It seems that they consider the number as the principle of things, in respect both of matter; and of their changes and situations ... And all these seven heavens, as it is said, are number.

The Merkavah

THE origins of the Merkavah concept lie in the Chariot Throne of the cherubim, whose divine pattern or prototype was shown to Moses in heaven and whose first representation in a cultic context is as 'two cherubim of gold', with outstretched wings, mounted on the cover of the Ark of the Covenant in the desert sanctuary. In the Holy of Holies (devir) of Solomon's Temple, two gold-plated cherubim shielded the cover of the Ark with their wings; their appearance, revealed to David in a vision as a divine pattern, is described in the parallel passage in Chronicles, which explicitly links the cherubim with the heavenly Chariot Throne: 'for the pattern of the chariot—the cherubim—those with outspread wings screening the Ark of the Covenant of the Lord'. The various traditions that pictured the cherubim as screening the Ark differ in their particulars: some place them above the cover of the Ark, others have them standing before it; common to all is the fact that their four wings touched. The divinely patterned chariot of the cherubim in the First Temple's Holy of Holies, the supposed throne of the Deity or site of his revelation in the Temple, did not survive the destruction, but lived on in mystical memory, which linked its cosmic prototype with its ritual meaning, and was perpetuated in prophetic and priestly traditions and in liturgical testimony. In these traditions, the very word merkavah became a symbolic concept expressive of the Holy of Holies and the Temple, both as a whole and in detail; it figured both in the divine prototype of the Temple (the supernal Heikhalot and their angelic cult), and in the memory of its earthly archetype (the Temple and its priests); its roots lay in the numinous foundations of an ancient ritual tradition that forged a bond between heaven and earth.

Biblical tradition explicitly ascribed the origins of the Merkavah to a divine pattern or prototype. The visionary tradition of the Merkavah repeatedly emphasized its four faces, while post-biblical tradition associated this divine prototype, facing all four points of the compass, with the universe and its microcosmic cultic representations: the Merkavah represented the annual cyclic cosmic order of time, based on a chronotopic fourfold axis unifying time and space. This unified space-time concept governed the fourfold cycle of seasons in nature, the four winds of the heavens', the 'four foundations of the wondrous firmament', and other multiples and derivatives of four in fixed proportions to the twelve months of the year. Thus, there were twelve diagonal divisions of the universe, twelve signs of the zodiac and forty-eight constellations, twenty-four hours in a day, twenty-four priestly and angelic courses performing their sacral duties, and 'twenty-four myriad thousand miles'. All these divisions derived from the divine chronotopic division melding time and place; they represented unifying links between the cosmic, the chronotopic, and the ritual, or between cycles of nature and cycles of time as reflected in the cultic order.

The Merkavah reflected time as the mystery of the creative process in nature, the eternal, divine order of Creation as embodied in fixed numerical proportions of cycles of time. Its constituent parts formed a multidimensional, concrete representation, in cultic terms, of the great clock of nature with its numerous fourfold subdivisions, whose interrelations were based on a fixed cyclic order that transformed time and place in accordance with the four seasons of the year. Correlated with this cosmic order was a fixed, fourfold order of ritual which observed the solar calendar; the latter was divided into 364 days, fifty-two sabbaths, and four equal quarters of ninety-one days—the annual seasons—each consisting of thirteen sabbaths (see below).

The Merkavah was thus a representation of the ritual order of cyclic ritual time, measured in sabbaths of days, i.e. weeks. But the four annual seasons in turn subdivided in accordance with a fixed sevenfold cyclic order; similarly, the concept of sacred cosmic place was also associated with a fixed sevenfold axis. The cyclic axis of sacred time derived from the seven days of Creation; accordingly, there are seven days in a week, counted in 'Sabbaths of days'; seven days of service performed by each priestly course serving in the Temple; seven days of consecration (miluim; see Lev. 8: B); and seven-week intervals between harvesting times (see below). The fixed spatial axis of sacred place, on the other hand, was embodied in seven firmaments, seven heikhalot, seven devirim, and seven merkavot.

The Merkavah tradition, then, established a chronotopic synchronization between the fourfold cycle and the sevenfold cycle, in regard to sacred time and sacred place alike, as a manifestation of the creative process of nature; the eternal, cyclic, cosmic order was preordained in terms of set times and testimonies, a divine pattern maintained by angelic forces. This tradition was preserved by priests and angels, all observing a hallowed solar calendar based on these two cycles, to which ritual and liturgy conformed in both earthly Temple and supernal Heikhalot. Thus, sacred time was reflected on a microcosmic ritual scale by the natural cosmic order and the divine order in the calendar of seasons, weeks, and set times (= festivals), correlated with a cyclic order of liturgy; while sacred place was similarly reflected by various sevenfold, fourfold, and twelvefold ritual representations linking the Earthly Temple with the supernal worlds. All these elements came together in the sacred service as performed on earth by the priests and in the heavens by the angels, all guardians of the sacred heritage.

The origins of the mystical Merkavah tradition lie in the vision of the exiled priest Ezekiel son of Buzi, who prophesied towards the end of the First Temple period. Deported from Jerusalem to Babylonia with Jehoiachin, he saw a vision in which the Chariot Throne and its cultic representations in the ruined Temple assumed a divine dimension, to become the Merkavah, combining various elements from the Holy of Holies and the Temple courts into an eternal, visionary, cosmic entity transcending the limits of time and space. In addition to the heavenly Chariot Throne, Ezekiel also envisioned the future earthly Temple, whose service was entrusted exclusively—as Ezekiel repeatedly stressed—to the priests of the House of Zadok.

The next stage in the Merkavah tradition was the mystical vision of seceding priestly circles, who were barred from serving in the Second Temple in the last centuries BCE because of fundamental dissension concerning the sanctity of time and place and polemical disputes about sabbath and festivals, calendar and cult. Having withdrawn, as a consequence, from the earthly Temple, these circles, who called themselves 'sons of Zadok, the priests', ministered in their mind's eye, together with their angelic counterparts, in a divine Chariot Throne which, inspired by Ezekiel's Merkavah vision and the tradition of the Temple service, they recreated in their writings in poetic and visionary terms. The Zadokite priests are referred to by a variety of priestly epithets: in the Community Rule; in the 'Rule for all the congregation of Israel ... when they shall join the Community to walk according to the law of the sons of Zadok the priests', in a Qumran scroll known as the Damascus Document, which calls them 'the sons of Zadok, the priests ... behold they are the interpretation of the last Law'; in the fragments of the Damascus Document found in the Cairo Genizah; in the War Scroll; and in other Qumranic works. They served together with their mystical angelic counterparts, referred to in Songs of the Sabbath Sacrifice in typically priestly terms: 'priests of the inner sanctum (kohanei korev) who serve before the King of holiest holiness', 'Priests of the inner sanctum in his royal sanctuary, ministers of the Presence in his glorious &via', 'priests of the highest of high', 'Angels of Holiness', 'chief priests', 'seven priestly factions for the wondrous Temple', 'Chief Princes', and 'Chiefs of the Princes of Wondrous Priesthoods'. The terrestrial chief priests, who had withdrawn from the Temple, and the heavenly priests of the inner sanctum, who were painted with a clearly priestly brush, sang together, in a permanent cyclic order, the Songs of the Sabbath Sacrifice; in a regular, prescribed daily, weekly, monthly order of set times they recited psalms, songs, hymns, and Kedushahs, shared by angels and men. They did all this in a cyclic, weekly order of liturgy, governed by the ritual solar calendar of weeks (sabbaths) and quarterly seasons, and correlated with the order of priestly courses, also subdivided in conformity with sabbaths and multi-annual cycles, and named after the new months and the festivals.

The last stage of the Merkavah tradition in ancient mystical literature was formulated by certain circles of priestly affiliation, active after the destruction of the Second Temple, who composed the Heikhalot literature in the first centuries CE. The protagonists of this literature—known as 'descenders of (or to) the Chariot' and associated with the high priest Rabbi Ishmael' and with Rabbi Akiva, who 'entered the Pardes' (an expression symbolizing engagement in esoteric speculation pertaining to the heavenly sanctuaries)—aimed to perpetuate the destroyed Temple and its cult through their vision, by 'descending' to the Chariot Throne and 'ascending' to the supernal Heikhalot—that is, heavenly temples or sanctuaries. There they met their mystical counterparts: the ministering angels, the angels of glory and the angels on high, as well as the high priest of the supernal worlds, Enoch son of Jared, also known as Metatron, the mystical angelic protagonist of the priestly literature from Qumran. The angels who serve in those supernal worlds bathe and purify themselves, sing and recite the Kedushah, exalt, bless with holy names, the kindle fiery flames, thus perpetuating the priestly and Temple ceremonies in the seven supernal sanctuaries, the Heikhalot.

Scholars are divided as to the historical identity and social, religious, and cultural venue of the various circles that were associated at different times in antiquity with the Merkavah and Heikhalot traditions, the mystical priesthood and the angels, the Songs of the Sabbath Sacrifice, the heavenly Kedushah, and the songs of the ministering angels. However, sizeable excerpts and fragments from the highly diverse literary opus of these circles are now available and invite discussion and investigation. Though generally incomplete, these excerpts provide sufficient evidence of the cosmic, mystical, and ritual attitudes of these circles; of their affiliation with the priesthood and the Temple; of their connections with worship and the cyclic liturgical ceremonies performed together with the angels; of their myths, mystical lore, and cult, linking heaven and earth; of their stringent rules of purity and impurity; of their calendar and festivals; of the prohibitions that they practised; and of their polemical position and self-perception as earthly correlates of the angels. In what follows I shall discuss the various stages in the formation and development of the mystical priestly tradition in antiquity, with its visionary metamorphoses of Temple and priesthood which, destroyed and desecrated, became objects of controversy; lost in earthly reality, they were perpetuated in an ideal, utopian guise through the divine Chariot Throne—the Merkavah—and the angelic priesthood in the supernal sanctuaries.

The Sevenfold Pattern

As already stated, the mystical Merkavah tradition evolved from the vision of Ezekiel son of Buzi the priest, in which the cherubim and sacred creatures in the earthly and heavenly Temples were fused together. Ezekiel envisioned a fourfold configuration of sacred, multi-faced, winged creatures, which could not be subsumed under any category clearly distinguishable as either earthly or heavenly; the fourfold nature of these creatures, facing all four points of the compass, is stressed again and again. The Merkavah tradition was taken up again in the literature of the secessionist priesthood discovered at Qumran, which is frequently “concerned with deciphering the cosmic order as revealed through harmonies expressed in fourfold numbers and sevenfold cycles, in both earthly Temple and heavenly sanctuaries. Many of the works of this literature, written in the heat of polemics and controversy towards the end of the Second Temple period, ignore the barriers between heaven and earth, angels and human beings, providing descriptions of visions featuring Merkavah, cherubim and angels, priests and their heavenly counterparts blessing, praising, and singing sacred songs in the supernal sanctuaries, according to a fixed, cyclic, cosmic order]] The final stage was that of Heikhalot and Merkavah literature, composed in mystical, ornamented language in the first centuries after the destruction of the Temple with the aim of mystically perpetuating the tradition. Many works of Merkavah tradition feature such subjects as crossing the borders between the worlds; 'descending to the Merkavah'; heavenly sanctuaries; angelic rituals and sacred song; the cyclic liturgies preserved by the angels whose task it was to supervise cosmic order; and the portrayal of that order in the divine Merkavah in the supernal worlds.

In the early, formative stages of Merkavah tradition, the priestly authors, whose writing drew on their own mythical and mystical traditions and displayed a unique affinity for the book of Ezekiel and its peculiar perceptions of priesthood and the Temple (chs.40-8), were unreservedly opposed to the Temple cult as performed in their times and to the very concept of time that governed it. In their works, written in the last centuries BCE and the first century (before the destruction of the Temple), they referred to themselves by various names alluding to the priesthood in general and the House of Zadok in particular, to concepts bound up with adherence to the righteous path and observance of the covenant, with upholding testimony and the sacred set times (festivals), with light, sanctity, and the priestly-angelic community: 'sons of Zadok, the priests, guardians of the Covenant', 'chief priests', 'knowers of righteousness', 'plantation of righteousness', 'root of growth', 'shoot of righteousness', 'congregation of holiness', 'Council of the Community', 'those who enter the Covenant', 'Sons of Light', 'Sons of Dawn', or 'those who enter the new Covenant'. In Heikhalot literature, composed after the destruction of the Temple, they were known by names referring to the divine Merkavah: 'descenders of [or to] the Merkavah', 'viewers of the Merkavah', or 'heroes of the company', as against 'band after band of angels from the firmament and company after company from the heavens'.

The priestly circles whose works were found at Qumran were adamantly opposed to the Temple cult of their times. They rejected the lunar calendar then governing the cult and instead upheld the superiority of a cultic calendar based on the solar year, demanding that the regular succession of sabbaths and festivals be derived from that calendar. Up until the destruction of the Second Temple, they fought for the concept of the Covenant and the Festival of Oaths or Covenants, also known as the Festival of Weeks (Heb. shavuot / shevuot), for every dimension of the sacred service that explicitly involved any aspect of cycle, number, date, fixed time, and counting, thus reflecting the regularity of the cosmic order; they stressed observance of the laws of purity and the rules of the Temple service associated with the perception of sacred place; and insisted on the superior right of the Zadokite priests to settle any question relating to Temple rituals and matters of purity and impurity, by virtue of their divine election to serve in the Temple and their eternal, sacred, heaven-granted authority. In much of their struggle over the legitimate performance of the cult, in questions relating to the calendar, the festivals, and the administration of Temple affairs, they relied on traditions of angelic origin found in Enoch, Jubilees, the Rule Scroll, and the Songs of the Sabbath Sacrifice. They saw themselves as a congregation or community revolving, so they believed, around an angelic and priestly 'oneness' or 'togetherness' (Heb. yahad), beyond time, from which derived the authority and legitimacy of their traditions, laws, and sacred service; they in fact referred to themselves, the Community, by the same word, yahad. The angels were witnesses to the Covenant, guardians of the calendar of sabbaths and festivals, and partners in sacred rites that conformed to the cyclic solar calendar, with its subdivision into quarters (= seasons) and sabbaths (= weeks).

The Heikhalot mystics, active after the destruction of the Temple, relinquished the oppositional aspect of their thought and the cultic controversies characteristic of the mystical priesthood prior to the destruction. Instead, they formulated heavenly, priestly, and mystical perceptions of the Temple and its rites, concentrating on perpetuating the now defunct earthly cult through its angelic counterpart in the world of the Merkavah—the Chariot Throne—and the Heikhalot—the heavenly sanctuaries. To that end, they created mythical, mystical, and liturgical modes of expression that bridged the gap between the sacred service of angels and human beings. These modes of expression were a numinous written record of priestly and angelic traditions concerning (1) sacred place—the world of the Merkavah, portrayed as seven sanctuaries or palaces in vertical sequence, facing all four points of the compass, thus preserving a sevenfold liturgical cyclicality synchronized with the four seasons of the year; (2) sacred time—the solar calendar, subdivided into four seasons and into sequences of seven-day sabbaths or weeks, associated with the figure of Enoch son of Jared, the seventh patriarch of the world, also known as Metatron, the Angel or Prince of the Countenance; and (3) sacred ritual—the tradition of oaths and covenants, names, songs of praise and blessings, the Kedushah, thanksgiving, all associated with septuples, shared by angels and priests, rooted in the teachings of Metatron and the angels.

The cultic conceptions and controversial positions espoused by the secessionist priesthood, which took shape in the stormy atmosphere of the last centuries ace, were excluded from the canon and considered non-canonical or 'extraneous' literature; their traditions were suppressed and almost vanished until rediscovered in the Judaean Desert Scrolls at Qumran. They were opposed, directly and otherwise, to the positions commonly maintained in the second and first centuries BCE, the Hasmonaean period, in regard to the three foundations of the cult: sacred place, sacred time, and sacred ritual.

All over the ancient world, temples were considered as a microcosm of the universe; they embodied sacred place, expressing the oneness of time, space, and ritual as a reflection of cosmic order, the numerical harmony inherent in that order, and the eternal cycles of heaven and earth. This ideal order, seen as an archetypal reproduction of the order of Creation and the underlying secret of creation and life, had a sacred numerical dimension, associated with the laws of nature and the fixed times of cult and ritual; a mythical, narrative dimension, delimiting the group's shared identity with its commandments and prohibitions, of heavenly origin but recorded in an earthly text; and a ritual dimension, creating a bond between secret and manifest and perpetuating these affinities between text, number, and narrative. These various dimensions were proclaimed in cyclic ceremonies which measured out the creative progress of manifest time in terms of seasonal changes and fertility cycles; the passage of time was celebrated in song and sacrifice which strove to close the gap between heaven and earth, picturing an ideal relationship between the manifest and the secret dimensions—a relationship representing a cosmic ritual unity between sacred place, sacred time, and sacred testimony, which together determined the continuity of Creation, agricultural plenty, and human fertility. The meaning of ritual in relation to the temple as microcosm has been aptly defined by a historian of religions, Jonathan Smith: 'Ritual represents the creation of a controlled environment ... [It is] a means of performing the way things ought to be in conscious tension to the way things are in such a way that this ritualized perfection is recollected in the ordinary, uncontrolled, course of things.' The temple and its ceremonies represent the ideal world, ruled by the primary divine order. Hence, a disturbance of any one of its components—the pattern of sacred time, sacred place, or sacred ritual—bound up as they are in the numerical and ritual oneness of nature and culture, testimony and festivals, signs and covenants, religion and law, purity and impurity, life and death, is seen as having a calamitous effect on the cosmic order of things: it wreaks havoc with the mutual relationship between heaven and earth.

The secessionist priesthood whose works were discovered at Qumran considered the Temple of their times, throughout the Hasmonaean period and the previous two decades, as desecrating and violating the hallowed rules of purity, as impure, so defiled that they withdrew from its service. This follows from the letter known as Miktsat ma'asei hatorah (MMT), written at the beginning of the Hasmonaean period. In this work, which deals with the laws of purity in the Temple and recounts the various sins which brought about the defilement of the Temple, we read: 'And you know that we have separated from the mass of the people and from their impurity and from mingling with them in these matters and from being in contact with them in these matters.' The same is stated explicitly in the Commentary on Habakkuk: 'As for that which he said, Because of the blood of the city and the violence done to the land [Hab. 2: 71: interpreted, the city is Jerusalem, where the Wicked Priest committed abominable deeds and defiled the Temple of God.] The target of the attacks in both works is most probably Jonathan the Hasmonaean, who defiled the Temple through his priesthood; in any event, the text is clearly referring to the Temple of the writer's time as defiled by the Hasmonaean priesthood. Similarly, we read in the Damascus Document: 'Moreover, they profane the Temple', 'they profaned the Temple', 'the third is profanation of the Temple', 'to defile the city of the sanctuary with their uncleanness', and even more strongly in the Testament of Levi: 'You will be inflated with pride over your priesthood, exalting yourselves not merely by human standards but contrary to the commands of God; . . . you will deride the sacred things. Therefore the sanctuary which the Lord chose shall become desolate through your uncleanness.'

As against the impure, defiled Temple from which they had withdrawn, administered as it was by 'Sons of Darkness' (implicitly identified as the priests of the Hasmonaean dynasty, of the division of Jehoiarib, who had usurped the high priesthood), those priestly circles who considered themselves to be the 'Sons of Light' and explicitly identified themselves as the priests of the House of Zadok (deprived of the priesthood in the Hasmonaean period), together with their allies, envisaged a super-temporal, heavenly Temple, drawing on traditions of the First Temple and Ezekiel's vision, as one deduces from the Songs of the Sabbath Sacrifice and from the Blessings Scroll, both found at Qumran. Parallel to the heavenly Temple in the world of the Merkavah was a 'sanctuary of men' for the priests and other members of the Community—an expression occurring in 4QFlorilegium and defined as follows: 'He has commanded that a Sanctuary of men be built for himself, that there they may send up, like the smoke of incense, the works of the Law.' The nature of this 'sanctuary of men' is described in detail in the Rule Scroll and in MMT. On the evidence of the scrolls, the members of the Community scrupulously observed the cyclic order of sabbaths and festivals according to the solar calendar, shared the cyclic celebrations of the sacred rites with the angels, and meticulously adhered to the stringent laws of purity and impurity that made it possible for them to keep angelic company. Before the schism became complete, probably in the early stages of the separation, when there was still some communication, the writers of MMT proposed the institution of alternative, pure rites, to replace the impure, false order prevailing in the earthly Temple;<sup>35</sup> elsewhere, however—as in the Temple Scroll, New Jerusalem, the Damascus Document, and the Rule of the Congregation of Israel at the End of Days—they appear to have lost hope of any further contact with the Temple of their times.

The works of this literature describe a different, gigantic, earthly Temple, or a future Temple built mostly according to a square plan measured in sevenfold units, influenced by biblical traditions and by Ezekiel's vision of the Temple's Between rejecting the contemporary, desecrated Temple, deploring the defiling rites performed in it by unworthy priests, and harbouring hopes for the reconstitution of the future Temple, with its legitimate cult restored, at the End of Days, the seceding priests seem to have focused their sacred service on the eternal heavenly Temple and its angelic cult.

The essential feature of the heavenly Temple—the world of the Merkavah - was its profound relationship with Ezekiel's Chariot Throne/Merkavah, the cherubim, and the sacred creatures, mounted in their four-faced spatial pattern and their sevenfold vertical pattern, representing sacred time measured in weeks/ sabbaths and sacred place as embodied in seven heikhalot and seven merkavot. This chronotopic order, unifying time and place around a common sevenfold-fourfold axis, was associated with the mysteries of sanctity, eternity, communion, and life itself, with the mutual relationship between cycles of time, cycles of fertility, and tangible prototypes representing the mystery of hidden things. The concepts of season, cycle, sanctity, four/quarter, seven/week/oath (all three derive from the same root in Hebrew sh-v-a'), purity and benediction, community and communion, all have double meanings, referring to sacred time and place alike and through them to the divine Covenant, to the cycle of seven festivals, to holiness and benediction. On the human plane, the same concepts are also associated with betrothal and union for purposes of fertility and reproduction, which involve cycles of ovulation counted in four-week periods, the seven-day term of purification, self-sanctification, covenant and oath, the seven benedictions of betrothal, the husband's conjugal duties, and the laws governing conjugal union.

Many of the spatial, temporal, ritual, and liturgical components of the heavenly Temple are arranged in a sevenfold pattern relating to time and place in a context of holiness: the seven days of Creation and their cyclic recurrence as fifty-two weeks, celebrated by the priestly courses performing their sacral duties in cycles of seven days and sequences of seven festivals; and by septuples of angels discharging their functions in similar fashion. Alongside this sevenfold motif, as noted above, was a fourfold motif: four seasons of the year, four points of the compass, twelve diagonal boundaries, twelve months of the solar year, and twelve signs of the zodiac. (Cultic representations in the earthly Temple of this sevenfold and twelvefold order, such as the seven-branched candelabrum, the twelve stones of the priest's breastplate, and so on, will be discussed later.) It was the task of the priests and their angelic counterparts to observe the seasons and festivals; that observance was governed on the time axis by a synchronization of the calendar of sabbaths, divided into four equal quarters/seasons of thirteen sabbaths each, with the calendar of biblical festivals, which provided for seven festivals within a seven-month period from Passover in the first month (Nisan) to the Festival of Ingathering in the seventh (Tishrei).<sup>37</sup> In this twenty-eight-week period there were four festivals of first fruits at intervals of seven sabbaths (the first two coinciding with the biblical festivals of Omer and Shavuot): the Festival of the First Barley (26 Nisan), the Festival of the First Wheat (15 Sivan), the Festival of the First Wine (3 Av), and the Festival of the First Olive Oil (22 Elul). They were always celebrated on a Sunday and involved pilgrimage to the Temple; they are detailed in the Temple Scroll and in MATT 4Q394, frgs. 1-2 i-v.

The components of the heavenly Temple constitute a multifaceted cosmic reality, unifying place, time, and ritual. The dimension of place is represented in myth and ritual, as we shall see later, by such elements as the Garden of Eden and the tree of life, Paradise (the mystical Pardes), the Merkavah, the Holy of Holies, the cherubim, conjugal union and communion; time is represented by the eternity of the cyclic laws of nature, which dictate, on the one hand, cycles of life and fertility and, on the other, the sequence of covenants and festivals; while ritual consists of sacred song, sacred service, blessing, and praise recited by priests and angels. The axis that holds all these disparate elements together is the number seven, which is common to the divine, sacred cycles of the seven days of Creation and the seven days of purification, the seven days of consecration (of the priests) and the seven appointed times, the seven benedictions, the seven branches of the candelabrum and the seven priestly vestments, and the whole complex of 'sevens' (or heptads) associated with the sacred service and specified in the Priestly Code.

All components of the Merkavah undergo a process of liturgical personification, by virtue of which they themselves become the bearers of sanctity and ritual. The ritual and liturgical elements were divided or multiplied by seven after experiencing a visionary metamorphosis that linked them to their divine origin, to become seven holy precincts, seven chariot thrones, seven devirim (Holies of Holies), seven heikhalot, and seven angelic priesthoods, in a vertical heavenly space comprising seven firmaments, as we read in the Songs of the Sabbath Sacrifice. This fixed vertical sevenfold axis of space is correlated with a cyclic horizontal axis of time: the sacred space is sliced, as it were, into horizontal septuples/ heptads of time, invested with sanctity in accordance with the solar calendar, which itself is divided into sabbaths and weeks in a fixed, eternal, cyclic sequence preserved by angelic and priestly courses. This ritual and liturgical calendar, measured from the fourth day of Creation—the day on which the heavenly luminaries were created—and onward, in regular, sevenfold cycles, is observed in the heavens by the princes of the angelic priesthoods, who recite the Songs of the Sabbath Sacrifice and continuously proclaim 'seven times with seven . . . ; and on earth by the twenty-four priestly courses, which share their sacral duties according to an immutable order, each for an appointed seven-day span. The names of the twenty-four priestly courses—whose number corresponds to the number of hours in a day—designate the order of succession of weeks in the ritual and liturgical calendar, in which each of the four seasons is a cycle of thirteen sabbaths.

The system of priestly courses was based on I Chronicles 24, where the Chronicler, expressing priestly tradition, describes how King David and two leading priests, Zadok and Ahimelech, divided the two families of Aaronide priests, the descendants of Aaron's sons Eleazar and Itamar, into twenty-four divisions or 'courses'. Various historical problems are presented by this biblical tradition and the lists of priestly courses in the Bible. Whether the priestly courses were indeed established only in the early days of the Second Temple, as claimed by modern scholars, or whether they in fact go back to the time of David and Solomon, in accordance with biblical tradition, Qumran writings surely considered them of paramount importance. The various fragments of the so-called 'Calendars of Priestly Courses' (also referred to as the Scroll of Priestly Courses, known in Hebrew as mishmarot) describe a sequence of twenty-four priestly courses, officiating in rotation for one week each in a fixed liturgical order, thus attesting to the fixed, cyclic rhythm of cosmic and liturgical time. The Calendars specify the name of the officiating course on the first day of each month, at each appointed time, and on each sabbath in a concise formulation, for example 'The first year; the first month; on the fifth, in Jedaiah, on the thirtieth of the month', that is, 'In the first year of the six-year cycle, in the first month [Nisan], on the fifth day [= Thursday] of the week of [the course of] Jedaiah, which falls on the thirtieth of the first month.' Only the priestly courses serving in the first week of the month are named, as well as those serving on festivals; the other courses officiated consecutively in the prescribed order. Days of the week are also specified with reference to the priestly courses then on duty, for example 'Creation, on the fourth, in Gamul', that is, 'On the fourth day [= Wednesday] of the week of the course of Gamul will fall the New Year of the week of Creation.' The lunar phases (new moon, full moon, etc.) and times relating to sabbatical and jubilee years are also stated in that way. The underlying reference system is thus a sequence of six-year cycles, rigidly prescribed over periods of six jubilees.

In order to prevent any possible desecration of the sabbath, each course, having served its term of duty, was replaced by its successor on the morning of the Sunday of the new week. Rabbinical tradition, in contrast, decreed that the rotation should take place on the sabbath itself, after the additional sacrifice of the sabbath had been offered. Indeed, the Sages did not prescribe a fixed order of service; instead, lots were drawn during the pilgrimage festivals in Jerusalem to determine which priestly course would serve first, the rest continuing in order.

The six-year cycle was necessary to correlate the calendar of priestly courses with the solar calendar. Indeed, elementary arithmetic shows that the lowest common multiple of the two numbers 24 (the number of courses) and 364 (the number of days in a (solar) year) is  $2084 = 6 \times 364$ . Thus, for example, the priestly course on duty in the first week of the year (which began on a Wednesday) would come back to the same week after a cycle of six years, during which it would have served a total of thirteen times. The New Year festival the first day of the first month—in the first and fourth years of the six-year cycle always fell on a Wednesday, the day on which the heavenly luminaries had been created. This was also the vernal equinox, when day and night are of equal length; and since the moon was created full, it is full on both those days. In other words, once in three years, on the first day of the first month (Nisan), the sun's and moon's paths return to their position at Creation; this event is referred to in Qumran literature as a sign, Heb. ot. According to Milik, thirty days were added every three years to co-ordinate the paths of the sun and the moon ( $364 \times 3 = 354 \times 3 + 30$ ). Another possibility, more plausible, is that a week was added every seven years in the sabbatical year (shemitah) ( $7 \times 365 = 7 \times 364 + 7$ ).

As against the mishmarot scrolls with their twenty-four courses as in the Bible, the number prescribed in the War Scroll is twenty-six, which is half the number of weeks in the solar year:

The fathers of the Community are fifty-two. The chief priests shall be appointed after the High Priest and his deputy, twelve chiefs to serve always before God. And the twenty-six chiefs of the courses shall serve in the courses. After them the chief Levites, to serve always twelve, one for each tribe, and the chiefs of their courses shall serve, each in his place. And the chiefs of the tribes and fathers of the Community after them, to attend always at the gates of the Temple. And the chiefs of their courses, with their numbered men, shall attend at their appointed times, at the beginnings of months and On Sabbaths, and on all the days of the year.

This may be a reference to a system based on the number of weeks in a half-year. Another possibility is that the War Scroll was referring to some ideal, eschatological situation featuring a sevenfold correlation between weeks, courses, and years.

Various inscriptions listing priestly courses have been found, both in the Land of Israel (Caesarea, Ashkelon, Kisufim, Beit El, Rehov, Nazareth) and elsewhere (Yemen); their presence is undoubtedly linked with the move of priests to Galilee after the Bar-Kokhba revolt. The question of the relationship between these inscriptions and the Qumran tradition of priestly courses and their preservation of liturgical order has yet to be studied. The same applies to a possible relationship with the evidence of priestly and liturgical traditions in Heikhalot literature, written long after the destruction of the Temple (see below, Ch. 10), when the priestly courses were meaningless as an organizational framework for Temple service. Their only possible significance then was to memorialize the sacred ritual and preserve its liturgical calendar.

Sacred heavenly space exhibits a vertical sevenfold pattern; it is divided in the Songs of the Sabbath Sacrifice into 'seven lofty holy places', 'seven wondrous territories', 'seven holy mysteries', 'seven most holy precincts', 'seven devirim of the priesthoods', 'seven holy precincts', or into seven heikhalot in seven firmaments. But it also displays a fourfold pattern, exemplified by the four sides of the Chariot Throne, the four points of the compass, 'four foundations of the wondrous firmament'. In parallel to these spatial patterns the secessionist priests observed and preserved a fixed, eternal and continuous, cyclic, sevenfold pattern of sacred time, divided into four equal seasons. They regarded the cultic calendar that governed the sacred Temple services around the time of their secession—based on a lunar calendar of 354 days, counted in months of unequal length dependent on human discretion, based on variable human observations of the new moon—as false and arbitrary, an infringement of the Covenant, sinful and wicked. This newly imposed lunar calendar was to be replaced by the ancient priestly solar calendar, re-establishing the sacred ritual and liturgical calendar of divine origin, extant from the very beginning of time, characterized by a fixed, eternal, cosmic, sevenfold and fourfold symmetry, counted in sabbaths of days (= weeks) and cycles of annual seasons. The sacred divisions of the solar calendar are outlined by the Angel of the Countenance, speaking to Moses in Jubilees:

And all of the weeks which will be commanded will be fifty-two weeks of days, and all of them are a complete year. Thus it is engraved and ordained on the heavenly tablets.... And you, command the children of Israel so that they shall guard the years in this number, three hundred and sixty-four days, and it will be a complete year. And no one shall corrupt its (appointed) time from its days or from its feasts.

This system was based on a solar calendar of 364 days, consisting of fifty-two weeks, whose sabbaths were counted in a fixed annual cycle, divided symmetrically among the four annual seasons, and on a prescribed mathematical calculation of the progress of the solar year: twelve thirty-day months, with four further days added to differentiate the four annual seasons. These 364 days were divided into four quarters, or seasons, each of thirteen weeks, which together constituted a year of fifty-two sabbaths.

The principles of the beautiful, harmonic, mathematical calculation underlying the solar year, which according to priestly tradition derived from a divine origin, are enunciated in detail in 1 Enoch 72: 32, 74: 10-12; 75:2; 82: 6; 2 Enoch 13-17, 41-8; Jubilees 6: 23-38; 4QMMT A II-III; Psalms Scroll IIQPs<sup>o</sup> XXVII, 2-I I; mention of these principles may also be found in the Temple Scroll, the Damascus Document, the Scroll of Priestly Courses, and the Songs of the Sabbath Sacrifice. The solar year began on the day on which the heavenly luminaries were created Wednesday—and was divided into consecutive quarters of fixed structure: ninety-one days divided into thirteen weeks; the sabbaths fell on fixed dates—the same ones in each quarter; the days on which the first days of months and the festivals fell were also known in advance—always falling on the same day of the week, the festivals on the same day of the month and in the same position within the quarter. No festival could ever fall on a sabbath, and neither could the first day of any month; the solar calendar could be used to determine the cycles of service of the twenty-four priestly courses, in sevenfold cycles of sabbatical years and jubilees.

This calendar, 'ordained and written in the heavenly tablets' and imprinted in the cyclic laws of nature, divided into seasons and signs of the zodiac based on an underlying fourfold, annual principle, reflects the divine pattern of time—the seven days of Creation and the various sevenfold divisions derived therefrom—as well as the harmonic principle linking cosmic divine time, as revealed in nature, and cultic time, as entrusted to human beings.

The sevenfold solar year, measuring time on the basis of a sacred principle amalgamating the cosmic, astronomical order and the ritual and liturgical order, was first learned from its guardians, the angels in heaven, who taught it to men in the time of Enoch, the seventh patriarch of the world, who in turn taught it to his descendants the priests Methuselah, Lamech, and Noah, as we read in the books of Enoch. It was later learned in Moses' day too, for he learned it on Mount Sinai on the roth of the third month, after being given the Torah on the 15th, from the Angel of the Countenance. Qumran literature also refers in this way to the high Priest, of whom it was said, May you be like an Angel of the Countenance in the Abode of Holiness, to the glory of God before you . . . Moses then imparted what he had heard from the angel to his brother, Aaron the priest, who became the cultic guardian of that information, as we read in Jubilees. From then on the solar calendar of sabbaths and festivals, seasons and jubilees, was in the keeping of the witnesses to the Covenant, angels and priests--the ministering angels known as the 'priests of the inner sanctum' and the Zadokite priests serving in the sanctuary.

Subsequently, the order of sabbaths and festivals was observed by the twenty-four priestly courses in Solomon's Temple, until the time of the Second Temple. The fifty-two weeks of the solar year were named in a multi-annual cyclic order after the twenty-four priestly courses and correlated with the fifty-two 'fathers of the Community', as noted in the War Scrolls.

That there was a cultic link between the solar calendar and the high priesthood of First Temple times follows from the fact that the guardians of the Qumranic liturgical tradition of the Temple associated the psalms of David, which they believed to have been revealed to the seventh son of Jesse, a fourteenth-generation descendant of Abraham,<sup>52</sup> in a prophetic vision, on the one hand, and the sequence of sabbaths and festivals as recorded in the sacrificial order of Temple service according to the solar calendar, which was of divine origin:

David son of Jesse was wise and brilliant like the light of the sun; (he was) a scribe, intelligent and perfect in all his ways before God and men.

And YHWH gave him an intelligent and brilliant spirit, and he wrote 3,600 psalms and 364 songs to sing before the altar for the daily perpetual sacrifice, for all the days of the year; and 42 songs for the Sabbath offerings; and 30 songs for the offerings for the beginnings of months, for all the festivals and for the Day of Atonement.

In all, the songs which he uttered were 446, and 4 songs to make music on the intercalary days. In all, they were 4,050.

All these he uttered through prophecy which was given him from before the Most High.

The calendar alluded to in this passage—the earliest source ascribing the composition of the book of Psalms to David—refers to a year of 364 days on which the songs accompanying the daily sacrifice were recited; to fifty-two weeks on which the sabbath sacrifice was offered; and to thirty songs sung on the thirty days on which an additional sacrifice was offered: that is, the twelve first days of months and the seven Temple festivals celebrated between the first and seventh months—all the festivals listed in Leviticus 23, on which sacrifices were offered to God, which amount to eighteen days (Passover—1, the Festival of Unleavened Bread-7; the Omer-1; the Festival of Weeks (Shavuot)-1; the Day of Atonement (Yom Kippur)—1; and the Festival of Ingathering-7). Special songs were composed for these eighteen days. Four further songs were added, for the days at the junctures of the four seasons; these days were known as 'meeting (day)s' (Heb. peguim: see Gen. 32: 2). As stated, the calendar was divided into fifty-two sabbaths designating fifty-two weeks, each of seven days, amounting all in all to the 364 days of the solar year.

The 4,050 psalms and songs that David composed were divided into three groups:  $4,030 = 3,600 + 446 + 4$ , representing a ritual and liturgical calendar 3,600 psalms, that is, ten times the number 360 of days in the solar year ( $4 \times \text{no} = 360 = 12 \times 30$ ), on each of which ten psalms were recited; 446 songs for the cumulative total of days on which sacrifices were offered: 364 days of the 'perpetual' daily sacrifice, fifty-two days of the sabbath sacrifice, and thirty days (the festivals and the first days of months) on which an additional sacrifice was offered ( $364 + 52 + 30 = 446$ ); and, finally, the four 'meeting' songs for the days between each two of the four seasons. On the basis of this calendar, the Temple year was divided into four ritual and liturgical quarters, each with the same number of days, sabbaths, and months; accordingly, this rich poetic opus was also divided into four. Thus we find at Qumran thirteen Songs of the Sabbath Sacrifice, which were probably recited four times a year, on the fifty-two sabbaths. Most probably, the book of Psalms, both the familiar traditional text and the recensions found at Qumran, contained songs and hymns representing a fourfold division of the poems and songs to accompany the various sacrifices offered on weekdays, sabbaths, and festivals, and of the poems accompanying the cyclic sequence of the Temple service, which as we have observed was correlated with the cosmic order of the seasonal cycle.

The basic idea of the calendar of fifty-two sabbaths was to consecrate the pattern of time beginning with the seven days of Creation, extending in sevenfold cyclic symmetry over the whole year. In addition, the annual cycle of sabbaths and weeks was synchronized with the fourfold cycle of the year, by dividing it into four symmetric periods of thirteen sabbaths each, co-ordinated with the cycle of thirteen Songs of the Sabbath Sacrifice ( $9: 13 = 7; 52 \times 7 = 4 \times 91 = 364$ ). Special importance attached to the seventh (middle) sabbath in each of the thirteen-sabbath cycles, which always fell on the 16th of the month in the second, fifth, eighth, and eleventh months of the year and was the midpoint of the division of the whole ninety-one-day season.

The division into sabbaths was the basis for the division of twenty-four priestly courses, which served in the Temple twice a year in six-year cycles: each of the twenty-four courses served thirteen times in six years. As seen above, the division into thirteen sabbaths per quarter and thirteen cycles of service of the twenty-four priestly courses was a consequence of the fact that there were thirteen twenty eight-day cycles in a solar year [ $13 \times 28 = 364$ ], corresponding to thirteen lunar cycles—but also to thirteen cycles of fertility each year in a woman's body, as will be seen below. The product of the numbers 4 [annual cyclic seasons/quarters/ annual liturgical and ritual units] and 7 [days of the week/seventh day/weekly liturgical and ritual units] is 28, which is counted 13 times [cycle/period = monthly cycle/lunar cycle/new moon] in the solar year of 364 days.

The priestly Temple calendar of the solar year, embodying the assumption that cosmic order was revealed through harmony as expressed in number, counting, and cycle, was associated with the mythological tradition of Enoch son of Jared, the seventh patriarch of the world;<sup>55</sup> with the perception of the sabbath as symbolizing the sanctity invested in the universe since the week of Creation and forming a link between the seventh day and the oath, 'a covenant for all time; it shall be a sign for all time';<sup>5s</sup> with the seven days of ordination at the start of the year, beginning with the fourth day, on which the heavenly luminaries were created; and with Shavuot, the Festival of Weeks/Oaths, celebrated seven sabbaths after the elevation of the Omer. The continuous calculations of the solar calendar revolved around a sevenfold axis, associated with the fifty-two sabbaths of the year, on which the sabbath sacrifice was offered; with the seven Temple festivals—which, together with the fifty-two sabbaths, make up a total of seventy days of complete cessation of labour; and with festivals celebrating the first harvests of wine and olive oil and the Wood-Offering, all of which revolved around a Pentecostal axis, each festival being celebrated on the fiftieth day, after seven sabbaths, that is, after seven complete weeks ( $7 \times 7 + 1 = 50$ ).

The agricultural sacral year extended over the period elapsing from the elevation of the Omer to the Festival of Ingathering—seven months, from the first month (Nisan) to the seventh (Tishrei); or from the Festival of Unleavened Bread, which fell on the 15th of the first month and was celebrated for seven days (from the 15th to the 21st), to the Festival of Booths (Sukkot), which coincided with the seven days of the Festival of Ingathering in the middle of the seventh month. The festivals thus began in the middle of the first month with a seven-day festival and ended in the middle of the seventh month with another seven-day festival; they were celebrated at intervals of seven sabbaths (seven complete weeks), as described in the Temple Scroll and in MMT. Seven weeks elapsed from the elevation of the Omer (the sheaf of the wave-offering—the first produce of barley) on Sunday, the 26th of the first month (Nisan), to Shavuot (marking the first wheat harvest) on Sunday, the 15th of the third month (Sivan). Another seven weeks separated the 15th of the third month from the first harvest of wine on Sunday, the 3rd of the fifth month (Av). Still another seven weeks elapsed until the first harvest of olive oil on Sunday, the 22nd of the sixth month (Elul), and the next day—Monday - was the time of the Wood-Offering, which began on the 23rd of the month and lasted six days. In other words, the Festival of the First Olive Oil and the Wood-offering were consecutive, forming a seven-day festival, seven full weeks after the Festival of the First Wine. The ritual year ended with the seven days of the Festival of Ingathering, halfway through the seventh month.

All these elements formed a link between two manifestations of sacred time. One was the permanent recurrence of the four seasons and the cycles of the agricultural year, whose first produce, of 'seven species' (barley, wheat, olive oil, wine, and the ingathering of fruit, completed by the addition of the Wood-Offering), was brought to the Temple at seven-week intervals, during the first seven months of the year. The other manifestation was the ritual determinism of the preordained calendar, based on a divine sevenfold pattern of sacred heavenly time; this time, given the status of an oath and a 'covenant for all time', was measured in sabbaths and weeks in cycles of four seasons, representing the continuity of the cosmic order, but also in terms of times of first yields, weekly divisions, and seven days of ordination, representing the parallel cultic order.

The cosmic clock of nature as measured in the solar calendar, with time demarcated in multiples of 4, 13, and 7 ( $4 \times 7 \times 13 = 364$ )—each sabbath being the seventh day, thirteen sabbaths in each ritual quarter of the liturgical cycle, i.e. in each of the four seasons—also governed another set of thirteen: any woman's thirteen fertile periods, once every four weeks, in the 364-day year ( $364 = 4 \times 7 \times 13$ ). These calculations were all based on the idea of an all-embracing divine presence, beyond the limits of human apprehension but manifested in a permanent, cyclic, numerical harmony—a harmony based on data not subject to erratic human observation. In other words, the priestly calculations were supposed to evoke an abstract, harmonic, cosmic order, revealed in cyclic relations and recurrences of numbers; whereas the calculations of the rival lunar calendar were founded on erroneous sensory data, dependent on the limits of human visualization.

All this seven-based counting, as we have seen, was associated on the one hand with sabbaths, festivals, and agricultural fertility as laid down in a permanent solar calendar. It represented divine, mathematical time flowing at a fixed rate, without regard for human comprehension, as reflected in the creative process of nature or the rhythm of fertility of Creation and Covenant, of nature and the seasons. On the other hand, every woman has a variable, personal calendar of weeks, which also involves counting in sevens. This personal calendar reflects the rhythm of human procreation—the cycle of fertility/infertility which a woman experiences every four weeks, which guarantees the fertile period following the seven days of purification and hence the very possibility of conception, birth, growth, and life. The synchronization achieved by such seven-based counting ensured fulfilment of the Covenant of continued life and procreation which, like nature itself, depended on a fixed number of cycles. As if to confirm this link between seven-based counting and procreation, only two commandments in the Bible are referred to as a 'covenant': the sabbath, which is called an 'everlasting covenant', observed once every seven days and delineating the basic unit of the cosmic ritual order—the week; and circumcision, also called an 'everlasting covenant', observed seven days after the birth of a son—the result of conception, which, too, occurs after the observance of seven days in the mother's personal calendar of purification, also measured in weeks. The two commandments involving the number seven, one termed 'a sign for all time' and the other an 'everlasting covenant', are associated with an eternal covenant between God and his people: for the sabbath, seven days are counted repeatedly, throughout the annual cycle of agricultural fertility; and for the seven days of purification, seven days are counted repeatedly throughout a woman's personal cycle of fertility.

The rhythm of feminine fertility is associated with the cycle of the moon with its phases; indeed, the Hebrew word for the waxing of the moon, ibur, also means 'conception'; while the Hebrew word for the appearance of the new moon, molad, is of the same root (w-l-d) as the word ledah, 'birth', and its cognates; similarly, the words that refer to a woman's monthly cycle may also be applied to the lunar phases. Both cycles are associated with the passage of four weeks. A menstruating woman is forbidden to her husband until seven 'clean' days (i.e. days on which no blood whatsoever has been seen) have elapsed, and only then—when the probability of conception is highest—may cohabitation occur. The ritual calendar was concerned with the Temple and the Holy of Holies; with sabbaths, festivals, and sacrifices; with purity and impurity; with sabbatical years and jubilees. The personal calendar was associated with sanctification, betrothal, isolation (when a woman is menstruating or otherwise 'unclean'), purification, and cohabitation. Both calendars, as we have seen, were marked off in sevens; both guaranteed continued fertility, the eternal continuity of life as dependent on a sevenfold rhythm; and both involved counting and number, oath and covenant, testimony and set times, holiness and sanctification, unification and separation, the eternity of Creation. On the one hand, the year is divided into weeks, which delineate the cycle of fertility and agricultural yields, as well as the phases of the moon; on the other, the seven days of purification guarantee the maximum probability of conception, birth, and the continuation of life.

It is not insignificant that the sanctity and purity which condition manifestations of life and fertility are bound up with numbers and cycles, while impurity and death have no numerical or other measure. Very probably, the sacred creatures/ cherubim, which various traditions portray as if their bodies were 'intertwined with one another', possibly alluding to sexual intimacy (see below), were originally a cultic representation of the secret of life and cycles of fertility. There is thus an affinity between the sanctity of the Temple, ceremonially expressed through interlocking septuples of time, place, and ritual in the Holy of Holies (kodesh kodashim) and symbolizing the link between the revealed and the concealed, and kidushin, 'sanctification', the Hebrew term for betrothal and conjugal union -a personal covenant whose purpose is to perpetuate life, also associated with ceremony and number, with cycle and counting, with sanctity and purity. Both the sanctity of the Temple and betrothal connect with the number seven, with oaths, with 'a covenant for all time', with blessing and fertility and the cycle of life.

The relationship between the divinely preordained, eternal, cosmic pattern of sacred time and the solar calendar representing it, on the one hand, and the tradition of covenants, sacrifices, and agricultural sacral festivals of sacred space and time, on the other, is described in Jubilees and the Temple Scroll. It is a deterministic relationship, linking the eternity of the natural cycles with the eternity of the Deity; it posits a permanent, cyclic, sevenfold pattern of divine time, which governs both seasonal changes and agricultural yields, and the ritual of the priestly courses in the Temple, through the latter's dependence on the solar calendar. The cosmic time concept, reflecting a divine reality beyond the apprehension of human observation and based on a permanent, cyclic, mathematical calculation, was quantified by the endless recurrence of the calendar from beginning to end, demarcated in sevens and multiples of seven, in fourfold cycles of thirteen.

This numerical conception, rooted in the symmetric, cyclic recurrence of four seasons, but also associated with the cycles of continued life and reproduction in nature, celebrating the first fruits and other agricultural produce at seven-week intervals, supplanted the conception of human, variable time underlying the lunar calendar. Human time was based on the estimated sighting of the new moon—an act of human observation and discretion—and on historical and national vicissitudes, rather than on cosmic, cyclic events. This human element led the secessionist priesthood, as we shall see, to reject the cult based on the lunar calendar, as well as the familiar, historical reasons for the festivals. They abhorred a conception of time based on human sovereignty, relying on variable counting and thereby on humanly observable data, which were inherently changeable and subordinate to variable human needs. Instead, they advocated a cosmic conception of time, based on permanent numerical calculation and thereby rooted in a comprehensive, eternal, abstract, divine reality, beyond the reach of the senses and of human observation, but measured in the permanent numerical proportions of the elements of the solar calendar.

Thus, the seven-based solar calendar, fixed and stable since antiquity, was symmetrically, harmonically, and cyclically structured it was limed on synchronization of the four seasons with sevenfold cycles of sabbaths and festivals—all dependent on calculations reflecting a world whose laws and order were open to systematic discovery and expression. The keepers of sabbaths and festivals according to this calendar saw themselves as initiates privy to wondrous mysteries, or to a divine revelation that explicated the secrets of time. In their own eyes, they were the guardians of divine times and festivals, celebrating covenants and cycles of agricultural produce, testifying to the annual seasons and the sabbaths of the year; their task was to preserve the secret pattern of the order of divine time, with its implications for agricultural plenty and the continuity of life:

But with the remnant which held fast to the commandments of God He made His Covenant with Israel for ever, revealing to them the hidden things in which all Israel had gone astray. He unfolded before them His holy Sabbaths and His glorious feasts, the testimonies of His righteousness and the ways of His truth, and the desires of His will which a man must do in order to live.

The unstable ritual year governing the sacred service in the Second Temple period—based on the false, variable, lunar year with its unreliable concept of time dependent on human observation, estimation, and discretion; a year in which the first days of months and festivals wandered from one day of the week to another—was condemned by the seceding priests as a sinful, blasphemous violation of the Covenant. The practices of the then officiating Temple priests were seen as impure and defiled: they had rejected the cyclic, cosmic, harmonic 'clock' of nature, measured by mathematical calculation, of the solar calendar, and the seasons counted in sevens ('mysteries of marvels'), in favour of an arbitrary 'clock', based on observation of the appearance of the new moon, which had nothing to do with the preordained and precalculated cyclic, symmetric, permanent, regular order of things. This condemnation is clearly implied by the highly polemical tone of Jubilees, MMT, the Damascus Document, the pesharim, the Rule Scroll, and the Temple Scroll.

As against the defiled Temple, distorted calendar, and sinful priesthood, which had arbitrarily caused this chaotic dislocation of the sacred service, defiled the Temple, and disturbed the synchronization of the set times of fertility and those of the Temple—as described in considerable detail in Qumran literature, both in terms of myth and vision and in terms of law and precept—the priestly authors envisioned a horizontal, seven-based pattern of divine time, reflecting a perfect, harmonic, world order and dictating a fixed, preordained continuum of appointed times, covenants, and oaths, as laid down in the solar calendar with its four seasons and twelve months of equal length. But their vision also included a vertical seven-based pattern of sacred, heavenly space, linked with the four cardinal directions that engender the universe and its fourfold and twelfold divisions, in accordance with the tradition of the four-faced Merkavah and the diverse spatial elements associated with it: cherubim and sacred creatures, the Garden of Eden and Paradise, peruyim and apiryon (both words from a Hebrew root with the connotation of 'fertility'), the 'eternal plantation', 'sacred plantation', and 'plantation of righteousness'; and the seven-based sanctuary, the 'seven holy precincts', the seven Heikhalot, and the twelve diagonal boundaries. The third overarching component of the secessionist priesthood's vision was the ritual seven-based pattern of the angelic service and sacred song, also associated with the Merkavah tradition, with the sacred service and the Songs of the Sabbath Sacrifice sung by seven angelic priesthoods, with the 'seven words of wondrous exaltations' sung every seven days, in accordance with the weeks of the solar calendar, in the seven supernal sanctuaries.

Alongside the seven-based pattern, there was also a fourfold/twelfold pattern: the four archangels Uriel, Raphael, Gabriel, and Michael; the four faces of the sacred creatures; the twelve heavenly gates, the twelve months and signs of the zodiac; the twelve tribes; the twelve gates of the Temple; the twelve stones of the breastplate; the twelve leaders of the Community; the twelve diagonal boundaries dividing the space of the universe into twenty-four parts, correlated with the twenty-four priestly courses; and so on. This ritual and chronotopic unity bound together sacred time and sacred space in a ritual continuum; it thus amalgamated the concepts of cosmic and earthly time, space, and ritual, around one single sacred prototype, all of whose components were interdependent and interlocked.

These priestly circles expressed profound identification with the angels—guardians of the covenants and the oaths, the sabbaths, the weeks, and the festivals, as engraved on the heavenly tablets; guardians of the gates and entrances representing the days, months, and seasons of the year. They described priestly and angelic liturgical ceremonies, organized in a sevenfold order according to the eternal, sacred solar calendar; they envisaged a community of angelic priests in the world of the Merkavah and in the 'sanctuary of man' (Songs of the Sabbath Sacrifice, Florilegium). In place of the arbitrary, sinful, chaotic, and distorting ritual of the human priests, which divorced time from space, disturbed ritual cosmic synchronization, defiled the Temple, and endangered the cycles of life and fertility, they envisaged a heavenly cult of angelic priests, a sacred ritual archetype, organized in an eternal, harmonic, seven-based pattern, in which the days of the year defined an orderly, symmetrical continuum in sacred space. This rite, with its cyclic, mathematical patterns delineated by the sabbaths and the festivals, rooted in divine paths of righteousness, observed in purity and sanctity by the priestly courses simultaneously with their angelic counterparts, was designed to uphold the Covenant, the blessing, the eternity of life and fertility for the guardians of the covenants and the festivals, of sanctity and purity.

In the various Merkavah traditions and the writings of the Community (or, as already noted, the yahad, implying the simultaneity of heavenly and earthly worship), priests and angels were witnesses to sacred time, observing sabbaths and festivals together in accordance with the solar calendar; together, in the supernal worlds and the visionary Temple, at seven-day intervals, they chanted the 'seven wondrous songs' and 'seven psalms of magnification'—the Songs of the Sabbath Sacrifice. So priests and angels together, observing the holy appointed times in their preordained, cyclic, divine order, uttered words of praise and thanks, recited blessings and divine names, pronounced the Ineffable Name with its benedictions as done in the Temple—all in regular sevenfold formulations. The tradition of the priestly courses, succeeding one another at weekly intervals in a prescribed order, was scrupulously adhered to—it had been instituted by Zadok the priest during King David's reign, and numerous lists of such courses have been discovered at Qumran, attesting to the observance there of the calendar of sabbaths and festivals and their regular liturgical order. In parallel, the names of the angelic courses, divided into seven or twenty-four, were carefully preserved, as indicated by Josephus' reference in his account of the Essenes: 'They swear ... to preserve the books of their sect and in the same way the names of the angels', the chief priests on earth regularly chanted, in the prescribed order, the thirteen Songs of the Sabbath Sacrifice, each sung on one of the thirteen sabbaths of the recurring season, together with the heavenly 'priests of the inner sanctum'. Such formulas as

Give thanks to God

Bless His Holy Name always

In the Heavens and their dominion All the angels of the holy firmament.

or

All the spirits of those who bring to the sanctuary

In their companies and in their dominions

All bless in community Your holy name.

may be found in a variety of versions, clearly demonstrating the participation of angels in the ritual and the interaction between heavenly and earthly worship. The holy names of the Deity are recited by angels and priests, just as the blessings, praises, and thanksgiving for the favour of Creation are uttered by those performing their sacral duties in both upper and lower worlds.

Angelic revelations, inscribed on heavenly tablets or imparted in dreams or mystical visions, recorded in holy books of divine origin, constitute the primary fount of religious validity and authority in this literature. They relate to the consecration of the priesthood, its affinity with the angelic world, the participation of angels in the cult, and the establishment of liturgical formulas recited jointly by the earthly guardians of the Covenant and their heavenly counterparts. All this revolves around the solar calendar, which sanctifies heavenly time in the Heikhalot, the supernal sanctuaries.

The alternatives proposed by the proponents of the secessionist priestly rite in these three areas—sacred time, sacred place, and sacred ritual, intertwined in a complex system of mutual relationships—were closely associated with the seven days of Creation, so that seven became a sacred typological number, an archetypal numerical model of divine origin governing time, place, and ritual. The priestly opposition venerated the number seven with all its derivatives and multiples, its mythical and mystical manifestations. It became a distinctive, identifying label, a sacred typological number pervading the universe and dictating the cultic rhythm of life, an eternal, ritual and liturgical axis combining septuples of time, of place, and of sacred ritual, and interchanging them in mystical metamorphoses. The number seven—dictating the span of time needed for the transition from chaos to Creation, from impurity to purity, and from death to life, associated, linguistically and conceptually, with oath, week, sabbath, the calendar, and the priestly courses—thus assumed a transcendental, cosmic, cultic significance, bridging the gap between the heavenly and the earthly through sacred sevenfold formulas.

The liturgical axis engendered mystical metamorphoses that unified cosmic, heavenly, angelic time and earthly, cultic, priestly time—both measured in multiples of seven: sabbaths and weeks; the seven Temple festivals, seven weeks apart; seasons, sabbatical years, jubilees—with cosmic space as manifested in seven sacred precincts, seven merkavot, seven devirim, and seven heikhaloi. All these components were reflected in the angelic priestly ritual observed in the 'sanctuary of man' by the 'seven chief princes' and the priestly courses, and in the supernal sanctuaries by the seven 'priests of the inner sanctum' and the angelic courses. The sacred service was performed by the priestly courses, succeeding one another at weekly intervals, thus observing the order of sabbaths. Among its main elements were the oaths of the guardians of the Covenant and the sacred song, sung every sabbath by septuples of angels and priests. These metamorphoses, which will be discussed below, created a link between the Chariot Throne of the cherubim in the ruined earthly Temple and its heavenly memorialization, Ezekiel's Merkavah, on the one hand, and Shavuot, the festival of the Covenant of fertility and first fruits, of Temple pilgrimage, celebrated in heaven by the angels and on earth by the priests, on the other. A mutual relationship, or interaction, was thus established between angelic worship in the heavenly sanctuaries and worship by priests and Levites singing in the earthly Temple, beyond the limits of time and space.

These seven-based traditions, consecrating cosmic time and place and their terrestrial representations, revolved around several elements: the focus of that sanctity was the Merkavah, the Chariot Throne of cherubim that had stood in the devir or Holy of Holies since the time of the desert sanctuary and the time of Solomon's Temple, and whose memory was perpetuated in various priestly traditions. The solar calendar hallowed by Merkavah traditions had probably been observed as a cultic and liturgical calendar by the Zadokite priests, who had officiated as high priests from the time of the First Temple until the middle of the Second Temple period. It was certainly regarded as the definitive ritual calendar by the priestly opposition circles of the Second Temple period and the Qumran priests, who identified themselves with the Zadokite priests; and it was the exclusive basis for the heavenly worship of the ministering angels, the priests of the inner sanctum, and chief princes as described in Songs of the Sabbath Sacrifice and in Enoch literature.

The circles among whom proto-Qumran and Qumran literature was composed, edited, preserved, and ultimately canonized proposed to replace the Temple cult of their time with three central priestly mystical traditions:

1. The Merkavah / Chariot Throne of the cherubim in the devir/ Holy of Holies of the desert sanctuary and of Solomon's Temple, built according to a heavenly prototype, and Ezekiel's Merkavah in its visionary transformation, as prototypes of sacred heavenly space;
2. The calendar of sabbaths—the solar calendar, as revealed in the tradition of Enoch, Jubilees, the Qumranic Psalms of David, and Songs of the Sabbath Sacrifice and preserved in the Temple Scroll, the Calendars of Priestly Courses, and MMT, as the prototype of sacred heavenly time; and
3. The angelic priesthood and the worship by the creatures of the Merkavah, described in the Songs of the Sabbath Sacrifice and the Blessings Scroll, as the prototype of the sacred heavenly ritual.

These three traditions of sacred time, place, and ritual were associated with the tradition of covenants, Shavuot, and the overarching predominance of the number seven, with regard both to numbers reflecting the laws and eternal order of the universe, which are open to systematic discovery and expression, and to abstract ideas concerning the mystery of life and blessing of fertility and procreation, reflecting divine law with its concrete manifestations and its cultic representation. The eternity of the divine order with its mysteries, referred to in the secessionist Priestly literature as 'wondrous mysteries' or similar expressions, and with its complex manifestations in terms of calculation and number, everlasting ages, seasons, and appointed times, is described in the Thanksgiving hymns:

All things are graven before Thee on a written Reminder for everlasting ages, and for the numbered cycles of the eternal years in all their appointed times....

