it weak and childish to complain. Another flies to his fellow creatures for aid and comfort. Another plunges into worldly schemes and cares, or rushes into amusement and gaiety. Another sits down in moody melancholy, broods over his calamities, and is the victim of a repining and complaining heart. They would enjoy comfort; but they know not where to look for it, and remain without it.—Not such is the case of the pious. They cherish and exhibit magnanimity, patience, and unruffled composure, or even 'glory in tribulations;' in all the vicissitudes of human life. What is the secret of their bliss? Whence do they derive this strength, peace, and joy? They turn to God; they think of his perfections, counsels, and ways; they meditate on his promises; they consider the design and end of his measures; they have the full persuasion that He orders all things in unerring wisdom, does all things in infinite benignity, and makes 'all things work together for good to them that love Him.' To Him they make their prayer; in Him they put their trust; and they are supported and comforted in all their troubles. By the power of a living faith they rise above the weakness and perverseness of human nature: their spirit is resignation, their feelings those of gratitude, and their language praise.

But, further, the men of the world may not be entirely strangers to mental trouble: we can scarcely suppose that their consciences are always lulled in a dead repose. Surely the thought of death, of the grave, of the final judgment, of everlasting woe as well as of everlasting bliss, will rush occasionally into the bosoms of the worldly and the vain, and excite feelings of disquietude. How do they banish fear and solicitude far from them, and proceed in their course with gay security? Perhaps they balance their virtues against their vices, and vaguely refer to the divine mercy. Perhaps they compare themselves to others, and speak peace to their hearts on the ground of a presumed superior excellence. Perhaps they plunge into revelry, and welcome almost any thing that serves to stifle painful conviction. All their comfort springs from stupifying the soul by folly and delusion.

The real Christian has inward trouble, and his soul may frequently be perplexed and sad within him. We do not here aim to describe spiritual darkness and distress, or to enumerate its causes. We only ask, What is the conduct of the righteous soul, and where does it seek for comfort, in the day of its anguish? It does not trifle with its woe, or account it fancy and moping melancholy, or stifle or expel it by erroneous notions or worldly folly. Its principle is faith; and in the exercise of that principle it approaches God in Christ Jesus at the throne of grace, and there seeks comfort by humble and earnest prayer. When the cloud gathers around him, when joy is fled, when he walks in darkness and sees no light, the believer makes it a season of reflection, of self-examination, of deep humiliation, and of fervent devotion. He does not look to himself, or to others, or to worldly objects for relief; but he cherishes the workings of a tender and contrite heart, and looks up with an imploring eye to the gracious Friend of penitent souls, who says to his tried and afflicted followers, 'Let not your hearts be troubled: believe in God, believe also in me.' His support is faith; he relies on the truth, mercy, and love of Jehovah; and as his faith prevails, his consolation abounds.

But let it be here distinctly observed, that the Bible is the book of consolation to the true believer: and we will now consider how all true believers may use the verses which compose our text for their consolation in the days of trouble and sorrow. We will suppose that they put these verses before them; and will furnish them with such language as they may, and as, we think, they ought to use.

'Let not your heart be troubled: believe in God, believe also in me.' 'These are the encouraging words in which the compassionate Saviour addresses us. Our trials are many and severe: but why should we be troubled? Let us look to God who orders all things; and to the Lord Jesus Christ, who is the good Shepherd. Our troubles are laid upon us for our benefit—' for our profit, that we might be partakers of his holiness.' It is good for us that we should be tried and afflicted; for 'tribulation worketh patience; and patience, experience; and experience, hope; and hope maketh not ashamed.' We look to Thee, our God and Father; to Thee, our gracious Saviour: we believe, by divine grace, in the word of truth, and we cannot be troubled: composure and peace prevail in our confiding souls.'

'In my Father's house are many mansions: if it were not so, I would have told you.' 'Thou thyself, O blessed Jesus! art the truth, and thy word is truth. Thou hast 'brought life and immortality to light through the gospel.' If this world is a wilderness, yet there is a Canaan above. If this world be a pilgrimage, yet it leads to a blessed and a happy home in the realms of light. We may gain possessions here, but we shall soon leave them. We may build houses, but we shall not long inhabit them. We may shine in pomp and elegance, but we shall soon lie down in the dust. But mansions—mansions above—mansions above in our Father's house—an abiding residence in the world of glory—a place in that city which hath foundations:—this is our comfort; and in the view of these sublime objects, we lose sight of the vanishing distinctions which prevail on earth; of the splendour of the great, and of the humble appearance of those of low estate. To dwell in the house of God above, to behold his glory, and to be near Him and like Him—this is elevation so magnificent, and enjoyment so pure, that, dim as our apprehensions of them are, we cannot mention, or even notice, the troubles and sorrows of mortality.'

' I go to prepare a place for you.' ' While we are suffering and toiling in a world of sin and care, the Lord Jesus Christ is employed on our behalf in the heavenly world. We have an Advocate with the Father, who looks upon us, who feels for us, who hears our prayers, and who does whatever is needful to promote our welfare. By the favour of men we may obtain those treasures and honours which procure admiration and flattery; or we may hear from them the language of condolence in the day of grief. But these things are only the things of a moment; nor can they heal the wounded spirit, dispel its darkness, or open before it the prospect of final blessedness. Thou, O Saviour! art our Benefactor and Comforter: we look to Thee, and to thy advocacy and intercession, and we have peace and joy amid the changes and sorrows of the present state.'

' And if I go and prepare a place for you, I will come again.' ' The gracious and glorious Redeemer is far removed from the sphere of human vision; yet is He spiritually present with his people; and at the appointed time he will again appear, and every eye shall see him. The heavens have received Him until the purposes of God are accomplished; and then He will come to be the Judge of all men, to the joy and triumph of his faithful followers. A few more rolling years, and we shall quit this agitated world, and behold Him who is the object of our faith. We meditate on the final glory, and banish our sorrow.'

' And receive you to myself: that where I am, there ye may be also.' ' When time is exchanged for eternity, where shall we be? Where our glorified Redeemer is. With whom shall we be? For ever with the Lord. Delightful thought! But what language can express, or what mind conceive, the blessedness of the righteous in the presence of God and of the Lamb through everlasting ages? These frail tabernacles will sink into the grave; but they will be raised again, pure and immortal; and then the happiness of the redeemed and sanctified will be perfect. How, then, can we be troubled in heart, when we know that the ills and sorrows of time will pass away as the mist of the morning, and be succeeded by the glory and felicity of heaven.

''And whither I go ye know, and the way ye know.'' Thou, O gracious Saviour! art in heaven, at the right hand of the Majesty on high, and Thou thyself art the Way. Though we are ignorant— of ourselves mere ignorance—yet by thy word and Spirit we have the best knowledge. In the light of thy holy word, we know both where Thou art, and what Thou art to thy Church. We look to thy Cross, thy Spirit, thy Commandments, thy Example, thy Intercession; and we see the way, and the means by which thy true disciples arrive at the regions of eternal bliss, and stand accepted in the presence of Jehovah,—to leave it no more for ever. Our souls are satisfied: and we can rejoice amidst the trials, changes, and sorrows,—the light afflictions of the present time, which are but for a moment.'

It is in this manner that the true believer may and ought to meditate on these delightful verses, and to derive the consolation which they are designed to impart to all holy and troubled souls.— What has been now advanced is sufficient, we trust, to show all reflecting persons, that the gospel of Christ abounds with what is equally glorious and consolatory; elevating and soothing to the soul. The fell enchantress Folly may fling a fascinating charm and a dazzling splendour over the varied scenes of life: but the charm will be soon dissolved, and the splendour vanish from our view. Sorrow and trouble are the birthright of man: and if the life of the gay and prosperous be looked upon as a bright picture, yet on close inspection we shall find that it abounds with deep and dark shades. Philosophy may reason to us, and Pleasure may amuse us; but still we are sufferers. And where shall we look for comfort, joy, and peace? To the Gospel, to Christ, to Heaven. The Wisdom from above sheds light and glory on the present scene, while it also reveals a perfect light and a perfect glory beyond it: so that we can lose the sight of present deformity, and the sense of present suffering, by virtue of the life which we feel within us, and of the magnificence which we see before us. If an Eden yet exist on earth, the kingdom of God's dear Son is that Eden: and there indeed we gather flowers that will not wither, and drink the living waters of a fountain that will not fail.

In closing the discourse, We ask you, or rather beseech you to ask yourselves, whether or no you are strangers to the gospel of Christ,—strangers, we mean, to its mercy and grace, to its light and power, to its healing and consoling virtues. If you be, consider seriously what it is which you are disregarding and despising. Your present peace is slumber and death; your hopes are vain presumptions; and your happiness is but little more than an insensibility to misery. We rejoice to speak before you of glorious mansions: but it is also our duty to remind you, that there is a prison of anguish and despair,—the final dwelling of the impenitent and unbelieving. Jesus will come again, and receive his people to himself; but in that day He will banish for ever the wicked from his presence. While you neglect to attend to the gospel, you put from you all that can make you truly happy here, and prepare you for a hopeful death, and a blessed eternity. Lay this to heart, and do not forfeit the glory and the bliss of heaven for the pleasures of sin and the vanities of a transitory world.

If you be truly and spiritually acquainted with the gospel, we call upon you to act in agreement with your professions and hopes. Let the declarations contained in the text be to you the sources of the purest consolation, whatever be the troubles of human life. Knowing and experiencing the mercy and grace which are revealed in the Scriptures, and having the prospect of eternal happiness, neither complain, nor be dismayed, nor be impatient. Be it your prayer, desire, and endeavour to do and to suffer according to the will of God. Thus will the divine life flourish within you; you will abound in the fruits of righteousness; your consolation will be great and unailing: yea, that peace which passeth all understanding will be granted to you,—a foretaste of the perfect bliss which will be your portion in the mansions of your Father's house.

W.W. Phelps (1792 – 1872) or Joseph Smith (1805-1844), Latter-day Saint Founder
The Answer to W.W. Phelps, Esq.: A Vision
Times and Seasons

(Times and Seasons, v. 4, no. 5, January 16, 1843, p. 85)
(Corresponding verse numbers from D&C 76 are in parentheses.)

1. I will go, I will go, to the home of the Saints,
Where the virtue's the value, and life the reward;
But before I return to my former estate
I must fulfil the mission I had from the Lord.

2. Wherefore, hear, O ye heavens, and give ear O ye earth;
And rejoice ye inhabitants truly again;
For the Lord he is God, and his life never ends,
And besides him there ne'er was a Saviour of men. (v. 1)

3. His ways are a wonder; his wisdom is great;
The extent of his doings, there's none can unveil;
His purposes fail not; from age unto age
He still is the same, and his years never fail. (v. 2-3)

4. His throne is the heavens, his life time is all
Of eternity now, and eternity then;
His union is power, and none stays his hand,—
The Alpha, Omega, for ever: Amen. (v. 4)

5. For thus saith the Lord, in the spirit of truth,
I am merciful, gracious, and good unto those

That fear me, and live for the life that's to come;
My delight is to honor the saints with repose; (v. 5)

6. That serve me in righteousness true to the end;
Eternal's their glory, and great their reward;
I'll surely reveal all my myst'ries to them,—
The great hidden myst'ries in my kingdom stor'd— (v. 6)

7. From the council in Kolob, to time on the earth.
And for ages to come unto them I will show
My pleasure & will, what my kingdom will do:
Eternity's wonders they truly shall know. (v. 7)

8. Great things of the future I'll show unto them,
Yea, things of the vast generations to rise;
For their wisdom and glory shall be very great,
And their pure understanding extend to the skies: (v. 8)

9. And before them the wisdom of wise men shall cease,
And the nice understanding of prudent ones fail!
For the light of my spirit shall light mine elect,
And the truth is so mighty 't will ever prevail. (v. 9-10)

10. And the secrets and plans of my will I'll reveal;
The sanctified pleasures when earth is renew'd,
What the eye hath not seen, nor the ear hath yet heard;
Nor the heart of the natural man ever hath view'd. (v. 10)

11. I, Joseph, the prophet, in spirit beheld,
And the eyes of the inner man truly did see
Eternity sketch'd in a vision from God,
Of what was, and now is, and yet is to be. (v. 11-12)

12. Those things which the Father ordained of old,
Before the world was, or a system had run,—
Through Jesus the Maker and Savior of all;
The only begotten, (Messiah) his son. (v. 13)

13. Of whom I bear record, as all prophets have,
And the record I bear is the fulness,—yea even
The truth of the gospel of Jesus—the Christ,
With whom I convers'd, in the vision of heav'n. (v. 14)

14. For while in the act of translating his word,
Which the Lord in his grace had appointed to me,
I came to the gospel recorded by John,
Chapter fifth and the twenty ninth verse, which you'll see. (v. 15)

Which was given as follows:

"Speaking of the resurrection of the dead,—

"Concerning those who shall hear the voice of "the son of man—" And shall come forth:—

"They who have done good in the resurrection "of the just.

"And they who have done evil in the "resurrection of the unjust." (v. 16-17)

15. I marvel'd at these resurrections, indeed!
For it came unto me by the spirit direct:—
And while I did meditate what it all meant,
The Lord touch'd the eyes of my own intellect: — (v. 18-19)

16. Hosanna forever! they open'd anon,
And the glory of God shone around where I was;
And there was the Son, at the Father's right hand,
In a fulness of glory, and holy applause. (v. 20)

17. I beheld round the throne, holy angels and hosts,
And sanctified beings from worlds that have been,
In holiness worshipping God and the Lamb,
Forever and ever, amen and amen! (v. 21)

18. And now after all of the proofs made of him,
By witnesses truly, by whom he was known,
This is mine, last of all, that he lives; yea he lives!
And sits at the right hand of God, on his throne. (v. 22)

19. And I heard a great voice, bearing record from heav'n,
He's the Saviour, and only begotten of God—
By him, of him, and through him, the worlds were all made,
Even all that career in the heavens so broad, (v. 23-24)

20. Whose inhabitants, too, from the first to the last,
Are sav'd by the very same Saviour of ours;
And, of course, are begotten God's daughters and sons,
By the very same truths, and the very same pow'rs. (v. 24)

21. And I saw and bear record of warfare in heav'n;
For an angel of light, in authority great,
Rebell'd against Jesus, and sought for his pow'r,
But was thrust down to woe from his Godified state. (v. 25)

22. And the heavens all wept, and the tears drop'd like dew,
That Lucifer, son of the morning had fell!
Yea, is fallen! is fall'n, and become, Oh, alas!
The son of Perdition; the devil of hell! (v. 26-27)

23. And while I was yet in the spirit of truth,
The commandment was: write ye the vision all out;
For Satan, old serpent, the devil's for war,—
And yet will encompass the saints round about. (v. 28-29)

24. And I saw, too, the suff'ring and mis'ry of those,
(Overcome by the devil, in warfare and fight,)
In hell-fire, and vengeance, the doom of the damn'd;
For the Lord said, the vision is further: so write. (v. 30)

25. For thus saith the Lord, now concerning all those Who know of my power and partake of the same;
And suffer themselves, that they be overcome
By the power of Satan; despising my name: — (v. 31)

26. Defying my power, and denying the truth;—
They are they—of the world, or of men, most forlorn,
The Sons of Perdition, of whom, ah! I say,
'T were better for them had they never been born! (v. 31-32)

27. They're vessels of wrath, and dishonor to God,
Doom'd to suffer his wrath, in the regions of woe,
Through the terrific night of eternity's round,
With the devil and all of his angels below: (v. 33)

28. Of whom it is said, no forgiveness is giv'n,
In this world, alas! nor the world that's to come;
For they have denied the spirit of God,
After having receiv'd it: and mis'ry's their doom. (v. 34-35)

29. And denying the only begotten of God,—
And crucify him to themselves, as they do,
And openly put him to shame in their flesh,
By gospel they cannot repentance renew. (v. 35)

30. They are they, who must go to the great lake of fire,
Which burneth with brimstone, yet never consumes,
And dwell with the devil, and angels of his,
While eternity goes and eternity comes. (v. 36)

31. They are they, who must groan through the great second death,
And are not redeemed in the time of the Lord;
While all the rest are, through the triumph of Christ,
Made partakers of grace, by the power of his word. (v. 37-39)

32. The myst'ry of Godliness truly is great;—
The past, and the present, and what is to be;
And this is the gospel-glad tidings to all,
Which the voice from the heavens bore record to me: (v. 40)

33. That he came to the world in the middle of time,
To lay down his life for his friends and his foes,
And bear away sin as a mission of love;
And sanctify earth for a blessed repose. (v. 41)

34. 'Tis decreed, that he'll save all the work of his hands,
And sanctify them by his own precious blood;
And purify earth for the Sabbath of rest,
By the agent of fire, as it was by the flood. (v. 42)

35. The Savior will save all his Father did give,
Even all that he gave in the regions abroad,

Save the Sons of Perdition: They're lost; ever lost,
And can never return to the presence of God. (v. 43)

36. They are they, who must reign with the devil in hell,
In eternity now, and eternity then,
Where the worm dieth not, and the fire is not quench'd;—
And the punishment still, is eternal. Amen. (v. 44)

37. And which is the torment apostates receive,
But the end, or the place where the torment began,
Save to them who are made to partake of the same,
Was never, nor will be, revealed unto man. (v. 45-46)

38. Yet God shows by vision a glimpse of their fate,
And straightway he closes the scene that was shown:
So the width, or the depth, or the misery thereof,
Save to those that partake, is forever unknown. (v. 47-48)

39. And while I was pondering, the vision was closed;
And the voice said to me, write the vision: for lo!
'Tis the end of the scene of the sufferings of those,
Who remain filthy still in their anguish and woe. (v. 49)

40. And again I bear record of heavenly things,
Where virtue's the value, above all that's pric'd—
Of the truth of the gospel concerning the just,
That rise in the first resurrection of Christ. (v. 50)

41. Who receiv'd and believ'd, and repented likewise,
And then were baptis'd, as a man always was,
Who ask'd and receiv'd a remission of sin,
And honored the kingdom by keeping its laws. (v. 51)

42. Being buried in water, as Jesus had been,
And keeping the whole of his holy commands,
They received the gift of the spirit of truth,
By the ordinance truly of laying on hands. (v. 52)

43. For these overcome, by their faith and their works,
Being tried in their life-time, as purified gold,
And seal'd by the spirit of promise, to life,
By men called of God, as was Aaron of old. (v. 53)

44. They are they, of the church of the first born of God,—
And unto whose hands he committeth all things;
For they hold the keys of the kingdom of heav'n,
And reign with the Savior, as priests, and as kings. (v. 54-56)

45. They're priests of the order of Melchizedek,
Like Jesus, (from whom is this highest reward,)
Receiving a fulness of glory and light;
As written: They're Gods; even sons of the Lord. (v. 57-58)

46. So all things are theirs; yea, of life, or of death;
Yea, whether things now, or to come, all are theirs,
And they are the Savior's, and he is the Lord's,
Having overcome all, as eternity's heirs. (v. 59-60)

47. 'Tis wisdom that man never glory in man,
But give God the glory for all that he hash;
For the righteous will walk in the presence of God,
While the wicked are trod under foot in his wrath. (v. 61)

48. Yea, the righteous shall dwell in the presence of God,
And of Jesus, forever, from earth's second birth—
For when he comes down in the splendor of heav'n,
All these he'll bring with him, to reign on the earth. (v. 62-63)

49. These are they that arise in their bodies of flesh,
When the trump of the first resurrection shall sound;
These are they that come up to Mount Zion, in life,
Where the blessings and gifts of the spirit abound. (v. 64-66)

50. These are they that have come to the heavenly place;
To the numberless courses of angels above:
To the city of God; e'en the holiest of all,
And the home of the blessed, the fountain of love: (v. 67)

51. To the church of old Enoch, and of the first born:
And gen'ral assembly of ancient renown'd.
Whose names are all kept in the archives of heav'n,
As chosen and faithful, and fit to be crown 'd. (v. 68)

52. These are they that are perfect through Jesus' own blood,
Whose bodies celestial are mention'd by Paul,
Where the sun is the typical glory thereof,
And God, and his Christ, are the true judge of all. (v. 69-70)

53. Again, I beheld the terrestrial world,
In the order and glory of Jesus, go on;
'Twas not as the church of the first born of God,
But shone in its place, as the moon to the sun. (v. 71)

54. Behold, these are they that have died without law;
The heathen of ages that never had hope.
And those of the region and shadow of death,
The spirits in prison, that light has brought up. (v. 72-73)

55. To spirits in prison the Savior once preach'd,
And taught them the gospel, with powers afresh;
And then were the living baptiz'd for their dead,
That they might be judg'd as if men in the flesh. (v. 74)

56. These are they that are hon'rabable men of the earth;

Who were blinded and dup'd by the cunning of men:
They receiv'd not the truth of the Savior at first;
But did, when they heard it in prison, again. (v. 74-75)

57. Not valiant for truth, they obtain'd not the crown,
But are of that glory that's typ'd by the moon:
They are they, that come into the presence of Christ,
But not to the fulness of God, on his throne. (v. 76-79)

58. Again I beheld the telestial, as third,
The lesser, or starry world, next in its place.
For the leaven must leaven three measures of meal,
And every knee bow that is subject to grace. (v. 81)

59. These are they that receiv'd not the gospel of Christ,
Or evidence, either, that he ever was;
As the stars are all different in glory and light,
So differs the glory of these by the laws. (v. 82)

60. These are they that deny not the spirit of God,
But are thrust down to hell, with the devil, for sins,
As hypocrites, liars, whoremongers, and thieves,
And stay 'till the last resurrection begins. (v. 83-85)

61. 'Till the Lamb shall have finish'd the work he begun;
Shall have trodden the wine press, in fury alone,
And overcome all by the pow'r of his might:
He conquers to conquer, and save all his own. (v. 85 and 107)

62. These are they that receive not a fulness of light,
From Christ, in eternity's world, where they are,
The terrestrial sends them the Comforter, though;
And minist'ring angels, to happify there. (v. 86)

63. And so the telestial is minister'd to,
By ministers from the terrestrial one,
As terrestrial is, from the celestial throne;
And the great, greater, greatest, seem's stars, moon, and sun. (v. 86-88)

64. And thus I beheld, in the vision of heav'n,
The telestial glory, dominion and bliss,
Surpassing the great understanding of men,—
Unknown, save reveal'd, in a world vain as this. (v. 89-90)

65. And lo, I beheld the terrestrial, too,
Which excels the telestial in glory and light,
In splendor, and knowledge, and wisdom, and joy,
In blessings, and graces, dominion and might. (v. 91)

66. I beheld the celestial, in glory sublime;
Which is the most excellent kingdom that is,—
Where God, e'en the Father, in harmony reigns;

Almighty, supreme, and eternal, in bliss. (v. 92-93)

67. Where the church of the first born in union reside,
And they are as they're seen, and they know as they're known;
Being equal in power, dominion and might,
With a fulness of glory and grace, round his throne. (v. 94-95)

68. The glory celestial is one like the sun;
The glory terrest'r'al is one like the moon;
The glory telesstial is one like the stars,
And all harmonize like the parts of a tune. (v. 96-98)

69. As the stars are all different in lustre and size,
So the telesstial region, is mingled in bliss;
From least unto greatest, and greatest to least,
The reward is exactly as promis'd in this. (v. 98)

70. These are they that came out for Apollos and Paul;
For Cephas and Jesus, in all kinds of hope;
For Enoch and Moses, and Peter, and John;
For Luther and Calvin, and even the Pope. (v. 99-100)

71. For they never received the gospel of Christ,
Nor the prophetic spirit that came from the Lord;
Nor the covenant neither, which Jacob once had;
They went their own way, and they have their reward. (v. 100-1)

72. By the order of God, last of all, these are they,
That will not be gather'd with saints here below,
To be caught up to Jesus, and meet in the clouds:—
In darkness they worshipp'd; to darkness they go. (v. 102)

73. These are they that are sinful, the wicked at large,
That glutted their passion by meanness or worth;
All liars, adulterers, sorc'ers, and proud;
And suffer, as promis'd, God's wrath on the earth. (v. 103-4)

74. These are they that must suffer the vengeance of hell,
'Till Christ shall have trodden all enemies down,
And perfected his work, in the fulness of times:
And is crown'd on his throne with his glorious crown. (v. 105-8)

75. The vast multitude of the telesstial world—
As the stars of the skies, or the sands of the sea;—
The voice of Jehovah echo'd far and wide,
Ev'ry tongue shall confess, and they all bow the knee. (v. 109-10)

76. Ev'ry man shall be judg'd by the works of his life,
And receive a reward in the mansions prepar'd;
For his judgments are just, and his works never end,
As his prophets and servants have always declar'd. (v. 111)

77. But the great things of God, which he show'd unto me,
Unlawful to utter, I dare not declare;
They surpass all the wisdom and greatness of men,
And only are seen, as has Paul, where they are. (v. 114-18)

78. I will go, I will go, while the secret of life,
Is blooming in heaven, and blasting in hell;
Is leaving on earth, and a budding in space:—
I will go, I will go, with you, brother, farewell.

Article 11 - In My Father's House are Many Mansions

"In my Father's house are many mansions; if it were not so, I would have told you. I go to prepare a place for you. And if I go and prepare a place for you, I will come again, and receive you unto myself; that where I am, there ye may be also." (JOHN xiv. 2, 3)

IN that last and lengthy discourse, which Jesus delivered to his disciples, before he gave himself into the hands of his enemies, we discover intense labor, designed to impress on their minds such facts as he well knew were necessarily embraced in the wonderful scheme of establishing his kingdom among men, and of building up his church on a foundation which should never be shaken. And as he designed that these unlearned and powerless disciples should be employed in this immense enterprise, he did not fail to acquaint them with the difficulties, trials, and sufferings which necessarily lay in the path in which he had appointed that they should go; so that in room of being discouraged by the persecutions they would have to suffer, they should regard them as a testimony in favor of the truth of his word. On the other hand, he was equally faithful to give them assurance of the divine support, by which they should be sustained in the path of duty. Among these assurances we find that which is recorded, John xiv. 1-3: "Let not your heart be troubled; ye believe in God, believe also in me. In my Father's house are many mansions; if it were not so, I would have told you. I go to prepare a place for you. And if I go and prepare a place for you, I will come again, and receive you unto myself; that where I am, there ye may be also."

I believe that the general opinion among the learned doctors of the church, and among Christian professors, 'respecting the "' many mansions "which Jesus said were in his Father's house, is, that in the immortal world of bliss and glory, there are different stations allotted to happy immortals; and that these different stations, or mansions, vary one from another, so as 'to agree with the various attainments in divine wisdom, and Christian virtue, which distinguish the characters of the saints here on earth. On the words, "many mansions," Dr. A. Clarke says,— "Though I have said before, that whither I am going, ye cannot come now, yet do not think that we shall be forever separated. I am going to that state of glory where there is not only a state of supreme eminence for myself, but also places for all my disciples; various degrees of glory, suited to the various capacities and attainments of my followers." Especially does this general opinion agree with the calculations and expectations of many who look forward to the highest seats in the many mansions of the immortal state. If this general opinion concerning "the many mansions," were true, it does not follow, necessarily, that those who are here promising themselves the most favorable distinctions in that future, immortal state, have adapted their course of life to the sure attainment of their expectations. The words of Jesus give us a good lesson on such a subject: "When thou art bidden of any man to a wedding, sit not down in the highest room, lest a more honorable man than thou be bidden of him: and he that bade thee and him come and say to thee, give this man place; and thou begin with shame to take the lowest room. But when thou art bidden, go and sit down in the lowest room; that when he that bade thee cometh, he may say unto thee, Friend, go up higher; then shall thou have worship of them that sit at meat with thee." When we hear those whose whole life indicates a desire for the highest distinctions in human society, and who are incensed against any who stand in their way, eloquently pleading their claims to elevated seats in the immortal state, it is hard to make ourselves believe that they have been sufficiently schooled in the lessons of the meek and lowly Jesus.

This vain and anti-christian spirit, which seeks for distinctions hereafter, because it is not gratified to the extent of its desires here, receives a very just rebuke in what Jesus said to his disciples, when he saw the same spirit working vehemently in them. When the ten had heard the request of the two, who desired of Jesus that they might be appointed to sit on his right and left in his kingdom, and the reply which they received, we are told that they were much displeased with them. Seeing his disciples in this envious and unhappy condition, he called them to him, and said unto them, "Ye know that they which are accounted to rule over the Gentiles exercise lordship over them; and their great ones exercise authority upon them. But so shall it not be among you; but whosoever will be great among you, let him be your minister; and whosoever of you will be the chiefest, shall be servant of all." To be a minister, in the sense of this text, is to be a servant, as the words of Jesus show, where he says, enforcing his precept by his example, "Even as the Son of Man came not to be ministered unto, but to minister, and to give his life a ransom. for many." How do this spirit and these teachings of the divine Master agree with this prevailing and vanity-feeding doctrine of our times?

Again; allowing that Jesus spoke of the immortal state, when he told his disciples that there are many mansions in his Father's house, on what authority do we rest the opinion, that these many mansions are all one above another? A house which should contain many rooms, and all one above another, would display a singular taste, present no architectural symmetry, nor any adaptation to convenience. There are no intimations in the Scripture, where we find the account of these many mansions, that they form such a grotesque edifice. No; this monstrous building, this huge temple of pride, is the work of human imagination, set to work by vanity, to build her an habitation.

But it is time to call in question the reference of these "many mansions," to the immortal state. To take this reference for granted, without due examination, is not doing the subject or ourselves justice. Where is this house of God, which Jesus calls his Father's house, in which are many mansions? Shall we find it in the immortal state, or shall we find it here on earth? Look carefully at what Jesus said: "In my Father's house are many mansions; if it were not so, I would have told you. I go to prepare a place for you. And if I go and prepare a place for you, I will come again, and receive you unto myself; that where I am ye may be also." It was necessary for Jesus to go away, and to pass through the scene of sufferings and death, which was required for the fulfilment of the prophecies concerning him, and by which he entered into his kingdom, or glory; as he spoke to the two who were going to Emmaus, after he rose from the dead, saying, "O fools, and slow of heart to believe all that the prophets have spoken; ought not Christ to have suffered these things, and to enter into his glory?" Had not Jesus left his disciples, and passed through this scene, the gospel kingdom could not have been set up in our world, nor the church established on earth. Is not this kingdom of God, this church of God, that house, in which are many mansions? Is not this the house of which the apostle speaks to the Hebrews?—"But Christ as a Son over his own house; whose house are we, if we hold fast the confidence and the rejoicing of the hope firm unto the end." Again, in the same epistle: "Having, therefore, brethren, boldness to enter the holiest by the blood of Jesus, by a new and living way, which he hath consecrated for us through the vail, that is to say, his flesh; and having an high-priest over the house of God, let us draw near with a true heart, in full assurance of faith." Of the same house of God the apostle speaks to Timothy: "That thou mayest know how thou oughtest to behave thyself in the house of God, which is the church of the living God, the pillar and ground of the truth." Again, in his epistle to the Ephesians, he says, "Now, therefore, ye are no more strangers and foreigners; but fellow-citizens with the saints, and of the household of God; and are built upon the foundation of the apostles and prophets, Jesus Christ himself being the chief corner-stone; in whom all the building, fitly framed together, groweth unto an holy temple in the Lord, in whom ye also are build together for an habitation of God through the spirit." St. Peter thus speaks of this house of God: "For the time is come that judgment must begin at the house of God; and if it first begin at us, what shall the end be of them that obey not the gospel of God?" It seems that there can be no question but this is the house of which Jesus spoke to his disciples, in which are many mansions; and into which he received them when he came, according to his promise. This was at the day of Pentecost when the Holy Spirit, the blessed Comforter, was so abundantly given. Then did the disciples of Jesus enter with him into the place he had prepared for them. Then did he come and receive them unto himself; and where he was, there were they. All this agrees with the prayer which Jesus offered to his Father. He said, "Father, I will that they also whom thou hast given me be with me where I am; that they may behold my glory which thou hast given me." That it was not necessary for the disciples of Jesus to go into the immortal state to be with him and to behold his glory, appears from another passage in the same prayer: "I pray not that thou shouldest take them out of the world, but that thou shouldest keep them from the evil."

That Jesus meant the same thing by his coming again to his disciples, and the coming' of the Holy Spirit, is evident. In the same communication in which he spoke of preparing a place for his disciples, and of coming to receive them to himself, that they might be with him, he said, "If ye love me, keep my commandments; and I will pray the Father, and he shall give you another comforter, that he may abide with you forever — even the spirit of truth; whom the world cannot receive, because it seeth him not; but ye know him, for he dwelleth in you, and shall be in you. I will not leave you comfortless; I will come unto you." Again, in the same communication, he says, "If a man love me, he will keep my words; and my Father will love him, and we will come unto him, and make our abode with him." When Jesus commissioned his disciples to go into all the world and preach the gospel to every creature, he promised to be with them, even unto the end of the world.

In the church of Christ here in this world, in the kingdom of Christ here on earth, in this house of God, are many mansions, allotments, or official appointments. It is evident that Jesus delivered the discourse, in which he spoke to his disciples of the many mansions which are in his Father's house, but a short time after he saw the workings of envy and strife among them, on the occasion of the request of James and John to sit, one on the right hand, and the other on the left hand of Jesus, in his kingdom. And though he did not assume the right to make the appointments desired, he indicated, by his reply, that such appointments would be made by his Father. It seems not improbable, therefore, that when he spoke of the many mansions in his Father's house, he designed to quiet the minds of his disciples, by giving them to understand that there were suitable allotments for them all; and that they had no occasion to be troubled in relation to their future stations, or employments, as his servants, and as servants of his church. That these appointments would be sufficiently honorable, Jesus gave them full assurance in his reply to Peter's question respecting what they were to receive for their having forsaken all and followed him. In his reply, he said, "Verily I say unto you, that ye which have followed me, in the regeneration, when the Son of man shall sit in the throne of his glory, ye also shall sit upon twelve thrones, judging the twelve tribes of Israel."

The account which Luke gives of this saying of Jesus, is found in such a connection with what he informs us of the strife which the disciples manifested on the question, which of them should be greatest, as to show, very clearly, that it was designed to quiet their minds in relation to the subject of their strife: "And there was also a strife among them, which of them should be accounted the greatest. And he said unto them, The kings of the Gentiles exercise lordship over them; and they that exercise authority upon them are called benefactors. But ye shall not be so; but he that is greatest among you, let him be as the younger; and he that is chief, as he that doth serve. For whether is greater, he that sitteth at meat, or he that serveth? Is not he that sitteth at meat? But I am among you as he that serveth. Ye are they which have continued with me in my temptations; and I appoint unto you a kingdom, as my Father hath appointed unto me; that ye may eat and drink at my table in my kingdom, and sit on thrones, judging the twelve tribes of Israel." That the kingdom of Jesus and his disciples, here spoken of, is the same as that of which we read in Daniel, which should succeed the four monarchies of the earth, I believe none will doubt. These thrones were not one over another, according to the merits or attainments of those who should sit on them; but were according to the divine appointment of him who alone could furnish such gifts to his church. These gifts are spoken of by St. Paul in his epistle to the Ephesians: "But unto every one of us is given grace according to the measure of the gift of Christ. Wherefore he saith, when he ascended up on high, he led captivity captive, and gave gifts unto men. And he gave some apostles; and some prophets; and some evangelists; and some pastors, and teachers; for the perfecting of the saints, for the work of the ministry, for the edifying of the body of Christ." Also of these gifts and appointments in the church, the same apostle speaks to the Corinthians, thus: "Now ye are the body of Christ, and members in particular. And God hath set some in the church, first, apostles; secondly, prophets; thirdly, teachers; after that, miracles; then gifts of healing, helps, governments, diversities of tongues." This subject, the same apostle has set forth in his epistle to the Romans, in a manner to give suitable and needed admonition: "For I say, through the grace given unto me, to every man that is among you, not to think of himself more highly than he ought to think; but to think soberly, according as God hath dealt to every man the measure of faith. For as we have many members in one body, and all members have not the same office; so we, being many, are one body in Christ, and every one members one of another. Having then gifts, differing according to the grace given to us, whether prophecy, let us prophesy according to the proportion of faith; or ministry, let us wait on our ministering; or he that teacheth, on teaching; or he that exhorteth, on exhortation; he that giveth, let him do it with simplicity; he that ruleth, with diligence; he that showeth mercy, with cheerfulness."

To whom would Christians, of the present day, assign a more important station in the church than to the apostle of the Gentiles? Was his station given him as a recompense of previous merit? This none will pretend. God gave to his church this gift of an apostle according to his own will and wisdom. And though there were none in the church more eminent than he, there were none who excelled him in humility, or in faithfully serving the church. And here it is of importance that we should be sensible of the fact, that no one of these appointments, or allotments in this house of God, this church of the living God, this pillar and ground of truth, was bestowed on any one as a reward of merit; but that they were, as the apostle says, "according to the grace that is given to us: but unto every one of us is given grace according to the measure of the gift of Christ. Now there are diversities of gifts, but the same spirit. And there are diversities of administrations, but the same Lord. And there are diversities of operations, but it is the same God which worketh all in all. But the manifestation of the spirit is given to every man to profit withal. For to one is given by the spirit the word of wisdom; to another, the word of knowledge by the same spirit; to another, faith by the same spirit; to another, the gift of healing by the same spirit; to another, the working of miracles; to another, prophecy; to another, discerning of spirits; to another, diverse kinds of tongues; to another, the interpretation of tongues; but all these worketh that one and self-same spirit, dividing to every man severally as he will."

To the foregoing considerations, it is of importance to add, that in all the representations of the kingdom and reign of the Messiah, which are found in the writings of the prophets, the whole scene is laid in this world; nor is there found, in the whole of the Scriptures, any description of his reigning with his saints in the future, immortal state. Observe the song of the redeemed: "Thou art worthy to take the book, and to open the seals thereof; for thou wast slain, and hast redeemed us to God by thy blood, out of every kindred, and tongue, and people, and nation, and hast made us unto our God kings and priests; and we shall reign on the earth." This agrees with Daniel's declaration: "And the kingdom and dominion, and the greatness of the kingdom under the whole heaven, shall be given to the people of the saints of the Most High, whose kingdom is an everlasting kingdom, and all dominions shall serve and obey him."

Having thus endeavored to set forth the true meaning of the house of God, and the many mansions of that house, I will close this article by expressing my fervent desire, that we, who are employed as servants in this house, may constantly realize that it is a place which Jesus has, through his sufferings and death, prepared for us, that he is with us, showing to us his glory. And that we may remember, at all times, those teachings and admonitions of the divine Master designed to subdue that vanity and pride which strive for nothing, save who shall be greatest.

Joseph Smith, History of The Church of Jesus Christ of Latter-day Saints, 7 vols., introduction and notes by B. H. Roberts, 6:, p.365

My text is on the resurrection of the dead, which you will find in the 14th chapter of John—"In my Father's house are many mansions." It should be—"In my Father's kingdom are many kingdoms," in order that ye may be heirs of God and joint-heirs with me. I do not believe the Methodist doctrine of sending honest men and noble-minded men to hell, along with the murderer and the adulterer. They may hurl all their hell and fiery billows upon me, for they will roll off me as fast as they come on. But I have an order of things to save the poor fellows at any rate, and get them saved; for I will send men to preach to them in prison and save them if I can.

There are mansions for those who obey a celestial law, and there are other mansions for those who come short of the law, every man in his own order. There is baptism, &c., for those to exercise who are alive, and baptism for the dead who die without the knowledge of the Gospel.

I am going on in my progress for eternal life. It is not only necessary that you should be baptized for your dead, but you will have to go through all the ordinances for them, the same as you have gone through to save yourselves. There will be 144,000 saviors on Mount Zion, and with them an innumerable host that no man can number. Oh! I beseech you to go forward, go forward and make your calling and your election sure; and if any man preach any other Gospel than that which I have preached, he shall be cursed; and some of you who now hear me shall see it, and know that I testify the truth concerning them.

John Angell James (1785-1859): British Congregational Minister High State Of Religion In World, Exalted State Of Honor & Happiness In World To Come; Different Degrees Of Glory In Celestial Kingdom
The Church in Earnest

As another inducement to earnestness, may be mentioned the certain connection between a high state of religion in this world, and an exalted state of honor and happiness in the world to come; or, in other words, the different degrees of glory in the celestial kingdom. We are too much accustomed to conceive of heaven and hell as places where the happy inhabitants of the one, and the miserable criminals of the other, will be, respectively, all upon a level; the one all equally happy, and the other all equally wretched. This is neither the doctrine of Scripture, nor the deduction of reason.

If we consult the Word of God, we find it declared, in reference to the wicked, that "The servant which knew his Lord's will, and prepared not himself, nor did according to his will, shall be beaten with many stripes. But he that knew not, and did commit things worthy of stripes, shall be beaten with few stripes. For unto whomsoever much is given, of him shall be much required." Luke xii. 47. So again it is said by the apostle, "Be not deceived; God is not mocked; for whatsoever a man soweth, that shall he also reap." Gal. vi. 7. "He which soweth sparingly, shall reap sparingly; and he which soweth bountifully, shall reap also bountifully." 2 Cor. ix. 6. Now the By all the worth of the immortal soul, then — by all the blessings of eternal salvation — by all the glories of the upper world — by all the horrors of the bottomless pit — by all the ages of eternity, and by all the personal interest you have in these infinite realities,

I conjure you to be in earnest in personal religion. Solemn truth conveyed in this language, is this — that man's life is the seed-time for eternity — and that as here he is always sowing, so he will hereafter be always reaping; and that the harvest, both as to the kind and the quantity, will be according to the seed. They that sow good seed will have, some thirty, some sixty, and some a hundred fold, according to the quantity sown; while they who sow the seed of bad things will also have a harvest regulated by their seed, both in its quality and amount. God's rule of reward and punishment is a law of proportion. True it is, that in the case of the righteous and the wicked, there is on the part of God a different ground of procedure in reference to each, inasmuch as the punishment of the wicked is on the ground of their own desert, while the reward of the righteous is on that of Christ's merits — but this affects not the rule of distribution, since he who gives to a believer any measure of heavenly glory for the sake of Christ, may, on the same ground, give to another a far greater measure; he might do this in a way of pure sovereignty, but he has determined to do so according to the measure of holiness to which believers attain on earth.

This principle of different degrees of glory does not at all interfere with, or in the least oppose, the doctrine of justification by faith; nor does it affect the perfect happiness of the blessed in heaven. It will excite neither envy, jealousy, nor ill-will of any kind, since these passions will be all rooted out from the spirits of just men made perfect; and no other disposition, but that of perfect love to God and our fellows, will have any place in us. A being possessed of this perfect love, though the least and lowest in the scale of blessedness, would look up to all above him without the smallest taint of malevolent feeling. All will be perfectly contented, and, therefore, perfectly happy; and he who is perfectly contented knows nothing of envy; these states of mind are incompatible with each other. There may be vessels of an indefinite number of capacities, yet all may be full. Thus we can conceive of different degrees of glory, and yet no disturbance of the felicity of those who are subjects of them.

Now the law by which these varieties will be regulated will be, as we have already supposed, the attainments in personal religion, and the degrees of usefulness of Christians upon earth; and this law will help us better to conceive of the whole subject. We may imagine that every effort of vital godliness — every successful resistance of temptation — every reach after holiness — every mortification of sin — every aspiration after conformity to God — may have some effect upon the moral constitution of our nature, analogous to the exercise of our understanding or of our body, in strengthening our intellectual and corporeal frame. There may be an expansion, so to speak, of the spiritual nature, an increasing receptivity of glory and honor, ever going on, by our growth in grace on earth; the child of God may here, by his good habits in the school of Christ, and by his holy exercises, be preparing for a larger stature of the perfect man in heaven. There can be little doubt that the society of Paradise will be well compacted and orderly. There may be varieties of rank, station and employment; for aught we can tell, there may be rule, subjection and government; and therefore the different degrees of grace may be the discipline, the education, the meetness, for the different situations to be filled up, the posts to be occupied, in the celestial kingdom. There are not wanting intimations of this in the Word of God.

Besides, let it be remembered that we shall carry with us our memory to heaven, and will it be no bliss to remember what we did for God on earth, and how we attempted to serve Christ? Why, the apostle Paul felt this even on earth; and if the retrospect then afforded him such delight, how much more when he saw the results of all he did spread out before him in the celestial world! With what rapture would he there say, "I have fought a good fight, I have finished my course!" How precious would be the recollection of all his sufferings, and all his labors! How it would delight him to look back, and recall to recollection his sacrifices and his services, not in a spirit of pharisaic pride, but of deep humility, and adoring gratitude and love. There he would realize the truth of his own words, "For what is our hope or joy, or crown of rejoicing? Am not even ye in the presence of the Lord Jesus Christ at His coming? For ye are our glory and joy." 1 Thess. ii. 19. Every soul he had been the instrument of saving would be a separate jewel to enrich and adorn his diadem of glory.

Just thus will it be with all others. Memory will add to their felicities also. The whole multitude of the redeemed will remember all they did for Christ, and think of it with delight; and they who have most to think of will have most bliss in the remembrance of it. The souls which they have been the instruments of saving will all be present to swell their rapture and augment their bliss. Nor will the enjoyment stop here. The blissful reminiscence will be enhanced by a divine eulogy, for Christ will add his testimony of approbation to all they did. Even a cup of cold water shall not lose its reward, if given to a disciple in his name. He will pass over nothing. He keeps a book of remembrance of those who even flunk upon his name; and he will mark with his special and personal commendation all we have done for him; and then they who have served him best will, of course, receive most of his gracious notice and commendation.

Professors, I appeal to you, then, on this deeply interesting and important view of our subject. True it is, that to be just within the threshold of your Father's house — to occupy the lowest room, and to perform the humblest service, will be amazing and unutterable grace — but this ought not to be an excuse for indolence, an apology for lukewarmness. If it be lawful for you to long for heaven, because there you shall enjoy the presence of your Lord, it is surely lawful for you to desire to press as near to your Lord as possible; the outer circle, the distant glimpse, the remote dwelling, ought not to be enough to satisfy your desire, or fill your heart. If it be lawful for you to covet heaven at all, because you shall there serve God, surely it is lawful for you also to aspire to the honor of doing more for him than you could do in one of the lowest posts. Call not this a spiritual selfishness, or an unauthorized ambition; it is no such thing; it is a legitimate yearning of the soul after the glory to be revealed. This, this, is your business on earth, you are training for heaven; this is your work in the church militant, to be preparing for some post and place in the church triumphant. Is not this enough to make you in earnest? Can you believe this, and not be in earnest? Awake — arouse — put aside your earthly- mindedness — mortify your corruptions! “Gird up the loins of your mind, be sober, and hope to the end, for the grace that is to be brought unto you at the revelation of Jesus Christ.” 1 Pet. i. 13.

The Different Degrees Of Glory Affirmed With Regard To The Inhabitants Of Heaven, Not Inconsistent With The Preceding Views

Perfect beatitude will be the portion of all, but it will be with that variety which lends charm and interest to the ever-varied creations of the universal God. Heaven will present an endless gradation in dignity and happiness, characterizing all the ranges of intellectual life and Divine enjoyment, from the least of all saints, up to the highest princedoms and dominions of the sky. That variety distinguishing the splendor of the stellar hosts, is the inspired similitude of the different degrees of glory in Heaven. The proper individuality and difference of character, obtaining among the good and devout of earth, will be perpetuated in Heaven. It would imply an utter reversal of all the laws of character, and a subversion of the mental and moral habitudes governing conduct and action, to suppose that Paul and John, Luther and Wesley, will present no diversity of reward and excellence in Heaven. As there are upon earth different kinds and degrees of moral worth and goodness, so in Heaven there will be similar difference in the kind and measure of reward and distinction meted to them.

Humble and illustrious worth, will be their immortal recompense and fullness of joy; but, in the case of each, it will be the expansion of the principles and elements giving birth to the distinctive classes upon earth. In Heaven, the millions of the unfallen and the redeemed, will take rank and class respectively about the throne of God, in conformity with the grade and extent of excellence, by which they are distinguished. Not unlike concentric circles around a common center, we may suppose ranks and grades to fall in and receive place and position at the hand of God, in strict adherence to the law of actual affinity with him. Moral resemblance to God and the extent of cooperation with him in the accomplishment of the Divine purposes, will be the rule of rank, and the law of relative position.

There will be many, innumerable multitudinous mansions, adjusted to the diversity of character and claim, as well as the multitude of the saved; but fullness of content and sufficiency, happiness intense and transcendent, will reign in all. We may imagine circles near, and orbits distant— greater and less nearness of access to the throne and altar — while even the very verge of the sphere is occupied by rejoicing millions. And yet all repose in the consummation of their hopes and wishes, and find the grand totality and laws of happiness the same to all and the same forever!

Introduction Of The Subject.

Few persons, I suppose, even though they may not be scientific astronomers, have refrained, under one aspect or another, from speculating on the Heavenly Bodies.