I shall now examine each of these three traditions and the seven-based metamorphoses associated with them, in connection with Chariot Throne and Temple, calendar and Covenant, priests and angels.

Angelic Opposition to the Ascension of Moses and the Revelation of the Law (1971) The Jewish Quarterly Review

New Series, Vol. 61, No. 4 (Apr., 1971), pp. 282-307

The presence of Angels at the Revelation of the Law on Mount Sinai is an old Jewish tradition evidently based upon the verse in Deut. 33:2 which begins "The Lord came from Sinai; He shone upon them from Seir; He appeared from Mount Paran", and goes on to say (what may be literally translated as) "He came from myriads of holiness (kodesh), At His right a fire of law unto them". Apparently, Jewish tradition, Palestinian and Hellenistic, takes the last part of the verse as referring to the presence of angels.

Thus the two Aramaic versions of Scripture, Onkelos and the Palestinian Targum, introduce angels into this verse. Onkelos takes the words "myriads of holiness" to mean "myriads of holy ones" which quite evidently means angels. More clearly, the Palestinian Targum renders the same words "myriads of holiness" as "myriads of holy angels". The last part of the verse is rendered in the Septuagint as: "With myriads from Kades, His angels with Him on His right". According to the Book of Jubilees, the Angel of God's Presence dictated to Moses a portion of the Law from the heavenly tablets. Philo, commenting on the verse, "Speak thou to us, and let not God speak to us, lest we die" states that though Israel asked for angelic mediation at Sinai, God Himself addressed the people directly. Josephus puts into the mouth of Herod the statement that "we have learned the noblest of our doctrines and the holiest of our laws from the messengers sent by God". The Biblical Antiquities of Philo also describes an angelic presence at Sinai. Similarly, Marqa the Samaritan, in his commentary on the Pentateuch which is dated some time between the second and fourth century, portrays numerous angels in attendance as Moses receives the Law.

In the Talmud too, the words "myriads of holiness" are taken to mean angels. Thus R. Akiba is said to have taken the word v'atah, "and he came", which precedes the words "from myriads of holiness", to be composed of two words (v'ot hu) and he interpreted the entire expression to mean, and He is the ensign among His myriads (of ministering angels).

Other rabbinic passages describing the theophany at Sinai describe the angels as active participants. Commenting on the verse "The chariots of God are myriads even thousands upon thousands, the Lord is among them, as in Sinai, in holiness", the rabbis state that myriads of angels accompanied God to the site of revelation. As God uttered each commandment, the angels carried it to the people and kissed each individual who accepted it. In the New Testament we find the statement that the Law was ordained by angels which would seem to mean that angels were the authors of the Law. Although the Church Fathers and the Gnostics took these passages literally, it is quite possible that Paul took them in the same sense as the Talmud, namely, that angels participated as mediators between God and the people at the revelation.

In contrast to these sources, the medieval commentator Nahmanides, without knowing of Philo nevertheless follows him in rejecting the idea of angelic mediation. In his commentary to Deut. 33:2 he states: "Not from the hand of the angels (was the Law given) only from the right (hand) of the Almighty Himself in all His glory". Other medieval commentators, such as Rashi and Ibn Ezra, though not specifying the role of the angels at the revelation, still take the words "myriads of holiness" as referring to an angelic presence.

In addition to this tradition of the presence of angels at the theophany on Mount Sinai, there is another tradition that prior to the revelation, at which the angels were present, there was opposition on their part to the ascension of Moses and the revelation of the Law to him because they felt it should be given to angels and not to men. The best known account of the angel's opposition to Moses' ascent and the giving of the Law is that ascribed to R. Joshua b. Levi in the Talmud. If this ascription is correct, the legend can be dated in the first half of the third century. According to this version of the legend when the angels became aware of Moses' ascent they said to God: "What does he who is born of woman here?" When they are informed that Moses has come for the Law, they implore God: "Dost Thou seek to give to flesh and blood a hidden treasure that was hidden with Thee 974 generations before the world was created? 'What is man that Thou art mindful of him? And the son of man that Thou thinkest of him? Oh Lord our God how glorious is Thy name in all the earth! Whose majesty is rehearsed above the heavens." God asks Moses to refute this argument but Moses expresses the fear that the angels will consume him with their fiery breath. God then bids him to hold on to the heavenly throne. R. Tanh'um adds that God spread some of the radiance of His Shekinah over Moses. Secured by Divine protection, Moses points out that the angels by their very nature cannot come within the purview of such requirements as would be imposed by several of the Ten Commandments. Do the angels work or engage in commerce that they require the commandment ordaining Sabbath rest? Do the angels have father and mother that they require a commandment to honor parents? Are the angels racked by jealousy and the evil impulse that they require commandments prohibiting theft, murder, adultery and covetousness?

The angels yield to Moses' logic, become his friends and bestow gifts upon him as he descends with the Law. Even the Angel of Death gives Moses a gift with which to stop the plague described in Numbers 17:12. In an anonymous version in a midrash we are told that when Moses was about to ascend to heaven a cloud appeared. He did not know whether to ride on it or grasp it until the cloud opened. He entered and was borne aloft. Then follows an account of how the angels sought to impede Moses' progress and how he successfully overcame their opposition.

On reaching the Divine Presence, he was attacked by a band of destroying angels surrounding the Throne of Glory. These angels tried to slay Moses with their fiery breath but the Almighty intervened. The story then continues as in the Talmud where Moses cites the first, second, fifth and tenth commandments in refutation of the angels and they bestow gifts upon him.

There is a third version of the legend attributed to R. Judah the Prince, which A. Marmorstein emends to R. Aha, thus dating it in the fourth century. In this version God Himself refutes the angels but instead of citing some of the Ten Commandments, He cites the laws of impurity relating to death, leprosy, menstruation and forbidden foods as examples of things which are applicable to humans but not to angels. Finally, in a late compilation we get a combination of versions one and three. Moses cites the fifth commandment as well as the laws of impurity. This source also describes the angels as giving Moses presents consisting of letters and tablets for healing disease.

In examining the various versions of the legend we find that the angels object not only to Moses receiving the Law but also to his ascent to heaven. "What does he who was born of woman here?" they protest. The expression ylud 'ishah is found in the book of Job where it describes the bleak and degraded condition of man. In rabbinic and post-rabbinic literature this utterance in the mouth of an angel is a designation of contempt for man and the context of several of the sources where the phrase occurs is that of a heavenly ascent. In the Ascension of Isaiah, the angels protest Isaiah's ascent in somewhat different words: "How far will he ascend that dwelleth in the flesh?"

In our tale and in cognate accounts of the heavenly ascent, the enmity of the angels for the ascending hero is expressed physically as well as verbally. The second version of our legend describes how the angels seek to prevent Moses' ascent by destroying him with their fiery breath. This physical danger facing Moses is alluded to in the late source Gedullat Mosheh, where Metatron, on receiving the divine command to bring Moses to heaven, states that the Lawgiver cannot come up and see the angels for they are of fire and he is but flesh and blood. A more explicit reference to the bodily attack of hostile angels is found in the Talmudic account of Rabbi Akiba's ascent. This motif is also contained in the Apocalypse of Abraham where Abraham is warned to keep away from the celestial heights lest he be destroyed.

However, the Ethiopic and Slavonic Books of Enoch, 3 Enoch and the Ascension of Isaiah also describe the heavenly ascent as taking place under the guidance of angels. Thus there appears to be two lines of thematic development, one in which the angels serve as guides for the ascending hero, the other in which they protest or try to prevent his ascent. Our legend falls in the latter category.

What is the background of the angelic opposition to the heavenly ascent and to the revelation of the Law? G. Scholem has demonstrated that this theme is a Jewish variation of a Gnostic myth of the second and third centuries which describes how the evil planets seek to prevent the ascent of the soul and its descent with the powers of light. A. Altmann has suggested that this myth is also the background of the angels opposition to the giving of the Law-the Law being the Jewish counterpart of the powers of light. Since our legend dates from this period, it seems that its two dominant features, angelic opposition to the ascent of Moses and angelic opposition to the revelation of the Law reflect a Jewish adaptation of the Gnostic theme. Of the two salient motifs, it is the heavenly ascent which provides the clue to a number of sub-motifs in the legend. According to the Talmud, the fear which overcame Moses on his ascent to heaven and in his encounter with the angels was mitigated by his grasping the Throne of Glory. Now the image of the heavenly throne as part of the context of a heavenly ascent and a revelation occurs in a number of sources but with a significant difference.

Ezekiel, the Hellenistic Jewish poet of the second century B.C.E. in his play the Exodus, portrays God as beckoning to Moses to sit on the heavenly throne. The Almighty then gives the Lawgiver His diadem and sceptre. Similarly, Marqa the Samaritan, in his commentary on the Pentateuch which is dated some time between the second and fourth century, describes the enthronement of Moses on his ascent to receive the Law. In a painting above the Dura synagogue, dating from the middle of the third century, there is depicted a throne with figures surrounding it. Goodenough suggests that the figure on the throne is Moses and he interprets the painting in the context of Jewish mystical literature dealing with the heavenly throne. An example of this literature is 3 Enoch where God provides Metatron with a throne just like the Throne of Glory.

Additional indication of the widespread use of the enthronement motif comes from the Mithraeum of Dura-Europas where there is a painting showing the two alleged founders of the Mithraic mysteries who are bearers of revelation- Ostanes and Hystaspes. Both are depicted sitting in a chair holding in one hand a book and in the other a black staff. The Talmudic legend apparently did not adopt this representation outright, possibly because it could not accept the idea that Moses should be seated on the Throne of Glory. Instead of sitting on God's throne Moses grasps it in order to gain temporary protection from the angels.

It should be pointed out that the image of enthronement on the ascension to heaven is not absent from rabbinic literature. The righteous sit on heavenly thrones but only after the resurrection. The postponement of enthronement until after death is also a feature of the Mandaean narrative concerning the ascent and descent of Denanuxt. Din-Mlikh shows hero the thrones which are prepared for unborn souls. Once they enter the world and their lives have run their earthly course, these individuals will ascend to heaven and sit on their thrones of rest. Din-Mlikh then shows Denanuxt the throne which will be his once he has completed his earthly mission. It is in this context that we understand the image in the Ascension of Isaiah 44 where the righteous sit on heavenly thrones and in the New Testament where they are pictured as sitting together with God on His throne.

Another prominent motif in the literature describing the heavenly ascent is the robing of the hero in royal or heavenly garments. The Slavonic Book of Enoch describes Enoch's transformation into a celestial being as accompanied by a change from an earthly robe into garments of God's glory. In 3 Enoch a similar transformation takes place. In the Ethiopic Book of Enoch the righteous are clothed with garments of glory which are identified with garments of life. The Apocalypse of Abraham and the New Testament also identify the heavenly vesture with immortality. According to the Ascension of Isaiah, the prophet, on ascending to heaven, is given a garment which makes him equal to the angels and he sees the saints similarly robed. The Mandaean text (in Lidzbarski's translation) has Manda d-Haya say to Enos: "Ich gewährte dir Glanz und Licht, das es bei dir an jenem ersten Gewande sei, das man dir aus dem Hause des Lebens verlieh ... In a different context Din-Mlikh Uthra tells Denanuxt that when his earthly mission is fulfilled he will return to heaven dressed in a stola of splendor and in a turban of light. The Patriarch Levi is instructed on his ascension to put on "the robe of priesthood ... the garment of truth ... and the turban of the head ... Finally, a Samaritan hymn describes Moses on his ascent to heaven as being clad in the name of the Godhead. This background sheds light on the statement of R. Tanhum in our legend that God spread some of the radiance of His Shekinah over Moses.

In a parallel source we find a similar description but with one significant variation, God spread His garment talito, over Moses. It is clear that the image of investiture in heavenly garments is here as well. However, this garment does not endow Moses with immortality or with supernatural qualities, it is merely an indication of God's favor and protection.

The Talmudic legend makes no mention of several elements connected with the heavenly ascent which show up in the cognate literature. Enoch is anointed on his ascension while the patriarch Levi is first cleansed in pure water then anointed with holy oil and fed with bread and wine. Similarly, the commentary of Marqah describes how Moses was anointed on his ascent to heaven, how he washed in the trough of the angels and ate their bread. In addition, Marqah depicts Moses as being called by names of honor. In 3 Enoch, Metatron is called by seventy names which God took from His own name and gave to him.

According to the Talmud, the angels in protesting the giving of the Law to Moses refer to it as "the hidden treasure ... hidden with Thee 974 generations before the world was created". In the Mandaean sources describing the revelation of secrets to the ascending Savior, there is no reference to a book or heavenly tablets given to him when he is sent down to the world, despite the fact that Mandaeans do look upon holy writings as a vehicle of revelation. By combining several passages in the Mandaean texts, Widengren deduces that the Mandaeans conceived of hidden books in heaven existing before creation. The Savior who ascends to heaven has read these books and brings the primordial revelation contained in them to mankind. If this reconstruction is correct, we have a parallel to our legend where the hidden preexistent Law is revealed to Moses. The description of the preexistent Law or wisdom as something hidden is already found in the book of Job where it is stated that wisdom "is hid from the eyes of all living". In a similar vein the author of the Wisdom of Solomon says of wisdom that he will "search her out from her first beginnings" and "will not hide her mysteries". The implication here is that from the very beginning wisdom was hidden and contained mysteries. It is this hidden wisdom and its mysteries which are revealed to the initiate by means of a vision, through the words of angels or on heavenly tablets. He in turn conveys this communication to mankind. Philo too, in describing the Sinaitic Revelation, portrays each Israelite as "instructed in the holy secrets and accepted for admission to the greatest mysteries".

However, Paul, speaking of his visions and revelations, tells of a man he knew who ascended to the third heaven, entered Paradise and there heard "things that cannot be told, that man may not utter". Thus there seem to be two types of revelation described in these sources—a revelation intended only for the initiate and a revelation intended for the masses and recorded in a book or on heavenly tablets. In IV Ezra we get a synthesis of these two types of revelation. Ezra is ordered to write and publish twenty-four books, but the last seventy books are to be kept secret and transmitted only to the wise among his people. Similarly, in 3 Enoch Moses transmits the mysteries of Torah to a chain of tradition ending with the circle of initiates while a parallel passage has the chain of tradition ending with all Israel.

In reviewing the motifs of our legend, we find that a number of them fall into a pattern which can be traced to an ascension theme found in Mesopotamian literature. In the Mesopotamian texts, the heavenly ascent is made by the king who is both wise scribe and visionary seer and is described as "the Sent One".

The various aspects of this theme can be summarized as follows:

Ascent to heaven

Entering the heavenly palace

Reception by the highgod in his assembly

Purification

Anointing

Robing in royal or heavenly garments

Handing over the heavenly book or heavenly tablets to the bearer of revelation

Calling with names of honor

Initiation into the heavenly secrets

Enthronement on the god-father's throne

Sending forth with a commission or a message to instruct the generation

The connection between this complex of rites and ideas and the role of Moses as described in the Bible is clear. Moses is "sent out" on his mission. He is both the wise judge and the visionary seer. On Mount Sinai he receives the tablets of stone, the Law and the commandments in order to instruct Israel. However, the succinct text of Scripture leaves out the other motifs enumerated in the Mesopotamian account of the heavenly ascent; but they reappear (though not necessarily in their entirety in any single source) in the rabbinic legend and in the cognate literature pre-dating it and post-dating it.

In the Talmudic narrative the following motifs are present: ascent to heaven, enthronement (in our legend portrayed as grasping God's throne), robing in heavenly garments. To these motifs the sources cognate to our legend add the following: purification, anointing, calling with names of honor, initiation into the heavenly secrets.

It is generally assumed that not until I Enoch 14 (commonly dated to the third century BCE) do we encounter the first account of a visionary ascent to the heavenly Temple. That chapter is part of Book 1 of I Enoch, commonly called the Book of the Watchers (1 Enoch 1-36), The Watchers,, disgraced angelic figures, have sent Enoch to petition the deity on their behalf. Enoch reports:

Behold clouds called me in the vision ... and in the vision winds caused me fly and hastened me and lifted me up into heaven And I went into the tongue of fire and came near to a Cario house which was built of hailstones Its roof was like the path of the stars and flashes of lightning. and among them were fiery Cherubim ... And I went into that house, and it was hot as fire and cold as snow, and there was neither pleasure nor life in it. And I saw in the vision, and behold, another house, which was larger than the former. And in everything it so excelled in glory and splendour and size that I am unable to describe to you its glory and its size. And I looked and saw in it a high throne, and its appearance was like Ice and its surrounds like the shining sun and the sound of Cherubim, And from underneath the high throne there flowed out rivers of burning fire so that it was impossible to look at it. And He who is great in glory sat on it, and his raiment was brighter than the sun, and whiter than any snow ... And the Lord called me with his own mouth and said to me. Come hither, Enoch, to my holy word. (1 En. 14:8-24, excerpted)

What are the major biblical antecedents of this passage? There is certainly a debt to elements of Genesis. The tantalizing reference in Gen 5:24, which says of Enoch that 'he walked with God; then he was no more, because God took him' is probably to be understood as a mundane reference to the death of the pre-flood Patriarch, but because of its ambiguous nature it inspired later traditions about Enoch, including this classic passage about Enoch's heavenly ascent. The Watchers of 1 Enoch are based on the 'sons of God' who 'went in to the daughters of humans' in Gen 6:1-4, 2 Kings 2 speaks of a holy man going to heaven: it is reported that as Elijah and his disciple Elisha 'continued walking and talking, a chariot of fire and horses of fire separated the two of them, and Elijah ascended in a whirlwind into heaven' (2 Kgs 2:11), but no account is given of the journey to heaven or of what Elijah saw there. Another possible precedent is the remarkable scene set on the holy mountain in Exod 24:9-11 (assigned by many to the so-called Yahwist writer): 'Then Moses and Aaron, Nadab and Abihu, and seventy of the elders of Israel went up, and they saw the God of Israel. Under his feet there was something like a pavement of sapphire stone, like the very heaven for clearness. God did not lay his hand on the chief men of the people of Israel; also they beheld God, and they ate and drank.'

Turning to Ezekiel, there are many parallels between I Enoch 14 and the various visions in the book of Ezekiel. Ezekiel alone of the classical prophets records the experience of being transported by God (for example, Ezek 8:1-3). The language of vision is shared, as is the imagery of cloud, wind, water and fire. The presence of the cherubim (e.g. Ezekiel 10-11) is another common factor. Again, the words of I Enoch 14, 'And I looked and I saw in it a high throne', echo the theme of the divine throne in Ezekiel 1. Moreover, the designation of the deity as 'He who is great in glory' recalls the emphasis on the divine glory in Ezekiel, and the words 'From underneath the high throne there flowed out rivers of burning fire' echo the river flowing from the Temple in Ezekiel 47.

But what about Ezekiel 40-42 specifically? Whilst the debt of I Enoch 14 to Ezekiel as a whole is clear, the parallels between I Enoch 14 and Ezekiel 40-42 may, at first sight, seem limited. There is the reference to the experience being 'in visions of God' (cf. Ezek 40:2), and to the cherubim (cf. Ezek 41:18-20); moreover, the first house entered by Enoch seems empty ('there was neither pleasure nor life in it'), arguably in this respect like the Temple of Ezekiel 40-42. But the key question is about the overall interpretation of Ezekiel 40-42. What are these chapters reporting? Could it be that they are to be interpreted as referring not to an earthly Temple, as has most often been assumed, but rather to the heavenly Temple? If so, Ezekiel 40-42 might provide the most important antecedent to I Enoch 14, and indeed arguably the earliest 'heavenly ascent' narrative, Himmelfahrt, whilst acknowledging parallels with Ezekiel, declares that 'Enoch's is the first ascent in Jewish literature'. The purpose of this essay is to consider whether this is so.

The Divine Presence in Ezekiel

It is important briefly to set the enquiry in the context of the way the book of Ezekiel presents access to the divine and God's presence more generally: A major issue in the book is that of where on earth the deity may be encountered. The book opens with the great vision of ch. 1, where the throne of Yahweh is witnessed in far-off Babylonia. Indeed this amounts to nothing less than a vision of God himself: 'This was the appearance of the likeness of the glory of the LORD' (1:28). The Lord is with his people in exile, no longer tied to the land of Israel. In the vision of chs 8-11, the divine glory is seen again, leaving the Temple. We read in 10:18: 'Then the glory of the LORD went out from the threshold of the house and stopped above the cherubim'. The vision of ch. 1, performing as it does the role of an overture to the book as a whole, has anticipated this departure. And then in the final section of the book, in ch. 43, the expected dramatic return of the deity to his shrine is presented: and the glory of the LORD filled the temple' (43:5). This return in ch. 43 does not undo or erase the various motifs whereby Ezekiel has affirmed the divine presence outside the land, the 'throne' of ch. 1 or indeed the 'sanctuary' of 11:16: 'I have become to them a sanctuary (albeit in small measure) in the countries where they have gone.'

The presence of God with his people wherever they are is not a temporary provision. Rather, the affirmation of 43:7 that 'This is the place of my throne and the place for the soles of my feet' stands within the context of that overarching theology of the freedom of God. Having abandoned his Jerusalem sanctuary for a time, the Lord now commits himself to dwell there permanently. But this remains, within the grand architecture of the book of Ezekiel, in tension with the affirmation of his presence with his people in their dispersion, for whom he will indeed himself remain a 'sanctuary'.

So far the focus of this summary has been on God's local presence on the one hand and his mobility (or universalism) on the other. This might be described as the horizontal plane. But there is a further dimension to be considered, that which could be expressed, at least in picture terms, as the vertical plane. I refer to the heavenly dimension, For it is important that for Ezekiel, as for the priestly tradition within which he stood, the divine 'glory', that dwells on earth is an expression of his immanent presence that does not exhaust his being. More needs to be said about the theme of transcendence; and this brings us to the central question of this essay: how are we to understand Ezekiel's great Temple vision? In particular, what are the implications of the initial tour of the Temple itself in chs 40-42?

A Tour of the Temple

In Ezek 40:1-2, we read: 'The hand of the LORD was upon me and he brought me in visions of God, to the land of Israel, and set me down upon a very high mountain'. We have already noted some similarity to the visionary language of 1 Enoch 14, specifically in the reference to the experience being in visions of God' and more generally in the Language of divine transportation. One is reminded of Ezek 8:3, where the prophet reports that 'the spirit lifted me up between heaven and earth, and brought me in visions of God to Jerusalem'. Ezekiel 8:1-3 has been a key text in the debate over the location of Ezekiel's ministry, some arguing that it gives evidence of a physical return to Jerusalem by Ezekiel; but it is important to take seriously the visionary nature of both references (8:1-3; 40:1-2), neither of which gives grounds for a view that Ezekiel actually exercised a ministry in Jerusalem. Like its earlier counterpart, the vision that begins in Ezekiel 40 is seen in Babylonia; it is 'in visions of God' that the prophet is brought to the land of Israel.

The 'very high mountain' is probably meant to signal the Temple mountain. But Sinai may be in mind too, as argued by Levenson, who takes the reference to 'the law of the temple' (43:12) as evidence of this.' And there are also resonances here of the cosmic mountain of ancient Near Eastern mythology, echoes picked up in the account of the sacred river in ch. 47. Such multiple reference in the phrase 'very high mountain' is perhaps an early hint that we are dealing with something more than simply the earthly Jerusalem. On the very high mountain was 'a structure like a city to the south' (40:2): Jerusalem is not named as such anywhere in Ezekiel 40-48 (nor Zion, which is never used anywhere in the book), but Jerusalem in some sense is surely intended by this reference to a city in the land of Israel. Note, though, that in what follows the Temple is not in the city, which is located, as here, away to the south, That the Temple is not in the city is perhaps a further clue that we are dealing with the heavenly Temple, possibly an echo of the Canaanite theme of the mountain of the gods being in the far north' (cf. Ps 48:2). So although the reference to 'the land of Israel' sounds very specific in geographical terms, it is to be seen as symbolic of things divine, the locus of the gate of heaven.?

Ezekiel is met by a man 'whose appearance shone like bronze, with a linen cord and a measuring reed in his hand' (40:3; we may compare the 'man clothed in linen, with a writing case at his side' in 9:2,3,11; and now also the use of 'bronze' in another visionary context, at 1:7), The reference seems to be Co an angelic guide, a feature that later comes to characterize some 'heavenly ascent' narratives, such as that in the Apocalypse of Abraham 15-30 (though, as it happens, not 1 Enoch 14).

The tour takes the following course: most of the long ch, 40 is devoted to an account of the Temple area, the gates and the outer and inner courts, but before the chapter ends. Ezekiel is led to the Temple itself, whose tripartite structure is described. This section extends from 40:48 to the end of ch. 41, The basic shape of the Temple follows the pattern familiar from 1 Kings 6-8 and indeed from the archaeology of the ancient Near East.' At 40:48 we have the 'vestibule', at 41:1 the '5:7' or 'nave', and then in 41:3 the reran or 'inner room'. The word 1. 1 not used for the inner room in Ezekiel (as it is in 1 Kgs 8:6), but in 41:4 Ezekiel's guide declares that this is 'the holy of holies' or 'the most holy place', using the important phrase found elsewhere in the Hebrew Bible (including indeed 1 Kgs 8:6). Chapter 42 concerns the outer court of the Temple, and then in 42:15 Ezekiel is led out by the gate that faces east', and is shown the temple area all around'.

Chapter 43 begins with a dramatic and powerful scene, the return of Yahweh to his sanctuary. Ezekiel is taken to 'the gate facing east', and there 'the glory of the God of Israel was coming from the east' (43:2) The statement that the 'glory of the LORD filled the temple' (43:5) echoes the words of both Exod 40:34 and 1 Kgs 8:11. Several scholars have highlighted the importance of ancient Near Eastern parallels to this theme of the return of the deity to the sanctuary from which he had earlier departed.'

Although the tour motif is picked up in a piecemeal way later, chs 40-42 appear to constitute a self-contained Temple tour. Several features mark out chs 40-42 as a coherent section. This is important to the argument I shall develop. Verse 5 introduces the first reference to the Temple within chs 40-43, This is a remarkably low-key reference, taking the Temple itself for granted: 'Now there was a wall all around the outside of the Temple area (40:5). Significantly, this wall is mentioned again at the end of ch. 42: It had a wall around it, five hundred cubits long and five hundred cubits wide' (42:20); this inclusio is one of the features that mark out chs 40-42 as a distinct section, as is the programmatic reference to 'separation between the holy and the common' in 42:20, The gate motif is also significant in this connection. Reference to 'the gateway' is found as early as 40:3 (cf, 'the gateway facing east' in 40:6) and again at the end of the section in 42:15 and 43:1 ('the gate that faces east'). The present phase of the activity of the 'man' seems to end with the start of ch. 43. At 43:6 we read 'While the man was standing beside me, I heard someone speaking to me out of the temple', that is someone other than the 'man' (who is not mentioned again until ch. 47). In the next verse it becomes clear that it is God himself who speaks, 'Mortal, this is the place of my throne and the place for the soles of my feet, where I will reside among the people of Israel forever' (43:7), as he does explicitly in 44:2, 5 ('The LORD said to me ...'). Moreover, the cross reference of 43:3 seems to constitute another marker of a new phase and so to confirm the impression that chs 40-42 are to be read as a self-contained section; this verse alludes to chs, I and 1011, and identifies ch. 43 as sharing the concern of those chapters with the issue of where in the world Yahweh is to be encountered.

How Should Ezekiel 40-42 be Understood?

Ezekiel's Temple as presented in the book's Last great vision has been understood in many different ways, Often interpreters combine elements of the main options but these may be isolated as three. Some have interpreted this Temple as based in part on a preserved description or even blueprint of the first, Solomonic Temple. There are elements of this in Cooke: 'We can imagine him poring over architectural plans 'in chs. 40-42 he describes its ground-plan, which is based partly on the lines of Solomon's temple Others have read it as first and foremost a plan for a restoration Temple-, so, for example, Clements: 'Ezekiel 40-48 is not just a vision of a new and restored Israel but a practical "renewal program" for national reorganization'. And others again have seen it as primarily an eschatological Temple; thus, for example, Eichrodt: 'they provide a picture of the temple, [and and people in the time of fulfilment`, referring to the `land and the people in the time of salvation'.

In the long run, this material would certainly be read both in the context of an actual restoration after return from exile and also in terms of eschatological hope, but what was the earliest situation? Was Ezekiel 40-42 in the first instance a vision of the heavenly Temple seen by Ezekiel during the Exile? The view that these chapters are indeed to be seen as the report of a visionary ascent to the heavenly Temple has had but a small place in modern scholarly discussion. In my judgement this proposal deserves more attention than it has received. The view was first seriously developed by Tuell in 1982." Something not dissimilar was proposed in 1985 by Cowan." Niditch worked along related lines in 1986," and recently, within the context of a Christian biblical theology, Beale has offered a comparable interpretation, seeing Ezekiel 40-48 as describing a heavenly Temple that will descend to earth at the eschaton. But it is Tuell who in 1996 developed the hypothesis most fully, and, as it is Tuell who has contributed most, we shall proceed by reporting and reviewing his case and then go on from there. The overall purpose of the present essay is to develop and nuance Tuell's important contribution, highlighting some problems with it but also adding additional evidence for his basic thesis.

In his 1982 article Tuell argued that an original vision of the prophet is recoverable, and that this vision involved a promise to Ezekiel's contemporaries of divine presence and accessibility, rather than a programme for the future (whether the return from exile or the eschaton). Tuell wrote of the need to reclaim the core vision, which he found in Ezekiel 40-42 (minus alleged additions), but also Ezek 43:1-7a, 44:1-3 and 47:1-12, Tuell wrote; Ezekiel, in exile in a foreign, unclean land, has experienced in mar'eh [vision] the presence of the Lord in power and fullness. He has seen the very dwelling place of God, and known it to be free of historical and geographical limitations, Tuell's [1996] article presents the most detailed case for reading chs 40-42 as a 'heavenly ascent' vision narrative; the chapters are interpreted as the report of a vision:

Ezekiel describes what he and his contemporaries would have understood as an actual visionary journey to the heavenly temple, Tuell advances his case on a number of grounds; here I isolate what seem to me to be his three key arguments.

The Case for Taking Ezekiel 40-42 as a 'Heavenly Ascent' Narrative (a) In Ezekiel's Temple vision most vertical dimensions are omitted," The various structures of the Temple are generally measured in two-dimensional outline, and little is said about the elevation of the building. Whilst three-dimensional descriptions are found occasionally (for example. 40:5, 42; 41:16-17, 22), they are untypical. Ezekiel's Temple seems to lack proper Temple walls; particularly striking is the fact that no height is given for the inner room in 41:4 or for the Temple as a whole in 41:13-14.

Tuell contends that such absence of detail argues against the section being a description of the Solomonic Temple, the first of the interpretations listed earlier, In any case our text does not conform to the pattern of the first Temple in some significant respects, for example there is no bronze sea in the forecourt. Some have taken the massive gates to be Solomonic (for example, Zimmerli), but even if this were right they are out of all proportion to the walls, which might be described as so scanty as to be token, and thus the design seems hybrid. Tuell further contends that the absence of detail in Ezekiel 40-42 and the impracticality of the design argue also against the restoration plan theory, the second of the interpretations. The account conjures up an impressive picture of the Temple, but, for all this, information essential for construction is lacking,

(b) A second argument against the theory that the section concerns a restoration Temple is that nowhere does Ezekiel 40-42 claim to be a building programme, Tuell makes much of this. No decision to build is reported, no divine permission given. In contrast, Moses receives an explicit divine command to build in Exod 25:8-9 (compare also other Old Testament passages such as 2 Sam 7:13; 1 Kgs 5:3-5; 1 Chr 21:5-6, 9-19), And there are ancient Near Eastern parallels for an explicit building command, for example in the Gudea cylinders (where Gudea, ruler of the Sumerian city of Lagash, is commanded to build the Temple of Ningirsu) and also in the Ba'al cycle, But in Ezekiel 40-42 there is no such decision or decree.

So, the theory that the vision represents a preserved description of the Solomonic Temple is hard to square with the lack of full dimensions, whilst the restoration plan idea has two arguments against it, namely the lack of full dimensions and the absence of a clear command to build. But most of what has been said is arguably compatible with the theory of an eschatological Temple, which God himself will construct at the end time. This is consistent both with the lack of detail and also with the absence of a command to build. The mythological echoes of the 'very high mountain' of Ezek 40:2 could have an eschatological interpretation. And we know that Ezekiel 40-48 was read eschatologically by some ancient readers (for example, Rev 21:10). This brings us to the third argument of Tuell's that I highlight, that in which he particularly counters an eschatological interpretation.'

(c) Crucial to understanding ch. 40 aright is to understand it in the light of 1:1-3 and 8:1-3, with which it shares many features. In fact three key formulae occur together only in these three contexts. Ezekiel 40:1-2 opens with a date formula specific to the day. This is an introductory formula common in Ezekiel's prophecy, but in this case the date is followed by the formula for expressing prophetic ecstasy (The hand of the Lord was upon me) and also the specification , 'in visions of God'. These three formulae unite 1:1-3, 8:1-3 and 40:1-2. These passages are bound together also by the cross-reference formula of 43:3, possibly editorial, alluding to both chs. 10-11 and ch. 1: 'The vision I saw was like the vision I had seen when he came to destroy the city, and like the vision that I had seen by the river Chebar.' Parunak, following rabbinic precedent, treated these visionary sections together.' Indeed, he added a fourth shared feature found in the three general contexts, namely the use of nil (spirit) as the subject of 'lift up' with the prophet as object (3:12, 14; 8:3; 11:1, 24; 43:5). The three visions are like three great landmarks in the book of Ezekiel, The vision beginning in Ezekiel 40-48 is closely related to the earlier visions and it invites interpretation in the same terms, The implications of this for the present discussion are vital. Chapters I and 8 are about present reality not future prediction: the appearance of the deity in Babylonia and the contemporary abuses in the Jerusalem Temple. Tuell importantly observes that 'none of the mar'oth are predictive prophesies' and 'As a mar'eh., the temple vision is an experience of a present, on-going reality'. Rather than seeing what will be Ezekiel glimpses what is now, in the heavenly realm' This third argument seems to me much the most persuasive of Tuell's three main arguments.

Such are the essentials of Tuell's cumulative case. He concludes that the detailed description serves to give us an overwhelming sense of the symmetry and order of the Temple's design, presenting the dimensions of the visionary Temple, as though a vision of an already built complex, through which Ezekiel is led.' Tuell posits a helpful parallel between Ezekiel 40-42 and the Mesopotamian descriptive inventories (not building plans) listed by Hurowity," like Ezekiel 40-42, these simply present the dimensions of the structure, without a command to build.

Tuell sees Ezekiel 40-42 as the fulfilment of the 'sanctuary' promise of Ezck 11:16. Yahweh had promised to be a sanctuary to his people in the countries where they had gone. Tuell writes:. 'Yhwh had promised to be present, in however small a measure, among the exiles. Ezekiel's detailed report of his vision would appear to be, at least in part, the means of this presence.'

Some Critical Issues Unaddressed by Tuell

(a) Whilst there are important links between the three visions of chs 1-3, 8-11 and 40-42, more needs to be made of the differences between these passages. Tuell acknowledges this in the case of Ezekiel I. It is distinctive that here the throne of God comes to the prophet, not vice versa (as in / Enoch 14), Himmetfarb makes a point of this as part of her argument that J Enoch 14 is the first 'heavenly ascent' narrative. Tuell in his counter argument rightly contrasts Ezekiel 1-3 and 40-42 in this regard: 'Ezekiel 1-3 certainly does not describe an ascent, but that is exactly the experience described in Ezekiel 40-42.'

But more needs to be said about the difference between ch, 8 and chs 40-42. The Temple of ch. 8, where so many abominations are committed, is decidedly not the heavenly Temple: the whole point is that this is the sullied earthly Temple. Tuell's important observations that 'none of the mar'oth are predictive prophesies' and 'As a mar'eh, the temple vision is an experience of a present, on-going reality' are true of ch. 8, but the fact that it evidently does not refer to the heavenly Temple would be an important difference from chs 40-42. There are then significant discontinuities as well as continuities among the three passages of Ezekiel, though this does not undercut the importance of the close affinities between these passages for the interpretation of chs 40-42.

(b) A more serious critique of Tue concerns the relationship between chs 40-42 and what follows, Tuell is surely wrong to say of ch. 43 that 'Ezekiel has seen the glory of the Lord enter the real temple', by which he means the heavenly Temple, and that Ezekiel has been given access to the cosmic reality, where Yhwh's true enthronement takes place?' Tuell 's persuasive thesis that chs 40-42 constitute a vision of the heavenly Temple should not obscure the fact that the concerns of chs 40-42 and ch. 43 are different, It is significant that for Tuell the core vision extends beyond Ezekiel 40-42, to take in 43:1-7a, 44:1-3 and 47:1-12,37 The present article, on the other hand, has emphasized the self-contained nature of chs 40-42, in which a glimpse of the heavenly Temple is vouchsafed to the prophet. Consistent with this is the fact that ch 43 (like ch. I and chs 10-11), deals with a distinctive question, that about where on earth God reveals himself. Whilst one must remember not to contrast the earthly and heavenly Temples inappropriately (because the earthly Temple was perceived as the very gate of heaven), nonetheless it is important that Ezekiel 43 is understood as an anticipation of the deity's return not to the heavenly Temple (which he has never left) but rather to the soon-to-be-restored earthly shrine. This is the reversal of the divine abandonment of the sanctuary recounted in chs 10-11, The symmetrical relationship between chs 10-11 and ch. 43 constitutes a key feature of the 'architecture' of this most orderly of biblical books.

This leads me on to raise a question about the second of Their arguments highlighted above, namely that concerning the absence of a building command, This is the weak point in his case. Tuell contended that this alleged absence militated against the notion that the vision is to be interpreted in terms of restoration, thus clearing the ground for his own theory of a vision of the heavenly Temple experienced by Ezekiel within exile, But the hypothesis that chs 4G-42 present a vision of the heavenly Temple does not depend on there being no command to build. Moreover, ch. 43 in fact provides a command to build: 'Describe the temple to the house of Israel, and let them measure the pattern' (43:10) and 'Make known to them the plan of the temple ... and write it down in their sight, so that they may observe and follow the entire plan' (43:11).

Two Additional Arguments for a 'Heavenly Ascent' Interpretation

(a) The reference to the 'following the entire plan' in ch. 43 in fact constitutes another argument for chs 40-42 being an account of the heavenly Temple, one not presented by Tuell. The key to this is a pentateuchal text that Tuell features prominently as part of the general background to his argument, namely Exodus 25. In fact at one point Tuell contrasts Exodus 25 and Ezekiel, arguing that Moses receives an explicit divine command to build in Exod whereas Tuell emphasizes that Ezekiel 40-42 lacks any command to build. I suggest that this Exodus text is actually more pertinent than Tuell claims. Let us consider it more closely. In Exod 25:9, 40 (commonly assigned to the Priestly source) Moses on the mountain receives detailed instructions for the construction of the tabernacle and its furniture.' This is a key passage for understanding the relationship between chs 40-42 and ch, 43 of Ezekiel. A 'model', is shown to Moses Exod 25:9, 40, Precisely what is meant by this is much debated: Hurowitz understands this to refer not to a structure but to a plan, on the basis of 1 Chr 28:11-12, which refers to a written pattern passed on from David to Solomon,' whilst in the interpretation of Exodus 25 presented by Cross the tabnit shown to Moses is the heavenly dwelling of Yahweh, of which the earthly sanctuary is the counterpart,'

Already early in ch, 40 we have a hint about the nature of the link between the tour of the Temple and what will follow. The 'man', the angelic guide, declares to Ezekiel, 'Mortal, look closely and listen attentively, and set your mind upon all that I shall show you, for you were brought here in order that I might show it to you; declare all that you see to the house of Israel' (Ezek 40:4). The length of the man's measuring reed is described (40:5) and then there are numerous references to measuring (for example, 40:5-23). In 43:10-11, as we have noted, we read: 'As for you, mortal, describe the temple to the house of Israel, and let them measure the pattern; make known to them the plan of the temple, its arrangement, its exits and its entrances, and its whole form — all its ordinances and its entire plan and all its laws; and write it down in their sight.' Particularly important are the words that follow, at the end of v. 11: 'so that they may observe and follow the entire plan and all its ordinances'.'

The key Hebrew words used in 43:10-11 are rare 'pattern' or 'measure', 'arrangement's (and also the related verb), 'plan' or 'form'. Nonetheless, in spite of this distinctive vocabulary, Ezek 43:10-11 seems to convey very much the same meaning as the more typical language of Exod 25:9, 4C, which use the fairly common word for that which was shown to Moses on the mountain, Unsurprisingly, some wish to emend Ezek 43:10-11 to assimilate it to the language of Exodus 25. But this is unnecessary; the very rarity of the words used here in Ezekiel supports their authenticity, as does the fact that occurs, albeit in a rather different context, at Ezek 28:12." Hurvitz, focusing specifically on Tilt, took Ezekiel's usage as evidence that he is later than the Priestly source. Be that as it may, Ezekiel's words may be chosen for particular effect, on the one hand recalling priestly terms perhaps already familiar, whilst on the other indicating at the same time that something even bolder is being spoken of, If Exodus 25 is best understood as Hurowitz (rather than Cross) argues (just a pattern shown to Moses, rather than the heavenly sanctuary), the point in Ezekiel may, by way of contrast, be that the prophet has glimpsed not merely the pattern but rather the heavenly Temple itself." If the heavenly Temple is in view, might not Ezekiel's tantalizing use of rare vocabulary in 43:10-11 share some affinity with the circumlocutory technique found at 1:28 (the appearance of the likeness of the glory of the LORD) or again at 11:16, 'a sanctuary to them (albeit in small measure)', being an at once subtle and yet bold hint at the revelation of the very things of heaven."

Ezekiel 40:18 features then both the heavenly Temple and the earthly Temple, The Temple of the vision of chs 40-42 is the heavenly archetype, the 'real' Temple, of which the Temple of Jerusalem was but a copy and a shadow, Ezekiel in exile has been granted a glimpse of this. A time for rebuilding the earthly Temple will come and so ch. 43 appropriately refers to the anticipated rebuilding (43:11.), according to the heavenly model that the prophet has seen."

(b) A further argument in favour of the heavenly Temple, again one not presented by Tuell, relates to the fact that Ezekiel's Temple of chs 40-42 appears to be all but empty. (We have noted a possible parallel here to I Enoch 14, where the first house entered by Enoch seems empty: 'there was neither pleasure nor life in it') Virtually all the furnishings of the Solomonic Temple, and indeed the desert tabernacle, go unmentioned. Among these omissions is the Ark of the Covenant.' The emptiness is arguably more explicable on the premise that the heavenly Temple is in view, The table of the bread of the Presence (cf, Exod 25:23-30) would be otiose, since by definition the Presence is fully present in the heavenly sanctuary. Again, the Menorah (cf. Exod 25:31-40), which probably represented the heavenly luminaries," would not be needed if the Temple concerned were the heavenly Temple. The only interior furniture referred to is the 'altar of wood' in front of the inner room (41:22: 'the table that stands before the Lord). This is distinct from the stone altar of burnt sacrifice that stands outside the Temple itself (40:47; cf. 43:13-27). The presence of the wooden altar in the otherwise empty Temple has long been recognized as something of an enigma.' But if this 'altar of wood' in front of the inner room were the altar upon which incense was burned (cf. Exod, 30:1-10), this may in fact support the theory that it is the heavenly Temple that is toured in Ezekiel 40-1-2, for the worship of God is, of course, the central activity of the heavenly Temple.'

Historical and Textual Parallels

We have already discussed in some detail the particularly close and important case of Exod 25:9, 40. There is other important comparative material in the Hebrew Bible, as Tuell shows, The ancient poem in 1Kgs 8:12-13 speaks of the Jerusalem Temple as Yahweh's earthly dwelling place COT-responding to his transcendent abode: The LORD has said that he would dwell in thick darkness. I have built you an exalted house, a place for you to dwell in forever.' The Temple itself was understood as a means of experiencing God (Ps 42:2, 'When shall I come and behold the face of God?'; Ps 84:7, The God of gods will he seen in Zion'), Margaret Barker has powerfully presented the Temple as the eery gate of heaven, drawing on these and other texts. Several Psalms evoke mythological imagery about the dwelling place of the gods (Ps 46:4, 'There is a river whose streams make glad the city of God, the holy habitation of the Most High'; Ps 48:2, 'Mount Zion, in the far north, the city of the great King'). And then there is Isaiah's Temple vision (Isaiah 6), in which the earthly Jerusalem Temple context of the prophet's call seems to give way to a glimpse of the heavenly Temple, as the mere edge of the divine train fills the earthly Temple: 'and the hem of his robe filled the Temple' (6: 1).

The notion of a heavenly Temple has deep roots in the temple ideologies of the ancient Near East!' In Babylonia precise adherence of the earthly temple to the pattern of the heavenly temple was regarded as a matter of great importance, and deviation from the foundation lines of temples was a matter of grave concern. Reference has already been made to the Sumerian case of Gude% ruler of the city of Lagash: he was shown in a dream the model according to which the Temple of Ningirsu was to be built."

Cultural Analogies

To historical and textual parallels may be added cultural analogies.

Tuell's own favoured analogy is that of the icon of Eastern Orthodox Christianity. which is understood to be a window into heaven. 'The text of Ezekiel's vision, thus, could become an aid to devotional piety, like the icon in Orthodoxy.' Moreover, as he points out, a written text (such as that of Ezekiel) can serve as an icon, there being a tradition within Orthodoxy of speaking of the Gospels as a 'verbal icon' of Christ.

Niditch (whose interpretation of Ezekiel's vision shares much with Tuell's) looks to Tibetan Buddhism, where the mandala is a symbolic representation of the sacred realm or cosmos, Niditch writes that the association of visionary experience with a detailed architectural plan in the Buddhist tradition provides a fascinating analogue helping one to appreciate a similar association in Ezekiel'. 'The 'real' mandala is the actual sacred realm', she reports, 'Closest to the realm itself are the three-dimensional buildings, palaces of the deities, built with real materials,' One is reminded here of the Mesopotamian descriptive inventories (not building plans), referred to earlier.

(c) A further parallel is the Platonic concept of ideal forms, Both ancients and moderns have posited actual influence between ancient Greece and the Hebrew Bible in this regard (in both directions in fact). I prefer to speak of cultural analogy in a more general sense rather than speculate about direct borrowing.

The Relative Dating of Ezekiel 40-42 and 1 Enoch 14

If it is reasonable to understand Ezekiel 40-42 as in some sense a 'heavenly ascent' narrative, there is the question of how early it is, and in particular its dating in relation to / Enoch 14.1 Enoch 14 is commonly dated to the third century BCE, although Isaac prefers the second century BCE. But how about the dating of Ezekiel 40-42? Studies of Ezekiel 40-48 as a whole have been much influenced by the stratifying approach of Gese, which was followed through in detail by Zimmerli and adapted by others. This strategy distinguishes between original Ezekiel material and various layers of addition. Others have favoured a more holistic approach to Ezekiel 40-48, above all Greenberg, who is reluctant to see the hand of any but Ezekiel in these chapters. Niditch provides another, less thoroughgoing, example of this latter trend,'

In Ezekiel in general we have to take account of a marked homogeneity between the words of the prophet and material that may well be secondary, The fact that this "house style' of Ezekiel is particularly distinctive makes it more difficult to distinguish between primary and secondary material in this book than in some others.<sup>o</sup> Questions of purpose and authorship are often connected; indeed in this present case scholars sometimes argue that practical details are a sign of secondary elaboration of an original vision, there being a widespread view that the visionary elements of chs 40-48 predate the more detailed features of measurement and legislation, and indeed are likely to be primary. Tuell, for example, identified his original core vision as Ezekiel 40-42 (minus alleged additions), 43:1=4,44;1-3 and 47:1-42.

But whether or not the material we have been considering is all from Ezekiel himself, several factors favour a sixth-century date for Ezekiel 40-48 as a whole, including chs 40-42. And this is what really matters with regard to the relative dating of Ezekiel 40-42 and I Enoch 14. There is nothing that unambiguously refers to events after the sixth century. This is a principle that Clements employs very effectively in his treatment of chs 1-24,' and it may be applied to the latter part of the book as well.

Moreover, the fact that Ezekiel's vision, however it is to be understood, is so divergent from what we postulate of the restoration reality strongly suggests that it predates the latter. If the Second Temple had already been inaugurated (as it was in about 515 BCE), it would have been difficult to write in this way; the account would surely have been accommodated to the new reality," It is worthy of note that Ezekiel's vision is given a specific date: the twenty-fifth year of our exile, at the beginning of the year, on the tenth day of the month, in the fourteenth year after the city was struck down' (40:1) The year seems to be 573, The fact that 4111-2 anticipates an end to exile is crucial to the whole section of the book that it introduces. At the half-way point of the exile as he perceives it, Ezekiel anticipates that twenty-five years later an end to exile will be accomplished, in a Jubilee year.' This is integral to the understanding of this material and reinforces the arguments for a date in the sixth century. So the relative dating of Ezekiel 40-42 and I Enoch 14 is secure, or at least beyond reasonable doubt.

A Mystical Trajectory

We can speak of an extended trajectory of mystical interpretation of this material over the centuries, Just as Ezekiel 40-42 has important antecedents (including Exod 24.9-11 and Isaiah 6), so the Ezekiel text has a rich afterlife (including, I contend, its influence on I Enoch 14). We find evidence for a similar understanding of Ezekiel 40-48 to that which I have advanced in the Songs of the Sabbath Sacrifice from Qumran. Carol Newsom has shown in detail the indebtedness to Ezekiel, not least chs 40- 48. One should mention also several non-sectarian compositions, found at Qumran but lacking the specific characteristics distinctive of the Qumran community, such as the Temple Scroll (11QTemple) and the work called the New Jerusalem, both of which make use of Ezekiel 40-4.8 in particular. Of the many who participate in the afterlife of this Ezekiel text, Niditch writes: 'All pine after the sacred in the face of disappointing, alienating earthly realities,' Mention should be made also of Paul and the intriguing reference in 2 Cor 12:1-4: 'I know a person in Christ who fourteen years ago was caught up to the third heaven - whether in the body or out of the body I do not know; God knows. And I know that such a person - whether in the body or out of the body I do not know; God knows - was caught up into Paradise and heard things that are not to be told, that no mortal is permitted to repeat. One may compare Bowker's theory that Paul's conversion on the road to Damascus was within the context of a merkavah visionary experience. And then there is the often-cited reference in the Babylonian Talmud to the 'marble steps' seen by the four who entered 'pardes' (b. Hag. 14b). And the trajectory continues on to the 'building vision' traditions in the mystical hekalot ('palaces') literature.

A long and deeply-rooted mystical tradition then. The apocalyptic traditions of 'heavenly ascent' and the often much later merkavah mystical materials must not be casually assimilated. But it is important to recognize the rich interrelation of these streams, as contended by Rowland, who has done much to chart the story of the reception of Ezekiel 1 within Judaism and Christianity.' Even Rowland, however, does not acknowledge sufficiently the contribution of Ezekiel. In the light of the above argument that not only the merkavah tradition but also the 'heavenly ascent' tradition may owe much to Ezekiel, it is no exaggeration to speak of a continuity of mystical tradition going back all the way back to the prophet Ezekiel himself, tightly seen as a visionary.

A Visionary Experience or an Actual Journey?

Should one speak of a visionary experience or of an actual journey to heaven? Tuell writes of chapters 40-42 in a way that seems to fall between these two stools: the report of a vision: Ezekiel describes what he and his contemporaries would have understood as an actual visionary journey to the heavenly temple', Some comparable passages read like visionary experiences (e.g. Daniel 7, in the second century BCE, and Acts 7:55-56 and 22:17-21, in the first century CE). Others sound more like journeys, as in I Enoch 14:8-24 (commonly dated to the third century BCE), the Apocalypse of Abraham 15-30 (probably first to second century CE), and, in the New Testament, 2 or 12:2-4 and Revelation 4 (first century CE). As Alan Segal has recently argued, it is important both to take seriously that some ancients really did reckon to have been transported and also to be open to physiological explanations of the sensation of ascents. As for Ezekiel, the language of the book seems to indicate clearly that the prophet's experience is one of vision rather than physical transportation. Ezek 40:2 refers to 'visions of God', like 8:3; and just as 8:3 does not imply a real physical journey to Jerusalem, so 40:2 does not imply a real journey to heaven. It is in vision that Ezekiel ascended to and toured the heavenly Temple.

An Exegetical or an experiential Tradition?

There is an important debate about whether the texts in question are exegetical or experiential in nature. Himmelfarb represents the former option, contending that evidence for rites or mystical practices designed to induce a heavenly ascent is scant', she writes that "the heavenly ascents of the hekalot literature functioned not as rites to be enacted but as stories to be repeated'..'. She offers a similar judgement with regard to the apocalyptic material: 'the apocalypses are best understood not as literary adaptations of personal experiences but as imaginative literature', Halperin, when discussing the apocalyptic material (in contrast to the hekalot literature), is more open to an experiential emphasis, 'When an apocalyptic visionary "sees" something that looks like Ezekiel's merkavah, we may assume that he is seeing the merkavah vision as he has persuaded himself it really was, as Ezekiel would have seen it had he been inspired wholly and not in part.' But when discussing the merkavah texts properly so called (the hekalot literature), he is emphatic on their exegetical and anthological rather than experiential nature.'

But by no means all have agreed, and there are those who give a larger place to the experiential generally. For example, Scholem and others have understood the ascents as literary devices providing directions for would-be mystics who wish to repeat the ecstatic experience of the visionary. Tuell was attracted to this, writing of chs 40-42: 'By reading this report, Ezekiel's audience could share in the prophet's experience of transcendent reality and so be given access to the presence of Yhwh'," and again: 'The reader of the text is able to experience what the prophet experienced. independent of the original visionary.' Tuell seeks to bridge between a more exegetical/anthological approach and a more experiential one through his analogy of the Eastern Christian icon: 'If we view the texts as having a devotional function analogous to that of the icon, the distinction between ecstatic religious experience and literary imagination becomes less significant. The text may itself be understood to give the reader access to the transcendent realm.'" Niditch mediates in a very similar way: 'The line between the exegetical and the mystical, linked perhaps by the mantic, is less well-marked than Halperin suggests.'" And reflecting further on the use of the material in later times, she writes: 'The building not only becomes a symbolization of an image of God's realm, but also indicates the seer's participation in the very process of world-creation.'" One is reminded here of the emphases of Lieb and Rowland., highlighting the experiential and imaginative dimensions of reading visionary texts.'

Local and yet Universal, immanent and yet Transcendent

Ezekiel, in spite of his priestly and Jerusalem-based formation, was able to articulate a theology of divine presence that took account of the exile, The exile and Yahweh's departure from Jerusalem were not only punishment for the sins of the nation, but became the occasion for a discovery that Yahweh was present to his people even in alien Babylonia (Ezekiel I; 11:16). Kutsko expresses this paradox effectively: 'The absence of God from the Temple (the removal of the divine kabod) is both theodicy and theophany; it allows the presence of God to be associated with Israel in exile.' Ezekiel goes on to present a return to Jerusalem, hardly surprising given his priestly and Jerusalem legacy and also in view of the anticipated fact of return and the need to give a theological account of it. But that left a problem. What are we to make of the twin poles that restoration leaves, namely renewed divine presence in Jerusalem and on-going divine presence elsewhere? Should one perhaps assume that Jerusalem is now again the unique place, just as before (at least from Josiah's reform in c. 620, an understanding that would obtain until the events of 70 CE made such a belief unsustainable? This might imply that just as Yahweh abandoned Jerusalem to be with the exiles, so now he has abandoned Babylonia (where a Jewish community remained in fact until modern times) to return to Jerusalem. Or should one speak rather in terms of a new dialectic suited to the two-fold life of the Jewish people after the exile: in the land and also in the diaspora? Surely the latter, And, moreover, if Yahweh could be encountered in Babylonia, then presumably potentially everywhere: have become to them a sanctuary (albeit in small measure) in the countries where they have gone' (Ezek 11:14' But in all of this we should not forget the heavenly, transcendent dimension, the focus of the present study. It is because Yahweh is transcendent and not immanently tied to Jerusalem that the affirmations of Ezekiel 1 and 11:16, the divine 'throne' and the 'sanctuary in small measure', are possible. They represent glimpses of the divine, much as the Temple vision of chs 40-42 reports a sight of the heavenly archetype, the 'real' Temple, of which the Temple of Jerusalem was only ever a copy and a shadow. It is this theology of transcendence that undergirds the theology of universalism. This is indeed a rich theology, with its finely-balanced dialectic between the presence of Israel's God with his people wherever they are and his honouring of the particular place of the special revelation of his holiness, and also, as we have now seen, a nuanced balance between the immanence of the deity and his overarching transcendence.

Ascent to Heaven in Antiquity (1992)

The motif of the journey to heaven is a vitally important phenomenon of ancient Mediterranean religions. There are five figures in the Bible who, according to standard Jewish and Christian interpretation, are reported to have ascended to heaven: Enoch (Gen 5:24); Elijah (2 Kgs 2:1-12); Jesus (Luke 24:51; Acts 1:9); Paul (2 Cor 12:2-4); and John (Rev 4:1). There are also four related accounts in which individuals behold the throne, or heavenly court, of Yahweh: Moses, Aaron, and the elders of Israel (Exod 24:9-11); Micaiah (1 Kgs 22:19-23); Isaiah (Isa 6:1-13); and Ezekiel (Ezk 1, 10). Finally, there is the scene in which an otherwise unidentified "son of man" comes before the throne of God in an apocalyptic vision of Daniel (Dan 7:11-14). This notion, that mortals enter into, or behold, the realm of the immortal God (or gods) undergoes various complicated developments from the Ancient Near Eastern into the Hellenistic period. It is closely related to a number of other topics such as the descent or journey to the underworld of the dead, the heavenly destiny of the immortal soul, the apotheosis or divinization of selected mortals (rulers, philosophers, divine men), and aspects of Greco-Roman, Jewish and Christian mysticism. Sorting through this complex conceptual web, and trying to understand these Biblical texts with their contexts and complicated traditional development, has occupied historians of ancient religions for the past 150 years (Bousset 1901; Segal 1980).

The motif of the heavenly journey can be divided into four basic types or categories, based upon the fundamental purpose or outcome of the ascent as reported in a given text. Generally speaking, the first two categories are more characteristic of the Ancient Near Eastern, or archaic period, which would include most texts of the Hebrew Bible (Old Testament). The latter two categories are more typical of the Hellenistic period, which reflects the perspective of the New Testament.

1. Ascent as an invasion of heaven.

In the cosmology reflected throughout most of the Hebrew Bible mortal humankind belongs on earth, not in heaven, and at death descends below to the nether world known as Sheol. Psalms 115 expresses this succinctly:

The heaven's are the LORD'S heavens, but the earth he has given to the sons of men.
The dead do not praise the LORD, nor do any that go down into silence.
But we will bless the LORD from this time forth and for evermore.

Generally speaking, just as there is no coming back from the dead, there is no idea or expectation that humans can go to heaven, a place reserved for God and his angelic attendants. This means that any report of a human being ascending to heaven would be seen as not only extraordinary, but often even as an intrusion or invasion of the divine realm. In an Akkadian text, Adapa, the son of Ea, attempts to ascend to heaven to obtain eternal life but is cast back down to earth (Pritchard 1969:101-3). A somewhat similar story is told of Etana, one of the legendary rulers of the Sumerian dynasty of Kish (Pritchard 1969: 114-18). A direct protest against such an ascent is found in Isa 14:12-20 (compare Ezk 28:11-19). There the prideful King of Babylon, who wants to ascend to heaven and become like God, is cast down to the nether world of worms and maggots (v 11). The ironic language of Prov 30:2-4 (compare Job 26; 38:1-42:6), though not a tale of ascent, emphasizes the contrast between the human and divine realms. A similar idea lies behind Deut 29:29 and 30:11-14. There is no need for one to ascend to heaven to learn the "secret things" which belong to God (compare Sir 3:21-22). Lucian's tale, Icaromenippus, though from the Roman imperial period, typifies this understanding of ascent to heaven as an invasion of the realm of the gods.

The accounts of Enoch and Elijah are best understood in this context. First and foremost, they are extraordinary. The normal fate, even of great heroes of the Hebrew Bible such as Abraham, Moses, and David, is death or "rest" in Sheol (Gen 25:7-9; Deut 34:6; 1 Kgs 2:10, cf Acts 2:29-34). Furthermore, both texts, particularly the one about Enoch, are ambiguous. Genesis 5:24, from the P source, in lieu of recording Enoch's death, simply says "Enoch walked with God; and he was not, for God took him." Where he was taken, the text does not say. Though the bulk of later Jewish and Christian tradition understood this text as ascent to heaven (Charlesworth 1983: 1: 3-315; Tabor 1989), this was not universally the case (compare Heb 11:5, 13-16). The author might have had in mind a journey "Beyond," to some special region on this earth (e.g. "Isles of the Blessed"), as in the cases of Gilgamesh's Utnapishtim or Menelaus in Homer. Such might also be the case with Elijah. Though he is clearly taken from the earthly scene in a chariot of fire that rises to heaven like a whirlwind, the author might well have had in mind his removal or "retirement" to some remote area. If so, "heaven" in this text is equivalent to "sky," and the author does not intend to imply that Elijah joined Yahweh as an immortal in the heavenly court. This appears to be the understanding of the Chronicles who reports that much later, Jehoram, king of Judah, receives a letter written by Elijah (2 Chronicles 21:12-15).