I. This, accordingly, has been the case, both in ancient and in modern times.

1. Ancient Paganism associated them with its Demonolatry or Hero-Worship: and pronounced, that the Deified Souls of the illustrious Ancestors of Mankind, in the successive antediluvian and postdiluvian Families of Adam and Noah, were translated to them; from which lofty Mansions they were held to look down upon this Sublunary World, influencing the actions and presiding over the fortunes of their posterity.

2. Hence, at a later period (for Mythology in one age becomes Romance in the next, and is finally degraded into Nursery Tales in the third), arose the fancies of Judicial Astrology: in which the Stars, according to their various positions and combinations at the birth of an individual, were thought subsequently to influence the whole of his life; and, by what was called the Calculation of his Nativity, it was even pretended to foretell the various matters which were destined to befall him.

II. These vanities are now swept away; but, still, room is left for speculations of a graver task.

Thus, when I see the wonderful precision of the Great Creator, even in the smallest objects, and when I cannot but discern the admirable adaptation of every minute particular to its own proper end; I feel it impossible to believe, that the probable Innumerability of Spheres, scattered through boundless Space, can all, by Supreme Wisdom, have been created, for absolutely no other purpose, than, with something like the [two Greek words] of Eschylus, bootlessly to twinkle forth their unfruitful inutility; I feel it impossible to believe (unless, indeed, there be some of those spheres as yet only in the progress of what may be called Geologic Formation), that their collective character, unlike the particular character of our own Planet, is that of containing only antres vast and deserts idle; in short, I cannot bring myself to believe, that, with objectless inaptitude, they are, one and all, totally empty of Intelligences qualified to comprehend and to promote the gracious designs and wise purposes of their Benign Creator.

At the same time, when I reflect upon the Absolute Purity of God, I find it equally impossible to believe: that Evil universally prevails throughout the Whole of his Works, as we know it particularly to prevail in this single Planet of ours. Mysterious and incomprehensible as may be the Origin of Evil, I feel instinctively persuaded, that its Occurrence, as we see it here, is the Exception, not the Rule. And, on such a principle, my belief is: that, amidst Myriads of Spheres, our World is the sole Exception.

This belief of mine is not purely gratuitous or arbitrary: it rests negatively on the authority of Scripture. We read not there of any Evil, save Diabolical and Human. Consequently, we have no right, or at least no ground, to assume the existence of Evil in any other Class of created Moral Agents. Through the aid of a prodigious extension of the Telescopic Power, it has now, apparently, been ascertained, that the Moon is uninhabited, and furthermore that it is in what seems to be a chaotic state: and, yet additionally, from that wonderful law of certain severally proportionate fixed intervals between the various Orbits of our Planetary System which has now been discovered to exist, it is highly probable, that the numerous small Asteroids, which revolve in nearly a common Orbit between Mars and Jupiter, are the rounded Fragments of a large Sphere, which, by the law of intervals, once subsisted between those two Planets, and which some mighty internal convulsion shattered into the small Asteroidal Fragments recently discovered by modern Science. But, in the silence of Scripture, neither of these cases can be legitimately adduced, as indicating the successive Existence and Punishment of Moral Evil in other Orbs than our own. We know not, that the Phenomena, afforded by the Moon and the Asteroids, may be any other than simply the Progress of Geologic Formation in Modes either similar or dissimilar to that which has characterised our Earth: and, certainly, a World or Worlds in the mere Progress of Material or Mechanical Arrangements, if such be the case with those Heavenly Bodies, can afford, in the silence of Scripture, simply and per se, no valid proof either of the past or of the present Existence of Moral Evil within their several limits.

How, then, are we to view the stupendous multitudes of those Spheres, whether planetary or stellar, which Astronomy reveals to us?

What are they?

For what purpose were they created?

When questions such as these occupy my mind, I recollect the authoritative saying of our Lord: In My Father's House Are Many Mansions. And, forthwith, I am involuntarily led to ask: Can these Many Mansions be the Many Spheres? Have we any well grounded analogy, from which we may argue onward? Can the House of the Father, which contains these Many Mansions, be any other, than the Immense Mundane House of God, the Real Temple of the Omnipresent?

Plainly, the Mansions, or, as the strictly correspondent Original runs, are no mere Temporary or Occasional Dwellings; but Fixed and Definite Abodes: nor yet are they Abodes simply; but Abodes, as the context shows, of Holy and Blessed Intelligences.

III. It has been thought that the imagery, employed by Christ, has been borrowed from the numerous small Chambers or Mansions, which were attached to the outer wall of both the Temple and the Oracle round about.

This is not improbable: but the context shows, that the Mansions, of which our Lord spoke, must, literally, be sought for elsewhere; that they are upon a far larger scale; and that they belong to a far more ample House of God. I go, said he, to prepare a Place for you. So spake he to his Disciples, when about to depart from them. But, assuredly, the promised Place could not be one of the small Chambers attached to the Jewish Temple.

Doubtless, it is one of the many Mansions in the true House of the Father. If, then, one of the many Mansions, now unprepared, is, in God's own appointed time, hereafter to be prepared, for his Faithful People: analogy seems to require, that the others of these many Mansions, all of them, at least, that are now prepared, should have similar tenants. But what can these similar tenants be, similar in holiness and similar in happiness, save the various Armies and Hierarchies of the Blessed Angels: those Angels, respecting whom our Lord says, that, hereafter, we shall be like them and equal to them?

I may add: that, when Christ spoke of Many Mansions in the House of his Father, he used language which would convey ideas familiar to the Jews. They did, indeed, preposterously distort such ideas, that so an agreement might be produced with the numerical precision of their Cabala: but, still, the ideas were there. In Paradise, say the Rabbins, there are Seven Mansions, which are each twelve thousand miles long, ten thousand miles broad, and ten thousand miles high<sup>1</sup>. This is mere grotesque: but, still, grotesque may overlay a germ of truth.

IV. For such opinions as I have stated, is there any warrant in Scripture, beyond an inference from our Saviour's declaration, that in his Father's House are many Mansions?

I think there is. But, still, I would here take my stand. With the Church of England, I maintain: that nothing is, bindingly, to be received and believed as an Article of Faith, unless it can be proved by most certain warrants of Holy Scripture.

No doubt, there may be a difference of opinion, as to whether my Views can, or can not, be thus substantiated: but the sound Protestant Principle itself remains unaltered. If the Proof from Scripture breaks down, let the whole be rejected as the Baseless Fabric of a Vision: or, should this be deemed too summary and severe, let it be estimated as nothing more than a Decent Probability unproved by Scripture.

Chapter II

The Probable Origination Of Our Lord's Phraseology Touching Certain Many Mansions In The House Of His Father

I Have briefly remarked: that our Lord's Phraseology, when he says In my Father's House are many Mansions, has been not improbably thought to refer, in the way of Poetical Machinery (if I may so speak), to the numerous small Chambers or Mansions which were attached to the outer wall of the Temple and its Oracle.

Should the reality of such an allusion to the particular construction of the Temple at Jerusalem be admitted, the allusion itself will tend, somewhat curiously, to establish the ideal sense of the Declaration which I have taken as the basis of the present Work.

I. To say nothing of the several Galleries which appear to have surrounded the Courts, many different Booms, story above story, were built exteriorly against the wall of the Temple itself, so as in a measure to encompass it.

Respecting these Chambers, which were the concomitants of the House of God; or, rather indeed, which were distinct, though constituent, parts and parcels of it, as one great Collective Whole: respecting these Chambers it might be truly said, that, in that House or Temple of the Father, were Many Mansions, appropriated to different purposes, and occupied by various Orders of his Sacerdotally Ministering Attendants.

To such Mansions, then, in the particular House of the Father at Jerusalem, let us suppose our Lord to have alluded in his memorable Declaration: that, in the general House of the Father which is identical (as the Jews understood it) with the Mundane Temple of the Universe, there are many Mansions, one of which he would prepare, in due season, for his Faithful People of the Human Race.

II. Now, so far as we can gather from Josephus and Philo, it seems to have been the established belief of the Levitical Church: that, in point of Designed Ideality, the Temple, taken in its largest acceptation, symbolised the Entire Universe.

1. Josephus, for instance, makes out the case by an adduction of many very curious particulars.

Thus, he distinctly tells us: not only that the Four Elements were represented by the Four Colours which entered into the embroidery of the Veil, but likewise that the "Whole Aspect of the Heavens, by which phrase (as the context shows) he means the Collective Appearance of the Stars, was graphically represented or depicted upon it; save only (which is the context referred to) that no figures of any living creatures, after the manner in which the Constellations are classed on the Mythological Sphere of the Greeks, were there employed.

Thus, again, the Seven then known Planets were understood to be represented by the Seven Lights of the Golden Candlestick.

Thus, furthermore, the Twelve Loaves on the Table of Shew-Bread shadowed out the Twelve Monthly Signs through which the Sun zodiacally passes.

Thus, likewise, the Thirteen Perfumes of the Censer, gathered from both Sea and Land, that is, from the Whole World Habitable and Uninhabitable, denoted: that the Entire Universe was constructed and devoted to the glory of God.

Thus, again, sub-inclusively, the Official Dress of the High-Priest respected, in its arrangement, the System of the World.

And thus, finally, the Three Divisions of the Tabernacle, or Ambulatory Temple, shadowed out the Three Divisions of the Universe: Earth, Sea, and Heaven<sup>1</sup>.

2. In like manner, Philo the Jew, at great length, gives the same account of the symbolical import of the Temple and its various Constituent Parts<sup>2</sup>.

I need not repeat from him, what I have already said from Josephus. Yet I may fitly remark: that, precisely in the same manner as the Inspired Author of the Epistle to the Hebrews, Philo builds the opinion of himself and his countrymen, on the charge, delivered by God to his servant Moses, that the Tabernacle or Moveable Temple should be constructed according to the Celestial Pattern shown to him in the Mount<sup>3</sup>. Nor yet must I here omit to subjoin Philo's own distinct and condensed statement of the Symbolic Principle, which entered into the very heart of that opinion.

It was Necessary, says he, that they, who prepared a Temple made with hands, for the Father and Ruler of the Universe, should employ substances<sup>8</sup>, similar and correspondent to those according to which he created the Whole World.

III. Purely, then, as a Matter of Fact, such were the ideas prevalent among the Jews: and I cannot but think, that St. Paul manifestly refers to them, and thence, by approbatively referring, confirms them, in his Epistle to the Hebrews.

There is, in particular, one place of this Epistle, which seems even verbally decisive.

The Apostle tells us: that the First or Levitical Covenant had, not only ordinances of Divine Service, but likewise a Worldly or Mundane Sanctuary.

I use the explanatory word Mundane, because the ambiguous term Worldly, employed by our English Translators, has here no relation to what we call Worldly-Mitidedness. On the contrary, it imports what we unambiguously express by the terms, Mundane and Cosmical.

St. Paul enters not, indeed, into the minuteness of particular detail, which characterises the parallel accounts given by Josephus and Philo: but, still, we distinctly learn from his exposition, that the Holy of Holies in the Temple represented that Heaven, which is specially marked by the more immediately revealed presence of the Father, and by the entrance into it of our great High-Priest the Son.

From this declared symbolical character of one part of the Temple, it plainly follows, by virtue of an inevitable homogeneity, that the other parts of the Collective Temple, the Courts and Porticos, to wit, which, jointly with the Naos, constituted the entire Hieron, represented, severally, in agreement with the recorded Doctrine of the ancient Jews, the various subordinate Parts of the Entire Universe<sup>1</sup>.

IV. I incline to think, that the same Idealism pervades the Machinery of the Apocalypse: for the language of St. Paul acts very much as a sort of key to the descriptions of St. John.

It has been often justly remarked, but by no commentator more copiously than Sir Isaac Newton, that the entire Apocalyptic Picture of Heaven is borrowed from the Temple. In fact, the very name of Temple is, more than once, expressly given to the Heaven which St. John beheld in vision. I may add, that the original word in Hebrew denotes either a Temple or a Palace: and the ground of such a peculiarity is, that the Temple is the Palace of the Great King, the miniature symbol of that true and larger Palace of God, the Universe. Hence the Temple is called the House of God: and, in the mimic ideality of Paganism, the Temple of an Idol-God was denominated his House.

But, with St. Paul's statement in our hands, we must not limit the Temple or Hieron, taken in its full extent, to what the Apostle calls the Mundane Sanctuary. Viewed in reference to its Courts, that is to say, viewed as the entire Hieron, it plainly enough takes in the whole World. The Naos, or Temple proper, is, as I have remarked above, the special Palace of the Great King: but, throughout the Apocalypse, the Hieron comprehends, apparently, the Whole Universe, or, at least, the Universe of our own Planet. Thus, Every creature, which is in Heaven and on the Earth and under the Earth, and such as are in the Sea, and All that are in them, are described, as jointly taking part, with the Angels and the Cherubic Animals and the Elders, in the Song to God and the Lamb, and therefore as present with them in the same vast Collective Hieron. Thus also, while the Naos or Proper Temple of God in Heaven is reserved for his measured or faithful worshippers, the Outer Court, which was comprehended in the circuit of the Hieron, is given to a race of idolatrous Gentiles that so they should even tread the Holy City under foot.

Such phraseology compels us to extend the mystical Apocalyptic Temple far beyond the Naos or Mundane Sanctuary or Peculiar Heaven of God. Taking that Temple in its broadest sense of the TLieron, we seem compelled, agreeably to the Cabala of the ancient Jews, to make it co-extensive with the Universe. All Creatures, whatever be their Locality, join, as actually present, in the Universal Song of Praise. But this could not be, unless All Creatures were viewed, as comprehended within the Hieron, though not admitted into the very Adytum of God, the Naos or Mundane Sanctuary. In other words, this could not be, unless the Entire Temple at Jerusalem was the Image and shadow of that large and true Temple which is co-extensive with the Universe. As Philo speaks, we must deem the Whole World God's highest and truest Temple<sup>1</sup>.

V. If, then, we be warranted in supposing, that the peculiar phraseology of our Lord, like the palpably intelligible Machinery of the Apocalypse, referred allusively to the Ideal Construction of the Temple at Jerusalem, I need scarcely remark, when the confirmed opinion of the ancient Jews is taken into consideration, how decisively it establishes the correctness of the view, which I am led to take of the Many Mansions in the House of the Father.

Different Degrees of Glory

Grace Gems Website

My dear friends, I now propose to discuss the question of different degrees of glory.

The FELICITY OF HEAVEN, set forth in general terms, will consist of the absence of all evil, both natural and moral, such as sin, and all its bitter fruits—death, disease, labor, care, sorrow, and pain; and the presence of all good suited to man as a rational, moral, social, and immortal creature, such as the perfect holiness of his nature, the presence of God in Christ, the society and converse of blessed spirits, and that service and honor which God may appoint to the holy inhabitants of the place. A question arises, Will these inhabitants be equal in all respects in honor and felicity? I do not think.

All real Christians will be in heaven, and possess in substance its chief felicity—as well they who are converted on a death-bed; as they who yield themselves to God in their youth; as well the believer who lives and dies in unmolested ease, as the martyr—all will be equal as to their deliverance from every kind of evil; all will be with Christ, see God face to face, and be perfectly happy—but still there will be circumstances connected with their heavenly state, that will raise some higher in the scale of splendor and blessedness than others.

While, therefore, there will be many things in which the felicity of the redeemed will be COMMON—it will be common in its object, the blessed God and the adorable Redeemer; in its subject, all the powers of the glorified body and soul; in its duration, which will be eternal; in its security, since all will be sustained by the Divine faithfulness; and in the full satisfaction of soul, which each, according to its capacity, will possess.

Yet there will be some peculiarities and DISTINCTIONS attaching to the more eminent servants of God. We may not be, and indeed are not, able to say with precision and in all things, in what these peculiarities consist—but we know that they will exist. We can conceive of a larger capacity for happiness in some than in others, just as there is a greater capacity for enjoyment in a man than in a child, or in one man than in another; yet all will be perfectly happy, according to their powers of receptivity. Vessels may be of various measures, yet all full. Heaven may consist of a graduated scale of rank, station, and service; yes, doubtless will; and one glorified spirit may be fitted for a higher post, a more important service, than another. Hence we can conceive, how perfection in all, can accord with variety, and even different degrees.

I will now consider the principle on which this difference will proceed, and by which it will be regulated. It will not be a capricious arrangement, a mere arbitrary appointment—nothing that God does, either in nature, providence, or grace, is of this character. Everything he does, he performs according to the counsel of his will; there is a reason for everything, a principle according to which everything is done. Now this applies to the case before us. In allotting to some a higher degree than others in glory, God proceeds on some principle, and what is it? Not worldly rank; some subjects and paupers will probably be higher in heaven than their monarchs. Not literary or scientific renown; some uneducated rustics may be elevated above scholars and philosophers. Not even success in converting souls to God, if it be unattended with a proportionate degree of pure motive and consistent piety; some obscure but eminently holy ministers, will have a brighter crown, than others whose popularity God may in a way of sovereignty employ for extensive usefulness.

Character, conduct, motives—as known to the omniscient God, will be the rule. We cannot find a better, a more intelligible representation of the subject, than the one usually employed, "Degrees of glory in heaven, will be proportioned to degrees of grace on earth."

We now see an obvious difference among God's people. There are some who are called in the morning of their existence, and who spend a long life in the service of God—while others called by grace at the last hour of life. There are some whose circumstances of ease and comfort call for little sacrifice or self-denial—while others follow Christ to beatings, imprisonment, and death. There are some, who though really regenerated, make little progress in sanctification, and evince so many imperfections, and so much worldly-mindedness, as to render their profession doubtful and suspicious—while others, who have overcome the world by faith in a most conspicuous manner, and by their eminently holy and consistent conduct, bring much glory to God. There are some who are grudging, indolent, or money-loving—while others are liberal, self-denying, and laborious. Now I contend that according to these differences on earth—there will be corresponding differences in heaven.

The PROOF of differing degrees of glory, will be found in the following arguments.

1. It is set forth in the following scriptures. Even the Old Testament asserts the fact. "Those who are wise shall shine as the brightness of the skies, and those who turn many to righteousness as the stars forever and ever," Dan. 12:3.
2. Our Lord, in his sermon on the Mount, encourages his persecuted followers to endure, by this consideration, "Great is your reward in heaven," Matt. 5:12. See also Matt. 10:41-42, "He who receives a prophet in the name of a prophet, shall receive a prophet's reward; and he who receives a righteous man in the name of a righteous man, shall receive a righteous man's reward. And whoever shall give to drink unto one of these little ones a cup of cold water only in the name of a disciple, verily I say unto you, he shall never lose his reward."
3. The parable of the pounds, Luke 19:12, teaches the same fact—the good trader with ten pounds, gained rule over ten cities; and the diligent possessor of five pounds, gained five cities.
4. In speaking of the righteous at the last day, the apostle says, as "one star differs from another star in glory, so also is the resurrection of the dead," 1 Cor. 15:41. The applicability of this passage, I know, has been disputed; and it has been considered as intended only to set forth the contrast between the earthly body, and the resurrection one; but this can I think hardly be sustained; there may be differences of magnitude between the stars—but no contrasts. Nor can the apostle mean to limit the difference to the degrees of bodily glory—but to set forth the varied distinctions of splendor of every kind, with which the righteous will appear at the last day.

To the same effect, are all those passages which speak of the rewards of the final judgment, when "every man shall receive the things done in the body, according to that he has done, whether it be good or bad," 2 Cor. 5:10; Rev. 22:12. How decisive is the language of the apostle, Gal. 6:7-9, "Be not deceived; God is not mocked—for whatever a man sows, that also shall he reap. For he who sows to his flesh shall of the flesh reap corruption; but he who sows to the Spirit, shall of the Spirit reap life everlasting. And let us not be weary in well doing; for in due season we shall reap, if we faint not." "This I say, He which sows sparingly shall reap also sparingly; and he which sows bountifully shall reap also bountifully," 2 Cor. 9:6. How clear and how impressive are such statements, that our life is a seed-time for eternity; that all our conduct is the seed sown, and that the harvest will be according to the seed we sow—in kind, quality, and quantity.

I now subjoin other considerations to prove the fact of different degrees of glory:

1. There will be certainly different degrees of misery and disgrace in hell, as is evident from Luke 12:47, Rom. 2:6-16. And why not, then, different degrees of felicity and honor in heaven? Observe the manner in which the apostle speaks of the different rewards of the ministers of the gospel in 1 Cor. 3, "Every man shall receive his own reward according to his own labor. If any man's work shall abide which he has built thereupon, he shall receive a reward. If any man's work shall be burned, he shall suffer loss—but he himself shall be saved; yet so as by fire." If this be true of ministers, it is no less so of all professors.

2. But this appears equally clear, if we consider the nature of those things of which our heavenly felicity will consist. Part of our happiness will arise from the recollection of what we have done for Christ. Memory will supply much of both the torment of hell, and the felicity of heaven—and they who have most to remember will be most happy. Our future happiness or misery will thus, in a great measure, arise out of our conduct here. Every holy action will be the seed of felicity. Did not Paul, when drawing near his end, look back with delight and gratitude, yet with humility, upon his apostolic life, when he exultingly exclaimed, "I have fought a good fight, I have finished my course, I have kept the faith," 2 Tim. 4:7. And if such joy was lawful and proper then, what will be the delight of looking back from heaven upon a life of service upon earth; of retracing all the way in which Divine grace has led, sustained, and sanctified us; of reviewing our temptations, conflicts, and triumphs! And this joy will be in proportion to the cause which produces it.
3. Another part of our felicity will arise from the approbation of God and Christ. This is evident from his representation of the solemnities of judgment, Matt. 25. How blissful to see HIM smile upon us! To hear HIM say, "You have done it unto ME. Well done, my good and faithful servant. Well done. I saw every action of piety, every struggle with temptation, every tear of penitence, every gift of property, every expression of sympathy with a suffering brother, every labor, and every sacrifice. I know your works, and now I reward them by this public testimony." How rich a reward! And of course it must be in proportion to the conduct which will secure it.
4. Another source of our celestial bliss will be the proofs and the fruits of our usefulness in the cause of God, and of immortal souls. The misery of the wicked in hell will arise, in no small degree, from seeing around them, in that world of despair, those whom they had led there by their evil principles, active effort, and seductive example. By a similar law, the felicity of the saints in heaven will receive everlasting accessions from hearing the songs, and witnessing the raptures of those whom they were the honored instruments in saving from death and conducting to glory. What must be the heaven of such men as Whitefield and Wesley, and of other less distinguished servants of Christ, in beholding before the throne so many whom it was their unutterable privilege to lead there!
5. Not dissimilar in kind, though of course less in degree, will be the joy of all who lay out their property, spend their time, or sacrifice their ease, endeavoring to increase the number of the saints, and thus people the realms of glory with redeemed spirits. Surely, surely, there must be an honor and a bliss in reserve for the eminently zealous, devoted, and self-denying—which will not be experienced in the same degree by those who do little for Christ.

Do not all these considerations, then, sustain the fact that there are different degrees of glory in heaven? Can we conceive of heaven without it? Does it not prove itself to every man's judgment? In every community on earth, from a family to a state—there are different services, and different posts, which must be sustained by various people, according to their various degrees and kinds of fitness—and why should it be otherwise in heaven? They, surely, form an inaccurate, low, and unworthy idea of that blessed world, who consider it only as a place where all are in every respect alike—all are equal, and all pursue an unvarying sameness of occupation.

It is of vast importance to connect, at any rate the idea of state, with that of place; and to remember that repentance, faith, and holiness, are not so much a condition of heaven—as a preparation for it. Regeneration is the commencement of glorification. Sanctification is the fitness for glorification.

I come now to answer the OBJECTIONS which some who have not well considered the subject sometimes bring against it.

Objection 1

Is it not opposed to the parable of the laborers hired to go into the vineyard, all of whom received the same wages, whether hired at the third or the eleventh hour? Matt. 20.

I answer,

this parable had nothing to do with the subject; its design being, not to represent the distribution of rewards and punishments in a future state—but the calling of the Gentiles to become fellow-heirs with the Jews, in the same church state and gospel privileges.

Objection 2

Does it not set aside salvation by grace, and justification by faith without works?

I answer,

Certainly not. The matter may be stated thus. Nothing performed by a creature, however pure, can merit eternal life. God may freely lay himself under an obligation to reward the obedience of a holy creature with everlasting life, and his so doing may be fit and worthy of him. Man having sinned, the promised good is forfeited, and death becomes the only reward of which he is worthy. God, having designs of mercy, notwithstanding, towards rebellious creatures, sent forth his Son to obey and suffer in their place, resolving to bestow eternal life on all who believe in him, as the reward of his undertaking. God not only accepts of all who believe in his Son for his sake—but their services also. There can be no rewardable action done by us at all, until we have believed in Christ, and are justified without works; and even then the different degrees of reward that follow, are all granted for the sake of Christ. It is not the result of any worthiness in us—but of Christ's merits. It is therefore a reward wholly of grace, and not of debt, from first to last. "I am persuaded this view of the subject, while it excludes all boasting, affords the greatest possible encouragement to be constant, unmoveable, always abounding in the work of the Lord." (Fuller)

Objection 3

If there are different degrees of glory, will not this be a source of envy and jealousy?

I answer,

It would, if we carried our present imperfections to heaven; but in a world of perfect love to God, and perfect love to our fellows, these passions cannot exist. Heaven will be so full of love, as to leave no room for anything else to live there. Nor can I conceive of a higher, nor indeed, in such a state, of a lower exercise of this God-like feeling, than to rejoice in the Divine award, which elevates to a degree of glory above us, those whom we shall then perceive and acknowledge to be more fit for it.

Objection 4

If all are perfect, it may be said, how can there be different degrees?

I answer,

All are perfect according to their capacity—but all have not the same capacity. Two diamonds may be of the same purity and brilliancy, yet they may be of different sizes and value.

"I have often," says a devout writer, "represented it to my own thoughts under this comparison. Here is a race appointed; here are a thousand different prizes purchased by some prince, to be bestowed on the racers, and the prince himself gives them food and wine according to what proportion he pleases, to strengthen and animate them for the race. Each has a particular stage appointed for him, some of shorter, some of longer distance. When every racer comes to his own goal, he receives a prize in exact proportion to his speed, diligence, and the length of the race; and the grace and justice of the prince shine gloriously in such distribution. Not the foremost of the racers can pretend to merit the prize; for the prizes were all paid for by the prince himself; and it was he who appointed the race; and gave them strength and spirit to run—and yet there is a most equitable proportion observed in the reward, according to the labor of the race. Now this similitude represents the matter so agreeably to the apostle's way of speaking, when he compares the Christian's life to a race, 1 Cor. 9:24, Gal. 5:7, Phil. 3:14-16, 2 Tim. 4:7, Heb. 12:1, that I think it may be almost called a scriptural description of the present subject." This representation, though not perfectly parallel to the case before us, as none can be, serves well enough to illustrate the subject.

A question has sometimes been asked, "Whether it is proper to hold up this subject as a motive to Christian diligence?" Why should it be a question? How can it be doubted? Is it not so held up by our Lord and his apostles? We need not pretend nor attempt to be wiser than they. Had not Moses "respect to the recompense of the reward?" In the full conviction that I act scripturally, I propose it to you, my dear friends, as an inducement to zeal, diligence, and self-denial, in the service of the Lord. I do not abuse the doctrine, as some have done, in enumerating the peculiar virtues to which high rewards are assigned in the heavenly world, among which they reckon the monkish practices of celibacy and austerity. Nor do I enjoin a selfish, mercenary notion of merit; for I know salvation to be all of grace from first to last—nor would I check those sentiments of profound humility which lead you to feel, as well as say, that the lowest seat in heaven is infinitely more than you deserve. But I would remind you, because the Scripture does, that the greater proficiency we make in divine experimental knowledge, and in real holiness, according to the means and helps we enjoy; the greater fidelity and diligence we show in discharging the duties of our particular station as members of society, and of the church; the more laborious we are in the improvement of the talents, whether ten, five, or one, entrusted to our care; the more we abound in fruits of righteousness, and the more zealous we are in those good works for which we have opportunity and capacity; the more self-denying we are for Christ's and conscience' sake; the more steadfast we are in resisting temptations; the more we glorify God by the exercise of faith and patience in the sharpest trials; the more active, liberal, and ready we are to make sacrifices for the cause of God and the salvation of souls; the more we cultivate love to our brethren and charity to all; the more we excel in spirituality and heavenly-mindedness; and the more we clothe and adorn all our other graces with humility and meekness of mind—the greater will be our future reward, the higher we shall rise in glory, the more fitted shall we be to serve God in some exalted station in the heavenly world.

And I wish to impress the sentiment very deeply upon your minds, that this will not only be the result of gracious and equitable appointment—but that it is the tendency of superior piety itself, to prepare us for such distinctions. I believe that there is a far more close and intimate connection between a state of grace and a state of glory, than many imagine. We all need a fitness for, as well as title to, heaven—and although everyone is fit who is truly regenerated, and no others—yet the more we are sanctified, the more we are fit for some of the higher services in our Father's house; where, as well as in the church on earth, there will be use and employment for vessels of gold, as well as of silver. There are many professors whose attainments in piety are so slender; whose graces are so languid; whose religion is blended with so much worldly-mindedness; who are at so little pains to grow in grace, that if they are true Christians at heart, and should gain admission to glory—they seem to be qualified for only some low place in the kingdom of heaven.

How mighty should be the INFLUENCE upon our mind and conduct of such a subject as this! How should it check our sloth, and rouse and quicken us to all diligence and perseverance! What an impression should it give us of the importance of our present situation and our present conduct! We are fearfully made, and still more fearfully placed. Everything we do, is a seed of futurity, and must bear eternal fruit. All our actions, words, and thoughts—are ripening into heaven—or hell. Can we be insensible to the solemnity of our situation? Shall we be anxious only to grow rich for time—and neglect to grow rich for eternity? Shall we be intent only upon amassing wealth upon earth—and forget to "lay up treasure in heaven?" Shall we be eager to enlarge and improve the inheritance which is seen and temporal—and be careless about enlarging that which is incorruptible, undefiled, and which does not fade away?

Men are ambitious enough, and we perhaps are like them, to rise in the world, and to attain to secular pre-eminence—let us copy this propensity; but by faith transfer the solicitude to eternal objects, and strive to be great in the kingdom of heaven. If there be prizes of various degrees of value, why should you not contend for one of the nobler ones? Why should you not covet earnestly the best gifts? While you acknowledge, with the truest lowliness of mind, that you are unworthy to sit down on the threshold of heaven—still press forward to a seat far nearer to the Savior's throne and feet. Seek to glow and shine like the seraphim in glory, and at the same time emulate them in deep prostration of soul, under a sense of your utter unworthiness before God.

How loudly and impressively does this subject speak to you who are young professors, and who are just setting out in the Divine life. Blessed is your privilege, in being called so early into a state of grace, and thus being invited, by the sovereign mercy of God, to add to the weight and the jewels of that crown which, if you are faithful unto death, is forever to sparkle on your brow. Estimate duly your opportunity. Your future life, as regards any earthly object which you can contemplate—is but a shadow; yet as connected with the eternal world—is of unutterable importance. I will not ask, if you will spend your days in folly and sin—you have renounced these things; but I ask, will you spend your life for worldly wealth and comfort—to the neglect of growth in grace? How rich may you grow in grace here—and glory hereafter! What treasures may you lay up in heaven! Let no ordinary degree of holiness satisfy you—no small measures of piety content you. In signal devotedness and usefulness in the church militant, prepare for such service in the church triumphant, as shall display the immensity of Divine grace, and the riches of Divine power. Seek eminent holiness first, for its own sake, and the sake of God who requires it—and then you will find in the end, that eminence in grace conducts to eminence of glory!

I am decidedly of opinion that a conviction of the truth of this subject, and a habitual meditation upon it—would do much to elevate the tone of piety among Christians, and keep up, yes, greatly quicken the spirit of zeal and liberality. It is not only a depressing—but a dangerous notion to hold, that weak faith, being still true faith; and little grace, which is still real grace—that those who have but small measures of either will reach heaven as certainly, and rise as high in heaven, as those who make greater attainments. This may seem to savor of a disposition to exalt the mercy of God—but its tendency is to abuse it; and under the appearance of deep humility, to promote indolence, luke-warmness, and worldly-mindedness.

It is a ruinous and fatal experiment to try, with how little religion we can reach heaven. If it be the language of humility as it oftentimes is, with some that use it, to say, "They shall be content with the lowest seat in glory," it is, at other times, the utterance of indolence and indifference. The question, however, is not what we deserve—but what we are invited to possess. We deserve nothing but hell! But we may have not only heaven—but an abundant entrance into it. God is inviting us to seek "more grace" here, that he may lavish upon us more glory hereafter—and all he gives, will, in one sense, flow back to himself again. Those who receive most from him, will render most to him. Higher degrees of glory, while, as regards ourselves, they will enlarge our capacity for happiness, will, as regards him, prepare us in a more eminent manner to enjoy, serve, and honor him. For his sake then, as well as your own, grow in grace, that you may rise in glory!

Remarks By President Brigham Young, Made In The Bowery, Great Salt Lake City, August 26, 1860.

I will read a portion of the vision Joseph Smith and Sidney Rigdon had concerning various kingdoms that God has prepared for his subjects:-

And the glory of the celestial is one, even as the glory of the sun is one. And the glory of the terrestrial is one, even as the glory of the moon is one. And the glory of the telestial is one, even as the glory of the stars is one; for as one star differs from another star in glory, even so differs one from another in glory in the telestial world; for these are they who are of Paul, and of Apollos, and of Cephas. These are they who say they are some of one, and some of another-some of Christ, and some of John, and some of Moses, and some of Elias, and some of Esaias, and some of Isaiah, and some of Enoch; but received not the Gospel, neither the testimony of Jesus, neither the Prophets, neither the everlasting covenant. Last of all, these are all they who will not be gathered with the Saints, to be caught up unto the Church of the Firstborn, and received into the cloud. These are they who are liars, and sorcerers, and adulterers, and whoremongers, and whosoever loves and makes a lie. These are they who suffer the wrath of God on the earth. These are they who suffer the vengeance of eternal fire. These are they who are cast down to hell and suffer the wrath of Almighty God, until the fulness of times when Christ shall have subdued all enemies under his feet, and shall have perfected his work, when he shall deliver up the kingdom, and present it unto the Father spotless, saying, I have overcome and have trodden the winepress alone, even the winepress of the fierceness of the wrath of Almighty God. Then shall he be crowned with the crown of his glory, to sit on the throne of his power, to reign for ever and ever. But behold, and lo! we saw the glory and inhabitants of the telestial world, that they were as innumerable as the stars in the firmament of heaven, or as the sand upon the sea-shore; and heard the voice of the Lord, saying, These all shall bow the knee, and every tongue shall confess to Him who sits upon the throne for ever and ever; for they shall be judged according to their works; and every man shall receive, according to his own works, his own dominion, in the mansions which are prepared; and they shall be servants of the Most High: but where God and Christ dwell they cannot come, worlds without end. This is the end of the vision which we saw, which we were commanded to write while we were yet in the spirit. (Doc. and Cov., sec. xcii., par. 7)

I do not know that I have any particular desire to dwell upon this any more than any other subject of the Gospel, although this subject, in the abstract, occupies more of my affection, adoration, and heartfelt gratitude to our Father and God than any other that has ever been revealed to my knowledge, from the days of Adam to the present.

Looking at the human family-the millions of intelligent beings who have come upon this earth from the days of Adam until now, and those that must still come in the course of events-the question naturally arises, What are they created for? what is the object of their being? None of them have power to produce themselves. Jesus Christ is the heir of this vast family. He said that he had power to lay down his life and take it up again; but he had no more power to produce his life, in the beginning of his existence, than we have. Every human being is endowed, more or less, with eternal intelligence, with the germ of life everlasting, of glory immortal; and then, when I view the human family as they are, with the traditions of the fathers, what the Bible has taught, what the priest has taught, and what kings and rulers have introduced and fastened upon their people, through traditions and customs, and contemplate the variety now existing and that has existed upon the earth, the marks of these finites, and what is their end, I can truly say that, in my estimation, no other revelation so glorious was ever given. You may read the character of the Deity as portrayed in all that has ever been revealed, until you come to this vision, in relation to his justice, his judgment, his power, his life, his glory, his excellence, his goodness, his mercy, and the fulness of every gift, of every trait, of every principle inherent in the character of the Supreme Being, and it is not equal in magnitude, in my reflections, to that which God revealed to Joseph Smith and Sidney Rigdon in the vision from which I have read.

We are far advanced in the things of the kingdom of God. To say nothing about any other principle or doctrine that has ever been revealed, the transcending glory, excellency, wisdom, goodness, virtue, and power that God has revealed in this vision far outweigh all the Christian tenets, doctrines, and systems they have drawn from the Bible. No cistern, to use a figure, hewn by man, can hold water; and every human doctrine and principle, professing to point the way of salvation, fades away. The doctrine God has revealed here is more precious to me, and is worth more than all the doctrines of Christendom.

We may read that the Lord will turn the wicked into hell, and all the nations that forget God; but, so far as the Bible and priests are concerned, the world are left in the dark upon what this vision reveals. Fatality is sealed on the world by the priests as an everlasting inheritance and legacy, from which they never can be delivered. Their doom is to dwell in a lake of fire and brimstone. God has created this intelligence to preserve it. If the world, with its present feelings, believed this vision, they would say-"Our condition will be so far better than we had anticipated, that we will continue our course; for we love the world and the things of the world, and we will roll sin as a sweet morsel under our tongues, and delight in all the iniquity we have indulged in from youth, and continue to imbibe the erroneous principles taught by the fathers and others, and will pass on from day to day; for our condition is to be so far better than our priests have taught us." It would have been better for them had they never been born, were it not so.

Were the wicked, in their sins, under the necessity of walking into the presence of the Father and the Son, hand-in-hand with those who believe that all will be saved-that Jesus will leave none, their condition would be more excruciating and unendurable than to dwell in the lake that burns with fire and brimstone. The fatalist's doctrine consigns to hell the infant not a span long, while the adulterer, whoremonger, thief, liar, false swearer, murderer, and every other abominable character, if they but repent on the gallows or their death-beds, are, by the same doctrine, forced into the presence of the Father and the Son, which, could they enter there, would be a hell to them.

The kingdoms that God has prepared are innumerable. Each and every intelligent being will be judged according to the deeds done in the body, according to his works, faith, desires, and honesty or dishonesty before God; every trait of his character will receive its just merit or demerit, and he will be judged according to the law of heaven as revealed; and God has prepared places suited to every class. The Saviour said to his disciples-"In my Father's house are many mansions: if it were not so, I would have told you. I go to prepare a place for you. And if I go and prepared a place for you, I will come again and receive you unto myself, that where I am, there ye may be also." How many kingdoms there are has not been told to us: they are innumerable. The disciples of Jesus were to dwell with him. Where will the rest go? Into kingdoms prepared for them, where they will live and endure. Jesus will bring forth, by his own redemption, every son and daughter of Adam, except the sons of perdition, who will be cast into hell. Others will suffer the wrath of God-will suffer all the Lord can demand at their hands, or justice can require of them; and when they have suffered the wrath of God till the utmost farthing is paid, they will be brought out of prison. Is this dangerous doctrine to preach? Some consider it dangerous; but is it true that every person who does not sin away the day of grace, and become an angel to the Devil, will be brought forth to inherit a kingdom of glory.

The sectarian world, as we call them, is a professed church of God, without the Priesthood. Sectarrians have not the Priesthood; but all of them who live according to the best light and intelligence they can obtain through faithfulness to what they believe, as taught unto them, will receive a kingdom and glory that will far transcend all their expectations, imaginations, or visions in their most excited moments whether in their falling-down power, jumping power, or squawling power. All they have ever desired or anticipated they will receive, and far more; but they cannot dwell with the Father and Son, unless they go through those ordeals that are ordained for the Church of the Firstborn. The ordinances of the house of God are expressly for the Church of the Firstborn.

"Go into all the world and preach the gospel to every creature. He that believeth and is baptized shall be saved, and he that believeth not shall be damned; and these signs shall follow them that believe. In my name," &c. This is the law of the celestial kingdom, and those who hearken to this law, and embrace its truths in their faith, and live them in their lives, will be brought to enjoy the presence of the Son, and will dwell with him and the Father. And all the residue, who do not sin against the Holy Ghost, will be punished according to their deeds, and will receive according to their works, whether it be little or much, good or bad.

Jesus will redeem the last and least of the sons of Adam, except the sons of perdition, who will be held in reserve for another time. They will become angels of the Devil.

What say you, ye Latter-day Saints? Is not this the most glorious thought that ever was revealed to mortal man? Let the Elders of this Church go forth and preach that every person who does not become as they are will have to suffer the wrath of God, and go down to hell to dwell in a lake that burns with brimstone and fire, "where the worm dieth not and the fire is not quenched," and I would not give the ashes of a rye-straw for all they will do. It is good for nothing: there is no life in it—there is no soul in it.

This intelligence must endure. We must preserve our identity before the Lord, who has sent his Son and angels, and is sending the Holy Ghost, and his ministers, and revelations, to comfort, cheer, guide, and direct the affairs of his kingdom on the earth. Shall we dwindle out in our faith, and in those blessings God bestows on us at this time? No. Let us live to increase them. Let us so live, that when we receive our bodies in the resurrection, we will be received in the presence of the Father and the Son. This kingdom is designed expressly to prepare the people to dwell with God the Father and his Son Jesus Christ, and all the world beside will receive according to their works upon the earth. This is a joy that is unspeakable: it is a glory beyond the capacity of our minds at the present time to appreciate. It is a great joy to me.

Sometimes I feel as though I would like to dwell upon these principles, they are so delightful; but I do not feel like preaching or talking much this morning. The glory and intelligence that God has prepared for the faithful, and for every other being that is worthy to receive, expand, extend, and comprehend, no man knoweth. Should not this fill every heart with peace and joy—that there is no end to the progress of knowledge? Let us continue to prepare ourselves to dwell with Him in eternal burnings.

May the Lord bless the people! Amen.

(speaking of heaven; note reference to 1 Corinthians 15)

That there will be gradations of knowledge and degrees of glory, I think is probable. There are so in the Church of God on earth; I see nothing to exclude the same from the Church of God in heaven. But this will not in the slightest degree affect the happiness or glory of the saints. Is there less beauty in a tulip-bed, or in a conservatory of flowers, because there is so rich an assemblage of varied colors? Or, is there less splendor in the heavenly bodies because there is so great a variety of magnitude, effulgence, and orbit? And will there be less enjoyment, or less beauty, or less song amidst the countless numbers who throng the temple above, because 'One star differeth from another star in glory' (1 Cor. 15:41)? Oh, no, the glory and the happiness of each will be full and perfect! Every spirit will possess a happiness and reflect a glory equal to its capacity. As two luminous bodies in the celestial system may shine in perfection, though in widely different orbits and with different degrees of splendor, and as two streams, the rivulet and the river, may course their way through landscape, the one gliding in simple, pensive beauty, the other rolling in majestic waves, and yet each filling its channel, both equally charming the eye and declaring the glory of God; so the 'spirits of just men made perfect' (Heb. 12:23) shall each be a differing, yet full, vessel of happiness. The image of God will shine with full-orbed splendor in both, though with different intensity, and by each one shall Christ perfect to himself endless praise.

Oh, beloved, if we but reach that world of purity and of bliss, we shall be so satisfied with the orbit we roll in, the glory we emit, and the happiness we feel, as never to question the goodness or the righteousness of God in the sphere assigned us! Christ will then be all in all to us, and we shall be satisfied with all that Christ has done. I think that our bliss will be so complete, our joy so full, and our glory so resplendent, we shall scarcely be conscious that there is another saint fuller, happier, or more glorious than ourselves. Blessed world of glory, we long to be within thy walls! Open, ye everlasting doors, and admit us, that we may eat of the tree of life and recline upon the sunlight banks of the crystal river that makes glad the city of our God.

The third thought that I bring to your attention is this: Our future state in the unseen world of eternity depends entirely on what we are in the present.

The life that we live on the earth is short and soon gone. "We finish our years with a moan."—"What is your life? You are a mist that appears for a little while and then vanishes." (Psalm 90:9; James 4:14) The life that is before us when we leave this world is an endless eternity, a sea without a bottom, and an ocean without a shore. "With the Lord a day is like a thousand years, and a thousand years are like a day." (2 Peter 3:8) In that world there will be no more time. But short as our life is here, and endless as it will be in eternity, the life we now live will have a tremendous impact on eternity. Our lot after death depends, humanly speaking, on what we are while we are alive. It is written, God "will give to each person according to what he has done. To those who by persistence in doing good seek glory, honor and immortality, He will give eternal life. But for those who are self-seeking and who reject the truth and follow evil, there will be wrath and anger." (Romans 2:6-8)

We must never forget, that every one of us, while we live, are in a state of probation. We are constantly sowing seeds that will spring up and bear fruit, every day and every hour in our lives. There are eternal consequences resulting from all our thoughts and words and actions, of which we pay too little attention to. "Men will have to give account on the Day of Judgment for every careless word they have spoken." (Matthew 12:36) Our thoughts are all numbered; our actions are weighed. No wonder that Paul says, "The one who sows to please his sinful nature, from that nature will reap destruction; the one who sows to please the Spirit, from the Spirit will reap eternal life." (Galatians 6:8) In a word, what we sow in life we will reap after death, and reap throughout all eternity.

There is no greater delusion than the common idea that it is possible to live wickedly, and yet rise again gloriously—to be without Christ in this world, and yet to be a saint in the next. When that great preacher George Whitefield revived the doctrine of conversion, in the last century, it is reported that one of his listeners came to him after a sermon and said, "It is all quite true, sir. I hope I will be converted and born again one day, but not till after I am dead." I fear there are many like him. I fear the false doctrine of the Roman Catholic purgatory has many secret friends even within the confines of the true Church today! However carelessly men may go on while they live, they secretly cling to the hope that they will be found among the saints when they die. They seem to embrace the idea that there is some cleansing, purifying effect produced by death, and that, whatever they may be in this life, they will be found "suitable for the inheritance of the saints" in the life to come. But it is all a delusion.

"The Scripture never represents the state of future misery, as a state of cleansing and purification, or anything analogous to a state of trial, where men may conform and qualify themselves for some better state of existence: but always as a state of retribution, punishment, and righteous vengeance, in which God's justice

(a perfection of which some men seem to render no account) vindicates the power of His majesty, His government, and His love, by punishing those who have despised them." (Horbery, volume II, p. 183)

"Life is the time to serve the Lord,
The time to insure the great reward."

The Bible clearly teaches that what we are when we die, whether converted or unconverted, whether believers or unbelievers, whether godly or ungodly, so we will be when we rise again at the sound of the last trumpet. There is no repentance in the grave: there is no conversion after the last breath is drawn. Now is the time to believe in Christ, and to lay hold of eternal life. Now is the time to turn from darkness to light, and to make our calling and election sure. The night comes when no man can work. As the tree falls, there it will lie. If we leave this world refusing to repent and believe, we will rise in the same condition on resurrection morning, and find it would have been "better for us if we had never been born."

"This life is the time of our preparation for our future state. Our souls will continue forever what we make them in this world. Such a taste and disposition of mind as a man carries with him out of this life, he will retain in the next. It is absolutely true that heaven perfects those holy and virtuous dispositions, which are begun here; but the other world alters no man as to his main state. He that is filthy will be filthy still; and he that is unrighteous will be unrighteous still." (Tillotson's Sermon on Philippians 3:20. (See Horbery, volume II, p. 133))

I strongly advise readers of this paper to remember this, and to make a good use of their time. Regard it as the stuff of which life is made, and never waste it or throw it away. Your hours and days and weeks and months and years all have something to say to your eternal condition beyond the grave. What you sow in this life on earth you are sure to reap in a life to come. As that holy preacher Richard Baxter says, it is "now or never." Whatever we do in religion must be done now.

Remember this in your use of all the means of grace, from the least to the greatest. Never be careless about them. They are given to be your helps toward an eternal world, and not one of them ought to be thoughtlessly treated or lightly and irreverently handled. Your daily prayers and Bible-reading, your weekly behavior on the Lord's day, your manner of going through public worship—everyone of these things are important. Use them all as one who remembers eternity.

Keep it foremost in your mind, whenever you are tempted to do evil. When sinners entice you, and say, "It is only a little sin." When Satan whispers in your heart, "Never mind: what is the great harm in it? Everybody does it,"—then look beyond time to a world unseen, and place in the face of the temptation the thought of eternity. There is a great saying by the martyred Reformer, Bishop Hooper, when someone urged him to recant before he was burned, saying, "Life is sweet and death is bitter." "True," said the good Bishop, "quite true! But eternal life is more sweet, and eternal death is more bitter."

2 In my Father's house are many mansions: if it were not so, I would have told you. I go to prepare a place for you.

3 And if I go and prepare a place for you, I will come again, and receive you unto myself; that where I am, there ye may be also.