2. Ascent to receive revelation.

This type of ascent involves a "round trip" from earth to heaven and back again, or some visionary experience of the heavenly court from which one returns to normal experience (ascent/descent). In contrast to the previous type, the journey or experience is appraised most positively. The earth, not heaven, is still understood as the proper human place, so that the ascent remains a "visit," though not an intrusion, into the divine realm.

The complex literary traditions surrounding the ascent of Moses on Mount Sinai, now found in Exodus 24, though not explicitly referring to a journey to heaven, are closely related to this category. Moses (or alternatively Moses, Aaron and the seventy elders), in ascending the mountain, enter the presence of God, the realm of the divine. He is given revelation in the form of heavenly tablets, then descends back to the mortal realm. Though he is not explicitly deified or enthroned, he becomes a semi-divine figure, eating and drinking in the divine presence and returning from the mountain with his face transformed like an immortal (Exodus 24:11; 34:29-30). In later interpretation this was understood as full deification (see Philo, De vita Mosis 2.290-91; De virt. 73-75; Ezekiel the Tragedian 668-82). The prophetic call of Isaiah is a further example of this same pattern (Isaiah 6:1-3). Since there is no specific reference to Isaiah being "taken up," this is a "visionary ascent," though the distinction between the two types is not always clear (see 2 Cor 12:2-4). He sees "The LORD sitting on a throne, high and lifted up" (v 1). He is then given a message with a corresponding prophetic commission. As a mortal, he is out of place in the divine realm; he cries out "Woe is me! For I am lost; for I am a man of unclean lips . . . for my eyes have seen the King, the LORD of hosts!" (v 5). The throne visions of Ezekiel (Ezekiel 1, 10) should be compared here, as well as the scene before the throne of the "Ancient of Days" in Daniel 7:14 where a "son of man" is given cosmic rulership over all nations. Micaiah's vision of the heavenly court also belongs under this category (1 Kings 22:19-23). In all of these texts the ascent or vision of the heavenly throne serves as a way of claiming the highest and most direct heavenly authority for the message. Such experiences are clearly evaluated as more noteworthy than the epiphany of an angelic messenger or receipt of a prophetic "word of the LORD." Widengren (1950) has traced this motif of royal or prophetic enthronement (ascent, initiation into heavenly secrets, receipt of a divine commission) into later Jewish traditions involving kingship, prophetic commissions and the revelation of secret heavenly lore. This understanding of ascent dominates one of the oldest sections of 1 Enoch, the Book of the Watchers (chaps. 1-36). The legendary figure Enoch is taken through the heavenly realms and shown cosmic secrets, even appearing before God's lofty throne. The Greek version of the Testament of Levi (2nd century B.C.E.) draws upon the ascent motif in a similar way, as does the Latin Life of Adam and Eve (1st century C.E.) and the Apocalypse of Abraham. In each of these texts the ascent to heaven functions as a vehicle of revelation, offering divine authority to the cosmological and eschatological lore the authors were expounding.

The closest non-Jewish, or Greek, parallel to this notion of ascent is probably Parmenides' prooemium, which survives in only a few fragments (Taran 1965). He tells of being taken in a chariot through the gate leading to daylight, where he is received and addressed by a goddess. On the whole, for Greeks in the archaic period, revelations came through epiphanies, oracles, dreams, omens, and signs of various sorts, not by being taken before the throne of Zeus. The fair number of Jewish (and Jewish-Christian) texts which make use of ascent to heaven as a means of legitimating rival claims of revelation and authority is likely due to the polemics and party politics that characterized the Second Temple period. It became a characteristic way, in the Hellenistic period, of claiming "archaic" authority of the highest order, equal to a Enoch or Moses, for ones vision of things.

3. Ascent to immortal heavenly life.

This type of ascent to heaven is final or "one way:" a mortal obtains immortality, or release from mortal conditions, thorough a permanent ascent to the heavenly realms. Broadly, there are two overlapping ideas involved here, both of which have been extensively investigated. First, that a hero, ruler, or extraordinary individual has obtained immortal heavenly existence (Farnell 1921; Guthrie 1950; Bieler 1935-36; M. Smith 1971; Gallagher 1982). Second, the more general idea that the souls of humankind, bound by mortal conditions, can obtain release to immortal heavenly life (Rhode 1925; Bousset 1901; Burkert 1985). The second is not merely a later democratization of the first, rather, the two exist side by side throughout the Hellenistic period. While they are distinct from one another, both are related to a fundamental shift in the perception of the proper human place. Increasingly in this period one encounters the notion that humans actually belong in heaven, with life on earth seen as either a "fall" or temporary subjection to mortal powers (Nilsson 1969: 96-185; J. Z. Smith 1975).

The only candidates for such immortalization in the Hebrew Bible are Enoch and Elijah, though, as noted above, both texts are ambiguous. As early as the Maccabean period (2nd century B.C.E.) Daniel speaks of the righteous dead being resurrected and "shining like the stars forever and ever," having obtained immortality (12:3). A similar notion is found in the Wisdom of Solomon, where the "souls of the righteous" are promised immortal life (3:1-9). Gradually, in Jewish and Christian texts of the Hellenistic period, the older idea of the dead reposing in Sheol forever is replaced with either a notion of the resurrection of the dead or the immortality of the soul or some combination of the two (Nickelsburg 1972). Both ideas involve the notion of a final ascent to heaven.

The NT reflects this Hellenistic perspective in which mortals can obtain heavenly immortality. Matthew 13:43, reflecting the language and influence of Daniel, asserts that "the righteous will shine like the sun in the kingdom of their Father." Eternal life is promised to the righteous throughout the NT corpus (Mark 9:42-48; Q [Matt 10:32-33=Luke 12:8]; Matt 25:46; Acts 13:48; John 3:16; 14:1-3; Rom 6:23; Col 3:1-4; 1 Tim 1:16; Heb 12:22-23; Jas 1:12; 1 Pet 1:4; 2 Pet 1:4; 1 John 5:11; Jude 21; Rev 20). In most cases this involves ascent to heaven and life before the throne of God (1 Thess 4:13-18; Rev 7:9-17). According to the NT, the righteous of the OT, such as Abraham, Moses, and the prophets, are included in this promised resurrection to immortal heavenly life (Heb 11). In the NT the ascent of Jesus to heaven is the paradigm for all those righteous mortals who follow. Just as he was raised from the dead, made immortal, and ascended to the Father, so will followers experience the same at his return (John 14: 1-3; 1 Cor 15: 20-28; Rom 8:29-30). The state of the the righteous souls who have died prior to the time of the end and the resurrection and ascent to heaven is not always clear. Paul seems to prefer the metaphor of "sleep," which parallels the Hebrew Bible notion of Sheol (1 Thess 4:13; 5:10; 1 Cor 15:18-20). But in two places he might imply that these "souls" or "spirits" depart immediately at death and ascend to the presence of Christ in heaven (Phil 1: 21-24; 2 Cor 5:1-10). In Revelation the "souls of the martyrs" are pictured as under the altar, presumably in heaven, longing for their time of vindication (6:9-11). In distinction to both of these views, the story of the rich man and the beggar Lazarus, unique to Luke, pictures the Hadean world of the dead, which is below not above, as a place in which rewards and punishments are already being experienced prior to the final resurrection and judgment (Luke 16:19-31). This latter text is more in concert with other Jewish materials of the period which see the "dead" as conscious, but in the Hadean world below, awaiting the resurrection and last judgment (cf. Rev 20:11-15). There is no uniform NT view of this subject of the "state of the dead."

Surprisingly, an actual narrative account of the ascent of Jesus to heaven occurs only in Luke (24:51, but see textual variants; Acts 1:9). It is assumed in Matthew and Mark and spoken of in John (20:17) and Paul (Rom 8:34). A similar resurrection from the dead followed by bodily ascension to heaven is prophesied for the "two witnesses" in the book of Revelation (11:7-12). They are God's final prophets before the return of Christ and the last judgment. The contrast between the NT and the Hebrew Bible regarding this expectation of ascent to heaven could not be more striking. Other than the doubtful examples of Enoch and Elijah, it is not until the book of Daniel, which is perhaps the latest text in the canon of the Hebrew Bible, that one finds any reference to mortals ascending to heavenly life (some would include Isa 26:19; Job 14:14-16 is a longing, not an affirmation). The NT is fully a part of the process of Hellenization in which notions of resurrection from the dead, immortality of the soul, and ascent to heaven were the norm rather than the exception.

4. Ascent as a foretaste of the heavenly world

This type of ascent involves a journey or "visit" to heaven which functions as a foretaste or anticipation of a final or permanent ascent to heavenly life. Though related to the second category, ascent to receive revelation, it is fundamentally different. For example, when Isaiah is taken before God's throne, though he receives a commission and experiences the glories of the heavenly world, there is no idea that he will return to that realm. He remains a mortal who dies and descends to Sheol with all the other dead.

The earliest example of this notion of ascent is in the Similitudes of Enoch (1 Enoch 37-71), probably dating from the 1st century B.C.E. In chapter 39 Enoch relates how he was taken to heaven. The experience transforms him (39:14) and he is told that he will later ascend to heaven permanently and receive glory and immortal heavenly life (chaps. 70-71). Second (Slavonic) Enoch also reflects a similar pattern. Enoch's journey through the seven heavens, which lasts 60 days (chaps. 1-20), is followed by a return to earth. The experience transforms him and functions in anticipation of his final translation to heaven.

Christians later took up and elaborated this understanding of ascent from such Jewish models, as seen in texts such as the Ascension of Isaiah. In the New Testament we have the striking firsthand account of Paul's own experience of ascent to Paradise (2 Cor 12:2-4). This text provides evidence for the actual "practice" of ascent to heaven in Jewish-Christian circles during this period, in contrast to a purely literary motif adopted to lend heavenly authority to a text. Obviously, Paul's experience functions as a highly privileged foretaste of the heavenly glorification which he expected at the return of Christ (Tabor 1986).

There are definite links between the language and ideas of these Jewish texts from Second Temples times, the testimony of Paul, and the Tannaitic and Amoraic Merkabah (and later Hekhalot) traditions (Scholem 1960; Gruenwald 1980; Halperin 1980).

It is noteworthy that Paul's testimony in 2 Corinthians 12:2-4 remains our only firsthand auto-biographical account of such an experience from the Second Temple period.

In Later Apocalypses, Three-Tier Cosmology Largely Displaced By More Complex Model Of Seven Heavens; The Idea That Universe Is Temple, Corresponding In Structure To Temple In Jerusalem Or At Least To Ideal Form, Continues To Pervade This Literature

“Paradise Now:” Essays on Early Jewish and Christian Mysticism

Steve St. Clair's notes:

Jewish and Christian Ascents to Heaven were based on descriptions of Solomon's Temple in the Old Testament books of Ezekiel, Isaiah, and Second Kings, and originally depicted three levels in heaven corresponding to the threefold division in the Old-Testament temple. In Morray-Jones's words:

Enoch's journey to heaven leads him into a temple whose threefold structure, consisting of concentric houses surrounded by a wall, corresponds closely to that of the earthly sanctuary in Jerusalem. "The two -houses" correspond to the sanctuary building and the holy of holies. The wall (v. 9, according to the Ethiopic text) of white marble corresponds either to the wall surrounding the inner courts of the temple or, perhaps, to the balustrade beyond which no Gentile was allowed to pass. The wheels of God's throne identify it as Ezekiel's merkabah, and the cherubim mentioned in the same verse are clearly identical with Ezekiel's living creatures. The structure of this celestial temple involves a curious reversal of normality: the inner of the two "houses" is larger than the outer (vv. 15-16).

The threefold structure of the temple in First Enoch 14 reflects a cosmology of three heavens, which is also attested in other parts of the early Enoch literature. An early form of the Testament of Levi employed a similar three-tier cosmology, although the number of heavens was increased to seven in later versions. Here again the highest heaven, the "dwelling place of the Great Glory" is called "the holy of holies." As observed by Himmelfarb, in the extended version of the text the chambers of the Temple are identical with the higher celestial levels.

In the later apocalypses, the three-tier cosmology is largely displaced by a more complex model of seven heavens. As Himmelfarb has shown, the idea that the universe is a temple, corresponding in structure to the temple in Jerusalem (or at least to the ideal form thereof), continues to pervade this literature.

Morray-Jones Paper:

The celestial temple is a central motif of Jewish apocalyptic literature and of the "merkabah mystical" traditions preserved in the hekhalot ("palaces" or "temples") writings of the rabbinic and immediately post-rabbinic periods. For examples, see R. G. Hamerton-Kelly, "The Temple and the Origins of Jewish Apocalyptic" (VT 20: 1970); Martha Himmelfarb, "Apocalyptic Ascent and the Heavenly Temple" (SBL Seminar Papers 1987); idem., Ascent to Heaven in Jewish and Christian Apocalypses (1993); Allen J. McNichol, "The Heavenly Sanctuary in Judaism: A Model for tracing the origins of the Apocalypse" (JReIS 1987); Craig R. Koester, "The Dwelling of God: The Tabernacle in the Old Testament, Intertestamental Jewish Literature, and New Testament" (CBQMS 1989); Rachel Elijior, "From Earthly Temple to Heavenly Shrines: Prayer and Sacred Song in the Hekhalot Literature and its relation to Temple Traditions" (JSQ 1997). In these sources, the ascent into heaven is envisaged as a journey through the courts of a cosmic temple to the innermost sanctuary where God appears in the form of a vast manlike figure of fire or light, called the "Power" or "Glory" seated upon the throne of glory (kissei_hakavod), also called the "chariot" (merkavah).

This imagery is deeply rooted in the Hebrew biblical tradition. For examples, see above all Jon D. Levensen, "The Temple and the World" (JR 64:1984m 275-98; and idem., Sinai and Zion: An Entry into the Jewish Bible (1985). See also E. Theodore Mullen, Jr., The Divine Council in Canaanite and Early Hebrew Literature (1980), 147-69, and Margaret Barker, The Gate of Heaven: The History and Symbolism of the Temple in Jerusalem (1991) 151-2. The term merkabah is derived from I Chronicles 28:18, where it refers to the chariot of the cherubims that carried the ark of the covenant in the holy of holies. In Isaiah 6, a central text of the later mystical tradition, the prophet encounters the enthroned deity in the holy of holies of the temple:

In the year the King Uzziah died, I saw the LORD sitting upon a high and exalted throne, and the train of his robe filled the temple. Above Him stood the Seraphim. Each one had six wings, two covering his face, two covering his feet, and two with which he flew. And they were calling to one another, "Holy! Holy! Holy is the LORD of Hosts! The whole earth is full of His Glory!" At the sound of their voices, the doorposts and thresholds shook and the House was filled with smoke.

The seraphim that Isaiah sees above the throne evidently correspond to the cherubim of 1 Chronicles 28:18, whose wings were outstretched above the ark. God's throne is, therefore, already identified with the chariot by which the ark was carried, as it is in the later esoteric sources.

Several commentators have maintained that there is a fundamental difference between the visions of the biblical prophets and the heavenly ascents described by the later apocalyptic writers. The prophets, it is argued, did not claim to have ascended to heaven but experienced their visions while remaining on the earth. Thus Isaiah's vision is said to have occurred in the earthly temple and not, as in the later apocalypses, its heavenly counterpart. This distinction may be somewhat overstated. Although it is true that detailed accounts of heavenly ascents are not found in the prophetic writings, the vision of the heavenly council provides the context for the commissioning of the prophet, who therefore experiences himself as present at the scene. George Widengren, moreover, has shown that the forms of these commissioning narratives originated in pre-biblical Mesopotamian enthronement ceremonies in which the king, having ritually entered the heavenly palace of the god, is awarded the status of a "sent one," like Enoch, Daniel, and other ascending heroes of the apocalypses, Isaiah is a participant in the action. His mouth is purified by an angel with a coal from the altar (Isaiah 6:6-7), after which he engages in a dialogue with God, volunteering his services and receiving his instructions (Isaiah 6:8-13).

Similar considerations apply to the commissioning scene in Ezekiel 1-3, which appears to take place not on earth but above the firmament, where the throne is said to be located (Ezekiel 1:20). Having fallen on his face (Ezekiel 1:28), the prophet gets up and interacts with the figure on the throne, eating the scroll that he offers him and receiving his commission (Ezekiel 2:1-3:11). Following this, he is returned to earth by a wind, which appears to be generated by the wings of the living creatures (Ezekiel 3:12) and, perhaps, to be identical with the words conventionally translated "spirit of the living creatures" of Ezekiel 1:20-21. Although Ezekiel is a priest, his vision does not occur in the earthly sanctuary but in Babylonia.

Isaiah is not said to be a priest and so is not permitted to enter the sanctuary on earth. He must, therefore, have been relocated in his vision. Whether the house into which he has been transported is the earthly temple or its celestial counterpart is nowhere specified, and it is perhaps doubtful whether this distinction would have been very meaningful to the author, for whom the ritual identification of the one with the other was not merely a dramatic metaphor. As observed by Levenson:

Isaiah is privileged to see the difference between the earthly antitype and the heavenly archetype disappear. Iconography becomes the reality it symbolizes ("The Jerusalem Temple in Devotional and Visionary Experience" (1986)).

The ritual identification of the earthly sanctuary with the heavenly throne room was, then, a central theme of the pre-exilic cult tradition, as expressed, for example, in the poetic parallelism of Psalms 11:4:

The Lord is in the temple of his holiness: the seat in the heavens is his throne.

I. Visions of the Enthroned Glory

Under the conditions of the exile, access to the divine throne via the physical temple in Jerusalem was, of course, no longer possible. Ezekiel's visions of the enthroned "Glory of the Lord" drawn on awesome wheels by mysterious living creatures, who are identified in Ezekiel 10:11-15 with the temple cherubim, occurred in response to this situation and provided an assurance that the heavenly reality was still accessible by other means. When the prophet is transported to and conducted around the temple of the future (Ezekiel 40-48), what he sees is, presumably, a celestial archetype, since it does yet not exist on earth.

Perhaps the earliest occurrence of the term merkabah in connection with Ezekiel's vision is in Sirach 19:8:

It was Ezekiel who saw the vision of the Glory, which was shown to him upon a chariot of cherubim.

The earliest detailed account of an ascent into heaven, however, occurs in I Enoch 14:8-25:

And it was shown unto me thus in a vision – Behold, there were clouds in the vision calling me, and thunderclouds were crying out to me, and stars and lightning flashes were hastening me and driving me on, and winds, in my vision, were bearing me aloft, and they lifted me upwards and carried me into heaven. And I went in until I approached a wall, built of hailstones, with tongues of fire surrounding it; and it began to terrify me. And I went into the tongues of fire, and approached a great house built of hailstones; and the walls of the house were like smooth ashlars, and they were all of snow, and the floors were of snow, and the ceiling was like shooting stars and lightning flashes; and between them were fiery cherubim, and their heaven was water; and a flaming fire surrounded the walls; and the doors were ablaze with fire. And I went into the house, hot as fire and cold as ice; and there was in it no sustenance for life, and fear overcame me and threatening seized me. And, shaking and trembling, I fell on my face. And I saw in my vision, and beheld another house greater than this one, with its door wide open before me, all built of tongues of fire. And in every respect, it excelled in glory and honor and greatness, so I was unable to express its glory and its greatness. And its floor was of fire, above which were lightning flashes and shooting stars, and its ceiling was a blazing fire. And I looked and saw a lofty throne; and its appearance was, as it were, and its wheels were like the shining sun, and there was the sound of cherubim. And from beneath the throne issued rivers of blazing fire, and I was unable to look at it. And the great glory was sitting upon it, and his garment was brighter than the sun, and whiter than any snow. No angel was able to enter this house, or to see His face, on account of its splendor and glory, and no flesh could look at Him. A flaming fire was round about him, and a great fire stood before him, and none of those who surrounded Him could come near Him. Ten thousand times ten thousand stood before him. He needed no counsel, for his every word was a deed, but the most holy angels who are near him turn not away nor depart from him at night. As for me, until then I had been prostrate on my face, shuddering and trembling; but the Lord called me with his own mouth and said to me: Come hear, Enoch, and hear my word.” And one of the holy ones approached me, and raised me to my feet, and led me to the door, and I bowed my face down low.

Here Enoch's journey to heaven leads him into a temple whose threefold structure, consisting of concentric houses surrounded by a wall, corresponds closely to that of the earthly sanctuary in Jerusalem. "The two - houses" correspond to the sanctuary building and the holy of holies. The wall (v. 9, according to the Ethiopic text) of white marble corresponds either to the wall surrounding the inner courts of the temple or, perhaps, to the balustrade beyond which no Gentile was allowed to pass. The wheels of God's throne identify it as Ezekiel's merkabah, and the cherubim mentioned in the same verse are clearly identical with Ezekiel's living creatures. The structure of this celestial temple involves a curious reversal of normality: the inner of the two "houses" is larger than the outer (vv. 15-16).

I have argued elsewhere that the threefold structure of the temple in First Enoch 14 reflects a cosmology of three heavens, which is also attested in other parts of the early Enoch literature. According to the majority of commentators, an early form of the Testament of Levi employed a similar three-tier cosmology, although the number of heavens was increased to seven in later versions. Here again the highest heaven, the "dwelling place of the Great Glory" is called "the holy of holies." As observed by Himmelfarb, in the extended version of the text the chambers of the Temple are identical with the higher celestial levels.

In the later apocalypses, the three-tier cosmology is largely displaced by a more complex model of seven heavens. As Himmelfarb has shown, the idea that the universe is a temple, corresponding in structure to the temple in Jerusalem (or at least to the ideal form thereof), continues to pervade this literature. A similar idea is expressed by Philo:

The whole universe must be regarded as the highest and, in truth, the holy temple of God. As sanctuary it has the heaven, the most holy part of the substance of existing things: as votive offerings it has stars; as priests it has angels, ministers of His Presence.

2. The Merkabah at Qumran

The Qumran sectarians, who believed the temple in Jerusalem to have been defiled and its cult perverted by a corrupt and illegitimate priesthood, evidently attached great significance to the prophecies of Ezekiel. It is perhaps possible that the site of the community settlement was chosen on the basis of Ezekiel 47:1-12, which states that in the last days a river will flow eastward from beneath the temple and revitalize the waters of the Dead Sea. In the Damascus Rule, the foundation of the Sect is dated to 390 years after the exile, on the basis of Ezekiel 4:4-5. In the same document, the leaders of the sect are identified with the "sons of Zadok" who, according to Ezekiel 44:15, are to serve as priests in the restored and purified temple of the coming age.

The most significant locus of merkabah material at Qumran occurs in the thirteen Songs of the Sabbath Sacrifice, which form a liturgical cycle intended for performance on the thirteen Sabbaths of the first quarter of the year according to the fixed solar calendar observed by the community. It is unknown whether or not the cycle was repeated during the second, third, and fourth quarters of the year. This is certainly possible, but we shall find that its integration with the first quarter of the cultic calendar was especially significant. ...

Each song begins with a summons to praise God, addressed to the angels, and goes on to describe the performance of the angelic liturgy. The heavenly temple is divided into seven sanctuaries (debirim) or, in two instances, also raised paths (netivot), each under the presidency of an angelic prince. The first five songs of the cycle deal with the angelic priestly councils of the lower debirim and create the framework of a ritual journey through the courts of the temple toward the sacred center. As observed by Newsom:

The language of songs 6-8, at the heart of the cycle, is characterized by a repetitious and hypnotic quality, suggestive of an increase in intensity of devotion.

In these songs especially, the number seven occupies a main role (cf. Masada Shirshabb 11.16-22; song 61).

The sixth song marks a transition, corresponding to entry from the outer courts of the temple into the sanctuary proper, the seventh song, at the heart of the cycle, taking us into the holy of holies. Here, instead of a single call to the angels to worship God, we find a series of seven such calls. These are almost certainly addressed to the angelic councils of the seven debirim. The temple itself is portrayed as an animate structure, and its architectural features and appointments as angelic entities who participate in the praise of God.

It is important to observe that according to this passage, the innermost sanctuary of the heavenly temple is also the highest heaven. This is indicated by the parallel expressions "firmament of His holy sanctuary" and "firmament of the uppermost heaven." The uppermost heaven, moreover, is said to have beams and walls. As in I Enoch and Testament of Levi, the courts and chambers of the temple are, in fact, the celestial levels. The temple is not "in" heaven; its seven sanctuaries are the heavens.

Carol Newsom observes that the praise of these multiple merkavot from the Qumran texts may well be related to the expression "debir to debir with the sound of holy multitudes"; in which case the merkavot are involved in the process of "relaying" the praise of God from the lower debirim to the higher ones. This might mean that there are seven merkavot, one in each sanctuary or heaven. The image of a throne in each of seven heavens is found, for example in The Ascension of Isaiah, to a minor midrash entitled The Visions of Ezekiel, and in Hekhalot Zutarti. On the other hand, MT Psalm 68:18 states that the chariots of God are "twenty thousand and two thousand" and a midrashic tradition attributed to rabbis of the third and fourth centuries, and to a mysterious "band that came up from Babylonia," takes this to mean that "twenty-two thousand chariots of ministering angels descended with the Holy One, blessed be he, at Sinai."

The language of the text as a whole is very similar to that of the Sabbath Songs, and the reference to a plurality of merkabot should be noted. Nitzan identifies allusions to the merkavah descriptions of Daniel 7:9, Isaiah 6, and, indirectly, Ezekiel 1:26-27 and 8:2. There are detailed allusions to biblical lists of divine attributes occurring in contexts associated with renewal of the Sinai covenant (Exodus 34:6-7; Deuteronomy 10:17, 21) and to descriptions of the Sinai theophany in Moses' final blessing (Deuteronomy 33:2-5, 26-27). Allusions to Psalm 68 are also evident, especially in the second fragment.

A passage in the later hekhalot literature tells of vast numbers of angelic merkabot who, with their accompanying "flames," relay God's praises from the lowest sanctuary to the highest. In the seventh hekhal, the fiery chariot-thrones say:

Blessed be the King of the kings of kings, the Lord, the Lord of every power!
Who is like God, who lives and endures?
His praise is in the highest heavens!
His holy kingdom is in the most exalted and highest heavens!
His Power is in the innermost chambers!
Sanctification from here, and sanctification from there!

And they pour out song unceasingly, and commemorate the Name of Neturiel the lord God of Israel, saying:

Blessed be the name of His glorious kingdom for ever and ever from the place of the House of His indwelling!

These angelic merkabot are distinctly reminiscent of the "repeaters" of God's praise of Gad encountered in Lxx Ezekiel 43:2 (cf. Psalms 68:18-19), and it may well be that the expression "debir to debir with the sound of holy multitudes" in the seventh song of the Qumran cycle refers to a scenario very much like that described in this hekhalot passage. The formulaic style of the hekhalot passage is quite similar to what we find in the Sabbath Songs. The image of praise being relayed and repeated by the angels, which is reflected in the antiphonal structure of the Songs themselves, may also be associated with the calling of the seraphim "one to another" as they recite the Kedusha (Isaiah 6:3).

As observed above, the seventh song, marking the entrance to the holy of holies, brings the first half of the ritual cycle to its climax. The eighth song is only fragmentarily preserved but appears to be closely parallel to song 6. Songs 9-11 describe in detail the vestibules, courts, and furnishings of the temple. There are numerous references to celestial life-forms whose images are carved on the interior walls. These correspond to the carvings of cherubim, trees, and flowers in both Solomon's temple and Ezekiel's ideal form (I Kings 6:18-36; 2 Chronicles 3:5-6; Ezekiel 40:31-34; 41:17-26). As in the previous songs, they are animate beings and participate in the praise of God.

Newsom regards the seventh song as the climax of the Sabbath Songs cycle as a whole, forming the apex of a liturgical pyramid structure. I suggest that this analysis requires modification and that the seventh song is, in fact, no more than a preliminary crescendo. In my opinion, it is the twelfth song, falling on the Sabbath following the covenant renewal ceremony of 4QBerahot that forms the true climax of the liturgical cycle as a whole. This song describes the manifestation of the Glory upon the merkabah.

The second half of the Sabbath Songs cycle is evidently based on the description of the ideal temple in Ezekiel 40-48, and Newsom is clearly right to connect the passage shown above with the vision described in Ezekiel 43:1-5, where the Glory on the merkabah returns to the holy of holies:

'Then he brought me in the gate that faces eastward; and behold, the Glory of the God of Israel coming from the east! His voice was like the sound of many waters, and the earth was illuminated by his Glory. And the vision that I saw was like the vision that I had seen when he came to destroy the city, and like the vision that I had seen by the River Khebar, and I fell upon my face. And the Glory of the Lord came into the house by way of the gate that faced eastward. Then the Spirit lifted me up and brought me to the inner court, and the Glory of the Lord filled the house.

Newsom comments:

I would suggest that the author of the Shirot, still following the outline of Ezekiel 40-48, first describes the structure of the heavenly temple and then gave an account of the entry of the divine chariot throne into the temple and the appearance of its glory there, an account modelled after Ezekiel 43:1-5 but enriched with details from Ezekiel 1 and 10.

The thirteenth and final song of the Qumran cycle describes the sacrifices performed before the divine throne by the angelic priests and, especially, their ritual vestments. Fletcher-Louis considers these figures to be identical with the senior priests of the community, who are held to be the embodiments of the divine Glory itself. He concludes, therefore, that the climax of the cycle is located in neither the seventh song (as advocated by Newsom) nor the twelfth (as proposed by me) but in the thirteenth: it is here, in the thirteenth, that the liturgy truly reaches its climax with a vision of the community's priesthood taking the place of the occupant of the throne-chariot. It is in the thirteenth song that the human form seated on God's throne to Ezekiel 1 comes into view. The human high priesthood here makes manifest the anthropomorphic appearance of the Glory of the Lord.

This conclusion follows from Fletcher-Louis's very detailed and insightful exegesis of the cycle as a whole, in which he demonstrates that a relationship of "functional synchronicity" and "spatial overlap" exists between the priestly community on earth and the angelic denizens of the heavenly temple. It is undoubtedly true that the Qumran sectarians considered themselves to be in fellowship with the celestial hosts and attributed to themselves, (quasi-) angelic status. Moreover, the glory of the celestial Adam (or logos) was ritually embodied in the person of the high priest, and that his vestments were symbolic of that glory is, as Fletcher-Louis shows, by no means unique to the Qumran literature. His suggestion that at Qumran the chief priests of the holy community were considered in their liturgical function to be visible manifestations of the divine glory is not merely plausible but probable almost to the point of certainty. The role of this "glorified" human priesthood is to represent and mediate the divine glory to the community of worshipers, which is thereby incorporated into the celestial hierarchy of glory.

Fletcher-Louis seems, however, to imply that the celestial Glory has no other mode of visible appearance than in the person(s) of the Priest(s), and in this he overstates his case. The clothing of the priests with glory in the thirteenth song—if this is indeed what is happening—is an expression of their mystical communion with the divine glory, which in turn facilitates the union between the community's worship and the liturgy of the angels. It does not mean that the cosmic function of the manifest Glory has wholly usurped in the person(s) of the priest(s). Thus, while the glorification of the priests in song 13 may legitimately be regarded as, in a sense, climactic; it flows as a consequence from the descent of the glory to the sanctuary, as described in song 12. This descent, which, as we have seen, was preceded by the covenant-renewal ceremony of Shavuot, seems, therefore, to form a more fitting climax to the cycle as a whole. It may further be noted that, according to Flayutin, the lunar date of Ezekiel's merkabab vision "in the fourth month, on the fifth day of the month" (Ezekiel 1:1) corresponds in the solar calendar to either the fourteenth or the fifteenth day of the third month, that is, to the eleventh Sabbath or, as is perhaps more likely, to the festival of Shavuot

Newsom describes the purpose of the Sabbath Songs cycle as "something like the praxis of a communal mysticism." which aimed to produce an intense experience of being present in the heavenly temple and participating in the worship of the angels!" She comments:

During the course of this thirteen week cycle, the community which recites the compositions is led through a lengthy preparation. The mysteries of the angelic priesthood are recounted, a hypnotic celebration of the sabbatical number seven produces an anticipatory climax at the center of the work, and the community is then gradually led through the spiritually animate temple until the worshippers experience the holiness of the merkabah and of the Sabbath Sacrifice as it is conducted by the high priests of the angels.

These songs, then, enabled the community to gain access to the heavenly temple and to join with the angelic hierarchy in its worship before the throne. By performing the liturgical cycle, the worshipers undertake a "ritual journey" which involves an "ascent" through the seven debirim (songs 1-7), followed by a detailed tour of the celestial temple, moving inwards toward the center, where the Glory manifests upon the throne. Another, perhaps better, way to understand this liturgy is to regard it as a process of "ritual construction." The performance of these songs, presumably combined with intensive visualization of the images described, will have had the effect of "building" the celestial temple in the personal and collective imagination of the participants.

The imperative formulae of the earthly hymns indicate that they are calling on the angels to participate with them in this ritual "temple building" project. The process of construction culminates in song II, which was performed immediately before the renewal of the community's covenant in the feast of Shavuot. On the two Sabbaths following this act of rededication, in songs 12 and 13, the divine Glory is called upon to indwell the temple that has been constructed by the now re-consecrated community, to clothe its priests with glory, and to receive its offerings. As observed above, it is the descent of the divine Glory in the holy of holies, described in song 12, that forms the true climax of the cycle. The sacred structure within which this manifestation occurs has been constructed by means of this extended ritual performance. The worship of the holy community and its celestial, angelic counterpart is, so to speak, the substance of which the temple is composed.

The idea that this spiritual temple is ritually constructed in and through the act of worship may perhaps be inherent in the very language and terminology of this remarkable liturgy. In addition to the emphasis on song and music that pervades the text, we have observed that, especially in the latter part of the cycle, this music is produced not only by the angels and the human worshipers but by the architectural components of the temple itself, which appears to be a living structure. The term debir, used of the seven courts or chambers of the temple, applies in scripture to the holy of holies (1 Kings 6:5-31; 7:49; 8:6-8; 2 Chronicles 3:16:4:20; 8:6-8; Psalms 28:2) and is probably derived from a common root with the Arabic word for "back" or "part behind." The King James Bible, however, renders the term by "oracle," a mistranslation that goes back via the Vulgate and that is based on the midrashic assumption that this word is derived from the root DBR, "to speak." it seems not impossible that the author of the Sabbath Songs may have made the same verbal association and interpreted the word DBR as indicative, in addition to its straightforward meaning, of "speech" or "utterance." If so, the phrase "debir to debir with the sound of holy multitudes" implies that the courts or sanctuaries of the temple are formed by the "utterances" of the angels and the worshiping community and that the heavenly temple is conceived of as a structure composed of living sound.

Elsewhere in the Scrolls, as is now widely recognized, the community itself is identified with the temple. The hierarchically ordered community thus embodies the living structure of the cosmic temple, and its members are incorporated into that celestial reality.

He has joined their assembly to the Sons of Heaven.
To be a Council of the Community,

A foundation of the Building of Holiness,
An eternal Plantation throughout all ages to come. (IQS 11:8-9)

The expression "an eternal plantation" reflects an ancient tradition according to which the temple, and especially the interior of the sanctuary building (corresponding to the sixth and seventh debirim of the Qumran model) is identified with the primordial garden of Eden, which was also the future paradise of the righteous. Incorporation into the structure of the temple confers "advance membership" of the world to come and is, at the same time, a return to humanity's original state of angelic purity. Thus, those who are admitted to this spiritual community "are destined to live for ever, and all the glory of Adam shall be theirs.

The same tradition occurs in a variety of rabbinic sources, where the righteous in the world to come are divided into seven hierarchal classes and where the garden of Eden is described as a series of seven concentric celestial chambers, built of gold, silver, and precious stones. This imagery appears to be derived at least in part from the language of Ezekiel's prophecy against the king of Tyre (Ezekiel 28:12-14):

You were the seal of perfect proportion, full of wisdom and perfect in beauty;
You were in Eden, the Garden of God; every precious stone adorned you.

Ruby, Topaz, and Emerald; Chrysolite, Onyx, and Jasper; Sapphire, Turquoise, and Beryl;
Your settings and mountings were made of Gold; they were prepared on the day of your creation.

You were the overshadowing, outstretched Cherub; for thus I appointed you;
You were upon God's holy mountain; you walked amongst fiery stones.

It has long been recognized that behind this passage lies a version of the primordial paradise tradition that is independent of, and possibly older than that preserved in Genesis 2-3. The description, then, referred originally to the primordial Adam who is the embodiment of the Divine Image or seal of perfect proportion and is here identified with the golden, bejewelled cherub whose outstretched wings overshadowed the ark in the holy of holies of the temple. That the rabbis were aware of this meaning of the passage is confirmed to several sources.

By about the first century C.E., the seven-level cosmology had largely displaced the three-tier model, although Paul in 2 Cor 12 equates paradise (i.e., the holy of holies) with the third heaven. The sevenfold model is most commonly found in rabbinic sources, although alternative traditions that enumerate two or three heavens are also sometimes mentioned. A correspondence between the cosmos and the structure of the temple is implied in m. Kehin 1:64, which lists ten areas of increasing holiness in Jerusalem, three outside the temple and seven within. Differing opinions are expressed about the precise divisions between these areas, but all agree that there were seven levels of holiness in the temple. According to Rabbi Yosi, these levels were as follows:

the area within the balustrade, from which Gentiles were excluded;
the court of women;
the court of Israel;
the court of the priests;
the area between the altar and the entrance to the sanctuary;
the sanctuary building; and the holy of holies.

This sevenfold conceptual structure doubtless reflects the seven planetary spheres of Greek cosmology and/or the seven heavens encountered in Sumerian and Babylonian magical texts. Since the sacred space of the temple is conceptually arranged in concentric "areas of holiness" around the ark or chariot on which

God's Glory is enthroned, it may be that the sevenfold structure also embodies "the appearance of the likeness of the Glory of the LORD" as described in Ezekiel 1:28:

As the appearance of the bow that is in the cloud on the day of rain, so was the appearance of the radiance that surrounded him

In other words, the seven heavens or courts of the temple may correspond to the bands of the rainbow-colored aura that surrounds the Glory on the throne. This hypothesis perhaps helps to explain an image encountered above, in song 12 of the Qumran cycle:

Like Hashmal, a radiant substance of glorious colors, wondrously hued and purely blended, are the spirits of the living elohim that move continuously with the glory of the wondrous chariots.

A similar description of the hashmal is encountered in Hekhalot Zutartei:

It is like the appearance of fire (Ezekiel 1:27), but it is not fire. Rather, it is like fiery flames of all kinds of color mixed together, and the eye cannot master their likenesses.

3. Descenders to the Merkavah

The hekhalot writings represent the continuation and adaptation of these traditions within rabbinic Judaism. They are so called because they describe, and give instructions regarding a visionary journey through seven concentric "palaces" or "temples" (corresponding to the debirim of the Sabbath Songs) to the celestial holy of holies, where the Glory appears on the merkavah. The methods employed by the "Merkabah mystics" included the recitation of hymns and prayers that are very similar in content and tone to those found in the Sabbath Songs, though often with the addition of long strings of ramina barbara. These hymns, some of which are said to have been revealed to Rabbi Akiva by the angels, must be known and recited correctly by the adept if he is to make the ascent in safety. One must also know the names of the angelic gatekeepers of the hekhalot and show them the correct magic seals, on which are inscribed the secret names of God. As in the apocalypses and the Sabbath Songs, the chambers of the temple (the seven hekhalot) are identical with the celestial levels.

In one important respect, however, the temple and the cosmos are structural opposites. The temple's areas of holiness are concentric upon the holy of holies. Ascent of the levels is therefore conceptualized as a journey "inward" to the center. The ascent into heaven, on the other hand, proceeds outward, away from the earth, so that the sphere of greatest holiness is assigned to the periphery. This dimensional shift may perhaps help to explain why in 1 Enoch 14 the "inner" house is greater than the "outer."

A similar apparent confusion of dimensional relationships is encountered in the hekhalot literature. The journey through the hekhalot to the merkabah is described both as an "ascent", and, somewhat disconcertingly, as a "descent." The two terminologies appear to be virtually interchangeable, but the mystics themselves are always called "descenders to the chariot" even where the narrative verb is 'to ascend.'" Various explanations of this puzzling terminology have been offered. Here mention should be made of Alan F. Segal's suggestion that the conception of the journey as a "descent" may be associated with the "fetal" position that, according to Hai Gaon of Pumbeditha (writing in the eleventh century CE) was adopted by the hekhalot practitioners.

You may be aware that many sages were of the belief that an individual possessing certain explicitly defined qualities who wishes to behold the Merkabah and the palaces of the heavenly angels has methods of achieving it. He must sit in fast for a certain number of days and lay his head between his knees and whisper to the ground many hymns and song, whose words are known from tradition. He then gazes into the inner rooms and chambers as if he were seeing the seven palaces with his own eyes, and beholds as if he were journeying from one palace to another and seeing what is there. "The posture described by Hai corresponds to that of Elijah on Mount Carmel in I Kings 18:42. Rabbinic sources state in passing that the first-century miracle worker Hanina ben Dosa adopted the same position when praying for the life of Yohanan ben Zakkai's son. Gershom Scholem found an intriguing parallel in a nineteenth century account. pia Chinese trance-somnabulist.

The idea that the Jerusalem temple embodies or reflects the structure of the universe is widely documented in rabbinic sources and in Josephus. The Even-haShati'ah, or foundation stone, beneath the altar possesses the attributes of an omphalos or "world-navel." Just as the Holy of Holies is said to be the sources of the light that shown forth on the first day of creation, so the foundation-stone, immediately outside the sanctuary, is identified with the primordial mound that emerged in the midst of the waters of chaos on day three. Josephus, moreover, tells us that the curtain at the entry to the sanctuary represented the firmament the was created on day two. Several midrashic sources add a further dimension to the model:

In the hour when the Holy One, Blessed by He, said to Moses, "And make me a sanctuary" (Exodus 25:8), Moses said, "How shall I know how to make it?" The Holy One, blessed be he, said "Do not be afraid. Just as I created the world and your body, so shall you make the tabernacle."

Whence do we know that this is so? You find in the tabernacle that the frames were fixed into the bases, and in the body the ribs are fixed into the vertebrae, and so in the world the mountains are fixed into the foundations of the earth. In the tabernacle, the frames were covered with gold, and in the body the ribs are covered with flesh, and in the world the mountains are covered and coated with earth. In the tabernacle, there were bolts in the frames to keep them upright, and in a body the limbs and sinews are extended to keep a man upright, and in the world, trees and plants are extended into the earth. In the tabernacle, there were curtains covering its top and both its sides, and in a man's body skin covers the limbs and ribs on both sides, and in the world, the heavens cover the earth on both its sides. In the tabernacle there was the veil separating the sanctuary from the Holy of Holies, and in the body the diaphragm divides the heart from the stomach, and in the world it is the firmament that divides the upper waters from the lower waters.

As Raphael Patai has demonstrated, this three-way correspondence among the the Temple, the world, and the human body is well-documented in the midrashic literature. More succinctly, the Midrash Tanhuma states: The temple corresponds to the whole world and to the creation of man, who is a small world.

All of this seems strongly to suggest that the "yordei-merkavah" in making the "ascent" through the levels of the heavenly temple to the highest firmament, could also be conceptualized (at least in some circles) of descending within the temple of his own body to the "Holy of Holies" within, where, as with the outward temple, the divine glory (or the image of God) is believed to dwell. If Segal is right to associate this posture with the downward direction of the Merkavah practice, this would suggest that the "ascent" through the heavens could also be understood to be a "descent" within the temple of the body ...

As Peter Schafer has emphasized, participation in the angelic liturgy was a primary goal of the hekhalot practitioners:

The Merkavah mystic represents in his person the participation of Israel in the heavenly liturgy and simultaneously confirms for the earthly congregation that it stands in direct contact with God in its synagogue liturgy.

The mystical practice of ascent to the heavenly temple thus maintains the connection between God and his people that had formerly been provided by the earthly temple in Jerusalem. The merkabah practitioner in the innermost hekhal, who worships before the throne, performs the mediatorial function of the high priest in the holy of holies.

Recent research has drawn attention to the theme of transformation in the apocalyptic and merkabah traditions. There are numerous references in the apocalypses, the hekhalot writings, and the midrashic traditions of the heavenly ascent, to the metamorphosis of the mystic's body into a purified angelic or supra-angelic form of fire or light that embodies or reflects the Image of the divine Glory and, like that Glory, expands to fill the universe. This is frequently associated with the idea that the mystic "assumes" or "is clothed with" the divine Name. This transformation was held to be extremely dangerous, should the mystic prove unworthy, but it seems to have been a central goal of the mystical endeavor. This motif is found in several gnostic sources and is surely the background of the language of "glorification" that is encountered in the letters of Paul and other early Christian writings. It seems that the vision of the Glory entailed the transformation of the visionary into an angelic likeness of that Divine Image.

As we have seen, the interior of the temple was identified with the garden of Eden or paradise. One who enters this garden, therefore, recovers "the Glory of Adam" and is conformed to the Image of God. According to rabbinic tradition, the intfallen Adam's body was, like the manifest Glory of the Shiur Qomah, so great that it filled the universe. This explains the expansion of the visionary's body when he enters the temple and worships before the throne.

The body of the Glory, which both fills and contains the universe, is therefore greater than the temple in which it dwells:

But will God in truth dwell with mortals on earth? Behold, heaven and the heaven of heavens cannot contain you! How much less this house that I have built! (2 Chronicles 6:18).

It is true that the "descent to the merkabah" was sometimes conceptualized as a journey within or into the "temple" of the practitioner's own body, then the Divine Image or "Glory of Adam" enthroned at the center must likewise be much greater than the outer "house."

The last three chapters of Hehhalot Rabbati, as the climax of the mystical ascent, contain a series of hymns that are said to be uttered by the throne of Glory in the presence of God each day and that the mystic himself is instructed to recite. This implies that he is identifying himself with the merkabah and asking God to be enthroned upon or within him. In other words, he is offering himself as a bodily vehicle for the manifestation of the Divine Image or Glory.

I suggest that the "descent within" and the "ascent without" may best be understood as two aspects or dimensions of a single transformational process, not mutually exclusive conceptual alternatives. The one who enters the holy of holies gains access to the highest heaven, since the courts of the temple are in symbolic reality the levels of the cosmos. Since this same structure obtains within the "temple" of the human body, the process of the heavenly journey may be enacted both "within" and "outside of" the body of the practitioner, who may thus be said both to "descend" and to "ascend." These observations may perhaps help to explain the cryptic utterance of Paul, when he insisted that he ascended into paradise (i.e., the heavenly holy of holies). "whether in the body or outside of the body, I do not know: God knows" (2 Corinthians 12:2-3).

The image of the body as a temple occurs several times in the New Testament. In John 2:19-21 (and, probably, parallels: Matthew 26:61; 27:40; Mark 14:58, 15:29), Jesus' body is compared with the Jerusalem temple. In 1 Corinthians 6:19, Paul calls the body of the individual Christian "a temple of the Holy Spirit." Elsewhere he makes the same statement of the church (1 Corinthians 3:9-17; 2 Corinthians 6:16), which is also very frequently called Christ's body. We recall that at Qumran the community regarded itself as the embodiment of the celestial temple.

The same theme occurs in Ephesians 2:14-16. Here the church is both a new creation and a resurrected body. Christ has abolished the law of the commandments which formerly divided one section of the body of humanity from the rest. This is also expressed in temple imagery ("the middle wall of the partition"). Thus, the Gentiles are no longer excluded from the worship of the holy community. This metaphor, which is developed in some detail in the following verses, reflects the structural imagery of the merkabah tradition: "body" and "temple" are complementary expressions of the same paradoxical reality. The Glory of the Lord, the Divine Image, is enthroned at the center "within" but at the same time comprehends all things within himself (2:21-22). This interweaving of body and temple imagery appears to be deeply indebted to the traditions that we have been considering.

Finally, consider Ephesians 4:7-13:

But to each one of us was given grace according to the measure of the gift of Christ, wherefore it is said: Having ascended to the height, he led captivity captive; he gave gifts to men.

Now what does "ascended" mean, except that he had first descended into the lower regions of the earth? The one who has descended is himself the one who has ascended far above the heavens, so that he might fill all things.

And he gave some to be apostles, and some to be prophets, and some to be evangelists, and some to be shepherds, and some to be teachers, for the equipping of the holy ones for the work of ministry, for the building up of the body of Christ, until we all arrive at the unity of the faith and the full knowledge of the Son of God, as a man at complete maturity, as the measure of the stature at the fullness of Christ.

Jesus Christ is identified with the Divine Glory that fills the universe (Col 1:3). The members of his church participate in that spiritual-bodily transformation, which is described in terms that are highly reminiscent of the Shi'ur Qomah (vv. 7 and 12). The (misquoted) citation of Ps: 68:19 links this passage in the Shavuot meriabah cycle discussed above and to the traditions about Moses' heavenly ascent. The language of "ascent" and "descent" in verses 6 and 9-10 is ambiguous and puzzling. This is remarkably similar to the characteristic language of the merkabah tradition. Christ, his church, and its individual members have become the body of God's Glory. In this new and "glorified" creation, the former distinction between "sacred" and "profane" is abrogated, and the purity laws associated with the temple cult are therefore rendered meaningless (cf. Hebrews 10:1-13). Since the very structure of the temple, with its ascending degrees of purity and danger, is conceived as both a barrier and a means of approach between the holy and the unholy, it is rendered obsolete by the convergence of heaven and earth in one spiritually transformed "body" made mystically one with the fullness of the everlasting Glory (Revelations 21).

4. Concluding Remarks

According to the Hebrew Bible, the earthly temple is the embodiment of a celestial archetype: the heavenly palace and throne room of the lord. In Isaiah's vision, the distinction between these two levels of reality seems to disappear. In the literature of the Second Temple period, this symbolic correspondence acquires cosmological significance. The cosmos itself is now conceptualized as a temple, and the earthly icon reflects this structure. Its seven (or three) courts and chambers, centered on the holy of holies, correspond to the celestial levels. In the apocalyptic-merkabah tradition, the visionary ascends to heaven by entering a temple whose interior is greater than its exterior, an image that expresses the opposing dimensional structures of the temple courts and the (three or) seven heavens, which are nonetheless considered to be identical. There he participates in the angelic worship of the "Great Glory," enthroned in the central chamber, and is himself transformed into an angelic likeness of that Glory. There is some evidence in the later sources to suggest that this ascent to heaven may also sometimes have been conceptualized as a "descent" within the "temple" of the visionary's own body. The fourfold correspondence of temple, cosmos, community and body is represented in figure I.

Many of these ideas are encountered in the Songs of the Sabbath Sacrifice, a liturgical text the performance of which may be interpreted as the ritual construction by the worshiping community, in association with the angelic hosts, of a seven-tiered temple, which is identified with that of Ezekiel. This temple not merely reflects but actually embodies the structure of the cosmos, for its seven sanctuaries are the seven heavens. The construction of this imaginary temple is completed on the eleventh Sabbath, which falls on the day before the annual ceremony of the renewal of the sects covenant at Shavuot, partially preserved in .IQBerakhot. On the Sabbaths following this ceremony of rededication, the Divine Glory descends on the Merkabah to indwell the temple that has been constructed and to receive the pure sacrifices that are offered in it (songs 12-13). If this analysis is correct, a unified liturgical framework links the Sabbath Songs to 4Oterakhot. It is perhaps legitimate to suspect that the Songs of the Maskil may also belong within this framework.

Despite repeated references to the recovery of Adam's lost glory, the theme of correspondence between the temple and the body is not developed in the Qumran sources. We find an emphasis on the embodiment of the temple archetype in the structure of the community as a whole. The rabbinic writings, in contrast, posit a three way correspondence between cosmos, temple, and body but make no reference to the correspondence between temple and community. All of these themes, however, are taken up and developed in combination by the Christian writers, who regarded their Savior-Messiah as "a great high priest who has gone through the heavens" (Hebrews 1:14) and for whom the image of the holy community as both body and temple was of central importance in the formulation of their faith.

Isaiah visits Hezekiah and has a vision

In the twentieth year of the reign of Hezekiah, king of Judah, Isaiah the son of Amoz and Josab the son of Isaiah came to Hezekiah in Jerusalem from Gilgal. And he sat on the couch of the king, and they brought a seat for him, but he would not sit (on it).

And when Isaiah began to speak with Hezekiah the king the words of faith and righteousness, all the princes of Israel were sitting (there), and the eunuchs and the king's counselors.

And there were there forty prophets and sons of the prophets; they had come from the neighboring districts, and from the mountains, and from the country, when they had heard that Isaiah was coming from Gilgal to Hezekiah.

They came that they might greet him, and that they might hear his words, and that he might lay his hand on them, and that they might prophesy, and that he might hear their prophecy; and they were all in the presence of Isaiah.

And when Isaiah spoke with Hezekiah the words of righteousness and faith, they all heard a door being opened and the voice of the Spirit.

And the king summoned all the prophets and all the people who were to be found there, and they came. And Micah, and the aged Ananias, and Joel, and Josab were sitting on his right.

And when they all heard the voice of the Holy Spirit, they all worshiped on their knees, and they praised the God of righteousness, the Most High, the One who (dwells) in the upper world and who sits on high, the Holy One, the One who rests among the holy ones;

And they ascribed glory to the One who had thus graciously given a door in an alien world, had graciously given it to a man.

And while he was speaking with the Holy Spirit in the hearing of them all, he became silent, and his mind was taken up from him; and he did not see the men who were standing before him.

His eyes indeed were open, but his mouth was silent, and the mind in his body was taken up from him.

But his breath was (still) in him; for he was seeing a vision.

And the angel who was sent to show him (the vision) was not of this firmament, nor was he from the angels of glory of this world, but he came from the seventh heaven.

And the people who were standing by, apart from the circle of prophets, did not think that the holy Isaiah had been taken up.

And the vision which he saw was not from this world, but from the world which is hidden from the flesh.

And after Isaiah had seen this vision he recounted it to Hezekiah, and to Josab his son, and to the other prophets who had come.

But the officials, and the eunuchs, and the people did not hear, apart from Samnas the secretary, and Jehoiakim; and Asaph the recorder, for they (were) doers of righteousness, and the fragrance of the Spirit was in them;

But the people did not hear, for Micah and Josab his son had sent them out when the wisdom of this world was taken from him as if he were dead.

Isaiah's Journey through the seven heavens

The vision which Isaiah saw he told to Hezekiah, and to Josab his son, and to Micah, and to the other prophets; it was as follows.

When I prophesied in accordance with the message which you have heard, I saw a glorious angel; his glory was not like the glory of the angels which I always used to see, but he had great glory, and an office, such that I cannot describe the glory of this angel.

And I saw when he took hold of me by my hand, and I said to him, Who am you? And what is your name? And where are you taking me up?

For strength had been given to me that I might speak with him.

And he said to me, When I have taken you up through (all) the stages and have shown you the vision on account of which I was sent, then you will understand who I am; but my name you will not know, for you have to return into this body.

But where I take you up, you will see, because for this purpose I was sent.

And I rejoiced because he spoke to me with kindness.

And he said to me, Do you rejoice because I have spoken kindly to you?

And he said You will see one greater than me, how he will speak kindly and gently with you; and the Father of the one who is greater you will also see, because for this purpose I was sent from the seventh heaven, that I might make all this clear to you.

The firmament

And we went up into the firmament, I and he, and there I saw Sammael and his hosts; and there was a great struggle in it, and the words of Satan, and they were envying one another.

And as above. so also on earth, for the likeness of what (is) in the firmament is here on earth.

And I said to the angel, What is this envying?

And he said to me, So it has been ever since this world existed until now, and this struggle (will last) until the one comes whom you are to see, and he will destroy him.

The first heaven

And after this he took me up above the firmament; this is the first heaven. There I saw a throne in the middle, and on the right and on the left of it there were angels.

And the angels on the left were not like the angels who stood on the right, but those who stood on the right had more glory, and they all sang praises with one voice.

And the throne was in the middle, and it they praised, and those on the left after them, but their voice was not like the voice of those is on the right, nor their praise like the praise of those on the right.

And I asked the angel who led me and said to him, To whom is this praise directed?

And he said to me, To the praise of [the One who sits in] the seventh heaven, the One who rests in the holy world, and to his Beloved, from where I was sent to you. To there it is directed.

The second heaven

And again, he took me up into the second heaven, and the height of that heaven is like that from heaven to earth and to the firmament.

And I saw there, as in the first heaven, angels on the right and on the left, and a throne in the middle, and the praise of the angels who (were) in the second heaven; and the one who sat on the throne in the second heaven had more glory than all (the rest).

And there was great glory in the second heaven, and their praise was not like the praise of those who (were) in the first heaven.

And I fell on my face to worship him.

And the angel who led me would not let me, but said to me, Worship neither throne, nor angel from the six heavens, from where I was sent to lead you before I tell you in the seventh heaven.

For above all the heavens and their angels is placed your throne, and also your robes and your crown which you are to see.

And I rejoiced very much that those who love the Most High and his Beloved will at their end go up there through the angel of the Holy Spirit.

The third heaven

And he took me up into the third heaven, and in the same way I saw those who (were) on the right and on the left, and there also (there was) a throne in the middle and one who sat on it; but no mention of this world was made there.

And I said to the angel who (was) with me, for the glory of my face, was being transformed as I went up from heaven to heaven; Nothing of the vanity of that world is named here.

And he answered me, saying, Nothing is named because of its weakness, but nothing is hidden which is done there.

And I wished to find out how it is known; and he answered me, saying, When I have taken you up into the seventh heaven, from where I was sent, to the One which (is) above these, then you will know that nothing is hidden from the thrones and those who dwell in the heavens, nor from the angels.

And the praises which they sang and the glory of the one who sat on the throne were great, and the angels who (were) on the right and on the left had more glory than (those in) the heaven which (was) below them.

The fourth heaven

And again he took me up into the fourth heaven, and the height from the third to the fourth heaven was greater than (from) earth to the firmament.

And then I again saw those who (were) on the right and those who (were) on the left, and the one who sat on the throne was in the middle? and there also they were singing praises.

And the praise and glory of the angels on the right was greater than that of those on the left.

And again the glory of the one who sat on the throne was greater than that of the angels who (were) on the right, but their glory (was) greater than that of those below.

The fifth heaven

And he took me up into the fifth heaven. And again I saw those who (were) on the right and the left, and the one who sat on the throne had more glory than those of the fourth heaven.

And the glory of those who (were) on the right was greater than that of those who (were) on the left.

The glory of the one on the throne was greater than that of the angels who (were) on the right, but their praise was more glorious than that of the fourth heaven.

And I praised the One who is not named and is unique, who dwells in the heavens, whose name is unknown to all flesh, the One who has given such glory to the different heavens, who makes the glory of the angels great and the glory of the one who sits on the throne (even) greater.

The air of the sixth heaven

And again, he took me up into the air of the sixth heaven, and I saw a splendor such as I had not seen in the five heavens as I went up; the angels possessed great glory, and the praise there was holy and wonderful.

And I said to the angel who led me, What (is) this which I see, my lord?

And he said to me, I am not your lord, but your companion.

And again I asked him, and I said to him, Why (are there) not corresponding groups of angels?

And he said to me: From the sixth heaven and upwards there are no longer those on the left, nor is there a throne placed in the middle, but they are directed, by the power of the seventh heaven, where the One who is not named dwells, and his Chosen One, whose name is unknown, and no heaven can learn his name;

For he is alone, he whose voice all the heavens and thrones answer. I, therefore, have been empowered and sent to bring you up here that you may see this glory,

And (that) you may see the LORD of all these heavens and of these thrones being transformed until he resembles your appearance and your likeness.

I say to you, Isaiah, that no man who has to return into a body of that world has come up, or seen or understood what you have seen, and what you are to see, for you are destined in the lot and of the air.

And I proclaimed the greatness of my LORD with praise, that through his lot I should come here.

And he said to me! Hear then this also from your companion: [when from the body by the will of God you have come up here]; then you will receive the robe which you will see, and also other numbered robes placed (there) you will see, and then you will be equal to the angels who (are) in the seventh heaven.

The sixth heaven

And he took me up into the sixth heaven, and there were none on the left; nor a throne in the middle, but all (were) of one appearance, and their praise (was) equal.

And (strength) was given to me, and I also sang praises with them, and is that angel also, and our praise was like theirs.

And there they all named the primal Father and his Beloved, Christ, and the Holy Spirit all with one voice, but it was not like the voice of the angels who (were) in the five heavens, nor (was it) like their speech, but there was a different voice there, and there was much light there.

And then, when I was in the sixth heaven, I thought that light which I had seen in the five heavens darkness.

And I rejoiced and praised the One who has graciously given such light to those who await his promise.

And I entreated the angel who led me that from then on I should not return to the world of flesh.

Indeed I say to you, Hezekiah and Josab, my son, and Micah that there is much darkness here.

And the angel who led me knew what I thought and said to me, If you rejoice over this light, how much more (will you rejoice) in the seventh heaven when you see the light where the LORD is and his Beloved- from where I was sent—who is to be called in the world the Son!

He who is to be in the corruptible world has not (yet) been revealed, nor the robes, nor the thrones, nor the crowns which are placed (there) for the righteous, for those who believe in that LORD who will descend in your form. For the light which (is) there (is) great and wonderful.

But as regards your not returning into the body, your days are not yet complete for coming here.

And when I heard (this), I was sad; and he said to me, Do not be sad.

The air of the seventh heaven

And he led me into the air of the seventh heaven, and moreover I heard a voice saying, How far is he who dwells among aliens to go up? And I was afraid and was trembling.

And he said to me when I was trembling. Behold! From there another voice which was sent out has come, and it says, The holy Isaiah is permitted to come up here, for his robe is here.

And I asked the angel who (was) with me and said, Who is the one who prevented me, and who is this one who turned to me that I might go up?

And he said to me, The one who prevented you, this is the one who (is) in charge of the praise of the sixth heaven.

And the one who turned to you; this is your LORD, the LORD, the LORD Christ, who is to be called in the world Jesus. but you cannot hear his names until you have come up from this body.

The seventh heaven

And he took me up into the seventh heaven, and there I saw a wonderful light, and also angels without number.

And there I saw all the righteous from the time of Adam onwards.

And there I saw the holy Abel and all the righteous.

And there I saw Enoch and all who (were) with him, stripped of (their) robes of the flesh; and I saw them in their robes of above) and they were like the angels who is stand there in great glory.

But they were not sitting on their thrones) nor were their crowns of glory on them.

And I asked the angel who (was) with me, How is it that they have received these robes, but are not on (their) thrones nor it in (their) crowns?

And he said to me, They do not receive the crowns and thrones of glory—nevertheless, they do see and know whose (will be) the thrones and whose the crowns—until the Beloved descends in the form in which you will see him descend.

The LORD will indeed descend into the world in the last days, (he) who is to be called Christ after he has descended and become like you in form, and they will think that he is flesh and a man.

And the god of that world will stretch out his hand against the LORD, and they will lay their hands upon him and hang him upon a tree, not knowing who he is.

And thus his descent, as you will see, will be concealed even from the heavens so that it will not be is known who he is.

And when he has plundered the angel of death, he will rise, on the third day and will remain in that world for five hundred and forty-five days.

And then many of the righteous will ascend with him, whose spirits do not receive (their) robes until the LORD Christ ascends and they ascend wit him.

Then indeed they will receive their robes and their thrones and their crowns, when he has ascended into the seventh heaven.

The record of men's deeds

And I said to him what I had asked him in the third heaven, Show me how everything which is done in that world is known here.

And while I was still speaking to him, behold one of the angels who were standing by, more glorious than that angel who had brought me up from the world, showed me (some) books, but not like the books of this world, and he opened them, and the books had writing in them, but not like the books of this world. And they were given to me, and I read them.

And behold the deeds of the children of Israel were written there, their deeds which you know, my son Josab.

And I said, Truly, nothing which is done in this world is hidden in the seventh heaven.

The robes and thrones and crowns

And I saw many robes placed there, and many thrones and many crowns,

And said to the angel who led me, Whose (are) these robes and thrones and crowns?

And he said to me, As for these robes. there are many from that world who will receive (them), through believing in the words of that one who will be named as I have told you.

And they will keep them, and believe in them and believe in his cross; for them (are) these placed (here).

The worship of the LORD

And I saw one standing (acre) whose glory surpassed that of _____ and his glory was great and wonderful.

And when they saw him. all the righteous whom I had seen and the angels to me and him. And Adam and Abel and Seth and all the righteous approached first and worshiped him, and they all praised him with one voice, and I also was singing praises with them, and my praise was like theirs.

And then all the angels approached, and worshiped, and sang praises.

And he was transformed and became like an angel.

And then the angel who led me said to me. Worship this one, and I worshiped and sang praises.

And the angel said to me, This is the LORD of all the praise which you have seen.

The worship of the angel of the Holy Spirit

And while I was still speaking? I saw another glorious (person) who was like him, and the righteous approached him. and worshiped, and sang praises, and I also sang praises with them; but his glory was not transformed to accord with their form.

And then the angels approached and worshiped him.

And I saw the Wan and the second angel, and they were standing, and the second one whom I saw (was) on the left of my LORD. And I asked the angel who led me and I said to him. Who is this one?

And he said to me. Worship him, for this is the angel of the Holy Spirit who has spoken. in you and also in the other righteous.

The worship of God

And I saw the Great Glory while the eyes of my spirit were open, but I could not thereafter see nor the angel who (was) with me, nor any of the angels whom I had seen worship my LORD.

But I saw the righteous as they beheld with great power the glory of that one.

And my LORD approached me, and the angel of the Spirit, and said, See how it has been given to you to see the LORD, and (how) because of you power has been given to the angel who (is) with you.

And I saw how my LORD and the angel of the Holy Spirit worshiped and both together praised the LORD.

And then all the righteous approached and worshiped, and the angels approached and worshiped, and all the angels sang praises.

The worship of the Father by the six lower heavens

And then I heard the voices and the hymns of praise- which I had heard in each of the six heavens—which I had heard as I ascended there?

And all (the voices and hymns of praise) were directed to that Glorious One whose glory I could not see.

And I also heard and saw the praise (which was directed to) him, and the LORD and the angel of the Spirit heard everything and saw everything.

And all the praise which was sent (up) from the six heavens was not only heard but seen.

And I heard the angel who led me, and he said to me, This is the Most High of the high ones, who dwells in the holy world, who rests among the holy ones, who will be called by the Holy Spirit in the mouth of the righteous the Father of the LORD.

The LORD Christ is commissioned by the Father

And I heard the voice of the Most High. the Father of my LORD, as he said to my LORD Christ, who will be called Jesus, Go out and descend through all the heavens. You shall descend through the firmament and through that world as far as the angel who (is) in Sheol. but you shall not go as far as Perdition.

And you shall make your likeness like that of all who (are) in the five heavens;

And you shall take care to make your form like that of the angels of the firmament and also (like that) of the angels who (are) in Sheol.

And none of the angels, of that world shall know that you (are) LORD with me of the seven heavens and of their angels. And they shall not know that you (are) with me when with the voice of the heavens I summon you, and their angels and their lights, and when I lift up (my voice) to the sixth heaven, that you may judge and destroy the princes and the angels and the gods of that world, and the world which is ruled by them;

For they have denied me and said, We alone am, and there is no one besides us.

And afterwards you shall ascend from the gods of death to your place, and you shall not be transformed in each of the heavens, but in glory you shall ascend and sit at my right hand, and then the princes and the powers of that world will worship you.

This command I heard the Great Glory giving to my LORD.

The descent of the LORD through the seven heavens

And thus I saw when my LORD went out from the seventh heaven into the sixth heaven.

And the angel who had led me from this world was with me, and he said to me, Understand, Isaiah, and look, that you may see the transformation and descent of the LORD.

And I looked, and when the angels who (were) in the sixth heaven saw him, they praised him and glorified him, for he had not been transformed into the form of the angels there; and they praised him, and I also sang praises with them.

And I saw when he descended into the fifth heaven, that in the fifth heaven he made his form like that of the angels there, and they did not praise him, for his form was like theirs.

And then he descended into the fourth heaven and made his form like that of the angels there; and when they saw him, they did not praise him or glorify him, for his form (was) like their form.

And again I saw when he descended into the third heaven, that he made his form like that of the angels who (were) in the third heaven.

And those who kept the gate of the (third) heaven demanded the password, and the LORD gave (it) to them in order that he should not be recognized, and when they saw him, they did not praise him or glorify him, for his form (was) like their form.

And again I saw when he descended into the second heaven, that there again he gave the password, 16 for those who kept the gates demanded (it), and the LORD gave (it).

And I saw when he made his form like that of the angels who (were) in the second heaven, that they saw him, but did not praise him, for his form (was) like their form.

And again I saw when he descended into the first heaven, that there he gave the password to those who kept the gates. And he made his form like that of the angels who (were) on the left of that throne, and they did not praise him or glorify him, for his form (was) like their form.

And as for me, no one questioned me because of the angel who led me.

And again he descended into the firmament where the prince of this world dwells, and he gave the password to those who (were) on the left, and his form (was) like theirs, and they did not praise him there; but in envy they were fighting one another, for there is there a power of evil and envying about trifles.

And I saw when he descended and made himself like the angels of the air, that he was like one of them.

And he did not give the password, for they were plundering and doing violence to one another.

The miraculous birth of the LORD

And after this I looked, and the angel who spoke to me and led me said to me, Understand, Isaiah son of Amoz, because for this purpose I was sent from the LORD.

And I saw a woman of the family of David the prophet whose name (was) Mary, and she (was) a virgin and was betrothed to a man whose name (was) Joseph, a carpenter, and he also (was) of the seed and family of the righteous David of Bethlehem in Judah.

And he came into his lot; and when she was betrothed, she was found to be pregnant, and Joseph the carpenter wished to divorce her.

But the angel of the Spirit appeared in this world, and after this Joseph did not divorce Mary; but he did not reveal this matter to anyone.

And he did not approach Mary, but kept her as a holy virgin, although she was pregnant.

And he did not live with her for two months.

And after two months of days, while Joseph was in his house, and Mary his wife, but both alone, it came about, when they were alone, that Mary then looked with her eyes and saw a small infant, and she was astounded.

And after her astonishment had worn lo off, her womb was found as (it was) at first, before she had conceived.

And when her husband, Joseph, said to her, What has made you astounded? His eyes were opened, and he saw the infant and praised the LORD, because the LORD had come in his lot:

And a voice came to them, Do not tell this vision to anyone.

But the story about the infant was spread abroad in Bethlehem.

Some said, The virgin Mary has given birth before she has been married two months.

But many said She did not give birth; the midwife did not go up (to her), and we did not hear (any) cries of pain.

And they were all blinded concerning him; they all knew about him, but` they did not know from where he was.

And they took him and went to Nazareth in Galilee.

And I saw, O Hezekiah and Josab my son, and say to the other prophets also who are standing by, that it was hidden from all the heavens and all the princes and every god of this world.

The infancy and life of the LORD

And I saw (that) in Nazareth he sucked the breast like an infant, as was customary, that he might not be recognized.

And when he had grown up. he performed great signs and miracles in the land of Israel and (in) Jerusalem.

The crucifixion and resurrection of the LORD

And after this the adversary envied him and roused the children of Israel, who did not know who he was, against him.

And they handed him to the ruler, and crucified him and he descended- to the angel who (is) in Sheol.

In Jerusalem, I, indeed, saw how they crucified him on a tree;

And likewise (how) after the third day he rose and remained (many) days.

The ascension of the LORD through the seven heavens

And the angel who led me said to me. Understand. Isaiah. And I saw when he sent out the disciples and ascended.

And I saw him; and he was in the firmament; but was not transformed into their form. And all the angels of the firmament, and Satan, saw him and worshiped.

And there was much sorrow in them as they said, How did our LORD. descend upon us, and we did not notice the glory which was upon him, which we (now) see was upon him from the sixth heaven?

And he ascended into the second heaven, and he was not transformed, but all the angels who (were) on the right and on the left, and the throne in the middle, worshiped him, and praised him, and said, How did our LORD remain hidden from us as he descended, and we did not notice?

And in the same way he ascended into the third (heaven), and in the same way they praised him and spoke.

And in the fourth heaven and also in the fifth they spoke in exactly the same way.

But there was one glory, and from it he was not transformed. -And I saw when he ascended into the sixth heaven, that they worshiped him and praised, but in all the heavens the praise grew louder.

And I saw how he ascended into the seventh heaven, and all the righteous and all the angels praised him.

And then I saw that he sat down at the right hand of that Great Glory, whose glory I told you I could not behold.

And also I saw that the angel of the Holy Spirit sat on the left.

The conclusion of the vision

This angel said to me, Isaiah, son of Amoz, it is enough for you, for these (are) great things. for you have observed what no one born of flesh has observed. And you shall return into your robe until your days are complete; then you shall come here. These things I saw.

Isaiah's Instructions to Hezekiah

And Isaiah told them to all those who were standing before him, and they sang praises.

And he spoke to Hezekiah the king and said. These things I have spoken

And the end of this world and all this vision will be brought about in the last generation.

And Isaiah made him swear that he would not tell this to the people of Israel, and that he would not allow any man to copy these words.

And then they shall read them.

But as for you. be in the Holy Spirit that you may receive your robes, and the thrones and crowns of glory, which are placed in the seventh heaven.

Because of these visions and prophecies. Sammael Satan sawed Isaiah the son of Amoz, the prophet, in half by the hand of Manasseh.

And Hezekiah gave all these things to Manasseh in the twenty-sixth year of his 43 reign.

But Manasseh did not remember these things, nor place them in his heart, but he became the servant of Satan and was destroyed.

Here ends (the book) of Isaiah the prophet with his ascension.

Testament of Levi

(Pseudepigraphical work)

Then there fell upon me a sleep, and I beheld a high mountain, and I was upon it.

And behold the heavens were opened and an angel of God said to me, Levi enter.

And I entered from the first heaven, and I saw there a great sea hanging.

And further I saw a second heaven far brighter and more brilliant, for there was a boundless light also therein.

And I said to the angel, Why is this so? And the angel said to me, Marvel not at this, for thou shalt see another heaven more brilliant and incomparable.

And when thou hast ascended thither, Thou shalt stand near the Lord, And shalt be His minister, And shalt declare His mysteries to men, And shall proclaim concerning Him that shall redeem Israel.

And by thee and Judah shall the Lord appear among men saving every race of men.

And from the Lord's portion shall be thy life, And He shall be thy field and vineyard, And fruits, gold, and silver.

Hear, therefore, regarding the heavens which have been shown to thee.

The lowest is for this cause gloomy unto thee, in that it beholds all the unrighteous deeds of men.

And it has fire, snow, and ice made ready for the day of judgement, in the righteous judgement of God; for in it are all the spirits of the retributions for vengeance on men.

And in the second are the hosts of the armies which are ordained for the day of judgement, to work vengeance on the spirits of deceit and of Beliar.

And above them are the holy ones.

And in the highest of all dwelleth the Great Glory, far above all holiness.

In [the heaven next to] it are the archangels, who minister and make propitiation to the Lord for all the sins of ignorance of the righteous;

Offering to the Lord a sweet-smelling savour, a reasonable and a bloodless offering.

And [in the heaven below this] are the angels who bear answers to the angels of the presence of the Lord.

And in the heaven next to this are thrones and dominions, in which always they offer praise to God.

Scriptural Basis of Degrees of Glory

The large degree of Protestant consensus was due mainly to the abundance of Scriptural references to rewards and punishments hereafter. Rewards and punishments received a prominent place in the Old Testament; the lists of blessings and cursings at the end of Leviticus and Deuteronomy had been interpreted by Philo, who in turn was read by the Fathers, as rewards and punishments. In the New Testament, the theme recurred, when various rewards were explicitly attached to specific works (cf. Matt. 5). The house of God has 'many mansions' (John 14: 2)—(which may or may not imply a heavenly hierarchy)—and Paul appears to indicate that the elect shall differ from one another—'as one star differeth from another' (1 Cor. 15: 41)—in heavenly glory. Against this concept of degrees it was possible to set the lesson propounded by the parable of the Vineyard (Matt. 20: 1-14)—in which the workers were given equal wages, regardless of the amount of time they had spent labouring — but Christ's retention of the Judaic language of rewards and punishments rendered it very difficult indeed to deny that judgement would be by works.

4Ezra.6

[35] Now after this I wept again and fasted seven days as before, in order to complete the three weeks as I had been told.

[36] And on the eighth night my heart was troubled within me again, and I began to speak in the presence of the Most High.

[37] For my spirit was greatly aroused, and my soul was in distress.

[38] I said, "O Lord, thou didst speak at the beginning of creation, and didst say on the first day, 'Let heaven and earth be made,' and thy word accomplished the work.

[39] And then the Spirit was hovering, and darkness and silence embraced everything; the sound of man's voice was not yet there.

[40] Then thou didst command that a ray of light be brought forth from thy treasures, so that thy works might then appear.

[41] "Again, on the second day, thou didst create the spirit of the firmament, and didst command him to divide and separate the waters, that one part might move upward and the other part remain beneath.

[42] "On the third day thou didst command the waters to be gathered together in the seventh part of the earth; six parts thou didst dry up and keep so that some of them might be planted and cultivated and be of service before thee.

[43] For thy word went forth, and at once the work was done.

[44] For immediately fruit came forth in endless abundance and of varied appeal to the taste; and flowers of inimitable color; and odors of inexpressible fragrance. These were made on the third day.

[45] "On the fourth day thou didst command the brightness of the sun, the light of the moon, and the arrangement of the stars to come into being;

[46] and thou didst command them to serve man, who was about to be formed.

[47] "On the fifth day thou didst command the seventh part, where the water had been gathered together, to bring forth living creatures, birds, and fishes; and so it was done.

[48] The dumb and lifeless water produced living creatures, as it was commanded, that therefore the nations might declare thy wondrous works.

[49] "Then thou didst keep in existence two living creatures; the name of one thou didst call Behemoth and the name of the other Leviathan.

[50] And thou didst separate one from the other, for the seventh part where the water had been gathered together could not hold them both.

[51] And thou didst give Behemoth one of the parts which had been dried up on the third day, to live in it, where there are a thousand mountains;

[52] but to Leviathan thou didst give the seventh part, the watery part; and thou hast kept them to be eaten by whom thou wilt, and when thou wilt.

[53] "On the sixth day thou didst command the earth to bring forth before thee cattle, beasts, and creeping things;

[54] and over these thou didst place Adam, as ruler over all the works which thou hadst made; and from him we have all come, the people whom thou hast chosen.

[55] "All this I have spoken before thee, O Lord, because thou hast said that it was for us that thou didst create this world.

[56] As for the other nations which have descended from Adam, thou hast said that they are nothing, and that they are like spittle, and thou hast compared their abundance to a drop from a bucket.

[57] And now, O Lord, behold, these nations, which are reputed as nothing, domineer over us and devour us.

[58] But we thy people, whom thou hast called thy first-born, only begotten, zealous for thee, and most dear, have been given into their hands.

[59] If the world has indeed been created for us, why do we not possess our world as an inheritance? How long will this be so?"

4Ezra.7

[1] When I had finished speaking these words, the angel who had been sent to me on the former nights was sent to me again,

[2] and he said to me, "Rise, Ezra, and listen to the words that I have come to speak to you."

[3] I said, "Speak, my lord." And he said to me, "There is a sea set in a wide expanse so that it is broad and vast,

[4] but it has an entrance set in a narrow place, so that it is like a river.

[5] If any one, then, wishes to reach the sea, to look at it or to navigate it, how can he come to the broad part unless he passes through the narrow part?

[6] Another example: There is a city built and set on a plain, and it is full of all good things;
[7] but the entrance to it is narrow and set in a precipitous place, so that there is fire on the right hand and deep water on the left;

[8] and there is only one path lying between them, that is, between the fire and the water, so that only one man can walk upon that path.

[9] If now that city is given to a man for an inheritance, how will the heir receive his inheritance unless he passes through the danger set before him?"

[10] I said, "He cannot, lord." And he said to me, "So also is Israel's portion.

[11] For I made the world for their sake, and when Adam transgressed my statutes, what had been made was judged.

[12] And so the entrances of this world were made narrow and sorrowful and toilsome; they are few and evil, full of dangers and involved in great hardships.

[13] But the entrances of the greater world are broad and safe, and really yield the fruit of immortality.
[14] Therefore unless the living pass through the difficult and vain experiences, they can never receive those things that have been reserved for them.

[15] But now why are you disturbed, seeing that you are to perish? And why are you moved, seeing that you are mortal?

[16] And why have you not considered in your mind what is to come, rather than what is now present?"

[17] Then I answered and said, "O sovereign Lord, behold, thou hast ordained in thy law that the righteous shall inherit these things, but that the ungodly shall perish.

[18] The righteous therefore can endure difficult circumstances while hoping for easier ones; but those who have done wickedly have suffered the difficult circumstances and will not see the easier ones."

[19] And he said to me, "You are not a better judge than God, or wiser than the Most High!

[20] Let many perish who are now living, rather than that the law of God which is set before them be disregarded!

[21] For God strictly commanded those who came into the world, when they came, what they should do to live, and what they should observe to avoid punishment

[22] Nevertheless they were not obedient, and spoke against him; they devised for themselves vain thoughts, [23] and proposed to themselves wicked frauds;

they even declared that the Most High does not exist, and they ignored his ways!

[24] They scorned his law, and denied his covenants; they have been unfaithful to his statutes, and have not performed his works.

[25] "Therefore, Ezra, empty things are for the empty, and full things are for the full.

[26] For behold, the time will come, when the signs which I have foretold to you will come to pass, that the city which now is not seen shall appear, and the land which now is hidden shall be disclosed.

[27] And every one who has been delivered from the evils that I have foretold shall see my wonders.

[28] For my son the Messiah shall be revealed with those who are with him, and those who remain shall rejoice four hundred years.

[29] And after these years my son the Messiah shall die, and all who draw human breath.

[30] And the world shall be turned back to primeval silence for seven days, as it was at the first beginnings; so that no one shall be left.

[31] And after seven days the world, which is not yet awake, shall be roused, and that which is corruptible shall perish.

[32] And the earth shall give up those who are asleep in it, and the dust those who dwell silently in it; and the chambers shall give up the souls which have been committed to them.

[33] And the Most High shall be revealed upon the seat of judgment, and compassion shall pass away, and patience shall be withdrawn;

[34] but only judgment shall remain, truth shall stand, and faithfulness shall grow strong.

[35] And recompense shall follow, and the reward shall be manifested; righteous deeds shall awake, and unrighteous deeds shall not sleep.

[36] Then the pit of torment shall appear, and opposite it shall be the place of rest; and the furnace of hell shall be disclosed, and opposite it the paradise of delight.

[37] Then the Most High will say to the nations that have been raised from the dead, `Look now, and understand whom you have denied, whom you have not served, whose commandments you have despised!

[38] Look on this side and on that; here are delight and rest, and there are fire and torments!' Thus he will speak to them on the day of judgment –

[39] a day that has no sun or moon or stars,

[40] or cloud or thunder or lightning or wind or water or air, or darkness or evening or morning,

[41] or summer or spring or heat or winter or frost or cold or hail or rain or dew, [42] or noon or night, or dawn or shining or brightness or light, but only the splendor of the glory of the Most High, by which all shall see what has been determined for them.

[43] For it will last for about a week of years.

[44] This is my judgment and its prescribed order; and to you alone have I shown these things."

[45] I answered and said, "O sovereign Lord, I said then and I say now: Blessed are those who are alive and keep thy commandments!

[46] But what of those for whom I prayed? For who among the living is there that has not sinned, or who among men that has not transgressed thy covenant?

[47] And now I see that the world to come will bring delight to few, but torments to many.

[48] For an evil heart has grown up in us, which has alienated us from God, and has brought us into corruption and the ways of death, and has shown us the paths of perdition and removed us far from life -- and that not just a few of us but almost all who have been created!"

[49] He answered me and said, "Listen to me, Ezra, and I will instruct you, and will admonish you yet again.

[50] For this reason the Most High has made not one world but two.

[51] For whereas you have said that the righteous are not many but few, while the ungodly abound, hear the explanation for this.

[52] "If you have just a few precious stones, will you add to them lead and clay?"

[53] I said, "Lord, how could that be?"

[54] And he said to me, "Not only that, but ask the earth and she will tell you; defer to her, and she will declare it to you.

[55] Say to her, `You produce gold and silver and brass, and also iron and lead and clay;

[56] but silver is more abundant than gold, and brass than silver, and iron than brass, and lead than iron, and clay than lead.'

[57] Judge therefore which things are precious and desirable, those that are abundant or those that are rare?"

[58] I said, "O sovereign Lord, what is plentiful is of less worth, for what is more rare is more precious."

[59] He answered me and said, "Weigh within yourself what you have thought, for he who has what is hard to get rejoices more than he who has what is plentiful.

[60] So also will be the judgment which I have promised; for I will rejoice over the few who shall be saved, because it is they who have made my glory to prevail now, and through them my name has now been honored.

[61] And I will not grieve over the multitude of those who perish; for it is they who are now like a mist, and are similar to a flame and smoke -- they are set on fire and burn hotly, and are extinguished."

[62] I replied and said, "O earth, what have you brought forth, if the mind is made out of the dust like the other created things!

[63] For it would have been better if the dust itself had not been born, so that the mind might not have been made from it.

[64] But now the mind grows with us, and therefore we are tormented, because we perish and know it.

[65] Let the human race lament, but let the beasts of the field be glad; let all who have been born lament, but let the four-footed beasts and the flocks rejoice!

[66] For it is much better with them than with us; for they do not look for a judgment, nor do they know of any torment or salvation promised to them after death.

[67] For what does it profit us that we shall be preserved alive but cruelly tormented?

[68] For all who have been born are involved in iniquities, and are full of sins and burdened with transgressions.

[69] And if we were not to come into judgment after death, perhaps it would have been better for us."

[70] He answered me and said, "When the Most High made the world and Adam and all who have come from him, he first prepared the judgment and the things that pertain to the judgment.

[71] And now understand from your own words, for you have said that the mind grows with us.

[72] For this reason, therefore, those who dwell on earth shall be tormented, because though they had understanding they committed iniquity, and though they received the commandments they did not keep them, and though they obtained the law they dealt unfaithfully with what they received.

[73] What, then, will they have to say in the judgment, or how will they answer in the last times?

[74] For how long the time is that the Most High has been patient with those who inhabit the world, and not for their sake, but because of the times which he has foreordained!"

[75] I answered and said, "If I have found favor in thy sight, O Lord, show this also to thy servant: whether after death, as soon as every one of us yields up his soul, we shall be kept in rest until those times come when thou wilt renew the creation, or whether we shall be tormented at once?"

[76] He answered me and said, "I will show you that also, but do not be associated with those who have shown scorn, nor number yourself among those who are tormented.

[77] For you have a treasure of works laid up with the Most High; but it will not be shown to you until the last times.

[78] Now, concerning death, the teaching is: When the decisive decree has gone forth from the Most High that a man shall die, as the spirit leaves the body to return again to him who gave it, first of all it adores the glory of the Most High.

[79] And if it is one of those who have shown scorn and have not kept the way of the Most High, and who have despised his law, and who have hated those who fear God –

[80] such spirits shall not enter into habitations, but shall immediately wander about in torments, ever grieving and sad, in seven ways.

[81] The first way, because they have scorned the law of the Most High.

[82] The second way, because they cannot now make a good repentance that they may live.

[83] The third way, they shall see the reward laid up for those who have trusted the covenants of the Most High.

[84] The fourth way, they shall consider the torment laid up for themselves in the last days.

[85] The fifth way, they shall see how the habitations of the others are guarded by angels in profound quiet.

[86] The sixth way, they shall see how some of them will pass over into torments.

[87] The seventh way, which is worse than all the ways that have been mentioned, because they shall utterly waste away in confusion and be consumed with shame, and shall wither with fear at seeing the glory of the Most High before whom they sinned while they were alive, and before whom they are to be judged in the last times.

[88] "Now this is the order of those who have kept the ways of the Most High, when they shall be separated from their mortal body.

[89] During the time that they lived in it, they laboriously served the Most High, and withstood danger every hour, that they might keep the law of the Lawgiver perfectly.

[90] Therefore this is the teaching concerning them:

[91] First of all, they shall see with great joy the glory of him who receives them, for they shall have rest in seven orders.

[92] The first order, because they have striven with great effort to overcome the evil thought which was formed with them, that it might not lead them astray from life into death.

[93] The second order, because they see the perplexity in which the souls of the ungodly wander, and the punishment that awaits them.

[94] The third order, they see the witness which he who formed them bears concerning them, that while they were alive they kept the law which was given them in trust

[95] The fourth order, they understand the rest which they now enjoy, being gathered into their chambers and guarded by angels in profound quiet, and the glory which awaits them in the last days.

[96] The fifth order, they rejoice that they have now escaped what is corruptible, and shall inherit what is to come; and besides they see the straits and toil from which they have been delivered, and the spacious liberty which they are to receive and enjoy in immortality.

[97] The sixth order, when it is shown to them how their face is to shine like the sun, and how they are to be made like the light of the stars, being incorruptible from then on.

[98] The seventh order, which is greater than all that have been mentioned, because they shall rejoice with boldness, and shall be confident without confusion, and shall be glad without fear, for they hasten to behold the face of him whom they served in life and from whom they are to receive their reward when glorified.

[99] This is the order of the souls of the righteous, as henceforth is announced; and the aforesaid are the ways of torment which those who would not give heed shall suffer hereafter."

[100] I answered and said, "Will time therefore be given to the souls, after they have been separated from the bodies, to see what you have described to me?"

[101] He said to me, "They shall have freedom for seven days, so that during these seven days they may see the things of which you have been told, and afterwards they shall be gathered in their habitations."

[102] I answered and said, "If I have found favor in thy sight, show further to me, thy servant, whether on the day of judgment the righteous will be able to intercede for the ungodly or to entreat the Most High for them, [103] fathers for sons or sons for parents, brothers for brothers, relatives for their kinsmen, or friends for those who are most dear."

[104] He answered me and said, "Since you have found favor in my sight, I will show you this also. The day of judgment is decisive and displays to all the seal of truth. Just as now a father does not send his son, or a son his father, or a master his servant, or a friend his dearest friend, to be ill or sleep or eat or be healed in his stead, [105] so no one shall ever pray for another on that day, neither shall any one lay a burden on another; for then every one shall bear his own righteousness and unrighteousness."

[36(106)] I answered and said, "How then do we find that first Abraham prayed for the people of Sodom, and Moses for our fathers who sinned in the desert,

[37(107)] and Joshua after him for Israel in the days of Achan,

[38(108)] and Samuel in the days of Saul, and David for the plague, and Solomon for those in the sanctuary, [39(109)] and Elijah for those who received the rain, and for the one who was dead, that he might live, [40(110)] and Hezekiah for the people in the days of Sennacherib, and many others prayed for many?

[41(111)] If therefore the righteous have prayed for the ungodly now, when corruption has increased and unrighteousness has multiplied, why will it not be so then as well?"

[42(112)] He answered me and said, "This present world is not the end; the full glory does not abide in it; therefore those who were strong prayed for the weak.

[43(113)] But the day of judgment will be the end of this age and the beginning of the immortal age to come, in which corruption has passed away,

[44(114)] sinful indulgence has come to an end, unbelief has been cut off, and righteousness has increased and truth has appeared

[45(115)] Therefore no one will then be able to have mercy on him who has been condemned in the judgment, or to harm him who is victorious."

[46(116)] I answered and said, "This is my first and last word, that it would have been better if the earth had not produced Adam, or else, when it had produced him, had restrained him from sinning.

[47(117)] For what good is it to all that they live in sorrow now and expect punishment after death?

[48(118)] O Adam, what have you done? For though it was you who sinned, the fall was not yours alone, but ours also who are your descendants.

[49(119)] For what good is it to us, if an eternal age has been promised to us, but we have done deeds that bring death?

[50(120)] And what good is it that an everlasting hope has been promised to us, but we have miserably failed?

[51(121)] Or that safe and healthful habitations have been reserved for us, but we have lived wickedly?

[52(122)] Or that the glory of the Most High will defend those who have led a pure life, but we have walked in the most wicked ways?

[53(123)] Or that a paradise shall be revealed, whose fruit remains unspoiled and in which are abundance and healing, but we shall not enter it, [54(124)] because we have lived in unseemly places?

[55(125)] Or that the faces of those who practiced self-control shall shine more than the stars, but our faces shall be blacker than darkness?

[56(126)] For while we lived and committed iniquity we did not consider what we should suffer after death."

[57(127)] He answered and said, "This is the meaning of the contest which every man who is born on earth shall wage, [58(128)] that if he is defeated he shall suffer what you have said, but if he is victorious he shall receive what I have said.

[59(129)] For this is the way of which Moses, while he was alive, spoke to the people, saying, `Choose for yourself life, that you may live!"

[60(130)] But they did not believe him, or the prophets after him, or even myself who have spoken to them.

[61(131)] Therefore there shall not be grief at their destruction, so much as joy over those to whom salvation is assured."

[62(132)] I answered and said, "I know, O Lord, that the Most High is now called merciful, because he has mercy on those who have not yet come into the world;

[63(133)] and gracious, because he is gracious to those who turn in repentance to his law;

[64(134)] and patient, because he shows patience toward those who have sinned, since they are his own works;

[65(135)] and bountiful, because he would rather give than take away;

[66(136)] and abundant in compassion, because he makes his compassions abound more and more to those now living and to those who are gone and to those yet to come,

[67(137)] for if he did not make them abound, the world with those who inhabit it would not have life;

[68(138)] and he is called giver, because if he did not give out of his goodness so that those who have committed iniquities might be relieved of them, not one ten-thousandth of mankind could have life;

[69(139)] and judge, because if he did not pardon those who were created by his word and blot out the multitude of their sins, [70(140)] there would probably be left only very few of the innumerable multitude."

4Ezra.8

[1] He answered me and said, "The Most High made this world for the sake of many, but the world to come for the sake of few.

[2] But I tell you a parable, Ezra. Just as, when you ask the earth, it will tell you that it provides very much clay from which earthenware is made, but only a little dust from which gold comes; so is the course of the present world.

[3] Many have been created, but few shall be saved."

[4] I answered and said, "Then drink your fill of understanding, O my soul, and drink wisdom, O my heart!

[5] For not of your own will did you come into the world, and against your will you depart, for you have been given only a short time to live.

[6] O Lord who are over us, grant to thy servant that we may pray before thee, and give us seed for our heart and cultivation of our understanding so that fruit may be produced, by which every mortal who bears the likeness of a human being may be able to live.

[7] For thou alone dost exist, and we are a work of thy hands, as thou hast declared.

[8] And because thou dost give life to the body which is now fashioned in the womb, and dost furnish it with members, what thou hast created is preserved in fire and water, and for nine months the womb which thou has formed endures thy creation which has been created in it.

[9] But that which keeps and that which is kept shall both be kept by thy keeping. And when the womb gives up again what has been created in it,

[10] thou hast commanded that from the members themselves (that is, from the breasts) milk should be supplied which is the fruit of the breasts, [11] so that what has been fashioned may be nourished for a time; and afterwards thou wilt guide him in thy mercy.

[12] Thou hast brought him up in thy righteousness, and instructed him in thy law, and reproved him in thy wisdom.

[13] Thou wilt take away his life, for he is thy creation; and thou wilt make him live, for he is thy work.

[14] If then thou wilt suddenly and quickly destroy him who with so great labor was fashioned by thy command, to what purpose was he made?

[15] And now I will speak out: About all mankind thou knowest best; but I will speak about thy people, for whom I am grieved, [16] and about thy inheritance, for whom I lament, and about Israel, for whom I am sad, and about the seed of Jacob, for whom I am troubled.

[17] Therefore I will pray before thee for myself and for them, for I see the failings of us who dwell in the land, [18] and I have heard of the swiftness of the judgment that is to come.

[19] Therefore hear my voice, and understand my words, and I will speak before thee."

The beginning of the words of Ezra's prayer, before he was taken up. He said:

[20] "O Lord who inhabitest eternity, whose eyes are exalted and whose upper chambers are in the air,

[21] whose throne is beyond measure and whose glory is beyond comprehension, before whom the hosts of angels stand trembling

[22] and at whose command they are changed to wind and fire, whose word is sure and whose utterances are certain, whose ordinance is strong and whose command is terrible,

[23] whose look dries up the depths and whose indignation makes the mountains melt away, and whose truth is established for ever –

[24] hear, O Lord, the prayer of thy servant, and give ear to the petition of thy creature; attend to my words.

[25] For as long as I live I will speak, and as long as I have understanding I will answer.

[26] O look not upon the sins of thy people, but at those who have served thee in truth.

[27] Regard not the endeavors of those who act wickedly, but the endeavors of those who have kept thy covenants amid afflictions.

[28] Think not on those who have lived wickedly in thy sight; but remember those who have willingly acknowledged that thou art to be feared.

[29] Let it not be thy will to destroy those who have had the ways of cattle; but regard those who have gloriously taught thy law.

[30] Be not angry with those who are deemed worse than beasts; but love those who have always put their trust in thy glory.

[31] For we and our fathers have passed our lives in ways that bring death, but thou, because of us sinners, are called merciful.

[32] For if thou hast desired to have pity on us, who have no works of righteousness, then thou wilt be called merciful.

[33] For the righteous, who have many works laid up with thee, shall receive their reward in consequence of their own deeds.

[34] But what is man, that thou art angry with him; or what is a corruptible race, that thou art so bitter against it?

[35] For in truth there is no one among those who have been born who has not acted wickedly, and among those who have existed there is no one who has not transgressed.

[36] For in this, O Lord, thy righteousness and goodness will be declared, when thou art merciful to those who have no store of good works."

[37] He answered me and said, "Some things you have spoken rightly, and it will come to pass according to your words.

[38] For indeed I will not concern myself about the fashioning of those who have sinned, or about their death, their judgment, or their destruction;

[39] but I will rejoice over the creation of the righteous, over their pilgrimage also, and their salvation, and their receiving their reward.

[40] As I have spoken, therefore, so it shall be.

[41] "For just as the farmer sows many seeds upon the ground and plants a multitude of seedlings, and yet not all that have been sown will come up in due season, and not all that were planted will take root; so also those who have been sown in the world will not all be saved."

[42] I answered and said, "If I have found favor before thee, let me speak.

[43] For if the farmer's seed does not come up, because it has not received thy rain in due season, or if it has been ruined by too much rain, it perishes.

[44] But man, who has been formed by thy hands and is called thy own image because he is made like thee, and for whose sake thou hast formed all things -- hast thou also made him like the farmer's seed?

[45] No, O Lord who art over us! But spare thy people and have mercy on thy inheritance, for thou hast mercy on thy own creation."

[46] He answered me and said, "Things that are present are for those who live now, and things that are future are for those who will live hereafter.

[47] For you come far short of being able to love my creation more than I love it. But you have often compared yourself to the unrighteous. Never do so!

[48] But even in this respect you will be praiseworthy before the Most High, [49] because you have humbled yourself, as is becoming for you, and have not deemed yourself to be among the righteous in order to receive the greatest glory.

[50] For many miseries will affect those who inhabit the world in the last times, because they have walked in great pride.

[51] But think of your own case, and inquire concerning the glory of those who are like yourself, [52] because it is for you that paradise is opened, the tree of life is planted, the age to come is prepared, plenty is provided, a city is built, rest is appointed, goodness is established and wisdom perfected beforehand.

[53] The root of evil is sealed up from you, illness is banished from you, and death is hidden; hell has fled and corruption has been forgotten;

[54] sorrows have passed away, and in the end the treasure of immortality is made manifest.

[55] Therefore do not ask any more questions about the multitude of those who perish.

[56] For they also received freedom, but they despised the Most High, and were contemptuous of his law, and forsook his ways.

[57] Moreover they have even trampled upon his righteous ones, [58] and said in their hearts that there is not God -- though knowing full well that they must die.

[59] For just as the things which I have predicted await you, so the thirst and torment which are prepared await them. For the Most High did not intend that men should be destroyed;

[60] but they themselves who were created have defiled the name of him who made them, and have been ungrateful to him who prepared life for them.

[61] Therefore my judgment is now drawing near;

[62] I have not shown this to all men, but only to you and a few like you." Then I answered and said,

[63] "Behold, O Lord, thou hast now shown me a multitude of the signs which thou wilt do in the last times, but thou hast not shown me when thou wilt do them."

4Ezra.9

[1] He answered me and said, "Measure carefully in your mind, and when you see that a certain part of the predicted signs are past,

[2] then you will know that it is the very time when the Most High is about to visit the world which he has made.

[3] So when there shall appear in the world earthquakes, tumult of peoples, intrigues of nations, wavering of leaders, confusion of princes,

[4] then you will know that it was of these that the Most High spoke from the days that were of old, from the beginning.

[5] For just as with everything that has occurred in the world, the beginning is evident, and the end manifest;

[6] so also are the times of the Most High: the beginnings are manifest in wonders and mighty works, and the end in requital and in signs.

[7] And it shall be that every one who will be saved and will be able to escape on account of his works, or on account of the faith by which he has believed,

[8] will survive the dangers that have been predicted, and will see my salvation in my land and within my borders, which I have sanctified for myself from the beginning.

[9] Then those who have now abused my ways shall be amazed, and those who have rejected them with contempt shall dwell in torments.

[10] For as many as did not acknowledge me in their lifetime, although they received my benefits, [11] and as many as scorned my law while they still had freedom, and did not understand but despised it while an opportunity of repentance was still open to them,

[12] these must in torment acknowledge it after death.

[13] Therefore, do not continue to be curious as to how the ungodly will be punished; but inquire how the righteous will be saved, those to whom the age belongs and for whose sake the age was made."

[14] I answered and said,

[15] "I said before, and I say now, and will say it again: there are more who perish than those who will be saved, [16] as a wave is greater than a drop of water."

[17] He answered me and said, "As is the field, so is the seed; and as are the flowers, so are the colors; and as is the work, so is the product; and as is the farmer, so is the threshing floor.

[18] For there was a time in this age when I was preparing for those who now exist, before the world was made for them to dwell in, and no one opposed me then, for no one existed;

[19] but now those who have been created in this world which is supplied both with an unfailling table and an inexhaustible pasture, have become corrupt in their ways.

[20] So I considered my world, and behold, it was lost, and my earth, and behold, it was in peril because of the devices of those who had come into it.

[21] And I saw and spared some with great difficulty, and saved for myself one grape out of a cluster, and one plant out of a great forest.

[22] So let the multitude perish which has been born in vain, but let my grape and my plant be saved, because with much labor I have perfected them.

[23] But if you will let seven days more pass -- do not fast during them, however;

[24] but go into a field of flowers where no house has been built, and eat only of the flowers of the field, and taste no meat and drink no wine, but eat only flowers,

[25] and pray to the Most High continually -- then I will come and talk with you."

As the presbyters say, then those are, others shall enjoy the delights of Paradise, and others shall possess the splendour of the city; for everywhere the Saviour will be seen, according as they shall be worthy who see Him. But that there is this distinction between the habitation of those who produce an hundred-fold, and that of those who produce sixty-fold, and that of those who produce thirty-fold; for the first will be taken up into the heavens, the second class will dwell in Paradise, and the last will inhabit the city; and that on this account the Lord said, "In my Father's house are many mansions:" John 14:2 for all things belong to God, who supplies all with a suitable dwelling-place, even as His word says, that a share is given to all by the Father, according as each one is or shall be worthy. And this is the couch Matthew 22:10 in which they shall recline who feast, being invited to the wedding. The presbyters, the disciples of the apostles, say that this is the gradation and arrangement of those who are saved, and that they advance through steps of this nature; and that, moreover, they ascend through the Spirit to the Son, and through the Son to the Father; and that in due time the Son will yield up His work to the Father, even as it is said by the apostle, "For He must reign till He has put all enemies under His feet. The last enemy that shall be destroyed is death." 1 Corinthians 15:25-26 For in the times of the kingdom the just man who is on the earth shall forget to die. "But when He says all things are put under Him, it is manifest that He is excepted which did put all things under Him. And when all things shall be subdued unto Him, then shall the Son also Himself be subject unto Him that put all things under Him, that God may be all in all. "1 Corinthians 15:27-28

Chapter 48 (end)

But now let us dismiss the wicked and inquire about the righteous.

And I will recount their blessedness

And not be silent in celebrating their glory, which is reserved for them.

For assuredly as in a little time in this transitory world in which you live, you have endured much labor,

So in that world to which there is no end, you shall receive great light.

Chapters 49—52. The Nature of the Resurrection Body: the final Destinies of the Righteous and the Wicked

Chapter 49

Nevertheless, I Will again ask from you,

O Mighty One, yea, I will ask made all things.

In what shape will those live who live in Your day?

Or how will the splendor of those who (are) after that time continue?

Will they then resume this form of the present,

And put on these entrammelling members,

Which are now involved in evils,

And in which evils are consummated,

Or will you perchance change these things which have been in the world

As also the world?

Chapter 50

And He answered and said unto me:

Hear, Baruch, this word,
And write in the remembrance of your heart all that you shall learn.
For the earth shall then assuredly restore the dead,
Which it now receives, in order to preserve them.
It shall make no change in their form,
But as it has received, so shall it restore them,
And as I delivered them unto it, so also shall it raise them.

For then it will be necessary to show the living that the dead have come to life again, and that those who had departed have returned (again).

And it shall come to pass, when they have severally recognized those whom they now know, then judgment shall grow strong, and those things which before were spoken of shall come.

Chapter 51

And it shall come to pass, when that appointed day has gone by, that then shall the aspect of those who are condemned be afterwards changed, and the glory of those who are justified.

For the aspect of those who now act wickedly shall become worse than it is, as they shall suffer torment.

Also (as for) the glory of those who have now been justified in My law, who have had understanding in their life, and who have planted in their heart the root of wisdom, then their splendor shall be glorified in changes, and the form of their face shall be turned into the light of their beauty, that they may be able to acquire and receive the world which does not die, which is then promised to them.

For over this above all shall those who come then lament, that they rejected My law, and stopped their ears that they might not hear wisdom or receive understanding.

When therefore they see those, over whom they are now exalted, (but) who shall then be exalted and glorified more than they, they shall respectively be transformed, the latter into the splendor of angels, and the former shall yet more waste away in wonder at the visions and in the beholding of the forms.

For they shall first behold and afterwards depart to be tormented.

But those who have been saved by their works,
And to whom the law has been now a hope,
And understanding an expectation,
And wisdom a confidence,
Shall wonders appear in their time.
For they shall behold the world which is now invisible to them,
And they shall behold the time which is now hidden from them:
And time shall no longer age them.
For in the heights of that world shall they dwell,
And they shall be made like unto the angels,
And be made equal to the stars,
And they shall be changed into every form they desire,
From beauty into loveliness,

And from light into the splendor of glory.

For there shall be spread before them the extents of Paradise, and there shall be shown to them the beauty of the majesty of the living creatures which are beneath the throne, and all the armies of the angels, who are now held fast by My word, lest they should appear, and are held fast by a command, that they may stand in their places till their advent comes.

Moreover, there shall then be excellency in the righteous surpassing that in the angels.

For the first shall receive the last, those whom they were expecting, and the last those of whom they used to hear that they had passed away.

For they have been delivered from this world of tribulation,
And laid down the burthen of anguish.
For what then have men lost their life,
And for what have those who were on the earth exchanged their soul?
For then they chose (not) for themselves this time,
Which, beyond the reach of anguish, could not pass away:
But they chose for themselves that time,
Whose issues are full of lamentations and evils,
And they denied the world which ages not those who come to it,
And they rejected the time of glory,
So that they shall not come to the honor of which I told you before.

Chapter 52

And I answered and said:

How can we forget those for whom woe is then reserved?
And why therefore do we again mourn for those who die?
Or why do we weep for those who depart to Sheol?
Let lamentations be reserved for the beginning of that coming torment,
And let tears be laid up for the advent of the destruction of that time.
But even in the face of these things will I speak.
And as for the righteous, what will they do now?
N sRejoice you in the suffering which you now suffer:
For why do you look for the decline of your enemies?
Make ready your soul for that which is reserved for you,
And prepare your souls for the reward which is laid up for you.

St. Irenaeus (125 – 200 AD), Church Father

There Shall Be Various Mansions For Saints, According To Rank Allotted To Each Individual Against Heresies 5:36

Men shall be actually raised: the world shall not be annihilated; but there shall be various mansions for the saints, according to the rank allotted to each individual. All things shall be subject to God the Father, and so shall He be all in all.

1. For since there are real men, so must there also be a real establishment (plantationem), that they vanish not away among non-existent things, but progress among those which have an actual existence. For neither is the substance nor the essence of the creation annihilated (for faithful and true is He who has established it), but the fashion of the world passes away; 1 Corinthians 7:31 that is, those things among which transgression has occurred, since man has grown old in them. And therefore this [present] fashion has been formed temporary, God foreknowing all things; as I have pointed out in the preceding book, and have also shown, as far as was possible, the cause of the creation of this world of temporal things. But when this [present] fashion [of things] passes away, and man has been renewed, and flourishes in an incorruptible state, so as to preclude the possibility of becoming old, [then] there shall be the new heaven and the new earth, in which the new man shall remain [continually], always holding fresh converse with God. And since (or, that) these things shall ever continue without end, Isaiah declares, For as the new heavens and the new earth which I do make, continue in my sight, says the Lord, so shall your seed and your name remain. Isaiah 66:22 And as the presbyters say, Then those who are deemed worthy of an abode in heaven shall go there, others shall enjoy the delights of paradise, and others shall possess the splendour of the city; for everywhere the Saviour shall be seen according as they who see Him shall be worthy.

2. They say, moreover, that there is this distinction between the habitation of those who produce an hundred-fold, and that of those who produce sixty-fold, and that of those who produce thirty-fold: for the first will be taken up into the heavens, the second will dwell in paradise, the last will inhabit the city; and that was on this account the Lord declared, In My Father's house are many mansions. John 14:2 For all things belong to God, who supplies all with a suitable dwelling-place; even as His Word says, that a share is allotted to all by the Father, according as each person is or shall be worthy. And this is the couch on which the guests shall recline, having been invited to the wedding. Matthew 22:10 The presbyters, the disciples of the apostles, affirm that this is the gradation and arrangement of those who are saved, and that they advance through steps of this nature; also that they ascend through the Spirit to the Son, and through the Son to the Father, and that in due time the Son will yield up His work to the Father, even as it is said by the apostle, For He must reign till He has put all enemies under His feet. The last enemy that shall be destroyed is death. 1 Corinthians 15:25-26 For in the times of the kingdom, the righteous man who is upon the earth shall then forget to die. But when He says, All things shall be subdued unto Him, it is manifest that He is excepted who did put all things under Him. And when all things shall be subdued unto Him, then shall the Son also Himself be subject unto Him who put all things under Him, that God may be all in all. 1 Corinthians 15:27-28

3. John, therefore, did distinctly foresee the first resurrection of the just, Luke 14:14 and the inheritance in the kingdom of the earth; and what the prophets have prophesied concerning it harmonize [with his vision]. For the Lord also taught these things, when He promised that He would have the mixed cup new with His disciples in the kingdom. The apostle, too, has confessed that the creation shall be free from the bondage of corruption, [so as to pass] into the liberty of the sons of God. Romans 8:21 And in all these things, and by them all, the same God the Father is manifested, who fashioned man, and gave promise of the inheritance of the earth to the fathers, who brought it (the creature) forth [from bondage] at the resurrection of the just, and fulfils the promises for the kingdom of His Son; subsequently bestowing in a paternal manner those things which neither the eye has seen, nor the ear has heard, nor has [thought concerning them] arisen within the heart of man, 1 Corinthians 2:9; Isaiah 64:4 For there is the one Son, who accomplished His Father's will; and one human race also in which the mysteries of God are wrought, which the angels desire to look into; 1 Peter 1:12 and they are not able to search out the wisdom of God, by means of which His handiwork, confirmed and incorporated with His Son, is brought to perfection; that His offspring, the First-begotten Word, should descend to the creature (facturam), that is, to what had been moulded (plasma), and that it should be contained by Him; and, on the other hand, the creature should contain the Word, and ascend to Him, passing beyond the angels, and be made after the image and likeness of God.

Chapter 13: Degrees of Glory in Heaven corresponding with the dignities of the Church Below

He, then, who has first moderated his passions and trained himself for impassibility, and developed to the beneficence of gnostic perfection, is here equal to the angels. Luminous already, and like the sun shining in the exercise of beneficence, he speeds by righteous knowledge through the love of God to the sacred abode, like as the apostles. Not that they became apostles through being chosen for some distinguished peculiarity of nature, since also Judas was chosen along with them. But they were capable of becoming apostles on being chosen by Him who foresees even ultimate issues. Matthias, accordingly, who was not chosen along with them, on showing himself worthy of becoming an apostle, is substituted for Judas. Those, then, also now, who have exercised themselves in the Lord's commandments, and lived perfectly and gnostically according to the gospel, may be enrolled in the chosen body of the apostles. Such an one is in reality a presbyter of the church, and a true minister (deacon) of the will of God, if he do and teach what is the Lord's; not as being ordained by men, nor regarded righteous because a presbyter, but enrolled in the presbyterate because righteous.

And although here upon earth he be not honored with the chief seat, he will sit down on the four-and-twenty thrones, judging the people, as John says in the Apocalypse. For, in truth, the covenant of salvation, reaching down to us from the foundation of the world, through different generations and times, is one, though conceived as different in respect of gift. For it follows that there is one unchangeable gift of salvation given by one God, through one Lord, benefiting in many ways. For which cause the middle wall<sup>3</sup> which separated the Greek from the Jew is taken away, in order that there might be a peculiar people. And so both meet in the one unity of faith; and the selection out of both is one. And the chosen of the chosen are those who by reason of perfect knowledge are culled [as the best] from the church itself, and honored with the most august glory—the judges and rulers four-and-twenty (the grace being doubled) equally from Jews and Greeks. Since, according / to my opinion, the grades<sup>4</sup> here in the church, of bishops, presbyters, deacons, are imitations of the angelic glory, and of that economy which, the Scriptures say, awaits those who, following the footsteps of the apostles, have lived in perfection of righteousness according to the gospel. For these taken up in the clouds, the apostle<sup>6</sup> writes, will first minister [as deacons], then be classed in the presbyterate, by promotion in glory (for glory differs<sup>6</sup> from glory) till they grow into “a perfect man.

Chapter 14: Degrees of Glory in Heaven

Such, according to David, “rest in the holy hill of God,” in the church far on high, in which are gathered the philosophers of God, “who are Israelites indeed, who are pure in And other sheep there are also,” saith the Lord, “which are not of this fold”—deemed worthy of another fold and mansion, in proportion to their faith. “But my sheep hear my voice,” understanding gnostically the commandments. And this is to be taken in a magnanimous and worthy acceptance, along with also the recompense and accompaniment of works. So that when we hear, “Thy faith hath saved thee,” we do not understand Him to say absolutely that those who have believed in any way whatever shall be saved, unless also works follow. But it was to the Jews alone that He spoke this utterance, who kept the law and lived blamelessly, who wanted only faith in the Lord. No one, then, can be a believer and at the same time be licentious; but though he quit the flesh, he must put off the passions, so as to be capable of reaching his own mansion. Now to know is more than to believe, as to be dignified with the highest honor after being saved is a greater thing than being saved. Accordingly the believer, through great discipline, divesting himself of the passions, passes to the mansion which is better than the former one, viz. to the greatest torment, taking with him the characteristic of repentance from the sins he has committed after baptism. He is tortured then still more—not yet or not quite attaining what he sees others to have acquired. Besides, he is also ashamed of his transgressions. The greatest torments, indeed, are assigned to the believer. For God's righteousness is good, and His goodness is righteous. And though the punishments cease in the course of the completion of the expiation and purification of each one, yet those have very great and permanent grief who are found worthy of the other fold, on account of not being along with those that have been glorified through righteousness. For instance, Solomon, calling the Gnostic, wise, speaks thus of those who admire the dignity of his mansion: “For they shall see the end of the wise, and to what a degree the Lord has established him.” And of his glory they will say, “This was he whom we once held up to derision, and made a byword of reproach; fools that we were! We thought his life madness, and his end dishonorable. How is he reckoned among the sons of God, and his inheritance among the saints?"

Not only then the believer, but even the heathen, is judged most righteously. For since God knew in virtue of His prescience that he would not believe, He nevertheless, in order that he might receive his own perfection, gave him philosophy, but gave it him previous to faith. And He gave the sun, and the moon, and the stars to be worshipped; "which God," the Law says, made for the nations, that they might not become altogether atheistical, and so utterly perish. But they, also in the instance of this commandment, having become devoid of sense, and addicting themselves to graven images, are judged unless they repent; some of them because, though able, they would not believe God; and others because, though willing, they did not take the necessary pains to become believers. There were also, however, those who, from the worship of the heavenly bodies, did not return to the Maker of them. For this was the way given to the nations to rise up to God, by means of the worship of the heavenly bodies. But those who would not abide by those heavenly bodies assigned to them, but fell away from them to stocks and stones, "were counted," it is said, "as chaff-dust and as a drop from a jar," beyond salvation, cast away from the body. As, then, to be simply saved is the result of medium actions, but to be saved rightly and becomingly is right action, so also all action of the Gnostic may be called right action; that of the simple believer, intermediate action, not yet perfected according to reason, not yet made right according to knowledge; but that of every heathen again is sinful. For it is not simply doing well, but doing actions with a certain aim, and acting according to reason, that the Scriptures exhibit as requisite.

As, then, lyres ought not to be touched by those who are destitute of skill in playing the lyre, nor flutes by those who are unskilled in flute-playing, neither are those to put their hand to affairs who have not knowledge, and know not how to use them in the whole of life. The struggle for freedom, then, is waged not alone by the athletes of battles in wars, but also in banquets, and in bed, and in the tribunals, by those who are anointed by the word, who are ashamed to become the captives of pleasures.

"I would never part with virtue for unrighteous gain." But plainly, unrighteous gain is pleasure and pain, toil and fear; and, to speak comprehensively, the passions of the soul, the present of which is delightful, the future vexatious. "For what is the profit," it is said, "if you gain the world and lose the soul!" It is clear, then, that those who do not perform good actions, do not know what is for their own advantage. And if so, neither are they capable of praying aright, so as to receive from God good things; nor, should they receive them, will they be sensible of the boon; nor, should they enjoy them, will they enjoy worthily what they know not; both from their want of knowledge how to use the good things given them, and from their excessive stupidity, being ignorant of the way to avail themselves of the divine gifts.

Now stupidity is the cause of ignorance. And it appears to me that it is the vaunt of a boastful soul, though of one with a good conscience, to exclaim against what happens through circumstances: "Therefore let them do what they may; For it shall be well with me; and Right Shall be my ally, and I shall not be caught doing evil."

But such a good conscience preserves sanctity towards God and justice towards men; keeping the soul pure with grave thoughts, and pure words, and just deeds. By thus receiving the Lord's power, the soul studies to be God; regarding nothing bad but ignorance, and action contrary to right reason. And giving thanks always for all things to God, by righteous hearing and divine reading, by true investigation, by holy oblation, by blessed prayer; lauding, hymning, blessing, praising, such a soul is never at any time separated from God. Rightly then is it said, "And they who trust in Him shall understand the truth, and those faithful in love shall abide by Him." You see what statements Wisdom makes about the Gnostics. Conformably, therefore, there are various abodes, according to the worth of those who have believed. To the point Solomon says, "For there shall be given to him the choice grace of faith, and a more pleasant lot in the temple of the Lord." For the comparative shows that there are lower parts in the temple of God, which is the whole church. And the superlative remains to be conceived, where the Lord is. These chosen abodes, which are three, are indicated by the numbers in the Gospel—the thirty, the sixty, the hundred.

And the perfect inheritance belongs to those who attain to "a perfect man," according to the image of the Lord. And the likeness is not, as some imagine, that of the human form; for this consideration is impious. Nor is the likeness to the first cause that which consists in virtue. For this utterance is also impious, being that of those who have imagined that virtue in man and in the sovereign God is the same. "Thou hast supposed iniquity," He says, "[in imagining] that I will be like to thee." But "it is enough for the disciple to become as the Master," saith the Master. To the likeness of God, then, he that is introduced into adoption and the friendship of God, to the just inheritance of the lords and gods is brought; if he be perfected, according to the Gospel, as the Lord Himself taught.

Such, according to David, "rest in the holy hill of God," Ps. xv. i. in the Church far on high, in which are gathered the philosophers of God, "who are Israelites indeed, who are pure in heart, in whom there is no guile;" John i. 47; Matt v. 8. who do not remain in the seventh seat, the place of rest, but are promoted, through the active beneficence of the divine likeness, to the heritage of beneficence which is the eighth grade; devoting themselves to the pure vision ἐποπτεία, the third and highest grade of initiation of the Eleusinian mysteries (Liddell and Scott's Lexicon). of insatiable contemplation.

"And other sheep there are also," saith the Lord, "which are not of this fold" John x. 16.—deemed worthy of another fold and mansion, in proportion to their faith. "But My sheep hear My voice," John x. 27. understanding gnostically the commandments. And this is to be taken in a magnanimous and worthy acceptance, along with also the recompense and accompaniment of works. So that when we hear, "Thy faith hath saved thee," Mark v. 34, etc. we do not understand Him to say absolutely that those who have believed in any way whatever shall be saved, unless also works follow. The greatest torments, indeed, are assigned to the believer. For God's righteousness is good, and His goodness is righteous. And though the punishments cease in the course of the completion of the expiation and purification of each one, yet those have very great and permanent grief The text here has ὅτι, for which has been substituted (Potter and Sylb.) οί, as above; τήν after ἀὐλῆς (fold) requires to be omitted also in rendering the sentence as we have done. are found worthy of the other fold, on account of not being along with those that have been glorified through righteousness.

For instance, Solomon, calling the Gnostic, wise, speaks thus of those who admire the dignity of his mansion: "For they shall see the end of the wise, and to what a degree the Lord has established him." Wisd. iv. 17. And of his glory they will say, "This was he whom we once held up to derision, and made a byword of reproach; fools that we were! We thought his life madness, and his end dishonourable. How is he reckoned among the sons of God, and his inheritance among the saints?" Wisd. v. 3–5.

Not only then the believer, but even the heathen, is judged most righteously. For since God knew in virtue of His prescience that he would not believe, He nevertheless, in order that he might receive his own perfection gave him philosophy, but gave it him previous to faith. And He gave the sun, and the moon, and the stars to be worshipped; “which God,” the Law says, Deut. iv. 19. made for the nations, that they might not become altogether atheistical, and so utterly perish. But they, also in the instance of this commandment, having become devoid of sense, and addicting themselves to graven images, are judged unless they repent; some of them because, though able, they would not believe God; and others because, though willing, they did not take the necessary pains to become believers. There were also, however, those who, from the worship of the heavenly bodies, did not return to the Maker of them. For this was the sway given to the nations to rise up to God, by means of the worship of the heavenly bodies. But those who would not abide by those heavenly bodies assigned to them, but fell away from them to stocks and stones, “were counted,” it is said, “as chaff-dust and as a drop from a jar,” Isa. xl. 15. beyond salvation, cast away from the body.