Heaven is a place of "mansions,"--of lasting, permanent, and eternal dwellings. Here in the body we are in lodgings, tents, and tabernacles, and must submit to many changes. In heaven we shall be settled at last, and go out no more. "Here we have no continuing city." (Heb. xiii. 14.) Our house not made with hands shall never be taken down.

Heaven is a place of "many mansions." There will be room for all believers and room for all sorts, for little saints as well as great ones, for the weakest believer as well as for the strongest. The feeblest child of God need not fear there will be no place for him. None will be shut out but impenitent sinners and obstinate unbelievers.

NOTES

2.--[In my Father's house.] This phrase can bear only one meaning. It is my Father's house in heaven: an expression accommodated to our weakness. God needs no literal house, with walls and roof, as we do. But where He dwells is called His house. (See Deut. xxvi. 15; Psalm xxxiii. 14; 2 Chron. xxxviii. 27; 2 Cor. v. 1.) There is something very touching and comforting in the thought that the heaven we go to is "our Father's house." It is home.

[There are many mansions.] The word rendered "mansions" means literally "abiding-places." It is only used here, and in the twenty-third verse of this chapter, "abode." We need not doubt that there is an intentional contrast between the unchanging, unvarying house in heaven, and the changing, uncertain, dwellings of this world, Here we are ever moving: there we shall no more go out. (See also Heb. xiii. 14.)

Chrysostom, Augustine, and several other ancient writers think the "many mansions" mean the degrees of glory. But the argument in favour of the idea does not appear to me satisfactory. Bishop Bull, Wordsworth, and some few modern writers take the same view. That there are degrees of glory in heaven is undoubtedly true, but I do not think it is the truth of this text.

No. VIII. "In my Father's house there are many mansions."— John xiv. 2.

All our earthly journey past.

Every tear and pain gone by,
Here together met at last,

In the mansions of the sky,
Each tho welcome "Come" awaits,

Conquerors over death and sin;
Lift your heads, ye golden gates,

Let the ransom'd travellers in!

"mansions"—"many mansions"—"a house" —"my Father's house." How many reflections are crowded into this one brief utterance of our gracious Redeemer! With what a homelike aspect do they invest our every thought of Heaven! They were among His last words; He himself was on His way to that peaceful "homestead" of which He speaks. Let us gather around Him, with the house of His Father in sight, and extract some of the comfort with which His declaration is replete.

The verse speaks of Multiplicity—"many mansions."

Had He been addressing His own disciples alone, the assurance would have been sufficient, "There will be a home for each of you." But He is discoursing for all time. His omniscient eye discerned at that moment the unborn myriads whom this chapter and this verse were to console and cheer. He would, therefore, certify that there is abundant provision made for all—patriarchs, prophets, saints, martyrs;—from the time that righteous Abel bent alone, a solitary redeemed saint, before the throne, the first sheaf of a mighty harvest, until the garners be filled, and the song of the ransomed become "as the sound of much people, the noise of many waters, and the roar of mighty thunders." He is to bring "many sons unto glory." There is grace for all—crowns for all—mansions for all! Heaven has been filling for six thousand years, and still there is room. How different its "recompense of reward" from worldly crowns and worldly honours! In the earthly race "many run, but one (only) receiveth the prize." In heaven the competition is open to "whosoever will." There is no jarring of interests in this loftier arena. The glorification of one is not attained there at the expense of another's downfall or exclusion. The mansions are many. The candidates are a mighty multitude which no man can number. Believer! "so run that you may obtain."

The verse speaks of Permanency — they are "mansions."

The word in the original is not a tent or temporary tabernacle, but a durable residence, never to be altered or demolished. The most graphic of Eastern travellers thus gives a description of tent-life, which, by contrast, affords the best illustration of the mansion-life of heaven: "When the cold, sullen morning dawned, and my people began to load the camels, I always felt loth to give back to the waste this little spot of ground, that had glowed for a while with the cheerfulness of a human dwelling. My tent was spared to the last, but when all else was ready for the start, then came its fall. The pegs were drawn, the canvas shivered, and in less than a minute there was nothing that remained of my genial home, but only a pole and a bundle."

"The tents of the East," says another, "seldom remain long in the same place. The traveller erects his temporary abode for the night, takes it down in the morning, and journeys onward. The shepherds of the country are also always moving from one place to another. The brook fails on which they relied for water, or the grass required for the support of their flocks is consumed, and they wander on to a new station."

How strikingly illustrative is this of the Bible figure, "the house of our earthly tabernacle" being "dissolved" (or taken down). The framework of mortality, like the Arab tent, is upreared for a time, but, after subserving its temporary purpose, it is, pin by pin, demolished, and the place that once knew it knows it no more.

Not so the ever-during mansions of our Father's house. They are "incorruptible" and "eternal in the heavens." No fading of brooks there! No joys withered and smitten there, like the grass of the wilderness." The Lamb that is in the midst of the throne shall feed them, and lead them to living fountains of water." Ah! it is the saddest, the most humiliating feature of the joys of earth, that, however pure, noble, elevating they may be at the moment, there is no calculating on their permanency. The mind will, in spite of itself, be haunted with the dark possibility of the ruthless invader of all happiness coming and dashing the full cup in a thousand fragments on the ground. In heaven no shadow of vicissitude or change can ever enter to dim an ever-brightening future. Once within that heavenly fold, we are in the fold for ever. On the lintels of the eternal mansion are inscribed the words, "Ye shall go no more out." Our happiness and joy will be as immutable and stable as everlasting love and power and faithfulness can make them.

The verse speaks of Diversity.

There are "many mansions"—not only many in number, but manifold in their degrees of glory. All will be happy. A halo of unutterable bliss and glory will encircle each separate dwelling, beyond what eye hath seen, or ear heard, or heart conceived. But as one star differeth from another star in glory, so, also, we have reason to believe, there will be gradations in the scale of future blessedness.

The allusion in our verse is evidently to the different courts of the Jewish temple. These were diverse in name and character. The outer and inner court, the court of the Gentiles, the courts of the priests, the Holy of Holies. All these were consecrated as portions of the same "House of the Lord." The lowliest Israelite was within sight of the altar, and within hearing of the high priest's benediction. But there were some courts more hallowed and glorious than others—their sacredness increasing the nearer the worshipper approached the place where dwelt the mystic Shekinah. It will be the same with the many mansions of the heavenly temple. All the vast multitude in the new Jerusalem will be within range of the benediction of the great High Priest, and as such they must be blessed. But there will be inner courts and enclosures of greater honour and glory. The more intense and exalted his love and devotedness on earth, the nearer will the believer be permitted to approach the Holiest of all, the nearer admission will he have to the Father's presence, and receive the more distinguishing badges of the Father's love. There will be one mansion for him whose pound hath gained five pounds, and another mansion for him whose pound hath gained ten pounds. Each, too, will be apportioned according to some earthly antecedents. There will be the special mansion of the martyr, who was borne from his earthly tent in his chariot of fire. There will be the special mansion of the missionary, who surrendered home, ease, worldly honour, in his noble embassy, and stood alone and unbefriended on Pagan shores, witnessing for a despised Saviour. There will be the mansion for the minister of Christ, who boldly proclaimed the message of life and death. There will be the mansion for the Sabbath-school teacher, who toiled to bring youthful trophies to the foot of the cross. There will be the mansion for the pining sufferer, who glorified God by patience and uncomplaining resignation. For the child, that fell on earth a withered blossom, whose tent was taken down while it was yet day, but reconstructed into a building of God eternal in the heavens. There will be a mansion for the old veteran of the cross, the champion in a hundred battles of the faith, and for the youthful soldier, who was only buckling on his armour when summoned from the earthly struggle.

The least in the kingdom, I repeat, will have a blessedness to the full—a glory and a joy which leaves no void or vacuum. As in the terrestrial, so in the celestial firmament. Though every planet circling round the Sun of Deity will shine with a borrowed splendour, yet the larger the planet, and the nearer its orbit is to its grand centre, the greater will be its radiance and glory. Though every flower will in itself be perfect, reflecting the lovely hues and tints of heaven, yet they will be of diverse form and colour. Some will diffuse a sweeter fragrance, or cluster in larger and richer groups than others. But all, large and small, the saint a hundred years old and the child translated in infancy, will (notwithstanding this diversity) have the same quality of bliss. The planet at the outskirts of the heavenly sphere and that nearest the centre will be bathed in one and the same rays of ineffable glory.

But while the verse speaks of Diversity, it speaks also of Unity.

There will be diversity in unity, and unity in diversity. The Church triumphant is one house. The Church on earth, alas! is a house divided against itself—church divided against church—Christian against Christian. Nominally the children of one Father, but dwelling in separate tabernacles. One saying, "I am of Paul," and another, "I of Apollos." Nominally pilgrims on one road, traversing the same wilderness, but each keeping his own peculiar and separate pathway, journeying on often with no look of kindly recognition exchanged, as if they were aliens and foreigners, instead of brethren and sisters in a common Lord.

But in yonder bright and happy home, discord, division, separation will be known no more. Once within that sacred portal, the exclamation will pass from tongue to tongue, "What! so long together on the pilgrimage, and maintaining a cold and chilling reserve and alienation! Alas! is it only now we are to begin to know what we should have known ages ago, ' how good and how pleasant a thing it is for brethren to dwell together in unity!'"

Ye who are mourning over these sad estrangements in the Church of God, rejoice at this glorious prospect. All shall be one then! One house—one home—one Father—one Elder-brother—one motive for praise—one theme for eternal song—a united Church under its one glorious and glorified Head!

Then add to this—the verse speaks of Safety.

Where can a child be so safe as in his Father's house? Trials, buffetings, discouragements, unkindness he may experience elsewhere, here at least he is safe and happy.

What music is there even on earth in that word "home?" The garner of happiness—the haunt of tender affections—the cherisher of bright hope —the hallowed spot where the spent spirit's weary wing folds itself to rest—the glad retreat in the dark and cloudy day. What must be the home of heaven? With what surpassing tenderness does that one word invest these many mansions, "My Father's house!" and how does it link us to the Saviour, when He thus addresses each heavenward and homeward bound pilgrim—" My Father and your Father, my God and your God!"

To enter heaven, the dwelling-place of the great Jehovah—to be ushered into the presence-chamber of the High and Lofty One who inhabiteth eternity! There might be much to awe and overwhelm the spirit in such a contemplation. But this beautiful home-word divests it of all its awfulness, and invests it with all that is winning and captivating. Each believer in the prospect of these bright mansions, may, without irreverence, adopt the words of his great Redeemer, and say, "If ye loved me, ye would rejoice, because I said I go unto ' my Father."

Would that we oftener realised heaven as such, and, amid earth's troubles and vicissitudes and sorrows, were led to regard every new trial, every new epoch of existence, every returning week and month and anniversary, as fresh chimes of celestial music floating from the towers of glory, and sounding in our ears, "Nearer home, nearer home!" Our Lord has taught us, while we "desire" in our daily prayer "a better country," to make it a final aspiration, "Our Father, which art in heaven, thy kingdom come." Heaven, in the noblest sense, is "the Church in the House."

The verse still further speaks of Honour.

It speaks of admission into God's presence, and to stand in that presence in the relation of children to a father. Even to be laid, like Lazarus, at the portals of heaven, and fed with the crumbs falling from the table, would have been more than what, as sinners, we deserve. What will it be to go "within the house," honoured with a place at the King's own banquet!

There are two Greek words used in the New Testament to describe the believer's relation to God Both are significant. The former literally means a slave, and such His redeemed child really is. He is the willing slave of righteousness, "bought with a price" by a gracious Master. He feels it to be alike his highest honour and obligation to be called "the servant of God." The other word, though translated by the same term (servant), has a higher meaning. It has rather reference to the believer's heavenly calling. It speaks of His lofty designation and employment in His Father's house, when He becomes a "ministering one." His earthly service is over, "Henceforth I call you not servants, but friends."

"In my Father's House I" "Yes," said a dying believer, as he quoted these words, "Our Lord tells me, You have been an out-door servant long enough, I will now make you an in-door servant, and take you out of the wind and rain to give you a glorified body and better wages and a better mansion." t

What a wondrous transition from the clay tenement to the everlasting mansions! Well may the poet exclaim, apostrophising the emancipated spirit:—

O change! O wondrous change!
Burst are the prison bars—
This moment there—so low,
In mortal prayer—and now,
Beyond the stars!

"O change! stupendous change!
There lies the senseless clod—
The soul from bondage breaks,
The new immortal awakes,
Awakes with God!

Finally, the verse tells us that all these wondrous home-mansions Jesus has gone to make ready for us.

"I go to prepare a place for you." Nay, more, He confers them as a right. He speaks as the "Heir of all things." Observe, it is not "your Father's house," but "my Father's house." "As the Son of the everlasting God," He seems to say, "I am not ashamed to call you brethren, and for my sake He will not be ashamed to own and welcome you as sons and daughters. ' My name, as ' the Beloved of the Father,' and my work, as the surety Redeemer, will form a passport and title to every room in these paternal halls!"

The value of a gift is enhanced by the character and worth of the donor. The gift of an earthly sovereign would be highly prized. Here is a gift bestowed by the "Prince of the kings of the earth," purchased by blood and toil and agony. These blood-bought mansions form the crown and consummation of all His other gifts. " This is The gift that God has given us, eternal life, and that life is in His Son." "Everything else that He 'did and taught and suffered,' had a reference to the opening of the kingdom of heaven to all believers. His coming from heaven was to shew heaven to us. His going again there was to prepare a place for us. His sitting at the right hand of God is to promote our interest in heaven. His coming in judgment is to take us back with Him to it."

If He be gone to prepare this place for us, be it ours to endeavour to be prepared for the place, seeking every returning morning to have our tent pitched "a day's march nearer home," nearer the house of our Father. "Yet a little while, and he that shall come, will come, and will not tarry." "Ho will not stay," says Goodwin, "a minute longer than needs must. He tarries only till He hath, throughout all ages, by His intercession, prepared every room for each saint, that He may entertain them altogether, and have them all about Him."

And shall we pause to ask where is that glorious home? Where these sparkling waters, these palms ever green, these robes ever bright? Does the spirit at the hour of death wing its arrowy flight to some distant province of creation? Or may heaven be some mysterious impalpable spirit-world around us? Though we hear no gush of the crystal waters, and gaze on no city of the crystal sea, may it not be that angel-wings are hovering over us, and that it is only these dull senses of ours that hide from us the celestial vision'.

But what though we can descry no dim outline of the everlasting hills? What though we look in vain for the lights gleaming in the distant windows of these "many mansions?" It is enough to know that One has gone to prepare them for us. And when completed, His voice will be heard, saying, "Come, for all things are ready!" "Then shall the righteous shine forth as the sun in the kingdom of Their Father."

Die Grade Der Seligkeit: Ein Beitrag Zur Eschatologie (The Degree Of Happiness: A Contribution To Eschatology)

Die kirchliche Lehre von den Graden der Seligkeit nach ihrem biblischen Grunde und ihrer geschichtlichen Entwicklung.

Die Zeit, in der wir leben, scheint im Allgemeinen Untersuchungen der Art, wie sie auf den folgenden Blättern beabsichtigt werden, nicht sonderlich günstig zu sein. Der überlieferte Pantheismus, wieviel er auch für einen überwundenen Standpunkt ausgegeben werden mag, ist noch immer in unsrem Völke, nicht zum mindesten unter den Gebildeten und Gelehrten in mächtiger Geltung; die materialistische Denkart, in ihrer strengeren Form neueren Datums, hat viele Gemüther mit ihrem eisigen Hauche berührt und manche Männer von weit reichendem Einfluß in ihren Dienst genommen. Wenn die letztere mit ihrer Behauptung eines mehr oder minder ausschließlichen Rechtes der Empirie in allen wissenschaftlichen Gebieten den schwindlich hohen Flug des pantheistischen Idealismus bespöttelt und aller Speculation die Wege zu verlegen bemüht ist, gegen eine Theologie, die sich herausnimmt, auf Grund der Offenbarung in ein übergeschichtliches und der unmittelbaren Wahrnehmung entrücktes Gebiet einzudringen, stehen Materialismus und Idealismus zusammen. Der erster e freilich mit mehr Glück, weil folgerichtiger. Wer sich alles Denkens über dasjenige, was über die unmittelbare Erfahrung hinausliegt, entschlagen will, den mag man vorläufig machen lassen. Iener Idealismus aber hat höhere Ziele: die Anfänge und das Ende der Dinge beschäftigen ihn in seiner Weise. Die Anfänge menschlicher Eultur, die ursprünglichen Gemeinschaftsformen, d. i. die Entstehung der Sprache, des Volksund Staatsverbandes auf Erden, alles dies nicht minder, als ein vorausgesetztes Ziel aller menschlichen Entwicklung geben ihm zu denken; was vor und hinter aller Geschichte liegt möchte er ergründen, in dem richtigen Gefühl, daß ohne Anfang und Ende auch die Mitte nicht von dem Dunkel befreit wird. Das Ende, wie es vorahnend geschaut wird, der Anfang, wie er oft nur dem Ende zu Liebe gedacht wird, hat denn auch zu kühnen Constructionen der Mitte Anlaß gegeben: von dem Dunkel zum Licht, von der Schwachheit zur Stärke, von dem Chaos zur Ordnung, vom Sinnlichen zum Geistigen, vom Streit zum Frieden, kurz von der Unvollkommenheit zum Vollkommenen soll sich die Geschichte der Menschheit bewegen. Daß es Thäler giebt und Höhen an dem Horizonte, an dem man diese Geschichte gleichsam fortschreiten sieht, wird nicht gerade geläugnet, aber oft wenig beachtet: was Thal und was Höhe, natürlich oft widersprechend bestimmt. Auch von der Wechselwirkung des Persönlichen und Allgemeinen in dem geschichtlichen Processe weiß man genug zu reden: wie der geschichtlich Hervorragende weder ohne seine Zeit das, was er ist, geworden, noch seine Zeit ohne ihn so und so habe werden können. Aber was das individuelle Leben betrifft, so ist dessen seifenblasenartiger Charakter nichts desto weniger Grunddogma dieses idealistischen Denkens. Alles Persönliche muß zum Schatten herabsinken, damit das Ganze seine Glanzesfülle behaupte. Wie von einem absoluten Ziele des Ganzen, etwa einer freien Liebesgemeinschaft auf Erden, so und in diesem Sinne kann von einem Ziele des Einzelnen nicht die Rede sein. Der Einzelne, sei er auf die Höhe oder in die Thäler der Bewegung gestellt, ist seinem Schicksal verfallen.

Alledem gegenüber ist es als eine erfreuliche Erscheinung auch jetzt noch zu begrüßen, wenn z. B. ein Philosoph, wie Ritter, zu den ersten der Geschichtsschreiber der Philosophie zu rechnen, selber Christ mit Ueberzeugung, des Christenthums Wesen darin findet, die Religion eines ewigen Lebens zu sein. ^) Mag man immerhin eine erschöpfende oder auch nur hinreichende Bestimmung des eigenthümlich Christlichen darin nicht finden, man braucht der materialistischen Gegner, eines Moleschott, eines Vogt, noch nicht vergleichend zu gedenken., um auch in einer solchen Auffassung des Christlichen ein schönes Zeugniß der christlichen Gesinnung nicht nur, sondern auch der christlichen Erkenntniß zu finden.

Ist nämlich die Idee des ewigen Lebens auch nicht die eigenthümlich christliche Grundidee, darüber kann kein Zweifel sein, sie ist ein durchaus integrierender Bestandtheil christlicher Lehre. Wenn selbst Theologen, wie Echleiermacher, dem w i r wenigstens das Prädicat eines „gläubigen“ nicht absprechen, sich zeitweise in pantheistischer Verirrung dieser Erkenntniß entschlagen haben, so kann dies an dem Unheil nichts ändern.

Ist sie aber ein solcher integrierender Bestandtheil, so ist ihre theologische Behandlung ein ewig junges Bedürfniß. Was auch von den feindlichen Strömungen dieser Zeit bemerkt werden mußte, das Interesse an eschatologischen Fragen überhaupt ist in der Kirche in weiten Kreisen lebendig. Es weisen darauf in unsern Tagen theils die chiliastischen Bewegungen im Lager der separirten Lutheraner, es weisen darauf die nicht spärlich erscheinenden Monographien., 2) es weisen darauf Aeußerungen, wie die auf dem letzten deutschen Kirchentage gehörte, die Eschatologie — und damit auch die Lehre von dem ewigen Leben — bedürfe gerade jetzt der Ausbildung.') Freilich könnte man, die Aufgabe so gestellt, ihr auch setzt noch größeren Umfang beilegen, als sie in unserm Sinn hat. Außer Zweifel ist nämlich, daß die Schrift und mit ihr im Allgemeinen auch die Kirche eine Succession von Epochen sich steigernder Seligkeit lehrt, welche der göttlichen Reichsöconomie gemäß von der Gesammtheit der Vollendeten zu durchleben sind. ^) Die Kirche hat gar Manches von einem sogenannten Mittelzustande gelehrt. Auch in dieser Hinsicht könnte man also von Graden reden; von Graden in diesem Sinn wird aber hier nicht die Rede sein. Wir reden vielmehr im Gegensatz zu jenen die Gesammtheit angehenden Epochen vor dem Endgericht von simultanen Seligkeitsgraden der Einzelnen nach demselben.

Solcher Aufforderung nun wollen die nachfolgenden Blätter entsprechen. Nicht, daß darin die ganze Lehre von den letzten Dingen, oder auch nur die besondere Lehre von dem ewigen Leben umspannt würde, es ist ein kleiner Kreis, in dem sich die Untersuchung bewegen soll. Ist die Eschatologie das Dach des christlichen Lehrgebäudes, nur ein Stein, ein Ziegel gleichsam wird hier geboten werden. Es soll gehandelt werden von den Graden der Seligkeit der einzelnen vollendeten Seelen. Und zwar wird das Wort Seligkeit gemäß biblischem und kirchlichem Sprachgebrauch hier zunächst so verstanden, daß es die objectiven Güter der zukünftigen Welt nicht minder, als den dadurch bedingten subjectiven Rückschlag in das Einzelbewußtsein, also die Seligkeit im engeren Sinne ausdrückt, so daß unter den Seligkeitsgraden also auch die im engeren Sinne sogenannten Herrlichkeitsgrade zunächst mitverstanden werden.

Freilich, haben wir auf diese Weise unser Gebiet gegen angrenzende abgesteckt, so hören wir wohl auch der kirchlichen Stimmen gar manche, die da warnen, sich mit Lehren zu thun zu machen, die man höchstens als Schnörkel und Zierrath will gelten lasten. Die Welt mit ihren Mächten der Zerstörung habe ja die Fundamente erschüttert, auch wohl den Eckstein verworfen. Wo diese Mahnung ernstlich gemeint ist, da kann sie wohl nur dazu auffordern wollen, daß über die vermeintlichen Schnörkel die Wahrung des Fundaments nicht vergessen werde, und einer so gemeinten Mahnung müssen wir volles Recht lassen. Wo sie aber weniger ernstlich gemeint ist, da ist die Annahme der Vergeblichkeit alles dogmatischen Bauens heimlicher Hintergedanke, und da müßten wir doch die Gegenmahnung bereit halten, dem christlichen Nachdenken in jeder Richtung sein Recht zu lassen. In der That bezeugt zudem laut genug die Geschichte, daß, wo man alle Arbeit an dem Kleinen der Lehre behaglich oder verächtlich bei Seite schob, man es mit der Arbeit am Großen, zu immer tieferer Erfassung grundlegender Wahrheiten, auch nicht allzu eilig und ernstlich nahm.

Was die Methode anlangt, die wir einhalten werden, so mag man sie die historisch kritische nennen. Ausgehend von dem biblischen Grunde, als der normativen Auctorität auch für diese Lehre, wollen wir in geordneter Uebersicht dann die Stimmen der Kirche vernehmen, und wie nach unfreer Ansicht die Entscheidung zu treffen sei, darlegen. Wir machen uns dabei die Wahrheit der Straußischen Bemerkung zu Nutze, daß die Fülle historischer Zeugnisse einem Waldstrom ähnele, den ein Mann nicht aufhält, wie die Meinung jedes einzelnen dem Wasser, das durch das Nrunnenrohr fließend, von einem Knaben gehemmt wird.2) Daß wir uns dabei nicht in eine bloße Geschichte menschlicher Meinungen zu verlieren haben, wird uns gegenwärtig bleiben.

Gehen wir nun zunächst an die Ausmittlung des Schriftgrundes unserer Lehre, so werden wir, da das Gericht die Entscheidung über alles zukünftige Ergehen der Einzelnen bringen wird, zunächst nach den Normen und Gesichtspunkten der Zurechnung zu fragen haben, welche nach den ausdrücklichen Worten der Schrift bei dem Gerichte angewendet werden sollen.

Der Antworten der Schrift auf die Frage: wonach wird ein Jeglicher beurtheilt werden, scheint in der That eine gewisse Fülle zu sein, wenn auf der einen Seite eine sehr ansehnliche Reihe von Bibelworten die Werke, ^) auf der andern der untrügliche Mund des Herrn auch die Worte,2) und endlich der Mund des Heidenapostels den „inwendigen Rath der Herzen“) als dasjenige bezeichnet, was für das endschaftliche Loos der für ein ewiges Dasein erschaffnen Seelen den Ausschlag geben werde. ') Was sich für uns daraus ergibt, ist: wenn eine Verschiedenheit der zu richtenden menschlichen Individuen in einer dieser drei Beziehungen, und zwar auf der einen Seite eine solche, die bis zu dem letzten Gericht hin nicht wird getilgt worden sein, auf der andern eine solche, die durch den einfachsten sittlichen Unterschied von gerecht und ungerecht, gut oder böse, noch nicht erschöpft ist, nachzuweisen wäre, so wäre auf biblischem Standpunkte damit die Wahrheit jener Lehre von den Graden der Seligkeit erwiesen.

Aber selbst, was auf Grund der angeführten Schriftworte als richtige Folgerung erscheinen mußte, kann doch, andre Erklärungen der Schrift entgegengehalten, nur eine eingeschränkte Geltung behalten. Wollte man auf Grund des Obigen behaupten, eine objectiv gleiche Summe von gerechten Werken, Worten, Gedanken, von mehreren Individuen aufgewiesen, werde ihnen den gleichen Grad von seligem Leben sichern, so würde die starre Objectivität dieser Auffassung an Luc. 12, 48 eine unüberschreitbare Grenze finden. Nicht an Alle werden die gleichen Forderungen gestellt werden: vor dem Schöpfer und Richter, der schaffend Individuen, nicht verkörperte Begriffe gesetzt hat, wird, wenn er richtet, die geschaffene Subjectivität auch in ihren feinsten Eigenthümlichkeiten angesehen werden. Ienen obengenannten beiden schriftmäßigen Bedingungen wird sich also als dritte anreihen, daß verschiedene Grade der Seligkeit insofern zugelassen werden müssen, als nach sonstigen Schriftzeugnissen etwa die Tragweite von Luc. 12, 48 doch nicht so groß ist, daß die erwähnten bis zum Gericht fortdauernden und durch jene einfachste Unterscheidung von Gerech und Ungerech nicht erschöpften diesseitigen Verschiedenheiten durch das Gewicht des Luc. 12 ausgesprochenen Canons bei der Vertheilung der Loose unwirksam gemacht werden.

Daß aber allerdings die Tragweite jener, Stelle groß sei, mag hier zunächst wiederum mit einigen Schriftworten erhärtet werden. Wie nämlich die Neichsöconomie verschiedene große Stadien hat, das der heidnischen, der jüdischen, der christlichen Lebensentwicklung — große Entwicklungen, die mit übergreifender Kraft und Allgemeinheit die Einzelentwicklung des Individuums bedingen, — so werden auch die Einzelnen in diese Entwicklungen Gestellten im Gericht darauf angesehen werden, ob sie, Heiden, ihnen selber ein Gesetz gewesen ») ob sie, mit dem Gesetz vom Sinai betraut'), oder ob sie durch Golgatha's Opferblut zu einer überschwänglichen Seligkeit berufen waren').

Was wir aus der Erwägung des letzt erwähnten von Luc. aufbewahrten Wortes Iesu einer ic. und der zahlreichen Stellen alten und neuen Testaments über die Rücksicht auf die verschiedenen mit Herzen, Mund und Händen geübten Lcbnserweisungen andererseits mit Recht folgern können, ist, daß das Eintreffen der drei genannten Bedingungen und damit die Enstanz der Grade einmal vorausgesetzt, bestimmte Kreise der Seligen nicht ausschließlich solche Seelen in sich begreifen werden, die quantitativ beim Gericht eine gleiche Summe von dergleichen Lebenserweisungen aufgewiesen haben; vielmehr daß sehr wohl Individuen von sehr verschiedener Begabung, Individuen, unter sehr verschiedenen — auch an innerer Bedeutung verschiedenen — Anregungen und Einflüssen durch das irdische Leben gegangen,, Individuen endlich, auch in Anbetracht des Umfangs der von ihnen ausgegangenen Lebensanregungen durch eine große Kluft geschieden, in demselben Chorus der Vollendeten gedacht werden können und müssen. Nicht auf das von Anfang an Gegebene, auch nicht auf das im Leben Geleistete, sondern auf das Verhältniß der Gabe zur Leistung wird es ankommen.

Bis jetzt bewegt sich die Theorie noch auf Grund unerwiesener, wenn auch probabler Voraussetzungen. Einen weiteren Schritt in der Prüfung des Schriftgrundes dieser Lehre thun wir, wenn wir auf zwei wichtige und bekannte Parabeln Iesu unser Augenmerk richten. (Matth. 25, 14—30; Luc. 19, 12—27.) Nicht in adäquaten Ausdrücken — welches menschliche Verständniß wäre scharf und welcher Flug der Gedanken hoch genug, um eine solche Schilderung zu fassen? — aber auch nicht in unbestimmter, das Besondere vereinerleiernder Allgemeinheit, — in scharf individualisirendem lebensvollem Bilde wird uns in beiden Parabeln gleichsam ein Bruchstück oder Durchschnitt des Weltgerichts vorgeführt. Die Gleichnisse bieten bekanntlich nennenswerthe Verschiedenheiten. Bei Lucas werden die Gaben gleichmäßig ausgetheilt: Jeder einzelne Knecht erhält ein Pfund. Was dagegen mit diesem Pfunde erworben wird, ist verschieden, und dieser Verschiedenheit gemäß wird diesen Knechten der verschiedene Lohn gegeben. Wesentlich abweichend sind mehrere Züge des Gleichnisses bei Matthäus. Fünf, zwei und ein Centner, verschiedene Gaben werden den verschiedenen Knechten von vom herein anvertraut, „einem jeglichen nach seinem Vermögen.“ Der Verschiedenheit der anvertrauten Gaben gemäß, der ersteren genau entsprechend, erwerben die fleißigen Knechte fünf und zwei Centner zu dem ursprünglich Anvertrauten. Dagegen wird über die Angemessenheit des Lohnes zu dem Erworbenen nichts bestimmtes ausgesagt; nur daß des Lohnes viel sei, dem wenigen ursprünglich Gegebenen gegenüber, mitgetheilt *).

Von unmittelbarer Bedeutung für unsere Lehre scheint freilich nur das Lucanische Gleichniß sein zu können. In der Matthäischen Parabel ist alle Verschiedenheit gleichsam vor den Anfang des ganzen Vorgangs zurückgeschoben. Die Knechte erhalten hernach Verschiedenes, eben in Bezug auf eine schon vorher, gleichsam zeitlos vorhandene individuelle Verschiedenheit; indem sie Verschiedenes mit dem Gegebenen und zu demselben hinzu erwerben, verhalten sie sich doch subjectiv genommen alle gleich: jeder thut nach seinem Vermögen. Auch in Bezug auf ihr letztes Geschick ist wenigstens die Meinung nicht gerade ausgeschlossen, daß sie gleiches Ergehen haben, wenn auch das über vieles Gesetztwerden gar verschiedene Abstufungen zuläßt. Dagegen zeigt das von Lucas überlieferte Gleichniß in der That eine bestimmte Verschiedenheit in dem endschaftlichen Ergehen der fleißigen Knechte. Auch scheint das verschiedene Resultat der Arbeit der im Anfang mit Gleichem Bedachten nicht sowohl in dem ungleichen Vermögen als in dem ungleichen Eifer bei der Arbeit begründet, und beidem, dem Maaße des Eifers, wie der dadurch bedingten Fülle der Erfolge entspricht die größere oder geringere Belohnung. Wie diese letztere freilich zu fassen sei, ob wesentlich verbunden mit jenem im Eingang erwähnten Rückschlag ins Bewußtsein, also als gesteigerte oder geminderte Seligkeit oder irgendwie ohne diesen, als größere oder geringere Erhabenheit und Herrlichkeit des Amtes oder der Stellung, das kann auch aus der Lucanischen Parabel nicht entschieden werden. Auf eine mehr oder minder umfassende Wirksamkeit in der Welt der Vollendung scheint allerdings das: „über zehn Städte Gesetztwerden“ zunächst hinzudeuten.

Das Matthäische Gleichniß hat in der That, wie bereits angedeutet unmittelbar mit der Lehre von den Graden nichts zu thun, wohl aber mittelbar. Es ist darin klar und bündig die Ursprünglichkeit individueller Unterschiede, verschiedener, sei es geistiger, sei es leiblicher Ausrüstung im diesseits ausgesprochen. Und wenn das Gleichniß selber über eine Correspondenz dieser diesseitigen mit einer etwaigen jenseitigen Verschiedenheit nichts Bestimmtes aussagt, so ist es doch die Schriftanalogie, welche, wie sie die dem Tode genommene Macht und den innigen Zusammenhang diesseitigen und jenseitigen Lebens und Seins verkündigt, solcher Correspondenz auch diesseitiger und jenseitiger Gaben das Wort redet.

So sind es diese beiden Gleichnisse vor Allem, welche jenen allgemeinen auf Hypothesen gegründeten Folgerungen gegenüber, welche wir oben vollzogen, weiter führen. Man könnte ihnen einen prophetischen Wenn man sich schon im Hinblick auf diese Parabeln schwerlich wird dem Zugeständniß entziehen können, daß in den beiden in den Parabeln angedeuteten Beziehungen eine Verschiedenheit der Vollendeten von der Schrift verheißen werde, so gewinnt diese Ueberzeugung Gewißheit, wenn man die Schriftstellen hinzunimmt, in welchen insonderheit den Aposteln des Herrn ein gewisser Vorzug auch in der zukünftigen Ordnung der Dinge beigelegt wird. Denn sicher wird man das „Sitzen auf den zwölf Stühlen und Richten die zwölf Geschlechter Israels“, ^) wie sehr man auch geneigt sein möge, den Gedankengehalt dieses Ausspruchs seiner bildlichen Hülle zu entkleiden, nicht anders, als auf eine bevorzugte Stellung der Zwölf deuten könnend) Ia selbst in dem eng geschlossenen Kreise der Zwölf, denen bei Lucas und Matthäus eine wesentliche Prärogative zugestanden wird, scheinen die mächtigen Principien der Steigerung und Individuation des Lebens sich noch geltend machen zu sollen. Denn nachdem bereits den Zwölfen die Berufung zu einer außerordentlichen Thätigkeit „in der Wiedergeburt“ versiegelt ist, sehen wir nicht nur die Mutter des Iacobus und Johannes mit der Bitte, ihren Söhnen die Plätze zur Rechten und zur Linken zu gewähren, an den Erlöser herantreten, wir hören auch den letzteren wenigstens mittelbar bestätigen, daß es in seines Vaters Reich dergleichen Ehrenplätze allerdings geben werdet. Denn aus der Erklärung Iesu, daß es ihm nicht zustehe, das Sitzen zu seiner Rechten und Linken zu gewähren, zu folgern, daß es solche Plätze überhaupt nicht geben werde, würde folgerichtig doch nur dem zustehen, der auch Act. 1, ? zu schließen wagt, daß mit der „Zeit und Stunde, welche der Vater seiner Macht vorbehalten hat“ eigentlich der Nimmermehrstag gemeint sei; es würde nur demjenigen zustehen, der es mit der Schrift überhaupt nicht genau zu nehmen entschlossen ist.

Character im eigentlichen Sinne beizulegen geneigt sein. Wollte man aber auch davon Abstand nehmen, auch die eigentliche Prophetie mangelt nicht auf diesem Gebiete.

Wenn nun sonach die Lehre von den Graden als auf biblischem Standpunkte unanfechtbar erscheint, so verdient auch das noch hervorgehoben zu werden, daß auch in den Voraussetzungen der besonderen Stellung im Reiche der Herrlichkeit die an die Zwölf gerichteten Verheißungsworte mit der vorerwähnten Parabel des Lucas vollkommen zusammenstimmen. Erschien nämlich in dem LucaNischen Gleichniß der Eifer des Knechtes, der zehn Pfund erworben, als das Motiv der endschaftlichen Bevorzugung desselben, so erscheinen auch die Zwölf, wie sie bei Lucas und Matthäus eingeführt werden, als solche vornehmlich eifrige Diener. Von Scheunen, die Iesu das Ohr liehen, wenn er durch Dörfer und Städte daherzog, das Evangelium vom Reich verkündigend, wissen beide Evangelisten zu melden. Aber „nachgefolgt“<sup>2)</sup> mit dieser eigenhümlichen Anhänglichkeit „beharrt bei ihm in seinen Anfechtungen“) — von der späteren Flucht der Jünger ist hier begreiflicher Weise abzusehen, — das waren eben diese Zwölf, denen er darum das Reich bescheidet. Sie waren es, die mit dem kostbaren Pfunde, das ihnen geliehen war, der Gemeinschaft mit dem Herrn gewuchert hatten. — Aehnliches gilt von der Matthäus 20, 23 gestellten Bedingung einer besonderen zukünftigen Herrlichkeit: auch das „den Kelch trinken und mit der Taufe des Herrn getauft werden“ erscheint als ein Wuchern mit dem gegebenen Pfunde.

Freilich auch das Andre bedarf noch der Erwähnung: auch das Matthäische Gleichniß erhält seine prophetische Bekräftigung. Ienes: er gab einem jeglichen nach seinem Vermögen, ^) entspricht bedeutsam jenem: es stehet mir nicht zu, sondern der Vater hat es den Seinen bereitet °). Wenn der Vater das Ende ordnet, so ist es auch der Vater, der im Anfang das Vermögen gegeben, nämlich die natürlichen Gaben, welchen entsprechend der Sohn die geistlichen Güter austheilt. Auch der größte Eifer, den Kelch des Sohnes zu trinken, wird jene heilige Continuität der väterlichen Ordnungen nicht durchbrechen können, vermögen deren, nicht ohne, sondern mit des Mittlers Willen, Anfang und Ende sich zusammenschließen.

Hiermit beendigen wir unsre Bemerkungen über den für die Lehre von den Graden zu führenden grundlegenden Schriftbeweis: nicht in der Meinung, die Sache durchaus erschöpft, wohl aber in der Ueberzeugung die schlagendsten Beweisstellen berührt zu haben. ^) Wem es vorwiegend um die Breite des zu legenden Fundamentes zu thun ist, der wird freilich an der Vollständigkeit des Nachweises vieles vermissen. Dem gegenüber müssen wir die Beschränkung unsrer Beweisführung für eine absichtlich gewählte erklären, und wollen unsren ersten biblisch-dogmatischen Abschnitt damit beschließen, daß wir in die Auslegungsgeschichte einen Blick werfend die vornehmsten Irrwege charakterisieren, in die sich in Bezug auf scheinbar einschlägige I<sup>o</sup>ci die ältere, wie die neuere Eregese verloren hat; zur Seite wird dieser letzteren Betrachtung eine kurze Würdigung der vornehmsten Einwände gehen, welche man aus der Schrift gegen die Lehre von den Graden schöpfen zu müssen geglaubt hat.

Iene Verirrungen charakterisieren sich einmal als allegorisirende Auslegungen, dann als unberechtigte Einlegungen, endlich als falsches Kleben am Buchstaben. In dem Bestreben, die Basis der Heilswahrheiten zu erweitern und in dieser sowie in mancher andern Beziehung den Boden gesunder historischer Auslegung verlassend, hat mit allegorisirender Eregese namentlich die alte Kirche eine Stufenverschiedenheit der Seligen schon aus den Vorgängen des alten Bundes zu erhärten gesucht. Voran steht in diesem Bemühen O rigenes, sei es daß er die Zwölfzahl der Stämme zum Formalprincip der Austheilung der Loose auch bei der seligen Auferstehung macht, und „die guten Könige über ihre Begierden“ der Ehren des königlichen Stammes Inda theilhaftig werden lüsst<sup>2)</sup>; sei es, daß er den geistlichen Iordan zu einer Grenzscheide stempelt, jenseits deren, wie einst Iacobs Erstgeborener, so auch daS erste und älteste Volk Gottes zu seiner Ruhe gelangen soll, während diesseits die Christusjünger ihr Theil habens; sei es, daß er wie sein späterer Bewunderer Hieronymus schon in der Arche Noä die Grade der Seligkeit präformirt sieht^); sei es endlich, daß er in dem alttestamentlichen Unterschiede zwischen Volk und Leviten einen Typus der himmlischen Kirche findet ^). Mag diese Neigung zum Allegorisiren auch noch bis in unsere Zeit hinein sich geltend machen — wir werden gelegentlich auch in unserm dogmatischen Abschnitte noch auf Aehnliches zurückkommen müssen — ernsthafte Ansprüche auf Gemeingültigkeit wagt sie jetzt kaum noch zu machen. Viel tiefer wurzelt noch jetzt das verwandte, jene Allegoriensucht eigentlich als besondere Art unter sich begreifende Bestreben in das einfache Schriftwort dasjenige, was als dogmatischer Gedanke in dem Ausleger gefestigt ist, einzulegen, und auch unsre Lehre hat es sich gefallen lassen müssen, durch manche., solchem Streben entsprungene Auslegungen gestützt zu werden. Denkwürdig in der That ist das Geschick einzelner Schriftworte, deren an und für sich mächtiger Inhalt den Auslegern dennoch oft zu leicht gewogen hat. Werfen wir einen Blick zunächst in die Geschichte von Ioh. 14, 2.

Fast alle Alten seit Iren äus schöpfen aus dieser Stelle einen Beweis für die Lehre von den Graden. Den mittelalterlichen Thomas, wie den Lombarden in seinen Ercerpten^) sehen wir getreu ihrer Spur folgen. Erst bei Gerhard, 2) nachdem freilich Euthymius Zigadenus und Petrus Martyr ) schon das Richtige deutlich gesehen, kommt die Stelle wenigstens unter die Beweismittel zweiter Ordnung zu stehen, und die Einwendung, daß die „vielen“ Wohnungen nicht grade mit Nothwendigkeit verschiedenartige seien, wird in Betracht gezogen, aber doch schließlich mit dem Hinweis auf die großartige Einstimmigkeit der alten Ausleger beschwichtigt: eine Schüchternheit, wie sie auch dem Buddeus eignet ^). Die neueste Zeit ist diesem wenigstens etwas besonneneren Zuge vielfältig wieder fremd geworden. Für,Olshausen^) ist freilich auch der nächste Sinn nur: für die Iünger, für alle Meinigen ist Raum da. Allein folgern könne man doch, meint er, aus dem Epitheton, daß die höchste Mannigfaltigkeit in den Verhältnissen der himmlischen Welt statthaben werde, je nach den Entwicklungsstufen derer, die in sie eintreten werden. Wie das aber, abgesehen von einer anderweitigen schriftmäßigen Begründung aus der Stelle für sich genommen auch nur gefolgert werden könne, ist nicht abzusehn. Wenn nun u. a. auch neuere Predigtsammlungen in dieser Stelle die Lehre von den Graden sehn, so ist dies schwerlich verwunderlich. Die „vielen Wohnungen in dem unermeßlichen Vaterhause“ gelten in der That K apf „sogleich als vielerlei Aufenthaltsorte für die vermiedenen Klaffender Seligen.«) Wenn Hoffmann in seiner vortrefflichen Sammlung) einer ähnlichen Auffassung der Stelle huldigt, so thut er wenigstens wohl, hervorzuheben, es sei nicht allein diese Stelle der heiligen Schrift, die uns nöthige, eine jenseits bestehende Mannigfaltigkeit anzunehmen, es sei alles, was uns der Mund Christi und feiner Apostel über die Vollendeten sage. Was weiter die Stellung der neuesten Com« mentatoren betrifft, so treten Stier und Peter Lange auf die Seite der hergebrachten Auslegung, Lange mit der wenig befriedigenden Bemerkung, daß, wenn die Vielheit der Wohnungen bloß quantitativ, nicht auch qualitativ sein sollte, ein anderer Ausdruck, etwa: es ist Raum genug, genügt haben würde. Dagegen sieht Th olu ck richtig, daß der Zusammenhang der Stelle auf Gradunterschiede nicht führt«). Bemerkt mag schließlich noch werden, daß ein Mann, den wir freilich zu den theologischen Auslegern, nicht zählen dürfen, sich unserer Stelle gelegentlich bedient, um die Mannigfaltigkeit der Himmlischen in seinem Sinne zu erhärten. Göthe, von der Gräsin Bernstorff aufgefordert, „den zu suchen, der sich so gern finden läßt“, bezieht sich in seiner Erwiderung auf die „vielen Provinzen in unsres Vaters Reich ^).“ Gewiß gerade diese Stelle würde seiner Beweisführung am mindesten dienen.

Ein ähnliches Ergehen, wie dieses Wort Jesu Johannes 14, 2 hat seit Alters ein apostolisches Dictum gehabt: 1. Cor. 15, 41. Schon Chrsostomus<sup>1)</sup> setzt, auf seinem Standpunkte mit hoher Klarheit, die Beziehung dieser Stelle auf die Seligkeitsgrade auseinander. Ambrosius geht in der gleichen Spur, und seine Bemerkungen werden von dem Lombarden<sup>2)</sup> getreulich wiedergegeben. Der Klarheit der Sonne entspricht ihm zufolge die himmlische Würde derjenigen, welche auf Erben hundertfältige Frucht, die des Mondes der Herrlichkeit derer, die sechzigfältige, die der übrigen Sterne dem Glanze derjenigen, die dreißigfältige getragen haben. Luther ist in demselben Irrthum: „da sind nun so viel himmlische oder irdische Creaturen, und dennoch ein jegliches in seiner Art vom andern unterschieden und immer eines herrlicher und edler, als das andre. Desgleichen soll auch in jedem Leben mancherlei Unterschied sein der Klarheit und Herrlichkeit und doch allzumal ein Leib und Glieder Christi<sup>6)</sup>.“ Schärfer und richtiger hat schon Calvin gesehen:«) in der Anwendung dieses Verses werde gemeinhin geirrt: wie wahr auch die Lehre von den Graden, wie stark durch andre Schrift<sup>7)</sup> stellen bezeugt, mit diesen paulinischen Worten habe dieselbe nichts zu thun. Hier handle es sich darum, daß unsre gegenwärtigen Leiber von denen, die wir einst empfangen würden, verschieden seien. Von den Graden der Seligkeit hier zu reden, lag, wie auch Billroth, Calvin folgend, bemerkt<sup>8)</sup>, nicht im Interesse der paulinischen Beweissührung.

Hatten wir soeben allegorisirende Auslegungen und dem Aehnliches zu rügen, so bleibt uns noch jenes Dritte, ein unberechtigtes Haften an dem biblischen Buchstaben, um zu zeigen, wie man auch auf diese Weise den Schriftgrund unserer Lehre ungehörlich verbreitert hat. Zwei Fälle mögen hier genügen. Wenn Origenes «) offenbar in dem Bestreben, den biblischen Inhalt möglichst concret zu fassen, den Sanftmüthigen in der Bergrede nur das Erdreich, dagegen den geistlich Armen das Reich Gottes verheißen sein läßt, so ist dies eine ebenso eigenthümliche, als unberechtigte Spaltung. Wenn ein Neuerer<sup>9)</sup> in der Absicht, die Stufen der Seligkeit möglichst bestimmt in Schriftworten auszudrücken, behauptet, die niedrigste Stufe der Seligkeit bezeichne Jesus mit den Worten: „aufgenommen werden in die ewigen Hütten;“ die, welche keine eigne Wohnung haben, stünden viel niedriger, als diejenigen, welche ihre eigne herrliche Friedenschütte von Gott erhalten, so mag dies immerhin für eine geistreiche Bemerkung gelten, auf Zuverlässigkeit kann sie wohl wenig Ansprüche machen.

Eine vollständige Aufzählung der in den verschiedenen Zeiten der Kirche mit untergelaufenen irrigen und gezwungenen Auslegungen, die in den Dienst des Dogmas von den Graden getreten sind, wird niemand, der mit dem Umfang der einschlägigen Literatur vertraut ist, an dieser Stelle erwarten; sie kann überhaupt kaum wünschenswerth erscheinen. Dagegen muß gefragt werden, wie es sich denn, zumal offenbar von dem traditionellen Beweisvornch so nennenswerthe Abzüge zu machen sind, mit denjenigen Schriftstellen verhalte, die von Alters her<sup>10)</sup> und bis in die neuere Zeit hinein gegen die Schriftmäßigkeit unsern Lehre geltend gemacht worden sind. Bekanntlich ist Iovinian der Erste gewesen, der von seinem, dem Hieronymus so verhaßten stoischen Standpunkte ein ganzes Heer von Einwendungen gegen die schon zu seiner Zeit alt hergebrachte Lehre von den Graden aufgestellt hat. Mögen wir es auch mit Cotta ^) beklagen, daß von den Lehren dieses italienischen Mönches keine zuverlässigere Kunde, als die in dem Werke des Hieronymus enthaltene auf uns gekommen ist, mögen wir feine auch durch die feindselige Schrift des letzteren hindurchschimmernde, hie und da gesund reformatorische Richtung anerkennen, unzweifelhaft geht doch aus der Polemik des Gelehrten von Stridon das hervor, daß Iovinian ein Gegner der Lehre von den Graden war, und daß er diese seiner Gegnerschaft vornehmlich durch Berufung auf die Schrift zu rechtfertigen suchte. Was nun den Inhalt seiner Einwendungen anlangt, so ist nicht zu verwundern, daß er die Schwäche der Ausleger seiner Zeit theilt und so in dieselben Fehler verfällt, deren auch die alten Vertheidiger der Lehre vielfältig sich schuldig machen <sup>2)</sup>. Er kann nicht davon loskommen, daß der Herr in der bekannten Stelle bei Matthäus <sup>1)</sup> von einer Scheidung von Böcken und Schafen redet, und von einer weiteren Differenzirung des Looses der Seligen absieht — eine Hartnäckigkeit, für die der „hochgelehrte Ausleger“ von Hieronymus weidlich verspottet wird. Ioviuian macht ferner die „armselige“ Einwendung, daß der Apostel die Christen zu Corinth einen Tempel, nicht aber viele Tempel des heiligen Geistes nenne: ^) als ob es, meint Hieronymus, nicht im Tempel vielerlei Bleibestätten geben könne. Von der hergebrachten Deutung von Ioh. 14,2. läßt sich Iovinianus so sehr imponiren, daß er eine noch weiter vom Wege liegende Auslegung anstrengt. Nicht verschiedene Bleibestätten im Himmelreich, sondern die Zahl der Gemeinden des Erdkreises sei von Jesu verstanden. „Ich gehe Euch die Stätte zu bereiten" °) gilt dem Mönche von Mailand als ein Beweis für die Gleichheit d«s Loofes de« Vollendeten, der Erlöser habe ja nicht von Stätten, sondern von einer Stätte geredet. Auch die Spur einer ernsthafteren Ginwendung findet sich indessen. Das Gleichmß von den Arbeitern im Weinberge«) hat ihm, wie fast allen, die sich irgend mit der Lehre von den Graden befaßt haben, zu denken gegeben. Offenbar wird der Denar, der an alle gleichmäßig gegeben wird, als die eine allen gleichmäßig beschiedcne Seligkeit gedeutet: wogegen denn Hieronymus ihm zu wissen thut, der Denar sei nicht der eine Lohn, sondern das eine Leben, indem verschiedner Lohn Platz habe.

Seit Iovinian der Erste, der mit Schriftgründen gegen die Lehre von den Graden auftrat, ist Petrus Martyr, der Lehrer von Straßburg, Basel und Oxford^). Christus hat, so sagt er, über diese ganze Sache nur ganz allgemein sich geäußert, wie z. B., daß wir „im Vaterlande gleich sein werden den heiligen Engeln" 2). Demnach lönne er in der Schrift weder Beweise für noch wider die Gleichheit der Seligen finden. Beides lasse sich wahrscheinlich machen, keines ausmachen. Sicher, zur Seligkeit thue es nichts, ob man so oder anders denke. Für bedeutend können nun die neun Argumente für die Gleichheit der Seligen, welche Martyr vorbringt, obwohl sie immerhin eine größere Besonnenheit in der Auswahl, als sie dem Mönche des vierten Jahrhunderts eigen ist, verrathen, ihrer Mehrzahl nach nicht gelten. Mehr als Anderes fordert es noch das Nachdenken heraus, wenn Martyr fragt, was denn, wenn den Zwölfen die zwölf Stühle vorbehalten sind, dem Paulus, der doch mehr gearbeitet hat, als sie alle, für Ehren vorbehalten sein möchten 1 obwohl sich auch da im Hinblick auf die schon oben erwähnte Fassung der Verheißung, °) auf den Umstand, daß diese Zwölf, deren Ausharren bis zur Stunde dieser Verheißung gerühmt wird, im Augenblicke der Gefahr flüchtig werden und einer unter ihnen durch seinen Verrath der Anwartschaft auf den Richterstuhl in der Wiedergeburt zweifelsohne verlustig wird, gar leicht eine befriedigende Entscheidung treffen läßt. Auch die Heranziehung von 1. Cor. 6, 3 hat eine Spitze, der sich ohne Weiteres nicht ausweichen läßt. Wenn alle corinthischen Christen berufen sind, die Engel zurichten, so kann gefragt werden, was denen, die in so ausgezeichnete Weise, wie die Zwölf gethan hatten, mit ihrem Herrn ausharren, für eine besondere Herrlichkeit vorbehalten bleibt. Scheint es doch, als ob das Richteramt über die Engel über dem Nichteramt unter Israel wie der Himmel über der Erde emporrage. Und in der That mahnt uns die Stelle, uns bei der Beurtheilung dieser Fragen der Meinung gründlich zu entschlagen, als ließen sich die Aussichten auf eine besondere Tätigkeit im Himmelreich in eine absolute Formel bannen. Sie lehrt uns auch darauf achten, daß in den verschiedenen Zeiten des Reiches Gottes auf Erden — und eine andere Zeit ist die von Luc. 22, 30 und die von 1. Cor. 6, 2 — die himmlische Hoffnung in andre Gestalten sich kleiden mußte: die Richterschaft über Israel konnte ja begreiflicher Weise vom Apostel den fernen Heidenchristen Corinth, und wären sie von apostolischem Eifer gewesen, nicht also verheißten werden, wie vom Herrn den judenchristlichen Zwölfen. Etwas Entscheidendes aber gegen die Idee einer Differenzirung der Aemter, wie sie in Luc. 19 unzweifelhaft niedergelegt ist, ja gegen die Lehre von den Graden überhaupt, vermögen wir auch aus dieser Stelle nicht zu schöpfen. Wer wollte auch wohl ausmachen, daß der Apostel, der seinen Corinthern diese Herrlichkeit des Engelrichtens verheißt, in den Worten des Herrn über die Zwölf eine besondere Prärogative nicht ausgedrückt gefunden habe. Und wenn es denn auch dunkel bleiben mag, in wiefern die Richterschaft über Israel, die des Richteramts über die Engel überrage, daß den Zwölfen etwas ihnen Gigenhümliches verheißten werde, darf darum nicht verkannt werden. Die stärkste Waffe nun aber wird, wie es scheint, wie schon von Iovinianus, so auch von Martyr aus Matthäus 20 geschmiedet. Dem Martyr scheint ein Bewußtsein davon beizuwohnen, daß er damit sein Bestes liefert, denn er stellt dieses Argument an die erste Stelle: ein Denar werde allen Arbeitern zu Theil und dem Herrn des Weinberges komme es nicht in den Sinn, sich den früher eingetretenen gegenüber etwa damit zu entschuldigen, daß ihr Lohn zwar wesentlich gleich, aber im Unwesentlichen doch verschieden und der ihrige größer sei, als der der Spätlinge. Der Lohn, das betont Martyr, ist von allen Unterscheidungen über Wesentliches und Unwesentliches abgesehen, gleich für alle. Wir wollen nun nicht, wie später Quenstedt, darüber rechten, ob unter dem Denar nicht statt des endschaftlichen Lohnes vielmehr irgend welche gnadenreiche diesseitige Vergeltung, in leiblichen oder in geistlichen Gaben bestehend, zu denken sei, noch weniger ihm seine Folgerung zugestehen, daß unter der von ihm bestrittenen Voraussetzung das Gleichniß eine Verleihung des ewigen Lebens auch an murrende Knechte lehren würdet, wollen auch nicht mit Stier darauf Gewicht legen, daß für den „überschwenglichen Gnaden- und Ehrenlohn im Himmel unser Tagelohn-Groschen ein schlechtes falsches Bild wäre)“; uns liegt vielmehr der wesentliche Nachdruck im Gleichniß auf den verschiedenen Zeiten der Berufung zur Arbeit, ein Gedanke, den schon Hieronymus ausführte, wenn er zur ersten Stunde Abel und Seth, zur dritten Henoah und Noah, zur sechsten Abraham und Isaak, zur neunten die Propheten und Moses, endlich zur eilften die Schaar der Heiden berufen werden läßt«), wobei denn nicht ausgeschlossen wäre, daß das Gleichniß auch auf mehr simultane Verschiedenheiten, das ist das frühere oder spätere Berufensein Zeitgenössischer eine Beziehung erleide. Den früher und den später Berufenen ist nun allerdings nach dem Gleichniß das eine Leben bereitet: daß der Heiland das ausspricht, hat einen unmittelbar paränetischen Zweck, „es ist das Gleichniß gerichtet gegen allen Hochmuth der Einen, wider alle falsche Demuth und Verzagtheit der Andern, es will uns Alle gleich machen darin, daß wir ohne knechtischen Blick auf den Lohn, ohne verkehrte Meinung von Verdienst einzig und allein dem himmlischen Kleinod nachjagen ^).“ Daß aber dieses eine Leben oder dieser eine Lohn nun für alle ohne Unterschied nach Umfang und Inhalt unter allen Umständen gleich sei, das würde doch auch bei ganz stricter Fassung nicht folgen; was gefolgert werden kann, ist eben nur, daß die Zeit der Berufung oder die Dauer der Arbeit bei der Austheilung des Lohnes einen Unterschied nicht begründen werde; die Ausdeutung des Gleichnisses ist in ihren rechtmäßigen Grenzen zu halten. Mag darin liegen, „daß Gott das Verdienst unseres Lebens nicht nach der Größe des Pstichtkreises, den er uns angewiesen hat, also auch nicht nach der Masse des Guten, das wir vollbrachten an sich“ beurtheilen werde, °) die Ausschließung der Ungleichheit wird immerhin dem Gleichnisse selber zufolge als eine hypothetische angesehen werden müssen. Gegen die Sehung dieser Ungleichheit, insofern sie sich auf etwas Anderes, als die früher e oder spätere Berufung gründen könnte, kann sich aus dieser Stell« nichts ergeben.

Den richtigen Grundsatz übrigens bei diesen Grenzstreitigkeiten über die von einzelnen Schriftworten beherrschten Wahrheitsgebiete hat übrigens bereits ein lutherischer Dogmatiker aufgestellt. Man muß, sagt Gerhardt/) die Stellen unterscheiden, die «n^Hz und die anderen, die tt^x^n<^ zu fassen find. Wenn z. B. Martvr 2) unter seinen neun Instanzen auch die geltend macht, daß laut d«s Apostels Wort die Leiden dieser Zeit nicht werth seien der Herrlichkeit, die an uns solle offenbar werden,') — woraus er eine gleiche Herrlichkeit aller folgert — so ist dies offenbar eine «^X13g zu fassende Stelle. Denn wo wäre wohl geschrieben, daß die Herrlichkeit derer, die auf den zwölf Stühlen zu sitzen nicht berufen sind, daS Leiden dieser Zeit nicht verlohne?

Haben wir es bisher mit der schriftmäßigen Begründung des Dogmas zu thun gehabt, so gehen wir nunmehr zur dogmatisch-geschichtlichen Behandlung desselben über. Stellten wir bei der erfteren die thetische Beweisführung voran, so erscheint es hier zweckmäßig, von vorn herein wenigstens einen Theil der gegen unsre Lehre angestregten Polemik ins Auge zu fassen. Es sollen nämlich unserem Dogma, auch abgesehen von den biblischen Bedenken, die gegen dasselbe geltend gemacht wurden, innerlich gewisse unüberwindliche Schwierigkeiten und Widersprüche anhaften. Im Begriffe der Seligkeit als des höchsten subjeetiven Gutes soll es liegen, daß es seiner eigensten superlativischen Natur gemäß einer Steigerung und Verminderung unfähig sei. Das Erste also, was uns obliegt, ist, daß wir die Existenz von Graden der Seligkeit nach ihrer inneren Möglichkeit erwägen, und zwar wird dieselbe theils von logischer, theils von psychologischer Seite zu erweisen sein. In dieser zwiefachen Hinsicht wollen wir, unsre im Gingang angekündigte Methode einhaltend, die kirchlichen Zeugnisse und Argumente für und gegen jene Möglichkeit ins Auge fassen.

Zuerst scheint, logisch genommen, in dem: Seligsein und dabei Verschiedensein ein Widerspruch zu liegen. Schon der Cappadocier Basilius sucht offenbar solchem Einwand zu begegnen, wenn «r, Wesentliches und Unwesentliches in dem Besitzstand der Seligm unterscheidend sagt, der Natur nach freilich feien alle Seligen einander gleich, der Unterschied gehe nur die Würde an. Wie unter den Engeln Gottes diese dienten, jene herrschten, wie der Geist Gottes vom Vater verschieden, wie die Sterne ungleich an Klarheit, so seien verschieden der Würde nach allerdings auch die vollkommenen Gerechte«. Aber wenn an Würde und an Rang einer den zweiten oder dritten Platz Hab«, so folge daraus noch mit Nichten, daß er seiner Natur nach von dem ersten in feiner Ordnung verschieden sei/) in der That eine wenig glückliche Unterscheidung, bei der die Verschiedenheit der Würde als rein zufällig erscheinen muß. War aber diese Lösung nicht glücklich, so kann es nicht auffällig erscheinen, wenn Thomas der Scholastiker den alten Faden wieder aufnimmt und nunmehr ausdrücklich da« schon der Betrachtung des Basilius zum Grunde liegende Problem aufstellt, wie, wenn doch der Kleinste« im Himmelreich schon d«s höchsten Gutes theilhaftig sei, es über das hinaus, was auch dem Kleinsten zu Theil geworden, noch etwas Höheres geben könne, ^) Mit der Lösung des Thomas nun wollen wir uns an dieser Stelle nicht zu thun machen; offenbar ist, man sollte, genau genommen, von dem hohen Gute, von dem subjectiven Gute schlechthin reden. Man sollte das Gut nicht nur in seiner Relation zu den irdischen Gütern, man sollte es auch an sich fassen. Selbst wenn man es, in solcher Relation betrachtet, als die höchste Stufe einer Güterleiter ansieht, sollten sich nicht auf dieser Stufe als gemeinsamer Unterlage auch wiederum andre aufbauen? Freilich sehen wir auch den Albertus, den Zeitgenossen des Thomas, noch einmal auf die Bahn des Basilius einlenken. Weit entfernt, meint er, daß das Aufnehmen der ganzen Fülle göttlichen Seins und göttlicher Wahrheit, wie es sich Albert als bei den Seligen eintretend vorstellt, noch wesenhafte Gradunterschiede 'gestatte, ist vielmehr daS Vorhandensein solcher natürlichen Unterschiede auch in der diesseitigen Welt, wie thatsächlich auch immer, doch gerade ein Hinderniß der Vollkommenheit;-') beiläufig bemerkt, eine Behauptung, die ethischer Weise ihre Bedenken hat, wie sehr auch die Sünde an den creatürlichen Unterschieden Anlaß nimmt. In der Welt der Vollendung nun findet nach Albert freilich eine Vertheilung der Geschäfte unter Verschiedene aber ohne wesentlichen Unterschied der Personen statt. Es ist wie bei den Engeln: auch unter ihnen Unterschied der Unter- und Ueberordnung, aber nur auf die heilig« Handlung, das Geschäft in der Hierarchie bezüglich. Also fast ganz wie Basilius, nur daß statt der Würde das Geschäft steht. Das gegen Basilius Bemerkte trifft darum Albert in gesteigertem Maaße: wo ohne Unterschied der Naturen Unterschied der Geschäfte, da finden wir schon hier Widerspruch: sollte zdas im Himmel anders sein?

Auch in der erneuerten Kirche ist man anfangs dem vor Alters betretenen Wege treu geblieben. Die von den Scholastikern überkommene sehr allgemeine Unterscheidung von essentiellen und acccstotischen Gütern') ist wesentlich als ein Versuch anzusehen, jener logischen Schwierigkeit: selig und doch verschieden, Herr zu werden. Auch dieser Versuch kann indessen befriedigend so lange nicht genannt werden, als man das Accidentelle als solches nicht irgendwie dogmatisch begründet. ^) Indessen werden später jene Schwierigkeiten, mit denen man sich lange wenig glücklich abmühte, allerdings befriedigender gelöst. Ein Andres, bemerkt Scherzes) richtig, sei ungleich« Vollkommenheit, ein Andres Unvollkommenheit, und wie letztere auszuschließen, so sei erste« allerdings zu setzen. Einen Fortschritt möchten wir darin wenigstens insofern erkennen, als von der unbestimmten Unterscheidung von Wesentlichem und Unwesentlichem, sowie von der unbefriedigenden von Würde und Natur abgesehen wird. Insonderheit aber ist mit Bretschneider daraufhinzuweisen, daß alle Polemik gegen die Möglichkeit der Grade, insofern sie ihre Argumente aus der Idee der Seligkeit hernimmt, von der unerwiesenen Voraussetzung ausgeht, daß die Seligkeit ein einfacher Zustand sei, und daß sie ihrem ganzen Inhalt nach etwa durch das Gottschauen, diesen Ausdruck gleichbedeutend genommen dem intuitiven Erkennen bezeichnet werden könne. Bretschneider — dessen übrige Anschauungen man selbstverständlich nicht mit in Kauf zu nehmen hat — hat im Allgemeinen nicht Unrecht, wenn er die Seligkeit als eine höhere innere Vollkommenheit, verbunden mit neuer Thätigkeit, Verbindung mit andern Wesen, einem neuen Verhältniß zur Sinnenwelt, überhaupt für etwas Gemischtes erklärt ^): natürlich daß die Vorstellung willkürlicher Zusammensetzung auszuschließen ist.

Konnte man nun logischer Weise die Frage auswerfen, ob mit dem Begriffe der Seligkeit nicht jedwede Verschiedenheit der Seligen streite so könnte man jenen ähnlichen Einwand auch psychologischerseits auswerfen. Hier sei doch Verschiedenheit der Christen, damit auch noch oft Neid der einen, Ueberhebung der andern, kurz ungeordnete Affecte. Würde nun jene Verschiedenheit auch jenseits noch sein, wie wolle man dann ihre diesseitigen Folgen ausschließen? Die Frage, so gestellt, beantwortet sich allerdings schon von einem ziemlich vulgären moralischen Standpunkte kurz dahin, daß von einer Rivalität der verschieden gearteten Seligen, eben weil sie vollendet sind, im Himmel nicht die Rede sein könne. Wenn so die Möglichkeit einer Verschiedenheit von dieser Seite kaum mit dem geringsten Schein beanstandet werden kann, so scheint sich, und das führt freilich über die Frage nach der Möglichkeit, mit der wir es jetzt zu thun haben, zum Theil hinaus — das aufgestellte Bedenken in der That in ein positives Argument für die Lehre, von den Unterschieden zu verwandeln. Ist nämlich an der moralischen Güte der Seligen irgend welches Grades von vom herein kein Zweifel, so scheint jedes Verhältniß, welches die Offenbarung dieser sittlichen Vollkommenheit ermöglicht, resp. denkbar macht, wie die Verschiedenheit der Seligen offenbar ein solches ist, von denen, die über diese Dinge denken, eifrig ins Auge gefaßt werden, unter Umständen als ein wirklich bestehendes angenommen werden zu müssen.

Die Freiheit der Seligen von Neid sowohl als Hochmut!) ist im Interesse der Lehre von den Graden von den Lehrern der Kirche von jeher betont worden. Von Neid wird nach Augustinus in jenem seligen Reiche, wie auch ein Stern sich von dem andern unterscheidet an Klarheit, nichts zu finden sein. Man wird des großen Gutes sich freuen, daß niemand seinem Oberen, gleich wie auch kein Engel dem Erzengel seine höhere Stellung mißgönnt. Verschiedene werden verschiedene Gaben haben, doch so, daß sie alle die eine Gabe gemein haben, nicht mehr, als sie haben zu wollen.°) Prosper von Aquitanien folgt dem Augustinus mit einer gleichen Betrachtung. °) Diese Gabe, nicht mehr, als man hat, zu wollen, ruht aber, wie Gregor d. G. auseinandersetzt,^) auf jenem allen Seligen gemeinen universalen Liebessinn, der der Gemeinschaft der Gaben sich freuet: was man nicht für sich selber empfangen hat, das freue man sich in einem Andern empfangen zu haben.— Und wie der alte Gregor, so beschäftigt sich auch der mittelalterliche Duns mit der Frage. Will Linus, der Bischof, fragt er, mehr seine eigne Seligkeit, als die der seligen Jungfrau? Er ist vorsichtig mit der Entscheidung. Man solle doch vor Todsünden sich selber noch eifriger bewahren, als Andere; das heiße, man müsse sich mehr als Andere lieben, d. i. mehr als Anderer, seine eigene Seligkeit suchen. Aber freilich nun die eigene Seligkeit doch nur nach dem göttlich bestimmten Maße: und was dies Maß anlange, so sei das der Maria größer, als das des Linus; weil größer nach Gottes Willen, so müsse auch Linus es größer wollen.^) Auch die lutherische Theologie, wie sie in Bezug auf die Lehre von den Graden überhaupt das Erbe der mittelalterlichen Kirche fast ungeschmälert antritt, hält es der Mühe für werth, die Neidlosigkeit der Vollendeten aller Grade hervorzuheben. So ist Mevfart bemüht, von den Jungfrauen, Lehrern und Märtyrern, von allen Auserwählten, trotz ihrer Eigenart den Verdacht des Neides abzuwehren.°) So wird treffend von Scriver auf Phil. 2, 3. 4. hingewiesen: wenn durch Demuth schon hier Einer den Andern höher halte, denn sich selber, wie viel mehr werde man dort auch diesen Befehl des Herrn vollkommen erfüllen.°) Sehr entschieden und mit bestimmter Beziehung auf die Lehre von der gerechten Vergeltung wird auch in dem Jahrhundert der Aufklärung die Neidlosigkeit aller Ordnungen der Seligen von Schubert behauptet. Die Seligen, heißt es, auch der niederen Grade, würden Verdruß empfinden, wenn sie erführen, daß ungleiche Werke mit einer gleichen Herrlichkeit belohnt würden. ^) Bei Schubert's berühmtem Zeitgenossen Bahrdt ist die Vorstellung der Neidlosigkeit durch den sehr energisch hingestellten dogmatischen Satz befürwortet, daß Gott unsere Seelen umschaffen und die niederen Gesinnungen irdischer Menschen, alle unsere Wünsche und Begierden tödten werde, s)

In neuerer Zeit ist die Lehre von der Neidlosigkeit der Seligen auch mit der Voraussetzung einer Verschiedenheit der Arbeit und des Berufes im Himmelreich in Beziehung gesetzt worden. Die Bitte der Söhne Zebedäi um eine besondere Wirksamkeit im Reiche der Herrlichkeit wird von Schlei ermacht, mit welchen Einschränkungen auch immer, wegen des ungeordneten Affectes, der in dieser Bitte wenigstens mit zum Ausdruck komme, entschieden als eine unberechtigte angesehen. Es möge, sagt er, anfangs einerlei zu sein scheinen, ob man die Sache Jesu liebt, oder ob man sich bestrebe, unter den Vorkämpfern dieser Sache einen ausgezeichneten Rang zu behaupten. Aber in Wahrheit sei dem doch anders, da oft der Dienst der Sache gerade dasjenige erfordere, wodurch man am wenigsten leuchten und glänzen könne. Da heiße es freiwillig zurücktreten in die zweite und dritte Reihe, wo man in der ersten nicht am Orte sei.«) Bei Schleiermacher reicht diese Betrachtung freilich, wie sehr auch der biblische Tert dazu anleitet, kaum über das Diesseitige hinaus. Bei Nihisch») dagegen ist dies entschieden der Fall, wenn er, den Früheren sehr ähnlich, das Bedenken ablehnt, ob nicht irgend einen sein Dienst im Himmel verdrießen werde.

Der Vorstellung vom Neide der Geringen entspräche auf der andern Gelte die vom Hochmuth der Großen im Himmelreich. Bei der Selbstverständlichkeit dieses Correlats kann man sich nicht wundern, das letztere nicht überall ausgesprochen zu finden. Schön wird die Vorstellung vom Hochmulh der Seligen abgewiesen von Thomas von Kempen: „Alle Heiligen, je größer sie sind in der Glorie, je demüthiger sind sie in ihnen selbst.“<sup>2)</sup> Sie werden also auch wohl nichts von dem, was Schleier» mach« „das trügerische Gefühl der Herablassung“ nennt, in sich nähren. Sie sind, wie Stockmeyer sagt, „frei von dem Schmutze des Neides sowohl als des Stolzes.«)

Beruhet auf dieser Freiheit von Stolz und Neid die psychologische Möglichkeit der graduellen Verschiedenheit der Seligen, so ist freilich hervorzuheben, daß sich hier die früher erwähnte Unterscheidung von Herrlichkeit«- und Telligkeitsgraden aufdrängt. Ist nämlich die Neldlosigkeit ein wesentlicher Bestandtheil nicht nur der sittlichen Vollkommenheit, die den Vollendeten eignet, sondern unmittelbar auch, wie des diesseitigen ZufriedenseinS, so des jenseitigen Seligseins, so liegt die Folgerung nahe, daß nicht nur in Beziehung auf diesen, sondern auch auf alle Bestandtheile seligen Lebens eine Gleichheit der Vollendeten zu denken sei. Und allerdings ist nicht zu verkennen, daß, obwohl eine bewußte Unterscheidung von Sellgkeits- und Herrlichkeitsgraden keineswegs auch nur der Mehrzahl der Lehrer und Väter geläufig ist, hier eine Instanz gegen die Seligkeits- und für die Herrlichkeitsgrade vorliegt.

Hatten wir es soeben mit der Möglichkeit der Verschiedenheit im Allgemeinen zu thun, so ist weiter zu fragen, welchen Spielraum diese Möglichkeit im Besonderen haben werde. Dieser letztere ist auf verschiedene Weise bestimmt worden.

Die erste Stufe der Versuche, ihn auszumitteln, ist die der irgendwie eigenthümlich gewandten, dabei zuweilen nicht ohne Willkür gruppirten Wiederholungen von Schriftaussagen. Dergleichen bieten namentlich die schon mehrfach erwähnten neueren Predigtsammlungen, die auf diese Gegenstände gern und ausführlich eingehen, gar manches. Essen und Trinken über dem Tische Iesu, Essen von dem Baume des Lebens, Essen von dem verborgenen Manna, Trinken von dem Gewächs des Weinstocks, Theilhaftigsein des guten Zeugnisses, des neuen Namens, der weißen Kleider, der lichten Leiber, alles das sind nach Kapf besondere Seligkeiten — unter den Herrlichkeiten aber ist das Sitzen auf Iesu Stuhl die alles überragende, größte. *) Was wir in dieser Zusammenstellung etwa noch vermissen, gibt uns Hoffmann, wenn er verweist auf das Pfeilersein im Tempel Gottes u. A.) Es ist der Ruhm dieser Ausführungen, daß sie sich von dem Schriftgrunde nicht trennen und trotz des hie und da Spielenden und Willkürlichen in der Gruppierung, wenigstens in der Sache selbst der subjectiven Phantasterei sich enthalten. Daß sie Anspruch auf dogmatische Schärfe machten und den bildlichen Character der biblischen Schilderung ganz wegläugneten, wird man ihnen nicht nachsagen.

In strengerer Form aber hat man jenen Spielraum der Unterschiede in vier verschiedenen Richtungen ausgemessen. Man hat den Sitz der letzteren gesucht in den verschiedenen Objecten der Freude, in besonderen Eigenthümlichkeiten der Subjecte, in der Beziehung der letzteren zu Gott, in ihren Thätigkeiten im Himmelreich.

Wenn von den Objecten der Freude die Rede ist, die eine besondere Seligkeit begründen sollen, s« ist es die Lehre von den Kränzen oder Kronen, die zuerst uns beschäftigt. Wie spät auch diese „Abenteuerlichkeit“ in dem anspruchsvollen Tone eines dogmatischen Satzes auftrat, eine Spur davon, freilich z. Th. in dem Gewande eines poesiereichen Traumgesichts finden wir schon bei Augustinus in einem nach dem Tode des Hieronvmus an Cyrill von Ierusalem gerichteten Briefe. ^) Nachdem der Bischof von Hippo die großen Tugenden und Verdienste des viersprachigen Theologen gerühmt hat, unternimmt er es, dessen Stellung im Reiche der Herrlichkeit zu ermitteln. Er will nicht so kühn sein, zu behaupten, daß der Abgeschiedene, in der Kraft der Gnaden Gestandene vor dem Vorläufer des Gnaoenspenders einen Vorzug habe. Der Herr wisse ja von keinem vom Weibe Geborenen, der größer sei, als er. So erklärt er ihn denn vorläufig für gleich selig mit dem Täufer. Doch macht er nachträglich auch von dieser Gleichheit noch einen kleinen Abzug. Iohannes trägt nämlich im Himmel ein Diadem mit dreien Reifen, während das des Hieronvmus nur deren zwei aufweist. Später wird dies Dogma von den Kränzen auch biblisch begründet,') zunächst von Rabanus.) Er ist der Meinung, der goldene Kranz, der auf dem Tisch des Herrn in der Stiftshütte angebracht war, und der der Vulgata zufolge als ein ciselirter gedacht wird, müsse, vorgeblich^') schon nach Bcda's des Ehrwürdigen Vorgang anagogisch gedeutet werden. Dieser Kranz, meint er, würde glatt und nicht ciselirt gearbeitet sein, hätte nicht die ungleiche Herrlichkeit der himmlischen Gerechten eben dadurch angedeutet werden sollen. Und so kann denn dies Wort vom Kranze von Rabanus mit dem Paulinischen 1. Cor. 15, 41 als ein locus pi.oban» zusammengestellt werden. — Wie äußerst haltlos auch alles das war, die Stelle Raban's hat offenbar der Blossa «i,äinai.ia Walafrids, der auch hier in die Fußstapfen seines Lehrers getreten ist, gleichsam den Weg bereitet. ^) Mit der ciselirten Arbeit an dem Kranze des Tisches macht sich freilich Walafrid nicht mehr zu thun. Da die Vulgata das doppelte ser s»Ii»b einmal durch coi.on», dann aber durch corou« nureolu, wiedergibt, so ist jener eiselirte Kranz ihm nur die Seligkeit im Allgemeinen, deren jeder, „der die Gebote hält“, theilhaftig wird. Diesem Kranze wird nun aber ein Kränzlein aufgesetzt, und das ist die besondere Seligkeit. Behalten ist nach Walaftid dies Kränzlein denen, die dem Worte des Herrn Marc. 10, 21 nachkommen, die selber unbefleckt von dem Umgang mit Weibern »ach Apoc. 14, 3. mit jungfräulicher Seele dem Lamme das neue Lied singen. Wenn in alle dem Poesie ist, aber verlässliche Wahrheit keine, so gilt das Gleiche von dem, was die Scholastik, insonderheit Thomas und Duns bringt. Der letzte« hat schon ausgemacht, nicht nur, daß es verschiedene Kränzlein gibt, sondern auch, daß dieselben bei den Jungfräulichen von weißer, bei den Blutzengen von rother, bei den Kirchenlehrern von grüner Farbe sein werden. Ia, auch das istno ch nicht genug, beiläufig wird noch hinzugefügt, daß die Märtyrer „vielleicht“ Palmen, die Jungfrauen weiße Lilien, die Lehrer grüne, unverwelkliche Zweige in den Händen tragen werden, l) Solchen Phantasien kann denn wohl auch die ernsthaftere Betrachtung eines Thomas, mit welcher er die Annahme der Dreizahl der Kränzlein zu rechtfertigen sucht — über das Fleisch siegen die Jungfrauen, über den Teufel die Lehrer, über die Welt die Märtyrer — keinen Zuwachs von Gunst verschaffen. In Erwägungen, wie: ob dieses oder jenes von den Kränzlein den Vorzug verdiene, oder: ob dem heiligen Sebastian, dem nach der Legende zweimal Getödteten, nicht etwa eine doppelte Martyrkrone beschieden sein dürfte,2) hat sich diese Art von Dogmatik vollenos das Todesurtheil gesprochen. — Wenn auf lutherischem Kirchengebiet auch später noch Aehnliches auftritt, — die Starrheit des dogmatischen Begriffes, mit der sich das ursprünglich bildlich Gemeinte in der Zeit der Scholastik umgeben hatte, ist geschwunden. Auch Meyfart') weiß noch von der rosenfarbenen Klarheit der Märtyrer, der schneeweißen der Jungfrauen, der sternengleichen ^) der Lehrer der Kirche zu reden. Aber immerhin sind es nicht mehr „Kränze“, sondern „Klarheit“, immerhin will er doch eigentlich nichts weiter, als durch Beispiele und Sinnbilder die Idee der jenseitigen Verschiedenheit erläutern, immerhin hält er es für nöthig, auch von der andern Auserwählten eigenthümlichen Vorzügen zu reden. Ihn kann der Spott billiger Weise nicht treffen, mit dem der Reformirte Rivet spät, aber immer noch gerecht jene scholastischen Fündlein geißelt, wenn er die auf den „grünen Kranz“, den Lohn ihrer Weisheit, ungeduldigen Kirchenlehrer einstweilen wenigstens mit einer grünen Kapuze bedenken will. °)

War diese Lehre von den Kränzen einmal aufgegeben, so konnte es kaum anders sein, als daß sich in Bezug auf die Vorstelligmachung eines in den Objecten der Freude beruhenden Unterschiedes der Seligen die Tendenz großer Verallgemeinerung Bahn brach. Calirt, aller anmaßlichen Bestimmtheit feind, begnügt sich, auf die tausend und abertausend Gegenstände hinzudeuten, welche Gott den Seligen, dem einen diesen, dem andern jenen, zu ihrer Freude vor die Geistesaugen zu stellen die Macht habe.«) Er, wie in unseren Tagen Stockmeyer weist auf die besonderen Offenbarungen hin, mit denen Gott die Einen mit diesen, die Andern mit jenen, erquickten werde. ')

Was die Möglichkeit eines Offenbarwerdens von Unterschieden an den seligen Subjecten betrifft, so ist die Lehre von der Klarheit der Leiber schon frühe kirchlich recipirt gewesen. ^) Schon Augustin freilich, bei dem diese Lehre noch mit einem schüchternen „Vielleicht“ auftritt, fühlt, indem er sie vorträgt, das Nedürfniß einer Vergeistigung derselben. „Wir brennen“, sagt er, „von Liebe zu den seligen Märtyrern, und wünschen, jenseits ihre Wundenmale zu sehen, und vielleicht werden wir sie sehen.“ Dabei aber bemerkt er sogleich, die Schönheit der Leiber werde, obwohl eben am Leibe fichtbar werdend, doch vornehmlich eine geistige Tugendschönheit offenbaren, natürlich in den verschiedensten Abstufungen') Wenn nun Augustinus noch zweifelt, ob Menschen fähig sind, diese Dinge zu denken, geschweige denn, sie geziemlich auszusprechen, wird die verschiedenartige Herrlichkeit der Leiber von der Scholastik in der sinnlichsten Weise ausgemalt. Eine besondere Schönheit soll nach Petrus Paludanus<sup>1)</sup> bei dem Prediger am Munde, bei den Märtyrern an den Narben, bei den Jungfrauen sogar an den Geschlechtstheilen zu Tage kommen. Ja, nicht nur die herrliche Klarheit, sondern auch die große Beweglichkeit der Auferstehungsleiber, auch die letztere als der Steigerung und Verminderung fähig, wird als Dogma sirirt. *) Auch die protestantische Dogmatik des sechszehnten Jahrhunderts nimmt, mit Abzug des offenbar Anstößigen und Abgeschmackten diesen Stoff doch meist fertig herüber und betont besonders die verschiedenartige Klarheit der Leiber. °) Erst Calirt, wie er für die Objecte der Freude die größte Mannigfaltigkeit in Anspruch nahm, protestirt gegen die Einseitigkeit dieses Dogma's von der Leibesklarheit, freilich, ohne viel gehört zu werden.«) Selbst das Jahrhundert der Aufklärung, sofern es nicht überhaupt allen ähnlichen Stoffen gleichgültig oder verneinend den Rücken gewandt hat, weiß von „ungleichen Graden der Vollkommenheit der Leiber der Seligen".<sup>1)</sup> Ja, auch unsere Zeit, an wiedererwecktem Leben nicht minder, als an todtgeborenen Verjüngungstendenzen reich, hat nicht nur die Lehre von der Klarheit, sondern auch jene scholastische von der Beweglichkeit der Leiber erneuert. Daß „die Trennungen des Raumes drüben nicht sind," möchte man vielleicht noch zugeben; daß aber darum die Auferstandenen mit ihren Geistleibern im Augenblick die weiten Räume durchfliegen/ muß doch wohl zu den Phantasien, die kaum auf Probabilität Anspruch haben, gezählt werden.

Nenn man die Grade theils durch das Object, theils durch Eigenthümlichkeiten des Subjects der seligen Freude bedingt dachte, so lag von vorn herein ein Drittes nahe, sie nämlich von der Relation zwischen Subject und Object abhängig zu machen. Diese Relation konnte vorwiegend sinnlich, konnte aber auch vorwiegend geistig gefaßt werden. Was das Erste betrifft, so nahm man frühzeitig verschiedene Oertlichkeiten an, an denen die Seligen verschiedener Grade ihren Sitz hätten. Und da als der Mittelpunkt des seligen Reiches sonder Zweifel die heilige Dreieinigkeit zu denken war, so mußte die Herrlichkeit der verschiedenen Orte der Seligen nach ihrem größeren oder geringeren Abstand von dem Throne der Dreieinigkeit gemessen werden. Schon Irenäus ist auf dieser Spur, wenn er der Seligen einen die Speise des Paradieses genießen, andre die leuchtende Herrlichkeit der glänzenden Stadt innehaben, noch andre in den Himmel eingehen läßt. ^) Origenes folgt ihm, indem er Abrahams Schooß hinzufügt, und von verschiedenen Orten und Wohnstätten ausdrücklich redet. 2) Wie ferner das Mittelalter, mit der Lehre von den Kränzen nicht zufrieden, durch bedeutende Vertreter feiner Anschauungsweise auch die von den Orten der Seligen ausgemalt hat, ist aus Dante's göttlicher Comödie genugsam bekannt. Auch die nüchterneren Dogmatik!<sup>1)</sup> der lutherischen Kirche, wie fern sie auch den ausgesponnenen Phantasieen des katholischen Dichters stehen, haben es doch nicht schlechthin für Phantasterei geachtet, von verschiedenen Orten der Seligen zu reden. Freilich der alte Chvt 1 äus, obwohl er eine große Verschiedenheit in den sogenannten accidentellen Gütern zugesteht, hält doch die Vorstellung verschiedener räumlicher Entfernungen von Christo für entschieden bedenklich. Fast uneingedenk seiner übrigen Zugeständnisse bemerkt er, so sehr dürfe man das Leos auch der Geringsten im Himmel nicht herabsehen, daß man sie Christo, dem Mittler des Heils ferner rücke, als die Großen.<sup>1)</sup> Quenstedt aber ist dies ältere Bedenken schon geschwunden. Der günstigere oder der ungünstigere Platz bei dem Mahle im Himmelreich gehört ihm ausdrücklich zu den accessorischen Gütern, in Betreff deren eine große Verschiedenheit stattfindet.^) Auch Calirt fragt, warum man nicht in der näheren oder entfernteren Stellung zu dem Herrn eine stufenmäßige Verschiedenheit der Seligen erkennen wolle. ^) Diesem verhältnißmäßig großen Conservatismus der älteren Zeit gegenüber geht die neuere nun mich in dieser Beziehung in die verschiedensten Richtungen auseinander. Der unwürdigen, an einem dem unsrigen wenigstens sehr verwandten Gegenstande geübten Persiflage eines Strauß, der da nicht begreifen kann, wie bei dem Gericht auch nur ein Territorium, wie das Königreich Böhmen die Menge der zu Richtenden weide fassen können, werden wir wenigstens bis zu dem Eingefüß folgen, daß, die finnliche Vorstellung einmal festgehalten, über die Verschiedenheit der Entfernungen von dem Herrn auch in dem auf das Gericht folgenden Leben der Verklärten kein Zweifel obwalten könnte. Denn de« Bemerkung Bretschneider«, ^ daß die Lehre von den Graden auch darum aufrecht erhalten werden könne und müsse, weil es eine irrtümliche Vorstellung sei, daß die Seligkeit „durch den Eintritt in einen Ort geschenkt werde“, vermögen wir keinen befriedigenden Sinn abzugewinnen. Solchem SlepliciSmus in Bezug auf den Ort der Seligen gegenüber hat denn auch die neuere Zeit zum Theil positiver e Lehrformen angestrebt. Die modeme Weltansicht hat selbst Schrifttellen benutzt, „um ihren Traum von einer Vertheilung der Seelen auf alle Planeten und Firsterne biblisch zu begründen.“ Auch Peter Lange 2) will den Himmel Gottes, in dem die verschiedenen Wohnungen der Seligen sind, „nicht von der Sternenwelt spiritualiftisch unterscheiden“, wenn gleich nicht „alle Sterne als himmlische Wohnungen zu betrachten“ feien. Daß die heilige Schrift nichts von Sternenbewohnern meldet, „am wenigsten die ihrer Körper entkleideten Seelen auf andere Sterne gehen lasse“, wird zugestanden werde» müssen.) Uebrigens gehört hierher auch, was von Kapf (a. a. O.) von den „Königspriestern“, die den Tempel der neuen Erde bewohnen, im Unterschied« v«n den übrigen Bewohnern der neuen Erde gelehrt wird, welche ersteren mit dem über zehn Städte Gesetzten in der Parabel Jesu identifizirt weroen.

Die nähere oder fernere Relation der Seligen zu dem Quell aller Freud« und Seligkeit ist nun durch den Ort, wenn auch zum Theil, doch nicht ausschließlich bedingt. Die Möglichkeit, auch von fem« her mit dem Throne der Herrlichkeit in die innigste Beziehung zu treten, ist schon, die Sache ganz finnlich angesehen, vorhanden. Die Vollkommenheit des Organe«, besonders aber die Intensität des Lichtes als Medium bedingen schon für das leibliche Sehen, von allen Entfernungen abgesehen, verschiedene Deutlichkeit deS Schauens. Wäre es nun wahr, was Buddeus sagt, daß die intuitive Gotteserkenntniß, die wir den Seligen beilegen, nach Analogie des leiblichen Sehens zu denken ift, ^) so gälte auch für die erstere, was eben vom letzteren gesagt wurde. In dieser intuitiven Erkenntniß der Seligm werden denn auch in der That von Alters her graduelle Verschiedenheiten angenommen. Bei IrenäuS') hängt das aufs engste mit seiner Theorie über die Oertlichkeiten zusammen. „Alle werden den Heilaud und Erlöser sehen“, aber von verschiedenen Standpunkten. Bei Origenes dagegen herrscht ein merkwürdiger Widerstreit. Hat er, wie wir vorher sahen, allerdings auch von Orten der Seligen gesprochen, so will er wenigstens, daß diese Orte mit der Deutlichkeit des Schauens nichts zu chun haben, Gott wird auch im Himmel nur gesehen, wenn er gesehen sein will; er wird unsichtbar, sobald er es nicht will. Er will aber nicht gesehen werden von denen, die nicht reines Herzens sind, ein Vorzug, der nach Origenes keineswegs allen Seligen eignet.«) Und wie diese Alten, so weiß auch die Scholastik von Graden des Schauens. Thomas macht sie von dem Licht der Herrlichkeit, als dem göttlichen Medium abhängig. Die Liebe freilich ist es, die die Sehnsucht nach Gott und dadurch auch die größere Empfänglichkeit für das Licht der Herrlichkeit zu Wege bringt.

Die Neueren haben zumeist von dieser Bahn abgelenkt. Das Schauen von Angesicht zu Angesicht wurde als Ausdruck für die wesentliche Seligkeit genommen, die allen gemein sein mußte. Ori» genistische Phantasieen durften hiervon nichts abziehen. So verwahrt sich denn Gerhard ausdrücklich gegen die Einführung von Unterschieden, wo es sich ihm um wesentliches Seligkeitsgut handelt.») Wie verschieden auch die Orte sein mögen, meint auch Lavater, an denen sich Selige bewegen, das ist vor Allem zu betonen, daß man immer den Herrn sieht „und ihn niemals aus dem Gesichte verlieren wird“. 2) Freilich gibt es auch Abweichungen von dieser Verwahrung, die freilich zu den glücklichen nicht zählen können. Wenn Origenes auch unreine Herzen in seinen Himmel hineindichtete, was ist es anders, wenn auch nach Heubner „kalte, selbstgenügsame Geister, in denen der Hochmut!) und Dünkel nichts als höchstens kalte Achtung gegen Iesum aufkommen ließ“, des seligen Reiches Bürger werden. Freilich kann man sich dann nicht wundern, daß diese „in düsterer Dämmerung“ wandeln müssen, „wo sie nur einen matten Wiederstrahl der himmlischen Sonne wie beim Mondlicht“ empfangen.)

Die größere oder geringere Unmittelbarkeit des Schauens war es eben, was die Verschiedenheit der Grade bedingte. Als Medium dieses Schauens galt dem Thomas das Licht der Herrlichkeit, welches selber wiederum von der scholastischen Philosophie für ein unerschaffenes erklärt wird. Ein Schritt weiter ist es demnach, wenn nun selbst geschaffene Wesen die Vermittelung des seligen Lebens an andre Creaturen übernehmen sollen, und durch die größere oder geringere Mittelbarkeit des Empfangens eine Verschiedenheit der Seligen bewirkt gedacht wird. Auch diese Vorstellung ist eine alte, schon dem Origenes eignende. Gemäß seiner Ueberzeugung von der erhabenen Reinheit, die den Gott Schauenden zukommt, kann er die Seligkeit des Schauens nicht allen Seligen zuerkennen. Auch im Himmel wird ja Gott wie auf Erden sein auserwähltes Volk haben. Gehört nun eine Seele nicht zu diesem Volk des Eigenthums, so ist sie darum noch nicht zu der Schaar der Unseligen verstoßen, ^) nur eines geringeren Seligkeitsgrades, etwa des Schauen der heiligen Engel als eines Abglanzes der göttlichen Herrlichkeit, ist sie nach Origenes theilhaftig. ^) Dieser Origenistischen Ansicht ist die des Areopagiten und des Erigena <sup>2)</sup> ähnlich, welche beide den Gott entfernter Stehenden die Erkenntniß desselben in alle Ewigkeit durch Höherstehende vermitteln lassen. — Wenn endlich auch Kapf's erwähnte Auslegung des „Aufgenommen werden in die ewigen Hütten" <sup>2)</sup> hierher zu zählen ist, so verdient freilich gegen sie und alles Aehnlich« Lavater's Bemerkung gehalten zu werden, daß alle Seligen nicht nur alles im Ueberfluß vor sich finden, sondern auch alles nicht gleichsam leihweise, sondern „als ihr Eigenthum " genießen werden. ^) Wenn in dem Bisherigen der Gesichtspunkt des seligen Genießens vorwaltete, sei es der Genuß der verklärten Leiblichkeit, sei es der der Kränze und Kronen, sei es endlich der des Schauens der göttlichen Herrlichkeit, so mußte auch der Gesichtspunkt der Thätigkeit, wenn auch einer solchen, in der der selige Genuß bereits mitgesetzt ist, bei dem Bestreben, den Spielraum der Verschiedenheit aussindig zu machen, zur Geltung kommen. Die Lehr-fähigkeit und -thätigkeit, welche nach Origenes gewissen Auserwählten eignet, — nämlich den in der Parabel über fünf und über zehn Städte Gesetzten, schien denen, welchen sie beiwohnt resp. vertraut ist, verglichen mit dem ihrer Leitung vertrauten Cötus, eine höhere Befriedigung zu gewähren. <sup>o</sup>) Wenn nun später die sonst nichts weniger als origenensirende alt-lutherische Kirche den Spielraum der Verschiedenheit in Betracht der accefforischen Güter einen weiten sein läßt, und die „freie Thätigkeit im Reiche Gottes" als ein solches accessorisches Gut gefaßt wird, «) so ist sie wenigstens in dieser Beziehung dem Origenes nicht ferne. Auch in neuester Zeit ist Ols Hausens') Auseinandersetzung über die Stufen der herrschenden Kraft mit der Steinmeyer's Ausführungen <sup>s</sup>) zu vergleichen sind, unter diese Kategorie der Versuche, die Gradverschiedenheit aus der Idee einer jenseitigen Thätigkeit zu begreifen, zu zählen.