As, then, to be simply saved is the result of medium The author reckons three kinds of actions, the first of which is κατόρθωμα, right or perfect action, which is characteristic of the perfect man and Gnostic alone, and raises him (εἰς τὴν ἀνωτάτω δόξαν) to the height of glory. The second is the class of τῶν μέσων, medium, or intermediate actions, which are done by less perfect believers, and procure a lower grade of glory. In the third place he reckons sinful actions (ἁμαρτηκίας), which are done by those who fall away from salvation (Potter). actions, but to be saved rightly and becomingly [2 Pet. i. 11.] is right action, so also all action of the Gnostic may be called right action; that of the simple believer, intermediate action, not yet perfected according to reason, not yet made right according to knowledge; but that of every heathen again is sinful. For it is not simply doing well, but doing actions with a certain aim, and acting according to reason, that the Scriptures exhibit as requisite. To produce this sense, καθῆκεν of the text is by Potter changed into καθῆκειν.

As, then, lyres ought not to be touched by those who are destitute of skill in playing the lyre, nor flutes by those who are unskilled in flute-playing, neither are those to put their hand to affairs who have not knowledge, and know not how to use them in the whole. On the authority of one of the ms., Sylburgius reads ὄλον instead of λόγον in the text. of life.

The struggle for freedom, then, is waged not alone by the athletes of battles in wars, but also in banquets, and in bed, and in the tribunals, by those who are anointed by the word, who are ashamed to become the captives of pleasures.

“I would never part with virtue for unrighteous gain.” But plainly, unrighteous gain is pleasure and pain, toil and fear; and, to speak comprehensively, the passions of the soul, the present of which is delightful, the future vexatious. “For what is the profit,” it is said, “if you gain the world and lose the soul?” Matt. viii. 26; Mark viii. 36; Luke ix. 25. It is clear, then, that those who do not perform good actions, do not know what is for their own advantage. And if so, neither are they capable of praying aright, so as to receive from God good things; nor, should they receive them, will they be sensible of the boon; nor, should they enjoy them, will they enjoy worthily what they know not; both from their want of knowledge how to use the good things given them, and from their excessive stupidity, being ignorant of the way to avail themselves of the divine gifts.

Now stupidity is the cause of ignorance. And it appears to me that it is the vaunt of a boastful soul, though of one with a good conscience, to exclaim against what happens through circumstances:—“Therefore let them do what they may; From the Acharneis of Aristophanes, quoted also by Cicero; with various readings in each. Heinsius substitutes παλαμάσθων for παλαμᾶσθαι of the text. For it shall be well with me; and Right Shall be my ally, and I shall not be caught doing evil.”

But such a good conscience preserves sanctity towards God and justice towards men; keeping the soul pure with grave thoughts, and pure words, and just deeds. By thus receiving the Lord’s power, the soul studies to be God; regarding nothing bad but ignorance, and action contrary to right reason. And giving thanks always for all things to God, by righteous hearing and divine reading, by true investigation, by holy oblation, by blessed prayer; lauding, hymning, blessing, praising, such a soul is never at any time separated from God. [Bunsen, Hippol., iii. p. 141.] Rightly then is it said, “And they who trust in Him shall understand the truth, and those faithful in love shall abide by Him.” Wisd. iii. 9. You see what statements Wisdom makes about the Gnostics.

Conformably, therefore, there are various abodes, according to the worth of those who have believed. [1 Cor. xv. 41.] To the point Solomon says, “For there shall be given to him the choice grace of faith, and a more pleasant lot in the temple of the Lord.” Wisd. iii. 14. For the comparative shows that there are lower parts in the temple of God, which is the whole Church. And the superlative remains to be conceived, where the Lord is. These chosen abodes, which are three, are indicated by the numbers in the Gospel—the thirty, the sixty, the hundred. Matt. xiii. 8. And the perfect inheritance belongs to those who attain to “a perfect man,” according to the image of the Lord. And the likeness is not, as some imagine, that of the human form; for this consideration is impious. Nor is the likeness to the first cause that which consists in virtue. For this utterance is also impious, being that of those who have imagined that virtue in man and in the sovereign God is the same. “Thou hast supposed iniquity,” He says, “[in imagining] that I will be like to thee.” Ps. l. 21. But “it is enough for the disciple to become as the Master,” Matt. xxv. 10. saith the Master. To the likeness of God, then, he that is introduced into adoption and the friendship of God, to the just inheritance of the lords and gods is brought; if he be perfected, according to the Gospel, as the Lord Himself taught.

Chapter 6

But if, for the contest's sake, God had appointed martyrdoms for us, that thereby we might make trial with our opponent, in order that He may now keep bruising him by whom man chose to be bruised, here too generosity rather than harshness in God holds sway. For He wished to make man, now plucked from the devil's throat by faith, trample upon him likewise by courage, that he might not merely have escaped from, but also completely vanquished, his enemy. He who had called to salvation has been pleased to summon to glory also, that they who were rejoicing in consequence of their deliverance may be in transports when they are crowned likewise. With what good-will the world celebrates those games, the combative festivals and superstitious contests of the Greeks, involving forms both of worship and of pleasure, has now become clear in Africa also. As yet cities, by sending their congratulations severally, annoy Carthage, which was presented with the Pythian game after the racecourse had attained to an old age. Thus, by the world it has been believed to be a most proper mode of testing proficiency in studies, to put in competition the forms of skill, to elicit the existing condition of bodies and of voices, the reward being the informer, the public exhibition the judge, and pleasure the decision. Where there are mere contests, there are some wounds: fists make reel, heels kick like butting rams, boxing-gloves mangle, whips leave gashes. Yet there will be no one reproaching the superintendent of the contest for exposing men to outrage. Suits for injuries lie outside the racecourse. But to the extent that those persons deal in discoloration, and gore, and swellings, he will design for them crowns, doubtless, and glory, and a present, political privileges, contributions by the citizens, images, statues, and—of such sort as the world can give— an eternity of fame, a resurrection by being kept in remembrance. The pugilist himself does not complain of feeling pain, for he wishes it; the crown closes the wounds, the palm hides the blood: he is excited more by victory than by injury. Will you count this man hurt whom you see happy? But not even the vanquished himself will reproach the superintendent of the contest for his misfortune. Shall it be unbecoming in God to bring forth kinds of skill and rules of His own into public view, into this open ground of the world, to be seen by men, and angels, and all powers?— to test flesh and spirit as to steadfastness and endurance?— to give to this one the palm, to this one distinction, to that one the privilege of citizenship, to that one pay?— to reject some also, and after punishing to remove them with disgrace? You dictate to God, forsooth, the times, or the ways, or the places in which to institute a trial concerning His own troop (of competitors) as if it were not proper for the Judge to pronounce the preliminary decision also. Well now, if He had put forth faith to suffer martyrdoms not for the contest's sake, but for its own benefit, ought it not to have had some store of hope, for the increase of which it might restrain desire of its own, and check its wish in order that it might strive to mount up, seeing they also who discharge earthly functions are eager for promotion? Or how will there be many mansions in our Father's house, if not to accord with a diversity of deserts? How will one star also differ from another star in glory, unless in virtue of disparity in their rays? 1 Corinthians 15:41 But further, if, on that account, some increase of brightness also was appropriate to loftiness of faith, that gain ought to have been of some such sort as would cost great effort, poignant suffering, torture, death. But consider the requital, when flesh and life are paid away— than which in man there is nought more precious, the one from the hand of God, the other from His breath— that the very things are paid away in obtaining the benefit of which the benefit consists; that the very things are expended which may be acquired; that the same things are the price which are also the commodities. God had foreseen also other weaknesses incident to the condition of man—the stratagems of the enemy, the deceptive aspects of the creatures, the snares of the world; that faith, even after baptism, would be endangered; that the most, after attaining unto salvation, would be lost again, through soiling the wedding-dress, through failing to provide oil for their torchlets— would be such as would have to be sought for over mountains and woodlands, and carried back upon the shoulders. He therefore appointed as second supplies of comfort, and the last means of succour, the fight of martyrdom and the baptism— thereafter free from danger— of blood. And concerning the happiness of the man who has partaken of these, David says: "Blessed are they whose iniquities are forgiven, and whose sins are covered. Blessed is the man to whom the Lord will not impute sin." For, strictly speaking, there cannot any longer be reckoned ought against the martyrs, by whom in the baptism (of blood) life itself is laid down. Thus, "love covers the multitude of sins;" 1 Peter 4:8 and loving God, to wit, with all its strength (by which in the endurance of martyrdom it maintains the fight), with all its life Matthew 22:37 (which it lays down for God), it makes of man a martyr. Shall you call these cures, counsels, methods of judging, spectacles, (illustrations of) even the barbarity of God? Does God covet man's blood? And yet I might venture to affirm that He does, if man also covets the kingdom of heaven, if man covets a sure salvation, if man also covets a second new birth. The exchange is displeasing to no one, which can plead, in justification of itself, that either benefit or injury is shared by the parties making it.

Chapter 12

Who, now, should know better the marrow of the Scriptures than the school of Christ itself?— the persons whom the Lord both chose for Himself as scholars, certainly to be fully instructed in all points, and appointed to us for masters to instruct us in all points. To whom would He have rather made known the veiled import of His own language, than to him to whom He disclosed the likeness of His own glory— to Peter, John, and James, and afterwards to Paul, to whom He granted participation in (the joys of) paradise too, prior to his martyrdom? Or do they also write differently from what they think— teachers using deceit, not truth? Addressing the Christians of Pontus, Peter, at all events, says, "How great indeed is the glory, if you suffer patiently, without being punished as evildoers! For this is a lovely feature, and even hereunto were you called, since Christ also suffered for us, leaving you Himself as an example, that you should follow His own steps." 1 Peter 2:20 And again: "Beloved, be not alarmed by the fiery trial which is taking place among you, as though some strange thing happened unto you. For, inasmuch as you are partakers of Christ's sufferings, do you rejoice; that, when His glory shall be revealed, you may be glad also with exceeding joy. If you are reproached for the name of Christ, happy are you; because glory and the Spirit of God rest upon you: if only none of you suffer as a murderer, or as a thief, or as an evil-doer, or as a busybody in other men's matters; yet (if any man suffer) as a Christian, let him not be ashamed, but let him glorify God on this behalf." 1 Peter 4:12 John, in fact, exhorts us to lay down our lives even for our brethren, 1 John 3:16 affirming that there is no fear in love: "For perfect love casts out fear, since fear has punishment; and he who fears is not perfect in love." 1 John 4:18 What fear would it be better to understand (as here meant), than that which gives rise to denial? What love does he assert to be perfect, but that which puts fear to flight, and gives courage to confess? What penalty will he appoint as the punishment of fear, but that which he who denies is about to pay, who has to be slain, body and soul, in hell? And if he teaches that we must die for the brethren, how much more for the Lord,— he being sufficiently prepared, by his own Revelation too, for giving such advice! For indeed the Spirit had sent the injunction to the angel of the church in Smyrna: "Behold, the devil shall cast some of you into prison, that you may be tried ten days. Be faithful unto death, and I will give you a crown of life." Revelation 2:10 Also to the angel of the church in Pergamus (mention was made) of Antipas, Revelation 2:13 the very faithful martyr, who was slain where Satan dwells. Also to the angel of the church in Philadelphia Revelation 3:10 (it was signified) that he who had not denied the name of the Lord was delivered from the last trial. Then to every conqueror the Spirit promises now the tree of life, and exemption from the second death; now the hidden manna with the stone of glistening whiteness, and the name unknown (to every man save him that receives it); now power to rule with a rod of iron, and the brightness of the morning star; now the being clothed in white raiment, and not having the name blotted out of the book of life, and being made in the temple of God a pillar with the inscription on it of the name of God and of the Lord, and of the heavenly Jerusalem; now a sitting with the Lord on His throne—which once was persistently refused to the sons of Zebedee. Matthew 20:20-23 Who, pray, are these so blessed conquerors, but martyrs in the strict sense of the word? For indeed theirs are the victories whose also are the fights; theirs, however, are the fights whose also is the blood. But the souls of the martyrs both peacefully rest in the meantime under the altar, Revelation 6:9 and support their patience by the assured hope of revenge; and, clothed in their robes, wear the dazzling halo of brightness, until others also may fully share in their glory. For yet again a countless throng are revealed, clothed in white and distinguished by palms of victory, celebrating their triumph doubtless over Antichrist, since one of the elders says, "These are they who come out of that great tribulation, and have washed their robes, and made them white in the blood of the Lamb." Revelation 7:14 For the flesh is the clothing of the soul. The uncleanness, indeed, is washed away by baptism, but the stains are changed into dazzling whiteness by martyrdom. For Esaias also promises, that out of red and scarlet there will come forth the whiteness of snow and wool. Isaiah 1:18 When great Babylon likewise is represented as drunk with the blood of the saints, Revelation 17:6 doubtless the supplies needful for her drunkenness are furnished by the cups of martyrdoms; and what suffering the fear of martyrdoms will entail, is in like manner shown. For among all the castaways, nay, taking precedence of them all, are the fearful. "But the fearful," says John— and then come the others— "will have their part in the lake of fire and brimstone." Revelation 21:8 Thus fear, which, as stated in his epistle, love drives out, has punishment.

Chapter 13

But how Paul, an apostle, from being a persecutor, who first of all shed the blood of the church, though afterwards he exchanged the sword for the pen, and turned the dagger into a plough, being first a ravaging wolf of Benjamin, then himself supplying food as did Jacob, — how he, (I say,) speaks in favour of martyrdoms, now to be chosen by himself also, when, rejoicing over the Thessalonians, he says, "So that we glory in you in the churches of God, for your patience and faith in all your persecutions and tribulations, in which you endure a manifestation of the righteous judgment of God, that you may be accounted worthy of His kingdom, for which you also suffer!" 2 Thessalonians 1:4 As also in his Epistle to the Romans: "And not only so, but we glory in tribulations also, being sure that tribulation works patience, and patience experience, and experience hope; and hope makes not ashamed." Romans 5:3 And again: "And if children, then heirs, heirs indeed of God, and joint-heirs with Christ: if so be that we suffer with Him, that we may be also glorified together. For I reckon that the sufferings of this time are not worthy to be compared with the glory which shall be revealed in us." Romans 8:17 And therefore he afterward says: "Who shall separate us from the love of God? Shall tribulation, or distress, or famine, or nakedness, or peril, or sword? (As it is written: For Your sake we are killed all the day long; we have been counted as sheep for the slaughter.) Nay, in all these things we are more than conquerors, through Him who loved us. For we are persuaded, that neither death, nor life, nor power, nor height, nor depth, nor any other creature, shall be able to separate us from the love of God, which is in Christ Jesus our Lord." Romans 8:35 But further, in recounting his own sufferings to the Corinthians, he certainly decided that suffering must be borne: "In labours, (he says,) more abundant, in prisons very frequent, in deaths oft. Of the Jews five times received I forty stripes, save one; thrice was I beaten with rods; once was I stoned," 2 Corinthians 11:23 and the rest. And if these severities will seem to be more grievous than martyrdoms, yet once more he says: "Therefore I take pleasure in infirmities, in reproaches, in necessities, in persecutions, in distresses for Christ's sake." 2 Corinthians 12:10 He also says, in verses occurring in a previous part of the epistle: "Our condition is such, that we are troubled on every side, yet not distressed; and are in need, but not in utter want; since we are harassed by persecutions, but not forsaken; it is such that we are cast down, but not destroyed; always bearing about in our body the dying of Christ." 2 Corinthians 4:8 "But though," says he, "our outward man perishes"— the flesh doubtless, by the violence of persecutions— "yet the inward man is renewed day by day"— the soul, doubtless, by hope in the promises. "For our light affliction, which is but for a moment, works for us a far more exceeding and eternal weight of glory; while we look not at the things which are seen, but at the things which are not seen. For the things which are seen are temporal"— he is speaking of troubles; "but the things which are not seen are eternal"— he is promising rewards. But writing in bonds to the Thessalonians, he certainly affirmed that they were blessed, since to them it had been given not only to believe in Christ, but also to suffer for His sake. "Having," says he, "the same conflict which you both saw in me, and now hear to be in me." Philippians 2:17 "For though I am offered upon the sacrifice, I joy and rejoice with you all; in like manner do you also joy and rejoice with me." You see what he decides the bliss of martyrdom to be, in honour of which he is providing a festival of mutual joy. When at length he had come to be very near the attainment of his desire, greatly rejoicing in what he saw before him, he writes in these terms to Timothy: "For I am already being offered, and the time of my departure is at hand. I have fought the good fight, I have finished my course, I have kept the faith; there is laid up for me the crown which the Lord will give me on that day" 2 Timothy 4:6 — doubtless of his suffering. Admonition enough did he for his part also give in preceding passages: "It is a faithful saying: For if we are dead with Christ, we shall also live with Him; if we suffer, we shall also reign with Him; if we deny Him, He also will deny us; if we believe not, yet He is faithful: He cannot deny Himself." 2 Timothy 2:11 "Be not ashamed, therefore, of the testimony of our Lord, nor of me His prisoner;" 2 Timothy 1:8 for he had said before: "For God has not given us the spirit of fear, but of power, and of love, and of a sound mind." 2 Timothy 1:7 For we suffer with power from love toward God, and with a sound mind, when we suffer for our blamelessness. But further, if He anywhere enjoins endurance, for what more than for sufferings is He providing it? If anywhere He tears men away from idolatry, what more than martyrdoms takes the lead, in tearing them away to its injury?

Blessed is the man whom Thou chooseth, and bringest near (Ps. 65:5); the third, Happy are they that dwell in Thy House (Ps. 84:5); the fourth, Lord, who shall dwell in Thy Tabernacle? (Ps. 15:1); the fifth, Who shall dwell upon Thy holy mountain? (Ps. 15:1); the sixth, Who shall ascend into the mountain of the Lord? (Ps. 24:3); the seventh, and who shall stand in His holy place? (Ps. 24:3)3

R. Simeon ben Yobai said: In the future the faces of the righteous will resemble seven joyous things: the sun, the moon, the firmament, the stars, lightning, lilies, and the lampstand of the Temple. Whence the sun? From the verse, But they that love Him be as the sun when he goeth forth in his might (Judg. 5:31). Whence the moon? From the verse, Fair as the moon (Song 6: to). The firmament? And they that are wise shall shine as the brightness of the firmament (Dan. 12:3). The stars? And they that turn the many to righteousness as the stars (Dan. 12:3). Lightning? They run to and fro like the lightnings (Nah. 2:5). Lilies (sosannim)? For the

Piska 47

That your days may be multiplied—in this world—and the days of your children . . .—in the days of the Messiah—as the days of the heavens above the earth—in the world to come—(upon the land) which the Lord swore unto your fathers to give them (11:21)—Scripture does not say here "to give you" but rather to give them; hence we find that we can deduce (the doctrine of) the resurrection of the dead from the Torah.'

As the days of the heavens above the earth: The faces of the righteous will (shine as bright) as the day, as it is said, But they that love Him (shall) be as the sun when he goeth forth in his might (Judg. 5:31). R. Simeon ben Yohai says: 'In the future, when the righteous greet the Shekinah, their faces will resemble seven joyous things, to wit, But they that love Him (shall) be as the sun when he goeth forth in his might (Judg. 5:31), Fair as the moon (shall they be), clear as the sun (Song. 6:10), And they that are wise shall shine as the brightness of the firmament, and they that turn the many to righteousness as the stars for ever and ever (Dan. 12:3), They (shall) run to and fro like lightnings (Nah. 2:5), (They shall be as) the leader, upon lilies (Ps. 45:1), and His beauty shall be as the olive tree (Hos. 14:7). Scripture says also, A song of ascents (Ps. 121: 1)—(intended) for the one who in the future shall make ascents for his servants, the righteous. R. 'Akiba says: Scripture does not say "a song of an ascent," but a song of ascents—there are thirty ascents, one above the other; Rabbi (Judah the Prince) says that there are sixty ascents, one above the other. Since there are several ascents, one above the other, am I to think that enmity, hatred, jealousy, or rivalry prevail among them? (No,) for Scripture says, And they that turn the many to righteousness (shall shine) as the stars for ever and ever (Dan. 12:3).—just as there is no enmity, hatred, jealousy, or rivalry among the stars, so is there none among the righteous; just as the brightness of one star is not like that of another, so is this true of the righteous. Another interpretation: They that turn the many to righteousness—this refers to alms collectors.<sup>6</sup> R. Simeon ben Menasya says: This refers to the elders, as it is said, But they that love Him (shall) be as the sun when he goeth forth in his might (Judg. 5:31). Who is greater, those who love or those who cause others to love? Certainly those who cause others to love. Hence, if it is said of those who love But they that love Him (shall) be as the sun when he goeth forth in his might, how much more is this true of those who cause others to love. And they that turn the many to righteousness (shall shine) as the stars for ever: Just as the stars are exalted and placed above all the creatures of the world, so are the righteous; just as the stars rule and govern from one end of the world to the other, so do the righteous; just as the stars are sometimes hidden and sometimes visible, just as the stars are grouped in so many clusters that they cannot be counted, so are the righteous. Or does this mean, regardless of whether they do God's will or not? (No,) for Scripture says, And thy seed shall be as the dust of the earth (Gen. 28:14)—if they do God's will, they will be like the stars; if not, they will be like the dust of the earth, for Scripture says, For the king of Aram destroyed them and made them like the dust in threshing (2 Kings 13:7).

Another interpretation: As the days of the heavens above the earth: They will live and endure for all eternity, as it is said, For as the new heavens and the new earth, (which I will make, shall remain before Me, saith the Lord, so shall your seed and your name remain) (Isa. 66:22). And is this not a matter of reasoning from the minor to the major? If the heavens and the earth, which were created only for the glory of Israel, shall live and endure for all eternity, how much more so will this be true with the righteous, for whose sake the whole world Was created. R. Simeon ben Yohai says: Scripture says, For as the days of a tree shall be the days of My people (Isa. 65:22)—tree means Torah, as it is said, She (wisdom) is a tree of life to them that lay hold upon her (Prov. 3:18). Is this not a matter of reasoning from the minor to the major? If the Torah, which was created only for the glory of Israel, shall endure for all eternity, how much more so shall the righteous, for whose sake the whole world was created. R. Joshua ben Korhah says: Scripture says, One generation passeth away, and another generation cometh, and the earth abideth for ever (Eccl. i:4)—it should have said here, "the earth passeth away, and the earth cometh, and the generation abideth for ever," but since Israel changed their deeds, God changed the order of the world.

One Scriptural verse begins by saying, Yet the number of the children of Israel shall be, and then goes on to say, as the sand of the sea, which cannot be measured nor numbered (Hos. 2: r)—when Israel does God's will, they are as the sand of the sea, which cannot be measured nor numbered; when they do not, yet the number of the children of Israel shall be. Similarly, one verse says, (One thousand shall flee at the rebuke of one, at the rebuke of five shall ye flee,) till ye be left as a beacon upon the top of a mountain (Isa. 30:17), while another verse says, For thus saith the Lord God: The city that went forth a thousand shall have a hundred left (Amos 5:3). Another interpretation: Yet the number of the children of Israel shall be—as numbered by heaven—as the sand of the sea—as numbered by man."

The Second Coming of Christ and Resurrection of the Dead (which Christ revealed unto Peter) who died because of their sins, for that they kept not the commandment of God their creator.

And he (Peter) pondered thereon, that he might perceive the mystery of the Son of God, the merciful and lover of mercy.

And when the Lord was seated upon the Mount of Olives, his disciples came unto him.

And we besought and entreated him severally and prayed him, saying unto him: Declare unto us what are the signs of thy coming and of the end of the world, that we may perceive and mark the time of thy coming and instruct them that come after us, unto whom we preach the word of thy gospel, and whom we set over (in) thy church, that they when they hear it may take heed to themselves and mark the time of thy coming.

And our Lord answered us, saying: Take heed that no man deceive you, and that ye be not doubters and serve other gods. Many shall come in my name, saying: I am the Christ. Believe them not, neither draw near unto them. For the coming of the Son of God shall not be plain (i.e. foreseen); but as the lightning that shineth from the east unto the west, so will I come upon the clouds of heaven with a great host in my majesty; with my cross going before my face will I come in my majesty, shining sevenfold more than the sun will I come in my majesty with all my saints, mine angels (mine holy angels). And my Father shall set a crown upon mine head, that I may judge the quick and the dead and recompense every man according to his works.

And ye, take ye the likeness thereof (learn a parable) from the fig-tree: so soon as the shoot thereof is come forth and the twigs grown, the end of the world shall come.

And I, Peter, answered and said unto him: Interpret unto me concerning the fig-tree, whereby we shall perceive it; for throughout all its days doth the fig-tree send forth shoots, and every year it bringeth forth its fruit for its master. What then meaneth the parable of the fig-tree? We know it not.

And the Master (Lord) answered and said unto me: Understandest thou not that the fig-tree is the house of Israel? Even as a man that planted a fig-tree in his garden, and it brought forth no fruit. And he sought the fruit thereof many years and when he found it not, he said to the keeper of his garden: Root up this fig-tree that it make not our ground to be unfruitful. And the gardener said unto God: (Suffer us) to rid it of weeds and dig the ground round about it and water it. If then it bear not fruit, we will straightway remove its roots out of the garden and plant another in place of it. Hast thou not understood that the fig-tree is the house of Israel? Verily I say unto thee, when the twigs thereof have sprouted forth in the last days, then shall feigned Christs come and awake expectation saying: I am the Christ, that am now come into the world. And when they (Israel) shall perceive the wickedness of their deeds they shall turn away after them and deny him whom our fathers did praise, even the first Christ whom they crucified and therein sinned a great sin. But this deceiver is not the Christ. And when they reject him he shall slay with the sword, and there shall be many martyrs. Then shall the twigs of the fig-tree, that is, the house of Israel, shoot forth: many shall become martyrs at his hand. Enoch and Elias shall be sent to teach them that this is the deceiver which must come into the world and do signs and wonders to deceive. And therefore shall they that die by his hand be martyrs, and shall be reckoned among the good and righteous martyrs who have pleased God in their life.

And he showed me in his right hand the souls of all men, And on the palm of his right hand the image of that which shall be accomplished at the last day: and how the righteous and the sinners shall be separated, and how they do that are upright in heart, and how the evil-doers shall be rooted out unto all eternity. We beheld how the sinners wept (weep) in great affliction and sorrow, until all that saw it with their eyes wept, whether righteous or angels, and he himself also.

And I asked him and said unto him: Lord, suffer me to speak thy word concerning the sinners: It were better for them if they had not been created. And the Saviour answered and said unto me: Peter, wherefore speakest thou thus, that not to have been created were better for them? Thou resistest God. Thou wouldest not have more compassion than he for his image: for he hath created them and brought them forth out of not being. Now because thou hast seen the lamentation which shall come upon the sinners in the last days, therefore is thine heart troubled; but I will show thee their works, whereby they have sinned against the Most High.

Behold now what shall come upon them in the last days, when the day of God and the day of the decision of the judgement of God cometh. From the east unto the west shall all the children of men be gathered together before my Father that liveth for ever. And he shall command hell to open its bars of adamant and give up all that is therein.

And the wild beasts and the fowls shall he command to restore all the flesh that they have devoured, because he willeth that men should appear; for nothing perisheth before God, and nothing is impossible with him, because all things are his.

For all things come to pass on the day of decision, on the day of judgement, at the word of God: and as all things were done when he created the world and commanded all that is therein and it was done -even so shall it be in the last days; for all things are possible with God. And therefore saith he in the scripture: [Ezek. xxxvii.] Son of man, prophesy upon the several bones and say unto the bones: bone unto bone in joints, sinew. nerves, flesh and skin and hair thereon and soul and spirit.

And soul and spirit shall the great Uriel give them at the commandment of God; for him hath God set over the rising again of the dead at the day of judgement.

Behold and consider the corns of wheat that are sown in the earth. As things dry and without soul do men sow them in the earth: and they live again and bear fruit, and the earth restoreth them as a pledge entrusted unto it.

And this that dieth, that is sown as seed in the earth, and shall become alive and be restored unto life, is man.

How much more shall God raise up on the day of decision them that believe in him and are chosen of him, for whose sake he made the world? And all things shall the earth restore on the day of decision, for it also shall be judged with them, and the heaven with it.

And this shall come at the day of judgement upon them that have fallen away from faith in God and that have committed sin: Floods (cataracts) of fire shall be let loose; and darkness and obscurity shall come up and clothe and veil the whole world and the waters shall be changed and turned into coals of fire and all that is in them shall burn, and the sea shall become fire. Under the heaven shall be a sharp fire that cannot be quenched and floweth to fulfil the judgement of wrath.

And the stars shall fly in pieces by flames of fire, as if they had not been created and the powers (firmaments) of the heaven shall pass away for lack of water and shall be as though they had not been. And the lightnings of heaven shall be no more, and by their enchantment they shall affright the world. The spirits also of the dead bodies shall be like unto them (the lightnings?) and shall become fire at the commandment of God.

And so soon as the whole creation dissolveth, the men that are in the east shall flee unto the west, unto the east; they that are in the south shall flee to the north, and they that are in the south. And in all places shall the wrath of a fearful fire overtake them and an unquenchable flame driving them shall bring them unto the judgement of wrath, unto the stream of unquenchable fire that floweth, flaming with fire, and when the waves thereof part themselves one from another, burning, there shall be a great gnashing of teeth among the children of men.

Then shall they all behold me coming upon an eternal cloud of brightness: and the angels of God that are with me shall sit (prob. And I shall sit) upon the throne of my glory at the right hand of my Heavenly Father; and he shall set a crown upon mine head. And when the nations behold it, they shall weep, every nation apart.

Then shall he command them to enter into the river of fire while the works of every one of them shall stand before them (something is wanting) to every man according to his deeds. As for the elect that have done good, they shall come unto me and not see death by the devouring fire. But the unrighteous the sinners, and the hypocrites shall stand in the depths of darkness that shall not pass away, and their chastisement is the fire, and angels bring forward their sins and prepare for them a place wherein they shall be punished for ever, every one according to his transgression.

Uriel the angel of God shall bring forth the souls of those sinners (every one according to his transgression, who perished in the flood, and of all that dwelt in all idols, in every molten image, in every object of love, and in pictures, and of those that dwelt on all hills and in stones and by the wayside, whom men called gods: they shall burn them with them (the objects in which they dwelt, or their worshippers) in everlasting fire; and after that all of them with their dwelling places are destroyed, they shall be punished eternally.

(Here begins the description of torments which we have, in another text, in the Akhmim fragment.)

Then shall men and women come unto the place prepared for them. By their tongues wherewith they have blasphemed the way of righteousness shall they be hanged up. There is spread under them unquenchable fire, that they escape it not.

Behold, another place: therein is a pit, great and full. In it are they that have denied righteousness: and angels of punishment chastise them and there do they kindle upon them the fire of their torment.

And again behold two women: they hang them up by their neck and by their hair; they shall cast them into the pit. These are they which plaited their hair, not for good (or, not to make them beautiful) but to turn them to fornication, that they might ensnare the souls of men unto perdition. And the men that lay with them in fornication shall be hung by their loins in that place of fire; and they shall say one to another: We knew not that we should come unto everlasting punishment.

And the murderers and them that have made common cause with them shall they cast into the fire, in a place full of venomous beasts, and they shall be tormented without rest, feeling their pains; and their worms shall be as many in number as a dark cloud. And the angel Ezrael shall bring forth the souls of them that have been slain, and they shall behold the torment of them that slew them, and say one to another: Righteousness and justice is the judgement of God. For we heard, but we believed not, that we should come into this place of eternal judgement.

And near by this flame shall be a pit, great and very deep, and into it floweth from above all manner of torment, foulness, and issue. And women are swallowed up therein up to their necks and tormented with great pain. These are they that have caused their children to be born untimely, and have corrupted the work of God that created them.

Over against them shall be another place where sit their children both alive, and they cry unto God. And flashes (lightnings) go forth from those children and pierce the eyes of them that for fornication's sake have caused their destruction.

Other men and women shall stand above them, naked; and their children stand over against them in a place of delight, and sigh and cry unto God because of their parents, saying: These are they that have despised and cursed and transgressed thy commandments and delivered us unto death: they have cursed the angel that formed us, and have hanged us up, and withheld from us (or, begrudged us) the light which thou hast given unto all creatures.

And the milk of their mothers flowing from their breasts shall congeal, and from it shall come beasts devouring flesh, which shall come forth and turn and torment them for ever with their husbands, because they forsook the commandments of God and slew their children. As for their children, they shall be delivered unto the angel Temlakos (a care-taking angel). And they that slew them shall be tormented eternally, for God willeth it so.

Ezrael the angel of wrath shall bring men and women, the half of their bodies burning, and cast them into a place of darkness, even the hell of men; and a spirit of wrath shall chastise them with all manner of torment, and a worm that sleepeth not shall devour their entrails: and these are the persecutors and betrayers of my righteous ones.

And beside them that are there, shall be other men and women, gnawing their tongues; and they shall torment them with red-hot iron and burn their eyes. These are they that slander and doubt of my righteousness. Other men and women whose works were done in deceitfulness shall have their lips cut off, and fire entereth into their mouth and their entrails. These are the false witnesses (al. these are they that caused the martyrs to die by their lying).

And beside them, in a place near at hand, upon the stone shall be a pillar of fire, and the pillar is sharper than swords. And there shall be men and women clad in rags and filthy garments, and they shall be cast thereon, to suffer the judgement of a torment that ceaseth not: these are they that trusted in their riches and despised the widows and the woman with fatherless children . . . before God.

And into another place hard by, full of filth, do they cast men and women up to the knees. These are they that lent money and took usury.

And other men and women cast themselves down from an high place and return again and run, and devils drive them. These are the worshippers of idols, and they put them to the end of their wist (drive them up to the top of the height) and they cast themselves down. And thus do they continually, and are tormented for ever. These are they which have cut their flesh as apostles of a man: and the women that were with them . . . and these are the men that defiled themselves together as women.

And beside them shall be a brazier? . . . and beneath them shall the angel Ezrael prepare a place of much fire: and all the idols of gold and silver, all idols, the work of men's hands, and the semblances of images of cats and lions, of creeping things and wild beasts, and the men and women that have prepared the images thereof, shall beat each other in chains of fire and shall be chastised because of their error before the idols, and this is their judgement for ever.

And beside them shall be other men and women, burning in the fire of the judgement, and their torment is everlasting. These are they that have forsaken the commandment of God and followed the persuasions of devils.

(Parts of these two sections are in the Bodleian Fragment. At this point the Akhmim fragment ends. The Ethiopic continues:)

And there shall be another place, very high; there shall be a furnace and a brazier wherein shall burn fire. The fire that shall burn shall come from one end of the brazier. The men and women whose feet slip, shall go rolling down into a place where is fear. And again while the fire that is prepared floweth, they mount up and fall down again and continue to roll down. Thus shall they be tormented for ever. These are they that honoured not their father and mother and of their own accord withdrew themselves from them. Therefore shall they be chastised eternally.

Furthermore the angel Ezrael shall bring children and maidens to show them those that are tormented. They shall be chastised with pains, with hanging up and with a multitude of wounds which flesh-devouring birds shall inflict upon them. These are they that boast themselves (trust) in their sins, and obey not their parents and follow not the instruction of their fathers, and honour not them that are more aged than they.

Beside them shall be girls clad in darkness for a garment and they shall be sore chastised and their flesh shall be torn in pieces. These are they that kept not their virginity until they were given in marriage, and with these torments shall they be punished, and shall feel them.

And again, other men and women, gnawing their tongues without ceasing, and being tormented with everlasting fire. These are the servants (slaves) which were not obedient unto their masters; and this then is their judgement for ever.

And hard by this place of torment shall be men and women dumb and blind, whose raiment is white. They shall crowd one upon another, and fall upon coals of unquenchable fire. These are they that give alms and say: We are righteous before God: whereas they have not sought after righteousness.

Ezrael the angel of God shall bring them forth out of this fire and establish a judgement of decision. This then is their judgement. A river of fire shall flow and all judgement (they that are judged) shall be drawn down into the middle of the river. And Uriel shall set them there.

And there are wheels of fire and men and women hung thereon by the strength of the whirling thereof. And they that are in the pit shall burn: now these are the sorcerers and sorceresses. Those wheels shall be in all decision, judgement, and punishment by fire without number.

Thereafter shall the angels bring mine elect and righteous which are perfect in all uprightness, and bear them in their hands, and clothe them with the raiment of the life that is above. They shall see their desire on them that hated them, when he punisheth them, and the torment of every one shall be for ever according to his works.

And all they that are in torment shall say with one voice: have mercy upon us, for now know we the judgement of God, which he declared unto us aforetime, and we believed not. And the angel Tartaruchus, keeper of hell, shall come and chastise them with yet greater torment, and say unto them: Now do ye repent, when it is no longer the time for repentance, and nought of life remaineth. And they shall say: Righteous is the judgement of God, for we have heard and perceived that his judgement is good; for we are recompensed according to our deeds.

Then will I give unto mine elect and righteous the washing (baptism) and the salvation for which they have besought me, in the field of Acherousia, a lake where the soul of Adam was washed, which is called Aneslasleja (Elysium). They shall adorn with flowers the portion of the righteous, and I shall go . . . I shall rejoice with them. I will cause the peoples to enter in to mine everlasting kingdom, and show them that eternal thing whereon I have made them to set their hope, even I and my Father which is in heaven.

I have spoken this unto thee, Peter, and declared it unto thee. Go forth therefore and go unto the land (or city) of the west; and enter into the vineyard which I shall tell thee of, in order that by the sickness (sufferings) of the Son who is without sin the deeds of corruption may be sanctified. As for thee, thou art chosen according to the promise which I have given thee. Spread thou therefore my gospel throughout all the world in peace. Verily men shall rejoice: my words shall be the source of hope and of life, and suddenly shall the world be ravished.

And my Lord Jesus Christ our King said unto me: Let us go unto the holy mountain. And his disciples went with him, praying. And behold there were two men there, and we could not look upon their faces, for a light came from them, shining more than the sun, and their raiment also was shining, and cannot be described, and nothing is sufficient to be compared unto them in this world. And the sweetness of them . . . that no mouth is able to utter the beauty of their appearance (or, the mouth hath not sweetness to express), for their aspect was astonishing and wonderful. And the other, great, I say, shineth in their aspect above crystal. Like the flower of roses is the appearance of the colour of his aspect and of his body . . . and their head was a marvel, And upon their shoulders and on their foreheads was a crown of nard woven of fair flowers. As the rainbow in the water, in the time of rain, so was their hair. And such was the comeliness of their countenance, adorned with all manner of ornament. And when we saw them on a sudden, we marvelled. And I drew near unto the Lord (God) Jesus Christ and said unto him: O my Lord, who are these? And he said unto me: They are Moses and Elias. And I said unto him: Abraham and Isaac and Jacob and the rest of the righteous fathers? And he showed us a great garden, open, full of fair trees and blessed fruits, and of the odour of perfumes. The fragrance thereof was pleasant and came even unto us. And of that tree saw I much fruit. And my Lord and God Jesus Christ said unto me: Hast thou seen the companies of the fathers?

As is their rest, such also is the honour and the glory of them that are persecuted for my righteousness' sake. And I rejoiced and believed and believed and understood that which is written in the book of my Lord Jesus Christ. And I said unto him: O my Lord, wilt thou that I make here three tabernacles, one for thee, and one for Moses, and one for Elias? And he said unto me in wrath: Satan maketh war against thee, and hath veiled thine understanding; and the good things of this world prevail against thee. Thine eyes therefore must be opened and thine ears unstopped that a tabernacle, not made with men's hands, which my heavenly Father hath made for me and for the elect. And we beheld it and were full of gladness.

And behold, suddenly there came a voice from heaven, saying: This is my beloved Son in whom I am well pleased: my commandments. And then came a great and exceeding white cloud over our heads and bare away our Lord and Moses and Elias. And I trembled and was afraid: and we looked up and the heaven opened and we beheld men in the flesh, and they came and greeted our Lord and Moses and Elias and went into another heaven. And the word of the scripture was fulfilled: This is the generation that seeketh him and seeketh the face of the God of Jacob. And great fear and commotion was there in heaven and the angels pressed one upon another that the word of the scripture might be fulfilled which saith: Open the gates, ye princes.

Thereafter was the heaven shut, that had been open.

And we prayed and went down from the mountain, glorifying God, which hath written the names of the righteous in heaven in the book of life.

There is a great deal more of the Ethiopic text, but it is very evidently of later date; the next words are:

Peter opened his mouth and said to me: Hearken, my son Clement, God created all things for his glory,' and this proposition is dwelt upon. The glory of those who duly praise God is described in terms borrowed from the Apocalypse: 'The Son at his coming will raise the dead . . . and will make my righteous ones shine seven times more than the sun, and will make their crowns shine like crystal and like the rainbow in the time of rain (crowns) which are perfumed with nard and cannot be contemplated (adorned) with rubies, with the colour of emeralds shining brightly, with topazes, gems, and yellow pearls that shine like the stars of heaven, and like the rays of the sun, sparkling which cannot be gazed upon.' Again, of the angels: ' Their faces shine more than the sun; their crowns are as the rainbow in the time of rain. (They are perfumed) with nard. Their eyes shine like the morning star. The beauty of their appearance cannot be expressed.... Their raiment is not woven, but white as that of the fuller, according as I saw on the mountain where Moses and Elias were. Our Lord showed at the transfiguration the apparel of the last days, of the day of resurrection, unto Peter, James and John the sons of Zebedee, and a bright cloud overshadowed us, and we heard the voice of the Father saying unto us: This is my Son whom I love and in whom I am well pleased: hear him. And being afraid we forgot all the things of this life and of the flesh, and knew not what we said because of the greatness of the wonder of that day, and of the mountain whereon he showed us the second coming in the kingdom that passeth not away.

The Father hath committed all judgement unto the Son. [The destiny of sinners -their eternal doom- is more than Peter can endure: he appeals to Christ to have pity on them.]

And my Lord answered me and said to me: Hast thou understood that which I said unto thee before? It is permitted unto thee to know that concerning which thou askest: but thou must not tell that which thou hearest unto the sinners lest they transgress the more, and sin. [Peter weeps many hours, and is at last consoled by an answer which, though exceedingly diffuse and vague does seem to promise ultimate pardon for all]: My Father will give unto them all the life, the glory, and the kingdom that passeth not away . . . It is because of them that have believed in me that I am come. It is also because of them that have believed in me, that, at their word, I shall have pity on men.

Hebrew Visions of Hell and Paradise. By M. Gaster, Ph.D.

THE recent recovery of the Revelation of St. Peter has again attracted attention to this branch of apocalyptic literature. Speculation has been rife as to the sources of that Revelation.

I intend publishing now, for the first time in English garb, the oldest extant Revelations which must have served as source to that of Peter, then to that of Paul, Ezra, Abraham, Isaiah, Virgin Mary, St. Macarius, and the host of others down to Dante and St. Patrick.

It is not here the place to enter into a more minute disquisition of the history of these visions. We find parallels in the old Ægyptian literature, in the Assyrian we have the well-known "Descensus ad inferos" of Izdubar (Nimrud). The Buddhist literature knows the Suh.rllekha, the letter of Nâgârjuna to King Udayana. In the Avesta literature we have the Nameh of Arda-viraf; in the Mahommedan we have the vision of Mahommed. All these Christian Revelations and of the others, at any rate the last two, are based directly upon those Hebrew visions, a fact which has hitherto not been noticed.

I reserve for a book, which I am writing, the fuller discussion of these points, and the study of the internal connection between these apocalyptic visions.

It would be bold to speculate on the relative age of each of the visions which I publish here. They all go back to the pre-Christian age, as is shown by the existence of those Christian visions almost verbally identical with the Hebrew. On the other hand one cannot doubt that they underwent some changes in the course of the ages. The substance remained intact, but many passages were interpolated or omitted. The different texts complement thus each other to assist us to arrive at a probable common source. The tendency of all these popular writings is to grow in the course of time, to attract and to assimilate various elements. We can see this process very clearly in the Revelation of Moses, which has been hitherto almost unknown. It has nothing in common with those known under that title. We have two recensions of it. A shorter one, and a longer which is more amplified and contains interpolations taken from the Zohar and the Talmud. Whether the biblical passages belonged originally to these visions is still a matter of doubt. They may have been tacked on to the narrative as a kind of scriptural proof, or they may stand as the beginning of a series of details and pictures which have been evolved out of them, by a rather fantastical exegesis, but by no means uncommon in the Oriental literature.

To each text I have added a full bibliography, and parallels from most of the extant apocryphal revelations. I have striven to be as literal as possible. The attempt to obliterate the Oriental touch by a polished translation, robs the text of its originality and local colour, which ought to be preserved.

I. The Revelation Of Moses (A)

Heaven, Hell, and Paradise.

(Gedulath Mosheh, Amsterdam, 1854, v. Jellinek, Beth-hamidrash, II. pp. x., xiv. ff., and xix-xx.)

1. As the apple tree among the trees of the wood, so is my beloved among the sons (Song of Songs, ii. 3). This applies to Moses, upon whom be peace.

2. In that hour when God said unto him: "Go and bring out the children of Israel from Egypt, for I have heard their groaning, and I remembered the covenant, and the oath I swore to Abraham my servant." Moses said: "O Lord of the Universe, who am I that I should go unto Pharaoh, and that I should bring forth the children of Israel out of Egypt?" (Ex. iii. 11). God said: "Thou hast humbled thyself in saying 'Who am I that I should go to Pharaoh?' but I will honour thee [as it is said: 'He that is of lowly spirit shall obtain honour' (Prov. xxix. 23)], and I will give the whole of Egypt into thy hands, and I will bring thee up even near to my throne of glory; and I will shew thee the angels of the Heaven." Thereupon God commanded Metatron, the angel of his presence (of the face), and said unto him: "Go and bring Moses with harps, and pipes, and drums, and dances, with joy, and songs, and praises."

3. And Metatron answered and said: "O Lord of the Universe, Moses is not able to come up and see the angels, for there are angels who are of fire and he is only of flesh and blood."

4. God said: "Go and change his flesh (body) into fire." And Metatron went to Moses.

5. When Moses beheld Metatron he trembled with fear, and said to him: "Who art thou?"

6. And he answered: "I am Enoch the son of Jared, thy father's father. The Almighty hath sent me to bring thee up to his throne of glory." [Ascensio Isaiae, ed. Dillmann, Leipzig, 1877. ix. 9; Apoc. Virg. Mary]

7. Moses said: "I am only flesh and blood, and cannot look upon the angels." And Metatron changed Moses' tongue into a tongue of fire, and his eyes he made like the wheels of the heavenly chariot, and his power like unto that of the angels, and his tongue like a flame, and brought him up to heaven. 15,000 angels were on the right hand, and 15,000 on the left, Metatron and Moses in the middle. In this way was Moses carried up to heaven. [Testament of Abraham, ch. 9 and 10, Rec. A. ed. M. R. James, Cambridge, 1892]

8. The first heaven to which Moses ascended corresponds to the first day of the week; there he saw the waters standing in lines. This heaven was full of windows, and at each window stood an angel. And Moses asked Metatron: "What are these windows?" and Metatron answered: "These windows are the window of prayer, the window of request, the window of supplication, the window of crying (tears), the window of joy, the window of satiation, the window of famine, the window of poverty, the window of riches, the window of war, the window of peace, the window of pregnancy, the window of birth, the window of the treasures of rain, the window of dew, the window of sin, the window of repentance, the window of smallness, the window of greatness, the window of death, the window of life, the window of disease among men, the window of disease among animals, the window of healing, the window of sickness, the window of health." And Moses saw great things past finding out, "yea marvellous things without number" (Job ix. 10). [Enoch, ch. 60, v. 12 ff. translated by Charles, ff., B. of Jubilees, ch. 1, v. Roensch, d. Buch d. Jubilaen, p. 259; cf. Sefer Raziel, Amsterdam, 1701; f. 34b ff]

9. Moses ascended then the second heaven, which corresponds to the second day of the week. There he saw an angel whose name is X. [In this recension the names of the angels are omitted. They are to be found, however, in the shorter] His length is 300 parasangs and 50 myriads of angels stand before him; they are of fire and water, and their faces are directed towards the Shekina above; and all sing hymns, saying: "Great is the Lord and highly to be praised" (cxlv. 3).

10. And Moses asked Metatron and said: "Who are those?" He answered: "These are the angels who are placed over the clouds, the wind, and the rain; they go and fulfil the will of their Creator and return to their places and praise the Almighty." And Moses asked: "Why have they their faces turned towards the Shekina?" And Metatron answered: "From that day when God created them until to-day they have not been moved from their position." [Enoch, l.c.; Jubilees, l.c.]

11. Moses went up to the third heaven, which corresponds to the third day of the week. There he saw an angel whose name is X. His length is a journey of 500 years. He has 70,000 heads, in each head 70,000 mouths, in each mouth 70,000 tongues, and in each tongue 70,000 dictions; before him stand 70,000 myriads of angels, all of white fire; they all praise and sing to God and say: "Thine, O Lord, is the greatness and power," etc. (1 Chr. xxix. 11).

12. Moses asked Metatron: "Who are these? and what is their name?" And he answered: "Their name is Erelim; they are placed over the grass (herbs), and over the trees, and over the fruits, and over the corn; and they all go and fulfil the will of their Creator and return to their places."

13. Moses went up to the fourth heaven. There he saw the temple built; the columns of red fire, the sides of green fire, the thresholds of white fire, the hooks and the planks of blazing fire; the portals of carbuncle and the halls of sparkling gems. And he saw angels going therein praising (and saying) [as King David, upon whom may peace rest, said: "Bless the Lord, ye angels of His, ye mighty in strength, that fulfil his word" (Ps. ciii. 20)]. [Testament Levi, ch. 5]

14. Moses asked Metatron and said: "Who are these angels?" And Metatron answered: "These are the angels, who are placed over the earth, and over the sun, and over the moon, and over the stars, and over the planets, and over the spheres, and ever sing they hymns unto Him." And he saw two big stars, each of them as big as the whole earth; the name of one was Nogah, and the name of the other Maadim, one standing above the sun, and the other above the moon. Moses asked Metatron: "Why do these stand above those others?" And he said: "The one stands above the sun in summer in order to cool the world from the heat of the sun, and that is the star Nogah; whilst the other stands near the moon in order to warm the world from the cold of the moon (and this is the star Maadim)." [Cf. Pirke de R. Eliezer, ch. 6]

15. Moses went to the fifth heaven and he saw there troops of angels half of fire and half of snow, and the snow is above the fire without extinguishing it, for God makes peace between them [as it is said: "He maketh peace in his high places," Job xxv. 2], and all praise the Almighty.

16. And Moses asked Metatron: "What are these doing?" He said: "Since the day when God created them are they so." Moses asked: "What is their name?" and he answered: "These are the Erelim who are called Ishim [as it is said: 'Unto you, O Ishim (men), I call,' Prov. viii. 4; i.e.: I call you Ishim!]."

17. Moses went up to the sixth heaven, there he saw an angel whose length was 500 years' journey; his name was X., and he was wholly of hail (ice), and by him stood thousands and myriads of angels, without number, and all sung praises to the One who said and the world was created [as it is said: the heaven proclaim the glory of God (Ps. xix. 2)]. [Ch. 8-17, cf. Othioth de R. Akiba (Jellinek, Bet-hamm. III. 20-21)]

18. Moses asked Metatron: "Who are these?" and he answered: "These are the Irin Kadishin, the holy watchers," (Daniel iv. 10-14).

19. Moses went up to the seventh heaven, and he saw an angel wholly of fire; and two angels, whose names were X. These were fastened with two chains of red and dark fire; and each of them had the length of 500 parasangs.

20. Moses asked Metatron: "Who are these?" And he answered: "These are wrath and anger, and God created them during the six days of creation, that they should fulfil his will." [Cf. Rev. of Paul, ch. 11 (Tischendorf, Apoc. Apocryphae, Leipzig, 1866, pp. 34-69)]

21. Moses replied: "I am afraid of these angels, and I cannot look on them." Thereupon Metatron embraced Moses, placed him in his bosom and said: "O Moses, beloved of God, be not frightened nor dread thou aught." And Moses was immediately calmed.

22. After this Moses saw another angel, whose countenance was totally different from those of the other angels, for he was ugly and his height of 540 years' journey, and he was girded forty times around his waist. From the sole of the foot unto the head he was full of fiery eyes, and whosoever looked at him, fell down in dread.

23. And Moses asked Metatron: "Who is this?" He answered: "This is the angel of death, who takes the souls of men." [Cf. Test. of Abraham, ch. 17] And he asked him: "Where is he now going?" And Metatron answered: "He goes to take the soul of Job the pious."

24. And Moses said before God: "May it be thy will, O Lord, my God and God of my fathers, that thou shouldst not deliver me into the hands of this angel!"

25. Then saw he angels standing before God; each of them having six wings. With twain wings they covered their faces, so that they might not look upon the Shekina. With the other twain wings they cover their feet, for they have the feet of a calf, and with the other twain wings they fly and praise God. The length of each wing is 500 years' journey, and the width from one end of the world to the other. And Moses asked: "Who are these?" and Metatron answered: "These are the holy Creatures." [Cf. P. d. R. Eliezer ch. 4]

26. Our sages tell [Talmud B., Tractate Pesachim, f. 94a-b; Yalkut, II. f. 44c, § 286; cf. Tract. Hagiga, f. 12b] that at the time when Nebuchadnezzar the impious said: "I will ascend above the heights of the clouds; I will be like the Most High" (Isaiah xv. 14 {sic. Isaiah xiv. 14}), the Holy Spirit came forth and said: "O impious man! How many are the days of the years of thy life? Threescore and ten, or even by reason of strength, fourscore years" (Ps. xc. 10), and the distance from earth to heaven alone is 500 years, the thickness of the heaven again 500 years, and from the heaven Rakia to the heaven Shehakim 500 years, and its thickness 500 years, and from Shehakim to Zebul again 500 years, and its thickness 500 years, and from Zebul to Meon 500 years, and its thickness 500 years, and from Meon to Araboth 500 years, and its thickness 500 years, and the feet of the holy Creatures are equal to the whole; and their ankles are equal to the whole; and the wings of the creatures are like the whole, and their necks are like the whole, and their heads like the whole, and their horns like unto the whole, and upon them is the throne of glory which is equal to the whole. [It is like the terrible ice, Ezek. i. 22.] And there sits the King of Kings, the Holy, blessed be He exalted and high, and thou sayest: "I will ascend above the heights of the clouds, I will be like the Most High! Woe unto thee, O impious man and woe unto thy soul, for thou shalt be brought down to the uttermost parts of the pit (cf. Isaiah xiv. 15) to the seven regions of hell to be punished for ever and ever."

27. And after that Moses saw an angel in the heaven called Araboth, i.e. the seventh heaven, and this angel was teaching the souls which were created by God at the time of the Creation and have been placed in paradise. The name of the angel was X. He teaches them in seventy languages in the college on high, and they answer: "Thus is the law of Moses given by tradition from Mount Sinai [as it is said Dina was set and the books were opened (Daniel vii. 10), and Dina is none other than this angel, who is the guardian angel of the Law and of wisdom." He has also another name, they call him Jefefiyah, for the name of the guardian angel of the Law is Iofiel]. [About seven heavens v. Ascensio Isaiae and Test. Levi, ch. 3]

28. (From the Zohar) R. Simeon, son of Johai, said: "At that time when Moses went up to heaven an angel sat before him and taught him 370 mysteries of the Law, Moses then said to God, 'I will not depart from here unless Thou wilt give me good gifts.'" God answered: "Moses, my servant, faithful in my house, I will give thee my Law wherein are good gifts, as it is written: 'For I gave thee a good gift' (Prov. iv. 2). Therein are also the commandments, positive and negative, and not only this (I grant thee) but also that the Law shall be recorded in thy name, as it is written: 'Remember ye the Law of Moses, my servant' (Malachi iii. 22)."
Whence do we know that Moses did actually ascend seven heavens? We learn it from the verse, "And Moses ascended to God." (It is further written, "God went up amidst the sounds of trumpets") (Ps. xlvi. 6). Moses is therefore called Elohim like unto his Master, for it is said: "See I have made thee as Elohim unto Pharaoh," therefore it is written: "Like an apple-tree in the wood is my beloved among the sons." This is Moses, master of the Prophets and servant of God; he is like an apple in odour and taste.

29. At that time a Bath-Kol came forth from underneath the throne of glory and said: "Moses, my servant! Art thou afraid of them?" [It is written: "A wise man scaleth the city of the mighty and bringeth down the strength of the confidence thereof" (Prov. xxi. 22). Strength means the Law as it is said: "God will give strength to his people" (Ps. xxix. 11).]

30. God said then to Moses: "Moses, my servant! Thou camest up here and hast been worthy of the privilege of seeing all with thy (earthly) power; and I have made thee ascend seven heavens, and have shown thee my treasures and I have given thee my law. Now thou shalt be worthy of seeing the two parks I have created in this world, one for the righteous and one for the sinners, viz. Paradise and Hell."

31. At that hour God sent Gabriel and said unto him: "Go with my beloved servant Moses and show him Hell!"

32. And Moses said to him: "I cannot enter Hell, that blazing fire." He said to him: "Moses, there is a fire which burns more than all the seven Hells, and yet when thou wilt tread it with thy feet, it shall not burn thee."

33. At an hour when Moses entered Hell, the fire of Hell withdrew for 500 parasangs. The master of Hell said to him: "Who art thou?" He answered: "I am the son of Amram." The Lord of Hell answered: "Not here is thy place." And Moses said: "I came to see the powerful works of God, blessed be He." And God said to the Lord of Hell: "Go and show him how men are in Hell." [I draw attention here to two more apocalyptic visions which do not seem to have been noticed hitherto. (1) The apocalypse of the Virgin Mary (v. Tischendorf, Apoc. Apocryphae, p. xxvii.; Gaster, Literatura populara român<sup>o</sup>a, Bucharest, 1883, p. 362-366; B. P. Hasdeu, Cuvente d. B-atr-an<sup>i</sup>, II. Bucharest, 1879, p. 301-367) extant in Slavonic texts of the twelfth century. Greek, Roumanian, etc.; Æthiopic and Syriac? In this text the tortures of Hell are very fully described. (2) Questions of St. Macarius, of which I possess 6, Roumanian MSS.; A Syriac Fragment of the twelfth century I found in the British Museum, Add. 17,262 (Wright, II. p. 867-8, No. 837), and a Greek text of the fifteenth century I discovered in Cod. Baroccianus (Bodleian), No. 147. f. 294b sqq.]

34. Immediately he went with Moses, like a pupil before his master, and entered Hell together with him.

35. Moses saw there men tortured by the angels of destruction. Some of the sinners were hanged by their eyelids, some by their ears, some by their hands, and others by their tongues, and they cried bitterly. And he saw women hanging by their hair and by their breasts and in such like ways, all were hanging by chains of fire. [Cf. V. 7. 15-19. Peter, ch. 9 (H. 24); Robinson and James, The Gospel according to Peter, etc., London, 1892, p. 37 sqq.; cf. A. Harnack (H.) Bruchstücke d. Evgl. u. der Apocalypse d. Petrus, Leipzig, 1893, p. 16 sqq]

36. And Moses asked the Lord of Hell, and said "Why are these hanged by their eyes and by their tongues and are so fearfully tortured and so sorely punished?" And the master of Hell answered: "Because they looked with an evil eye at fair women, and at married women, and at the money of their friends and neighbours, and gave false witness against their neighbours." [Cf. V. 15, 17. Peter, ch. 7 (H. 22); Paul, ch. 37, 38]

37. Also saw he in Hell men hanging by their sexual organs and their hands were tied, and he asked: "Why do these hang?" The Lord answered: "Because they committed adultery, and stole, and killed, and murdered." [Cf. Peter. ch. 9, 10 (H. 24-26); Paul, 32; Virg. Mary]

38. He saw other men hanging by their ears and their tongues, and he asked: "Why are these hanging by their ears and tongues?" And he answered: "Because they neglected the study of the law, and talked slander and vain words and empty words. [V. 16] The women are hanging by their hair and breasts, because they used to uncover their breasts and their hair before the young men and desired them, and came thus to sin." [V. 17; Peter, ch. 9 (H. 22); cf. Paul, ch. 40]

39. Hell cried then with a bitter and loud voice, and said to the Master of Hell: "Give me the sinners, that I may destroy them." For Hell is always hungry and never satisfied, and crieth always for the sinners to devour them, but hath no power over the righteous. [Cf. Ev. Nicodemi, Greek form, ch. 20 ff.: "O all devouring and insatiable Hades"]

40. Moses went further and saw two sinners hanged by their feet with their heads downwards, and they cried by reason of the torture of Hell, and their bodies were covered with black worms, each worm 500 parasangs long. And these sinners cry and lament, saying: "Woe unto us, for the terrible punishment of Hell; would we could die." But they cannot die [as it is said: "They long for death but it cometh not" (Job iii. 21)]. [Peter, ch. 9, 13 (H. 24, 28)]

41. Moses asked the master of Hell: "What acts have these committed?" And he answered: "These are those who swore falsely, and profaned the Sabbath, and despised the learned, and persecuted the orphans; and gave bad names to their neighbours, and bare false witness. Therefore hath God delivered them to these worms to take vengeance on these sinners." And Moses asked: "What is the name of this place?" And he answered: "Aluka [as it is said; Aluka hath two daughters" (Prov. xxx. 15)]. [Cf. V. 16; Paul, ch. 39]

42. Moses went then to another place. There the sinners were lying on their faces; and he saw two thousand scorpions swarming over them and stinging them and torturing them, and the sinners cried bitterly. Each scorpion has 70,000 mouths, and each mouth 70,000 stings, and each sting has 70,000 vesicles filled with poison and venom, and with these are the sinners imbued and thus are they tortured; and their eyes are sunk in their sockets for fear and dread, and their cry: "Woe unto us, for our sins, and for the day of judgment." [V. 24; VII. 4; Peter, ch. 13 (R. 21)]

43. And Moses asked: "What have these committed?" And he answered: "These have wasted the money of others; they have taken bribery, and elevated themselves above others; they have put their neighbours publicly to shame; they have delivered up their brother Israelite to the gentile; [Peter, ch. 12 (H. 27)] they denied the oral Law and maintained that God did not create the world. Therefore God has handed them over to the scorpions to be avenged on them." [Paul, ch. 42; cf. Virg. Mary]

44. He saw there another place where the sinners stood up to their knees; the name of that place is Tit hayaven ("miry clay," Ps. xl. 3). Angels of destruction tie them up with chains of iron and lash them with fiery whips, and they take fiery stones and break with them the teeth of the sinners, from morning until evening, and during the night they prolong their teeth again to the length of a parasang in order to break them anew next morning; [as it is said: "Thou hast broken the teeth of the wicked" (Ps. iii. 8)]. And the sinners cry: "Woe unto us, woe unto us!" but nobody takes pity on them. [Cf. Talmud, Tr. Berachoth, f. 54b]

45. Moses asked the master of Hell: "What have these committed?" He answered: "They ate all kinds of forbidden fruit and gave them to Israelites to eat; they were usurers, and apostates and blasphemers; they wrote the ineffable name of God for Gentiles; [Probably on amulets] they had false weights; they stole money, and ate on the fast day of Kippur [for whosoever eats blood, or reptiles, or worms, and does not keep away from them is punished by being cut off], these are for ever punished in Hell, and therefore God hath delivered them to the angels of destruction to chastise them. [Cf. Paul, 36; Macarius, 40]

46. [He saw there further how they punish the wicked with fire and snow; and torture them terribly.] The Lord of Hell said then to Moses: "Come and see how the wicked are punished in Hell with fire." Moses answered: "I dread to go." But the Lord of Hell answered: "Go and dread naught," [as it is said: "Yea, though I walk through the valley of the shadow of death I will fear no evil" (Ps. xxiii. 4)].