So weit über den Spielraum der Unterschiede. Was auch von phantastischen Ausschreitungen im Einzelnen zu sagen wäre und gesagt ist, von den Richtungen, in welchen man denselben auszumessen trachtete, verhält sich keine gegen die Schriftanalogie feindselig. Die Möglichkeit, daß in jeder dieser Beziehungen sich jenseits Unterschiede verwirklichen, ist vollkommen offen zu halten. Welches sind dann aber, von Möglichkeiten abgesehen, die dogmatischen Gründe für die Nothwendigkeit der Grade?

Die geschichtliche Untersuchung wird es hier mit einer Gruppe dogmatisch-ethischer und einer anderen dogmatisch-metaphysischer Betrachtungen zu thun haben. Es kann nämlich erstens gefragt werden, ob in dem verschiedenen sittlichen Verhalten der Christen diesseits eine Nothwendigkeit verschiedener Grade jenseits gesetzt sei. Der Begriff der göttlichen Gerechtigkeit ist es, welcher diesen ersten Theil beherrscht. Auf der andern Seite ist zu fragen, ob etwa, von allem empirischen Verhalten des Christen diesseits abgesehen, die Idee eines in alle Ewigkeit fortdauernden Unterschiedes der Seligen in einem ewigen göttlichen Rathschluß begründet sei. Die Idee der göttlichen Weisheit wird es sein müssen, mit der es dieser zweite Abschnitt zu thun hat. — Mit Beziehung auf die Idee der Weisheit sowohl als die der Gerechtigkeit wird hier denn auch die bereits angeregte Frage: ob Seligkeits-, ob Herrlichkeitsgrade ihre weitere Beantwortung fordern.

Zunächst von der Begründung der Lehre von den Graden durch die Idee der Gerechtigkeit Gottes. Diese Gerechtigkeit hat es zu thun mit Werk und Arbeit des Christen. Da diese Arbeit der Christen im Reiche Gottes erfahrungsmäßig eine gar verschiedene ist, verschieden nach Dauer und Umfang, so schien diesen augenfälligen Verschiedenheiten auch im Jenseits etwas entsprechen zu müssen. Haben die Apostel, meint Clemens, nicht vor vielen Andern gearbeitet? So wird ihnen, urtheilt er auch der Vorrang im Himmel nicht fehlen: und zwar eben wegen dieser ihrer Arbeit wird er ihnen nicht fehlen, denn von einer besonderen Vorzüglichkeit ihrer Natur zu reden, wäre widersinnig. ^) Des Origenes Urtheil ist dem des Clemens verwandt. Warum Paulus besonders selig sei, geht ihm aus 1. Cor. 15, 10. hervor, 2) und ää Natth. lom. XV §. 12 werden die Stufen der Seligkeit aus dem Schriftworte bewiesen, daß einem Jeglichen vergolten werden solle nach seinen Werken. Wer meinen wollte, unbillig sei es, daß noch über dieses Leben hinaus Unterschiede bestehen sollen ^ der würde selber, urtheilt Origenes,) in hohem Grade unbillig denken. Denn in der Iullsljualit»s der Seligen kommt gerade die höchste aeyuiws Gottes zum Vorschein; nur in der Ungleichheit des Lohnes kann die rechte Angemessenheit des Jenseitigen zum Diesseitigen zu Tage kommen. Auch nach Chrysostomus offenbart sich in der Ungleichheit des Lohnes die ganze Schärfe und Sorgfalt des gerechten Gerichtes Gottes; ^) nach Hieronymus scheint diesseits noch die Sonne Gerechten und Ungerechten, jenseits wird sie auch den Gerechten, einem jeden nur nach seinem Verdienst scheinen. °) Sich gegen diese Wahrheit zu verhärten, anzunehmen, daß Paulus, der große Arbeiter im Weinberge etwa mit jenem Blutschänder in Corinth im Himmel gleiches Ergehen habe, das muß Hieronymus einfach für Lästerung erklären. — Wenn weiter diemittelalterliche Dogmatikmit ihrer Lehre von den verdienstlichen Werken naturgemäß auf die letzteren die Grade der Seligkeit gründete,«) so kann selbst der akatholische Soein, eigentlich der Lehre von den Unterschieden abgeneigt, doch auch, hierin dem Hieronymus ähnlich, nicht recht denken, daß jener Paulus mit der Fülle seiner Thaten und Leiden vor dem Schächer nichts voraus habe, der erst im letzten Stündlein Christum als Herrn erkannt hat. ^) Würde denn nicht, urtheilt Bahrdt, 2) zwei Jahrhunderte später, die Gerechtigkeit Gottes ebenso verdunkelt, als sie jetzt scheint, wollten wir annehmen, daß ein Mensch, „der sein ganzes Leben Gott und der Tugend gewidmet hatte, nicht mehr Vortheil (?!) davon haben sollte, als ein anderer, der vielleicht in den letzten Wochen seines Lebens gerettet und bekehrt wurde?“ Ebenso hält es Knapp für unmöglich und durchaus der christlichen Lehre für unangemessen, daß ein Mensch, der sein ganzes Leben der Tugend und Frömmigkeit gewidmet hatte, einem andern, der erst spät seinen ehemaligen Sünden entsagt hat, in Absicht der Belohnung gleich gedacht werde.)

Nicht gering an Umfang, wie theilweise durch das Ansehen der Vertreter ist der hier aufgestellte Consensus der Lehrer, die bei der Begründung der Grade ein Hauptgewicht auf die Werke legen. Verstärkt wird das letztere z. B. noch durch die Erwägung, daß das Gericht Gottes nur insofern das absolut gerechte sei, als es eine vergleichende Schätzung der von allen Einzelnen aufzuweisenden Summen der Werke mit in sich einschließt. Schon Origenes, indem er, an ein Wort des Herrn anknüpfend, beim Gericht Ierusalem mit Sodom verglichen werden läßt, läßt durch eben diese Vergleichung Sodom gerettet werden. Und, wenn man Bedenken tragen will, die Sodomiter am Ende noch in den Himmel zu denken, ihnen etwa den geringsten Grad von seligem Leben beizulegen, so mangelt es Origenes auch nicht an anderen Instanzen. Aus der Vergleichung mit jeder höheren Vollkommenheit geht ja nach ihm für die leichter Befundenen ein verdammendes, aus der Vergleichung mit jeder geringeren für den, der schwerer wiegt, ein freisprechendes Urtheil hervor. Mit Christus verglichen, müssen da alle verdammt werden, Christus mit allen Andern verglichen, wird von allen gerechtfertigt: er wird gerechtfertigt auch von Abraham, Isaak und Iacob, wogegen seine Gerechtigkeit auch einen Moses verurtheilt. ^) Freilich war es der individuellen Eigenthümlichkeit dieser Betrachtung entsprechend, daß sie wenige Nachfolger gefunden hat. Wir finden Aehnliches bei Duns, wenn auch er von Christi Seligkeit in Vergleich mit der der Christen handelt und des höchsten Seligkeitsmaßes allein die Seele Christi theilhaftig sein läßt, da sie allein des Lebens Werk vollkommen gethan hat. °) Auch Gerhard hat diesen Gedanken bei seinen Erörterungen über die Seligkeitsgrade ausgedrückt: wer die Seligen mit einander vergleicht, muß erfahren, daß über allen Vergleich erhaben, Christus glänzt als Haupt im Reiche des Vaters.«)

Aber auch die einzelnen Positionen, die zusammen die Summa der Werke eines Christen ausmachen, werden den Zeugnissen der Kirche zufolge auf's genaueste erwogen und gegen einander abgewogen, wodurch dann begreiflicher Weise die Verschiedenheit des Facit sich steigert. Es konnte nicht fehlen, daß man hierbei zum Theil auf bedenkliche Wege kam. Einzelne Laster und Gebrechen — das ist der Grundton dieser

Aeußerungen — schließen nicht an und für sich aus von dem seligen Leben, voraus, gesetzt, daß überwiegende Tugend die Waage hält, — wohl aber gehen sie das Maß an, das jedem Einzelnen zu Theil wird. Origenes nimmt geradezu Anstoß an der Strenge eines apostolischen Wortes und wagt es, die letztere durch Interpretation zu verringern. Es kann hart erscheinen, sagt er, daß die Lästerer nicht sollen in das Reich Gottes kommen, ^) aber diese 'Härte ist nur scheinbar. „Das Reich Gottes" umfaßt ja nicht alle Seligen, sondern nur einen Theil derselben, einen besonders bevorzugten. 2) Aehnlich verhält es sich nach Origenes mit den sl)«/unl. Wenn weder Bischof noch Presbyter, noch die Wittwe, die es wahrhaft ist, eine zweite Ehe eingehen, so ist das unstreitig ein Vorzug, und die so gewandelt haben, umfängt im Himmel das Reich der Erstgeborenen und Reinen, die Gemeinde ohne Flecken und Runzel. Ist aber darum der <^«,<ag unselig? Mit Nichten. Denn empfängt er auch nicht die unverwelkliche Krone, so gehört er doch zu denen, die in Iesu Namen anrufen und selig werden.') So wird nach Origenes alles im Gericht gewürdigt, alles gegen einander gewogen, auch, wie wir weiter erfahren, Glaube gegen Werke, Werke gegen Glauben.') Mit den Werken mag es einmal, bei einer gewissen Trägheit und Lässigkeit des Christen nicht zum Besten bestellt sein; die Werke allein angesehen, möchte derselbe im Himmel, mit Origenes zu reden, zu Ruben, Gad, Halb-Manasse zu stellen sein. Aber es wird auch der Glaube gewogen, der ihn vielleicht der Gemeinschaft Israels diesseit des Iordans würdig macht: in Rücksicht auf beides wird die absolut gerechte Entscheidung getroffen und jeder mit seinem eigenthümlichen Seligkeitsgrade bedacht werden ^) Auch auf das Verhältnis; von Werken und Gnosis wird diese Ausgleichungs-Theorie ausgedehnt: wer tapfer und treu die Kämpfe des Lebens bestanden hat, dem wird der Mangel an Gnosis nicht schlecht» hin zum Schaden gereichen.«) — Nach Origenes ergeht sich später auch Basilius d. Gr. in ähnlichen Belrachtungen des gerechten Gerichtes Gottes: auch er findet in den gedachten Eompensationen den Grund verschiedener Grade. Sollte Gott, fragt er, das Böse in einem Christenleben anschlagen, das Gute aber in der Rechnung vergessen? Wie viele Märtyrer, die zuerst verläugnet haben, haben doch nachher den Kampf wider das Fleisch aufgenommen! Sie haben mit der Zunge, nicht mit dem Herzen (?) verläugnet. Da liegt nun der Herr nicht gleichsam auf der Lauer, das Böse zu erspähen, während er das Gute bei Seite läßt. Sollte er das schnelle Wort der Verläugnung, nicht aber die langen Martern in seine Gedenkbücher schreiben? Nein, ruft Basilius aus, wir sind Menschen, nicht Engel, Gott weiß es: eine Stunde ist es, die uns stehen und fallen sieht. Da gilt es, nach Basilius, zu wissen: ein Stern übertrifft den andern an Klarheit ^); wenn dem schlechthin Standhaften ein volleres Maß beschieden werde, so gehe doch auch der Gefallene, der aufsteht, der Seligkeit nicht verlustig.') Liegt in Form und Inhalt dieser Betrachtungen allerdings etwas Unangemessenes, noch mehr in demjenigen, was Hieron ymus beibringt. Er redet den Iovinian an, der „Jerusalem mit Kittos, Iudäa mit Kypros, Christus mit Zeno" vertauscht hat. „Sagst du: ni« log ich, so lügst du; gestehst du's, so trifft dich, was WeisH. 1, 11 geschrieben ist, und zwar, nach deiner eignen Lehre, zu ewiger Verdammnis)" Dagegen, meint Hieronymus, sei die Wahrheit die, daß auch, wer gelogen hat, selig, obwohl in minderem Grade werde.') Hierher gehört auch Theodoret's sehr abenteuerliche Meinung, daß der Herr die thörichten Iungfrauen im Gleichniß auch nicht einmal seiner Anrede gewürdigt haben würde, wären sie nicht eben Iungfrauen gewesen. Da sie dies sind, und wenigstens einige Compensation zu üben ist, werden sie wenigstens dieser Ehre theilhaftig. ^)

Allen bisherigen Begründungen der Lehre von den Graden eignete derselbe Typus. Der Widerspruch gegen den letzteren, von Einzelheiten ganz abgesehen, konnte nicht wohl ausbleiben. Die Theorie von der vergleichenden Schätzung der Werke konnte leicht anthropovathisch erscheinen, die von der Compensirung in falsche Satisfactionslehren ausarten, was bekanntlich im Mittelalter im reichsten Maße der Fall war. Ueberhaupt aber kam die Zeit, wo, Werke und Seligkeit in Zusammenhang zu bringen, für gefährlich und verderblich galt: natürlich um so mehr der Versuch, besondere Werke mit einer besonderen Seligkeit. Es fehlte nicht an solchen, die die ganze Lehre von den Graden wegen ihres katholisch-verdienstlichen Anstrichs verworfen wissen wollten. Schönfeld, zu diesen gehörig, kommt auf den Schächer zurück, der, obwohl er von Werken nichts aufzuweisen hat, doch an Seligkeit dem Petrus nicht nachstehe: Werk hin, Werk h», Christus habe so gut für den Schächer, wie für Petrus gelitten;«) und daraus folge die gleiche Seligkeit beider. — So weit ging man nun freilich nur selten. Quenstedt ist ganz bereit, die Lehre von den Graden beizubehalten; nur in der Begründung muß er entschieden abweichen. Der Grund der Grade der Seligen ist auf keine Weise in menschlichen Verdiensten, sondern in der freiesten Dispensation und Verheißung Gottes zu suchen.«) Dieser Protest schloß nun freilich Unklarheiten ein. . Abgesehen davon, daß die Freiheit Gottes denn doch von der älteren Theorie nicht geläugnet ward, war mit der schon von Gerhard beliebten Unterscheidung: nicht wegen, sondern gemäß den Werken') doch gar zu wenig gewonnen. Ein Neuerer, Strauß, hatte Recht, wenn er der altprotestantischen Dogmatik hier eine „Verwickelung in besondere Schwierigkeiten" Schuld gab.«) Auch von anderem, als Straußischem Standpunkt, ist ja neuerlich anerkannt worden, daß alles was in der älteren protestantischen Kirche in Betracht der kehre von den Werken dem bekannten Amsdorsischen Paradoron nahe kommt, auf einer „Vermengung von Rechtfertigung und Seligkeit" beruhe. Mag man die letztere immerhin mit Schneckenburger^)) „als reales Correlat" der ersteren ansehen, die Rechtfertigung am Anfang der Christenlaufbahn — darin wird man Lange beipflichten — darf nimmer mit dem Vergeltungsgericht am Ende derselben verwechselt werden. 2) Der Widerspruch, sahen wir, ist selbst auf Widerspruch gestoßen und zwar innerhalb des Gebiets der gereinigten Kirche. Soll von Vermittelung die Rede sein, so wird es vor allem auf die richtige Fassung des Begriffes der Werke ankommen, die, obwohl schon vor der Kirchnerneuerung und damit vor jenem Proteste Schönfeld's und Quenstedt's in ihren Elementen vorhanden,') doch bald vielfach verdunkelt, nun nachdem sie auch neuerdings wieder an's Licht gezogen, insonderheit jenen erwähnten Protesten gegenüber von Bedeutung ist. Nur von der Totalität der ihrer innerlichen Entstehung nach gewürdigten Werke, konnte nämlich gesagt werden, daß sie für die Eeligkeitsgrade Bedeutung haben. Nicht auf das Werk an sich, auf Charakter und Tugenden kommt es nun darum Lavater an, wlnn von der Anweisung des Platzes in der Residenz Gottes die Rede ist;^)) ja auf die Vertraulichkeit des diesseitigen Umgangs mit Iesu und die Innigkeit des Gebetes. °) Das „einzig« Werk, welches gelohnt wird", ist nun nach Schleier m acher dieTreue;von allen äußerlich genommen guten Werken aber gilt, daß es keins gibt, das nicht auch von solchen Menschen vollbracht werde, denen vor Christus gar kein eigentlicher Werth eignet.«) „Thatkräftige Erweisung christlichen Lebens in fruchtbarer Gesinnung, thatkräftige Entwicklung des durch Christum gewonnenen Lebenskeimes", das sind nach de Wette die Werke, nach denen bei Anweisung der Stelle im Himmel gefragt wird.?) Nach Heubner ist es die „Herzensstellung zu Iesu",«) nach Kapf die ^verläugnngsvolle und überwindende Nachfolge",') auf welche es, wie bei der Entscheidung: ob selig, so bei der: in welchem Grade selig? ankommt.

Iene tiefere Fassung des Begriffes der Werke ist eine Vorbedingung der wahrhaften Vermittelung der Gegensätze. Es ist von Wichtigkeit, die wirklichen Vermittelungsversuche kennen zu lernen. Bei manchen der älteren Protestanten müssen wir sie freilich mehr als geschehen voraussetzen, als daß wir den Modus derselben genau anzugeben vermöchten. So ist Calvin bekanntlich durchaus der Lehre von „der freiesten Dispensation" Gottes in Bezug auf die Seligkeit zugethan, darum aber in Betreff der Begründung der Grade nicht etwa mit Quenstedt einverstanden: es ist ihm vielmehr gar nicht zweifelhaft, daß der Triumph der Seligen um so größer ist, je herrlicher die Werke sind, die ihnen ins Ienseits folgen ^): wie er sich aber die Lösung dachte, erfahren wir nirgends ausdrücklich: da, wo man Zusammenhängendes darüber erwartet, begnügt er sich mit Verweisung auf die Schrift.2) Später hat man mit verschiedenem Glück wirkliche Lösungen angestrebt. So sieht Morus in der Seligkeit im Allgemeinen ein Gnadengeschenk Gottes, in dem besonderen Grade derselben einen Lohn der Werke, oder des der Gnade gegenüber unterlassenen ereatürlichen Widerstandes.)) Aehnlich wird von Vretschnid er die Behauptung, daß aus der Allgenugsamkeit des Verdienstes Christi die gleiche Seligkeit aller folge, auf eine Verkennung des Wesens der Seligkeit zurückgeführt: das Verdienst Christi ändert an diesem Wesen nichts, sondern erwirbt es den Christen, doch so, daß es dieselben zuvor diesseits zu Werken anregt, denen gemäß ihnen gelohnt wird aus dem mannigfaltigen Schatze göttlicher Gnaden. Auch daß die zu erlangende Seligkeit alles menschliche Verdienst unendlich überragt, ist nach Bretschneider kein Hinderniß der Anerkennung einer genauen Angemessenheit von Verdienst und Belohnung: wenn allen mehr gegeben werde, als sie verdienen, werde darum nicht allen das Gleiche gegeben; dabei sei natürlich die Rücksicht Gottes auf den Gehorsam der Christen eine freie. ^) Aus neuester Zeit gehört hierher noch die an Morus erinnernde präzise Unterscheidung de Wette's, wenn er für die Seligkeit im Allgemeinen den Glauben, für den Grad derselben die Werke entscheidend sein läßt;^)) eine Unterscheidung, die freilich trotz ihrer Präcision nicht befriedigt.

So innerlich man nun auch — und de Wette, wie wir sahen, nicht zum mindesten — den Begriff des Werkes faßte, daß der Grund der Grade doch immer im Umkreis des Subjectiven gesucht wurde, könnte als pelagianisirend und rationalisirend gelten. Die Abwehr dieser Deutung könnte in vollem Umfang nur im Zusammenhang mit der Lehre von der Gnade überhaupt geschehen. Es wäre hervorzuheben, daß das Gute nicht, wie nicht ohne den göttlichen Willen, so nicht ohne den menschlichen wirklich werde, daß, wenn nicht Göttliches und Menschliches zur Einerleiheit zusammensinken sollen, dem menschlichen Willen eine relative Selbstständigkeit zu vindiciren ist und daß Gott das Heil aller in unbedingter Allgemeinheit nur an sich, d. i. in Form des absoluten höchsten Zweckes will, dagegen in Wirklichkeit das Heil aller derer, welche das Heil frei ergreifen. ») In Bezug auf die Lehre von den Graden insonderheit aber ist zu behaupten, daß das Verhältniß auch des christlichen Willens dem göttlichen gegenüber ein verschiedenes ist, daß es Grade gibt des sterbenden Fleischeslebens ^) und daß der heilwärtige Glaube, die Quelle aller christlichen Werke, selber entweder ein schwacher oder ein starker ist. 2) Insofern es dann wahr ist, daß auch dieser Glaube selbst, trotz aller Verantwortlichkeit des Menschen für denselben, nach seiner größeren oder geringeren Intensität Gabe Gottes ist, kann srellch immer wieder von der „freiesten Dispensation“ in Bezug auf die Grade die Rede sein. Ia, da die Concurrenz göttlicher Wirksamkeit eine beständige ist, wird es nicht genügen, etwa den Anfang des Glaubenslebens, wie Origenes thut, 8) vorwiegend auf göttliche, das dem Anfang Treubleiben nach seinen verschiedenen Graden auf menschliche Rechnung zu setzen; insofern menschliches Verdienst in jedem Moment zugleich göttliche Gabe ist, wird die Ertheilung der Grade Verleihung von „Gnade für Gnade“ sein. ^) Gott wird, wenn er die Werke aus Gnaden lohnt „seine eignen Gaben krönen“. ^) „Er wird die Gnade der Seligkeit in Gemäßheit der Gnade der Heiligung nach seiner Barmherzigkeit zutheilen.“ «) Daß es nun Seligkeit s- und nicht Herrlichkeitsgrade sind, auf welche die Betrachtung der verschiedenen Dignität christlicher Werke führen muß, darf nicht bezweifelt werden. Nur auf die Seligkeitsgrade im engeren Sinne paßt der Begriff des Gnadenlohnes, welcher den Einzelnen beigelegt werden soll laut der Verheißung. Die einzige wahrhafte Beschränkung dieser Ansicht liegt, nächst jenem vorläufig bei Beurtheilung der Lehre von Neidlosigkeit geltend gemachten Bedenken, in dem früher besprochenen biblischen Canon von der bei dem Gericht einzuhaltenden Rücksicht auf das ursprünglich beigelegte Maß') individueller Begabung, weil und insofern dasselbe für das christliche Werk von Bedeutung ist.

Gerade dieser Canon ist es nun, der uns zu der anderen Gruppe von Betrachtungen hinüberführt, die wir als dogmatisch-metaphysische bezeichneten. Ist nämlich jenes ursprüngliche Maß des Individuums diesseits ein von Gott gegebenes, so läßt sich fragen, ob nicht diese Verschiedenheit des individuell Christlichen als Weg und Werk der schöpferischen Weisheit Gottes auch in der jenseitigen Welt zu betrachten sei.

Wie die Gerechtigkeit Gottes mit dem christlichen Werk, so hat es die Weisheit Gottes mit der christlichen Entwicklung zu thun. Und, wenn es Seligkeitsgrade waren, die dem christlichen Werke beschieden wurden, so sind es Herrlichkeitsgrade, die wir, der Idee der Entwicklung gemäß, den christlichen Individuen jenseits beigelegt denken. Freilich ist hier zweierlei zu beachten. Einmal, daß wir die Frage nach einer über das Gericht hinausliegenden Entwicklung in einem gewissen Sinne von unserer Betrachtung ausgeschlossen haben, daß es sich also hier nur um das Stetigkeitsverhältniß zwischen dem diesseits vollendeten und dem jenseits beginnenden Leben handelt. Zweitens aber, daß der Gesichtspunkt der Entwicklung immer nur als ein ergänzender, die Idee des Gerichts und der Verantwortlichkeit für die Werke nichts weniger als beseitigender zu betrachten ist.

Die Idee der Entwicklung ist hier im Allgemeinen auf das christlich Individuelle zu beschränken. Dieser auch für die richtige Begründung die Lehre von den Graden wichtige Grundsatz ist freilich nicht immer genügend gewürdigt, und die Idee der Entwicklung auch auf das rein sittliche Gebiet übertragen worden: wie es scheinen könnte, mit dem günstigsten Erfolg für die Begründung unserer Lehre. Wenn nämlich die einzelnen Christen in verschiedenen sittlichen Entwicklungsstadien aus der diesseitigen Welt scheiden, die Idee der Entwicklung aber das — ihr zu bestreitende — Recht hätte, die des Gerichtes gleichsam zu verschlingen, — so wäre auch damit schon, wie es von dem Standpunkte des gerechten Gerichtes der Fall war, die äußerste Mannigfaltigkeit der Grade in der jenseitigen Welt gegeben. Sehen wir auch hier in die Geschichte.

Was auch von Ausnahmen im Einzelnen zu melden wäre, die Freiheit von Sünde hat die Kirche im Allgemeinen als ein gemeinsames Gut aller Grade der Seligen angesehen. Selbst bei Origenes halten die beiden Behauptungen, daß „niemand ohne Sündenschmutz werde auferstehen können“, und daß es, „nur zu denken, daß wir schmutzig und besudelt auferstehen, ein Verbrechen sei“, sich insofern die Wage, als ihm zufolge ein „reinigendes Saerament“ den unreinen in den reinen Zustand hinüberbildet. ^) Daß die Negation der Sünde, wie jede Verneinung, kein mehr oder minder vertrage, ist der wiederholte Ausspruch auch der Scholastik.2) Auch von der lutherischen Dogmatik eines Quenstedt wird die mindeste Spur sündlichen Wesens an den Seligen geläugnet.) Sind nun Neuere dieser Ueberzeugung entfremdet, so ist das eine Folge eben davon, daß ihnen die Idee des Gerichts in der der Entwicklung untergeht. Daß nach Schleiermacher „eine vollkommene Gemeinschaft mit dem Vater und dem Sohne und untereinander nicht gleich könne von uns gefunden werden“/.) daß also mit Notwendigkeit Grade der Unvollkommenheit übrig bleiben, schließt, wie eine gewisse Verzweiflung an der göttlichen Allmacht, so eine Verkennung der Bedeutung des Gerichts ein. Daß nach Strauß in den gewöhnlichen Vorstellungen vom Gericht „eine gewaltsame Unterbrechung der selbstthätigen Entwicklung des menschlichen Geistes“ eine „mechanische Procddur, eine zauberische Operation“ 2) soll gesetzt sein, beweist seinen Fanatismus für die Idee der Entwicklung. Daß endlich der auch „philosophische“ Romang, — so sehr er sonst von Strauß abweicht, und z. B. die von dem letzteren „ungeistig“ gescholtene Vorstellung von den Wirkungen der Trennung des Leibes und der Seele probabel findet — doch schließlich im Gericht nur eine so große Veränderung will stattfinden lassen, als sie „der übrigen Verhältnisse wegen“ geschehen müsse, bezeichnet ein Schwanken zwischen den Ideen von Gericht und Entwicklung, wie es schwer zu verzeihen ist. ^) Nicht einmal die Idee der Entwicklung, kann man sagen, kommt, abgesehen von der Schädigung, welche durch Einführung einer Art von Naturproceß die Lehren von Freiheit und Gericht erleiden, bei diesen Aeüßerungen Neuerer zur rechten Geltung. Denn wenn „entwickeln“ heißt: in Gemäßheit und in Kraft des innersten Grundes einer Person oder Sache Veränderungen an derselben hervorbringen, so soll diesen Neuere zufolge das Gericht die Selbigkeit des allerdings auch bei dem Frömmsten diesseits immer noch sündigen Lebens eigentlich in keinerlei Hinsicht ändern; die Forderung auch nur schlechthiniger Allmäligkeit der christlichsittlichen Entwicklung aber müßte, genau genommen, selbst an den Wirklichkeiten diesseitigen christlichen Lebens zu Schanden werden.)

Wenn wir der Idee der Entwicklung, — insofern sie als ein Moment der Begründung der Lehre von den Graden auftrat — nach der rein sittlichen Seile hin das Recht versagten, so geschah das darum, weil in der That bei einer Erwägung, die es mit der durch das Gericht von Hemmungen befreien und nur noch durch Gott bedingten Entwicklung zu thun hat, allein die großen gottgesetzten Positiva menschlichen und christlichen Lebens, nicht aber zugleich die Sünde in Betracht kommt, die, obwohl in aller diesseitigen Entwicklung durch menschliches Verschulden als Hemmung noch mitgesetzt, doch in ihrem Wesen Negation göttlichen Willens ist. Ein Recht auf Entwicklung hat alles Ursprüngliche; ursprünglich aber ist auf unserem Gebiete alles christlich Individuelle. ')

Menschliche Individualität ist Einheit von Natur und Freiheit; auch christliche Individualität ist diese Einheit, aber die unter die Gnade gestellte. Dieser Bund hat, — und die christliche Lehre hat das, im Ganzen genommen, nie geläugnet, Bedeutung nicht nur für das diesseitige, sondern auch für das jenseitige Leben. — Nicht daß die christliche Individualität mit allen ihren Attributen schlechthin dieselbe bliebe, vielmehr wird sie ihrer rein irdischen Hüllen entkleidet, wird entwickelt, doch so, daß die Selbigkeit ihres Substrates gewahrt bleibt. Diese Entwicklung aber des christlich Individuellen wird sich von zwei verschiedenen Seiten anschauen lassen. Nehmen wir nämlich den Moment des Gerichts zum Standort, so wird die vollendete Seele einmal von ihren so oder so gearteten und gebildeten Gaben, von ihrer zeitlich und örtlich bedingten Eigenthümlichkeit manches hinübernehmen; auf der anderen Seite wird die diesseits gebildete Individualität eben in ihrer Eigenart für die jenseits zu empfangenden Gnadengüter ein gewisses Maß von Empfänglichkeit mitbringen. Die Stetigkeit der Entwicklung wird demnach einmal rückwärts schauend auf das Irdische, dann aber auch vorwärts schauend auf das Himmlische zu erwägen sein: die beiden Tendenzen, deren wir die zu beseligenden Individuen theilhaftig denken, mögen vor der Hand die erste als eine conservative, die andere aber als eine receptive bezeichnet sein.

Was die Eriere betrifft, so ist die christliche Individualität zunächst und zum Theil durch die Zeit bedingt. Daß diese Bedingungen auch noch in das Jenseits hinein fortwirken, dafür scheinen einzutreten die Stimme n mancher Zeugen christlicher Wahrheit. Anders wohnte Christus, bemerkt Hieronymus, diesseits in den Corinthern, anders in den Ephesern, anders in Timotheus und Titus, anders endlich in Paulus, und diese Verschiedenheit hat auch für das Jenseits etwas zu bedeuten. Wenn man diese diesseitige Verschiedenheit als lediglich in Freiheitsmomenten wurzelnd und die Werke der Einzelnen als mehr oder minder verdienstlich ansehen wollte, so hütet sich Hieronymus wenigstens, eine Seala des Verdienstes aufzustellen. Auch dürfte, das Werk ganz innerlich gefaßt, Timotheus schwerlich selbst einem Paulus nachstehen: vielmehr liegt es nahe, was auch dem Hieronymus wohl immer noch die Betrachtung getrübt hat, bei seinen Worten zu denken an Pauli größere Gaben, zumeist aber an die Priorität und Unmittelbarkeit seiner Berufung. Auch wenn dann mit Beziehung auf Galater 4, 19 dem Gebärer von Hieronymus ein größeres Verdienst beigelegt wird, als dem Geborenen, so wird doch wohl, genau genommen, der Unterschied anderswo, als im Verdienste zu suchen und mit der Priorität des Gebärenden ein eigentliches Verdienst nicht gesetzt sein. ^) Ist es nun in diesem Verhältnisse des Paulus zu den Galatern und zu Timotheus z. Th. die Zeit, welche diesseits die Unterschiede bedingte, die auch jenseits noch fortwirken, so war weiter auch, wie bald Theodoret<sup>2)</sup> und Augustinus<sup>3)</sup> wenigstens z. Th. erkannten / der Unterschied der Patriarchen, Propheten, Apostel und späteren Märtyrer Jesu durch die Zeit bedingt, und daß solche irdische Bedingtheiten ihr ewiges Gegenbild in himmlischen haben sollen, konnte der Glaubensanalogie in keiner Weise zuwider, ja mußte ihr gemäß geachtet werden. Freilich konnte es nicht fehlen, daß, hatte sich einmal eine übertriebene Schätzung gewisser, seien es Werke, seien es Leiden, die nur in gewissen Zeiten der diesseitigen Reichsentwicklung zu thun oder zu erdulden waren, festgesetzt, eine Neigung geltend machte, die göttlichen Schranken zu sprengen und die Attribute der Dulder und Helden, die göttlicher Fügung gemäß auch im Jenseits einen Bestandtheil ihres individuellen Seins ausmachen mußten, auch denen beizulegen, welche diesseits eines gleichen Lebens und Leidens nicht hatten theilhaftig werden sollen. Die Bedingungen des Martyriums z. B. konnten auch von den eifrigsten Christen in einem ruhigen Zeitalter, einem christlichen Staate nicht geschaffen werden. Und doch gefiel man sich später darin, den später und anders Nollendeten, gleich als ob sie dessen bedürftig wären, dieselbe himmlische Herrlichkeit beizulegen. Auch der h. Martinus gehört nach Sulpicius Severus zu denjenigen, die ihre Kleider im Blute des Lammes gewaschen haben; die eigenthümliche Herrlichkeit eines Märtyrers werde ihm nicht mangeln. Denn hättet er unter Roro und Decius gelebt, et würde den Zeugentod bestanden haben. ^richtiger aber hatte schon Augustinus<sup>4)</sup> Bedenken getragen, den Unterschied der Zeiten zu verwischen. Wenn er den Hieronymus mit dem Täufer vergleicht, so hat freilich auch der erstere getragen Schläge, Schimpf, Schande und Spott der Menschen: aber durch das Beil des Henkers sein Leben zu beschließen, ist ihm nicht vergönnt gewesen: darum, ob er wohl die Kränze der Jungfräulichen und Lehrer auf seinem Haupte vereinigt, die Krone des Martyriums ist ihm im Himmel versagt. Ist dieser Standpunkt Augustin's, alle Verdienstlichkeit solches der Zeit eigenthümlichen Christenleidens natürlich bei Seite, der gesunde und schon diesseits neidlose Standpunkt, so scheint auch dem mittelalterlichen Tauler ^) der Gedanke wenigstens vorzuschweben, daß Bekenner und Jungfrauen und alle Heiligen, die alle ihre eigene Zeit gehabt und in ihr gewurzelt waren, vermöge der Continuität der Entwicklung auch ihre eigene Herrlichkeit im Himmel genießen müssen. Auch wenn neuerlich Olshausen dem Augustinus „wegen seines über Jahrhunderte durch die Kraft der Wahrheit geübten Einflusses“ eine besondere Stelle im Himmel zu vindiciren scheint, so möchte der Gedanke sehr nahe liegen, daß diesseits wie jenseits die Stelle des Kirchenvaters durch die Zeit mitbestimmt sei, in der er die mächtigen Wurzeln seiner christlichen Individualität diesseits nach göttlichem Willen getrieben hatte. Auch, wenn nach Hoffmann<sup>2)</sup> Luther, Calvin und Andere jetzt in vielfachem Glanze strahlen, die Eigenart dieses Glanzes wird mit der Zeit der diesseitigen Reichsentwicklung, in die sie gestellt waren, zu thun haben. — Wie weit man diesen Betrachtungen folgen wird, das wird sich freilich darnach richten, ob und wie viel Spielraum man hier dem Zufalle zugesteht. Ist wirklich, wie Steinmeyer<sup>3)</sup> behauptet, Zufälliges an dem Ruhm der Maria, die den Herrn gesalbt hat, ist Zufälliges an dem der opferwilligen Wittwe, ja selbst etwa eines Luther u. A., so könnte dies Zufällige hier nicht in Betracht kommen.

Die Bedingungen der diesseitigen christlichen Individualität entziehen sich nun allerdings, von dem Allgemeinen, etwa der Zeit, abgesehen, in welcher sie sich gestaltet, der Berechnung dergestalt, daß wir, wo es sich um die Gesamtheit aller christlichen Individualitäten handelt, als den letztlich wirksamen Factor nur den schaffenden, erlösenden und heiligenden Gott erkennen; dennoch folgt gerade aus der absoluten Originalität des Wesens der letzteren auch ihr individueller Fortbestand im Jenseits, und damit der der Gaben, die als geschaffene, gelöste und geheiligte Natur dem innersten Freiheitskern des Individuums gleichsam vermählt sind.

Das christliche Alterthum hat für dieses ewige Recht des christlich Individuellen ein Auge, aber in den verschiedenen Vertretern seiner Anschauungsweise ist es von verschiedener Klarheit. Origenes ist wenig consequent, wenn er auf der einen Seite den heiligen Geist als das Princip auch des Individuellen im Christenthum nicht stückweise mitgetheilt werden läßt noch in einer Vertheilung der Gaben, *) und doch auf der anderen Seite individuelle Beschränkungen annimmt, die auch bis zum Ende der Dinge fort dauern. °) Es ist nicht ein bloßer Streit zwischen christlicher Hoffnung und wissenschaftlichem Streben, ^) der sich in diesem Widerspruche darstellt, es ist ein Defect auch gerade des christlichen Denkens, der ihn an der fort dauernden Beschränktheit christlichen Einzeldaseins im Jenseits gelegentlich Anstoß nehmen heißt. Immer aber ist der Gesichtspunkt der Gabe doch bei Origenes klar festgehalten, den man bei manchen Alten sehr am unrechten Orte mit dem des Verdienstes vertauscht findet. Wenn es individuelle Gabe, nicht Gebot ist, jungfräulich und ehelos zu leben, so ist schon dem Ambrosius') diese Wahrheit verdunkelt. Jungfrauen und Ehefrauen eine gleiche Seligkeit verheißen, — das Wort gefaßt in dem erwähnten engeren Sinne, das gilt dem Ambrosius als barbarisches Geschrei verwirrungssüchtiger Gleichmacher. Es geht seine Meinung nicht darauf, daß besonderen Gaben diesseits auch besondere jenseits entsprechen werden, dies wäre eben unverwerflich, — sondern darauf, daß dem größeren Verdienste diesseits auch größerer Lohn jenseits entsprechen müsse. — Keuscher ist Augustinus, wenn er bemerkt, daß auf eine andere Weise im Himmel glänzen werde die eheliche Keuschheit, auf andere die jungfräuliche Reinheit«) wenn er von himmlischen Eonsonanzen handelt, von dem Zusammenklang verschiedener, aber nimmer disharmonischer Töne im Himmel *): die verschiedene Herrlichkeit ist keine ungleiche Seligkeit. Noch viel deutlicher tritt der Gesichtspunkt der Gabe bei einigen Späteren hervor, wenn auch immer noch nicht mit voller Bestimmtheit. Es gibt, sagt Gregor der Nazianzener, vielerlei christliche Werke und Tätigkeiten; nicht alle sollen alles thun, auch nicht alle dasselbe. Warum drängt ihr euch, ruft er, alle zu dem beschaulichen Leben, das doch, — für den Unberufenen und anders Begabten — gerade seine großen Gefahren hat! Gehe jeder seine gewiesene Bahn und bestrebe sich, sie gut zu durchlaufen. Dann wird er in einer der vielen Wohnungen, die bei dem Vater sind, wie das Schiff in dem Hafen anlangen. ^) Theodoret von Cyrus macht ganz ähnliche Betrachtungen: freilich seien die Ordnungen der Himmlischen verschieden: Patriarchen, Apostel, Märtyrer, dann Jungfräuliche und Eheliche, auch Reiche und Arme, Staatsmänner und Eremiten; aber darauf komme es an, daß man hier seinem Beruf, er sei welcher er wolle, Ehre mache, und nicht lau und lässig, sondern tapfer und treu ihn verwalte.«) Fehlt bei diesen Lehrern eigentlich nur die ausdrückliche Anerkennung der Gabe als solcher, so ist selbst bei Gregor dem Großen das Streben nicht zu verkennen, in dieser Beziehung der Wahrheit gerecht zu werden. Anerkannt wird z. B., daß auch Eheleute, — nicht Jungfräuliche allein, recht handeln können und sich sehnen, den allmächtigen Gott zu schauen. Freilich ist Gregor nicht mächtig genug, dem Strome der Zeit zu widerstehen: den Jungfrauen, die ja ihren Sinn nicht theilen zwischen Himmel und Erde, ihnen gebührt schließlich nach Gregor der Vorzug diesseits und jenseits. Und, wie mit den Jungfrauen, so ergeht es Gregor mit den Lehrern: daß ihr Charisma in Ewigkeit nicht verloren sei, will man ihm wohl nicht bestreiten. Aber daß er die, „die nicht nur das eigene Fleisch meistern, sondern auch Andere am Sündigen hindern“, wegen solchen Verdienstes besonderer Seligkeit theilhaftig ^) macht, ist ein Beweis von der Verwirrung, in welche die Zeit verfallen war.

Das Mittelalter, bei all seinem Verdienststolze auf praktischem Gebiet, hat doch auch Denker hervorgebracht, die dasjenige, was wir die conservative Tendenz des christlich Individuellen nannten, klar und zum Theil überscharf betont haben. Scotus Erigena, auch sonst gewissermaßen «in Prediger in der Wüste seines dunkeln Jahrhunderts, legt ein sehr entschiedenes Gewicht darauf, daß, wie jede Creatur, so auch jeder einzelne Christ eine bestimmte Grenze seines Seins und seiner Gaben habe und daß diese Grenze in Ewigkeit bleiben werde. Wenn darum verheißen werde, die Christen sollten Gott von Angesicht zu Angesicht schauen, so heiße das doch nicht etwa, daß sie im Stande sein würden, Gottes Dreieinigkeit von Grund aus zu erkennen, sondern nur, daß ihnen Erscheinungen derselben würden zu Theil werden, deren sie sich erfreuen dürften, wie es theils Geschöpfen im Allgemeinen, theils dem besonderen Individuum, de» Bedingungen seiner Natur gemäß, erlaubt sei. 2) Auch dem Thomas ist eine ähnliche Betrachtungsweise eigen. Die christlichen Individuen, von Anfang her graduell unterschieden, werden von Gott, dem Beweger, nach seiner unendlichen Weisheit zum Ziel geleitet: ein Ziel, welches, wie Thomas sagt, nicht Gott selber sein kann in pantheistischem Sinne; 2) —dann wären, wenn überhaupt selig, es alle in gleichem Maße; vielmehr sei das Ziel für jeden einzelnen Christen ein verschiedenes, gleichsam vor Gott gelegenes, welches der uranfänglichen individuellen Bestimmtheit gemäß für den einen in größerer, für den anderen in geringerer Gottferne liege. Wenn diese Anschauungen eines Scotus und Thomas von dem Gesichtspunkte der individuellen Entwicklung befriedigen, so sind sie allerdings insofern mit Vorsicht aufzunehmen, als sie, für sich genommen, die Lehre von der Freiheit gefährden können.

Wenn sich in diesen Zeugnissen mittelalterlicher Dogmatik die conservative Tendenz des christlich Individuellen sogar mit Gefährdung der Lehre von der Freiheit anerkannt findet, so bat auf der anderen Seit« das Individuelle, also das dem Freiheitsgebiete zum Theil wirklich Entnommene in dieser Zeit noch sehr nach Anerkennung zu ringen. Der Mystiker Tauler z. B. indem er auf die vielberegte Frage, ob jungfräuliches, ob eheliches Leben, zurückkommt, muß freilich das demüthige Eheweib der hoffärtigen Jungfrau auch in Absicht auf die Seligkeit vorziehen; dennoch ergeht er sich, während er die göttliche Einsetzung der Ehe übergeht, im Preise der Jungfrauschaft als der im Himmel erfundenen, im Himmel von den Engeln erlernten, im Himmel auch nach dem Gericht in den höchsten Ehren verbleibenden. *) — Möchten, wäre zu sagen, die Ehren immerhin groß sein, das würde doch klar bleiben müssen, daß, — die Jungfräulichkeit als Gabe gefaßt, — von Vergeltung, und damit von gesteigerter Seligkeit nicht zu reden ist.

Solcher widerspruchsvollen — und verderblichen — Fassung der Bethätigung verschiedener Gaben als ebenso vieler Verdienste hat die Reformation in weitem Umfang ein Ziel gesetzt; nicht in allen ihren Trägern freilich nüchtern genug und besonnen. Wenn Petrus Martyr dazu fortschritt, überhaupt die Continuität des Diesseitigen und Ienseitigen in Bezug auf die Gaben zu laugnen, indem er dabei auf das Verschwinden der in der apostolischen Zeit vorkommenden Gnadengaben schon in der diesseitigen Entwicklung der Kirche hinwies, so war dies eine Meinung, die einmal etwas wie die spätere Irvingianisch« Antithese hervorzurufen geeignet, dann aber auch in Bezug auf die escha«, tologische Frage unhaltbar war. ^) Besonnen und klar wird dagegen die Bedeutung der Gabe in Beziehung auf ewiges Leben und Seligkeit in dem folgenden Jahrhundert von Rivet gewürdigt, wenn er z. N. Charismen der Ehelichen nicht minder als der Unbeweibten anerkennend, beiden auch im Himmel ihr eigenthümliches Lob nicht abspricht. ^) Daß die Polemik gegen die Jungfrauen, die es nur dem Leibe nach find, und die nie zur Herrlichkeit eingehen, ihm noch zu thun macht, wird man begreiflich finden. Ganz kurz vor Rivet hatte schon Ealirt den Umkreis der Gaben, die eine besondere Verherrlichung auch im Himmel gewärtigen, mit großartigem Sinne sehr weit gezogen. Nicht die Jungfrauen allein, — nicht die Beschaulichen, nicht die Lehrer, die Märtyrer allein, könnte man hinzusetzen — nein, auch die Kriegesfürsten, die ihrer Gabe brauchend, von der Liebe Christi getrieben zur Vertheidigung des Glaubens die Waffen ergriffen haben, werden nach ihm ihrer eigenthümlichen Herrlichkeit nicht verlustig gehen. ^) Daß später die Lehrer noch häufig, wie bei Quenstedt, ^) als in dieser Eigenschaft eigenthümlich zu verherrlichende hervorgehoben werden, °) darf natürlich für einen Rückschritt nicht gelten, vorausgesetzt, baß aller Anspruch auf besondere Verdienstlichkeit diesseits und besondere Seligkeit jenseits, soweit beides mit de« bloßen Amtscharakter zusammenhängen sollte, ausdrücklich aufgegeben wird.

Bonden NeuereniftdieMeinung,daß besondere aufbestimm ten Gaben beruhende Werke und Lebensweisen eine Anwartschaft auf besondere Seligkeit geben, mit Recht durchaus verlassen worden; nicht durchweg aber die nicht eben haltbarere, daß die vorzügliche Begabung überhaupt eine vorzügliche Seligkeit nach sich ziehe. „Vorzügliche Fähigkeiten und Hülfsmittel“, behauptet Storr«) alles Ernstes, „müssen den Christen im Guten weiter bringen und also auch aus eine höhere Stufe der Seligkeit erheben", als geringe; eine Behauptung, die auch durch die Einschränkung, daß „die Vorzüge des Begabteren dem minder Begabten nicht nachtheilig werden können", von ihrer Unhaltbarkeit nichts einbüßt. Aehnliches gilt in neuester Zeit von Romang, wenn er aus der auch in Ewigkeit nicht aufzuhebenden verschie denartigen individuellen Beschränkung und Begabung des christlichen Einzelwesens eine entsprechend verschiedenartige „Verringerung der Seligkeit" folgert.^) Denn wenn auch immer zu beherzigen ist, daß Seligkeit und sittliche Vollkommenheit zusammen sind, und die erstere niemals jeweiliger subjectiver Befriedigung gleich zu setzen ist, — daß Seligkeit und metaphysische Vollkommenheit untrennbar sind, wird doch nicht behauptet werden dürfen. 2) Dagegen wird nun von Anderen die Gabe in ihrer ewigen Bedeutung auch neuerdings richtig gewürdigt. Nach Lavater ist bei dem Eintritt in das jenseitige Leben nichts absolut neu zu gestalten, sondern die alten Triebe und Kräfte nach ihrer unendlichen individuellen Verschiedenheit werden „entwickelt, hergestellt, frei gemacht".«) Soll von Neuem die Rede sein, so kann es doch nur so sein, daß —wie wir Schleiermacher hinzufügen lassen, des ursprünglich verliehenen Maßes bei dessen Ertheilung nicht vergessen wird,^) nur so, daß darum nach einem jenseitigen Herrlichkeitsgrade diesseits nicht zu trachten, derselbe nicht vom Erlöser zu erbitten ist, da des Vaters weisheitsvoller Nach von Ewigkeit über dessen Verleihung entschieden hat.2) Dabei modisiziren die Gaben, wie neuerlich Hoffmann bemerkt, allerdings wie diesseits das Leben des Glaubens, so jenseits das des Schauens;«) ein anderer ist auch nach Steinmeyer jenseits ein Petrus, ein anderer ein Paulus, ein Iacobus, Iohannes.')