47. And Moses stood up to go, and he saw the Shekina moving before him, so that he should not be in dread of the angels of destruction. Each of these is full of eyes, and hath fiery chains in his hands, and his length is 500 years' journey.

48. Moses went and saw how the wicked were punished by fire, being half in fire and half in snow, with worms crawling up and down their bodies and a fiery collar round their necks, and having no rest, [V. Bahya, comment. to Pentateuch, Venice, 1544, f. 181b] except on Sabbath days and Festival days. [Paul, ch. 44; cf. Pesikta rabbati, ed. Friedman, ch. 23, f. 112a] All (the other) days they are tortured in Hell. Of these speaks the verse: "And they shall go forth and look upon the carcasses of the men that have transgressed against me, for their worm shall not die, neither shall their fire be quenched" (Isaiah cxvi. 28 {sic lxvi. 24}).

49. And Moses asked the angel of Hell: "What have these committed?" And the angel answered: "This is the punishment for those who have committed adultery, sodomy, idolatry, and murder, and who have cursed their parents. Therefore hath God delivered them to the angels of destruction to be avenged on them." [Peter, ch. 9 (H. 24); cf. Macarius, 22, 27, 39, V. Mary] And Moses asked: "What is the name of this place?" And he answered: "The name of it is Abadon."

50. Thereupon Moses went up (to heaven) and said: "May it be Thy will, O Lord, my God, and God of my fathers, that Thou mayest save me and Thy people Israel from those places which I have seen in Hell."

51. God said to Moses: "Moses, my servant? I have created two parks: Paradise and Hell. Whosoever committeth evil deeds goeth down to Hell, and whosoever doth good deeds cometh into Paradise" [as it is said: "I the Lord search the heart, I try the reins, even to give every man according to his ways, according to the fruit of his doings" (Jer. xvii. 10)].

52. Then Moses lifted up his eyes and beheld the angel Gabriel; and he fell down and bowed himself before him. And the angel said: "Hast thou seen Hell?" He answered: "Yea." And the angel said: "Come then, I will show thee Paradise, by the will of God." So Moses went with him to Paradise.

53. When they came there, the angels said: "Thy time is not yet arrived to leave the world." Moses answered: "I came to see the mighty deeds of God, and the reward of the pious in Paradise, what is their condition there."

54. The angels began then to praise Moses and they said: "Hail, O Moses, servant of the Lord; Hail, O Moses, born of woman, who hast been found worthy to ascend seven heavens, hail the nation to whom such belongs." [{Hebrew: AKhKhS} such in arithmetical calculation is equal to {Hebrew: ASM}.]

55. When Moses went into Paradise he saw an angel sitting under the tree of life. Moses asked the angel Gabriel: "Who is this angel?" He answered: "This is the Lord (guardian) of Paradise and his name is X."

56. This angel then asked Moses: "Who art thou?" He answered: "I am the son of Amram." He said to him: "Why didst thou come hither?" And Moses answered: "To see the reward of the pious in Paradise have I come hither."

57. The angel took Moses by the hand, and they went both together. Moses looked up and saw seventy thrones fixed, one next to another; all made of precious stones, of emerald, sapphire and diamond and precious pearls, and the foot of each was of gold and fine gold. Around each throne stood seventy angels. Amongst the thrones was one greater than the others, and twenty of the ministering angels kept ward thereover.

58. Moses enquired of the angel and said: "Whose is that throne?" He answered: "It is the throne of Abraham the Patriarch."

59. Thereupon Moses went immediately up to Abraham. Abraham asked him: "Who art thou?" He answered: "I am the son of Amram." And Abraham asked: "Is perchance already thy time come to leave the world?"

Moses answered: "My time is not yet come, but with the permission of God I came to see the reward of the pious." [Cf. Ascensio Isaiae, viii. 27, 28] Abraham then said: "Praise ye the Lord, for He is good; for His mercy endureth for ever" (Ps. cvi. 1).

60. Then went Moses to the throne of Isaac, and he spake with him in a similar manner, and Moses answered in like wise.

61. Then asked Moses, the guardian angel of Paradise: "What is the length and width of Paradise?" The angel answered: "There is none who could measure it; no angel or Seraph can ever know the length and width of Paradise, for it is unlimited and boundless and immeasurable. The angels guard only the thrones and these are unlike to one another, for some of them are of silver, others of gold, others of bdellium, others of ruby, topaz, and carbuncle, others of emerald, sapphire and diamond, others of precious stones and pearls, others of rubies and carbuncles."

62. Moses asked the angel: "For whom is the throne of pearls?" He answered: "It is for the scholars who study the Law day and night for the sake of heaven." "And those of precious stones?" "For the pious men." "And those of rubies?" "For the just." "And those of gold?" "For the men who repent;" "but the greatest throne is for thy forefather Abraham, the other thrones are for Isaac and Jacob, and for the prophets and righteous, and the holy and wise pious men, each after his worth and position and the good works he hath performed in the world."

63. Moses then said to the angel: "For whom is that throne of copper?" He answered: "For the wicked man, whose son is pious; because through the merits of his son he obtains a portion of heavenly bliss; as thou seest in the case of Terah, who had worshipped all the idols in the world, but who through the merits of his son Abraham obtained that throne of copper as it is said: "Thou shalt go to thy fathers in peace" (Gen. xv. 15), thus announcing to him (Abraham) that God would give (his father also) a place in Paradise."

64. Afterwards Moses looked and beheld a spring of living water welling forth from underneath the tree of life and dividing itself into four streams, [and it comes from under the throne of glory] and they encompass the Paradise from one end to the other. And under each throne there flow four rivers, one of honey, the second of milk, the third of wine, and the fourth of pure balsam. [Paul, ch. 23] These all pass beneath the feet of the just, who are seated upon thrones.

65. It is said in the Zohar. King Messias said to R. Simeon, son of Johai: "Worthy art thou of thy portion in heaven, for thy teaching is divided (spread) through 670 heavens, each heaven is divided into 670 lights, each light is divided in 670 arguments, each argument is divided in (among) 670 worlds, each world is divided in 670 streams of pure balsam.

66. And all these streams flow round Paradise and beneath all the thrones. All these were created by God for the just, and whoso becometh equal to them in merit, sees and enjoys, as they enjoy, the splendour of the Shekina.

67. When Moses saw all these godly and pleasant things he felt great joy, and exclaimed: "Oh! how great is Thy goodness which Thou hast laid up for them that fear Thee, which Thou hast wrought for them that put their trust in Thee, before the sons of men" (Ps. xxxi. 19 {sic xxxi. 20}).

68. And Moses retired from there and went away. At that same moment a voice from Heaven (Bath-Kol) was heard saying: "Moses, servant of the Lord, faithful in His house; even as thou hast seen the reward which is preserved for the just in the future world, so also in the days to come shalt thou see the rebuilding of the Temple and the advent of the Messiah, and behold the beauty of the Lord, and meditate in His Temple" (Ps. xxvii. 4). (May it now be Thy will, O Lord, my God and the God of my fathers, that I and the whole nation of Israel may be deemed worthy of sharing in good and the great consolation, and the days of the Messiah, and the rebuilding of the Temple, and the everlasting life. Amen.)

II. The Revelation Of Moses. (B.)

Heaven.

[Ziyuni, fol. 93 c-d, cf. Yalkut Reubeni, fol. 100d-101a; Jellinek, Beth-hammidrash, I. 58-64; Pesikta Rabbati, ed. Friedmann, sec. 20, fol. 96a-98b; MS. Oxford, No. 1466, 14 (Cat. Neubauer)].

1. Moses, our teacher, upon whom may rest peace, said to Israel: "Hear, O Israel, you the whole nation! I went up on high, and I saw all the Heavenly rulers. I saw the angel Kemuel, the Janitor, who is placed over 12,000 angels of destruction, and who stands at the gates of heaven.

2. I saw further the angel Hadarniel, who is higher by 60 myriads of parasangs than Kemuel, and with every diction that comes out of his mouth go forth 12,000 flashes of lightning.

3. I saw further Sandalfon, the prince, greater than Hadarniel by 500 years' journey. Of him said Ezekiel: "One wheel upon the earth besides the living Creatures, for each of the four faces thereof" (Ezek. i. 15).

4. This is the Sandalfon who weaves crowns for his master. When this crown appears before the heavenly hosts, they all shake and tremble and the holy Creatures are struck dumb, and the holy Seraphim roar like lions, and they say: "Holy, holy, holy is the Lord of Hosts, the whole earth is full of his glory" (Is. vi. 2). And when the crown approaches the throne the wheels of the throne of glory move, and the thresholds of brilliancy quake, and all the heavens are seized with terror. And when the crown passes on to the throne of glory to its right place all the heavenly hosts open their mouths, turn to the Seraphim and say: "Blessed be the glory of the Lord from his place." They say: "From his place" (Ezek. iii. 12), because they do not know His actual place. When the crown comes near to God's head He accepts it graciously from His servants. And the heavenly Creatures and the Seraphim, and the wheels of the throne of glory, and the heavenly hosts, and the Hashmalim and Cherubim praise the Creator, acknowledge him as their king, and exclaim unanimously: "The Lord reigneth, the Lord reigned, the Lord will reign for evermore." [Talmud B., Hagigah, f. 13b; Longfellow, Sandalfon

5. I saw further the fiery river Rigyon, which comes out before God, from under the throne of glory, and is formed from the perspiration of the holy Creatures who support the throne of glory; and out of dread of God's majesty perspire fire. [Cf. Pirke de R. Eliezer, ch. 4] This river is meant by the saying "a fiery stream issued and came forth before him; thousand thousands ministered unto him, and ten thousand times ten thousand stood before him; the judgment was set and the books were opened" (Dan. vii. 10). For the Almighty sits and judges the ministering angels, and after the judgment they bathe in that river of fire and are renewed. Afterwards the river flows on and carries with it fiery coals, and falls on the heads of the sinners in Hell, as it is said: "Behold the tempest of the Lord, even His fury is gone forth, yea, a whirling tempest; it shall burst on the head of the wicked" (Jer. xxiii. 19). [V. 23; cf. Peter, 8 (H. 23); Paul, 32; V. Mary]

6. I saw further the angel Galitzur, surnamed also Raziel, who stands behind the curtain and listens to all that is decreed in heaven and proclaims it. This proclamation is then handed over to the prophet Elijah and he proclaims it to the world from the Mount Horeb.

7. The wings of Galitzur are spread and keep off the breath of the holy Creatures, for otherwise all the ministering angels would be burned by the breath of the holy Creatures.

8. I saw further Michael, the great prince, standing at the right side of the throne, and Gabriel at the left; and Iefefiyah, the guardian of the law, standing before it; and Metatron, the angel of the presence, standing at the door of the palace of God. And he sits and judges all the heavenly hosts before his master. And God pronounces judgment and he executes it.

9. I saw then a troop of the terrible angels who surround the throne of glory, they were more powerful and mightier than all the other angels. All these whom I saw wished to scorch me with the breath of their mouths, but out of dread of the presence of the Almighty, the king of kings, they had no power to injure me, for they all were full of fear and agony and dread before Him.

III. The Revelation Of R. Joshua Ben Levi. (A.) (250 C.E.)

Paradise, Hell.

(Orhot Hayim II. Cod. 52, Montefiore College, f. 281b-282b; Cod. 28, Jews' College, London, f. 145b-147a; Jellinek, Beth-hamidrash, II. 48-51; with Agadath Bereshit, Warsaw, 1867, fol. 51a-b; Kolbo, § 120; Zunz, Gottesdienstl. Vortraege, p. 141, No. e.)

1. R. Joshua, son of Levi, was a pious man. When the time approached that he should leave this world, the Lord said to the angel of death, "Go and fulfil whatever his wish may be." He went to him and said unto him: "The time is nigh when thou shalt leave this world, but now tell me what thou wishest, that I may fulfil it." [Cf. Test. Abraham, ch. 9]

2. As soon as R. Joshua heard this, he said: "I pray thee, show me my place in Paradise." He answered and said: "Come and I will show thee it." R. Joshua answered and said, "Give me thy sword, so that thou shouldst not frighten me." And he gave him his sword. So they went together till they reached the wall of Paradise. There being outside the wall, the angel of death lifted R. Joshua from the ground and placed him upon the crest of the wall, and said unto him: "Behold thy place in Paradise."

3. At that moment R. Joshua jumped down from the wall and fell into Paradise. The angel of death caught him by his mantle and said to him, "Get thee out thence." But R. Joshua swore by the name of God that he would not do so. The angel of death had no power to enter therein. The ministering angels seeing this, said to the Almighty: "Lord of the Universe, behold what R. Joshua hath done! By force hath he taken possession of his portion in Paradise." God answered: "Go and see if he has ever broken his oath, then shall this oath of his be likewise void and null." They searched and could not find any such case. So they came and said: "He hath never broken his oaths in his lifetime." And God answered: "If it be so, let him remain there."

4. When the angel of death saw this, he said to R. Joshua: "Give me now my sword back." But R. Joshua did not fulfil his request till a voice came forth and said: "Give him the knife, for it is of necessity for His creatures."

5. R. Joshua then said to him: "Swear unto me that thou wilt not show it any more to the creatures at the moment when thou takest their souls." [For up to that time the angel of death used to kill men openly, as one slaughters animals, and he showed it even to the suckling in the bosom of their mother.] At that hour he swore unto him, and R. Joshua returned the knife to him.

6. After that began the prophet Elijah to proclaim and to cry out aloud to the just: "Clear the way for the son of Levi."

7. [He went and saw R. Joshua sitting in the compartment of the just, and he asked him: "Art thou the son of Levi?" And he answered: "Yes." He asked again: "Hast thou seen a rainbow in thy lifetime?" Again R. Joshua answered: "Yes." And he replied: "Then if this is so, thou art not the son of Levi."--In fact it had not been the case. Now as Joshua had not seen a rainbow, but he did not wish to boast of it and to ascribe it to his own merits. He had asked him about the rainbow, for it is the sign of the covenant between God and the world; and when the rainbow appears then God (remembers) and pitieth his creatures; but when there liveth a just man, there is no longer any necessity for a rainbow, as through his merits the world is saved. As it is said: "And the just is the foundation of the world" (Prov. x. 25). Therefore did he ask him about the rainbow.]

8. The angel of death went to R. Gamaliel and told him: "So and so hath R. Joshua done unto me." R. G. answered and said: "He served thee right. But now please go and tell him I request him to search through heaven and hell their mysteries and to write them down and send it to me [also if there are idolators in hell]."

9. The angel went, and R. Joshua answered: "I will do so."

10. Thereupon R. Joshua went and searched through Paradise and he found therein seven compartments, [Cf. Midrash Kônen in Arze Lebanon, Venice, 1601, f. 3a-b; Yalkut Reubeni, Amsterdam, 1700, f. 13d-14a] each of twelve myriads of miles in width, and twelve myriads of miles in length; the measure of their width being the same as that of their length.

11. The first compartment corresponds to the first door of Paradise. Here dwell the proselytes who had embraced Judaism of their own free will, not from compulsion. The walls are of glass and the wainscoting of cedar. As I tried to measure it the inhabitants rose to prevent me from doing it. Obadiah the just, who presides over them, rebuked them and said: "What are your merits that this man should dwell here with you?" (for they wished to retain him there). Thereupon they allowed him to measure it.

12. The second compartment corresponds to the facing of the door of Paradise. It is built of silver and the wainscoting thereof of cedar. Here dwell those who repent, and Manasseh, son of Ezekiah, presides over them.

13. The third compartment, facing the third door, is built of silver and gold. Here dwell Abraham, Isaac and Jacob, and all the Israelites who came out of Egypt, and the whole generation who had lived in the desert, and all the kings (princes), with the exception of Absalom. There is also David, and Solomon, and Kilab, son of David, still alive, and all the kings of the house of Judah, with the exception of Manasseh, who presides over those who repent. Over these here preside Moses and Aaron. Here are the precious vessels of silver and gold, and jewels, and canopies, and beds, and thrones, and lamps of gold, and precious stones and pearls. And I asked: "For whom are all these prepared?" And David answered and said: "They are for those who still dwell in the world whence thou comest." And I asked: "Is here perhaps one also from the Gentiles, at least from my brother Esau?" And he answered and said: "No; because the Almighty gives the reward of every good deed they do in their lifetime in that world, but after death they go down to Hell; whilst the sinners in Israel get their punishment in their lifetime in that world, but after death they obtain the merit of their good deed here." As it is said: "And he payeth." [Cf. Othioth de R. Akiba (Jellinek l.c. p. 23)]

14. The fourth compartment, facing the fourth door of Paradise, is beautifully built, like to the first compartment, but its wainscoting is of olive-wood. Here dwell the perfect, and faithful, and just men. Why is the wainscoting of olive-wood? Because their life has been bitter to them as olives.

15. The fifth compartment is of silver, and gold, and refined gold, and of crystal, and bdellium; and through its midst flows the river Gihon. The walls are of silver and gold, and a perfume breathes through it more exquisite than the perfume of Lebanon. And beds of silver and gold are there prepared, covered with violet and purple covers, woven by Eve, and mixed with scarlet and made of hair of goats, woven by angels. Here dwell the Messiah and Elijah in a palanquin of the wood of Lebanon; the pillars thereof of silver, the bottom thereof of gold, the seat of it of purple. Herein lieth the Messiah, the son of David, who is the love of the daughters of Jerusalem, the midst thereof is love. The prophet Elijah takes the head of the Messiah and places it in his bosom and says to him: "Be quiet and wait, for the end draweth nigh." On every Monday and Thursday and Saturday and Holiday the Patriarchs come to him and the fathers of the Tribes and Moses and Aaron and David and Solomon and every king of Israel and of the house of Judah, and they weep with him and comfort him, and say unto him: "Be quiet and wait and rely upon thy Creator, for the end draweth nigh."

Also Korah and his company and Dathan and Abiram and Absalom come to him on every Wednesday, and ask him: "When will the end of our misery come? When wilt thou reveal thyself?"

16. He answereth them and says: "Go to your fathers and ask them." And when they hear of their fathers they feel ashamed and do not ask any further.

17. When I came to the Messiah he asked me: "What is Israel doing in the world from which thou comest?" And I answered and said: "Every day they await Thee." He immediately raised His voice and wept.

18. In the sixth compartment dwell those who died through performing a pious act.

19. In the seventh compartment dwell those who died from illnesses caused through the sins of Israel.

20. R. Joshua, son of Levi, tells further: "I asked the Messiah to allow me to look into Hell, but he did not allow me, as the righteous should never behold Hell." So I sent to the angel called Komm that he might describe Hell for me. But it was impossible, for at that moment R. Ismael, the high priest, and R. Simeon, son of Gamaliel, and ten just men were killed, and the news reached us, so I could not go with the angel. I went afterwards with the angel Kipod and the light went with me up to the gates of Hell, and the Messiah came with me, and they were open. The sinners who were there saw the light of the Messiah, and rejoiced, and said to one another: "This will bring us out from here." [Ev. Nicodem]

21. I saw compartments of ten miles length and of five width, full of pits of fire, and these consume the sinners, and after their destruction they are again made whole and fall again into the fire. In that compartment are ten nations from the Gentiles, and Absalom presides over them. These nations say one to another: "Our sin is that we have not accepted the Law; but what is your sin?" And the other answers: "That is also our sin, we are like you." They say then to Absalom: "Why art thou punished, seeing that thou as well as thy parents hast accepted the Law?" And he answers them and says: "Because I did not hearken to the commandments of my father." Angels stand close by and with their staves drive them back into the fire and burn them. Then they hurry to Absalom to beat him also, and to burn him; but a voice calls out to them: "Do not beat him and do not burn him, for he is from the seed of Israel, who said 'We will do and hearken,' and he is the son of my servant David." So they leave him upon his seat and honour him with the honour of a king. They bring out afterwards the sinners from the fire just as if they had not been burnt and the fire had never touched them; and they burn them again. This they repeat seven times, three times at day and four times at night. Absalom alone is saved because he is the son of David.

22. After having seen this I returned to Paradise, wrote description of Hell and sent it to R. Gamaliel and the ten elders of the Jews, and I told them all what I had seen in Paradise and Hell.

IV. The Revelation Of R. Joshua Ben Levi. (B.) (250 C.E.?)

Paradise.

(Jellinek, Beth-hamidrash II. p. 52-53; Yalkut I. § 20, f. 7a; Elia ha-Cohen: Shebet Mussar, Constantinople, 720, ch. 25, f. 80-81a.)

1. R. Joshua, son of Levi, tells: "Paradise has two gates of carbuncle, and sixty myriads of ministering angels keep watch over them. Each of these angels shine with the lustre of the heavens. When the just man approaches them they divest him of the clothes in which he had been buried and clothe him with eight clothes, woven out of clouds of glory, and place upon his head two crowns, one of precious stones and pearls and the other of gold, [Cf. Ascensio Isaiae, viii. 14, ix. 9, 24] and they place eight myrtles in his hand and praise him and say to him: "Go and eat thy bread with joy." And they lead him to a place full of rivers (waters) surrounded by roses and myrtles. Each one has a canopy according to his merits, as it is said: "For over all the glory shall be spread a canopy" (Is. iv. 5).

2. And through it flow four rivers, one of oil, the other of balsam, the third of wine, and the fourth of honey. Every canopy is overgrown by a vine of gold, and thirty pearls hang down from it, each of them shining like the morning star. In every canopy there is a table of precious stones and pearls, and sixty angels stand at the head of every just man, saying unto him: "Go and eat with joy of the honey, for thou hast worked assiduously in the Law," of which it is said: "And it is sweeter than honey," and drink of the wine preserved from the six days of Creation, for thou hast worked in the Law which is compared with the wine," as it is said: "I would cause thee to drink of spiced wine" (Song viii. 2). The least fair of them is beautiful as Joseph and Johanan and the grains of the pomegranate upon which fall the rays of the sun. There is no night, as it is said: "And the light of the righteous is as the shining light" (Prov. iv. 18).

3. And they undergo three transformations passing through three wards. In the first ward the just is changed into a child, and he enters the compartment of children and tastes the joys of childhood. In the second ward he is changed into a youth, there he enjoys the delights of youth. In the third ward he is changed into an old man, he enters the compartment of the old and enjoys the pleasures of mature age. [Paul, ch. 22, 23, 45; Peter, ch. 5 (H. 19-20)]

4. In Paradise there are eighty myriads of trees in every corner; the meanest among them choicer than a garden of spices. In every corner there are sixty myriads of angels singing with sweet voices, and the tree of life stands in the middle and over-shadoweth the whole Paradise; and it has 500 tastes, each different from the others, and the perfumes thereof vary likewise. [Peter, ch. 5 (H. 15-16)] Over it hang seven clouds of glory, and the winds blow from all the four corners and waft its many odours from one end of the world to the other. Underneath sit the scholars and explain the Law. These have each two canopies, one of stars and the other of sun and moon, and clouds of glory separate one from the other.

5. Within this is the Eden containing 310 worlds, as it is said: "That I may cause those that love me to inherit Substance" (Prov. viii. 21) [the numerical value of the Hebrew word for Substance is equivalent to 310]. [Cf. Yalkut Reubeni, f. 14a-b]

6. Here are the seven compartments of the just. In the first are the martyrs, as, for instance, R. Akiba and his companions. In the second, those who were drowned. In the third, R. Johanan and his disciples. [In what consisted his great merit? He said: "If all the skies were skins and all men scribes and all the forests pens, these scribes would not be able to write down all that I have learned from my teachers, and still am I no more than a dog liking the sea."] The fourth group is of those who were covered by the cloud of glory. The fifth group is that of the penitents [for the place occupied by a penitent not even a perfectly just man can occupy]. The sixth group is that of children who have not yet tasted sin in their lives. [Cf. Paul, ch. 26] The seventh group is that of the poor, who, notwithstanding that, studied the Law and the Talmud, and had acquired moral life. Of these speaks the verse: "For all that put their trust in Thee rejoice, and they shout for ever for joy" (Ps. v. 11 {sic v. 12}). And God Almighty sitteth in their midst, and expounds to them the Law, as it is said: "Mine eyes shall be upon the faithful of the land, that they may dwell with me" (Ps. xci. 6 {sic xci. 6}). And God hath not yet fully unveiled the glory which awaiteth them in the world to come, as it is said: "The eye hath not seen, O God, beside Thee, that which Thou workest for him that waiteth for Him" (Isaiah lxiv. 4 {sic lxiv. 3b}). Amen.

V.

Hell.

(Orhot Hayim, Vol. II. Cod. 52, Montefiore College, Ramsgate, f. 279a-b (= §§ 1-18). Elia de Vidas: Reshit Hochma, Constantinople, 1736, f. 40 a-b (= §§ 1-9, 19-21); cf. ibid. f. 40b, 41a. Jellinek, Beth-hamidrasch V. 50-51 (= §§ 10-18).)

1. R. Johanan began his homily with the verse "Passing through the valley of weeping they make it a valley of springs." This means to say that the sinner confesses, just as the leprous confesses, and he says: "I have committed such and such a transgression in that place, on that day, in the presence of so-and-so, in that society."

2. Hell has three gates: one at the sea, the other in the wilderness, and the third in the inhabited part of the world. That at the sea is alluded to in Jonah (ii. 3): "Out of the belly of Sheol cried I, and thou heardest my voice." That of the wilderness is alluded to (Numbers xvi. 33). "So they and all that appertained to them, went down alive unto Sheol." And that in the inhabited portion of the world (Isaiah xxxi. 9) "Saith the Lord, whose fire is in Zion and his furnace in Jerusalem."

3. Nine different kind of fires are in Hell, one devours and absorbs, another absorbs and does not devour, while another again neither devours nor absorbs. There is further fire devouring fire. There are coals big as mountains and coals big as hills, and coals huge like unto the Dead Sea and coals like huge stones.

4. There are rivers of pitch and sulphur flowing and fuming and seething.

5. The punishment of the sinner is thus: The angels of destruction throw him to the flame of hell; this opens its mouth wide and swallows him [as it is said: "Therefore Sheol hath enlarged her desire and opened her mouth without measure and their glory and their multitude and their pomp and he that rejoices among them descends into it" (Isaiah v. 14.)] This all happens to him who has not done one single pious act which would make the balance incline towards mercy; whilst that man who possesses many virtues and good actions and learning and who has suffered much he is saved from hell [as it is said: "Yea though I walk through the valley of the shadow of death, I will fear no evil for thou art with me; thy rod and thy staff shall comfort me" (Ps. xxiii. 4). "Thy rod" means the suffering and "thy staff" means the law [Cf. Test. Abraham, ch. 12-14]].

6. R. Johanan began: "The eyes of the wicked shall fail and refuge is perished from them and their hope shall be the giving up of the ghost" (Job ii. 20 {sic xi. 20}). That means: a body which is never destroyed and whose soul enters a fire which is never extinguished; of these speaks the verse: "For their worm shall not die neither shall their fire be quenched" (Isaiah lxvi. 24).

7. R. Joshua, son of Levi, said: Once upon a time I was walking on my way when I met the prophet Elijah. He said to me: "Would you like to be brought to the gate of hell?" I answered: "Yes!" So he showed me men hanging by their hair; and he said to him, these were they that let their hair grow to adorn themselves for sin. Others were hanging by their eyes; these were they that followed their eyes to sin, and did not place God before their face. Others were hanging by their noses; these were they that perfumed themselves to sin. Others were hanging by their tongues; these were they that had slandered. Others were hanging by their hands; these were they that had stolen and robbed. Others were hanging by their sexual organs; these were they that had committed adultery. Others were hanging by their feet; these were they that had run to sin. He showed me women hanging by their breasts; these were they that uncovered their breasts before men, to make them sin. He showed me further men that were fed on fiery coals; these were they that blasphemed. Others were forced to eat bitter gall; these were they that ate on fast-days. He showed me further men eating fine sand, they are forced to eat it and their teeth are broken; and the Almighty says to them: "O ye sinners! when you used to eat that which you stole and robbed it was sweet in your mouth now you are not able to eat even this." [As it is said: "Thou hast broken the teeth of the wicked" (Ps. iii. 8).] And he showed me men wallowing in the mire and worms were set upon them; these are they of whom it is said: "For their worm shall not die, neither shall their fire be quenched; and they shall be an abhorring unto all flesh" (Is. lxvi. 24). He showed me further men who are thrown from fire to snow and from snow to fire; these were they that abused the poor who came to them for assistance; therefore are they thus punished [as it is said: "Thou hast caused men to ride over our heads; we went through fire and through water" (Ps. lxvi. 12)]. He showed me others who were driven from mountain to mountain, as a shepherd leads the flock from one mountain to another. [Of these speaks the verse: "They are appointed as a flock for Sheol. Death shall be their shepherd and the upright shall have the dominion over them in the morning, and their form shall be for Sheol to consume that there be no habitation for it" (Ps. xlix. 15).] [I. 34-49]

8. R. Johanan said: "For every sin there is an angel appointed to obtain the expiation thereof; one comes first and obtains his expiation, then follows another and so on until all the sins are expiated, as with a debtor who has many creditors and they come before the king and claim their debts, and the king delivers him to them and says: "Take him and divide him between yourself." So also is the soul delivered in hell to cruel angels, and they divide it among themselves.

9. Three descend to hell for ever and do not ascend any more--the man who commits adultery, who blames his neighbour in public, and who is guilty of perjury. Others say: "Those who honour themselves by slandering their neighbours, those who make intrigues between man and wife in order to create disputes among them."

10. Seven descend to Hell: the judge, the butcher, the scribe, the physician, the barber and the teacher of very young children. These, if they have fulfilled their mission conscientiously for the sake of heaven, ascend afterwards again. Three, however, descend never to ascend: the man who blames his neighbour in public, the man who slanders his neighbour, and the man who commits adultery.

11. Hell has seven names: Sheol, Abaddon, Beer Shaon, Beer Shahat, Hatzar Maveth, Beer Tahtiyah, and Tit Hayaven. [VII. 2] The length of Sheol is a three years' journey, and so are its width and height. Similarly are the others also. Hell is thus a 2100 years' journey. If a man deserves punishment he is handed over to the angels of destruction. These seize him and lead him to the court of death, darkness and gloom, [as it is said: "Let their way be dark and slippery" (Ps. xxxv. 6)]. But this is not all, for they thrust him into Hell, [as it is said: "And the angel of the Lord pursuing them" (Ps. xxxv. 6)].

12. When a man dies and is carried along upon his bier ministering angels walk before him and people walk behind the bier following him. If they say: "Happy the man, for he was good and praiseworthy in his lifetime;" the angels say unto him: "Write it down," and he writes it down. [Cf. Macarius, 10-11] And this is not all, but two angels watch over the man at the moment of his death, and they know whether he has stolen or robbed during his lifetime; for even the stones and the beams of his house witness against him; [as it is said: "For the stones shall cry out of the wall and the beam out of the timber shall answer it" (Habak. ii. 11)]. [Macarius, 12-16]

13. When a man dies he is brought before Abraham, Isaac, and Jacob. They say unto him: "My son! what hast thou done in that world from which thou comest?" When he answereth: "I have bought fields and vineyards; and I have tilled them all my life." They answer: "O fool, that thou hast been! Hast thou not learned the words of King David, who said: "The earth is the Lord's and the fulness thereof" (Ps. xxiv. 1)." Angels then take him away and bring another man before them, and they ask him in likewise. If he answereth: "I gathered gold and silver," they retort: "Fool that thou art! Hast thou not read in the books of the prophets: "The silver is mine and the gold is mine, saith the Lord of hosts" (Haggai ii. 8).

14. When scholars are brought before them, they say: "My son! What hast thou done in the world from which thou comest?" He answers: "I have devoted my life to the study of the law." And the patriarchs answer: "He entereth into peace; they rest in their beds, each one that walketh in his uprightness" (Is. lvii. 2). And the Almighty receives them with grace.

15. There are five kinds of punishment in Hell, and Isaiah saw them all. He entered the first compartment and saw there two men carrying pails full of water on their shoulders, and they pour that water into a pit which, however, never fills. Isaiah said to God: "O thou who unveilest all that is hidden, unveil to me the secret of this!" And the Spirit of the Lord answered: "These are the men who coveted the property of their neighbours, and thus is their punishment." [Cf I. 36]

16. He entered the second compartment and he saw two men hanging by their tongues, and he said: "O thou, who unveilest the hidden, reveal to me the secret of this!" He answered: "These are the men who slandered, therefore they are thus punished!" [I. 38, 41]

17. He entered the third compartment and he saw there men hanging by the sexual organs. He said: "O thou who unveilest the hidden, reveal to me the secret of this!" And He answered: "These are the men who neglected their own wives and committed adultery with the daughters of Israel! [I. 36. 2. I. 38. 3. I. 48]

18. He entered the fourth compartment and saw there women hanging by their breasts, and he said: "O thou who unveilest the hidden, reveal to me the secret of these!" And He answered: "These are the women who uncover their hair and rend their veil, and sit in the open market place to suckle their children in order to attract the gaze of men and to make them sin; therefore they are punished thus!"

19. He entered the fifth compartment and found it full of smoke. There were all the princes, chiefs, and great men, and Pharaoh, the wicked, presides over them and watches at the gate of hell, and he saith unto them: "Why did you not learn from me when I was in Egypt?" So he sits there still and watches at the gates of hell.

20. On the eve of the Sabbath the sinners are led to two mountains of snow, where they are left until the end of the Sabbath, when they are taken back from there and brought again to their former places. An angel comes and thrusts them back to their former place in hell.[3] Some of them take, however, snow and hide it in their secret parts to cool them during the six days of the week, but the Almighty says unto them: "Woe unto you who steal even in hell!" [As it is said: "Draught and heat consume the snow waters, in Sheol they sin." {Job xxiv. 19} That means to say: "They sin even in Sheol."]

21. Every twelvemonth the sinners are burned to ashes and the wind disperses them and carries those ashes under the feet of the just [as it is said: "And ye shall tread down the wicked, for they shall be ashes under the sole of your feet" (Malachi iii. 29 {sic iii. 21})].

22. Afterwards the soul is returned to them and they come out black as the blackness of a pot, and they acknowledge the justice of their punishment and say: "Thou hast rightly sentenced us and rightly judged us. With Thee is righteousness and with us shame, as it is with us to-day." [Paul, i. 8]

23. The other nations, however, and the idolators are punished in the seven compartments of hell, in each compartment for a twelvemonth. And the river Dinor floweth from beneath the throne of glory and falleth over the heads of the sinners, and it floweth from one end of the world to the other.[Cf. II. 5. Test. of Isaac, James and Barnes, Test. of Abraham, p. 147]

24. There are seven compartments in hell, and in each of them are 6000 rooms, in each room 6000 windows, in each window (recess) there are 6000 vessels filled with venom, all destined for slanderous writers and iniquitous judges. [It is to that, that Solomon alludes when he says: "And thou mourn at thy latter end when thy flesh and thy body are consumed" (Prov. v. 2 {sic v. 11}).] [I. 42, VII. 4] None of these will be saved unless they acquire learning and pious deeds. But at the end the Almighty will have pity on all his creatures, as it is said: "For I will not contend for ever, neither will I be always wroth, for the spirit shall pass before Me and the souls which I have made" (Is. lvii. 16).

VI. Hell.

(Nachmanides, Shaar ha-gemul, Ed. Warsaw, 1878, p. 10 (= §§ 2-7); cf. Orhot Hayim, II. f. 282b-283a; Midrash Kônen, l.c. f. 4a).

1. R. Joshua, son of Levi, says: "When I measured the first compartment of Hell, I found it to be 100 miles long and 60 miles wide. Therein are pits with lions; all fall into those pits and are devoured by the lions, and the bones are thrown into burning fire.[ Cf. Test. of Isaac; James and Barnes, Test of Abraham, p. 147] I entered the second compartment and found it of the same size as the first. [Here follows in the text of Orhot Hayim, III. 21]

2. In the second compartment, in the second division, there are ten nations, and their punishment is like unto that of the first compartment. Doeg presides over them and the angel who punishes them is Lahatiel; but Doeg is freed from chastisement because he is a descendant from those who said: "We will do and hearken" (Israel).

3. In the third compartment there are other ten nations, their punishment is the same. The angel who punishes them is Shaftiel. Korah who presides over them and his companions are free from punishment, for they also said: "We will do and hearken."

4. In the fourth compartment the punishment is the same. There are also ten nations and Jeroboam presides over them. The angel who punishes them is Maktiel (Matniel). Jeroboam, however, has immunity for he himself had studied the Law, and he cometh from those who had said: "We will do and hearken."

5. In the fifth compartment the punishment is the same. Ahab presides over them. The angel who punishes them is Hutriel (Oniel). Ahab has immunity because he is one of the children of Israel who said on Mount Sinai: "We will do and hearken."

6. In the sixth compartment the punishment is the same. Micha presides over them. The angel who punishes them is Pusiell (Hadriel). Micha is free from chastisement for he is from those who said on Mount Sinai: "We will do and hearken."

7. In the seventh compartment the punishment is the same. Elisha ben Abuya presides over them. The angel who punishes them is Dalkiel (Rugziel). Elisha, however, has immunity for he is a descendant from those who said on Mount Sinai: "We will do and hearken." This is the punishment of the tens of thousand who are in each compartment, and they do not see each other, for it is dark, and this darkness is that deep darkness which existed before the world was created. [Peter, ch. 6 (H. 21); Macarius, 19; Virg. Mary.]

VII. Hell.

(Baraita de Massechet Gehinom: in Hesed le-Abraham of Abr. Azulai in: Yalkut-ha-roim, Warsaw, 1858, f. 85, sqq. Cf. Midrash Kônen, l.c. f. 3b-4a. Shebet Mussar, ch. 26, f. 84a.)

1. We read in the Baraita of the Creation: "Beneath the earth is the (abyss) Tehom under Tehom is Bohu, under Bohu is Yam, under Yam is Mayim, under Mayim is Arka, and there is, Sheol, Abadon, Beer Shahat, Tit-hayaven, Shaare Mavet, Shaare Tzalmavet, and Gehinom. Here are the sinners and the angels of destruction presiding over them. There is darkness thick as the wall of a city, and there the heavy and bitter punishments of the sinners are enacted, as it is said: 'The wicked shall be put to silence in darkness' (1 Sam. ii. 9)."

2. The uppermost compartment is Sheol. The height thereof is 300 years' journey; the width 300 years' journey; and its length 300 years' journey. The second compartment is Beer Shahat, of the same height, width, and length. The third is Tit-Hayaven of equal size. The fourth is Shaare Mavet of the same size. The fifth Abadon of the same size. The sixth Shaare Tzalmavet of the same size. The seventh Gehinom of the same size. That makes altogether the length of hell 6300 years' journey." [V. 11.]

We read further: the fire of Gehinom is one-sixtieth of the fire of Shaare Tzalmavet, and so of every consecutive compartment till the fire of Sheol, and in Sheol is half fire and half hail (ice), and the sinners therein when they come out from the fire are tortured by the hail (ice), and when they come out from the hail

(ice) the fire burns them, and the angels who preside over them keep their souls within their bodies [as it is said, "for their worm shall not die, neither shall their fire be quenched" (Isaiah lxvi. 24)].

3. We read further, "God created seven hells, in each hell are seven compartments, in each compartment there are seven rivers of fire and seven of hail (ice), the width of each is 100 cubits, its depth 1000 cubits, and its length 300 cubits, and they flow one after the other, and all the sinners pass through them and are burned, but the 40,000 angels of destruction who preside over them revive them and raise them on their feet and announce to them their deeds which were evil, and their ways which were crooked," and they say to them, "Pass now through the rivers of fire and hail and snow, just as you passed over and transgressed the law and the commandments which were given unto you on Mount Sinai, for you feared not the fire of hell and the punishment of Abaddon. Now render account of your deeds!"

4. There are besides in every compartment 7000 holes (crevices), in every hole there are 7000 scorpions. Every scorpion has 300 slits (cavities), in every slit 70,000 pouches of venom, from these flow six rivers of deadly poison. When a man touches it he immediately bursts, every limb is torn from him, his body is cleft asunder, and he falls dead upon his face. The angels of destruction collect his limbs and set them, and revive the man and place him upon his feet and take their revenge upon him anew. [I. 42, V. 24.]

Paradise.

(In Massechet Atziluth, ed. Warsaw, 1876, f. 54 a-b; Siddur Amram, Warsaw, 1865, I. f. 12b-13a).

R. Ismael tells: "Sagansagel addressed me and said to me: 'My beloved! sit in my bosom and I will tell thee what will happen to Israel.' So I sat in his bosom and he looked at me and wept; and tears flowed from his eyes and dropped on my face. And I said: 'Glorious heavenly light! Why dost thou weep?' And he answered: 'Come and I will show unto thee what is awaiting my holy people Israel.' He took me and brought me into the innermost place, to the treasure-house of treasures and he took down the books and showed me the decrees of many misfortunes written therein. I asked him: 'For whom are these destined?' And he answered: 'For Israel!' Again I asked: 'Will they be able to endure them?' And he answered: 'Come to-morrow and I will show thee more calamities still.' The next day he showed me still more calamities, for some it being decreed to die by the sword, for others to die of hunger, others again destined for slavery. And I said: 'O glorious heavenly light! have they indeed sinned so heavily?' He answered: 'Every day new calamities are decreed, but when Israel gathers in his prayer-house and repeats: "May His exalted name be praised" we retain those calamities and do not let them come out from these rooms.' When I left him I heard a voice speaking in Aramaic and saying: 'The holy temple is destined to be ruined and the temple to be a burning light, and the kingly palace delivered over to the owls and the young to slavery, and the princes to death and the pure altar to be profaned, and the table for the shewbread will be carried off by enemies, and Jerusalem will be a desert, and the land of Israel a desolation.' When I heard these words I was terrified and trembled and I fell down. Then came the angel Hadarniel and breathed into me a new soul and lifted me upon my feet and said to me: 'My beloved! what hath happened unto thee?' And I answered: 'O glorious heavenly light! is there indeed no salvation for Israel?' And he answered and said: 'Come and I will show thee the treasures of comfort and help stored up for Israel.' He brought me up and I saw groups of angels weaving raiments of salvation and making crowns of life and fixing in them precious stones and pearls, and anointing them with all kinds of spices and delights. [IV. 1] I asked: 'For whom are these all destined?' He answered: 'For David, king of Israel.' And I said: 'Show me the glory of David.' And he said: 'Wait three hours until David will come hither in his glory.' So he took me and placed me in his bosom, and he asked me: 'What dost thou see?' I answered: 'I see seven lightnings running into one another.' He said: 'Shut thine eyes that thou mayest not be dazzled by the light which precedes King David.' At that moment the wheels and Ophanim and holy Creatures and the treasures of rain and snow, and the clouds of glory and the planets and the ministering angels moved and shook and said: 'The heavens declare the glory of God' (Ps. xix. 1 {sic xix. 2}). I heard then a loud voice proceeding from Eden crying: 'The Lord reigneth for ever and ever,' and lo! David was in front and all the kings of his house after him, each one with his crown upon his head; but the crown of David surpassed them all, its lustre shineth from one end of the world unto the other. And David went up to the heavenly Temple, where a throne of fire stood ready for him, whose height is of 40 parasangs, its length and its width double the same. When David took his seat upon the throne prepared for him, facing that of his Creator, all the kings of Judah ranged themselves before him, and the kings of Israel stood behind him. Then he began to utter hymns and praises, such as no human ear has heard. (Paul, ch. 29.) And when he said: 'The Lord will reign for ever and ever.' Metraton and his company responded: 'Holy, holy, holy is the Lord of Hosts,' and the holy Creatures praised and said: 'Blessed be the glory of the Lord in its place.' The heavens say: 'The Lord will reign for ever and ever.' The earth says: 'The Lord hath reigned, does reign, and will reign for ever,' and all the kings respond and say: 'And the Lord will be king over the whole earth.'"

Chapter 10: On the Resurrection, and the Judgment, the Fire of Hell, and Punishments.

2. Since the heretics, however, think themselves persons of great learning and wisdom, we shall ask them if every body has a form of some kind, i.e., is fashioned according to some shape. And if they shall say that a body is that which is fashioned according to no shape, they will show themselves to be the most ignorant and foolish of mankind. For no one will deny this, save him who is altogether without any learning. But if, as a matter of course, they say that every body is certainly fashioned according to some definite shape, we shall ask them if they can point out and describe to us the shape of a spiritual body; a thing which they can by no means do. We shall ask them, moreover, about the differences of those who rise again. How will they show that statement to be true, that there is "one flesh of birds, another of fishes; bodies celestial, and bodies terrestrial; that the glory of the celestial is one, and the glory of the terrestrial another; that one is the glory of the sun, another the glory of the moon, another the glory of the stars; that one star differeth from another star in glory; and that so is the resurrection of the dead?" 1 Cor. xv. 39–42. According to that gradation, then, which exists among heavenly bodies, let them show to us the differences in the glory of those who rise again; and if they have endeavoured by any means to devise a principle that may be in accordance with the differences in heavenly bodies, we shall ask them to assign the differences in the resurrection by a comparison of earthly bodies. Our understanding of the passage indeed is, that the apostle, wishing to describe the great difference among those who rise again in glory, i.e., of the saints, borrowed a comparison from the heavenly bodies, saying, "One is the glory of the sun, another the glory of the moon, another the glory of the stars." And wishing again to teach us the differences among those who shall come to the resurrection, without having purged themselves in this life, i.e., sinners, he borrowed an illustration from earthly things, saying, "There is one flesh of birds, another of fishes." For heavenly things are worthily compared to the saints, and earthly things to sinners. These statements are made in reply to those who deny the resurrection of the dead, i.e., the resurrection of bodies

Commentary on John

Book 2:3, in ANF 10:324-325

Now it is possible that some may dislike what we have said representing the Father as the one true God, but admitting other beings besides the true God, who have become gods by having a share of God. They may fear that the glory of Him who surpasses all creation may be lowered to the level of those other beings called gods. We drew this distinction between Him and them that we showed God the Word to be to all the other gods the minister of their divinity. To this we must add, in order to obviate objections, that the reason which is in every reasonable creature occupied the same relation to the reason who was in the beginning with God, and is God the Word, as God the Word occupies to God. As the Father who is Very God and the True God is to His image and to the images of His image-men are said to be according to the image, not to be images of God-so He, the Word, is to the reason (word) in every man. Each fills the place of a fountain-the Father is the fountain of divinity, the Son of reason. As, then, there are many gods, but to us there is but one God the Father, and many Lords, but to us there is one Lord, Jesus Christ, so there are many Lo/goi, but we, for our part, pray that that one Lo/goj may be with us who was in the beginning and was with God, God the Logos. For whoever does not receive this Logos who was in the beginning with God, or attach himself to Him as He appeared in flesh, or take part in some of those who had part in this Logos, or whoever having had part in Him falls away from Him again, he will have his portion in what is called most opposite to reason. What we have drawn out from the truths with which we started will now be clear enough. First, we spoke about God and the Word of God, and of Gods, either, that is, beings who partake in deity or beings who are called Gods and are not. And again of the Logos of God and of the Logos of God made flesh, and of logoi, or beings which partake in some way of the Logos, of second logoi or of third, thought to be logoi, in addition to that Logos that was before them all, but not really so. Irrational Reasons these may be styled; beings are spoken of who are said to be Gods but are not, and one might place beside these Gods who are no Gods, Reasons which are no Reasons. Now the God of the universe is the God of the elect, and in a much greater degree of the Saviours of the elect; then He is the God of these beings who are truly Gods, and then He is the God, in a word, of the living and not of the dead. But God the Logos is the God, perhaps, of those who attribute everything to Him and who consider Him to be their Father. Now the sun and the moon and the stars were connected, according to the accounts of men of old times, with beings who were not worthy to have the God of gods counted their God. To this opinion they were led by a passage in Deuteronomy which is somewhat on this wise:9 "Lest when thou liftest up thine eyes to heaven, and seest the sun and the moon and the whole host of heaven, thou wander away and worship them and serve them which the Lord thy God hath appointed to all the peoples. But to you the Lord thy God hath not so given them." But how did God appoint the sun and the moon and all the host of heaven to all the nations, if He did not give them in the same way to Israel also, to the end that those who could not rise to the realm of intellect, might be inclined by gods of sense to consider about the Godhead, and might of their own free will connect themselves with these and so be kept from falling away to idols and demons? Is it not the case that some have for their God the God of the universe, while a second class, after these, attach themselves to the Son of God, His Christ, and a third class worship the sun and the moon and all the host of heaven, wandering, it is true, from God, but with a far different and a better wandering than that of those who invoke as gods the works of men's hands, silver and gold, -works of human skill. Last of all are those who devote themselves to the beings which are called gods but are no gods. In the same way, now, some have faith in that Reason which was in the beginning and was with God and was God; so did Hosea and Isaiah and Jeremiah and others who declared that the Word of the Lord, or the Logos, had come to them. A second class are those who know nothing but Jesus Christ and Him crucified, considering that the Word made flesh is the whole Word, and knowing only Christ after the flesh. Such is the great multitude of those who are counted believers. A third class give themselves to logoi (discourses) having some part in the Logos which they consider superior to all other reason: these are they who follow the honourable and distinguished philosophical schools among the Greeks. A fourth class besides these are they who put their trust in corrupt and godless discourses, doing away with Providence, which is so manifest and almost visible, and who recognize another end for man to follow than the good. It may appear to some that we have wandered from our theme, but to my thinking the view we have reached of four things connected with the name of God and four things connected with the Logos comes in very well at this point. There was God with the article and God without the article, then there were gods in two orders, at the summit of the higher order of whom is God the Word, transcended Himself by the God of the universe. And, again, there was the Logos with the article and the Logos without the article, corresponding to God absolutely and a god; and the Logoi in two ranks. And some men are connected with the Father, being part of Him, and next to these, those whom our argument now brings into clearer light, those who have come to the Saviour and take their stand entirely in Him. And third are those of whom we spoke before, who reckon the sun and the moon and the stars to be gods, and take their stand by them. And in the fourth and last place those who submit to soulless and dead idols. To all this we find analogies in what concerns the Logos. Some are adorned with the Word Himself; some with what is next to Him and appears to be the very original Logos Himself, those, namely, who know nothing but Jesus Christ and Him crucified, and who behold the Word as flesh. And the third class, as we described them a little before. Why should I speak of those who are thought to be in the Logos, but have fallen away, not only from the good itself, but from the very traces of it and from those who have a part in it?

From All That I Have Explained To You, Receive & Believe That In Day Of Resurrection Your Body Shall Arise In Its Entirety, You Shall Receive From Our Lord Reward Of Your Faith, & In All That You Have Believed, You Shall Rejoice & Be Made Glad

Demonstration 8 (Of the Resurrection of the Dead)

1. At all times controversies arise on this matter, how the dead shall rise and with what body they shall come? 1 Corinthians 15:35 For lo! The body wears out and is corrupted; and the bones also, no doubt, as time lengthens out over them, waste away and are not to be recognised. And when you enter a tomb in which a hundred dead men are buried, you find not there an handful of dust. And thus say those that reflect on these things:— "We know of course that the dead shall rise; but they will be clothed in a heavenly body and spiritual forms. And if it is not so, these hundred dead that were buried in one tomb, of whom after a long time elapses there remains nothing at all there, when the dead shall be quickened, and shall be clothed in a body and rise, unless they shall be clothed in a heavenly body, from whence shall their body come? For lo! There is nothing in the tomb."

2. Whosoever reflects thus is foolish, and without knowledge. When the dead were brought in, they were something; and when they were there for a long time, they became nothing. And, when the time shall have come that the dead shall rise, that nothing shall become something according to its former nature, and a change shall be added to its nature. O you unwise who reflectest thus, hear that which the blessed Apostle said when he was instructing a foolish man like you; for he said:— You fool, the seed which you sow unless it die is not quickened; and that which you sow is not like that which grows up into blade, but one bare grain of wheat or barley or some other seedling. And to each one of the seeds is given its own body. But God clothes your seed with its body as He wills. 1 Corinthians 15:36-38

3. Therefore, O fool, be instructed by this, that each of the seeds is clothed in its own body. Never do you sow wheat and yet reap barley, and never do you plant a vine and yet it produced figs; but everything grows according to its nature. Thus also the body that was laid in the earth is that which shall rise again. And as to this, that the body is corrupted and wastes away, you ought to be instructed by the parable of the seed; that as the seed, when it is cast into the earth, decays and is corrupted, and from its decay it produces and buds and bears fruit. For the land that is ploughed, into which seed is not cast, produces not fruit, even if that land drinks in all the rain. So the grave in which the dead are not buried, from it men shall not issue forth in the quickening of the dead, though the full voice of the trumpet should sound within it. And if, as they say, the spirit of the just shall ascend into heaven and put on a heavenly body, they are in heaven. And He Who raises the dead dwells in heaven. Then when our Saviour shall come, whom shall He raise up from the earth? And why did He write for us:— The hour shall come, and now is, that the dead also shall hear the voice of the Son of Man, and they shall live and come forth from their tombs? For the heavenly body will not come and enter into the tomb, and again go forth from it.

4. For thus say those who are stubborn in folly:— Why did the Apostle say— Different is the body which is in heaven from that which is on earth? 1 Corinthians 15:40 But he that hears this, let him hear also the other thing that the Apostle said:— There is an animal body, and there is a spiritual body. 1 Corinthians 15:44 And again he said:— We shall all sleep, but we shall not all be changed. And again he said:— This that shall die must clothe itself with that that shall not die, and this which is corruptible must clothe itself with that which is incorruptible. Again he said:— We must all stand before the judgment-seat of Christ, that every man may be rewarded in his body for everything that before time was done by him, whether good or evil. 2 Corinthians 5:10 Again he said:— What shall those do that are baptized for the dead? For if the dead rise not, why are they baptized for them? 1 Corinthians 15:29 Again he said:— If there is no resurrection of the dead, then is Christ not risen, and if Christ is not risen then your faith is vain, and our preaching. And if so we are found false witnesses in that we testified of God, that He raised up Christ, Whom He raised not up. Therefore, if the dead rise not, there is no judgment. And if there is no judgment, then let us eat and drink, for tomorrow we shall die. Be not deceived; evil communications corrupt good purposes. Now as to this that the Apostle said:— The body that is in heaven is different from that which is on the earth, let this word be thus understood by you. When the body of the just shall arise and be changed, it is called heavenly. And that which is not changed is called earthly, according to its earthly nature.

5. But hear, my beloved, another word like this, which the Apostle has spoken. For he said:— The spiritual man judges everything, and he is judged by no one. 1 Corinthians 2:15 And again he said:— They that are spiritual are spiritually minded, and they that are carnal are carnally minded. Romans 8:5 And again he said:— When we were in the flesh, the weaknesses of sins were working in our members that we might become fruit for death. Romans 7:5 Again he said:— If the Spirit of Christ is in you, you are spiritual. Romans 8:9 All these things the Apostle said, while he was clothed in the flesh but was doing the works of the Spirit. Thus also in the Resurrection of the dead, the righteous shall be changed, and the earthly form shall be swallowed up in the heavenly, and it shall be called a heavenly body. And that which shall not be changed, shall be called earthly.

6. Concerning then this Resurrection of the dead, my beloved, according to my power I will instruct you. For from the beginning God created Adam; moulded him from the dust of the earth, and raised him up. For if, while Adam was not, He made him from nothing, how much easier now is it for Him to raise him up; for lo! As a seed he is sown in the earth. For if God should do those things that are easy for us, His works would not appear mighty to us. For lo! There are among men artificers who make wonderful things, and those who are not artificers of the works stand and wonder how they were done; and the work of their fellows is difficult in their eyes. How much more should not the works of God be as a marvel! But for God this was no great thing, that the dead should be quickened. Before seed was sown in the earth, the earth produced that which had not been cast into it. Before it had conceived, it bore in its virginity. How then is this difficult, that the earth should cause to spring up again what had been cast into it, and after conception should bear? And lo! Her travail-pains are near; as Isaiah said, Who has seen anything like this and who has heard such things as these? That the earth should travail in one day, and a people should be born in one hour? Isaiah 66:8 For Adam unsown sprang up; unconceived he was born. But lo! now his offspring are sown, and wait for the rain, and shall spring up. And lo! The earth teems with many, and the time of her bringing forth is at hand.

7. For all our fathers, in hope of the Resurrection and the quickening of the dead, were looking forward and hastening; as the blessed Apostle said, If the righteous had been looking forward to that city from which Abraham went forth, they would have had an opportunity of again turning back and to it; but they showed that they were looking forward to one better than it, namely that which is in heaven. Hebrews 9:15-16 They were looking forward to be released and to go speedily there. And from that which I am writing unto you, understand and observe that they were looking forward to the Resurrection. For Jacob our father, when he was dying, bound Joseph his son with an oath, and said to him, Bury me in the tomb of my fathers, with Abraham and Sarah and Isaac and Rebecca. And why, my beloved, did Jacob not wish to be buried in Egypt, but with his fathers? He showed beforehand, that he was looking forward to the quickening of the dead; that, when the Resurrection shout should be raised and the sound of the trumpet (heard), he might rise up near to his fathers, and might not at the time of the Resurrection be mingled with the wicked who shall return to Sheol and to punishment.

8. Thus also Joseph bound his brethren by an oath, Genesis 50:24 and said to them:— When God shall remember you, take up my bones from hence with you. And according to the word of Joseph his brethren did, and kept the oath a hundred and twenty-five years. At that time when the hosts of the Lord went out from the land of Egypt, then Moses took up the bones of Joseph when he went forth. Exodus 13:19 And the bones of the righteous man were more precious and better in his estimation than the gold and the silver that the children of Israel took from Egypt when they spoiled them. And the bones of Joseph were forty years in the wilderness; and at that time when Moses fell asleep, he gave them in inheritance to Joshua the son of Nun. The bones of Joseph his father were better in his estimation than all the spoil of that land which he subdued. And why did Moses give the bones of Joseph to Joshua? Clearly, because he was of the tribe of Ephraim the son of Joseph. And he buried them in the land of promise, that there might be in that land a treasure, (even) that of the bones of Joseph (that were) buried therein. And also at the time that Jacob was dying, he blessed his tribes, and showed them what would happen to them in the latter days, and said to Reuben:— Reuben, you are my firstborn, might and the beginning of my strength. You have gone astray; as water, you shall not abide, because you went up to your father's bed. Truly you defile my couch and went up. Genesis 49:3-4 From the time that Jacob fell asleep until the time that Moses fell asleep two hundred and thirty-three years elapsed. Then Moses wished by his priestly power to absolve Reuben from his transgression and sin, in that he had lain with Bilhah, his father's concubine; that when his brethren should rise, he might not be cut off from their number. So he said in the beginning of his blessing:— Reuben shall live and not die, and shall be in the number. Deuteronomy 33:6

9. And also when the time came that Moses should sleep with his fathers, he was grieved and distressed, and he sought of his Lord and entreated that he might pass over to the land of promise. And why, my beloved, was the righteous Moses grieved because he did not enter into the land of promise? Clearly, because he wished to go and be buried with his fathers, and not be buried in the land of his adversaries, in the land of Moab. For the Moabites hired Balaam the son of Beor to curse Israel. Therefore Moses wished not to be buried in that land, lest the Moabites should come and take vengeance on him by taking up and casting forth the bones of that righteous man. And the Lord performed an act of grace towards Moses. For He brought him forth to Mount Nebo, and showed him all the land, making it pass before him. And as Moses gazed upon all the land, and gazed upon the mountain of the Jebusites where the Tabernacle was to dwell, he was grieved and wept when he saw the tomb in Hebron where his fathers Abraham, Isaac and Jacob were buried, that he should not be buried with them, nor his bones cast upon their bones, that he might rise along with them in the Resurrection. But when he had seen all the land, his Lord encouraged him and said to him, "I myself will bury you and hide you, and none shall know your tomb." So Moses died according to the word of the mouth of the Lord, and He buried him in a valley in the land of Moab over against Beth-Peor, where Israel had sinned, and no man has known his sepulchre unto this day. Deuteronomy 34:5-6 Two goodly benefits did his Lord accomplish for Moses in not making known his tomb to the children of Israel. He rejoiced that his adversaries should not know it, and cast forth his bones from his tomb; and in the second place, that the children of his people should not know it, and make his tomb a place of worship, for he was accounted as God in the eyes of the children of his people. And understand this, my beloved, from hence, that when he left them and went up to the mountain, they said: Exodus 32:1 — As for this Moses who brought us up from the land of Egypt we know not what has become of him. So they made them a calf and worshipped it, and they remembered not God Who brought them up from Egypt by means of Moses with a mighty hand and an uplifted arm. Deuteronomy 5:15 Because of this, God had respect unto Moses, and did not make known his tomb; lest, if He should make known his tomb, the children of his people might go astray, and make them an image, and worship it and sacrifice to it, and so by their sins disquiet the bones of the righteous man.