Was endlich die receptive Tendenz des diesseitigen individuell Christlichen angeht, so hat man sie von Alters her gern in Bildem verdeutlicht, wenn auch der eigentliche Ausdruck ebenfalls angestrebt wird. Schon Origenes braucht, um die individuell verschiedene Empfänglichkeit für die jenseitigen Güter darzustellen, ein Bild, vom Gemälde nämlich, dem ein Entwurf zu Grunde liege, auf dem dann die Farben sich bequem auftragen lassen; der anzuwendende Griffel ist der Griffel unseres Herm Iesu Christi, und nach Art des diesseitigen Entwurfes richtet sich jenseits die Ausführung.«) Besonders beliebt aber ist das Bild von Gefäßen verschiedenen Umfangs, das schon von Ambro sius<sup>o</sup>) und dann von Hieronymus") gebraucht wird: in jedes der verschiedenen Gefäße wird fo viel von der Gnaden« fülle gegossen, als sie zu fassen vermögen. Auch das Bild von der leiblichen Sättigung wird angewendet, z. B. von Prosper Aquitanus:") wie die letztere allen, die da satt genannt werden, gleichmäßig eignet, obwohl die Einzelnen nicht gleich viel Speise, sondern ihrem Verlangen gemäß genossen haben, so werden auch alle Seligen, obwohl einer und derselben seligen Befriedigung theilhaftig, doch graduell in Betracht der Herrlichkeitsgrade verschieden sein. Die Reihe dieser Bilder zu ergänzen, mag dann noch des von Seriver aus Drelincourt mitgetheilten gedacht sein: Krystalle verschiedener Größe werden alle von den Strahlen der Sonne an allen Enden erleuchtet und „jedes wird das Bild der schönen Sonne, die es ansieht, ausdrücken, aber solches wird nicht hindern, daß sie nach unterschiedlicher Größe nicht sollten mehr oder weniger Licht empfangen, und daß die Sonne nicht sollte mehr oder minder in einem oder dem anderen erscheinen": also ist es auch nach Drelincourt mit der Verschiedenheit der Seligen im Himmel. Bon Scriver aber wird seinerseits das Gleichniß von den verschiedenen Blumen, denen dieselbe Sonne „ihren Ginstuß schenkt" hinzugefügt. ^) Zu den Versuchen aber, die verschiedene Receptivität des individuell Christlichen für die jenseitigen Güter in eigentlichem Ausdruck zu beschreiben, rechnen wir schon Gregor's Aeüßerung über die Correspondenz der Gaben diesseits und der Wohnungen des Vaters im Ienseits. Die letzteren sollen voll werden, keine vergeblich bereitet sein: bei Gott geschieht ja nichts umsonst. 2) Die Empfänglichkeit für die besondere Herrlichkeit aller dieser einzelnen Wohnstätten wird also diesseits gemäß der verschiedenen Gaben gewirkt werden. — Im Mittelalter ist es dann Duns vor allen, der dieser verschiedenen Empfänglichkeit der Individuen das Wort redet. Der Trieb nach einem bestimmten Grade geschöpflcher Herrlichkeit ist vom Anbeginn, wie einer jeden vernünftigen Creatur, so insonderheit jedem Christen von Gott eingepflanzt worden. Wenn dieser seine vollkommene Berechtigung hat bei allen, die selig werden, so ist das Trachten nach einem höheren, als dem ursprünglich bestimmten Grade schon darum unmöglich, weil der alles wirkende Gott zu einem solchen Trachten nicht mitwirkt. Ist aber das Ziel des berechtigten Trachtens erreicht, so ist jedes Seligen Erkenntniß- sowohl als Willenstrieb — und der anerschaffene nicht minder als der in Gemäßheit des letzteren im diesseitigen Leben ausgebildete vollkommen gesättigt, so daß er schlechterdings nichts außer dem, was er hat, verlangen oder ersehnen mag.‘) So die Scholastik: von Neueren aber heben wir besonders Lavater hervor. Alle diesseitigen Gaben sind nach ihm von vorn herein für das Jenseits verliehen; hier liegt ihr letzter Zweck. „Diejenigen Kräfte werden schon hier mit besonderer Sorgfalt geübt, deren der Einzelne zu seiner ewigen Bestimmung am meisten bedarf.“^ Diese diesseits zu wirkende Bereitschaft ist dabei durchaus individueller Art: ein eigenes Paradies, ein für die besonderen Talente und Fähigkeiten, ja für die persönlichen Neigungen und für den besonderen Geschmack ausgesuchter Ort, °) eine Thätigkeit, zu der der Einzelne in dem ewigen Reiche durch alle Ewigkeiten hinauf am besten zu brauchen ist, eine Stelle, wohin sich unter allen Millionen Einwohnern des Himmels keiner so gut, so genau schickte, keiner so unentbehrlich wäre, als eben der Einzelne, >) wird ja Lavater zufolge von Gott, wenn er den Einzelnen diesseits zur Herrlichkeit vorbereitet, für ihn in Aussicht genommen. Auch Lavater's älterem Zeitgenossen Bah rot war es ja schon als ein „würdiger Gegenstand des großen Geistes“ erschienen, zu untersuchen, wie groß und mannigfaltig die Fähigkeit des Menschen ist, selig zu sein. Da Gott keinem Geschöpfe die Receptivität zu etwas geben könne, ohne die Absicht zu haben, ihm dasselbe irgend einmal selbst zu geben, so werde, hatte Bahrdt geurtheilt — so groß und mannigfaltig die Fähigkeit des Menschen sei, selig zu sein, auch diese Seligkeit — oder vielmehr Herrlichkeit — selber sein.») In neuester Zeit ist endlich auch Martensen auf diese Frage eingegangen, und zwar so, daß er einen besonderen Gesichtspunkt hervorkehrt. Iene Receptivität war nämlich offenbar nicht als eine Bereitschaft zu denken, schlechthin äußerliche, dem seligen Subjecte fremde Güter zu empfangen, sondern vielmehr als eine Fähigkeit, gerade mit dem innersten Wesenskern in die himmlischen Verhältnisse einzugehen. Was da nun auch diesseits die unter die Gnade gestellte Freiheit an der individuell gearteten Natur geleistet, wie sie die letztere relativ verklärt haben mochte, eine göttliche Action bei dem Eintritt in das neue Leben mußte trotzdem nothwendig erscheinen. Diese nennt Martensen eine Metamorphose der Talente;‘) eine relative Receptivität für den durch dieselbe zu erreichenden Grad von Herrlichkeit ist dabei offenbar bereits vorher vorhanden zu denken. Durch Martensen's Ausführungen sind übrigens die erwähnten von Martyr erhobenen Bedenken, wohl ohne bewußte Polemik gegen den letzteren, so gut wie erledigt.

Zum Schluß mag noch von einer Combination der beiden von uns getrennt behandelten Begründungstheorien die Rede sein, einer Begründung der Grade, die zwar von dem Gesichtspunkt der Entwicklung, aber nicht der individuellen, zwar von dem Gesichtspunkt der Werke, aber nicht des Gerichts ausgeht: wir meinen jene Theorie, die aus der verschiedenen Dignität christlicher Werke einerund einer behaupteten Rückerinnerung an dieselben im Jenseits andererseits verschiedene offenbar nicht Herrlichkeits-, sondern Seligkeitsgrade ableitet. Die Vorfrage: ob überhaupt eine solche Rückerinnerung anzunehmen, können wir getrost mit Steinmeyer dahin entscheiden, daß die Auferstandenen zwar „alles das vergessen haben werden, was bloß ihr sinnliches Erdenleben berührt hatte, daß sie aber an das zurückdenken können, was ihnen bereits hier zu einer Kraft des ewigen Lebens gediehen war“.*) Schon die alte Kirche hat nun mit dieser Rückerinnerungstheorie auch die Lehre von den Graden in Beziehung gesetzt. Hierher gehört es, wenn Clemens, allerdings im Zusammenhang mit seinen Vorstellungen von einer allmäligen Reinigung im Jenseits, von einer Schaam über die begangenen Sünden redet, °) die natürlich, je nachdem die letzteren so oder so beschaffen waren, größere oder geringere Abzüge von dem Vollmaß der Seligkeit machen muß. Auch Origenes weiß von einem Gedächtnis der Sünde im Jenseits; ja in diesem Gedächtnis ist eigentlich ihm zufolge wesentlich die Strafe beschlossen, die auch denen, die endlich selig werden — und dieser Lehrer denkt ja alle am Ende selig — nicht erlassen wird.^) Ist nun aber diese Vorstellung von einer Bestimmtheit des jenseitigen Zustandes durch die Erinnerung an das Diesseits im Allgemeinen eine alte, so ist doch die Meinung, daß auch die wirklich Vollendeten, in ihrem seligen Zustande dauernd Befestigten noch immerfort unter diesen Einflüssen des Diesseits stehen, neueren Ursprungs. Es konnte nicht fehlen, daß die Sache nun auch insofern anders gewendet wurde, als nicht an die Erinnerung an diesseitige Niederlagen des Geistes an sich gedacht, sondern die in verschiedenem Maße beseligende Rückerinnerung auf die in verschiedenem Maße herrlichen Siege des Geistes im Diesseits bezogen wurde: mit Recht gewiß, insofern nur in Bezug auf solche Siege des Geistes die Theorie der Entwicklung, auch diese, gewissermaßen psychologische, Anwendung finden dürfte. 2) Petrus Martyr ist es — merkwürdig genug, der biblische Antagonist der Lehre von der Verschiedenheit der Grade, — der von dieser Seite her wenigstens die Probabilität des Dogma's nicht gerade in Abrede stellen möchte. Es ist wohl denkbar, sagt er, daß einige Selige, wenn sie bedenken, daß Gott durch sie mehr und größere Thaten gethan hat, als durch andere, nun deshalb mehr Freude und Ergötzen finden werden, als die anderen, die sich so großer durch sie vollbrachter Dinge nicht erinnern können. Bei Petrus tritt freilich diese Ansicht, begreiflich genug, nur beiläufig auf; viel zuversichtlicher wird sie später von Schubert vorgetragen. Die Freude der Seligen wird nach ihm um so größer sein müssen, „je härter und gefährlicher der Kampf und je bitterer die Leiden gewesen sind, die sie vormals ausgestanden haben“. Am entschiedensten aber tritt doch Knapp für die Sache ein: es sei gewiß, daß ein Theil der himmlischen Seligkeit im Bewußtsein und Andenken an das im vorigen Leben genossene und gelohnte Gute bestehen werde. Zunächst darf die Tragweite dieser Theorie nicht überschätzt werden. Wer in den vollkommeneren Zustand übergegangen ist, für den ist die Erinnerung an den unvollkommeneren, insofern auch aus ihr noch Freude stieß, von secundärem Belang. Auch wäre zu bedenken, daß, wie Schleiermacher einmal ausführt, selbst im diesseitigen Leben an die Rückerinnerung an vollbrachtes Gute sich gerne die Sünde zu heften pflegt, daß wir darum im Allgemeinen schon diesseits wohl thun, „was überstanden ist und vollendet, zu vergessen und nicht weiter darauf zurückzusehen“, um alle Selbstgefälligkeit, die auch bei Christen sich gern noch einschleicht, zu meiden. Im Uebrigen haftet dieser Theorie nichts an, was dem Glauben zuwiderliefe. Sie will, obwohl sie unmittelbar mit der Idee des Gerichts nichts zu thun hat, dieselbe nicht verdrängen noch vertreten, und beruht ihrerseits auf dem an sich keineswegs gefährlichen, vielmehr wahren Satze, daß — wie das Böse sich selber bestraft macht — so auch das Gute zum Theil schon nach einem dem irdischen Geiste immanenten Gesetze sich selber belohnt macht. — Am Schlusse unserer Untersuchung eine gesichtete Summa der Wahrheiten, die nun als Gesammttertrag derselben gelten könnte, aufzustellen, würde einem Hinausgehen über die uns gestellte Aufgabe gleichkommen. Nur einige Andeutungen scheinen im Rückblick auf den durchlaufenen Weg nothwendig. Was den grundlegenden biblischen Abschnitt betrifft, so ist ersichtlich, daß sich eine endschaftliche Beantwortung der Frage, ob nicht doch etwa der Luc. 12, 48 aufgestellte Canon bis zu einer wirklichen Egalisirung der von den Einzelnen beim Gericht aufzuweisenden christlichen Lebensarbeit hinaufreiche, an keiner Stelle unserer Betrachtung ergeben hat. Es konnte das nicht der Fall sein. Denn wie die Frage, ob viele, ob wenige selig werden, wie die andere, ob etwa die „Noachischen Sünder oder sonst geschichtliche Personen“ schlechthin und ewig verdammt sind, weder in der Affirmative noch in der Negative direct zu beantworten ist, so fehlt auch hier für die Entscheidung alles zureichende Material, eine Statistik christlicher Rechtschaffenheit sowohl als Begabung* hienieden. Die Frage, ob bei gleicher Ausrüstung einer Anzahl von Gläubigen nun auch am Ende die gleiche Summa von christlichen Lebenserweisungen von ihnen in Wirklichkeit werde aufgewiesen werden, oder ob unter Umständen auch der entgegengesetzte Fall eintrete, entzieht sich, in dieser Allgemeinheit gestellt, von selber der Antwort. Die prophetischen Aeußerungen des Herrn, mit denen wir es zu thun hatten, scheinen allerdings auf das letztere hinzuweisen; es wird dabei aber darauf ankommen, ob man, wie wir es allerdings thun, das Prophetische dieser Aeußerungen streng als solches behauptet, oder ob man, was uns ohne Willkür nicht thunlich scheint, dieses Prophetische in's Paränetische umdeutet. — Daß weiter das von Matthäus und Lucas gebotene Parabelpaar nach seinen beiden Grundgedanken uns das Theilungsprincip für den letzten und wichtigsten Abschnitt unserer dogmengeschichtlichen Betrachtung geboten hat, wird ersichtlich geworden sein. In der That liegt hier der Ausgangspunkt für die Unterscheidung von Seligkeits- und Herrlichkeitsgraden, von christlichem Werk und Gabe, Begriffe, deren Correlation uns aus all der Trübung, welche auch dieser Theil der Eschatologie z. Th. im Laufe der Zeit erfahren, doch immer wieder leuchtend hervortritt. — Was den genannten dogmatischen Hauptabschnitt selber angeht, so hat der Begriff der Seligkeit grade, abgesehen von den geschichtlich ausgeprägten Theoremen, bekanntlich noch jetzt nach Anerkennung zu ringen. Hoffmann bezeichnet es als unerlaubt, Unterschiede in der Seligkeit zu denken; es werde in der Seligkeit keines der Vollendeten noch „Sehnen, Vermissten, Mangel“ sein. Da er an der Gerechtigkeit Gottes selbstverständlich nicht zweifelt, so wird er die oben an Luc. 12 geknüpfte Frage sich so beantworten, daß alle die wirklich selig werden, die Rücksicht auf die Verschiedenheit des Verliehenen mit eingerechnet, sich diesseits subjectiv gleich verhalten haben. Wir können diese Annahme nicht theilen. Auch wenn Lange behauptet, daß, wenn von Graden die Rede sei, damit nur Grade der werdenden Seligkeit oder der gewordenen Herrlichkeit gemeint sein können.«) so ist dies zunächst eine Behauptung, die noch des Beweises gewärtig ist. Sie scheint auf ein Analogon der Apokatastase-Theorie hinauszulaufen: aber eine Nothwendigkeit in Gott, diejenigen, die in irgend einem Maße sich den Glauben an den Sohn öffnen, zu dem schlechthin höchsten und damit zu einem gleichen Maße wahrhaftiger Befriedigung gelangen zu lassen, wird schwerlich erwiesen werden können. Alles kommt hier darauf an, daß die Begriffe der göttlichen Gerechtigkeit und Gnade in tiefinnerlicher Durchdringung und nicht so, wie es zuweilen mißverständlich genug geschieht, gefaßt werden, daß nämlich vor Christo die Gerechtigkeit und nach seiner Erscheinung die Gnade sei. Treffend ist, im Grunde nur Repetition des Wortes der Wahrheit, Schleiermacher's Wort: es ist die Treue und Gerechtigkeit Gottes, daß er uns die Sünde vergibt;^) ja es ist die Treue und Gerechtigkeit, und darum gar nicht minder die Gnade. — Freilich sind wir mit diesem Anerkenntniß nicht am Ende unserer Probleme. Ist es die Gerechtigkeit Gottes, welche wirklich Grade der Seligkeit zuteilt, wie stimmt damit die jedenfalls von einem großen Concentus der Lehrer vertretene Ansicht, daß von Graden des Gutseins im Himmel doch nicht zu reden ist. Wir theilen diese Überzeugung; folgen auch der bekannten Kantischen Theorie dahin, daß eine Ausgleichung von Gutsein und Glücklichsein im Himmel erfolgen werde: aber von diesseitigem Gutsein; das Seligkeitsmaß wird dem diesseitigen, durch die Gnade gewirkten Gutsein entsprechen. Daß jenseits alle, weil sie im Gericht des Schmutzes der Sünde entkleidet sind, nothwendig gleich selig sein werden, dafür würde der Beweis der diesseitigen Ethik schwer fallen. Die Schrift bezeugt verschiedene Seligkeitsgrade; wenn sie aber ethische Fortschritte und damit ethische Verschiedenheit im Jenseits zu bezeugen scheint, so redet sie von den Seelen der Noachischen Fluthzeit,') und nicht, wie hier nur von solchen die Rede ist, von denen, die diesseits in Christo dem Heil entgegenreifen. Damit erledigt sich uns, was wir vorläufig als Instanz gegen die Lehre von den Seligkeitsgraden aufstellten;') sie wird als solche durch die andere aus der Idee der göttlichen Gerechtigkeit fließende nicht nur aufgewogen, sondern weit überwogen. — Was dann die Herrlichkeitsgrade anlangt, so können wir sie uns allerdings ohne einen mehr oder minder beseligenden subjectiven Rückschlag, ohne also zugleich Seligkeitsgrade zu sein, nur so denken, daß — und da bleibt freilich der Name kein getreuer Ausdruck der Sache mehr — die Verschiedenheit nicht sowohl als eine graduelle, als vielmehr als eine spezifische gefaßt wird. Alle sollen etwas sein zum Lobe von Gottes herrlicher Gnade diesseits und jenseits; über den Vorzug aber der Gaben diesseits und jenseits zu streiten, ist Thorheit: schon darin liegt, daß es sich um spezifische Verschiedenheiten handle. — Schließlich könnte noch gefragt werden, was denn, da doch allem Dogmatischen, also auch wohl unserem Dogma die praktische Seite eignet, von dieser letzteren zu halten sei. Wenn man sie zu Zeiten so hoch anschlug, daß man behauptete, leichtsinnig mache es, sich alle Seligen und Herrlichen gleich selig und herrlich zu denken, ^) so hat nun wohl ein Anderer gewarnt, wenn er auch auf Grund der Schrift Verschiedenheiten der Seligen einräumte, sich mit den wenig nützlichen Speculationen da rüber zu befassen. °)

Beiderlei Aeußerungen dürften des Zieles fehlen. Daß man nothwendig ein leich ts i n ni g er Christ werde, wenn man die Lehre von den Graden nicht habe, ist darum unrichtig, weil diese Lehre von den «ntralen Wahrheiten des Glaubens verhältnißmäßig ferne liegt. Wäre es doch gar wohl denkbar, obwohl ein Irrthum, daß man gerade diese Lehre wegen der vermeintlichen Abschwächung, die die gewiß ernste Lehre von dem ewigen Verderben durch dieselbe erleidet, auf's höchste beanstandete. — Daß aber die Beschäftigung mit peripherisch gelegenen Dogmen, wie das unsrige ein solches ist, wenig nütze, ist eine auch einem großen theologischen Denker einmal mit untergelaufene irrige Schätzung alles dogmatischen Arbeitens. Mit etwas minderem, aber doch entschieden mit analogem Rechte würde der Vorwurf das Streben nach theologischer Finrnung selbst der Lehre von der Gnadenwahl, von dem Mahle des Herrn treffen. Dem gegenüber beschließen wir diesen Aufsatz mit dem sich unter uns bereits erfüllenden Wunsche, daß das christliche Denken fortfahre, sich mitten unter allen zum Theil entschieden feindseligen Gegensätzen der Zeit einen vernehmlichen Ausdruck zu geben, immer eingedenk des Wortes, das der Apostel zu den Coloffern geredet hat.

Differences Of Rank Exist Among God's Children In State Of Grace; Analogy Countenances View, Which Scripture Confirms, That Same Is Case Among Those Who Are In State Of Glory

Meet for Heaven: A State of Grace Upon Earth the Only Preparation for a State of Glory in Heaven

Chapter X – Tenth Analogy

Differences of rank exist among God's children in a state of grace; analogy countenances the view, which Scripture confirms, that the same is the case among those who are in a state of glory.

Perfect equality in rank and in attainments does not exist, and never has, among the inhabitants either of earth or of heaven. Perfect equality of rank never has, at any period, existed upon earth. Christianity was introduced into the world, not to destroy, not to change, the institutions of society in this respect, but to sanctify them just as they previously existed in the providence of God, so that judgment might flow down our streets like a stream, and righteousness as the mighty waters.

Christianity has introduced a mighty change into the world, as through it the wilderness and the solitary place have become glad; the desert has been made to rejoice, and to blossom like the rose. The Lord's house is established upon the top of the mountains, and is exalted above the hills, so that all nations are seen flowing into it. Christianity, however, came not down from heaven, and lit upon the earth, with the object of introducing among mankind a religious republic everywhere over the world, and thus to put an end to all distinctions in rank and in attainment; but to emancipate men from the dominion of Satan and sin, and to introduce them into the glorious liberty of the children of God. Differences in rank and in attainment always existed among men, and, I apprehend, will continue to exist as long as the world stands. Nicodemus is a ruler; Lazarus is a beggar; Paul is an accomplished scholar; Peter and Andrew, James and John, are illiterate fishermen.

How different are God's children in the world, not only in rank, but in their attainments also, both natural and spiritual! Newton is endowed with powers that dimly shadow forth to us the attribute of omniscience on the part of God. He grasps a universe of material orbs in one comprehensive survey; and, wherever he traverses mentally in space, he sees the skirts of that robe with which He is arrayed who covers himself with light as with a garment. Bacon, with his patience in experimenting, and with his power of generalization, made himself, to a great extent, master of all knowledge in all its various departments. Locke was possessed of an understanding brilliant as the noonday sun, and of logical and analytical powers that were never surpassed. Howe had powers of mind of a transcendental nature, with which he not only looked into heaven, but seemed, even whilst upon earth, actually to live in heaven; to walk through all its courts of bliss, and to hold converse with the adorable Godhead, with angels and glorified saints; and, in all the views he has given us of the upper sanctuary, shows, that, in addition to the possession of great intellectual powers, he had, in an eminent degree, - what is termed heavenly-mindedness. Edwards had a comprehensiveness of theological acquisition that was probably never surpassed. He viewed theology, metaphysics, and logic, as a person would do a valley, with the stream winding through it, and the palm-trees growing along its brink, whilst standing upon an eminence on a clear, cloudless day, and looking downwards with the aid of a powerful telescope. Calvin viewed theology with a cold, clear, legal comprehensiveness; saw God in his high sovereignty, the scheme of salvation -in all its parts hanging and depending upon Him, whom he beheld sitting with something like a legal inflexibility upon the throne. Contrast these giants of the faith whilst upon earth — whose understandings still blaze forth upon us through their religious writings, like so many bright intellectual suns shining over our heads to enlighten us in the way of salvation, in the things that belong to our everlasting peace — with other Christians, whose mental attainments are so small and limited, that they simply know the Bible is true; that God speaks to us in it, and makes known to us the way of salvation through its inspired vocables; that Jesus is an all-sufficient Saviour, whose blood cleanseth from all sin, and is able to save to the very uttermost; that the Holy Spirit comes down from the Father and the Son, in answer to their prayers, to regenerate their souls; and that heaven is prepared, into which Christ the forerunner has entered, to be the eternal home of all the people of God. But these Christians, low in mental attainments, are living before God under the influence of divine grace, and are spending a life of love to God and to man here. Thus grace does not equalize the mental powers of Christians: it merely sanctifies those they have.

Similar differences in rank exist among the inhabitants of heaven. Angels differ in rank. There are angels and archangels; there are principalities and powers; there are cherubim and seraphim. I cannot exactly say what the particular distinctions are among the angels of God, which these epithets, applied to them, point out; but assuredly they indicate that the angelic community is not a presbyterial equality, is not a republican dead level. I cannot tell — for on this the Scriptures are entirely silent — what has led God to appoint these diversities in rank and in attainment among the angels who stand in his presence, and minister to him in the upper sanctuary, no more than I can tell what leads God, when sending children to be born into the world, to assign one the position of being born of a sovereign, in one of the palaces of earth, and another to be born of a beggar, cold and comfortless, by the wayside; no more than I can tell what it is that leads God to assign such a difference in rank and attainment to the different members of the human family; no more than I can tell what has led God to give such differences in their degrees of brightness to the different orbs of the firmament.

Angels may all possess the very same form and appearance, with their complexional differences, and be all equally shining and lovely in their countenances; -and the differences of rank existing among them may be merely in the authority and rule which they exercise over their compeers. Why this dignity in rank is assigned by God to some of the angels over others, I cannot tell. It may be as a reward, for a season, for zeal in the work of God, in doing his will, and in executing his commands. It may be that government is needed even in heaven; that governors are required even among the angels; and that God appoints certain of their number for an assigned period, irrespective of reward altogether, to fill the places of honor he has prepared, and to exercise the authority he commits into their hands. In this way, angels may be changing places from a higher to a lower, or from a lower to a higher sphere, as men upon the earth are found doing, in executing that power which God, in his providence, puts into their hands.

There are also different degrees of rank and of attainment among the redeemed who are now glorified in heaven. "They that be wise shall shine as the brightness of the firmament; and they that turn many to righteousness, as the stars for ever and ever." The question may be put, How is this difference, in the degrees of glory which God gives to his children in heaven, assigned? Upon what principle does God act when determining the position which this saint and that saint is to occupy in a state of glory? I believe that God is neither partial nor capricious, and that, in assigning to each glorified saint his and her position in glory, he is guided by the two principles of infinite rectitude and of infinite wisdom. There are two principles, upon one or other of which, or upon both, God may assign to us, who are believers in Jesus, our position in glory, — the degree of our state of grace upon earth may determine our degree of glory in heaven, or work done for Christ here may determine the reward that we are to receive when we enter into heaven. If our degree in a state of grace is to determine our degree in a state of glory, this surely ought to be a powerful motive to stimulate us not to rest contented with small attainments in the divine life here; or, if it be work done for Christ upon earth that is to determine our position in glory, this should be a powerful motive to lead us to work the works of God whilst it is called to-day. Paul, after a long life of arduous labor in the cause of Christ upon earth, will thus be advanced to a higher position in glory than the thief upon the cross, who never performed even one good work in the cause of Christ, except the example which he gave, when, feeling himself approaching, and now on the very verge of, an undone eternity, he looked with a broken heart to Christ, and cried that Jesus would remember him when he entered into his kingdom. Men reward those who work for them, in proportion to the time they have been engaged in their service, and the amount of work performed by them; and it is upon the principles of equity that the God of heaven should do the same.

Eternal Hope: Five Sermons Preached in Westminster Abbey

Sermon, Westminster Abbey

Luke xiii. 23, 24.

“Then said one unto Him, Lord, are there few that be saved? And He said unto them, Strive to enter in at the strait gate.”

THIS passage, my brethren, gives us the very essence of our Lord’s teaching respecting the present and the future. Since He had dwelt so often on the difficulty and narrowness of virtue’s uphillward path, and on the few who toil in it, whereas many are to be seen rushing along the broad road that leadeth to destruction,—some one (who perhaps had more speculative curiosity than moral earnestness) wanted to know the issues of this fact;—and therefore asked Him the plain, direct question, “Lord, are there few that be saved?” Now supposing that it were so;—supposing that, as thousands of theologians have taught for thousands of years, the vast majority are in the next world for ever lost,—would not our Lord have said so? would not His teaching have gained a terrific awfulness from admitting it? Had the answer to the question been a plain “Yes!”—and had that view been as essential to morality as some assert,—surely it would have been worse than dangerous,—it would have been unkind to suppress it! But what is the answer of Divine wisdom? Is it some glaring agony of fire and brimstone for billions of years? Is it in that style in which the coarse terrorism of the Puritan is at one with the coarse terrorism of the Inquisition? No; but it is a refusal to answer. It is a strong warning to the questioner. It is a tacit rebuke of the very question. It is the pointing to a strait gate, and a narrow way, whereby alone we can enter into the kingdom of God. In this sad world it is but the few who find that way, and until they find it they cannot see the kingdom of God. But there is not one word here about an irreversible doom to a material torment; not one word to tell us that all who walk in that broad road inevitably reach its fatal goal. And are we not ‘bound to consider the silences of Scripture no less than its utterances?’ If we still yearn for any answer about the future we may find it perhaps in the glorious words of Isaiah, “Fear not; for I am with thee: I will bring thy seed from the East, and gather thee from the West; I will say to the North, Give up; and to the South, Keep not back; bring my sons from far, and my daughters from the ends of the earth;” or in the dazzling vision of the seer of the Apocalypse, “I beheld, and to! a great multitude, which no man could number, of all nations, and kindreds, and peoples, and tongues, stood before the throne, and before the Lamb, clothed with white robes, and palms in their hands;” or in the calm promise of our Blessed Lord Himself. “In My Father’s House are many mansions.” But the spirit of the answer of our Blessed Lord was this, “The fate of the souls that He hath made is in the hands of Him that made them, not in thine. Enter thou in at the strait gate.”

2. It was in that spirit, my brethren, that I strove to speak to you last Sunday, believing that much of the popular teaching about the awful subject of future retribution—its physical tortures, its endless duration, its irreversible finality at the instant of death,—gives us an utterly false picture of the God of Love, which, though it may find warrant in the primâ facie aspect of texts wrongly translated or totally misunderstood, finds no warrant either in the general tone of Scripture or in God’s no less sacred teachings to our individual souls. And if some would represent such a view as dangerous, I reply that my only question is, ‘Is it true?’ It is falsehood which is always dangerous; but truth never. It is not for us to construct after our own fashion the unseen world. You think that men will not love God without the terror of an endless hell? So thought not David. He said, “There is mercy with Thee: therefore shalt Thou be feared.” And in any case it is useless to dogmatise about things which God has not revealed. “Things are as they are, and will be as they will be;” and for us to misrepresent them by the fallibility of human system, or at the bidding of human expedience, is a blasphemy against truth and against God. What is dangerous is to drive some into indignant atheism, and to entangle others with an evil superstition, and to crush others under a deep despair, by representing Him whose name is Love as a remorseless Avenger, instead of as a Father, who is gracious and merciful, slow to anger and of great kindness, neither keepeth He His anger for ever. Evil souls and foolish souls can make any doctrine dangerous. St. Peter tells us that they wrested the writings of St. Paul, as they did also the other Scriptures, to their own destruction; would you, therefore, have had the Scriptures unwritten? or ought St. Paul never to have taken up his pen? Some of the Fathers, I am afraid, held what I believe to be the truth on this matter,—just as hundreds of our ablest clergy do,—but feared to preach it;<sup>1</sup> but the best and greatest of the Fathers did preach it, and many saints at whose feet I gladly sit have preached it in this age. And, if we see a truth, are we to be “liars for God”<sup>2</sup> by suppressing it, because those think it dangerous who believe in no more potent motive for virtue and the love of God than a ghastly terror? Are we to go before the very God of truth with a lie in our right hands? Richard Baxter—a saint of God if there ever was one—avowed his belief that even a suicide, if hurried by sudden passion into self-slaughter, may be saved, and “If,” he nobly added, “if it should be objected that what I maintain may encourage suicide, I answer, I am not to tell a lie to prevent it!” We English can’t do that. But, oh, my brethren, I am not afraid, I never shall be afraid, of doing harm by asking you “to think noble things of God.” I am not afraid to bid you plead with Him in the spirit of righteous Abraham, “That be far from Thee, Lord: shall not the Judge of all the earth do right?” I am not afraid to say of Him with holy Paul, “Is there unrighteousness with God? God forbid!” I am not afraid to plead with Him, in that syllogism which, as Luther said, sums up all the Psalms of David—“the God of pity pities the wretched. We are wretched; therefore”—not surely in this short world only, but for ever—“God will pity us.” Punish us? Yes, punish us because He pities. But “God judges that He may teach, He never teaches that He may judge.” His æonian fire is the fire of love; it is to purify, not to torture; it is to melt, and not to burn:—

We would be melted by the heat of love
By flames far fiercer than are blown to prove
And purge the silver ore adulterate.

God Himself tells us that “He afflicteth, not willingly, but for our profit, that we may be partakers of His holiness;” but could it be “for our profit” to be tortured for ever in a hopeless hell? And shall He belie His own words? Our Church, thank God—wiser than her wisest, tenderer than her tenderest ministers—speaks not in such tones in her burial service; and I, who believe in a God whose name is Love—I, who rely with all my heart on “the mercy of the Merciful,”<sup>1</sup>—I who put my whole trust and confidence in that living God who is “the Saviour of all men”—I, who think that the key to all the dreadful perplexities of life and death lies in the belief that Christ lived and died—I, for one, say, God forbid! I would rather go to the instinct of the Christian saint than to the system of the dogmatic theologian; I would rather accept, as reflecting the mind of God, the broad humanitarian charity, the keen and tender sensibility of the Christian poet, than the hard logic of the inflexible systematist. And our great living poet ends his dread “Vision of Sin” in the very spirit of my text:—

At last I heard a voice upon the slope
Cry to the summit, ‘Is there any hope?’
To which an answer pealed from that high land,
But in a tongue no man could understand:
And, on the glimmering summit far withdrawn,
God made himself an awful rose of dawn.

Dismissing then all controversy, which I never wish to introduce into this or into any pulpit,—not thinking it well to answer that part of controversy which springs from mere ignorance or angry prejudice, but realising, with deep responsibility, the sacredness of this place, and desiring, in deep humility, to lead aright the thoughts of men and women of open minds and loving hearts,—I will ask you to glance a little closer with me at God’s ways with man. Not in idle speculation, not in the interests of any dogma, but because, a few years hence, death will stare every one of us in the face, and because the faith in the future may beneficently influence our work in the present—let us, for a few moments, glance at what men are, and at what we may hope in the future for them and for ourselves.

3. There are, in the main, three classes of men: there are the saints; there are the reprobates; there is that vast intermediate class lying between yet shading off by infinite gradations from these two extremes.<sup>1</sup>

I. Of the saints, my brethren, I shall not speak; their promise is sealed; their lot is sure. Beautiful, holy souls, into whom, in all ages, entering, the Spirit of God hath made them friends of God and prophets, these are the joy of heaven—they are the salt of earth. We, every one of us, are better for them, as the dull clods of the earth are better for the snowy hills whence the rivers flow; as the stagnant air of earth is better for the pure winds which scatter the pestilence. Oh, what would the world be—what would England be—what would this huge oppressive city be—without them? without the ten righteous, the thirty, the forty, the fifty righteous, for whose sakes the heavens do not burst to drown, with deluging rain,

The feeble vassals of lust, and anger, and wine,
The little hearts that know not how to forgive?

What would this city be if it were nothing more than one mad greedy coil of jarring slanders, of reckless competition, of selfish luxury, of brutal vice? Few, we know, are these saints of God, and mostly poor, and often despised; and yet it is they alone who save the world from corruption by the gangrene of its vices, from dissolution by the centrifugal forces of its hate. Their gentle words break our fierce wranglings with the balm of love; their calm faces look in upon our troubles with peace and hope:—

Ever their statues rise before us.
Our loftier brothers, but one in blood,
At bed and table they lord it o'er us,
With looks of beauty and words of good.

A millionaire, a successful man, though the world crawl at his feet, is but as the small dust of the balance; but, “O God, O God, give us saints!” About them we have no controversy. We know that they shall be happy; we know that God shall treasure them in the day when He maketh up His jewels; we know that “eye hath not seen, nor ear heard, nor heart conceived” what God shall give to them that love Him.

II. But if they be unassailably secure, eternally happy, what of the other extreme? What of the reprobates? We see sometimes an heroic virtue; would to God that we never saw also a brutal vice. Not far from here is a vast prison, holding some 1,200 criminals. Every time the great clock of Westminster booms out its chimes to the tune—

Lord, through this hour,
Be Thou my guide;
So, by Thy power,
No foot shall slide:

those prisoners hear it. Among them are some who have got within the arm of the law, but are hardly criminals at all; those might be even liberated: others who have fallen into crime only from surrounding temptations, and from natures weak but not depraved; these might be reclaimed: but some there are whom those who know them describe as filthy, cruel, brutal, irreclaimable, and whom society gives up.<sup>1</sup> It is thus (but I have been obliged altogether to soften down his words) that a great living writer speaks of them: “Miserable distorted blockheads,” he calls them, “with faces as of dogs or oxen; angry, sullen, degraded, sons of greedy mutinous darkness; base-natured beings, on whom, in a maleficent, subterranean life of London scoundrelism, the genius of darkness has visibly set his seal. Who,” he asks, “could ever command these by love?” A collar round the neck, a cartwhip on the back, these, in an impartial and steady human hand, are what should be afforded them,—and he proposes, with all the speed possible, to make an end of them at once. Well, my brethren, the punishment of crime is just, and society has a right by stern punishment to protect the innocent; yet I am glad that the Saviour of man spake never in terms like these. I rejoice that He rather said that He came to call sinners to repentance; to seek and save the lost. And if you ask me whether I must not believe in endless torments for these reprobates of earth, my answer is, Ay, for these and for thee, and for me too unless we learn with all our hearts to love good and not evil; but whether God for Christ's sake may not enable us to do this even beyond the grave, if we have failed to do so in this life—I cannot say. I know that God hates sin, because He loves the soul which it destroys; I know that “the path of that hatred is as the path of a flaming sword; which he who hath eyes may see, divinely beautiful and divinely terrible, everywhere burning, as with unquenchable fire, the false and death-worthy from the true and life-worthy.”<sup>2</sup> Yet I know also that for these Christ died. The bigot may judge their souls if he likes; the Pharisee may consign them with conventional orthodoxy to endless torment; but so cannot and will not I. “Forbear to judge,” said the holy king by the awful death-bed of Cardinal Beaufort, who died and made no sign—

Forbear to judge, for we are sinners all!
Close up his eyes, and draw the curtain close,
And let us all to meditation.

Born and bred as these have been, surrounded as they have been from infancy with sights and sounds of degradation, what should we have been,—what wouldst thou have been, O comfortable bigot, or thou, O prosperous Pharisee—hadst thou had but as small a chance as they? Pointing to a murderer on his way to execution, “there,” said a good and holy man, “there, but for the grace of God, goes John Bradford.” If, as we look into the abyss of our own hearts, we see infinite potentialities of guilt and vice, so, as I look on these I see in them, in spite of all their shame and stain, the infinite potentialities of virtue. And is it not almost blasphemous to suppose that He who made a human being with such rich capacities will in one moment “throw it from Him into everlasting darkness?” Not mine at any rate shall it be to close against them “with impetuous recoil and jarring sound,” the gates of hell, lest those gates should more justly be clanged on me; I but I commend them with humblest hope, even after this life of hopelessness, to Him who did not loathe the whiteness of the leper, and who suffered the woman that was a sinner to wash his feet with tears. That without holiness none can see God; that every guilty deed, if unrepented of, must bring its own just and awful retribution; that, for every impure and cruel soul there remaineth, behind the clouds of this world, the dark night of the next; that I know. But when I remember that even these have been known to burst into tears at a mother's name; that even these have been known at times to flash out into high deeds of momentary heroism—I see that God's Spirit has nowhere taught us that He who gave cannot give back; that He who once made them innocent children cannot restore their innocence again; that He who created them,—He who will have all men to be saved,—cannot recreate them in His own image, cannot uncreate their sins. At any rate no arrogant word, no theologic dogma, no acrid prejudice of mine, shall ever utter to them the language of despair, or stand between these—God's lowest—and His love.

Nay, I believe that the Good Shepherd, for so He Himself has told us, will not cease to search for these His lost sheep, until He find them. Here again the Christian poets teach us a truer charity than the hard theologians:

Still for all slips of her,
One of Eve's family,
Wipe those poor lips of her,
Oozing so clammily.

Make no deep scrutiny
Into her mutiny. . .
Cross her hands humbly,
As if praying dumbly,
Over her breast.

Owning her weakness,
Her evil behaviour,
And leaving with meekness
Her sins to her Saviour!

III. But, my brethren, the vast, vast mass of mankind belong to the third class: they are not utter reprobates any more than they are saints. They may rise to the one, they may sink to the other; but for the most part they are undecided. They face both ways; they halt between two opinions; they are neither saints nor criminals; they have not closed heart and soul with good, they have not abandoned themselves utterly to evil. They want to be pardoned, yet they want to retain the offence; they admire holiness, but they dally with iniquity; they shudder to be in a state of sin, yet they attain not to a state of grace; there “is an Adam in them, and there is a Christ;”<sup>1</sup> now they sin with reckless abandonment, now they repent in bitterest remorse; “the angel has them by the hand and the serpent by the heart.”<sup>2</sup>

To how many here do these words apply? We break no law of man; to the eye of man it might seem that we broke no law of God. But O what would be thought of us if we were all seen as we are?—if our hearts were naked and open to each other as they are to God? And it is those who do try to be God’s children who most realise their own exceeding sinfulness. This is why (as one has said) the cry of remorse and anguish which springs from the lips of a Fénelon or a Cowper is far more bitter than any confession which is ever wrung from a Richelieu or a Voltaire. Many, many of these better, and tenderer, and saintly souls have, I believe, been rendered utterly and hopelessly wretched, even to madness, as poor Cowper was, by that false view of God which is given by the pitiless anathemas of man. But to all these comes the cry, “Comfort ye, comfort ye, my people, saith our God.” Your own holier instinct tells you so. Son, or brother, or friend, or father dies: we all have lost them; it may be that they were not holy; not even religious; perhaps not even moral men; and it may be that, after living the common life of man, they died suddenly, and with no space for repentance; and if a state of sin be not a state of grace, then certainly, by all rules of theology, they had not repented, they were not saved. And yet, when you stood—O father, O brother—heavy-hearted by their open grave;—when you drank in the sweet words of calm and hope which our Church utters over their poor remains;—when you laid the white flowers on the coffin;—when you heard the dull rattle of “earth to earth, ashes to ashes, dust to dust;”—you,—who, if you knew their sins and their failings, knew also all that was good, and sweet, and amiable, and true within them,—dared you, did you even in the inmost sessions of thought,—consign them, as you ought logically to do, as you ought if you are sincere in that creed to do,—to the unending anguish of that hell which you teach? Or does your heart, your conscience, your sense of justice, your love of Christ, your faith in God, your belief in Him of whom you sing every Sunday that His mercy is everlasting,—rise in revolt against your nominal profession then?

You can bear to think of them,—as you can bear to think of yourself—suffering, as they never did on earth, the aching pang of God’s revealing light, the willing agony of His remedial fire. We should desire,—we should even pray for that—the natural consequence of our own alienation—meant not to torment us, but to perfect. But an arbitrary infliction—a burning torment—an endless agony—a material hell of worm and flame—a doom to everlasting sin;<sup>1</sup>—and all this with no prospect of amendment, with no hope of relief—the soul’s transgressions of a few brief hours of struggling, tempted life followed by billions of millenniums in scorching fire—and all this meant, not to correct but to harden; not to amend, but to torture and degrade:—did you believe in that for those whom you have loved?

Again, I say, God forbid:—again, I say, I fling from me with abhorrence such a creed as that! Let every Pharisee, if he will, be angry with me—let every dogmatist anathematise—but that I cannot, and do not believe. Scripture will not let me; my conscience, my reason, my faith in Christ, the voice of the Spirit within my soul, will not let me; God will not let me! What I do believe is this,—that for every wilful sin which we commit, unless it be repented of, we shall, as we do, feel the heavy and merciful wrath of God, until He have purged the vile dross from us, and made us as the fine gold for Himself. But what? Shall nature fill the hollows of her coarse rough flints with purple amethyst; shall she, out of the grimy coal, over which the shivering beggar warms himself, form the diamond that trembles on the forehead of a queen; shall even man take the cast-off slag and worthless rubble of the furnace and educe from it his most glowing and lustrous dyes—and shall God not be able to make anything of His ruined souls? And what? shall we be able to pity and to love those that hate us; and to bless those who curse us; and to forgive those who have wronged us;—shall we be willing to pardon our prodigals and to call them home;—and shall God not be willing—(and if willing who shall dare to say that He is not able?)—beyond the grave? “Shall mortal man be more just than God? Shall man be more just than his Maker?” We made them not; they are not people of our pasture, or sheep of our hands; yet if we can feel for sinners a yearning love, a trembling pity; and if that love and pity springs from all that is holiest and most Christlike in our souls;—and if it would be wholly impossible for any wretch among us to be so remorseless as to doom his deadliest enemy to an endless vengeance,—are we to believe this of God?—to believe that He who planted mercy in us is merciless, and that He will “hold us up with one hand and torment us with the other,” who knoweth our frame, and remembereth that we are but dust? Or shall we not rather believe, as the wise woman of Tekoah said to David three thousand years ago, “We must needs die, and are as water spilt on the ground; and God does not take away life, but devises devices that the wanderer may not for ever be expelled from Him.” Yes, where sin aboundeth grace shall much more abound. If God visits the sins of the fathers upon the children unto the fourth generation of them that hate Him,—He showeth mercy, not only unto thousands, as our version has it, but “unto the thousandth and thousandth generation”<sup>1</sup> of them that love Him, and keep His commandments; and so always,—in God’s promises, though not in man’s systems,—in God’s revelations though not in man’s beliefs, there is a vast overbalance of mercy above wrath. Ay, my brethren, fear not; have faith in God; think noble things of God; be sure that trust in the righteous God means the ultimate triumph of good over evil;—be sure that the cross of Christ, Christ’s infinite atonement, Christ’s plenteous redemption, means,—for all who do not utterly extinguish within their own souls the glimmering wick of love to God,<sup>2</sup>—the conversion of earth’s sinners, far off it may be,—but at last, far off, at last, into God’s saints.

I say to thee, do thou repeat
 To the first man thou mayest meet
 In lane, highway, or open street,
 That he, and we, and all men move
 Under a canopy of love
 As broad as the blue sky above.
 And,—ere thou leave him,—say thou this
 Yet one word more,—they only miss
 The winning of that final bliss,
 Who will not count it true, that love,
 Blessing, not cursing, rules above—
 And that in it we live and move.
 And one thing further make him know,
 That to believe these things are so,
 This firm faith never to forego,—
 Despite of all that seems at strife
 With blessing—all with curses rife—
 That this is blessing—this is life! (Arch Bishop Trench)

Delivered in the Tabernacle, Salt Lake City, Sunday Afternoon, June 13th, 1880

I shall endeavor to occupy a few moments of time, and perhaps I may continue my remarks until it is time to close the meeting. I wish I enjoyed better health; I should then feel more like speaking. But as it is, I feel willing to exert myself as far as possible, and also to bring my mind to bear upon the great subject of salvation, and the principles that pertain to eternal life and happiness in the world to come. It is difficult, sometimes, for a person who does not feel well in body, to concentrate his mind upon those subjects which will be edifying and instructive to the people.

It gives me great joy and pleasure, at all times, when I have the opportunity to express myself in regard to the great and important work, which our Father in heaven has seen proper to commence in our day. We have been made partakers, in a measure, of the spirit of the living God, pertaining to this last dispensation. This spirit, when received, and when we give it our attention, and bring our minds to bear upon the object of its operations, is calculated to instruct and impart much information and knowledge to both male and female who are in the possession of it. The Spirit of God is a spirit of revelation. It always was a spirit that revealed something to the human family, when mankind were in possession of it.

There have been, however, many ages since the commencement of the world, when the children of men have so far wandered from the Almighty, so far departed from his ordinances and precepts, that the spirit of revelation has not had place within them. The world may be considered in a woeful state of darkness and unbelief, whenever this great and glorious gift is withdrawn from the children of men; for without this gift, without this spirit, without revelation from the Most High, it is utterly impossible for the human family to be saved in the celestial kingdom of our Father and God. Perhaps some may think that this is a very broad statement. They will refer back to the last sixteen or seventeen centuries, and will say, that our fathers have not enjoyed the spirit of revelation, during that time, and if your statement, Mr. Pratt, be true, our fathers are not saved in the celestial kingdom of God. I do not say that our fathers will all be sent to an endless hell. I have made no such assertion. I do not say that they will receive no happiness, no glory, no reward in the world to come; I have made no such assertion; but understand my assertion, that if the world have not been in the possession of divine revelation directly to themselves, during this long period of time, then there have none of them been saved in the celestial kingdom of our Father and God.

Now I hope that you have understood me. There is quite a difference between being saved in some kingdom, where there is some glory, some happiness, and being saved in the kingdom where our Father resides. There is only one way to obtain this kingdom—the kingdom that is represented, in its glory, by one of the most brilliant luminaries that shines in yonder heavens, namely, the sun. We are told by our Saviour that those who obey his commandments shall shine forth as the sun in the kingdom of our Father. The Apostle Paul informs us that there are in the eternal worlds many different kinds of glory. In the 15th chapter of his first epistle to the Corinthians, he says, that There is one glory of the sun, and another glory of the moon, and another glory of the stars; for one star differeth from another star in glory. So also is the resurrection of the dead.

They do not all rise to the same glory, nor to the same happiness, nor to the same fullness, nor to the same kingdom; but they arise from their graves, and come forth—those who are counted worthy of any kind of glory—to receive that which they are worthy of, all that they have lived for, and nothing more.

Our Father who dwells in yonder heavens, and his Son Jesus Christ, inhabit the highest degree of glory in eternity. They are possessed of all the fullness of glory. They have a fullness of happiness, a fullness of power, a fullness of intelligence, light and truth, and they bear rule over all other kingdoms of inferior glory, of inferior happiness, and of inferior power. Their glory is like that of the sun, or at least, the sun being the most conspicuous body with which we are immediately acquainted, in regard to its glory, it is referred to as being typical of the highest degree of glory in the heavens. The Gospel is intended to exalt the children of men to that same degree of glory, where our Father and where his Son reside. Hence it is said by our Savior, just as he was taking leave of his apostles in ancient times,

Let not your heart be troubled: ye believe in God, believe also in me. In my Father's house are many mansions: if it were not so, I would have told you. I go to prepare a place for you. And if I go and prepare a place for you, I will come again and receive you unto myself; that where I am, there ye may be also.

There is a mansion where he dwells. Where this mansion is located in the midst of the vast surrounding space, has not been revealed to us. It may have been revealed in former ages of the world, but to us, as Latter-day Saints, we have no revelation concerning its location. But there is a location, where these two glorious personages dwell. It has a location, just as much as our earth has a location in the solar system. But when I speak of our Father and our God being located in a glorious mansion, or celestial world, I do not wish to be understood that he is confined to that location. Do not misapprehend the subject. He is not confined to that particular locality, in the midst of universal space. He has power which we are not in possession of. He has power to waft himself from that particular locality to other dominions, other worlds, other creations; and to do this with an immense velocity. Of course, to accomplish this must occupy time. There are some, however, so foolish in their ideas that they suppose that it does not require time for the Almighty to go from world to world, or for any celestial messenger to do so. But this is a grand mistake. Time is included in all motion. Time is included between the event of a heavenly being leaving the celestial abode, where he dwells, and going to some other abode at a distance. How great this time may be is not revealed; but I have an idea that it is much swifter than any velocity with which we are familiar; I mean the velocity with which our Father and God can convey himself from the celestial abode where he dwells to some other kingdom. I believe it to be much swifter than that of the common light which shines from the heavenly bodies of our system, or from the distant bodies of the stellar system. Now, light travels with immense velocity-185,000 miles in one beat of the pulse, or in about one second of time. We might suppose that that is about as swift as any being would want to be wafted. But suppose that our Father, in the heavenly world where he dwells, should feel disposed to visit one of the vast dominions of his great creation as far distant as the nearest fixed star. If he could go no faster than light is transmitted through space, it would take him three and a half years to perform the journey. And to go to one that was situated some ten or fifteen times further off, it would take, of course, ten or fifteen times longer. And to go to some which are as far off from him as the distant creations that are just visible through our most powerful telescopes, it would take him six hundred thousand years to perform the journey, provided his velocity was only equal to that of light.

I draw the conclusion, therefore, that God is not confined to the velocity of light, or to any other velocity with which we are acquainted-that he can go with immense velocity, perhaps thousands and hundreds of thousands of times swifter than that of light, if he feels disposed so to do. It is out of the question for us to suppose that God does not travel in going from creation to creation. That he could be momentarily and instantaneously in two creations at the same time is something that I never could comprehend, although it is believed in by some of the religious professors of the present day. They believe that God, in his person, can be in infinite space all at the same moment. That is not our doctrine. It is not my doctrine, at least. He may be, by his power, by his intelligence, by his spirit, in infinite space, working throughout all the vast dominions of space, according to laws he has ordained and instituted.

Having said so much, in regard to the locality of our Heavenly Father, and of the celestial beings who dwell in the same abode, or in the same mansions where he resides, let me now say a few words more in regard to his presence being everywhere. I cannot, for a moment suppose, and I do not believe that any intelligent being who exercises his intelligence, independently of the traditions of the children of men, can suppose, that a person can be everywhere present at the same instant. "But," inquires one, "When a good man dies, passes out of this body of flesh and bones, it is said that he is in the presence of God. Does this mean that he has actually gone from his tabernacle, perhaps millions and millions and unnumbered millions of miles, to the abode or mansion where Jesus is, because he is in the presence of God?" No; I do not look at it in this way, I look at it in this light: if this world in which we dwell had the veil withdrawn from off its face, and the veil taken away from our faces, I consider that we would see the Lord, however far distant he might be; hence we would be in his presence; and on the other hand, those who dwell in his abode, however distant, can see us; for there is no veil over his face, no veil over the celestial abode of our Father and God, and there being no veil over him, nor over the beings that dwell in his abode, they can behold the most distant creations, which they have made. Now, this is my view. I do not say this is the view of the Latter-day Saints, but my own individual views, in regard to these matters. If then we pass out of these bodies of ours, and the veil is taken away, we are in his presence, just as much as we would be if we were wafted to the mansion where he dwells: I have no doubt, but what we will be wafted (if we are worthy) to that mansion, in due time; but I say, that we are in the presence of God, while our spirits are yet here upon the earth; because the veil is removed and our eyes can pierce eternity, and eternal things.

Now, we have some examples of this, Latter-day Saints: and I sometimes wonder, when we have such plain examples as are to be had in this book which I hold in my hand, (The Pearl of Great Price) I sometimes wonder that people should be so limited in their ideas and in their views, concerning the future state of man (I mean the glorified man), as to suppose that he will be confined in his vision to some particular locality, and that he will be something similar to what we are here in this mortal life. Now, even mortal men, before they obtained immortality, have enjoyed this spirit of seeing things that were naturally supposed to be utterly impossible. Who that is acquainted with this book (the Pearl of Great Price) has not read with great and deep interest, the words of that great man, Moses, before he was sent down to Egypt to redeem the Israelites? Who is there among the readers of the Latter-day Saints who cannot comprehend, in some measure, how the vision of that man was enlarged, while he was yet here in a state of mortality? He went up into the Mount to pray to the Lord. The veil was removed. The glory of God rested upon Moses, and great and important things were made manifest to him. All things were not revealed; for he was incapable of receiving all things while yet a mortal being. But the Lord saw proper to reveal some things; and Moses sought to know some other things, but the Lord would not grant it and told him that no man could behold all his works, except he beheld all his glory; and no man could behold all his glory and afterwards remain in the flesh upon the earth; that is, in the state of mortality. But, said he, "Moses, my son, I will show unto thee some of the works of mine hands. I will reveal unto you concerning the heaven that is over your head, and this earth upon which you dwell." And as the Lord talked with Moses, the Spirit of God being upon him, his eyes were opened, the veil was taken away, and he saw the whole earth, not merely the surface of it, but the interior of it; every particle of it was before the eyes of Moses.

This, then, shows that there is within each of these mortal tabernacles a spirit, and this spirit, when lit up by the Holy Spirit from on high, has certain faculties and powers, far beyond that which we are able to develop naturally here upon the earth. We cannot, by our own natural powers, discern one foot underneath the surface of the earth. We cannot discern through anything that is opaque in its nature—anything that will not admit the natural light to be transmitted through its substance. But still, we have the faculties within us; we have the power; there is merely an obstacle, or obstruction, in the way; and when this obstruction is removed it shows the godlike powers that are planted within the tabernacles of men, by which they can behold and pierce those portions of creation that are not discernable by the natural man. This Moses obtained during the few moments that he was thus enwrapped in vision. He obtained more information in those few moments than could be imparted in all the universities and colleges that ever existed, since the creation of the world to the present day. We may study the ponderous volumes that are published by the learned, and it takes a long time to grasp the information that some very learned men have received. But oh, how different is the method of receiving revelation, when it comes from the Most High! In a moment, as it were, those faculties of ours that have been lying dormant ever since we were born into this world—those faculties which are enshrouded with the darkness of a fallen creation—those faculties, when once illuminated, when once touched by the finger of the Almighty, can pierce the creations of the Almighty, so far as he permits us to behold.

These things encourage me. I am in hopes, when I get to the other side of the veil, that it will not be so difficult for me to understand the different laws of science, and the different laws and branches of education, that are taught in this little creation of ours. I am in hopes that when my spirit shall launch forth out of this mortal tabernacle, and go into the eternal world, that I shall not, at that time, require Lord Ross's great six feet telescope; I am in hopes that I shall not need any of the telescopes, or other instruments invented in the nineteenth century; but I am in hopes there will be a telescope prepared for me, by which I can see the vast creations of the Almighty, and comprehend, in a short period of time, more than could be unfolded to the children of mortality in a thousand years.

I mention this in order to bring before the Latter-day Saints a principle which, I think, we should all, more or less, reflect upon. How encouraging it is to think we are not always going to be bound down to this slow process of gaining knowledge, and information, and wisdom, pertaining to the works of the Almighty! How glorious it is also, to reflect upon the celestial host, who dwell in the fulness of celestial glory, where there is no veil, and where they have their bodies; for some of them have been raised from the grave to immortality, and are clothed upon with all the fulness of the attributes of the Father. I say, how glorious it is to reflect upon the heights and depths and lengths and breadths of knowledge that will then be unfolded to the children of men! These things, as I said before, inspire my heart with joy. I do not confine my hopes to the volumes of works on science, with which I may come in contact here in this world; I do not confine my hopes to the slow process of advancing in knowledge and intelligence that the children of this world have; but I look forward to that higher school-that great university which will scope in boundless and eternal space, that will scope in the most distant creations that we can imagine in the vast field of eternity, in which we will be able to comprehend those laws by which the various creations are governed; not understand them as we now comprehend some few laws, but understand them in all their perfection and fulness, being like unto our Father and God, made like unto him, fashioned like unto his glorious body, and become indeed "sons of God." Shall I go still further and say Gods? Are we not the children of our Father? Will not the children ascend to the same height, to the same glory, to the same celestial world, and to the same fullness of the attributes of their Father? Are not our children, take them as a body, qualified to come up to all the perfections and attributes of their fathers, who came on the earth before them? It seems to be a general law that children will grow up and possess all of the perfections of their parents, provided that they take the necessary steps, and are favored with long life, and have the natural intelligence that is common to man. If, then, this seems to be a natural law in regard, not only to man, but also to all animated creation-that the children come up and possess the perfections of their fathers before them-may we not reason, by analogy, that our Father who begat us-our Father who dwells in yonder celestial world, intends to make us one with him, that we shall receive the same fulness with him, that we shall partake of light, and truth, and knowledge, and advance from grace to grace, as the revelations in the Book of Covenants state, until we shall receive a fulness of all truth? Then will not this make us, in one sense of the word, sons of God? Will it not make us Gods also, according to the word of God?

"But," inquires one, "how can two persons possess the same attributes without quarreling with each other?" That is not the order of heaven. That is not the pure law that God has ordained, that there should be quarrels with those that have the same degree of intelligence; but the law is that they shall become one, as "I and my Father are one, so that these my brethren may also become one in us as we are one." That is the law; and if they are one there will be as much unity between his children who are exalted to that high condition in the celestial glory, as there is a unity and oneness between the Father and his only begotten Son. Have they any quarrel? Have they any difficulties? Have they any difference of views? Does one intend to carry on one government, and another a different kind of government? No; whatever is the will of the Father, is the will of the Son; whatever the Father is prepared to do, throughout all his vast dominions, the Son is in accord with him; and whatever the Father desires to perform and accomplish, his children who are made like him and one with them, will take hold and perform the same work, with all that unity and oneness which exist between the Father and the Son. In the celestial glory they are made equal in oneness, in power, in knowledge, and in all perfections; and the Lord their God is with them, and they are one with him, to carry on all his purposes, and will be one with him throughout all the future ages of eternity.

I thought perhaps the time was expired; but I will say a few more words in regard to this great glory, this high destiny prepared for the sons of God. I told you that our process of gaining information would be very rapid-would be immense in its growth, and that we should have the faculties within us developed to the highest degree. But now let us for a few moments, look into this high state of perfection.

When our faculties are thus developed, and when we have all the wisdom that I have been speaking of, that dwells in the bosom of celestial beings, in the eternal worlds, what will we do with this wisdom? Will we fold up our arms, and remain throughout all the future ages of eternity, in perfect indifference and laziness, without anything to accomplish or perform? No; we will have works assigned to us to perform in the eternal worlds, that will be proportionate to all the fulness of that glory and knowledge which we are endowed with. Did the sons of God in ancient times, come forth and assist in the formation of this little creation of ours? Did they all shout for joy when the materials were brought together, and when the foundations of the earth were laid? Did they all feel happy and sing a song of rejoicing, and with great joy; did they look upon the works which they were performing? Yes. Jesus was there-the First Born of this great family of our Father in heaven. He had the superintendence of this creation. He had the power, because the power dwelt within him, to build this earth of ours, the same as you give to your superintendent power to build your temples, about which Brother Rich has been speaking. It is said that the worlds were made through our Lord Jesus Christ. But do you suppose that he alone made them? No; he had the sons and daughters of God with him. And there were prophets in those days, before our earth was made. They shouted for joy when they saw the nucleus of this creation formed. Why? Because they could look into the future, and by the spirit of prophecy, behold the designs and purposes of the great Jehovah in regard to the creation which they were then in the act of forming. Did they not understand that they would have the privilege of coming forth and peopling this earth? Yes. Did they not understand that they were to pass through a probation on this earth, the same as we are now passing through, in order to prepare them for a still higher exaltation and glory, with immortal bodies of flesh and bones? Yes; they understood these things, hence their joy, when they saw the creation being formed for them. I mention this, in order to show to the Latter-day Saints that the great work that will be entrusted to those who are prepared, will be proportionate to the wisdom, intelligence and understanding that will be imparted to those who enter into the fulness of the glory of the celestial kingdom. They will not remain in idleness to all eternity. They will have a work to perform. They will form worlds under the direction, no doubt, of those that may be appointed to superintend works of such vast magnitude. Furthermore, when they have formed these worlds, they will set them in motion in the midst of universal space, in some location, where they can continue their mission, and where all necessary things shall be fulfilled and accomplished during the days of the probation of these various creations. There will be laws given to govern these new creations, the same as there are laws given to govern the creations with which we are surrounded. The inhabitants upon these creations will be visited from time to time by those that have taken part in the great work of their formation. The inhabitants thereof will be dealt with according to law. They will be intelligent beings. They will have their agency, and they will pass through their probation the same as the people are now passing through their probations here in this world. Everything will be accomplished according to laws that shall be ordained when these creations are made. Will they visit these creations? Yes; for they will have the same power of locomotion, the same power to pass through space (almost in the twinkling of an eye) that our Father has-that his Son Jesus Christ has-that all celestial beings who are exalted in his presence have, and possessing the power, they will visit from creation to creation; they will impart knowledge and understanding to their children in these creations. They will visit them with the light of their countenances, and the children of these creations will be made glad in their hour, in their times, and in their seasons, by the light and countenances of the celestial beings who, from time to time, organized them.

These are the high destinies that await the Latter-day Saints, if they are faithful. These are the high destinies into which many of the Former-day Saints have already entered. These are the great, and choice, and exalted blessings in store for all who will keep the commandments of our Father and God. Amen.(Journal of Discourses, 26 vols., 21:, p.256-260,262-263)

We can afford to be true and faithful to God; we can afford to carry out every principle and commandment which God has given unto us; we can afford to do this, as much so as Prophets and Apostles and people of God of other dispensations and generations. And I would say to all Israel, there is not one soul of us who can afford to compromise one of the commandments which God has committed to our charge. No man can afford to do this who is called of God to build up this Kingdom. We can afford, however, to meet the consequences, whatever they may be. And I would say to all present this day, that we should have, and that we have as much comfort, as much hope and as much cause to trust in God, and have received as much encouragement, by the over-ruling hand of Almighty God in our behalf, to go on magnifying our calling and to be true and faithful to every commandment which God has given unto us, as the people of any other generation had in their day; and for one I can say, "It is the kingdom of God or nothing" for me and I am willing to risk the consequences.

I know that I cannot afford to disobey any commandment which God has given to me, because there is no man who holds the Priesthood, and possessing the inspiration and the gifts of God and the light of truth, but would be ashamed both in the flesh and in the spirit-world to meet his God, and to be obliged to acknowledge that he did not obey His commandments.

And I will here say that whenever we do our duty, whenever we keep the commandments which have been made known to us, we will see the fulfilment of the promises which God has made to us with regard to this day, age and dispensation. There is no promise which God has made to us but that will be fulfilled to the very letter. I read these—the Bible, the Book of Mormon, the Doctrine and Covenants, and I regard them as eternal truths. I cannot find any revelations given from the days of Moses down to the days of Joseph Smith, nor from the days of Joseph to our day, by men who have spoken as they were moved upon by the Holy Ghost, but what has been fulfilled to the very letter, as far as time would admit of. Though the heavens and the earth pass away, not one jot or tittle which will fall unfulfilled.

When I read these solemn, these eternal declarations made through the mouth of Joseph Smith, my heart swells with gratitude and praise to God, my heavenly Father. I consider that the Doctrine and Covenants, our Testament, contains a code of the most solemn, the most Godlike proclamations ever made to the human family. I will refer to the "Vision" alone, as a revelation which gives more light, more truth, and more principle than any revelation contained in any other book we ever read. It makes plain to our understanding our present condition where we came from, why we are here, and where we are going to. Any man may know through that revelation what his part and condition will be. For all men know what laws they keep, and the laws which men keep here will determine their position hereafter; they will be preserved by those laws and receive the blessings which belong to them.

I say again, the Latter-day Saints have every encouragement; their pathway is plain and inviting before them. And the nearer we adhere to the commandments of God, the more confident we shall become that God is our friend and that He is watching over us, and that his son Jesus is our advocate, with the Father, that he is in the midst of this people, and that he will contend for the rights of his Saints, and will ward off every weapon which is formed against Zion.

Fin du monde présent et mystères de la vie future

Le sentiment le plus probable et le plus conforme aux Écritures, c'est qu'ils ressusciteront « à l'état de l'homme parfait, dans la mesure de l'âge de la plénitude de Jésus-Christ, in virum perfectum, in mensuram ætatis plenitudinis Christi “En d'autres termes, tous les hommes restaurés sur le type et à l'image de Jésus-Christ, autant du moins que le comportera la mesure et le degré de leurs mérites, renaîtront dans la maturité de l'homme, dans le plein développement de leur être et de leur constitution physique, comme le Christ au jour de sa Résurrection et de son Ascension, lorsque entrant dans sa béatitude, il alla prendre possession de son éternelle souveraineté.

Enfin les élus ressuscités posséderont la clarté. Ils seront environnés d'une telle splendeur, qu'ils apparaîtront comme autant de soleils: Tunc justi fulgebunt sicut sol in regno Patris eorum – A la vérité. cette clarté sera départie à des degrés divers aux élus, suivant l'inégalité de leurs mérites », car autre est la clarté du soleil, autre est celle de la lune, autre est celle des étoiles. Les étoiles elles-mêmes diffèrent entre elles en clarté. Ainsi en sera-t-il à la résurrection des morts.

Les élus qui apparaîtront entourés de plus de gloire, seront les docteurs: « Ceux qui auront éclairé les peuples dans la vraie doctrine, brilleront comme la lumière du firmament. – Les pasteurs, ceux qui les auront formés à la justice, seront comme des étoiles, pendant toute la durée des éternités.» – La clarté dont les élus seront ornés jettera sans cesse de nouveaux reflets, elle prendra à tout instant une nouvelle croissance; les saints glorifiés se communiqueront éternellement les biens qu'ils possèdent. et ils réfléchiront les uns sur les autres les torrents de splendeur dont ils seront illuminés. La source et le foyer de cette clarté divine ne seront autres que Dieu lui-même , qui, selon saint Jean, est tout “lumière”et en qui il n'y a aucun mélange d'imperfections et de ténèbres: Cum apparuerit, similes ei erimus, quoniam videbimus eum sicuti est.

Ce qui est certain, c'est que tout dans cette cité sera paisible et divinement ordonné. – La tristesse et l'envie en seront à jamais exclues; car, comme l'explique saint Augustin, «la tristesse et l'envie procèdent de nos mauvaises passions et des désirs qui nous font convoiter le bien d'autrui; mais dans la cité de Dieu, il n'y aura plus de désirs puisque tous ceux qu'ont jamais éprouvés les élus seront entièrement satisfaits: – l'Agneau les abreuvera à la source des eaux vives et leur soif sera pleinement étanchée.» – Secondement, il n'y aura pas de bien d'autrui à convoiter. – Dans la cité sainte, les biens et les richesses ne seront autres que le Dieu Charité, qui se départira lui-même intégralement à chacun des élus, suivant le degré et la mesure de leurs mérites. Ainsi, l'universalité des anges et des hommes se trouvera consommée en une unité parfaite, par la vertu de Celui qui est appelé le premier-né de la création, la tête du corps de l'Église, qui a reçu la primauté de toutes choses afin que Dieu soit tout en tous: Ut sit Deus omnia in omnibus.

Some Features of the Life Everlasting: St. John xiv. 2, 23.

The Expositor, edited by Samuel Cox, Sir William Robertson Nicoll, James Moffatt

In discussing the Vision of Isaiah a number or two back, I said: "We often speak of that bourn from which no traveller returns, and lament that no one of those who have crossed the stream of death has ever come back to tell us what would have added praise to praise, by bringing us a report of the land that lies beyond" And in rebuke of the thoughtlessness or ingratitude which prompts us to speak thus, I alluded to the fact that "He who could not be holden of death had returned to assure us that it is a wealthy land and a good," and passed on to point out that "a whole order of men, the prophets, have risen into the spiritual and eternal world, the world which lies beyond death and above life, and have come down from it to tell us what they had seen."

As my subject was "the Vision of Isaiah," I then naturally went on to indicate those features of the life eternal which were disclosed to the Prophet when he saw the Lord sitting on a throne high and lifted up, his train filling the temple. And now I should like to take up and expand the point I then passed over with a bare allusion, and to suggest how much we may learn of the life everlasting from the life and words of Him to whom all the prophets bear witness. For when I said that He who could not be holden of death had returned from beyond the bourn from which we have too hastily concluded that no traveller has returned, I did not tell the half of what He has done to reveal and illustrate the life of which we complain that we know so little, of which we sometimes complain that we know nothing at all. For not only did Christ enter into that life through the gate and avenue of death; He also came down from it through the gate and avenue of birth. The life everlasting was familiar to Him before He came and dwelt among us. It continued to be familiar to Him while He tabernacled with us. His whole life on earth is the express type and pattern of what our life in heaven, as well as in the kingdom of heaven, is to be. How, then, can we lament our entire ignorance of what the life everlasting is to be, when we have only to look at Him in order to see what it is! With what face can we go on repeating the old foolish complaints and longings—complaints of the darkness in which the future is hidden from us, and longings for some clear and cheerful light—when all the while the light is with us and the darkness has passed away!

What, then, it may be asked, do we learn, or what may we learn, from the life of Christ, of the life everlasting?

And, in reply, I may say that, in general, we learn that so often as we rise into the life of faith, the life of righteousness, the life of love and service, we lay hold on life eternal, we practise ourselves in the life we are to live for ever. But this is so obviously true that I need not dwell upon it. Yet there is probably great need to insist on the immense worth of this reply, this revelation of what the spiritual and eternal life really is. For, when we speculate about the future life, we are too apt to let our thoughts settle on its mere conditions and accidents, rather than on its supreme and essential qualities. We want to know, for instance, what the place we are to inhabit is like; or who our companions are to be, and how many or how few; or whether we shall be in a body or out of a body; or whether we shall recognize those whom we have known here, and love those whom we have loved. Nor are such speculations to be hastily or intemperately condemned: it is natural, I suppose, and may be right, that we should indulge in them. But these, we should remember, are not the main questions. If we want to know what the life of any distinguished man was like, and what it was worth, we do not determine our answer to that question by ascertaining what his income was, or what class of house he had for his abode, or what was his personal appearance, or what costume he wore; but by finding out what he knew, what he thought, what he did, what, above all, was the ruling character and animating spirit of his life. The former series of questions is not without importance, indeed; for the answers to them help to throw light on the character of the man and his achievements: but they are important mainly as they do throw light on these. And, in like manner, it is not the accidents or details, it is not the conditions and costume of the heavenly life which are of the first importance to us, but its essential character, its ruling and animating spirit. When, therefore, we learn from Christ that the life of heaven is a life of righteousness, of charity, of service, we learn what it is most important that we should know about it, and may well be content to leave its minor conditions and external accidents for future disclosure. Not that they are all of them so left; but that we should not need to fret and trouble ourselves even if they were. If our friends who are with God share his pure, loving, ministerial life,—if they possess the very life which was manifest in his Son Jesus Christ,—as they do,—what more need we ask or wish for them? And if we, when we die, are to share that life, what more do we need to know for ourselves, or how can we dare to say that we know nothing about the life beyond the bourn? We know all, or all that is of real and vital importance.

Nor is it only in his example that the Lord Jesus Christ reveals to us what we call the future life, but what He called "the life eternal." He also revealed it, or many of its main features, in his words. And it is a curious instance of the foolish and complacent ignorance with which men are too often content, that, at times, even those who believe in Christ should speak of the future life as quite hidden from them, though all the while they hold in their hands words which, if duly studied, would disclose its main features to them; and never so much as suspect that they are guilty of the basest ingratitude in thus casting on Him the onus of an ignorance for which they themselves are alone to blame. Nor are these illuminating words, as a rule, mystical and remote, hard to get at or hard to understand; there would be some excuse for us if they were.

Take, for example, the words of Christ reported by St. John: In my Father's house are many mansions. The words are simple enough. We have all read them, I suppose, almost as often as any words in the New Testament. We have only to meditate upon them for a few moments in order to find a meaning in them which gives us a new sense of the vastness of heaven, of the charm and variety of the life we are to live in it, and of that curious and happy combination of repose and progress in it which meets and satisfies the two main currents of our nature: and yet how few of us have made that meaning our own!

It tasks no scholarship to see that our Lord, like the prophet Isaiah when he was caught up into heaven, had the Jewish temple in his mind; and that He here represents heaven to us as "the spiritual and eternal antitype," or archetype, of that transitory tabernacle. For the temple at Jerusalem had many courts, and many chambers; it was the abode of many different kinds of men,—as priests, singers, scribes, porters, watchmen, soldiers. And in this respect, He tells us, it resembled his Father's house. That also has many mansions, for many different kinds of man and spirit. For by his Father's "house" I understand Him to mean the whole broad universe seen and unseen, with some of its mansions on this side the river of death, and some on that side; just as some of the courts and chambers of the house at Jerusalem were on one side of the little stream that ran through it, and some on the other. When He leaves his disciples, therefore, when He is parted from them and taken up into heaven, they are not to let their hearts be "troubled," as though He were really separated from them, He will but have gone from one mansion of God's house to another: the same great roof will still cover them both. And the mansions are many, because men are many, and that there may be room for them all. In other words, the universe is large and various because the Father in heaven has so many children, and must find a suitable home for every one of them. We are in one mansion of that great House even while we are on the earth. Our friends who have left the earth are only in another mansion, or chamber, of the same great House: they are still under the same broad roof with us; and God is still their Father, as He is ours. We may as easily pass to them as a Jew could pass from chamber to chamber, or go up from court to court, in the temple at Jerusalem.

And, lest even this familiar and homely figure should fail to reassure us, Christ passes on to say, I go to prepare a place for you,—to suit a place to you, to provide conditions for you so sweetly and delicately attuned to your individual needs and bents and cravings that each one of you will feel himself to be at home in it, feel too that his home is a heavenly home, whatever the chamber or mansion in which he may dwell; nay, for only thus do we reach the full force of the phrase, in a heaven of his own, a place that he may call and know to be his very own—his private heaven, his personal abode.

The mansions are many, then, that there may be room for us all, and because there are so many of us; and the places are prepared with a view to our personal idiosyncracies, our individual leanings, necessities, preferences. So that the heavenly life is at once a large life, having the whole universe for its domain, and a life of infinite variety, exquisitely adapted to every man's wishes, culture, needs; and this life, at once so various and so large, is —as we have already seen—a pure and holy life, a life of righteousness and service; for all its mansions are parts of a temple and partake its sanctity, a temple in which God is worshipped day and night for ever.

These, surely, are pleasant and helpful thoughts concerning the future life; they lie on the very surface of our Lord's words, and may be picked up by any one who looks at them with a heedful eye. But for the next thought we must go a little beneath the surface, though not much. For, although the word mansions will suggest to every reader ideas of solid endurance and stately repose, we may not all know that the word mansiones, like the Greek word which it translates, means "resting-places," and indicates those "stations" on a great road where Eastern travellers found, as they still find in similar caravanserais, both repose and refreshment. And that this is the true meaning of the word here, all scholars are agreed. So that when Christ says to us "In my Father's house are many mansions," by his very choice of this word He suggests to us that curious combination of the contrasted ideas of rest and progress which enter into all our conceptions of the heavenly life. When, and in proportion as, we enter on that life, we rest from toil, from strife, from care; and this rest, as it denotes an immense advance on our natural or earthly life, so also it predicts advances still to come, and speaks to us of an endless progress into the likeness and fellowship of God our Father as we pass from mansion to mansion of his great Home—resting in each, yet rising from one to another. Advance without restlessness, a journey in which every day will bring us to a fresh station, and every station will be a mansion, and every mansion a home, and every home made glad by our Father's presence and companionship; to be for ever drawing nearer to God, while yet we are for ever enjoying Him—this is the thought suggested to us by the phrase, In my Father's house are many mansions.

How much, then, have we learned from Christ; how many essential features of the life everlasting become plain to us as we study his life and words! The future life for which we look is not to be separated by any deep gulf, by any abrupt break, from the life we are now living, or may and ought to live. Our friends who have passed into it are not divided from us; they are under the same roof, though in different chambers or mansions of the same House; they are in the presence of the same Father; they share the same life with us. For we too enter on the life everlasting when we live a life of faith, of righteousness, of love, of service; and this life is at once large and various, at once pure and genial, at once stable and advancing, at once a constant rest and a constant progress to a deeper rest; it has the whole universe for its theatre; and this theatre is a sacred and august temple, in every chamber of which we may worship the Father of our spirits, rejoice in his presence, and enter into a closer and more inward fellowship with Him.

All this, too, remember, we have learned from a single word of Christ; and there are many such words, all waiting to yield us their store of precious meaning, and to enlarge our conceptions of the life that now is and of that which is to be, the very moment we meditate upon them.

Yes, the life that now is, as well as that which is to be. Let us mark that well, and lay the keenest emphasis upon it. For it is "the life everlasting" of which we are speaking, the true life of man in time as well as in eternity. And there are many who, while curiously speculating on the mysteries of the future life, neglect the duties of this present life, and fall short of the peace which might be theirs. Like Judas (Verse 22)—the honest and loyal Judas, not the traitor—they fail to understand how they may share the life eternal in the fleeting hours of time, how they may realize a Divine Presence, and feel that even here and now they are resting in one of the many mansions of the Father's house. Jesus had said (Verse 21) that He would manifest Himself to as many as loved Him and kept his commandments even after He had been taken up and vanished from their sight. Judas quite understood that in these words his Master was promising a special revelation of Himself, a revelation which would carry everlasting life with it, which would raise as many as received it into the very life that dwelt in Him, and draw them into a vital and constant fellowship with his Father. But Judas did not understand how these things could be. And so Christ had to teach him (Verse 23) that men's power of receiving a Divine revelation depends on their active obedience of Divine commandments; and that active obedience, again, depends on personal and fervent love for the Giver of those commandments. Judas asked: "Lord, what is come to pass that thou wilt manifest thyself unto us, and not unto the world?" And Jesus replied: "If a man love me, he will keep my word; and my Father will love him, and we will come to him, and make our abode with him." In other words, Christ taught him that the Divine manifestation and fellowship are limited, not by any lack of love and bounty in God, but by the lack of love, and therefore the lack of receptivity, in man. For how can even God Himself give men what men cannot or will not take? But if any man will take, God will give. Let him but open the hands of love and obedience, and his hands will instantly be filled. Now, and here, he will see God, and in God his Father, and by that vision be raised into the life everlasting. And, as if to impress this thought upon us, our Lord uses in Verse 23 the very word He had already used in Verse 2; and as there He had spoken of the many mansions in his Father's house, so here He says, "If any man love me and keep my word, my Father will love him, and we will come to him, and make our abode"—our mansion— "with him."

Here, then, and now, we may dwell, we may work and rest, in one of the many mansions. Here, and now, we may have our Father always with us. Here, and now, we may enter on the life everlasting, the life of love, of obedience, of service; that large yet various life, that stable yet advancing life, that life of rest and yet of progress, of growth and yet of peace, which is the strength and joy of heaven. For if we know and are sure that, whatever our lot and outward conditions may be, or however they may change, we are always in God's house, and that God is always with us—loving us because we love Him, ministering to us because we serve Him, blessing us because we worship Him in all we do—we are settled and stablished in a peace which none of the chances and changes of time can disturb; at a single stroke we are freed from the stings of vanity, and the frets of care, and the torments of fear, and the pangs of loss. We are one with God in a growing fellowship, in a growing yet always satisfying peace; and what harm can time and change do to those who are one with the Lord of change and time? what harm can death itself do us when even death is, for us, only a messenger sent to call us to some ampler mansion of the House and Temple in which we already abide, and to conduct us to a place still more exquisitely prepared for us?

Chapitre IX
Que l'Union des Bienheureux avec Dieu aura Différents Degrés

Or ce sera cette lumière de gloire, Théotime, qui donnera la mesure à la vue et contemplation des bienheureux; et selon que nous aurons plus ou moins de cette sainte splendeur, nous verrons aussi plus ou moins clairement, et, par conséquent, plus ou moins heureusement la très sainte Divinité, qui, regardée diversement, nous rendra de même différemment glorieux. Certes en ce Paradis céleste tous les esprits voient toute l'essence divine; mais nul d'entre eux, ni eux tous ensemble ne la voient, ni peuvent voir totalement. Non, Théotime; car Dieu étant très uniquement un et très simplement indivisible, on ne le peut voir qu'on ne le voie tout. Et d'autant qu'il est infini, sans limite, ni borne, ni mesure quelconque en sa perfection, il n'y a, ni peut avoir aucune capacité hors de lui, qui jamais puisse totalement comprendre ou pénétrer l'infinité de sa bonté infiniment essentielle et essentiellement infinie.

Cette lumière créée du soleil visible qui est limitée et finie est tellement vue toute de tous ceux qui la regardent, qu'elle n'est pourtant jamais vue totalement de pas un, ni même de tous ensemble. Il en est presque ainsi de tous nos sens-. Entre plusieurs qui entendent une excellente musique, quoique tous l'entendent toute, les uns pourtant ne l'entendent pas si bien, ni avec tant de plaisir que les autres, selon que les oreilles sont plus ou moins délicates. La manne était savourée toute de quiconque la mangeait, mais différemment néanmoins, selon la diversité des appétits de ceux qui la prenaient, et ne fut jamais savourée totalement; car elle avait plus de différentes saveurs qu'il n'y avait de variétés de goûts ès Israélites. Théotime, nous verrons, et savourerons là-haut au ciel toute la Divinité; mais jamais nul des bienheureux, ni tous ensemble, ne la verront ou savoureront totalement.

Cette infinité divine aura toujours infiniment plus d'excellences que nous ne saurions avoir de suffisance et de capacité: et nous aurons un contentement indicible de connaître, qu'après avoir assouvi tout le désir de notre cœur, et rempli pleinement sa capacité en la jouissance du bien infini qui est Dieu; néanmoins il restera encore en cette infinité des infinies perfections à voir, à jouir et posséder, que sa divine Majesté comprend et voit elle seule, elle seule se comprenant soi-même.

Ainsi les poissons jouissent de la grandeur incroyable de l'Océan; et jamais pourtant aucun poisson, ni même toute la multitude des poissons, ne vit toutes les plages, ni ne trempa ses écailles en toutes les eaux de la mer. Et les oiseaux s'égayent à leur gré dans la vasteté de l'air; mais jamais aucun oiseau, ni même toute la race des oiseaux ensemble, n'a battu des ailes en toutes les contrées de l'air, et n'est jamais parvenu à la suprême région d'icelui. Ah! Théotime, nos esprits, à leur gré et selon toute l'étendue de leurs souhaits, nageront en l'Océan, et voleront en l'air de la Divinité, et se réjouiront éternellement de voir que cet air est tant infini, cet Océan si vaste, qu'il ne peut être mesuré par leurs ailes; et que jouissant, sans réserve ni exception quelconque de tout cet abîme infini de la Divinité, ils ne peuvent néanmoins jamais égaler leur jouissance à cette infinité, laquelle demeure toujours infiniment infinie au-dessus de leur capacité.

Et sur ce sujet les esprits bienheureux sont ravis de deux admirations: l'une pour l'infinie beauté qu'ils contemplent, et l'autre pour l'abîme de l'infinité qui reste à voir en cette même beauté. O Dieu! que ce qu'ils voient est admirable! mais, ô Dieu! que ce qu'ils ne voient pas l'est beaucoup plus! Et toutefois, Théotime, la très sainte beauté qu'ils voient étant infinie, elle les rend parfaitement satisfaits et assouvis; et se contentant d'en jouir, selon le rang qu'ils tiennent au ciel, à cause de la très aimable providence divine qui en a ainsi ordonné, ils convertissent la connaissance qu'ils ont de ne posséder pas, ni ne pouvoir posséder totalement leur objet, en une simple complaisance d'admiration, par laquelle ils ont une joie souveraine de voir que la beauté qu'ils aiment est tellement infinie, qu'elle ne peut être totalement connue que par elle-même. Car en cela consiste la divinité de cette beauté infinie, ou la beauté de cette infinie divinité.

Chapter XI - God's Sleeping Saints Of The Old Testament.

Rev. Nathaniel West, D.D., on Daniel's Revelation—Sublime Events of the Future—Destiny of Israel's Righteous Dead—Splendor of the Coming Age—Millennial Glory Succeeded by "The New Heaven and the New Earth."

A More literal version of the passage to which I wish to direct attention—Daniel xii. 1-3—is the following:

And, at that time, shall Michael stand up, the great prince which standeth for the children of thy people; and there shall be a time of trouble such as never was since there was a nation even to that same time: And, at that time, thy people shall be delivered, every one that shall be found written in the book; and many shall awake (or be separated out) from among the sleeping ones of the earth dust; these (who awake at that time) shall be unto life everlasting, but those (who do not awake at that time) shall be unto shame and contempt everlasting: And the teachers (the Maskilein, compare xt. 33-35) shall shine as the brightness of the firmament, and they that have turned the many (see the original) to righteousness, as the stars for ever and ever.

There is something peculiarly solemn and impressive in these mystic words of the revealing angel to Daniel. They rivet our attention and affect our hearts as only a communication from the unseen world can do, and subdue our spirit into tenderness and awe. The speaker is none other than the angel Gabriel himself, sent on swift wings to stand by the banks of the Tigris, and comfort the mourning, confessing, praying, and prostrate prophet, bereft of his strength, and whose "comeliness was turned into corruption." In the midst of a "deep sleep," into which he was thrown, with his "face on the ground," a hand touches him and sets him "on his knees" again, and "on the palms of his hands." A voice accosts him, saying:

O Daniel, man greatly beloved, understand the words that I speak unto thee, and stand upright, for unto thee I am now sent I am come to make thee understand what shall befall thy people in the latter days; for yet the vision is for many days.

The revealing angel, in form "like the similitude of the sons of men," touches him again to strengthen him, and proceeds to unveil to his soul what is "noted in the Scripture of truth." The words of the angel are associated with scenes of testimony and suffering for the truth on the part of God's ancient faithful people, and scenes of judgment against the transgressors of the holy covenant. The voice that speaks to the prophet is low and soft, and full of comfort and hope.

As we listen to its calm cadence, we are reminded of the holy benediction, in John, that falls from heaven upon the graves of the dead martyrs of Jesus: "I heard a voice, from heaven, saying unto me, write; Blessed are the dead who die in the Lord, from henceforth; yea, saith the Spirit; that they may rest from their labors, and their works do follow them." The "rest" of the bodies of the righteous, however, is not their final goal. The hope of a glorious resurrection is set before them as an animating motive to confirm their steadfastness and faith, and support them in the hour of trial and death. It was the hope of the Old Testament people of God. In the prophet Isaiah, it was the voice of Him who is "the resurrection and the life" that comforted the sufferers for His name with the thrilling promise, "Thy dead men shall live. My dead body shall arise. Awake! Sing! ye dwellers in the dust!—for the dew of herbs is thy dew, and the earth shall bring forth the dead!" Like the flower over which the scorching sirocco has passed, and buried its body beneath the sand, drying its leaves and destroying its form, but whose stem and calyx revive and re-bloom through the power of descending dew, so shall it be when, in the last day, the Spirit of Life descends to restore the sleeping dust of the saints of God. "Their bones shall flourish like an herb." It is to the same event the revealing angel points the prophet Daniel in the words of the twelfth chapter. And it is to the same event the Holy Spirit directs the vision of John, and associates with the resurrection of the faithful blood-witnesses, a co-regency with Christ, on earth, in the day of millennial glory. They live again, and reign a thousand years, and this is the first resurrection." The vision in John is the companion piece of the angel's prediction in Daniel. The hope of the resurrection, so dear to God's Old Testament saints, is carried through the New Testament, and shines with superior light on the last pages of divine revelation. It is a hope into which we ourselves are grafted, by sharing the grace of Him who is Israel's king and ours.

I need not linger here to refute that unbelieving criticism, of our day, which restrains the interpretation of these solemn words, in Daniel, to Maccabean or Neronian times, or degrades them to a merely figurative import. They do not refer to the transient era of Maccabean independence, nor to the favor that came to the Church in the days of Constantine, nor to the Reformation of the sixteenth century, nor to the regeneration of the soul, nor to its ascension to heaven, nor to the times of Charlemagne, nor to any political or ecclesiastical victory in this present age. Such violence to the plain letter of the Scripture is its own refutation. The eyes of the revealing angel who speaks to Daniel, like those of the angel who speaks to John, are directed far beyond Maccabean times, the days of Nero, Constantine, Charlemagne, the Reformation, and our own period. They reach to Israel's final outcome," in the latter days," when Daniel, awaked from his "rest," shall stand in his lot," at the end of the days"; in other words, to the close of the present age.

Two great events stand out in bold relief in the foreground of the angel's observation. He looks forward to the "great tribulation" connected with Israel's final fortunes in the great crisis to come, the bisecting epoch that divides our present age from that of millennial glory, and fastens his eyes upon them. These events are: (1) the deliverance of the surviving remnant of Israel from the power of the last Antichrist; and (2) the resurrection of Israel's righteous dead, foremost among whom are Israel's faithful martyrs. Daniel's "people" are not the Christian Church, nor are "the children of thy people," believing Gentiles, as certain commentators would foolishly have it. It is the literal believing Israel whose living remnant is delivered, and whose faithful dead are raised; even that same reproached and outcast race to whom the Lord's mercy comes" in the latter days," when "the veil that is spread over all nations is destroyed," and "death is swallowed up of victory," and the Lord "takes away the rebuke of His people from off all the earth," and the "Jew" is no longer a proverb and a byword, and Jerusalem no longer is trodden down under foot of the Gentiles, but is a crown of glory in the hand of the Lord, and a royal diadem in the hand of her God.

Of the second of the two great classes just named, viz., Israel's faithful dead, the revealing angel gives a complete description—one that has touched the heart of Jew and Gentile in all ages. Of this description I now speak.

(1). He describes them from their register. Their names are found "written in the Book." This they have in common with those who are "delivered"—" at that time." They are the righteous alone, for none of the wicked are found "written in the Book." The registered dead are the holy dead, one class alone; the heirs of the kingdom. It is said of every one, "not found written in the Book," that he wakes not till "a thousand years after" the righteous (Rev. xx. 5-15). By the phrase "written in the Book" is meant the eternal predestination unto life of the righteous, by the sovereign will of God. "Chosen, faithful, and true," they are heirs by divine right to eternal glory, having been "written in the Book of Life from the foundation of the world" (Rev. xvii. 8). The remaining unraised company of the sleepers, unregistered, sleep on in their sins and their graves, destined to eternal shame and contempt. They have no part in the "first resurrection" (Rev. xx. 5). In the words of the Lord Himself to Isaiah: "Dead, they shall not live; deceased, they shall not rise"—at that time (Isa. xxvi. 14). "The upright shall have the dominion over them in the morning," while "their beauty shall consume in the grave, from their dwelling" (Ps. xltix. 14). Nor is this all. The deeds of the righteous survivors are for a memorial before God, in His book of remembrance, and because of which "They shall be mine," saith God, "in the day when I shall make up my jewels, and I will spare them as a man spareth his own son that serveth him" (Mal. iii. 16, 17). Not otherwise is it with the righteous dead. Their deeds also are in remembrance before God. Their "record" is on high; God's journal of their testimony; heaven's minutes of their life's proceedings; a book of chronicles and monuments; the recorded acts and sufferings of patriarchs and kings, of judges and priests, of wise men and prophets in all ages; a full itinerary of their warfare and their death; a history and martyrology of God's dear saints. Bright upon the roll of immortality their names are written with a pen of love; not one name omitted, not one syllable misspelled, not one letter changed. Their sins are all blotted out. Their good deeds abide as a sweet-smelling savor unto God, the measure and the rule of their reward. God's memory does not fail Him. The holy dead are registered upon it, and graven in it; more lustrous there than on the breastplate gems of Aaron and his sons.

(2). They are described from their number. They are "many," not all of Israel's dead, but only they who are "written in the Book"; not a few, on the other hand, but "the many," of verse third, who "have been turned to righteousness"—a multitude. To Abraham it was said in covenant: "I will make thy seed as the dust of the earth." "Tell the stars, if thou canst. So shall thy seed be" (Gen. xiii. 16; xv. 5). To Rebekah it was said in the same covenant: "Be thou the mother of thousands of millions" (Gen. xxiv. 60). A remnant at most at any one time, yet, in the outcome, a multitude that no man can number; the elect out of all the tribes, sealed with the seal of the living God, and gathered out of all the nations and kindreds and tongues where they are scattered. Like the springing wheat from the grain that is sown, or the drops of the dew from the morning's womb, so shall Israel's faithful dead be in the resurrection of the just. Not only Adam and Eve, Abel and Enoch, Noah and Shem, all the gray forefathers of the world's dawn will be there, but still more, the three great forefathers of the Hebrew race, Abraham, Isaac, and Jacob, with Sarah, Rebekah, and Rachel, and their twelve-tribed believing seed, down to the latest generations. Moses and Joshua; Samson, Gideon, and Barak; the leaders and judges of the people, will appear in that grand review. Samuel and the prophets who sang of the glory that should one day come to Israel's king, will be there to swell the triumph of the saints. The righteous monarchs from David to young Josiah and the princes of the exiles returned from Chaldean captivity, will augment the number. From the plains of Mesopotamia and the brick kilns of Egypt, from the shores of the Red Sea to the banks of the Jordan, from the battlefields of Beth-horon and Esdraelon, the faithful dead will rise to meet their expected reward. And Daniel will "stand in his lot" at the end of the days. When that solemn command is given to the harvest-reapers, "Gather My saints together, them that have made a covenant with Me by sacrifice," every angel seraph, and prince, and every legion, following the sound of the archangel's trump, will go through the land of Israel, and thence to the four ends of the earth, to reap and to bind their sheaves. They will visit the Holy City and the valley of Jehosaphat, where lie the tombs of the kings, and the fields that skirted the Emmaus road where lie the graves of the judges; thence on to the caves of Hebron and the rock chambers of Judea, and to every spot inside and outside the land, to Egypt, Assyria, Babylon, the isles of the sea, and to every country and nation wherever a saint of God lies sleeping, to start him from his long slumber and wake him to glory. "They shall come from the East and the West, the North and the South, and sit down with Abraham, Isaac, and Jacob, in the kingdom of God" (Luke xiii. 28, 29). The band of slaughtered innocents will be there, the first martyrs of Jesus; John the Baptist will be there; Stephen, Paul, Peter, the beloved John, all the apostles, and all of their race who have believed in the Messiah they preached; Mary, the mother of Jesus, and the other five Marys who were written unto life, the women of Samaria, the Galilean women last at the cross and first at the tomb, the dying thief and the centurion that stood at the cross, all will be there, and in front of all the martyrs of the last times. Multitudes! multitudes! of Israel's host, thick and bright as the beads of morning dew! ' Jacob's heavens shall drop down dew when the souls of the righteous descend from above, and their bodies revived, ascend from their graves; and the land shall become "the land of the living" and not of the dead. How vast the number! "Many shall awake."