10. And Moses again proclaimed clearly the Resurrection of the dead, for he said as from the mouth of his God:— It is I that cause to die and it is I that make alive. Deuteronomy 32:39 Again also Hannah said thus in her prayer:— The Lord causes to die and quickens; He brings down to Sheol and brings up (therefrom). 1

Samuel 2:6 The Prophet Isaiah also said thus:— Your dead shall live, O Lord, and their bodies shall rise, and they that sleep in the dust shall awake and praise you. Isaiah 26:19 David also proclaimed, saying:— For lo! For the dead You work wonderful things, and the mighty ones shall rise and make confession unto You, and those that are in the tombs shall recount Your grace. And how in the tombs shall they recount the grace of God? Clearly, when they shall hear the sound of trumpet summoning them, and the cornet sounding forth from on high, and the earthquake that shall be, and the tombs that shall be opened, then the mighty ones shall arise in glory, and recount one to another in the tombs, saying, "Great is the grace that is performed towards us. For our hope was cut off; yet (another) hope has arisen for us. We were imprisoned in darkness, and have come forth to the light. We were sown in corruption, and have risen in glory. We were buried naturally, and we have risen spiritually. Again we were sown in weakness, and have risen in power." This is the grace that they shall tell of in the tombs.

11. And it was not only in words, my beloved, that God said:— "I quicken the dead," but also in deeds He showed it to us by many testimonies; that we might have no hesitation (concerning it). He showed it beforehand plainly; for through Elijah a wonder was manifested, (in proof) that the dead shall live and that they that sleep in the dust shall arise. For when the son of the widow died, Elijah raised him up and gave him to his mother. And Elisha again, his disciple, raised up the son of the Shunamite; that the testimony of two might be established and confirmed for us. And also again when the children of Israel cast a dead man on the bones of Elisha, that dead man revived and arose. And the witness of three is certain.

12. And also through the Prophet Ezekiel, the Resurrection of the dead was manifestly shown, when God brought him forth to the valley and showed him many bones, and made him pass by them round about them, and said to him:— Son of Man, will these bones live? And Ezekiel said to Him: Ezekiel 37:1-10 — You know, O Lord of lords. And the Lord said to him:— Prophecy, O Son Man, over these bones; prophecy and say to the dry bones, Hear the word of the Lord of lords. And when he had caused them to hear those words, there was a shaking and a noise, and the bones were gathered together, even those that were crushed into pieces and broken. And when the Prophet saw them, he was astonished, for they came together from all sides, and each bone received its fellow, and each joint approached its fellow-joint, and they ordered themselves, one on another. And their dryness was made moist, and the joints were united by the ligatures, and the blood grew warm in the arteries, and skin was stretched over the flesh, and hair grew up according to its nature. But they lay prostrate and there was no breath in them. Then again He commanded the Prophet, and said to him:— Prophecy unto the spirit and say to it, Come, O spirit, from the four winds, and breathe upon these slain men that they may live. And when he caused them to hear this second word, the spirit entered into them, and they revived and stood up upon their feet, a very great host.

13. But why, my beloved, was it that those dead did not rise because of the one word (spoken) through Ezekiel, and why was not their resurrection, both of bones and spirit, accomplished (through that one word)? For lo! By one word the bones were fitted together, and by another the spirit came. It was in order that full perfection might be left for our Lord Jesus Christ, Who with one utterance and one word will raise up at the last day every body of man. For it was not the word that was insufficient, but its bearer was inferior. And with regard to this, understand and observe that when Elijah also, and Elisha his disciple, raised the dead, it was not with one word that they raised them up, but after they had prayed and made intercession and delayed no little time, then they arose.

14. And our Lord Himself, in that His first Coming raised up three that were dead, that the testimony of three might be made sure. And He raised up each one of them with two words each. For when He raised up the widow's son, He called him twice, saying to him, Young man, young man, arise. Luke 7:14 And he revived and arose. And again, He twice called the daughter of the chief of the synagogue, saying to her, Damsel, damsel, arise. Mark 5:47 And her spirit returned and she arose. And after Lazarus died, when He came to the place of burial. He prayed earnestly and cried with a loud voice and said, Lazarus, come forth. John 11:43 And he revived and came out of his tomb.

15. And concerning all this that I have explained to you, that those dead persons were raised with two words each, it was because for them two resurrections take place; that former one, and the second, that which is to come. For in that resurrection in which all men shall rise, none shall fall again; and by one word of God, sent forth through Christ, all the dead shall rise in the twinkling of an eye, speedily. For He Who brings it to pass is not feeble or insufficient. For with one word of summons He will cause all the ends (of the world) to hear, and all that are laid (in the grave) shall leap forth and rise up; and no word shall return void to Him that sent it forth, but as it is written in the Prophet Isaiah, Isaiah 55:10-11 who compares the word to rain and snow; for he said:— As the rain and the snow come down from heaven and return not there, but fertilize the earth and cause it to bring forth and give seed to the sower and bread for food, so shall the word be that goes forth from My mouth, and it shall not return to Me void, but shall accomplish whatsoever I desire and shall accomplish that for which I shall have sent it. For the rain and the snow do not return to heaven, but accomplish in the earth the will of Him that sends them. So the word that He shall send through His Christ, Who is Himself the Word and the Message, shall return to Him with great power. For when He shall come and bring it, He shall come down like rain and snow, and through Him all that is sown shall spring up and bear righteous fruit, and the word shall return to His sender; but not in vain shall His going have been, but thus shall He say in the presence of His sender:— Behold, I and the children that the Lord has given Me. Isaiah 8:18 And this is the voice through which the dead shall live. Concerning it our Redeemer testifies, saying:— The hour shall come when even the dead shall hear the voice of the Son of Man and shall come forth from their tombs; John 5:25 as it is written, In the beginning was the voice, that is the Word. John 1:1 Again He said, The Word became a body and dwelt among us. John 1:14 And this is that voice of God which shall sound from on high and raise up all the dead.

16. Again, our Lord explained to the Sadducees with regard to the resurrection of the dead, when they brought forth to Him the parable of the woman who was married to seven husbands, and said to Him:— Lo! The woman was wife of them all; in the Resurrection of the dead, to which of them shall she be wife? Matthew 22:28 Then our Lord said to them:— You do greatly err, and you know not the Scriptures nor the power of God. For they who are worthy of that world and of that Resurrection from the dead, they that are men do not take wives, nor are the women married to husbands, for they cannot die, for they are as the angels of God and children of the Resurrection. But concerning the Resurrection, that the dead shall rise, have you not read in the Scripture that God said to Moses out of the bush, "I am the God of Abraham, of Isaac and of Jacob." And lo! He is not God of the dead, for they all are alive unto Him. Matthew 23:29-32

17. And there are those who even while they live are dead unto God. For He laid a commandment on Adam and said to him, In the day that you shall eat of the tree, you shall surely die. Genesis 2:17 And after he had transgressed the commandment, and had eaten, he lived nine hundred and thirty years; but he was accounted dead unto God because of his sins. But that it may be made certain for you that a sinner is called dead even when he lives, I will make it clear to you. For thus it is written in Ezekiel the Prophet, As I live, says the Lord of lords, I desire not the death of the dead sinner.

18. Moreover our Lord said to that man who said to Him:— Let me go and bury my father, and I will come to You. Luke 9:59-60 And our Lord said to him, Let the dead bury their dead, but go, preach the Kingdom of God. But how is this word understood by you, my beloved? Did you ever see the dead burying their dead? Or how shall a dead man arise to bury another dead man? But receive this explanation from me, that a sinner, while he is living, is dead unto God; and a righteous man, though dead, is alive unto God. For such death is a sleep, as David said, I lay down and slept, and awoke. Again Isaiah said, They that sleep in the dust shall awake. Isaiah 26:19 And our Lord said concerning the daughter of the chief of the synagogue, The damsel is not dead, but sleeping a slumber. Matthew 9:26 And concerning Lazarus, He said to His disciples:— Our friend Lazarus has fallen asleep; but I go to waken him. John 11:11 And the Apostle said:— We shall all sleep, but we shall not all be changed. 1 Corinthians 15:51 And again he said:— Concerning those that sleep, be not grieved. 1 Thessalonians 4:13

19. But it is right for us to be afraid of the second death, that which is full of weeping and gnashing of teeth, and of groanings and miseries, that which is situated in outer darkness. But blessed shall be the faithful and the righteous in that Resurrection, in which they expect to be awakened and to receive the good promises made them. But as for the wicked who are not faithful, in the Resurrection woe to them, because of that which is laid up for them! It would be better for them according to the faith which they possess, were they not to arise. For the servant, for whom his Lord is preparing stripes and bonds, while he is sleeping desires not to awake, for he knows that when the dawn shall have come and he shall awake, his Lord will scourge and bind him. But the good servant, to whom his Lord has promised gifts, looks expectantly for the time when dawn shall come and he shall receive presents from his Lord. And even though he is soundly sleeping, in his dream he sees something like what his Lord is about to give him, whatsoever He has promised him, and he rejoices in his dream, and exults, and is gladdened. As for the wicked, his sleep is not pleasant to him, for he imagines that lo! The dawn has come for him, and his heart is broken in his dream. But the righteous sleep, and their slumber is pleasant to them, in the day-time and the night-time, and they take no thought of all that long night, and like one hour is it accounted in their eyes. Then in the watch of the dawn they awake with joy. But as for the wicked, their sleep lies heavy upon them, and they are like a man who is laid low by a great and deep fever, and tosses on his couch hither and there, and he is terrified the whole night long, which lengthens itself out for him, and he fears the dawn when his Lord will condemn him.

20. But our faith thus teaches, that when men fall asleep, they sleep this slumber without knowing good from evil. And the righteous look not forward to their promises, nor do the wicked look forward to their sentence of punishment, until the Judge come and separate those whose place is at His right hand from those whose place is at His left. And be instructed by that which is written, that when the Judge shall sit, and the books be opened before Him and the good and evil deeds recited, then they that have wrought good works shall receive good rewards from Him Who is good; and they that have done evil deeds shall receive evil penalties from the just Judge. For towards the good, He changes not His nature; and He proves Himself just because He justly condemns many. But towards the evil He changes His nature, in that world where grace is lost in justice; and He proves Himself just to all. And grace will not be joined with justice towards them. Like as grace avails not (to remedy) detriment, so justice (avails not to assist) grace. For grace is far from the judge, but justice urges the judge. If grace be near to any one, let him turn himself towards it, and not deliver himself into the hands of justice, lest it condemn him, exacting for his shortcomings the penalty at his hands. And if grace be far from any one, justice will bring him to the trial, and by it he will be condemned, and go away to the torment.

21. But hear, my beloved, this proof that retribution shall take place at the end. For when the Shepherd divides His flock and sets some on His right hand and some on His left, until He shall have acknowledged the service of the good, then He will cause them to inherit the kingdom; and until He shall have rebuked the evil and they are condemned, then He will send them to the torment. And as to them that sent messengers after the King, saying, This man shall not be king over us, when He shall receive the kingdom and return, then His adversaries shall be slain before Him. And the labourers who hastened and were wearied in the vineyard, shall not receive the reward till the labour shall cease. And the traders who received the money, when the Lord of the money shall come, then shall He exact the usury. And the virgins who, while waiting for the bridegroom, slumbered and slept because He delayed to come, when they shall hear the cry, then they shall awake and trim their lamps; and they that are wise shall enter in; and the foolish shall be shut out. And they who were before us in entering the faith, without us shall not be made perfect. Hebrews 11:40

22. From all these things, understand, my beloved, as it has been made certain for you, that as yet no one has received his reward. For the righteous have not inherited the kingdom, nor have the wicked gone into torment. The Shepherd has not as yet divided His flock. And lo! The workmen enter into the vineyard, and as yet have not received the reward. And lo! The merchants are trading with the money. And as yet their Lord has not come to take the account. And the King has gone to receive the Kingdom, but as yet He has not returned the second time. And those virgins that are waiting the bridegroom are sleeping up to the present time, and are awaiting the cry when they will awake. And the former men who toiled in the faith until the last men shall come, shall not be made perfect.

23. But they who are babes in understanding say:— "If no one has received his reward, why did the Apostle say, When we shall depart from the body, we shall be present with the Lord?" 2 Corinthians 5:8 But recollect, my beloved, that I instructed you concerning this matter in the Demonstration concerning Solitaries, that the spirit which the righteous receive, according to its heavenly nature, goes to our Lord until the time of the Resurrection, when it shall come to put on the body in which it dwelt. And at every time it has the memory of this in the presence of God, and looks eagerly for the Resurrection of that body in which it dwelt, as the Prophet Isaiah said about the Church of the Gentiles:— They that make mention of you shall be faithful and stand before the Lord, and you shall not give them rest. But as to the wicked, they have none to make mention of them before the Lord, because the Holy Spirit is far removed from them, because they are animal, and are buried after the manner of animals.

24. And again, (the followers of) doctrines, which are instruments of the Evil One, are offended by the word which our Lord spoke, No one has ascended up to heaven but He Who came down from heaven, the Son of Man, Who was in heaven. John 3:13 And they say, "Lo! Our Lord testified that no earthly body has ascended to heaven." In their ignorance they cannot apprehend the force of this. For when our Lord instructed Nicodemus, he did not apprehend the force of the saying. Then our Lord said to him:— No one has ascended into heaven, so as to come down and relate to you whatsoever is there. For if I have spoken unto you of those things that are in the earth, and you believe not, how shall you believe if I shall speak unto you of those things which are in heaven? John 3:12 For lo! no other witness besides Me has come down from thence, to bear witness concerning those things which are in heaven, so that you should believe. For Elijah went up there, but he came not down along with Me to bear witness, that the testimony of two might be sure.

25. But as for you, my beloved, have no doubt as to the Resurrection of the dead. For the living mouth (of God) testifies:— I cause to die and I make alive. Deuteronomy 32:39 And both of them proceeded out of one mouth. And as we are sure that He causes to die, and we see it; so also it is sure and worthy of belief, that He makes alive. And from all that I have explained to you, receive and believe that in the day of the Resurrection your body shall arise in its entirety, and you shall receive from our Lord the reward of your faith, and in all that you have believed, you shall rejoice and be made glad.

Demonstration 22 (Of Death And The Latter Times)

1. The upright and righteous and good and wise fear not nor tremble at death, because of the great hope that is before them. And they at every time are mindful of death, their exodus, and of the last day in which the children of Adam shall be judged. They know that by the sentence of judgment death has held sway, because Adam transgressed the commandment; as the Apostle said:--Death ruled from Adam unto Moses even over those who sinned not, so that also upon all the children of Adam it passed,(3) even as it passed upon Adam. And how did death rule from Adam unto Moses? Clearly, when God laid down the commandment for Adam, He warned him, and said:--On the day that thou shalt eat of the tree of the knowledge of good and evil, thou shalt die the death.(4) So when he transgressed the commandment and ate of the tree, death ruled over him and over all his progeny. Even over those who had not sinned, even over them did death rule through Adam's transgression of the commandment.

2. And why did he say:--From Adam unto Moses did Death rule? And who is so ill-furnished with knowledge as to imagine that only from Adam to Moses has death had dominion? Yet let him understand from this that he said:--Upon all men it passed. Thus, upon all men it passed from Moses until the world shall end. Yet Moses preached that its kingdom is made void. For when Adam transgressed the commandment whereby the sentence of death was passed upon his progeny, Death hoped that he would bind fast all the sons of man and would be king over them for ever. But when Moses came, he proclaimed the resurrection, and Death knew that his kingdom is to be made void. For Moses said:--Reuben shall live and not die, and shall be in number.(5) And when the Holy One called Moses from the bush he said thus to him:--I am the God of Abraham, of Isaac, and of Jacob.(6) When Death heard this utterance, he trembled and feared and was terrified and was perturbed, and knew that he had not become king for ever over the children of Adam. From the hour that he heard God saying to Moses:--I am the God of Abraham, of Isaac, and of Jacob, Death smote his hands together, for he learned that God is King of the dead and of the living, and that it is appointed to the children of Adam to come forth from his darkness, and arise with their bodies. And observe that our Redeemer Jesus also, when He repeated this utterance to the Sadducees, when they were disputing with Him about the Resurrection of the dead, thus said:--God is not(God) of the dead, for all are alive unto Him.(7)

3. And that God might make known to Death that his authority is not for ever over all the progeny of the world, He translated Enoch to Himself, because he was well-pleasing, and made him deathless. And again He took up Elijah to heaven, and Death had no dominion over him. And Hannah said:--The Lord maketh to die and causeth to live; He bringeth down to Sheol and raiseth up.(8) Furthermore Moses said as from the mouth of God:--I make to die and I cause to live.(9) Again the Prophet Isaiah also said:--Thy dead shall live, and their dead bodies shall rise again; and the sleepers of the dust shall be awakened, and shall glorify Thee.(1) When Death heard all these things, amazement seized him, and he sat him down in mourning.

4. And when Jesus, the slayer of Death, came, and clothed Himself in a Body from the seed of Adam, and was crucified in His Body, and tasted death; and when (Death) perceived thereby that He had come down unto him, he was shaken from his place and was agitated when he saw Jesus; and he closed his gates and was not willing to receive Him. Then He burst his gates, and entered into him, and began to despoil all his possessions. But when the dead saw light in the darkness, they lifted up their heads from the bondage of death, and looked forth, and saw the splendour of the King Messiah. Then the powers of the darkness of Death sat in mourning, for he was degraded from his authority. Death tasted the medicine that was deadly to him, and his hands dropped down, and he learned that the dead shall live and escape from his sway. And when He had afflicted Death by the despoiling of his possessions, he wailed and cried aloud in bitterness and said, "Go forth from my realm and enter it not. Who then is this that comes in alive into my realm?" And while Death was crying out in terror (for he saw that his darkness was beginning to be done away, and some of the righteous who were sleeping arose to ascend with Him), then He made known to him that when He shall come in the fulness of time, He will bring forth all the prisoners from his power, and they shall go forth to see the light. Then when Jesus had fulfilled His ministry amongst the dead, Death sent Him forth from his realm, and suffered Him not to remain there. And to devour Him like all the dead, he counted it not pleasure. He had no power over the Holy One, nor was He given over to corruption.

5. And when he had eagerly sent Him forth and He had come forth from his realm, He left with him, as a poison, the promise of life; that by little and little his power should be done away. Even as when a man has taken a poison in the food which is given for (the support of) life, when he perceives in himself that he has received poison in the food, then he casts up again from his belly the food in which poison was mingled; but the drug leaves its power in his limbs, so that by little and little the structure of his body is dissolved and corrupted. So Jesus dead was the bringer to nought of Death; for through Him life is made to reign, and through Him Death is abolished, to whom it is said:--O Death, where is thy victory?(1)

6. Therefore, ye children of Adam, all ye over whom Death has ruled, be mindful of Death and remember life; and transgress not the commandment as your first father did. O Kings, crowned with the diadem, remember Death, which will take away the diadems that are set upon your heads, and he shall be king over you till the time, when ye shall rise again for the judgment. O ye haughty and uplifted and proud, remember Death, which shall destroy your haughtiness, and dissolve the limbs, and separate the joints, and the body and its forms shall be given over to corruption. The lofty ones shall be brought low by Death, and the fierce and stern ones shall be buried away in his darkness. He shall take away all the pride, and they shall corrupt away and become dust, until the judgment. O ye rich, remember Death; for when the time shall come and ye shall draw nigh to him there, ye shall not use your wealth and possessions. He will not place dainty viands before you, nor will he prepare for you a rich banquet. There the body of the gluttons who used to live delicately shall be corrupted. They shall cease from their luxury and shall not remember it. There the worm shall consume their bodies, and they shall clothe themselves in darkness over their fair apparel. They remember not the ending of this world, that Death shall confound them when they descend to him. So they shall sit in oppression and in the shadow of death, and shall not remember this world, until the end shall be and they shall rise again for the judgment. O ye rapacious and extortioners and plunderers of your fellows, remember Death, and multiply not your sins; for in that place sinners repent not; and he who has plundered his fellows' goods shall not possess his own, but shall go to the place where man shall make no use of wealth. And he shall come to nought and pass away from his honour, but his sins shall be laid up against the day of judgment.

7. O ye that trust in this world, let this world be despised in your eyes; for ye are sojourners and aliens in the midst of it, and ye know not the day that ye shall be taken out of it. For suddenly shall Death come, and separate and lead away the loved children from their parents, and the parents from their darling children. He leads away for himself the precious only-begotten children, and their parents shall be deprived of them and shall come into contempt. He separates precious friends unto himself, and their beloved weep for them lamentably. He leads away and takes prisoners unto himself them that are desired for their beauty, that he may put to shame their forms and corrupt them. And those that are glorious in aspect he leads away to himself, and they become dust until the judgment. He leads away betrothed maidens from their spouses, and binds them captive in his bridal-chamber, in his place of gloom. He leads away and separates betrothed husbands from the virgins who were designed for them and betrothed in their name; and these shall sit in bitter mourning over them. He leads away and separates unto himself all the beautiful youths who supposed that even unto old age they would not see death. He leads away and gathers unto himself the loved infants of days, with whom their parents were not satiated. He leads away to himself the wealthy, the sons of luxury; And they leave their possessions as the waves of the sea.<sup>(1)</sup> He leads away to himself the skilful artificers, who were raising up the world by their wonderful works. He leads away to himself the subtle and the wise, and they become simple, not distinguishing good from evil. He leads away to himself the richly endowed of this world, and their endowments are destroyed and shall not be established for ever. He leads away to himself the mighty and the great ones, and their might is brought low and weakened, and comes to an end. Them that were confident that their might would not be brought lower, in the day of death, men that are of lower degree than theirs gather together their bodies. They that trust that in their death they shall be buried with honour, it befalls them that the dogs devour them. And they that trust that they shall be buried in the place wherein they were born, know not but that in the land of their captivity they shall even be gathered (to the grave) with insult. They that trusted in their possessions, that they should give them in inheritance to their children, from them it is hidden that they shall be plundered by their enemies. Death leads away to himself the brave and the warriors. who thought to lay waste the great world. Death leads away them that adorn themselves with all pleasant things, and the burial of an ass befalls them when they are buried. Death rules over the unborn, and takes them captive to himself before they are born. Death leads away to himself them that are honoured with pomps, and they come into contempt when they descend to him, to the realm of darkness, where there is no light. He is not ashamed before Kings (that are) crowned with the diadem. He is not abashed before the lofty and the fierce ones who lay waste the lands. Death respects not the persons of the honourable, nor does he receive a bribe from the rich. Death despises not the poor, nor does his soul scorn him that has nothing. Death honours not hem that live in magnificence, nor with him are the good distinguished from the bad. He takes no account of the aged, rather than of children in respect of honour. The lords of prudence he makes without understanding, and them that used to make haste and vex themselves, in acquiring possessions there with him, these are stripped of their gains. He leads away to himself slaves and their masters; and there the masters are not honoured more than their servants. Small and great are there, and they hear not the voice of the oppressor. The slave who is freed from his master(1) there pays no regard to him who used to oppress him. Death binds and makes captive to himself the keepers of prisoners, and the prisoners who were shut up. By means of Death the prisoners are released, and fear not again because of their oppressors.

8. They that live daintily fear death; but the afflicted look forward with hope that they shall be speedily taken away. All the rich tremble because of death; but the poor desire it, that they may rest from their labour. Death terrifies the mighty when they remember him; but the sick look forward with hope to him that through him they may forget their pains. Again the young children are afraid of death, for when it comes upon them they shall leave their pleasures; but the old men advanced in years pray for it, they that are in need of daily bread.

9. The sons of peace remember death; and they forsake and remove from them wrath and enmity. As sojourners they dwell in this world, and prepare for themselves a provision for the journey before them. On that which is above they set their thoughts, on that which is above they meditate; and those things which are beneath their eyes they despise. They send away their treasures to the place where there is no peril, the place where there is no moth, nor are there thieves. They abide in the world as aliens, sons of a far land; and look forward to be sent out of this world and to come to the city, the place of the righteous. They afflict themselves in the place of their sojourning; and they are not entangled or occupied in the house of their exile. Ever day by day their faces are set upwards, to go to the repose of their fathers. As prisoners are they in this world, and as hostages of the King are they kept. To the end they have no rest in this world, nor is (their) hope in it, that it will continue for ever. They that acquire possessions, rejoice not in them, and they that beget children, death fills them with sorrow. They that build cities, shall not be left in them; and those that hasten and toil for anything, are in no wise to be distinguished from fools. O man without sense, whosoever he be whose trust is in this world!

10. Remember, my beloved, and compare and consider in thy mind, who is there of former generations who has been left in this world so as to continue for ever? Death has led away the former generations, the great ones and the mighty and the subtle. Who is there that acquired great possessions, and at the time when he departed took them with him? That which was gathered together from the earth returns back into its bosom; and naked does a man depart from his possessions. The wise, when they acquire goods, send some of them before them, as Job said: My witnesses are heaven; and again:--My brethren and my lovers are with God.(2) And our Lord commanded them that acquire possessions to make for themselves friends in heaven, and also to lay up treasures there.(3)

11. Do thou also remember death, O wise scribe, that thy heart be not lifted up, so that thou shouldest forget the sentence of judgment. Death leaves not aside the wise, nor respects the persons of the subtle. Death leads away to himself the wise scribes, so that they forget that which they have learned, until the time comes in which all the righteous shall rise again.

12. In that place they shall forget this world. There they have no want; and they shall love one another with an abundant love. In their bodies there shall be no heaviness, and lightly shall they fly as doves to their windows.(1) In their thoughts they shall not there remember wickedness at all, nor shall anything of uncleanness arise in their heart. In that place there shall be no natural desire, for there they shall be weaned from all appetites. There shall not arise in their heart anger or lasciviousness; also they shall remove from them all things that gender sins. Fervent in their heart will be the love of each other; and hatred will not be fixed within them at all. They shall have no need there to build houses, for they shall abide in light, in the mansions of the saints. They shall have no need of woven raiment, for they shall be clothed in eternal light. They shall have no need of food, for they shall recline at His table and be nurtured for ever. The air of that region is pleasant and glorious, and its light shines out, and is goodly and gladsome. Planted there are beautiful trees, whose fruits fail not, and whose leaves fall not. Their boughs are glorious, their perfume delightful, and of their taste no soul shall grow weary for ever. Spacious is the region, nor is it limited; yet its inhabitants shall see its distance even as that which is near. There the inheritance shall not be divided, and no man shall say to his fellow:--"This is mine and that is thine." They shall not be bound there in the desire of covetousness, nor shall they go astray there concerning remembrance. There a man shall not love his neighbour with especial reverence, but abundantly shall they all love one another after one fashion. They shall not marry wives there, nor shall they beget children; nor shall there the male be distinguished from the female; but all shall be sons of their Father Who is in heaven; as the Prophet said:--Is there not one Father of us all; is there not one God Who created us?(2)

13. And as regards that which I said; that there they shall not take wives, nor is male distinguished from female, our Lord and His Apostles have taught us. For our Lord said:--They that are worthy of that world, and of that resurrection from the abode of the dead, shall not take wives, nor shall (women) become wives to men; for they cannot die; but they are as the angels in heaven, and are the children of God.(3) And the apostle said:--There is neither male nor female, neither band nor free; but ye are all one in Jesus Christ.(4) For, as for Eve, to spread abroad generation, God took her out from Adam, that she might become the mother of all living; but yet in that world there is no female; even as in heaven also there is no female, nor generation, nor use of concupiscence. In that place there is no deficiency, but fulness and perfection. The aged shall not die and the young shall not grow old. And it is in expectation of growing old and dying that young men take wives and beget children, that when the fathers shall have died the children may rise up in their stead. Now all these things have their use only in this world, for in that place there is no want, nor any deficiency, nor concupiscence, nor generation, nor ending, nor failure, nor death, nor termination, nor old age. There is neither hatred, nor wrath, nor envy, nor weariness, nor toil, nor darkness, nor night, nor falsehood. There is not in that place any want at all; but it is full of light, and life, and grace, and fulness, and satisfaction and renewal, and love, and all the good promises that are written but not yet sealed. For there is there that which eye hath not seen and ear hath not heard, and which hath not come up into the heart of man,(5) that which is unspeakable and which a man cannot utter. And the Apostle said:--That which God hath prepared for them that love Him.(6) Though men shall say much, they shall not be able to express it. That which eye hath not seen, they are unable to relate; and that which ear hath not heard, it is not right to speak of in such wise as to compare it with anything that the ear has heard and the eye has seen. And that which has not come up unto the heart, who is there dares to speak of it, as though it was like anything that has come up into the heart? But this is right for a speaker, to liken and call that place the abode of God, and the place of life, the perfect place, the place of light, the place of glory, the Sabbath of God, the day of rest, the repose of the righteous, the joy of the just, the abode and dwelling-place of the righteous and the holy, the place of our hope, the sure abode of our trust, the place of our treasure, the place that shall assuage our weariness and remove our afflictions, and soothe our sighs. To these things it is right for us to liken, and thus to call, that place.

14. Again, Death leads away to himself kings, the founders of cities, who strengthen themselves in splendour. And he does not leave aside the Lords of the countries. Death leads away and takes captive to himself the avaricious who are not satisfied nor say "Enough"; and he is greedy for them with a greater greed than theirs. Death leads away to himself the despoilers who were not by their grace restrained from despoiling their fellows. Death leads away to himself the oppressors, and through death are they restrained from iniquity. Death leads away to himself the persecutors, and the persecuted have rest till they go to him. Death leads away to himself them that swallow up their fellows, and the down-trodden and oppressed have rest for a little until they themselves also are led away and go thither. Death leads away them that abound in meditations, and all they have thought upon is dissolved and brought to nought. Men meditate upon many matters, and death comes upon them suddenly, and they are led away; and thereafter they remember nothing that they have thought upon. There is one that makes plans for many years, and (the knowledge) is withheld from him that he shall not survive to-morrow. Some son of Adam is uplifted and vaunts himself over his fellow; and death comes upon him and brings to nought his vaunting. The rich man plans to add to his possessions, and he knows not that he shall not continue to possess even that which he has acquired. Death leads away to himself all the children of men, and binds them fast in his abode until the judgment. Also over those that have not sinned is he king, because of the sentence of judgment that Adam received for his sins.

15. And the Life-giver shall come, the Destroyer of Death, and shall bring to nought his power, from over the just and from over the wicked. And the dead shall arise with a mighty shout, and Death shall be emptied and stripped of all the captivity. And for judgment shall all the children of Adam be gathered together, and each shall go to the place prepared for him. The risen of the righteous shall go unto life, and the risen of the sinners shall be delivered unto death. The righteous who kept the commandment shall go, and shall not come nigh unto judgment in the day that they shall rise; as David asked, And bring not thy servant into judgment;(1) nor will their Lord terrify them in that day.

16. Remember that the Apostle also said, We shall judge angels.(2) And our Lord said to His disciples, Ye shall sit on twelve thrones, and judge twelve tribes of the house of Israel.(3) And Ezekiel said concerning righteous men,(4) that they shall judge Ahola and Aholibah. Since, then, the righteous are to judge the wicked, He has made clear concerning them that they shall not come into judgment. And as to what the apostles say, that We shall judge angels, hear, and I will instruct thee. The angels who shall be judged by the apostles are the priests who have violated the law; as the Prophet said, The lips of the priest shall guard knowledge, and the law shall they inquire of his mouth; because he is the angel of the Lord, the most mighty.(5) The angels who are the priests, of whose mouth the law is inquired, when they transgress the law, shall be judged at the last by the apostles, and the priests who observe the law.

17. And the wicked shall not arise in the judgment, nor sinners in the congregation of the righteous.(1) And even as the righteous who are perfected in good works shall not come into the judgment to be judged, so of the wicked also whose sins are many, and the measure of whose offences is overflowing, it shall not be required that they should draw nigh unto the judgment, but when they have risen again they shall turn back to Sheol, as David said, The wicked shall turn back to Sheol, and all the nations that forget God.(2) And Isaiah said, All the nations are as a drop from the bucket, and as the turning of the balance. And the isles as a grain of sand shall be cast away, and all the nations are esteemed as nothingness by Him. For destruction and the sword are they esteemed by Him.(3) Therefore learn and be persuaded, that all the nations that know not God their Maker, are esteemed by God as nothingness, and shall not come nigh to judgment, but as soon as they have risen shall turn back to Sheol.

18. But all the rest of the world who are called sinners shall stand in the judgment and be rebuked. Those in whom there is a little shortcoming will the judge rebuke, and make known to them that they have offended. And He will give them the inheritance of life after the judgment. And understand that our Lord has made known to us in His Gospel, that every man according to his work shall receive his reward. He that received money, showed the increase on it. He whose pound or talent produced tenfold, received life, perfect, in nothing lacking. He whose pound or talent produced fivefold, received the half of ten. One was given a tenfold authority and one a fivefold. Now consider and see, that the increase of five is less than that of ten; and the labourers who demand the reward excel them that received it in silence. They who toiled all the day, with bold face receive the reward and demand it, in confidence that He will add more to them. While they who worked one hour receive it in silence, and know that through grace they receive mercy and life. The sinners whose sins are many shall be condemned by the place of judgment, and shall go into torments. And from that time and onwards, judgment shall rule over them.

19. Furthermore, hearken unto the Apostle who said, Every man according to his work shall receive his reward.(4) He that toiled little, shall receive according to his remissness; and he that made much speed, shall be rewarded according to his speed. And Job also said, Far be it from God to do iniquity; and far be it from Him to do sin. For according to a man's works will He reward him, and a man shall receive according to his ways.(5) And also the Apostle said, Star excels star in brightness. So also is the resurrection of the dead.(6) Therefore know that, even when men shall enter into life, yet reward shall excel reward, and glory shall excel glory, and recompense shall excel recompense. Degree is higher than degree; and light is more goodly than light in aspect. The sun excels the moon, and the moon is greater than the stars that are with her. And observe that the moon and the stars are also under the power of the sun, and their light is swallowed up in the splendour of the sun. And the sun has power along with the moon and the stars, that he may not abolish the night which has been separated from the day. And when the sun was created, he was called a luminary. And observe that the sun and the moon and the stars are all called luminaries; but luminary excels luminary. The sun obscures the light of the moon, and the moon likewise darkens the light of the stars; and star excels star in its light.

20. And understand (this) also, from that which is of this world, those who labour with toil, and from the hired men who work with their fellows. There are some who hire their fellow-men by day-wages, and (these) receive the wage of their toil; and there are some who are hired for the month, and compute and receive the wage for the time, at the time agreed. And the day-wage is distinguished from the monthly wage; and yearly exceeds monthly wage.

21. And also again, understand it from the authority that is in this world. There are some who please the king by their activity, and receive honour from those in authority. One receives a crown from the king, to become governor in one of the countries. And under the authority of another, the king places towns; and also he excels his inferiors in his attire. Some receive presents and gifts, and one honour is distinguished from another. There is one to whom the king gives the honour of being steward over all the treasury. Another, according to his lower condition, serves the king, and his authority is only to provide the daily food.

22. Also in respect of penalty, I say that all men are not equal. He that has done great wickedness is greatly tormented. And he that has offended not so much is less tormented. Some shall go into outer darkness, where there is weeping and gnashing of teeth.(1) Others shall be cast into the fire, according as they deserve; for it is not written that they shall gnash their teeth, nor that there is darkness there. Some shall be cast into another place, a place where their warm shall not die, and their fire shall not be quenched, and they shall become an astonishment to all flesh.(2) In the faces of others the door shall be closed and the Judge will say to them:--I know you not.(3) And consider that, as the reward for good deeds is not equal for all men, so it is also for evil deeds. Not in one fashion shall men be judged, but every man according to his works shall receive his requital, because the Judge is clothed in righteousness and regards not the persons of men.

23. And even as I have showed thee concerning the world, how one honour excels another, of those that kings and rulers of this world give to those beneath them; also concerning this I have showed thee, that even as kings have good gifts to give to those honoured by them, so also they have prisons and chains and fetters, which are various kinds of bonds. One man offends the king with a grievous offence, and without inquiry he is delivered over to death. Another offends, yet is not deserving of death; he is put in bonds until he is judged; and is chastised, and the king remits his offence. There is another whom the king has held in regard; and outside the prison house he is kept in freedom, without chains and without bonds. He that is put to death is distinguished from him that is bound; and the punishment of one exceeds that of another, according to the desert of his offence. But come thou to our Redeemer, Who said:--Many are the mansions in My Father's house.(4)

24. My beloved, men who are inferior in understanding, dispute about this that I write to thee, and say:--"What is the place in which the righteous shall receive a good reward; and what is the place in which are torments, in which the wicked shall receive the punishments of their works?" O man that thinkest thus, I will ask thee, and tell thou me, why is death called death, and why is Sheol called Sheol? For it is written that when Korah and his companions made a schism against Moses, the earth opened her mouth and swallowed them up, and they went down alive into Sheol.(5) Therefore that was the mouth of Sheol that was opened in the wilderness. David also said, The wicked shall turn back to Sheol.(6) We say that to Sheol, in which Korah and his companions were swallowed up, thither shall the wicked be turned back. For God has power, if He chooses, to give inheritance of life in heaven, and if it please Him, in the earth. Jesus our Lord said. Blessed are the poor in spirit, for theirs is the kingdom of heaven.(1) And to one of those who were crucified with Him, who believed on him He swore:--Thou shalt be with Me to-day in the garden Eden.(2) And the Apostle said, When the righteous shall rise again, they shall fly upwards to meet our Redeemer.(3) But, however, we say thus: That which our Redeemer said to us is true:--Heaven and earth shall pass away.(4) And the Apostle said, Hope which is seen is not hope.(5) And the Prophet said, The heavens shall pass away as smoke, and the earth as a garment shall wear away; and its inhabitants shall become like it.(6) And Job said concerning those that sleep, Till the heavens wear out, they shall not be aroused, nor shall they wake out of their sleep.(7) From these things be thou persuaded that this earth, in which the children of Adam are sown, and the firmament that is over men, (even) that firmament which is set to divide the upper heavens from the earth and this life, shall pass away, and wear out, and be destroyed. And God will make a new thing for the children of Adam, and they shall inherit inheritances in the Kingdom of Heaven. If He shall give them inheritance in the earth, it shall be called the kingdom of heaven. And if in Heaven, it is easy for Him to do. For with the kings of the earth also, although each one of them abides in his own place, yet every place to which their authority extends, is called their kingdom. So the sun is a luminary set in the heaven, yet for every place to which its rays extend, its authority suffices, whether on sea or on land. And observe that the princes of the world also have banquetings and delights, and in every place or state into which they go, their banquetings are with them; and in whatever place pleases them, they make a prison-house. For the sun in twelve hours circles round, from the east unto the west; and when he has accomplished his course, his light is hidden in the night-time, and the night is not disturbed by his power. And in the hours of the night the sun turns round in his rapid course, and turning round begins to run in his accustomed path. As for the sun that is with thee, thou wise man, from thy childhood till the completion of thy old age, thou knowest not where he runs in the night-time, so as to circle round to the place of its course. Is it necessary for thee to inquire into those things that are hidden from thee?

25. These memorials I have written for our brethren and beloved, the children of the Church of God, that when these come into their hands in various places, and when they read in them, they may also remember my insignificance in their prayers, and may know that I am a sinner also, and fail short; but that this is my faith, that I have set forth from the beginning and written, in these chapters written (by me). Faith is the foundation, and upon faith (rest) the works that become it. And after Faith (I wrote) that there are two commandments of love. And after Love, I have written of Fasting, in its demonstration also along with its works. And after Fasting, I wrote of Prayer in its fruit and in its works. And after Prayer, have written about War and about whatever Daniel wrote concerning the kingdoms. And after War, I have written of the exhortation for Monks. And after the Monks, I have written about Repentance. And after Repentance, I have written about the Resurrection of the dead. And after the Resurrection of the dead, I have written about Humility. And after Humility, I have written of the Pastors, the teachers. And after the Pastors, I have written about the Circumcision in which the people of the Jews pride themselves. And after the Circumcision, I have written about the Passover, and about the fourteenth day. And after the Passover, I have written about the Sabbath, in which the Jews are puffed up. And after the Sabbath, I have written an Exhortation, on account of the dissension which happened in our days. And after the Exhortation, I have written about Meats, those that the jews deem unclean. And after the Meats, I have written about the Gentiles, that they have entered in and become heirs instead of the original people. And after the Gentiles, I have written and proved that God has a Son. And after the Son of God, I have written against the Jews, who speak injuriously about Virginity. And after the apology about Virginity, I have written again Against the Jews, who say:--"It is appointed for us to be gathered together." And after that defence, I have written about Almsgiving to the Poor. And after the Poor, I have written a demonstration about The Persecuted. And after the Persecuted, I have written at the end about Death and the Last Times. These twenty-two discourses have I written according to the twenty-two letters of the alphabet. The first ten I wrote in the six hundred and forty-eighth year of the kingdom of Alexander the son of Philip the Macedonian, as is written in the end of them. And these twelve last I wrote in the six hundred and fifty-fifth year of the kingdom of the Greeks and of the Romans, which is the kingdom of Alexander, and in the thirty-fifth year of the Persian King(1)

26. These things I have written according to what I have attained to. But if anyone shall read these discourses, and find words that do not agree with his thought, he ought not to scorn them; because whatsoever is written in these chapters was not written according to the thought of one man, nor for the persuasion of one reader; but according to the thought of all the Church, and for the persuasion of all faith. If he shall read and hear with persuasion, it is well; and if not, it is meet for me to say that I wrote for those open to persuasion and not for mockers. And if again any reader should find words that are spoken by us in one fashion, and by another sage in another fashion, let him not be disturbed at this; for every man speaks to his hearers according to what he can attain to. So I, who have written these things, even if some of the words do not agree with what other speakers have said, yet say this; that those sages have spoken well, yet it seemed good to me to speak thus. And if any man shall speak and demonstrate to me about any matter, I will receive instruction from him without contention. Everyone who reads the sacred scriptures, both former and latter, in both covenants, and reads with persuasion, will learn and teach. But if he strives about anything that he does not understand, his mind does not receive teaching. But if he finds words that are too difficult for him, and he does not understand their force, let him say thus, "Whatsoever is written is written well, but I have not attained to the understanding of it." And if he shall ask about the matters that are too hard for him of wise and discerning men who inquire into doctrine, then, when ten wise men shall speak to him in ten different ways about one matter, let him accept that which pleases him; and if any please not him, let him not scorn the sages; for the word of God is like a pearl, that has a beautiful appearance on whatever side you turn it. And remember, O disciple, what David said, From all my teachers have I learned.(2) And the Apostle said:--Thou readest every Scripture that is in the Spirit of God. And prove everything; hold fast that which is good; and flee from every evil thing.(3) For if the days of a man should be many as all the days of the world from Adam to the end of the ages, and he should sit and meditate upon the Holy Scriptures, he would not comprehend all the force of the depth of the words. And man cannot rise up to the wisdom of God; as I have written in the tenth discourse. But, however, the words of all speakers who do not take from the great treasure, are accursed and to be despised. For the image of the king (on his coin) is received whet ever it goes; but (the coin) in which there is base metal, is rejected and is not received. And if any one should say, "These discourses were spoken by such an one;" let him carefully learn that to be careful to inquire about the speaker is not commanded him. I also according to my insignificance have written these things, a man sprung from Adam, and fashioned by the hands of God, a disciple of the Holy Scriptures. For our Lord said:--Every one that asketh receiveth, and he that seeketh findeth, and for him that knocketh it shall be opened.(1) And the prophet said:--I will pour out my spirit upon all flesh in the last days, and they shall prophesy.(2) Therefore whoever shall read anything that I have written above, let him read with persuasion, and pray for the author as a brother of the Body; that through the petition of all the Church of God; his sins may be forgiven. And let whoever reads understand what is written:--Let him that hears the word, communicate to him that causes him to hear, in all good things.(3) And again it is written, The sower and the reaper shall rejoice together.(4) And Every man according to his labours shall receive his reward.(5) And There is nothing hidden that shall not be revealed to every man.(6)

The Bohairic Life on Paradise, Hell, and Heavenly Ascents

The Life of Saint Pachomius And His Disciples

Excerpted from 1980 publication "Pachomian Koinonia Vol. One", translated by Armand Veilleux, Monk of Mistassini

Paragraph 73 – Pachomius has a Terrifying Apparition

This is the revelation that our father Pachomius saw in his prayer. Looking toward the east wall of the sanctuary, [he saw the wall] become all golden; and on it there was a large icon, like a large picture [of someone] wearing a crown on [his] head. That crown was glorious in the extreme; all around its sides were multicolored images which resembled precious stones and which are the fruits of the Holy Spirit: faith, goodness, fear, mercy, purity, humility, righteousness, patience, kindness, gentleness, temperance, joy, hope, and perfect charity.' Before the icon were two great and very august archangels, motionless and contemplating the Lord's image that had appeared in the assembly room. While watching that great revelation, our father Pachomius went on praying and imploring [God] in these terms: 'Lord, may your fear descend on us all forever, so that we may not sin against you all our life long.' And he went on repeating that same prayer. Then the angels said to him, 'You cannot endure the fear of the Lord as you request'. He answered, 'Yes, I can, by God's grace.' And at once the ray of fear, after the manner of the sun rising on the entire world, and without leaving its place, moved gradually forward toward him. That shining ray was very green and its sight wonderfully terrifying. When fear touched him, it pinched all his members, his heart, his marrow, and his whole body; and at once he fell to the ground and began to writhe like a living fish. His soul grew very sad and he fainted away toward death. The angels were watching him with part of their faces without in the least averting their eyes from the image of the Lord that was appearing to our father Pachomius. They said to him, 'Did we not tell you that you could not stand the full shock of the Lord?' He cried out, 'Have mercy on me, my Lord Jesus Christ!' At once the ray of fear retreated gradually until it returned to its place. Then the sheen of mercy moved toward him like a rich holy chrism. When mercy reached him he was comforted; he rose at once to his feet and blessed God until the time when the brothers do the synaxis; and he rested a while.

Paragraph 82 – Visions Concerning the Fate of Souls at the Time of Death

Here is the way the angels of light visit the good brothers, as the thing was many times revealed to [Pachomius] by the Lord. If the dying man is good, three angels whose rank corresponds to the measure of the dying man's conduct come to fetch him. If he is of a high rank by his practices, angels who are outstanding are sent to conduct him to God. If on the other hand he is a little one in virtues, angels of lower rank are sent to come for him. God acts thus so that those [angels] who come <to visit> the man may lift him out of his body with proper patience, and lest some high-ranking [angels], being sent to take someone who is of low rank by his practices, should treat him according to the custom of earthly authorities. These [authorities] act with partiality, impressed by the riches and empty glory, and treat those who are despised or poor according to their condition of scorn and poverty.' But the divine powers act in all things in accordance with right judgement, in conformity with the Lord's command and with the merit of the works that have been accomplished.

The three angels sent to fetch a man are in ascending rank, and the one of lower rank always obeys the one whose rank is higher. At the moment when the man is about to breathe his last, one of the angels stands by his head, another by his feet, in the attitude of men who with their hands would anoint him with oil until the soul should leave the body. The third spreads out a large spiritual cloth on which' to receive the soul with honor. As for the soul of the holy man, it is beautiful to see and white as snow. After the soul has emerged from the body onto the cloth, one of the angels seizes the two upper corners of the cloth, the other the two lower ones, after the manner of men on earth lifting a body. The third angel sings in front of the soul in a language no one knows; even the others, namely our father Pachomius and Theodore who were having this apparition, did not understand their singing; they only heard the angel making resound the word Alleluia. And thus they proceeded through the air toward the east with the soul; they did not proceed as men do on foot, but advanced with a gliding movement like flowing water; for they are spirits. They proceeded on high with the soul so it might see the boundaries of the universe from one end to the other, that it might see all creation and glorify God whose creation it was.

After that, they let him know the place in which he will rest by the Lord's order so that, having once entered the place of his rest earned by his good works, he may realize what torments he has escaped and may thus the more bless the Lord for saving him from all those sufferings through the goodness of our Lord Jesus Christ.

Then they bring him to the feet of the man of God who taught him the fear of the Lord and nourished him with his law. He in turn carries him like a gift to the feet of the Lord. Then he blesses the Lord outspokenly saying, 'I will bless you, my Lord, with all your saints.' After that they lead him to the resting place the Lord assigned him according to the measure of the works he accomplished. <At the time the soul is about to be presented to the Lord, >4 it is authorized to come near—or to stay at a distance—in accordance with the merit of the good works it accomplished on earth. For whoever has merited everlasting life doubtless also sings and blesses the Lord before entering the resting place prepared for him by the Lord. <And when they bless the Lord>,5 there are some who see the Lord and bless him, thanks to their purity of heart, saying, Blessed are the pure in heart; they shall see God. For whoever is negligent in his practices has not deserved to see God in the glory of his godhead, because his purity of heart is not perfect. Nevertheless if he deserves simply life, he sees the flesh of the Son of God, that is, his humanity, which is one with his divinity in which it exists inseparably.

According to the merits of each of the dead, the saints come toward those who have done God's good pleasure to meet them solemnly, by the Lord's command. They come toward some of them as far as the door of life and embrace them. They come toward others a distance proportionate to their merits. Others they let come near them before getting up and embracing them. Others have not even enough merit to be embraced by the saints; they merely inherit life in the measure of their littleness. When they come forth to meet them, the just wear crowns brighter than those which the person they come out to meet has won in combats on earth in which he fought against the devil, except the crown of justice which on resurrection day he will receive from God the just judge, as Paul says.' When the soul of the just comes close to the door of life, the Lord puts David's words into his mouth so he may repeat them saying, Open for me the gates of righteousness so I may enter and glorify the Lord. And the angel who keeps the door of life answers saying, This is the gate of the Lord, the righteous ones will enter there. If it is the souls of some who were disciples of perfect men, the angels who accompany them exclaim when they arrive at the door, Open the gates! Let in the people that keep righteousness and that keep justice and peace, for they have hoped in you, Lord, as it is written in Isaiah.'

Our father Pachomius had this great revelation in the monastery of Thmousons on the occasion of the brother catechumen who was secretly baptized before dying. After seeing how the righteous leave the body, he asked further how the soul of the sinner leaves the body; and the angel said to him, 'The Lord will give you entire satisfaction. If it is a soul with an evil way of life, two merciless angels come to fetch it at the time it is to be visited. When the man is at the point of death, when he no longer recognizes anyone, one of the merciless angels is placed near his head, the other at his feet; and thus they begin to thrash him until his wretched soul is on the point of going up. Then they thrust into his mouth a hooked object, a sort of fish-hook, and they yank that wretched soul out of his body; it is dark and shady. Then they tie it to the tail of a spirit-horse — for [the soul] also is a spirit—and thus they take it away and pitch it into torments or else to the bottom of hell, according to its works' deserts.'

'In fact, there are also many good men who pass through these sufferings during their last illness and at the moment of breathing their last. It is because they resemble cooked meat that still needs to be cooked a little longer before being eaten. It is the same with the faithful who are so tried in their latter days before dying as to be free of everything and pure before the Lord. We know likewise that some holy men were made to undergo sufferings at the time of their death, for instance, saint Stephen, all the martyrs, and those who can be likened to them. Job, too, David, and many other holy men sustained great suffering and many tribulations in the course of their lives, some on their deathbed. In fact, many sinners die quietly without having undergone sufferings in this world because of the tribulations and the punishments awaiting them, as it is written, The wicked man is kept for an evil day. That is why, having seen this sort of people, Ecclesiastes said, The same end will come to the righteous and the wicked, the pure and the impure, the good and the bad. Indeed we see our Saviour, the Lord of all, hung on the cross with two thieves, one on the right, one on the left, and the Lord in between.' These things were taught to our father Pachomius at Thmousons. And he was very happy that the brother catechumen had entered into the resting place of the holy men of the Lord. And when that brother had been carried to the mountain and buried beside the brothers, our father went south quickly with Theodore to Phbow, grateful to the Lord for what he had seen.

Paragraph 83 – Vision of a Soul Escorted by Angels into Heaven

Another day, as Theodore was sitting somewhere in the assembly room, he heard in the air angel voices singing a melodious song. He rose at once and went to our father Pachomius, who said, 'It is a righteous soul that has left its body with which they are passing over above us; and we also have had the grace of hearing those who are blessing God in front of it'. While they were speaking together they looked up, they saw the one who had been visited, and they knew who he was.'

The Lord often opened their eyes. And they saw the angel of God at the altar in the sanctuary dispensing to those who were worthy the sacred mysteries by the hand of the priest or the bishop who was dispensing them. And if someone who was unworthy or defiled came forward to receive the sacred mysteries, the angel would withdraw his hand, and it was the celebrant alone who dispensed them to him.'

Paragraph 88 – Vision of the Punishments of Sinners After Death

Still another day, by the Lord's command, our father Pachomius was carried away that he might contemplate the punishments and the torments to which the children of men are subject. Was it in the body that he was carried away, was it out of the body? — God knows that he was carried away.' Having been brought to the north of the paradise of delights, far from this world and from the firmament, he saw rivers, canals, and ditches filled with fire; in them the souls of sinners were being tormented. And while he walked with the angel, contemplating the torments, he saw those above where he was now going suffering much more than those he had seen at the start. They were delivered up to torturing angels of a very frightening aspect and holding fiery whips in their hands. If some of the souls they were tormenting lifted their heads above the fire, they would whip them hard and thrust them farther into the fire. They would sigh desperately without being able to cry out because of their exhaustion and because of the way they were suffering the great number of torments weighing on them. The souls being tormented were very numerous, even innumerable.

He likewise saw wells and cisterns filled with fire which burned more fiercely still. He looked in and saw that there was only one soul in each cistern. That soul's two feet, which had the appearance of the flesh it wore in the world, were set one on each side of the cistern. And fire was consuming, one by one, the members with which it had sullied itself in the world. On looking attentively at one of the cisterns, he recognized the one who was being tormented in it; it was one of those who are marked out in the world, and whom the Scriptures call effeminate.'

He likewise saw monks subjected to punishments in that place, and he questioned the angel who was walking with him, 'What evil have these done to be brought here?' The angel answered, 'Those whom you see are quite pure as regards the body, but they are idlers who go about in places where brothers live as anchorites. They speak evil of the other brothers living near [those they are visiting], knowing that the latter are not on good terms with the former, and thus they think they will find favor on account of their slanders, with a view to getting food and drink. And when they leave these [brothers] and go away elsewhere, in turn they speak ill of those they have been flattering in the ears of those they had just been slandering, again with a view to being well-received by these others. And so for their slanders they have been cast into these hard torments that never cease.'

The torturing angels were quite filled with joy and gladness. They rejoiced as an administrator rejoices to see his master's wealth increasing; for the Lord had created them pitiless, that they might not feel sorrow for the wicked men turned over to them to be tormented. And if the souls they are tormenting beg them to have pity on them, they are full of anger toward them and punish them more with fierce torments. When souls are brought in and turned over to them, they are overjoyed—like one who has made an immense gain — happy over the downfall of the wicked.

As our father Pachomius was looking at the punishments with the angel who accompanied him, one of the torturing angels tugged at him and said joyfully, 'Come, Pachomius, let me show you these other wicked punishments'. Our father Pachomius, seeing himself gaily dragged by him to look at all these punishments, was amazed at the nature of these pitiless angels and at the way they rejoiced over such evil torments. As for him, he was very sad at the sight of the sufferings in which were found the wretched souls of impious men that were being tormented.

When he had gone on a bit he saw an innumerable crowd of souls of all ages being roughly hustled along by the pitiless torturing angels. Once more he asked his accompanying angel who these souls were and he was told, 'These are the souls of sinners who died today throughout the world, and they are being classified for punishment according to their deserts.'

Having gone on once more toward the west with the angel who was accompanying him and showing him the punishments, he saw down below an opening at the gate of hell. Hell itself is very deep; it is dark and sends out heat like a hearth. This place is the Lord's prison. When men are brought in, they are hurled into it; they utter loud cries, 'Woe is me for not knowing the God who created me that I might be saved'. Then they cannot speak at all because of the heat and the thick mist of the place. And they no longer recognize each other because of the darkness and the distress that grips them.

Going further on, toward the southwest, he saw there other harsh punishments, of the sort which he had previously seen to the north and by which the souls were being punished. He was further shown a kind of large house of stone whose length, breadth, and height were enormous. It was full of fire. Into it were thrown all the young people who in this world have sullied their bodies with impurity, unbeknownst to their parents; that is why they are enduring these fierce torments for evil and impure acts which are wicked before God and before men.

It happened that when the angel had finished showing our father Pachomius all the punishments and the sufferings of the torments they entailed by command of the Lord, he counseled him urgently in these terms, 'Pachomius, bear witness to the brothers of all that you have seen, so that they may strive not to fall into such evil punishments. God has sent me to you to show you all this; in turn bear witness of it to the brothers and to the whole world, that they may do penance and be saved.' From that day on when our father Pachomius assembled the brothers for the instruction, he spoke to them first on the Scriptures because they are the main thing and the breath of God; then he would inform them about all the punishments he had seen and about the sufferings they entailed, and concerning which the angel had given him instructions from the Lord, so that they might have the fear of God and might avoid sinning and falling into such punishments and into the tortures which he had seen.

Paragraph 103 – Vision of Pachomius (of Dark and Gloomy Hell symbolizing Apostacy of the World)

Upon another day it happened that the Lord sent our father Pachomius a vision. He looked and saw the aspect of a dark and gloomy hell, in the midst of which stood a pillar. Voices were heard from all sides making an outcry and saying, 'Here is the light, here close to us'. The men in that place were groping their way, for great was the darkness of that gloomy place and very frightening. Then when they would hear 'Here is the light, here close to us', they would run there seeking the light and wanting to see it; but when they ran forward they would hear another voice behind them, 'Here is the light, over here'; and at once they would turn to the rear seeking the light because of the voices they had heard. He saw also in the vision some of those who were in the darkness, as if circling a pillar and thinking they were going forward and drawing near the light, not realizing that they were only turning around a pillar. He looked again and saw in that place the whole community of the Koinonia walking one after the other, holding fast to each other for fear of getting lost by reason of that deep darkness. Those who were in front had a small light like that of a lamp to light their way; only four of the brothers saw that light, while all the rest saw no light whatever. Our father Pachomius watched their way of progressing; if one let go his hold on the man in front of him, he would lose his way in the darkness, along with all those who came after him. He saw one of them, called Paniski and a great man among the brothers, refusing with a few others to walk behind the man in front showing them the way. Then the man of God Pachomius called them each by name in his ecstasy before they should give up, saying, 'Hold to the man in front for fear of going astray!' The small light that went before the brothers continued in front of them until it reached a great opening through which a great light on high was coming;

they climbed up to it. This opening was fitted with a great trap to keep the light from falling below and to keep those who were in the dark from going out by it.

After he had seen this our father Pachomius was likewise instructed on the interpretation of the vision by the one who had shown him all this; 'The image of the hell that you saw is this world; the gloomy darkness that reigns there are all the stupid errors and vain cares. As for the men who are there, they are the souls without knowledge; and the voices crying "here is the light, here close to us", are the heretics—and the schismatics — each of which says, "Ours is the right opinion". The pillars' around which they walk in circles are the authors of error the simple ones trusted in because they said, "We are they who save; they are those who lead astray." The brothers showing the way are all those who love the Lord and walk in the right faith as it is written, For all of you are one in Christ.' He was told besides, 'Those of the brothers who let go their hold stand for bishops who are in the right faith of Christ, but are in communion with the heretics and mislead many of those they teach and especially men who know no malice; they neglect those who behave well and give scandal to many. As it is written, Woe to him through whom scandal comes.'

(The small light guiding the brothers is the Gospel, divine truth; truly he who is deluded by himself and by his passions is not pure, as it is written, Among them God has blinded the hearts of the faithless ones of this age that they might not see the light of the Gospel of Christ who is the image of God.) That is also why that light is small, for in the holy Gospels it is written about the kingdom of heaven, It is like a mustard seed, which is small. As to the flood of light coming in on high through the opening, it is the word spoken by the Apostle, Until we shall all have come to that same notion of faith and to the knowledge of the Son of God; to the perfect man, to the exact measure of the fullness of Christ Jesus.'