(3). They are described from their condition. They are "sleepers of the earth-dust," and in Isaiah xxvi. 19, the "dwellers of the dust." The dead are viewed in their whole personality, body and soul, and the description of them as "sleeping," is taken from the repose, of their material part in the grave. Sleep is the image of death. As to the souls of the righteous, they are "in the hands of God, and dwell near the throne of His glory." Soul-sleep is nowhere taught in the Bible. Their bodies rest in the grave, waiting the hour when the spirit's energy passes over to the material part of the believer, and along with this, earth's glorification begins (Rom. viii. 19-22). It belongs to the blessedness of the believer, that his body still remains united to God in covenant and in fact. It is dust already redeemed. His sleep, unlike that of the wicked, is a blessed sleep. As he sinks to his rest in the grave, and wraps the dark robe of death around him, he can calmly say his evening prayer with David, "I will both lay me down in peace and sleep, for Thou, Lord, only makest me to dwell in safety" (Ps. iv. 8). "My flesh also shall rest in hope; for Thou wilt not abandon me to the grave" (Ps. xvi. 9). And sure of his rising in the morning, he can say as his eyelids close, "I will behold Thy face in righteousness; I shall be satisfied when I awake with Thy likeness" (Ps. xvii. 15). Like Abraham, Isaac, and Jacob in their whole personality, so he lives "unto God," even when dead, for the believer "never dies" (John xi. 26; Luke xx. 38). Full of comfort are the angel's words, "Many shall awake from among the sleepers in the earth dust"—many of "Thy people." They are the words of one of the "Holy Watchers" who stands guard, unseen, over the graves of the just. The blessed condition of "the dead who die in the Lord" is that, as to their bodies, they "enter into peace, and rest in their beds," and as to their souls, "each one walks in its uprightness" before God (Isa. lvii. 2). "There the wicked cease from troubling and the weary are at rest" (Job iii. 17).

(4). They are described from their reward. And this is two-fold. (1) A reward of life; (2) a reward of glory; and both everlasting. "These," who awake at that time, "shall be unto life everlasting." That is their destiny. There is no more separation now of soul or body. They were, indeed, possessors of life everlasting, prior to their death, and by virtue of their faith, but the life was a hidden life—a life in mystery and not in maturity; an inward spark, not an out-bursting flame; a first-fruit, not the fullness of unfading fruition in glory. The "Spirit of life" dwelt in their mortal bodies, still mortal. Their souls were "quickenened." On earth, and in heaven, they "reign in life by one," yet only in imperfection. But, now, it is fullness of life for body and soul together, because the completion of life, begun here and now, matures at the resurrection from the dead. Of that full immortality and incorruption, the veiled Spirit of God, dwelling in the believer as in a temple, is the prophecy and pledge. The "life everlasting" to which the "many" shall awake, is the everlasting life of the body and soul together.

But more. The reward is a reward of glory, and special glory to all who turn many to righteousness.

The teachers shall shine as the brightness of the firmament, and they that have turned many to righteousness, as the stars forever and ever.

What a motive to work! The "life" is everlasting, and the "splendor," the Zohar, is forever and ever! The teachers were the Maskilein, the approved instructors of the people, sent of God, "to give light to them that sit in darkness and in the shadow of death, and to guide their feet in the way of peace" (Luke i. 17-79). They were men like the prophets of old; men like Ezra and the Baptist, who denounced sin and enforced righteousness; men like Paul, and Peter, and John; and later like Irenaeus and Justin; Tertullian and Augustine; Luther, and Calvin, and Knox; Cranmer, and Latimer, and Ridley; Whitfield and Wesley; and thousands more in our own times. Ecclesiastical orders and titles are nothing here. The reward is not to a titled clergy as such, but to "teachers" of the law and the promise. It is not to fruitless preachers, but to "turners of many to righteousness." There is a glory in the kingdom for all, no matter how varied or numerous they are. Jachin and Boaz are not all. God's temple rests on many pillars. God's garden has many flowers. God's music has many notes. God's sky has many stars. And, just as one differs from another, "so also is the resurrection" (1 Cor. xv. 42). A glory belongs to Christ, the central sun, none of us may claim as our own. Another glory belongs to the Church, the moon, that none of us may inherit, a borrowed splendor that covers the whole company of saints as one. But there is glory that belongs to the individual "glitterers" of the firmament, different in degree, and it is ours, so to turn many to righteousness, as that neither Alcione's sheen, nor the stars that burn in Orion's belt, shall surpass our brightness, in the resurrection of the just. And what a miracle of splendor that will be, when sun, moon, and stars, all shine in the firmament, at the same time! We shall, each, have our own peculiar glory while yet lost in the "Greater Light" who rules that golden clay, for "the righteous shall shine forth, as the sun, in the kingdom of their Father" (Matt. xiii. 43). The splendor of Christ will augment, not quench, our own. The clear gleam of the saints will be both physical and spiritual—nothing less than the glory of Christ Himself. And this is the reward they shall have forever, for their brief moment of work and suffering here.

(5). Once more: they are described from their character. This we have in the context, in chapter xi. 32, 33, to which the "many" here refers. In times of trial they count not their lives dear to them. Martyrdom for them has no terrors. "They fall by the sword and by flame, by captivity and spoil," and yet they "do exploits" for God (xi. 32, 33). Such the prophets. Such the Maccabean heroes whose valor and faith Paul had commended; the martyred mother and her seven sons—a story that should magnetize the world into life—the dauntless host that "resisted unto blood, striving against sin"; God's unflinching braves who were stoned and sawn asunder," the "tempted," the "wanderers about in sheepskins and goatskins, being destitute, afflicted, tormented, and of whom the world was not worthy," the troglodyte saints of God, who "wandered in deserts and mountains, in dens and caves of the earth," and "obtained a good report through faith"; men and women alike "tortured, not accepting deliverance, that they might obtain a better resurrection" (Hebrews xi. 35-39). Such were not only the martyrs of the law, but also those of the Gospel, who were alike made "a gazing stock, both by reproaches and afflictions, and were companions of them that were so used"—elect souls who "took joyfully the spoiling of their goods, knowing that they had, in heaven, a better and an enduring substance" (Heb. x. 33, 34). Pioneers, they were, of the suffering saints who found their only home on earth, in Roman catacombs, or Alpine solitudes, or in the cells of Spanish inquisition! Ease and popularity could not buy them. False brethren could not intimidate them. Calamity could not dishearten them. A trimming and time-serving policy could not attract them. Wealth, respectability, and power could not overawe them. Honied flattery could not seduce them. The institutional morality, the customary ethics of society, a cunning prudence and desire of personal influence and social self-entrenchment, the neutrality so odious to God, had no charms for them. They were no "middle men." Deceived, betrayed, maligned, forsaken by friends, their worst foes those of their "own household," they still chose to "suffer affliction with the people of God, rather than enjoy the pleasures of sin for a season, having respect unto the recompense of the reward" (Heb. xi. 26). And they shall "shine"! Asleep in the dusty earth, they shall one day awake from their graves at the trumpet's call, and soaring upward, shall gleam as they go, flashing like the welkin's glance, and beaming as the stars, forever and ever. This, their Zohar, their eternal splendor in the world to come!

(6). Finally, they are described from their future time. The time is given us, not only in the organic connection of the whole prophecy of Daniel, but in the immediate text and context, also. The resurrection here spoken of, occurs, it is said, in verse first, "at that time." The specification is as precise and definite as the angel's words could make it, and what "that time" is, we are at no loss to understand. It is the time (1) when he, of whom the "vile person" (xi. 21), viz., Antiochus Epiphanes, is a type, shall hereafter, as did Antiochus before, invade the holy land, and, "planting his tent in the glorious holy mountain," shall suddenly "come to his end, and none shall help him" (ix. 41-45)—in other words, when the last oppressor of the Jewish people shall be miraculously destroyed. It is the time (2) when Michael, the tutelary angel prince of Israel, shall stand up, once again, for the Jewish people, as he had done before (x. 13), to deliver them from trouble; the same Michael who "contended for the body of Moses" (Jude 9), and is represented in John's vision, as fighting Satan, when Israel is converted to the "Lamb," and Satan's accusation is forever hushed (Rev. xi. 7-11). It is the time (3) when the last "great tribulation" waxes to its height, unparalleled in history.

Then "at that time," both the deliverance and the resurrection shall take place. Here five distinct events contemporate, viz.: (a) The standing up of Michael, (b) the great tribulation, (c) the deliverance of the living remnant, (d) the resurrection of the many from among the sleepers, and (e) the reward of everlasting life and glory in the kingdom (xii. 1-3). It is the time, furthermore, when the monarchy colossus (ii. 31-45) falls; for the last persecutor of "the children" of Daniel's people is the "little horn" that shall rise out of the ten horns (or toes) of the fourth or Roman Empire, in its present divided condition, or European states system, and of which the "little horn" that rose out of one of the four horns of the third or Greek Empire, is the type. It is the time when the colossus is struck on the toes, or in the horns, of the fourth empire by the "stone" (ii. 45), and when the "little horn" springing there-from is destroyed also (vii. 7-27).

And this time is expressly declared to be when "the Son of Man comes in the clouds of heaven" (vii. 3), an expression our Lord referred to His second coming (Matt. xxvi. 64). It is, therefore, the time when our Lord's present sojourn in heaven has come to an end (Acts iii. 19-21); the time of the "harvest," or "end of this age" (Matt. xiii. 37-43); the time of the end of Gentile supremacy over Israel, or end of the "times of the Gentiles" (Luke xxi. 24); the time of the last Antichrist's destruction (Isa. xi. 4; 2 Thess. ii. 3-8); the time when the surviving remnant of Israel is converted (Rom. xi. 25-27; Rev. xii. 1-11); the time when the warrior-bridegroom-king comes from an opened heaven (Rev. xix. 11-21), to destroy the "beast"; the time when a separation is made between the righteous and the wicked (Matt. xxv. 31-46); and when the kingdom comes in its glory on earth; and the greatness of it "under the whole heaven" is given to the saints (Dan. ii. 44; vii. 27); the time of the vintage and harvest, when the Son of Man sits in the cloud, having on His head a golden crown, and in His hand a sharp sickle (Rev. xiv. 14-20); the time when the last seal is opened, last trumpet blown, and last vial poured, and Satan is bound, and the "first resurrection" takes place, and millennial glory is introduced (Rev. xx. 1-6); the time when, the "kingdoms of this world become the kingdom of our Lord and His Christ" (Rev. xi. 15-19); the time of Israel's final victory, and of the glory of the saved nations (Rev. vii. 117; xiv. 1-5; xv. 1-4), consequent on Babylon's fall (Rev. xviii. 2; xx. 3; xxi. 24); the time when the returning "Nobleman" destroys his enemies who would not have him to reign over them, and sets up His kingdom in power and glory (Luke xix. 12-27). In short, it is "the end of this age," where all these prophetic lines and events converge into one great day, "the day of the Lord" that comes as a thief in the night. It is the time covered by the "seven-sealed scroll" of the Apocalypse, and for the interpretation of which, Israel is the key. Then, "at that time," in "the latter days" of this age, shall the resurrection of Israel's faithful dead take place, amid terrors and glories such as the world has never seen, nor ever will behold again. Then, too, all

"they that are Christ's, at His coming" (i Cor. xv. 23), shall wake at the sound of His voice (1 Thess. iv. 13-17).

And now, what shall I say in conclusion? The book of Daniel is simply a philosophy of history in its great design. It was meant to be that. It has little to do with the doctrines of grace. It has all to do with the outward fortunes of Israel and the world-empires, and the outward development of the visible kingdom of God. The "New Testament Church" is not found in it once. It touches only on the beginning and close of the New Testament times. It busies itself, wholly, with Israel and the times of the Gentiles, or nations. Its one great object is to sketch a sacred calendar, covering in outline the whole range of four successive Gentile empires (the fourth of which still exists, though broken into various kingdoms and kings) from the first fall of Jerusalem, and blotting out of the visible kingdom of God on earth, down to the "finishing of the mystery of God" with respect to Gentile, Jew, and the Church of God. Its one purpose is to lead us rapidly over the whole period of Israel's national ruin, rejection, dispersion, and expectation, on to the time when Gentile power shall no longer have any succession, but the sovereignty hitherto wielded shall be transferred, through judgment, to Israel's King and His saints. Then the deliverance of Israel's remnant will occur, and all Israel's faithful dead will be raised, and "they that are Christ's" from among the Gentiles, and the wicked be swept from the earth. Then, seated with Christ, the "saints of the high places shall take the kingdom forever, even forever and ever" (Dan. vii. 27). Then, in their own land made glorious—the first-fruits of a still future final cosmical change—they shall sing together. "In that day, this song shall be sung in the land of Judah; we have a strong city. Salvation will God appoint for walls and bulwarks" (Isa. xxvi. 1). Apply it to the "Church" if you will. "Application is not interpretation." Make it belong, in a sense, to the first advent. It belongs in its truest sense to the second. "At that time," says Delitzsch, "the confessors of Jehovah shall be waked from their graves, and form, with the faithful living, a glorious Church. Here is predicted the first resurrection." So the pious Weber, a gifted and life-long student of the Hebrew faith, has said: "The Jewish Christian Church shall again revive, as at first. From the dispersion shall the living, and from their graves shall the dead, be brought back to enjoy, together, in the Holy Land, the promised glory of the Messianic age." And Fuller—with whom Prof. Volck, of Dorpat, one of the deepest and ablest exegetes of the world, agrees—comments thus in his work on Daniel: "Not merely those who survive the great tribulation shall be delivered, but also many from those who sleep in the earth shall awake in order to enjoy this redemption." In like manner Dr. S. P. Tregelles, the only scholar ever pensioned by the British Government: "It is at the coming of the Lord Jesus that Israel is delivered. It is then, also, that the first resurrection takes place." So many others, of equally high repute as thorough scholars and deep investigators of the Word of God.

How glorious Israel's now waste and desolate land will be "in that day," and "at that time"! "The whole territory, so mountainous, rough, and uneven, now, "shall "become a plain" in the midst of which the mountain of the Lord's house shall rise exalted in beauty and glory above all surrounding hills. Canaan shall become like the Arabia that stretches from Lebanon to the Dead Sea. The borders of the Holy Land shall be enlarged, its valleys exalted, its mountains brought low, its deserts made as the Garden of Eden, and the Holy City rebuilt and adorned, with a temple of glory unseen before; Jerusalem shall be "a new thing in the earth," a "diadem of glory in the hand of her God." Salvation and praise will be the one music from her walls and her gates. A glorified land, city, people, and nation, the metropolitan point and splendor of a new age shall Palestine and Jerusalem be in the day of the deliverance of Israel's remnant, and resurrection of Israel's faithful dead—a fore-light of that further future re-gensis when not only a part, but "the whole creation shall be delivered from the bondage of corruption into the liberty of the glory of the children of God,"—and a "new heaven and a new earth" shall appear (Rom. viii. 21; Rev. xxi. 1; Isa. xl. 4, lxi. 3, lx. 1-22, lxii. 4-12, lxv. 17-25; Jer. xxxi. 38-40; Ezek. xxxvi. 35; xl.-xlviii.; Joel iii. 17-20; Zech. xiv. 8-11). Wide and glorious shall be the whole land, and great the numbers of Israel. "O Lord, Thou increasest the nation, Thou glorifiest Thyself, Thou enlargest all the borders of the land"! (Isa. xxvi. 15), a passage horribly mangled in King James' version, but on which in the original, with others, Justin rested the statement that, at the time of Israel's deliverance and resurrection, Jerusalem shall be "rebuilt, broadened, and adorned, as the prophets Ezekiel, Isaiah, and others declare" (Dial., Cap. 80).

What a scene for contemplation in the wonderful ongoing of the kingdom of God on earth! How glorious the day when the name of Jerusalem shall be written "Jehovah-Shammah, the Lord is there!" and "the earth shall be filled with the knowledge of the Lord, as the waters cover the sea" (Ezek. xlviii. 35; Hab. ii. 14). O days of trouble, and warfare, and sin, days of tears, and sorrow, and death, run on and expire! "Come, Lord Jesus, come quickly!"

And, now, O anxious believer in Jesus, waiting, watching, looking for and loving His appearing, "Go thou thy way till the end shall be!" If the bridegroom tarries "thou shall rest," but—resting or toiling till He comes—"thou shalt stand in thy lot at the end of the days" (Dan. xii. 13).

Christ's Work Continued After His Death—The Perfect Science of Human Redemption—What was Lost in the Fall—What is to be Regained in the Restoration—Justice Tempered with Mercy— Loss Sustained by the Disobedient—Doom of the Sons of Perdition—The Celestial, Terrestrial and Telestial Glories—Redemption and Glorification of the Earth—Salvation of the Whole Race—The Finished Work of Christ—Universal Dominion of the Father

THE mission of Christ was to save that which was lost. It was not completed when He hung upon the cross. His dying exclamation, "It is finished!" referred to His sufferings for sin, the ordeals of mortality, his labors in the flesh. As we have seen, he continued his work of salvation when out of the body, by preaching to the dead. After his resurrection He met, on several occasions, with his disciples, and instructed them in the plan of redemption and sent them forth to all nations, that the work he had commenced on earth might be continued. He ministered to other nations, uttered his voice to other sheep which were not of the fold in Palestine, that the lost tribes of Israel and all who could not be reached by His Jewish Apostles might hear the glad tidings of salvation. This, though not fully revealed in the Bible, is made clear in the Book of Mormon. After his ascension, to fulfil His own promise, he went to prepare a place for His faithful disciples, that when they left the earth they might be able to abide with Him.

But all this was only a small part of the perfect scheme of redemption. That which was lost in Adam is to be regained in Christ. Through the commission of crime, death came into the world. Satan gained dominion. The earth trembled under the curse. Eden bloomed no more upon its face. The tree of life was removed. Thorns and briars and noxious weeds came up in the place of the flowers and fruits of paradise. Deity was hidden from the sight of man. Sorrow and pain and toil and travail became the heritage of mortals. Enmity arose between man and beast. Venom entered the serpent's fangs, and rage the hearts of brute and fowl and aqueous creature. Strife dwelt in the very elements and death brooded over the face of the smitten globe. What, then, was lost? The immortality of man; the blessed tree of life; communion with Jehovah; the companionship of angels; the purity of paradise; man's dominion over inferior creatures; freedom from Satanic influence; exemption from toil and pain; earth's affinity with perfected realms on high.

Until all this has been restored Christ's work must continue. The earth must be cleansed from its corruptions. The elements must melt with fervent heat, and be purified from evil. Satan and his hosts must be banished and bound. Eden must blossom again as at first. The lion and the lamb must lie down together. The fig tree and the myrtle must flourish where the rank weeds grow. The whole race of Adam must be raised from the dead. The veil between earth and heaven must be removed. The knowledge and glory of God must cover the earth as the waters cover the deep, and the spirit of life and peace and light and joy must be poured out upon all flesh, until the whole creation vibrates with pleasure and responds with praise.

The ushering in of the great Millennial day, a glimpse of which has been seen by all the holy prophets since the world began, with the sweet rest of earth and its inhabitants, is not, however, the completion of Christ's glorious work. His kingdom must not only be established from pole to pole and from shore to shore, but His saving power must penetrate to every lost soul of our race in the regions of the damned. A just judgment will be meted out to all. They who reject the Gospel must suffer the penalty. Those who are found worthy of many stripes must receive their portion. The wicked will be turned into hell, with all the nations that forget God. Each condemned person will pay the uttermost farthing for his sins. Justice, tempered, not warped or thwarted, by Mercy, will mete out to all their right desert, "every man according to his works." The punishment is always existent, therefore it is eternal punishment. But each one who suffers receives only his just portion thereof. Shall the murderer and the Sabbath-breaker, the adulterer and the thief, the drunkard and the profane, all merit the same doom? Would human courts proclaim such judgment? Shall man have more equity than God? When stern Justice has claimed its own and filled its purpose, shall there be no place for sweet Mercy?

While there is one soul of this race, willing and able to accept and obey the laws of redemption, no matter where or in what condition it may be found, Christ's work will be incomplete until that being is brought up from death and hell, and placed in a position of progress, upward and onward, in such glory as is possible for its enjoyment and the service of the great God. The punishment inflicted will be adequate to the wrongs performed. In one sense the sinner will always suffer its effects. When the debt is paid and justice is satisfied; when obedience is learned through the lessons of sad experience; when the grateful and subdued soul comes forth from the everlasting punishment, thoroughly willing to comply with the laws once rejected; there will be an abiding sense of loss. The fulness of celestial glory in the presence and society of God and the Lamb are beyond the reach of that saved but not perfected soul, forever. The power of increase, wherein is dominion and exaltation, and crowns of immeasurable glory, is not for the class of beings who have been thrust down to hell and endured the wrath of God for the period allotted by eternal judgment.

But Jesus the anointed, with his army of Saviors bearing the Priesthood after the order of Melchisedec, will seek and save that which is lost until everything savable is redeemed. Only those beings who have learned the law, received of the light of truth, tasted the sweets of the divine spirit, basked in the sunbeams of the heavenly glory, made covenant to serve the King of Kings and received power to advance to the pinnacle of exaltation, and then have turned away from the right, chosen evil rather than god, driven away the power and promptings of the spirit of light and truth, sought to become a law unto themselves, imbrued their hands in the blood of innocence or, drinking in of the influence of that Evil One, consented to and endorsed the slaying of the world's Redeemer, thus sinning against the Holy Ghost and becoming servants of Satan and Sons of Perdition, will be in their nature and status unredeemable, and therefore will remain "filthy still" and thus be unfit for a kingdom of any degree of glory. These will go away with the Devil and his angels into the outer darkness, beyond the spheres where flows the river of salvation and where blooms the tree of life. For them alone of Adam's race there is no repentance, for them alone is the second death, for them alone is the blackness of darkness forever.

When the work of Christ and his associate Kings and Priests unto God is finished, the Saints of all the ages will be crowned with glory and receive their reward. They will be made rulers over many things. In the order of eternity they will stand in the heavenly family organization, and all things will be theirs. Of their increase there will be no end. They will hold the key to all heights and depths. They will have power over all the elements, spiritual and corporeal. The incorruptible and fadeless riches will be theirs. They will mingle with the highest. They will gaze upon the face of the Eternal God and dwell in the presence of the sinless Son. Pain and sorrow and trial and death will henceforth be only known in memory, to form the contrast needful to make their joy complete. Eternity with all its boundless opportunities and unutterable bliss and intelligence and majesty will be before them without a barrier in the way, secure for them as to the Almighty Father himself. This is the celestial glory.

Those who were not numbered with the Saints of God in the flesh, but who received the gospel in the spirit; the good and honorable who were led astray by the designing; the class not fitted for the crowning glory of the celestial world nor worthy of the doom of the wicked, will also receive their portion. They will not attain to the gifts of increase and dominion and the fulness of the highest, but will enter into their rest, which shall be glorious. And though they reach not to the Father's fulness, they will receive the visits of the Son and of his associates in the celestial world, and enjoy rich blessings unspeakable in their greatness and perpetuity. They inherit the terrestrial glory.

Those who were cast down to the depths for their sins, who rejected the gospel of Jesus, who persecuted the Saints, who reveled in iniquity, who committed all manner of transgressions except the unpardonable crime, will also come forth in the Lord's time, through the blood of the Lamb and the ministry of his disciples and their own repentance and willing acceptance of divine law, and enter into various degrees of glory and power and progress and light, according to their different capacities and adaptabilities. They cannot go up into the society of the Father nor receive of the presence of the Son, but will have the ministrations of messengers from the terrestrial world, and have joy beyond all expectation and the conception of uninspired mortal minds. They will all bow the knee to Christ and serve God the Father, and have an eternity of usefulness and happiness in harmony with the higher powers. They receive the celestial glory.

Thus the inhabitants of Earth with the few exceptions that are beyond the power of redemption will eventually be saved. And the globe on which they passed their probation, having kept the law of its being, will come into remembrance before its Maker. It will die like its products. But it will be quickened again and resurrected in the celestial glory. It has been born of the water, it will also be born of the Spirit. Purified by fire from all the corruptions that once defiled it, developed into its perfections as one of the family of worlds fitted for the Creator's presence, all its latent light awakened into scintillating action, it will move up into its place among the orbs governed by celestial time, and shining "like a sea of glass mingled with fire," every tint and color of the heavenly bow radiating from its surface, the ransomed of the Lord will dwell upon it; the highest beings of the ancient orbs will visit it; the garden of God will again adorn it; the heavenly government will prevail in every part; Jesus will reign as its King; the river of life will flow out from the regal throne; the tree of life, whose leaves were for the healing of the nations, will flourish upon the banks of the heavenly stream, and its golden fruit will be free for the white-robed throng, that they may eat and live forever. This perfected Earth and its saved inhabitants will then be presented to the Eternal Father as the finished work of Christ, and all things will be subject unto the Great Patriarch, Architect, Creator, Ruler, the Almighty, to whom be obedience and reverence and praise in all the countless worlds that shine as jewels in His universal crown!

Lord Christ Spoke Of Temple As Father's House; In It Were Many Mansions Or Apartments: One For Leper, Who Was Healed. To Purify Himself; Another For Nazarite, Term Of Whose Vow Had Expired, To Be Shaven And Cleansed; Another For Treasures And Musical Instruments Of Levites

Father's House By James M. King, D D. (Methodist), New York.

My Father's house.—John xiv: 2.

You are familiar with the context in which these words appear. The Saviour says, "Let not your heart be troubled. Ye believe in God; believe also in me. In my Father's house are many mansions. If it were not so I would have told you. I go to prepare a place for you, And if I go and prepare a place for you, I will come again and receive you unto myself, that where I am, there ye may be also. And whither I go ye know, and the way ye know."

Some scholars declare that "the Father's house" refers to the universe of His creation—all his dominion—considering that the many mansions constitute the various regions in which His unfallen and intelligent creatures dwell. But the Lord Christ spoke of the Temple as the Father's house. In it were many mansions or apartments: one for the leper, who was healed, to purify himself; another for the Nazarite, the term of whose vow had expired, to be shaven and cleansed; another for the treasures and musical instruments of the Levites. And it is in this, I think, you will find the type which our Lord employs in the expression, "in my Father's house are many mansions."

The Temple was the home of the nation. Every one had an interest in it. But the various classes had their separate and peculiar apartments in this one common home. And the Lord hints that we shall not visit the presence of God as Gentiles did the Temple, but as Jews. We shall dwell in the courts of His house. The idea of the text is intensely that of home. We all belong to the Father's family. It matters not whether we ignore the family relationship or not. It matters not even though we may have taken our portion of the substance and gone and expended it upon riotous living. We nevertheless belong to the Father's family. Sinfulness and disobedience do not destroy the fact of the parentage of the human race, any more than they destroy the fact of the human parentage—the relationship we sustain to our earthly parents.

I want to meditate a little while to-night with you upon what the Father's house or heavenly home is, by what human homes are.

Home, in the first place, is the place of unfettered joy. The boy at school must be restrained, and must be disciplined if he is ever to amount to any thing in this world. But home, to him, means freedom from tasks and routine. The man becomes a boy again, when he is at home. One of the most beautiful pictures drawn by the hand of that artist Oliver Wendell Holmes, given us in "The Autocrat of the Breakfast Table," represents a man who is somewhat along in years—in middle age, perhaps—in the midst of home joys, and, looking upon the innocence of the childhood about him and the youth near him, he cries out:

O for one year of youthful joy
I give back my twentieth spring.

I'd rather laugh, a bright-haired boy,
Than reign, a gray-haired king.

How about that wife, that in your youth you wedded, and to whom,
by ties of affection you were joined?
Oh, I wouldn't lose my wife.

The angel took a sapphire pen.
And wrote. In rainbow dew,

The man would be a boy again.
And be a husband, too.

But how about the children that are about you?
Oh, I can't lose the children.

The angel took a sapphire pen.
And wrote, in rainbow dew,

The man would be a boy again,
And be a father, too.

Home makes every man who is worthy the name of man conscious of a return to boyhood again. Home is the place of pleasurable work. There is work in this world that is not very pleasurable. The man who leaves the work-shop or the counting-house jaded and worn out, thinking that he would like to rest, comes home lighthearted with his toil, but in the midst of surroundings that make toil a rest to him.

Home is the place of unridiculed tenderness; and that means a great deal. There is a great deal of punishment that comes to man in this world by ridicule; but never any of it, certainly, ought to be in the home. It is a place of unridiculed tenderness. The endearments of home are enjoyed without fear of the cynical sneer or the bantering laugh. It is the place where a man who has worn for self-defense, and honestly, too, a mask during the daytime, lest others might pierce his heart, can throw off his mask and be himself again. Don't you trust a man who is never tender in his home. Such a man has in him the essential elements of dishonesty. I want to find, before I will trust a man even in large human relationships, that he is capable of making bare his heart somewhere.

Home is the place of free intercourse. Now letter-writing is no small boon in this world; but after all, they are but the bare thoughts that are there uttered. It needs the countenance of the speaker, the expression of the eye; it needs the presence of the speaker, in order that free, effective communication may take place. Jesus Christ has written a good many letters to you and me. I hope the time will come when you and I will be able to interpret them by the expression of His face. You take that letter that comes to you from mother or loved one, when you are away from home, or when they are away, and you read and interpret it in the light of the face that you know looked on it when the letter was written. Oh for the time to come, when you and I shall be able to interpret these wondrous letters of the Man of Nazareth, the brother of our humanity, in the light of his eyes upon us!

Home is the dwelling-place of loved ones. There my best friends, my kindred dwell. Let us learn what the Father's house, or heaven is, from what homes ought to be. There ought to be uninterrupted peace in the home; no jealousies, no bitterness. The worst thing in this world is a family quarrel; the next worst thing is a church quarrel; because, in connection with both, the tenderest ties and the highest possibilities of happiness are sundered and rudely torn apart. Oh, who can conceive, in connection with an ideal home, jealousies between children and jealousies between parents, and between children and parents? Who can conceive of any pure blessing entering into a home where jealousy has entered? Certainly, that kind of a home is not a type of heaven.

But home ought to be a place of implicit obedience. The Scriptures say, "His servants shall serve him, also his children." I do not mean by that, severity, although very frequently the sternest severity is the tenderest mercy. There can be no happiness where there is no harmony. There can be no harmony where there is no law. There can be no law, producing harmony, where there is no obedience. But love is to be the constraining motive of every action in the home. "Duty" is a word for earth: "Privilege" is its synonym in home and heaven. It is better for a man to obey from a sense of duty what he knows to be obligation in this world, than not to obey at all. It is better for a man who is carnally disposed or wickedly disposed to be absolutely restrained by the strong hand of justice in law; but there is not much liberty where there is such obedience, and where there is such a motive in that obedience as that. I conceive that in heaven and in perfect homes—approaching, at least, perfection—which are the types of the Father's house, the home in heaven, there is no such word as "duty" ever used, but "privilege." Paul, you remember, said that the soul that had in it the catalogue of virtues to which he made reference, righteousness, peace, temperance, charity, long-suffering, was above law, simply because it obeys the law. "Privilege" is the synonym for "duty," in the home that is the type of heaven.

But another characteristic of what home ought to be is charity; the actions of a brother, or of a member of the same family circle, never misjudged. If there is a place in the world where a man ought to be estimated absolutely by what he is worth, without misjudgment, it is in the home circle. Gentleness and kindness ought to characterize the home circle that is to be the type of heaven. One of the most beautiful passages in all the inspired word is that which says, "Thy gentleness hath made me great." Why, it is a passage that you may meditate upon and revolve in your mind, and you will never strike the deepest depths of it. The gentleness of God making man great'. Such power has in it omnipotence.

When that great modern apostle of temperance, perhaps the greatest now living, who has perhaps led more men than any other man who ever lived, from inebriety to Christian safety, excepting only John B. Gough, Francis Murphy, when he lay a criminal, in the cell up in Maine, with the law not yet enforced in its sentence upon him; degraded by the power of drink; when missionary after missionary and minister after minister went to his side to plead with him and see if they could not get at something that was good in him—no, it was all covered over with the power and the habit of sin, which had come to be deep guilt upon his nature. But one day a kindly man took a child of Francis Murphy into the cell of the prison where he was, and she stooped over, with the tears dropping upon his breast, and said to him, "Papa, we are homesick at our house without you," and what there was left of manhood and hope and divinity underneath all this overcovering debris was reached, and Francis Murphy, not long after his liberation and restoration, telling the incident, said, "Man is lost beyond the possibility of redemption, if the divinity of his nature does not listen when some child says 'Home' in his ear." The gentleness of the child life, that had never come to be hard, was the messenger of God to get at the soul that had been thus covered up.

Another element of home, as it ought to be, is security. As little children who believe in the omnipotence of a father's arm, and in the equal omnipotence of a mother's love, shall we rest happy, happy forever. A beautiful simile is used by one whose name I cannot give, giving a picture of the home without the mother's power in it: "Go into a home—pictures on the walls, elegant and expensive furniture; but there is no carpet on the floor and no fire on the hearth. That is home without a mother's warm love. But when the mother enters, the floor is covered, and the tender and elastic return at the touch of the foot makes conscious of tenderness, and the glowing warmth of the hearth fire makes us feel that this is a type of the Father's home."

Have you ever been home-sick? Do you know what it means to be homesick? I do. No person can describe it to you if you have not been homesick, and if you have been no one needs to describe it to you—an experience that has in it, perhaps, more of the elements of torture than any other individual experience. You know that the Swiss soldiers are great mercenaries. They lend themselves for hire to fight for other nationalities, more than any other people on the face of the earth. And yet accurate statistics say that in certain campaigns in which these Swiss soldiers had been fighting as mercenaries, more of them died, actually, from homesickness than from the shock of battle. It is recorded that if the hand, in the midst of the festivities of the camp, strikes up the national air of the Swiss, the mercenary, away from home, falls into a fit of despondency for which there is no cure except a discharge from the army and telling him to go home.

It is to me simply appalling to reflect that the sinner, dying impenitent, must be homeless forever. It is not my purpose, and it is seldom my practice, to attempt to picture what are the penalties of final impenitence in this world. But it is enough for me to know, to make me seek to avoid it, and to escape from it, that the soul that has not come to the Father's house and been adopted into the Father's family through mercy and merit in Jesus Christ, is simply to be homeless forever, stripped of every comfort, deprived of every ray of affection. Heirship in Christ can alone prepare for the eternal home. Ho is the door of the Father's house. "I am the way," He declares, "and no man cometh unto the Father but by me." It is recorded in the 28th verse of the 14th Chapter of John, that "then the disciples went away again to their own home." The word appears very prominently in the New Testament Scriptures. It is a Christian word. Dryden says that home is the sacred refuge of our life. The derivation of the word is principally or primarily Saxon, and that embodies in it a world of instruction. It is that language that contains the thought most prevalent and most extended, concerning the redemption of the race by Christ Jesus. It is the Saxon civilization that is the Christian civilization, and in its very essence it has words communicating thoughts that are not found in other languages. To be at home on any subject is to be conversant or familiar with it.

We have been using home as a type of heaven. Do you know that homes are not known in countries where Christ is not known? Do you know that in Mohammedanism the very heart and life, that constitutes the central thought, the Bre-place, the heart affection of every home circle, womanhood, maternity, is yet the plaything and the gratifier of passion? So that it has come to be true that the measure of the civilization of any people finds its exact measurement in the character of the homes of the people. When Napoleon I. was asked what were the two greatest needs of modern France, his first response in order was, "Mothers." That simply meant homes.

Dr. Johnson says that to be at home is the ultimate result of all ambition, the end to which every enterprise and labor tends, and of which every desire prompts the prosecution. It is indeed at home that every man must be known by those who would make a just estimate of his virtue or his falsity: for smiles and embroidery are alike occasional, and the mind is often dressed for show, in dainty honor and in fictitious benevolence; but there is no sham, no deception, no possible cheating concerning personal character, in the Father's home. So, when these things are found in the homes of earth, as a type they are banished.

Christ said, "I go to prepare a place for you, that where I am, there ye may be also." How clearly that states the simple fact that heaven, the home of the follower of Christ, is where Christ's personal presence is. It is the presence of the Master that makes the heaven of which He is the centre. "I go to prepare a place for you, that where I am, there ye may be also." Is not that true of the homes of earth? Was that little child far from right, who came from a very common and very neglected home, so far as the external evidences of care were concerned, and, when asked by a teacher, "Where is your home, my child?" responded, "Where mother is." So shall heaven be where Christ is.

Pardon the personal reference. I am myself a son of an itinerant minister, as well as an itinerant minister personally. The mother of the home, with us, moved the family twenty times during the ministerial career of my father. It was literally true that home, with us, was where mother was. And it is literally true to-day that it matters not how long may have been the time of abode in any locality, it is the character of the home that makes it the type of the skies.

A husband, the record says, had lived sixty years with a faithful wife. He was a man of exceeding wealth, and he erected a magnificent mausoleum in which to deposit the mortal remains of the wife that left him after three score years of united home life; and after much deliberation for determining what should be the brief epitaph that should tell the whole story upon that virtuous, noble woman's tomb, that had cost its scores upon scores of thousands of dollars, he simply wrote her name, finally, and the sculptor graved this on the tomb: "She always made home happy;" and that was enough. The heart and life that could do that ' needed not that they should say, "Blessed are the dead who die in the Lord." It needed not that the burial service should be read over such mortality, out of which such a spirit had gone. One sentence told the whole story.

Have you ever yearned to return home, when you have been away? "I long to see home," the sailor says, tossed upon the storm-agitated deep. "I am going home," says the weary workman, oppressed with the toil and worn by its friction. "I must hurry home," says the mother, thinking of the child in the cradle that awaits her coming. "Oh, how I long to get home," says the schoolboy, who is fretted and worried with his tasks. "Don't stop me: I am going home," says the bright and beautiful girl, . h i: goin- away from the things that constituted the grace of childhood. "Almost home," says the dying Christian; and in connection with it comes the utterance from the skies: "In my Father's house are many mansions. If it were not so I would have told you." Oh, how that makes me think, sometimes, that Christ, seeing the narrow scope of our vision, thought that humanity would some time say, "Why, there have been millions and millions of people that have lived in this world. Is there room for them all?" "In my Father's house are many mansions. ' If there were only a few mansions, I would have told you. But there are many. "I go to prepare a place for you, that where I am, there ye may be also."

God grant that the personal presence of Him who uttered this hope of our race maybe in the midst of every family circle represented here to-night. Yea, more than that; make His home in every heart. And by and by, all this debate as to the occupations, as to the character, as to the locality of the heaven which is the Father's home, shall be dissipated in the twinkling of an eye, when, being where He is, we look upon His face and interpret His promises in the light of His smile.

You know all my intimate thoughts and cleared up all my doubts. I once told you how astonished I was that God does not give equal glory in heaven to all His chosen. I was afraid they were not all equally happy. You made me bring Daddy's big tumbler, and put it by the side of my tiny thimble. You filled them both with water and asked me which was the fuller. I told you they were both full to the brim and that it was impossible to put more water in them than they could hold. And so, Mother darling, you made me understand that in heaven God will give His chosen their fitting glory and that the last will have no reason to envy the first. By such means, you made me understand the most sublime mysteries and gave my soul its essential food.

Seeing my great thirst for knowledge, God was pleased, when I was fourteen, to add to the "fine flour," "honey" and "oil" in abundance.

This "honey" and "oil" I found in the conferences of Father Arminjon on The End of this World and the Mysteries of the World to Come. While reading this book my soul was flooded with a happiness quite supernatural. I experienced a foretaste of what God has prepared for those who love Him; and, seeing that eternal rewards are so much in excess of the petty sacrifices of this life, I yearned to love Our Lord, to love Him passionately, and to give Him countless proofs of affection while this was still in my power.

JOHN Xiv. 2.

Many Mansions

SORROW needs simple words for its consolation; and simple words are the best clothing for the largest truths. These eleven poor men were crushed and desolate at the thought of Christ's going; they fancied that if He left them they lost Him. And so, in simple, childlike words, which the weakest could grasp, and in which the most troubled could find peace, He said to them, after having encouraged their trust in Him, "There is plenty of room for you as well as for Me where I am going; and the frankness of our intercourse in the past might make you sure that if I were going to leave you I would have told you all about it. Did I ever hide from you anything that was painful? Did I ever allure you to follow Me by false promises? Should I have kept silence about it if our separation was to be eternal? "So, simply, as a mother might her babe upon her breast, He soothes their sorrow. And yet, in the quiet words, so level to the lowest apprehension, there lie great truths, far deeper than we yet have appreciated, and which will enfold themselves in their majesty and their greatness through eternity. "In My Father's house are many mansions; if it were not so, I would have told you."

I.—Now note, in these words, first, the "Father's house," and its ample room.

There is only one other occasion recorded in which our Lord used this expression, and it occurs in this same Gospel near the beginning; where in the narrative of the first cleansing of the temple we read that He said: "Make not my Father's house a house of merchandise." The earlier use of the words may help to throw light upon one aspect of this latter employment of it, for there blend in the image the two ideas of what I may call domestic familiarity, and of that great future as being the reality of which the earthly temple was intended to be the dim prophecy and shadow. Its courts, its many chambers, its ample porches with room for thronging worshippers represented in some poor way the wide sweep and space of that higher house; and the sense of Sonship, which drew the Boy to His Father's house in the earliest hours of conscious childhood, speaks here.

Think for a moment of how sweet and familiar the conception of heaven as the Father's house makes it to us. There is something awful, even to the best and holiest souls, in the thought of even the glories beyond. The circumstances of death, which is its portal, our utter unacquaintance with all that lies behind the veil, the terrible silence and distance which falls upon our dearest ones as they are sucked into the cloud, all tend to make us feel that there is much that is solemn and awful even in the thought of eternal future blessedness. But how it is all softened when we say, "My Father's house." Most of us have long since left behind us the sweet security, the sense of the absence of all responsibility, the assurance of defence and provision, which used to be ours when we lived as children in a father's house here. But we may all look forward to the renewal, in far nobler form, of these early days, when the father's house meant the inexpugnable fortress where no evil could befall us, the abundant home where all wants were supplied, and where the shyest and timidest child could feel at ease and secure. It is all coming again, brother! And amidst the august and unimaginable glories of that future the old feeling of being little children, nestling safe in the Father's house, will fill our quiet hearts once more.

And, then, consider how the conception of that future as the Father's house suggests answers to so many of our questions about the relationship of the inmates to one another. Are they to dwell isolated in their several mansions? Is that the way in which children in a home dwell with each other? Surely if He be the Father, and heaven be His house, the relation of the redeemed to one another must have in it more than all the sweet familiarity and unrestrained frankness which subsists in the families of earth. A solitary heaven would be but half a heaven, and would ill correspond with the hopes that inevitably spring from the representation of it as "my Father's house."

But consider, further, that this great and tender name for heaven has its deepest meaning in the conception of it as a spiritual state of which the essential elements are the loving manifestation and presence of God as Father, the perfect consciousness of sonship, the happy union of all the children in one great family, and the derivation of all their blessedness from their elder Brother.

The earthly temple, to which there is some allusion in this great metaphor, was the place in which the Divine glory was manifested to seeking souls, though in symbol, yet also in reality, and the representation of our text blends the two ideas of the free, frank intercourse of the home and of the magnificent revelations of the holy of holies. Under either aspect of the phrase, whether we think of "my Father's house" as temple or as home, it sets before us, as the main blessedness and glory of heaven, the vision of the Father, the consciousness of sonship, and the complete union with Him. There are many subsidiary and more outward blessednesses and glories which shine dimly through the haze of metaphors and negations, by which alone a state of which we have no experience can be revealed to us; but these are secondary. The heaven of heaven is the possession of God the Father through the Son in the expanding spirits of His sons. The sovereign and filial position which Jesus Christ in His manhood occupies in that higher house, and which He shares with all those who by Him have received the adoption of sons, is the very heart and nerve of this great metaphor.

But I think we must go a step further than that, and recognise that in the image there is inherent the teaching that that glorious future is not merely a state, but also a place. Local associations are not to be divorced from the words; and although we can say but little about such a matter, yet everything in the teaching of Scripture points to the thought that howsoever true it may be that the essence of heaven is condition, yet that also heaven has a local habitation, and is a place in the great universe of God. Jesus Christ has at this moment a human body, glorified. That body, as Scripture teaches us, is somewhere, and where He is there shall also His servant be. In the context He goes on to tell us that "He goes to prepare a place for us," and though I would not insist upon the literal interpretation of such words, yet distinctly the drift of the representation is in the direction of localising, though not of materialising, the abode of the blessed. So I think we can say, not merely that what He is that shall also His servants be, but that where He is there shall also His servants be. And from the representation of my text, though we cannot fathom all its depths, we can at least grasp this, which gives solidity and reality to our contemplations of the future, that heaven is a place, full of all sweet security and homelike repose, where God is made known in every heart and to every consciousness as a loving Father, and of which all the inhabitants are knit together in the frankest fraternal intercourse, conscious of the Father's love, and rejoicing in the abundant provisions of His royal house. And then there is a second thought to be suggested from these words, and that is of the ample room in this great house. The original purpose of the words of my text, as I have already reminded you, was simply to soothe the fears of a handful of disciples.

There was room where Christ went for eleven poor men. Yes, room enough for them! but Christ's prescient eye looked down the ages, and saw all the unborn millions that would yet be drawn to Him uplifted on the cross, and some glow of satisfaction flitted across His sorrow, as He saw from afar the result of the impending travail of His soul in the multitudes by whom God's heavenly house should yet be filled. "Many mansions!" The thought widens out far beyond our grasp. Perhaps that upper room, like most of the roof-chambers in Jewish houses, was open to the skies, and whilst He spoke, the innumerable lights that blaze in that clear heaven shone down upon them, and He may have pointed to these. The better Abraham perhaps looked forth, like His prototype, on the starry heavens, and saw in the vision of the future those who through Him should receive the adoption of sons and dwell for ever in the house of the Lord, "so many as the stars of the sky in multitude, and as the sand which is by the seashore innumerable."

Ah, brethren! if we could only widen our measurement of the walls of the New Jerusalem to the measurement of that "golden rod which the man, that is, the angel," as John says, applied to it, we should understand how much bigger it is than any of these poor sects and communities of ours here on earth. If we would lay to heart, as we ought to do, the deep meaning of that indefinite "many" in my text, it would rebuke our narrowness. There will be a great many occupants of the mansions in heaven that Christian men here on earth—the most Catholic of them—will be very much surprised to see there, and thousands will find their entrance there that never found their entrance into any communities of so-called Christians here on earth.

That one word "many" should deepen our confidence in the triumphs of Christ's Cross, and it may be used to heighten our own confidence as to our own poor selves. A chamber in the great temple waits for each of us, and the question is, Shall we occupy it, or shall we not? The old rabbis had a tradition which, like a great many of their apparently foolish sayings, covers in picturesque guise a very deep truth. They said that, however many the throngs of worshippers who came up to Jerusalem at the passover, the streets of the city and the courts of the sanctuary were never crowded. And so it is with that great city. There is room for all. There are throngs, but no crowds. Each finds a place in the ample sweep of the Father's house, like some of the great palaces that barbaric Eastern kings used to build, in whose courts armies might encamp, and the chambers of which were counted by the thousand. And surely in all that ample accommodation, you and I may find some corner where we, if we will, may lodge for evermore.

I do not dwell upon subsidiary ideas that may be drawn from the expressions. "Mansions" means places of permanent abode, and suggests the two thoughts, so sweet to travellers and toilers in this fleeting, labouring life, of unchangeableness and of repose. Some have supposed that the variety in the attainments of the redeemed, which is reasonable and Scriptural, might be deduced from our text, but that does not seem to be relevant to our Lord's purpose.

One other suggestion may be made without enlarging upon it. There is only another occasion in this Gospel in which the word here translated "mansions" is employed, and it is this: "We will come and make our abode with him." Our mansion is in God; God's dwelling-place is in us. So ask yourselves, Have you a share there in that heavenly home? When prodigal children go away from the father's house, sometimes a heart-broken parent will keep the boy's room just as it used to be when he was young and pure, and will hope and weary through long days for him to come back and occupy it again. God is keeping a room for you in His house; do you see that you fill it.

II.—In the next place, note here the sufficiency of Christ's revelation for our needs.