Paragraph 114 – Pachomius' Trip to Heaven

It happened once that he fell sick and he suffered so much that those sent out to fetch him snatched his soul away and he died. Then he was brought to the other age. But as he was approaching the gate of life, an order came from God to bring him back to his body once more. He was sad when he learned this, because he did not want to come back to his body again. Indeed he saw that the light of that air was wonderful and of such beauty as to be indescribable because of its splendor. As he was sad, a man who stood at the door to guard it turned toward him to look at him. The face of that man shone like a great painting because of its splendor, and the appearance of his body was all light. That man said to him, 'Go, my son, return to your body, for you still have to suffer a small martyrdom in the world'. When he heard this word he was very happy, for he greatly desired to be a martyr for the Lord's name. The angels who rejoiced with him informed him that, 'This man who is speaking to you is the apostle Paul'.

As soon as they brought him to the place where his body was, the soul considered its body; and behold, it was dead. It happened that when the soul approached the body, all the members of the body secretly opened up; the soul took its place again and the body became alive. While [Pachomius'] soul had been carried away, the brother who was with him slept.

After this, he was carried away to Paradise many other times. In what manner? God knows; as the Apostle says, Either in the body, I do not know; or without the body, I do not know, it is God who knows; and so it is that that one was caught up to the third heaven and he heard secret words which man' is not allowed to repeat. So also our father Pachomius was carried away to that place, and he saw the cities of the saints, of which it is not possible to describe the constructions, the monuments, and the good things that the Lord has prepared for those who love him.' When he saw those cities, he remembered what the Lord says in a parable in the Gospel, speaking to the servants whose talents had produced ten and five talents, Enter into your master's happiness,<sup>3</sup> and again, He said to one, 'Be in charge of ten cities'; and to the other, 'Be in charge of five.'

The climate of that age is very even and its surface without limits. The fruit trees and the vineyards produce a spiritual food and are incorruptible, so that the fruits of the trees of this age are like unworthy and contemptible things compared to their variety. No tree or plant growing in paradise is ever deprived of fruits profusely giving out great fragrance. A man cannot bear that fragrance without passing out, unless the Lord gives him the grace. That age is above this earth and outside the firmament. That land is far above the mountains. The lights that are in the firmament and lighten the earth are not those that lighten that age, but it is the Lord that lightens it, as Isaiah says, It will not be the light of the sun that will lighten us during the day, neither the shining of the moon that will lighten us by night, but the Lord will be our everlasting light. There is no day or night in that age, but it is lightened by an abundant and unceasing light. So great are its boundaries that this world is nothing in comparison. A little outside the paradise there are many fruit trees and vineyards totally like those of this world.

Paragraph 123 – Pachomius' Death (Vision of Angels Ranked Above Each Other)

When he had said these things, he fell unconscious for a little while and did not say anything more to any of them. Then he made the sign of the cross with his hand three times. Suddenly he opened his mouth and gave up his spirit, on the fourteenth of the month of Pasons at the tenth hour of the day.' Such great fear [overcame them] at that moment that the place trembled three times. And many of the ancients who often had visions said, 'We saw throngs of angels ranked above each other contemplating him. They preceded him singing very joyfully till he was received into his resting place.'

Paradise Has Four Levels: Summit, Heights, Slopes, & Lower Parts; Inhabitants Of These Regions Are Correspondingly: God, Victorious, Righteous, & Repentant Hymns on Paradise (Excerpts)

Presentation on St. Phillips Seminary site:

http://www.st-philip.net/presentations/paradise\_hymns.pdf

One finds examples of types as "things revealed" when St. Ephrem discusses the topography of the Garden.

He describes Paradise as a mountain divided into distinct regions, each with their own inhabitants.

The summit is the abode for the "glory of God's presence," shkintha. The heights are reserved for the victorious, naçikhe, the middle region for the righteous, zadiqe, and the lowest parts for the repentant, tayabe. According to one's spiritual labors one is allowed to proceed up the Paradisiacal mountain, being halted at the level of which "he is worthy," dshawe leh. Nobody is excluded since there are enough levels for all.

Hence Paradise has four levels: the summit, the heights, the slopes, and the lower parts. The inhabitants of these regions are correspondingly: God, the victorious, the righteous, and the repentant.

One set of "types of Paradise," here, tuphsaw dpardaisa, deals with Noah and the Ark. The animals lived in the lowest part, to the birds was allotted the middle part, while Noah, like the deity, lived in the upper deck.

Mount Sinai provides yet more types. The people were below, the priests round about the mountain, Aaron midway up, and Moses at the heights, while "the Glorious One," mshabhkha, was at the summit.

In these types Paradise, the harbor of all riches, is portrayed, whereby also the Church is portrayed. Thus one finds here several types of Paradise which in turn is a type of the Church.

When He made this intricate design
He varied its beauties,

so that some levels were far more glorious than others,
To the degree that one level is higher than another, so too is its glory
the more sublime.

In this way He allots
the foothills to the most lowly, the slopes to those in between and the heights to the exalted.

When the just ascend its various levels they receive their inheritance, with justice He raises up each one to the degree that accords with his labors;
each is stopped at the level whereof he is worthy,
there being sufficient levels in Paradise for everyone;
the lowest parts for the repentant,
the middle for the righteous,
the heights for those victorious,
while the summit is reserved for God's presence.

Noah made the animals live in the lowest part of the Ark; in the middle part
he lodged the birds, while Noah himself, like the Deity, resided on the upper deck.

On Mount Sinai it was the people who dwelt below,
the priests round about it,
and Aaron halfway up,
while Moses was on its heights, and the Glorious One on the Summit.

A symbol of the divisions in that Garden of Life did Moses trace out in the Ark and on Mount Sinai too;
he depicted for us the types of Paradise with all its arrangements:
harmonious, fair and desirable in all things -- in its height, its beauty, is the harbor of all riches, whereby the Church is depicted. (Hymns on Paradise. 2:10-14)

In this example, the Ark and Sinai are types of the eschatological Paradise. Even the human body, phagra, soul, naphsha, and intellectual spirit, tar'itha (literally "intellect"), are types of Paradise. In any of these types, one receives a partial revelation of the levels of Paradise. Nonetheless, all the types in the world will never depict anything but a partial manifestation of Paradisiacal glory. For a fuller experience thereof, one must await the eschaton. In the meantime, human knowledge of Paradise will be partial and thus subjective, albeit genuine.

For Among The Glories Of The Saints Are "Many Mansions" In The Father's House; That Is Differences Of Dignities

On the Holy Spirit

Paragraph 40

Moreover by any one who carefully uses his reason it will be found that even at the moment of the expected appearance of the Lord from heaven the Holy Spirit will not, as some suppose, have no functions to discharge: on the contrary, even in the day of His revelation, in which the blessed and only potentate will judge the world in righteousness, the Holy Spirit will be present with Him. For who is so ignorant of the good things prepared by God for them that are worthy, as not to know that the crown of the righteous is the grace of the Spirit, bestowed in more abundant and perfect measure in that day, when spiritual glory shall be distributed to each in proportion as he shall have nobly played the man? For among the glories of the saints are "many mansions" in the Father's house; that is differences of dignities. For as "star differeth from star in glory, so also is the resurrection of the dead." They, then, that were sealed by the Spirit unto the day of redemption, and preserve pure and undiminished the first fruits which they received of the Spirit, are they that shall hear the words "well done thou good and faithful servant; thou hast been faithful over a few things, I will make thee ruler over many things." In like manner they which have grieved the Holy Spirit by the wickedness of their ways, or have not wrought for Him that gave to them, shall be deprived of what they have received, their grace being transferred to others; or, according to one of the evangelists, they shall even be wholly cut asunder, — the cutting asunder meaning complete separation from the Spirit.

VIII. And yet, O talkative Dialectician, I will ask you one small question, Job 38:3 and answer thou me, as He says to Job, Who through whirlwind and cloud gives Divine admonitions. Job 38:1 Are there many mansions in God's House, as you have heard, or only one? Of course you will admit that there are many, and not only one. Now, are they all to be filled, or only some, and others not; so that some will be left empty, and will have been prepared to no purpose? Of course all will be filled, for nothing can be in vain which has been done by God. And can you tell me what you will consider this Mansion to be? Is it the rest and glory which is in store There for the Blessed, or something else?— No, not anything else. Since then we are agreed upon this point, let us further examine another also. Is there any thing that procures these Mansions, as I think there is; or is there nothing?— Certainly there is— What is it? Is it not that there are various modes of conduct, and various purposes, one leading one way, another another way, according to the proportion of faith, and these we call Ways? Must we, then, travel all, or some of these Ways...the same individual along them all, if that be possible; or, if not, along as many as may be; or else along some of them? And even if this may not be, it would still be a great thing, at least as it appears to me, to travel excellently along even one.— "You are right in your conception."— What then when you hear there is but One way, and that a narrow one, Matthew 7:14 does the word seem to you to show? That there is but one on account of its excellence. For it is but one, even though it be split into many parts. And narrow because of its difficulties, and because it is trodden by few in comparison with the multitude of the adversaries, and of those who travel along the road of wickedness. "So I think too." Well, then, my good friend, since this is so, why do you, as though condemning our doctrine for a certain poverty, rush headlong down that one which leads through what you call arguments and speculations, but I frivolities and quackeries? Let Paul reprove you with those bitter reproaches, in which, after his list of the Gifts of Grace, he says, Are all Apostles? Are all Prophets? Etc. 1 Corinthians 12:29

Two Exhortations to Theodore After His Fall

But I do not wish you to be any of these, nor to be brought out of despair to confession, but with a good expectation, after cutting away the whole root of despair, to manifest zeal in the contrary direction. And what is the root and mother of this despair? It is indolence; or rather one would not call it the root only, but also the nurse and mother. For as in the case of wool decay breeds moths, and is in turn increased by them; so here also indolence breeds despair, and is itself nourished in turn by despair; and thus supplying each other with this accursed exchange, they acquire no small additional power. If any one then cuts one of these off, and hews it in pieces, he will easily be able to get the better of the remaining one. For on the one hand he who is not indolent will never fall into despair, and on the other he who is supported by good hopes, and does not despair of himself, will not be able to fall into indolence. Pray then, wrench this pair asunder, and break the yoke in pieces, by which I mean a variable and yet depressing habit of thought; for that which holds these two things together is not uniform, but manifold in shame and character. And what is this? It happens that one who has repented has done many great and good deeds, but meanwhile he has committed some sin equivalent to those good deeds, and this especially is sufficient to plunge him into despair, as if the buildings which had been set up were all pulled down, and all the labor which he had bestowed upon them had been vain and come to naught. But this must be taken into account, and such reasoning must be repelled, because, if we do not store up in good time a measure of good deeds equivalent to the sins which are committed after them, nothing can hinder us from sinking grievously and completely. But as it is, (right action ) like some stout breastplate does not suffer the sharp and bitter dart to accomplish its work, but even if it is itself cut through, it averts much danger from the body. For he who departs to the other world with many deeds both good and bad, will have some alleviation in respect of the punishment and the torment there; but if a man is destitute of these good works, and takes only the evil with him, it is impossible to say what great sufferings he will undergo, when he is conducted to everlasting punishment. For a balance will be struck there between the evil deeds and those which are not such; and should the latter weigh down the scale they will to no small extent have saved the doer of them, and the injury arising from the doing of evil deeds is not so strong as to drag the man down from the foremost place; but if the evil deeds exceed, they carry him off into hell fire, because the number of his good actions is not so great as to be able to make a stand against this violent impulse. And these things are not merely suggested by our own reasoning, but declared also by the divine oracles; for He Himself says, He shall reward every man according to his works. Romans 2:6 And not only in hell, but also in the kingdom one will find many differences; for He says in my Fathers house are many mansions; John 14:2 and, there is one glory of the sun, and another glory of the moon. 1 Corinthians 15:41

And what wonder, if in dealing with such great matters he has spoken with such precision, seeing that He declares there is a difference in that world even between one star and another?

Knowing then all these things let us never desist from doing good deeds, nor grow weary, nor, if we should be unable to reach the rank of the sun or of the moon, let us despise that of the stars. For if only we display thus much virtue at least, we shall be able to have a place in Heaven. And though we may not have become gold, or precious stone, yet if we only occupy the rank of silver we shall abide in the foundation; only let us not fall back again into that material which the fire readily devours, nor, when we are unable to accomplish great things, desist also from small ones, for this is the part of extreme folly, which I trust we may not experience. For just as material wealth increases if the lovers of it do not despise even the smallest gains, so is it also with the spiritual. For it is a strange thing that the judge should not overlook the reward of even a cup of cold water, but that we, if our achievements are not altogether great, should neglect the performance of little things. For he who does not despise the lesser things, will exercise much zeal concerning the greatest; but he who overlooks the former will also abstain from the latter; and to prevent this taking place Christ has defined great rewards even for these small things. For what is easier than to visit the sick? Yet even this He requites with a great recompense. Lay hold then on eternal life, delight in the Lord, and supplicate Him; take up again the easy yoke, bow yourself beneath the light burden, put a finish to your life worthy of the beginning; do not suffer so great a stream of wealth to slip past you. For if you should continue provoking God by your deeds, you will destroy yourself; but if before much damage has been done, and all your husbandry has been overwhelmed with a flood, you will dam up the channels of wickedness, you will be able to recover again what has been spoiled and to add to it not a little further produce. Having considered all these things, shake off the dust, get up from the ground, and you will be formidable to the adversary; for he himself indeed has overthrown you, as if you would never rise again; but if he sees you again lifting up your hands against him, he will receive such an unexpected blow that he will be less forward in trying to upset you again, and you yourself will be more secure against receiving any wound of that kind in future. For if the calamities of others are sufficient to instruct us, much more those which we have ourselves undergone. And this is what I expect speedily to see in the case of your own dear self, and that by the grace of God you are again become more radiant than before, and displaying such great virtue, as even to be a protector of others in the world above. Only do not despair, do not fall back; for I will not cease repeating this in every form of speech, and wherever I see you, as well as by the lips of others; and if you listen to this you will no longer need other remedies.

15:40. "There are also celestial bodies, and bodies terrestrial; but the glory of the celestial is one, and the glory of the terrestrial is another."

15:41. "There is one glory of the sun, and another glory of the moon, and another glory of the stars: for one star differs from another star in glory."

And what means he by these expressions? Wherefore from the resurrection of the body did he throw himself into the discourse of the stars and the sun? He did not throw himself out, neither did he break off from his purpose; far from it: but he still keeps to it. For whereas he had established the doctrine concerning the resurrection, he intimates in what follows that great will be then the difference of glory, though there be but one resurrection. And for the present he divides the whole into two: into "bodies celestial," and "bodies terrestrial." For that the bodies are raised again, he signified by the corn: but that they are not all in the same glory, he signifies by this. For as the disbelief of the resurrection makes men supine, so again it makes them indolent to think that all are vouchsafed the same reward. Wherefore he corrects both. And the one in the preceding verses he had completed; but this he begins now. And having made two ranks, of the righteous and of sinners, these same two he subdivides again into many parts, signifying that neither righteous nor sinners shall obtain the same; neither righteous men, all of them, alike with other righteous, nor sinners with other sinners.

Now he makes, you see, first, one separation between righteous and sinners, where he says, "bodies celestial, and bodies terrestrial:" by the "terrestrial" intimating the latter, and by the "celestial," the former. Then farther he introduces a difference of sinners from sinners, saying, "All flesh is not the same flesh, but there is one flesh of fishes, another of birds, and another of beasts." And yet all are bodies; but some are in more, and some in lesser vileness; and that in their manner of living too, and in their very constitution.

And having said this, he ascends again to the heaven, saying, "There is one glory of the sun, and another glory of the moon." For as in the earthly bodies there is a difference, so also in the heavenly; and that difference no ordinary one, but reaching even to the uttermost: there being not only a difference between sun and moon, and stars, but also between stars and stars. For what though they be all in the heaven? yet some have a larger, others a less share of glory. What do we learn from hence? That although they be all in God's kingdom, all shall not enjoy the same reward; and though all sinners be in hell, all shall not endure the same punishment. Wherefore he added,

15:42. "So also is the resurrection of the dead."

(Moses on Mount Sinai Receiving the Law)

For Moses, when he climbed the mountain, fasted for forty days. He went up as a mere man; he descended carrying God with him. And look, we see this verified in us. After the space of a few days, unless our bodies are sustained by nourishment, they would die. But Moses, after fasting forty days, descended even stronger than all of the others. For he was nourished by God, and his body was sustained by another, heavenly food. Indeed, the Word of God was his food, and he had a glory shining on his countenance. All this, which happened to him, was a figure of something else. For that glory now shines splendidly from within the hearts of Christians. At the resurrection their bodies, as they rise, will be covered with another vesture, one that is divine, and they will be nourished with a heavenly food. (Homily 12 Par.14)

(Ezekiel during his Vision)

When Ezekiel the prophet beheld the divinely glorious vision, he described it in human terms but in a way full of mysteries that completely surpass the powers of the human mind ... And all of this which the prophet saw in ecstasy or in a trance was indeed true and certain, but it was only signifying and foreshadowing something no less hidden, something divine and mysterious, a mystery hidden for generations (Col 1:26) but that has been revealed only in our time, the end of the ages, (1 Pt 1:20) when Christ appeared. For the prophet was viewing the mystery of the human soul that would receive its Lord and would become his throne of glory. For the soul that is deemed to be judged worthy to participate in the light of the Holy Spirit by becoming his throne and habitation, and is covered with the beauty of ineffable glory of the Spirit, becomes all light, all face, all eye. (Homily 1 par. 1-2)

(Christ during His Transfiguration)

As the body of the Lord was glorified when he climbed the mount and was transfigured into the divine glory and into infinite light, so also the bodies of the saints are glorified and shine like lightning.[lviii] Just as the interior glory of Christ covered his body and shone completely, in the same way also in the saints the interior power of Christ in them in the day will be poured out exteriorly upon their bodies ... as many lamps are lighted from the one, same fire, so also it is necessary that the bodies of the saints, which are members of Christ, become the same which Christ himself is. (Homily 15 par. 38)

Homily 5

The Great Difference Between Christians and men of this world; for the latter, imbued with the spirit of this world, are in heart and mind held captive by earthly shackles; Christians, however, are possessed by a love for their Heavenly Father. They keep Him alone before their eyes in all their desires.

For this reason, Christians who are genuine Christians are optimistic and are glad to leave the body because they have that house not made by hands, which house is the power of the Holy Spirit dwelling in them. Therefore, even if the house of the body is destroyed, they do not fear, 'for they have the heavenly house of the Spirit and the incorruptible glory, which glory in the day of the resurrection will build up and glorify the house of the body, as the Apostle says: "He that raised Christ from the dead shall raise up also your mortal bodies through his Spirit that vivify us. It says: "If so be that being clothed we shall not be found naked" (2 Cor 5:3), and "He shall bring to life our mortal bodies by his Spirit that dwells in us" (Rom 8:11).

For blessed Moses provided us with a certain type through the glory of the Spirit which covered his countenance upon which no one could look with steadfast gaze. This type anticipates how in the resurrection of the just the bodies of the saints will be glorified with a glory which even now the souls of the saintly and faithful people are deemed worthy to possess within, in the indwelling of the inner man. It is written: "For we all with open face [that is to say, in the inward man], reflecting as in a mirror the glory of the Lord, are changed into the same image from glory to glory" (2 Cor 3:18). Likewise: "Moses for forty days and forty nights did not eat bread or drink water" (Ex 23:28). It is not possible that a natural body can live without bread so long, unless he partook of some other spiritual bread. This bread even now the saints invisibly partake by the power of the Holy Spirit.

11. In a double way, therefore, the blessed Moses shows us what glory true Christians will receive in the resurrection: namely, the glory of light and the spiritual delights of the Spirit which even now they are deemed worthy to possess interiorly. Because of this, these gifts of the Spirit will redound also in their bodies then. The saints even now possess this glory in their souls, as said above, but it will then cover and clothe their naked bodies. It will sweep them up into Heaven and we will at last come to rest, both body and soul, with the Lord forever.

When God created Adam, he did not furnish him with material wings as birds have, but he prepared for him the wings of the Holy Spirit. The same he plans on giving him at the resurrection, to lift him and direct him wherever the Spirit wishes. These wings the saints already now are deemed worthy to possess to fly up mentally to the realm of heavenly thoughts."

For Christians live in another world, eat from another table, are clothed differently, prefer different enjoyment, different dialogue, and a different mentality. Because of this they exceed all other men. This power already they are considered worthy to enjoy in their souls through the Holy Spirit. Therefore, also in the resurrection their bodies • will be worthy to receive those eternal blessings of the Holy Spirit. They will be permeated with that glory which their souls in this life have already experienced.

12. Therefore, each one of us should strive and make every effort to pursue diligently all virtues. We ought to believe and seek from the Lord that the inner man receive even now this glory and that we may participate in the holiness of the Spirit so that, purged from all sordid traces of evil, we may receive also in the resurrection what will clothe our bodies as they rise naked, what will cover over any deformity, will vivify and transform them in the heavenly kingdom forever.

Christ will descend from Heaven and raise up all generations of Adam that have fallen asleep from the beginning of time, as Holy Scripture proves. And he will divide all into two parts. Those who bear his particular sign, that is, the sign of the Spirit, he will call to himself as his very own and place them at his right hand. He says: "My sheep hear my voice and I know mine own and I am known by mine" (in 10:27, 14). Then shall their bodies be surrounded with the divine glory because of their good works. They themselves will be filled with the glory of the Spirit which in this life they enjoyed in their souls. And thus, illumined by the divine light and caught up into Heaven "to meet the Lord in the air (as is written), we shall be always with the Lord" (1 Thes 4:17), reigning with him forever and ever. Amen.

Homily 8

Concerning those things which occur when Christians pray; on the degrees of perfection that is, whether Christians are able to reach the highest degree of perfection

6. Question: Tell us, in what degree of perfection are you

Answer: After I received the experience of the sign of the cross, grace now acts in this manner. It quiets all my parts and my heart so that the soul with the greatest joy seems to be a guileless child. No longer am I a man that condemns Greek or Jew or sinner or worldling. Truly, the interior man looks on all human beings with pure eyes and finds joy in the whole world. He really wishes to reverence and love all Greeks and Jews.

At certain times he, like the son of a king, places all his trust in the Son of God as in his father. Doors are opened to him and he enters inside into "many mansions", (Jn 14:2). And the further he enters, again new doors open in a progression. From a hundred mansions he enters into another hundred. He becomes rich and yet ever richer. Other new and amazing wonders are disclosed to him. Things are entrusted to him as a son and an heir which can never be explained by human nature or expressed in syllables by mouth or tongue. Glory to God. Amen.

Homily 15

This homily teaches through many ways how a soul ought conduct herself in holiness, chastity, and purity, towards her spouse, Jesus Christ, the Savior of the world. It touches also on certain questions, namely, whether in the resurrection all the members are raised up and other questions on evil, grace, free will, and the dignity of human nature.

45. Just as in the visible world we see that kings are not served by peasants who watch sheep, but by well-groomed and well-instructed persons, so also in the heavenly palace, those who serve the heavenly King are those who are free of all fault and reproach and are pure of heart. As in the palace, the attractive maidens without blemish and reproach, namely, the most beautiful, are called to participate in the company of the king, so also in the spiritual palace, it is those who possess all manner of good virtues that enter into fellowship with the heavenly King.

Homily 20

Only Christ, the true physician of the interior man, can heal the soul and adorn it with the garment of His grace.

3. If anyone stands solely on his own righteousness and redemption, he labors in vain and to no purpose. For every fancy of one's own justification will appear on the last day as a filthy rag, as the Prophet Isaiah says: "All our justification has been as a filthy rag" (Is 64:6). Let us, then, beg and implore God to clothe us with "the garment of salvation" (Is 61:10), namely, our Lord Jesus Christ, the ineffable Light, which those who have borne it will never put off for all eternity. But in the resurrection their bodies also will be glorified by the glory of the Light with which the faithful and noble persons are even now clothed, as the Apostle says: "He that raised up Christ from the dead will also raise up our mortal bodies by his Spirit that dwells in us" (Rom 8:11). Glory to his ineffable compassion and his ineffable mercy.

Homily 32

The glory of the Christians, even now, dwells within their souls and will at the time of the resurrection be manifested and will glorify their bodies in proportion to their piety.

1. The languages of this world are different. For each nation has its own language. But Christians learn now only one language and all are taught one wisdom of God, a wisdom not of this world nor of this passing age. And as Christians walk in this creation, they discover newer, heavenly insights and glories and mysteries, receiving them from what things hit their senses.

There are genera of domesticated animals, such as the horse and ox. Each of them has its own proper body and voice. This is the same for wild animals. The lion has its own body and voice; likewise the deer. And among the reptiles there is also a great variety, as also among the birds there are many types of bodies. The body and voice of the eagle are of one kind, that of a hawk of another.

There are the same differences in the sea. There are many bodies that are not like to each other. And in the earth there are many seeds, but each seed has its own fruit. There are many trees; but some trees are bigger, some are smaller. And the harvests of fruit show forth a great variety. For each type of tree has its own flavor. And there are herbs and great differences exist among them. Some are useful for healing, others only for their fragrance. But each tree produces from within a cover which appears visibly: leaves and flowers and fruit. Likewise also the seeds bring forth from within the covering visible to the eye. And the lilies themselves produce from within their covering and adorn the earth.

2. So also those Christians who have been deemed worthy in this life to possess the heavenly raiment carry that raiment dwelling within their souls. And when it will be preordained by God to dissolve this creation and for heaven and earth to pass away, then the heavenly raiment that clothed and glorified their soul in this present life and which they possessed in their heart, that raiment also will adorn their naked bodies which will rise from the tombs, the bodies that will awake in that day. This invisible and heavenly gift and raiment even in this life Christians receive.

Homily 34

Concerning the glory of the Christians which their bodies in the resurrection will be deemed worthy to receive and how the bodies will be made radiant along with the soul

1. Just as the bodily eyes see all things distinctly, so also to the souls of the saints the beauties of the Godhead are manifested and seen. Christians are absorbed in contemplating them and they ponder over them. But to bodily eyes that glory is hidden, while to the believing soul it is distinctly revealed. This is the dead soul the Lord raises to life out of sin, just as he also raises up dead bodies as he prepares for the soul a new heaven and a new earth (RI: 21:1; Is 65:127) and a sun of righteousness, giving the soul all things out of his Godhead.

There is a true world and a living earth and a fruit-bearing vine and a bread of life and a living water, as it is written: "I believe to see the good things of the Lord in the land of the living" (Ps 27:13). And again: "Unto them that fear the Lord the Sun of righteousness shall arise with healing in his wings" (Mt 4:2). And the Lord said: "I am the true vine" ( Jn 15:1). And again: "I am the bread of life" (Jn 6:35). And again: "Whoever drinks of the water that I shall give him, there shall be in him a fountain of water springing up into life everlasting" ( Jn 4:14).

2. For the coming of the Lord was completely for man, who lay dead in the tomb of darkness, sin, of the unclean spirit and of evil powers, so that in this world now he might raise up man and give him life and purify him from all blackness and enlighten him with his very own light and cover him with his own raiment, the heavenly raiment of his Godhead. But in the resurrection of those bodies whose souls were earlier raised up and glorified, the bodies also will be glorified with the soul and illumined by the soul which in this present life has been illumined and glorified. For the Lord is their home and their tabernacle and their city. They are clothed with a dwelling place from I leaven "not made with hands" (2 Cor 5:1), the glory of the divine light, as having become children of light.

3. So in many forms and many different divine glories they gaze upon each other and each is astonished and rejoices "with unspeakable joy" (1 Pt 1:8). You see how the glories of God are unspeakable and incomprehensible, of ineffable light and eternal mysteries and of innumerable good things. For example, in the visible things around us, it is impossible for anyone to comprehend the number of plants of the earth or of seeds or of various flowers.

And it is also impossible for anyone to measure all the richness of the earth. Or in the sea, it is impossible for any man to understand the living creatures in it or their number or their kinds or their variety or the measure of the sea's water or the measure of its extent. Or in the air, it is impossible to know the number of birds or their kinds or their variety. Or it is impossible to comprehend the greatness of the heaven or the positions of the stars or their course.

So likewise it is impossible to speak or describe the richness of Christians which is immeasurable, infinite, and incomprehensible. For if such creatures as these are so infinite and incomprehensible to men, how much more he that created and furnished them! Therefore, one ought rather to rejoice and be glad because such richness and inheritance has been stored up for Christians, so that no one can speak of it nor explain it adequately. With all diligence and humility, then, we must go forth to the struggle of Christians and to receive that richness. For the inheritance and share of Christians is God himself. It says: "The Lord himself is the portion of my inheritance and of my cup" (Ps 16:5). Glory to him, who gives himself and shares his own holy nature with the souls of Christians, forever. Amen.

Homily 36

The double resurrection of souls and bodies and of the differing glory bestowed upon the risen.

1. The resurrection of the souls of the dead takes place even now in time of death. But the resurrection of bodies will take place in that day. Just as in the heavens the stars are fixed, but all are not equal, one differing from the other (1 Cor 15:41) in brightness and magnitude, so also in spiritual matters there are degrees of progress according "to the measure of faith, in the Spirit himself" (Rom 12:3; 1 Cor 12:9), one being richer than another. And Scripture says, "He that speaks in a tongue, speaks by the Spirit of God" (1 Cor 14:2). Such a person is a spiritual man, speaking to God. But he who prophesizes, "builds up the Church" (1 Cor 14:2). Such a one possesses a greater degree of grace. For the first one edifies himself alone, the other also the neighbor. This is like the grain of wheat sown in the earth. The same grain out of the same earth brings forth many and differing grains. And again from the sheaves, some are larger while some are smaller, but all are brought together to one threshing floor, to one barn. And even though they are different, one bread is made from them.

2. Or as in a city there are crowds of people and some are infants, some are adults or some adolescents, and yet all drink water from one fountain and eat from one bread, all enjoy the same air. Or in the case of lamps, one may have two wicks and one have seven. But where there is a more abundance of light, there the illumination is greater. As many as are in fire and light, such cannot be also in darkness. But there is a great difference. It is like the case of a certain father who has two sons, one a child, the other a youth. He sends the older one abroad to cities and foreign countries. But the child he always guards since he is incapable of doing anything. Glory to God. Amen.

The Great Letter

God Wills to Save All

Let them not be servants of the bodies and souls of others, but as servants of Christ and of us, let their work appear pure and sincere before God. Let no one believe that by zeal for good works he cannot do the things which will bring salvation to his soul. For God does not enjoin the impossible upon his servants, but he shows abundant and great love and divine goodness, so that of his own good will he rewards each one by giving him some good work to do. Therefore, no one who seriously seeks salvation will lack power to do good. The Lord says: "Whoever will give even a cup of cold water to someone simply in the name of a disciple, amen, I say to you, that he will not go unrewarded" (Mt 10:42).

What can be more powerful than this commandment? Heavenly reward follows upon a cup of cold water. And look at the immense love for mankind! He says: "As long as you did it to one of these, you did it to me" (Mt 25:40). Indeed it is a small commandment, but when obeyed it brings forth from God a great and abundant gain.

A Will Toward God

Indeed, he demands nothing beyond our powers. But whether you do something small or great, your reward depends on your will. If in the name and in reverence for God you do anything, a splendid and unbelievable gift is bestowed upon you. But if you do good out of the motive of ostentation and for the praise of men, listen to the Lord himself categorically stating: "Truly I say to you, they have received their reward" (Mt 6:2). In order that we may not act in this way, he commands his disciples and through them us: "Be on your guard. Do not display your deeds of mercy or prayer or fasting before men. Otherwise you will not have a reward before your Father in Heaven" (Mt 6:1). So the Lord orders us to run away from the perishable praises of perishable men, to flee the withering glory, but truly to seek only that glory whose beauty neither can be described nor has any end. By it we ourselves will be able to become participators of those ineffable mysteries in Christ Jesus, our Lord, to whose glory be forever and ever. Amen.

Apocalypse of Paul

Here beginneth the Vision of Saint Paul the Apostle

But I will come to visions and revelations of the Lord. I knew a man in Christ fourteen years ago, whether in the body I know not or whether out of the body I know not -God knoweth- that such an one was caught up unto the third heaven: and I knew such a man, whether in the body or out of the body I know not -God knoweth- that he was caught up into paradise and heard secret words which it is not lawful for men to utter. For such an one will I boast, but for myself I will boast nothing, save of mine infirmities.

1 At what time was it made manifest? In the consulate of Theodosius Augustus the younger and Cynegius, a certain honourable man then dwelling at Tarsus, in the house which had been the house of Saint Paul, an angel appeared unto him by night and gave him a revelation, saying that he should break up the foundation of the house and publish that which he found; but he thought this to be a lying vision.

2 But a third time the angel came, and scourged him and compelled him to break up the foundation. And he dug, and found a box of marble inscribed upon the sides: therein was the revelation of Saint Paul, and his shoes wherein he walked when he taught the word of God. But he feared to open that box, and brought it to the judge; and the judge took it, sealed as it was with lead, and sent it to the emperor Theodosius fearing that it might be somewhat strange; and the emperor when he received it, opened it and found the revelation of Saint Paul. A copy thereof he sent to Jerusalem and the original he kept with him. (Gr. reverses this: he kept the copy and sent away the original. It adds: And there was written therein as followeth.)

3 Now while I was in the body, wherein I was caught up unto the third heaven, the word of the Lord came unto me, saying: Speak unto this people: How long will ye transgress, and add sin upon sin, and tempt the Lord that made you? Saying that ye are Abraham's children but doing the works of Satan (so Gr.; Lat. Ye are the sons of God, doing the work of the devil), walking in the confidence of God, boasting in your name only, but being poor because of the matter of sin. Remember therefore and know that the whole creation is subject unto God, but mankind only sinneth. It hath dominion over the whole creation, and sinneth more than the whole of nature.

4 For oftentimes hath the sun, the great light, appealed unto the Lord, saying: O Lord God Almighty, I look forth upon the ungodliness and unrighteousness of men. Suffer me, and I will do unto them according to my power, that they may know that thou art God alone. And there came a voice unto it, saying: All these things do I know, for mine eye seeth and mine ear heareth, but my long-suffering beareth with them until they turn and repent. But if they return not unto me, I will judge them all.

5 And sometimes the moon and the stars have appealed unto the Lord, saying: O Lord God Almighty, unto us hast thou given rule over the night; how long shall we look upon the ungodliness and fornications and murders which the children of men commit? suffer us to do unto them according unto our powers, that they may know that thou art God alone. And there came a voice unto them, saying: I know all these things, and mine eye looketh upon them and mine ear heareth, but my long-suffering beareth with them until they turn and repent. But if they return not unto me, I will judge them.

6 Oftentimes also the sea hath cried out, saying: O Lord God Almighty, men have polluted thine holy name in me: suffer me and I will arise and cover every wood and tree and all the world, till I blot out all the children of men from before thy face, that they may know that thou art God alone. And again a voice came, saying: I know all, for mine eye seeth all things, and mine ear heareth, but my long-suffering beareth with them until they turn and repent. But if they return not I will judge them. Sometimes also the waters have appealed against the children of men, saying: O Lord God Almighty, the children of men have all defiled thine holy name. And there came a voice, saying: I know all things before they come to pass, for mine eye seeth and mine ear heareth all things: but my long-suffering beareth with them until they turn. And if not, I will judge. Often also hath the earth cried out unto the Lord against the children of men, saying: O Lord God Almighty, I suffer hurt more than all thy creation, bearing the fornications, adulteries, murders, thefts, forswearings, sorceries, and witchcrafts of men, and all the evils that they do, so that the father riseth up against the son, and the son against the father, the stranger against the stranger, every one to defile his neighbour's wife. The father goeth up upon his son's bed, and the son likewise goeth up upon the couch of his father; and with all these evils have they that offer a sacrifice unto thy name polluted thine holy place. Therefore do I suffer hurt more than the whole creation, and I would not yield mine excellence and my fruits unto the children of men. Suffer me and I will destroy the excellence of my fruits. And there came a voice and said: I know all things, and there is none that can hide himself from his sin. And their ungodliness do I know, but my holiness suffereth them until they turn and repent. But if they return not unto me, I will judge them.

7 Behold then ye children of men. The creature is subject unto God, but mankind alone sinneth. Therefore, ye children of men, bless ye the Lord God without ceasing at all hours and on all days; but especially when the sun setteth. For in that hour do all the angels go unto the Lord to worship him and to present the deeds of men which every man doeth from morning until evening, whether they be good or evil. And there is an angel that goeth forth rejoicing from the man in whom he dwelleth. When therefore the sun is set, at the first hour of the night, in the same hour goeth the angel of every people and of every man and woman, which protect and keep them, because man is the image of God: and likewise at the hour of morning, which is the twelfth hour of the night, do all the angels of men and women go to meet God and present all the work which every man hath wrought, whether good or evil. And every day and night do the angels present unto God the account of all the deeds of mankind. Unto you, therefore, I say, O children of men, bless ye the Lord God without ceasing all the days of your life.

8 At the hour appointed, therefore, all the angels, every one rejoicing, come forth before God together to meet him and worship him at the hour that is set; and lo, suddenly at the set time there was a meeting, and the angels came to worship in the presence of God, and the spirit came forth to meet them, and there was a voice, saying: Thence could ye, our angels, bringing burdens of news?

9 They answered and said: We are come from them that have renounced the world for thy holy name's sake, wandering as strangers and in the caves of the rocks, and weeping every hour that they dwell on the earth and hungering and thirsting for thy name's sake; with their loins girt, holding in their hands the incense of their heart, and praying and blessing at every hour, suffering anguish and subduing themselves, weeping and lamenting more than all that dwell on the earth. And we that are their angels do mourn with them, whither therefore it pleaseth thee, command us to go and minister lest they do otherwise, but the poor more than all that dwell on the earth. (The sense required as shown by Gr. is that the angels ask that these good men may continue in goodness.) And the voice of God came unto them, saying: Know ye that from henceforth my grace shall be established with you, and mine help which is my dearly beloved Son, shall be with them, ruling them at all times; and he shall minister unto them and never forsake them, for their place is his habitation.

10 When, then, these angels departed, lo, there came other angels to worship in the presence of the majesty, to meet therewith, and they were weeping. And the spirit of God went forth to meet them, and the voice of God came, saying: Whence are ye come, our angels bearing burdens, ministers of the news of the world? They answered and said in the presence of God: We are come from them which have called upon thy name, and the snares of the world have made them wretched, devising many excuses at all times, and not making so much as one pure prayer out of their whole heart all the time of their life. Wherefore then must we be with men that are sinners? And the voice of God came unto them: Ye must minister unto them until they turn and repent; but if they return not unto me, I will judge them. Know therefore, O children of men, that whatsoever is wrought by you, the angels tell it unto God, whether it be good or evil.

11 Again, after these things, I saw one of the spiritual ones coming unto me, and he caught me up in the spirit, and carried me to the third heaven. And the angel answered and said unto me: Follow me, and I will show thee the place of the righteous where they are taken when they are dead. And there after will I take thee to the bottomless pit and show thee the souls of the sinners, into what manner of place they are taken when they are dead. And I went after the angel, and he took me into heaven, and I looked upon the firmament, and saw there the powers; and there was forgetfulness which deceiveth and draweth unto itself the hearts of men, and the spirit of slander and the spirit of fornication and the spirit of wrath and the spirit of insolence and there were the princes of wickedness. These things saw I beneath the firmament of the heaven. And again I looked and saw angels without mercy, having no pity, whose countenances were full of fury, and their teeth sticking forth out of their mouth: their eyes shone like the morning star of the east, and out of the hairs of their head and out of their mouth went forth sparks of fire. And I asked the angel, saying: Who are these, Lord? And the angel answered and said unto me: These are they which are appointed unto the souls of sinners in the hour of necessity, even of them that have not believed that they had the Lord for their helper and have not trusted in him.

12 And I looked into the height and beheld other angels whose faces shone like the sun, and their loins were girt with golden girdles, holding palms in their hands, and the sign of God, clad in raiment whereon was written the name of the Son of God, full of all gentleness and mercy. And I asked the angel and said: Who are these, Lord, that are of so great beauty and compassion? And the angel answered and said unto me: These are the angels of righteousness that are sent to bring the souls of the righteous in the hour of necessity, even them that have believed that they had the Lord for their helper. And I said unto him: Do the righteous and the sinners of necessity meet [witnesses] when they are dead? And the angel answered and said unto me: The way whereby all pass unto God is one: but the righteous having an holy helper with them are not troubled when they go to appear in the presence of God.

13 And I said unto the angel: I would see the souls of the righteous and of the sinners as they depart out of the world. And the angel answered and said unto me: Look down upon the earth. And I looked down from heaven upon the earth and beheld the whole world, and it was as nothing in my sight; and I saw the children of men as though they were nought, and failing utterly; and I marvelled, and said unto the angel: Is this the greatness of men? And the angel answered and said unto me: This it is, and these are they that do hurt from morning until evening. And I looked, and saw a great cloud of fire spread over the whole world, and said unto the angel: What is this, Lord? And he said to me: This is the unrighteousness that is mingled by the princes of sinners (Gr. mingled with the destruction of sinners; Syr. mingled with the prayers of the sons of men).

14 And I when I heard that sighed and wept, and said unto the angel: I would wait for the souls of the righteous and of the sinners, and see in what fashion they depart out of the body. And the angel answered and said unto me: Look again upon the earth. And I looked and saw the whole world: and men were as nought, and failing utterly; and I looked and saw a certain man about to die; and the angel said to me: He whom thou seest is righteous. And again I looked and saw all his works that he had done for the name of God, and all his desires which he remembered and which he remembered not, all of them stood before his face in the hour of necessity. And I saw that the righteous man had grown in righteousness, and found rest and confidence: and before he departed out of the world there stood by him holy angels, and also evil ones: and I saw them all; but the evil ones found no abode in him, but the holy ones had power over his soul and ruled it until it went out of the body. And they stirred up the soul, saying: O soul, take knowledge of thy body whence thou art come out; for thou must needs return into the same body at the day of resurrection, to receive that which is promised unto all the righteous. They received therefore the soul out of the body, and straightway kissed it as one daily known of them, saying unto it: Be of good courage, for thou hast done the will of God while thou abodest on the earth. And there came to meet it the angel that watched it day by day, and he said unto it: Be of good courage, O soul: for I rejoice in thee because thou hast done the will of God on the earth; for I told unto God all thy works, how they stood. Likewise also the spirit came forth to meet it and said: O soul, fear not, neither be troubled, until thou come unto a place which thou never knewest; but I will be thine helper, for I have found in thee a place of refreshment in the time when I dwelt in thee, when I was (thou wast?) on the earth. And the spirit [thereof] strengthened it, and the angel thereof took it up and carried it into the heaven. And the angel said (Syr. And there went out to meet it wicked powers, those that are under heaven. And there reached it the spirit of error, and said): Whither runnest thou, O soul, and presumest to enter heaven? stay and let us see if there be aught of ours in thee. And lo! we have found nothing in thee. I behold also the help of God, and thine angel; and the spirit rejoiceth with thee because thou didst the will of God upon earth. (Syr. has more here. There is a conflict between the good and evil angels. The spirit of error first laments. Then the spirit of the tempter and of fornication meet it and it escapes, and they lament. All the principalities and evil spirits come to meet it and find nothing, and gnash their teeth. The guardian angel bids them go back, 'Ye tempted this soul and it would not listen to you.' And the voice of many angels is heard rejoicing over the soul. Probably this is original matter.) And they brought it until it did worship in the presence of God. And when they (it?) had ceased, forthwith Michael and all the host of the angels fell and worshipped the footstool of his feet and his gates, and said together unto the soul: This is the God of all, which made thee in his image and likeness. And the angel returned and declared, saying: Lord, remember his works; for this is the soul whereof I did report the works unto thee, Lord, doing according to thy judgement.

And likewise the spirit said: I am the spirit of quickening that breathed upon it; for I had refreshment in it in the time when I dwelt therein, doing according to thy judgement. And the voice of God came, saying: Like as this soul hath not grieved me neither will I grieve it, for like as it hath had mercy, I also will have mercy. Let it be delivered therefore unto Michael the angel of the covenant, and let him lead it into the paradise of rejoicing that it become fellow-heir with all the saints. And thereafter I heard the voices of thousands of thousands of angels and archangels and the cherubim and the four-and-twenty elders uttering hymns and glorifying the Lord and crying: Righteous art thou, O Lord, and just are thy judgements, and there is no respect of persons with thee, but thou rewardest every man according to thy judgement. And the angel answered and said unto me: Hast thou believed and known that whatsoever every one of you hath done, he beholdeth it at the hour of his necessity? And I said: Yea, Lord.

15 And he said unto me: Look down again upon the earth and wait for the soul of a wicked man going forth of the body, one that hath provoked the Lord day and night, saying: I know nought else in this world, I will eat and drink and enjoy the things that are in the world. For who is he that hath gone down into hell and come up and told us that there is a judgement there? And again I looked and saw all the despising of the sinner, and all that he did, and they stood together before him in the hour of necessity: and it came to pass in that hour when he was led out of his body to the judgement, that he (MS. I) said: It were better for me (MS. him) that I (he) had not been born. And after that the holy angels and the evil and the soul of the sinner came together, and the holy angels found no place in it. But the evil angels threatened (had power over) it, and when they brought it forth out of the body, the angels admonished it thrice, saying: O wretched soul, look upon thy flesh whence thou art come out; for thou must needs return into thy flesh at the day of resurrection to receive the due reward for thy sins and for thy wickedness;

16 And when they had brought it forth, the accustomed (i.e. guardian) angel went before it and said unto it: O miserable soul, I am the angel that clave unto thee and day by day reported unto the Lord thine evil deeds, whatsoever thou wroughtest by night or day; and if it had been in my power I would not have ministered unto thee even one day; but of this I could do nothing, for God is merciful and a just judge, and he commanded us not to cease ministering unto your soul till ye should repent: but thou hast lost the time of repentance. I indeed am become a stranger unto thee and thou to me. Let us go then unto the just judge: I will not leave thee until I know that from this day I am become a stranger unto thee. (Here Copt. inserts a quite similar speech of the spirit to the soul, which may be original.) And the spirit confounded it, and the angel troubled it. When therefore they were come unto the principalities, and it would now go to enter into heaven, one burden (labour, suffering) was laid upon it after another: error and forgetfulness and whispering met it, and the spirit of fornication and the rest of the powers, and said unto it: Whither goest thou, wretched soul and darest to run forward into heaven? Stay, that we may see whether we have property of ours in thee, for we see not with thee an holy helper. (Syr. adds: And the angel answered and said: Know ye that it is a soul of the Lord, and he will not cast it aside, neither will I surrender the image of God into the hand of the wicked one. The Lord supported me all the days of the life of the soul, and he can support and help me: and I will not cast it off until it go up before the throne of God on high. When he shall see it, he hath power over it, and will send it whither he pleases.) And after that I heard voices in the height of the heavens, saying: Present this miserable soul unto God, that it may know that there is a God, whom it hath despised. When therefore it was entered into the heaven, all the angels, even thousands of thousands, saw it, and all cried out with one voice saying: Woe unto thee, miserable soul, for thy works which thou didest upon the earth, what answer wilt thou make unto God when thou drawest near to worship him? The angel which was with it answered and said: Weep with me, my dearly beloved, for I have found no rest in this soul. And the angels answered him and said: Let this soul be taken away out of our midst, for since it came in, the stench of it is passed upon us the angels. And thereafter it was presented, to worship in the presence of God, and the angel showed it the Lord God that made it after his own image and likeness. And its angel ran before it, saying: O Lord God Almighty, I am the angel of this soul, whose works I presented unto thee day and night, not doing according to thy judgement. And likewise the spirit said: I am the spirit which dwelt in it ever since it was made, and I know it in itself, and it followed not my will: judge it, Lord, according to thy judgement. And the voice of God came unto it and said: Where is thy fruit that thou hast yielded, worthy of those good things which thou hast received? did I put a distance even of a day between thee and the righteous? did I not make the sun to rise upon thee even as upon the righteous? And it was silent, having nothing to answer; and again the voice came, saying: Just is the judgement of God, and there is no respect of persons with God, for whosoever hath done his mercy he will have mercy on him, and whoso hath not had mercy, neither shall God have mercy on him. Let him therefore be delivered unto the angel Tartaruchus (Gr. Temeluchus) that is set over the torments, and let him cast him into the outer darkness where is weeping and gnashing of teeth, and let him be there until the great day of judgement. And after that I heard the voice of the angels and archangels saying: Righteous art thou, O Lord, and just is thy judgement.

17 And again I beheld, and lo, a soul which was brought by two angels, weeping and saying: Have mercy on me, thou righteous God, O God the judge; for to-day it is seven days since I went forth out of my body, and I was delivered unto these two angels, and they have brought me unto those places which I had never seen. And God the righteous judge said unto it: What hast thou done? for thou hast never wrought mercy; therefore wast thou delivered unto such angels, which have no mercy, and because thou hast not done right, therefore neither have they dealt pitifully with thee in the hour of thy necessity. Confess therefore thy sins which thou hast committed when thou wert in the world. And it answered and said: Lord, I have not sinned. And the righteous Lord God was wroth with indignation when it said: I have not sinned, for it lied. And God said: Thinkest thou that thou art yet in the world? If every one of you there when he sinneth, hideth and concealeth his sin from his neighbour, yet here no thing is hidden, for when the souls come to worship before the throne both the good works and the sins of every one are made manifest. And when the soul heard that, it held its peace, having no answer. And I heard the Lord God, the righteous judge, saying again: Come, thou angel of this soul, and stand in the midst. And the angel of the sinful soul came, having a writing in his hands, and said: These, Lord, that are in mine hands, are all the sins of this soul from its youth up unto this day, even from ten years from its birth: and if thou bid me, Lord, I can tell the acts thereof since it began to be fifteen years old. [Apocalypse of Zephaniah: I looked and saw that a writing (the same word, chirographum) was in his hand: he began to open it, and when he had spread it out I read it in mine own language, and I found all my sins that I had committed, recorded by him, even those which I had committed from my childhood up unto this day.] And the Lord God the righteous judge said: I say unto thee, O angel, I desire not of thee the account since it began to be fifteen years old; but declare its sins of five years before that it died and came hither. And again God the righteous judge said: For by myself I swear, and by mine holy angels and by my power, that if it had repented five years before it died, even for the walk (conversation) of one year, there should be forgetfulness of all the evil which it committed before and it should have pardon and remission of sins: but now let it perish. And the angel of the sinful soul answered and said: Command, Lord, that (such and such an) angel to bring forth those (such and such) souls.

18 And in that same hour the souls were brought forth into the midst, and the soul of the sinner knew them. And the Lord said unto the soul of the sinner: I say unto thee, O soul, confess thy deeds which thou didst upon these souls whom thou seest, when they were in the world. And it answered and said: Lord, it is not yet a full year since I slew this one and shed its blood upon the earth, and with another I committed fornication; and not that only, but I did it much harm by taking away its substance. And the Lord God the righteous judge said: Knewest thou not that he that doth violence to another, if he that suffered violence die first, he is kept in this place until he that hurt him dieth, and then do both of them appear before the judge? and now hath every one received according as he did. And I heard a voice saying: Let that soul be delivered into the hands of Tartaruchus, and he must be taken down into hell. Let him take him into the lower prison and let him be cast into torments and be left there until the great day of judgement. And again I heard thousands of thousands of angels singing an hymn unto the Lord and saying: Righteous art thou, O Lord, and just are thy judgements.

19 The angel answered and said unto me: Hast thou perceived all these things? And I said: Yea, Lord. And he said unto me: Follow me again, and I will take thee and show thee the places of the righteous. And I followed the angel and he took me up unto the third heaven and set me before the door of a gate; and I looked on it and saw, and the gate was of gold, and there were two pillars of gold full of golden letters; and the angel turned again to me and said: Blessed art thou if thou interest in by these gates, for it is not permitted to any to enter save only to those that have kept goodness and pureness of their bodies in all things. And I asked the angel and said: Lord, tell me for what cause are these letters set upon these tables? The angel answered and said unto me: These are the names of the righteous that minister unto God with their whole heart, which dwell on the earth. And again I said: Lord, then are their names also their countenance and the likeness of them that serve God is in heaven, and they are known unto the angels: for they know them that with their whole heart serve God before they depart out of the world.

20 And when I had entered within the gate of paradise there came to meet me an old man whose face shone like the sun, and he embraced me and said: Hail, Paul, dearly beloved of God And he kissed me with a joyful countenance, but he wept, and I said unto him: Father (Lat. Brother), why weepest thou? And again sighing and weeping he said: Because we are vexed by men, and they grieve us sore; for many are the good things which the Lord hath prepared, and great are his promises, but many receive them not. And I asked the angel and said: Who is this, Lord? And he said unto me: This is Enoch the scribe of righteousness. And I entered within that place and straightway I saw Elias I and he came and saluted me with gladness and joy. And when he had seen me, he turned himself away and wept and said unto me: Paul, mayest thou receive the reward of thy labour which thou hast done among mankind. As for me, I have seen great and manifold good things which God hath prepared for all the righteous, and great are the promises of God, but the more part receive them not; yea hardly through much toil doth one and another enter into these places.

21 And the angel answered and said unto me: What things soever I now show thee here, and whatsoever thou hearest, reveal them not unto any upon earth. And he led me and showed me: and I heard there words which it is not lawful for a man to utter; and again he said: Yet again follow me and I will show thee that which thou must relate and tell openly. And he brought me down from the third heaven, and led me into the second heaven, and again he led me to the firmament, and from the firmament he led me unto the gates of heaven. And the beginning of the foundation thereof was upon the river that watereth all the earth. And I asked the angel and said: Lord, what is this river of water? and he said unto me: This is the Ocean. And suddenly I came out of heaven, and perceived that it is the light of the heaven that shineth upon all the earth (or, all that land). And there the earth (or, land) was seven times brighter than silver. And I said: Lord, what is this place? and he said unto me: This is the land of promise. Hast thou not yet heard that which is written: Blessed are the meek, for they shall inherit the earth? The souls therefore of the righteous when they are gone forth of the body are sent for the time into this place. And I said unto the angel: Shall then this land be made manifest after (lat. before) a time? The angel answered and said unto me: When Christ whom thou preachest cometh to reign, then by the decree of God the first earth shall be dissolved, and then shall this land of promise be shown and it shall be like dew or a cloud; and then shall the Lord Jesus Christ the eternal king be manifested and shall come with all his saints to dwell therein; and he shall reign over them a thousand years, and they shall eat of the good things which now I will show thee.

22 And I looked round about that land and saw a river flowing with milk and honey. And there were at the brink of the river trees planted, full of fruits: now every tree bare twelve fruits in the year, and they had various and divers fruits: and I saw the fashion (creation) of that place and all the work of God, and there I saw palm-trees of twenty cubits and others of ten cubits: and that land was seven times brighter than silver. And the trees were full of fruits from the root even to the upper branches. (Lat. is confused here. Copt. has: From the root of each tree up to its heart there were ten thousand branches with tens of thousands of clusters, [and there were ten thousand clusters on each branch,] and there were ten thousand dates in each cluster. And thus was it also with the vines. Every vine had ten thousand branches, and each branch had upon it ten thousand bunches of grapes, and every bunch had on it ten thousand grapes. And there were other trees there, myriads of myriads of them, and their fruit was in the same proportion.) And I said unto the angel: Wherefore doth every tree bring forth thousands of fruits? The angel answered and said unto me: Because the Lord God of his bounty giveth his gifts in abundance unto the worthy; for they also of their own will afflicted themselves when they were in the world, doing all things for his holy name's sake. And again I said unto the angel: Lord, are these the only promises which the most holy Lord God promiseth? and he answered and said unto me: No; for there are greater by seven times than these. But I say unto thee, that when the righteous are gone forth out of the body and shall see the promises and the good things which God hath prepared for them, yet again they shall sigh and cry, saying: Wherefore did we utter a word out of our mouth to provoke our neighbour even for a day? And I asked again and said: Be these the only promises of God? And the angel answered and said unto me: These which now thou seest are for them that are married and keep the purity of their marriage, being continent. But unto the virgins, and unto them that hunger and thirst after righteousness and afflict themselves for the name of the Lord, God will give things seven-fold greater than these, which now I will show thee. And after that he took me out of that place where I saw these things, and lo, a river, and the waters of it were white exceedingly, more than milk, and I said unto the angel: What is this? and he said to me: This is the lake Acherusa where is the city of Christ: but not every man is suffered to enter into that city: for this is the way that leadeth unto God, and if any be a fornicator or ungodly, and turn and repent and bear fruits meet for repentance, first when he cometh out of the body he is brought and worshippeth God, and then by the commandment of the Lord he is delivered unto Michael the angel, and he washeth him in the lake Acherusa and so bringeth him in to the city of Christ with them that have done no sin. And I marvelled and blessed the Lord God for all the things which I saw.

23 And the angel answered and said unto me: Follow me and I will bring thee into the city of Christ. And he stood by (upon) the lake Acherusa, and set me in a golden ship, and angels as it were three thousand sang an hymn before me until I came even unto the city of Christ. And they that dwelt in the city of Christ rejoiced greatly over me as I came unto them, and I entered in and saw the city of Christ. And it was all of gold, and twelve walls compassed it about, and there were twelve towers within (a tower on each wall, Copt.; 12,000 towers, Syr.), and every wall had a furlong between them (i.e. the walls were a furlong apart, so Syr., Copt. the circumference of each was 100 furlongs) round about; and I said unto the angel: Lord, how much is one furlong? The angel answered and said unto me: It is as much as there is betwixt the Lord God and the men that are on the earth, for the great city of Christ is alone. And there were twelve gates in the circuit of the city, of great beauty, and four rivers that compassed it about. There was a river of honey, and a river of milk, and a river of wine, and a river of oil. And I said unto the angel: What are these rivers that compass this city about? And he saith to me: These are the four rivers which flow abundantly for them that are in this land of promise, whereof the names are these: the river of honey is called Phison, and the river of milk Euphrates, and the river of oil Geon, and the river of wine Tigris. Whereas therefore when the righteous were in the world they used not their power over these things, but hungered and afflicted themselves for the Lord God's sake, therefore when they enter into this city, the Lord will give them these things without number (?) and without all measure.

24 And I when I entered in by the gate saw before the doors of the city trees great and high, having no fruits, but leaves only. And I saw a few men scattered about in the midst of the trees, and they mourned sore when they saw any man enter into the city. And those trees did penance for them, humbling themselves and bowing down, and again raising themselves up. And I beheld it and wept with them, and I asked the angel and said: Lord, who are these that are not permitted to enter into the city of Christ? And he said unto me: These are they that did earnestly renounce the world day and night with fasting, but had an heart proud above other men, glorifying and praising themselves, and doing nought for their neighbours. For some they greeted friendly, but unto others they said not even 'Hail', and unto whom they would they opened, and if they did any small thing for their neighbour they were puffed up. And I said: What then, Lord? their pride hath prevented them from entering into the city of Christ? And the angel answered and said unto me: The root of all evils is pride. Are they better than the Son of God who came unto the Jews in great humility? And I asked him and said: Wherefore is it then that the trees humble themselves and are again raised up? And the angel answered and said unto me: All the time that these spent upon earth (Of old time they were on the earth, Copt.) serving God (they served God): But because of the shame and reproaches of men they were ashamed (did blush) for a time and humbled themselves, but they were not grieved, neither did repent, to cease from this pride that was in them (and one day they bowed themselves because of the disgrace of man, for they cannot endure the pride that is in him, Copt.). This is the cause why the trees humble themselves and again are raised up. And I asked and said: For what cause are they let in unto the gates of the city? The angel answered and said unto me: Because of the great goodness of God, and because this is the entry of all his saints which do enter into this city. Therefore are they left in this place, that when Christ the eternal king entereth in with his saints, when he cometh in, all the righteous shall entreat for them, and then shall they enter into the city with them: yet none of them is able to have confidence such as they have that have humbled themselves, serving the Lord God all their life long.

25 But I went forward and the angel led me and brought me unto the river of honey, and I saw there Esaias and Jeremias and Ezekiel and Amos and Micheas and Zacharias, even the prophets lesser and greater, and they greeted me in the city. I said unto the angel: What is this path? and he said unto me: This is the path of the prophets: every one that hath grieved his soul and not done his own will for God's sake, when he is departed out of the world and hath been brought unto the Lord God and worshipped him, then by the commandment of God he is delivered unto Michael, and he bringeth him into the city unto this place of the prophets, and they greet him as their friend and neighbour because he hath performed the will of God.

26 Again he led me where was the river of milk, and I saw in that place all the children whom the king Herod slew for the name of Christ, and they greeted me, and the angel said unto me: All they that keep chastity in cleanness, when they are gone out of the body, after they worship the Lord God, are delivered unto Michael and brought unto the children: and they greet them saying: They are our brothers and friends and members: among them shall they inherit the promises of God.

27 Again he took me and brought me to the north side of the city, and led me to where was the river of wine, and I saw there Abraham, Isaac, and Jacob, Lot and Job and other saints, and they greeted me. [Apocalypse of Zephaniah: (The angel) ran unto all the righteous that are there, Abraham, Isaac, Jacob, Enoch, Elias, and David. He conversed with them as a friend with a friend, who talk together.] And I asked and said: What is this place, Lord? The angel answered and said unto me: All they that are entertainers of strangers, when they are departed out of the world first worship the Lord God, and then are delivered unto Michael and brought by this path into the city, and all the righteous greet him as a son and brother, and say unto him: Because thou hast kept kindness and the entertainment of strangers, come thou and have an inheritance in the city of our Lord God. Every one of the righteous shall receive the good things of God in the city according to his deeds.

28 And again he took me to the river of oil on the east side of the city. And I saw there men rejoicing and singing psalms, and said: Who are these, Lord? and the angel said unto me: These are they that have devoted themselves unto God with their whole heart, and had in them no pride. For all that rejoice in the Lord God and sing praises to the Lord with their whole heart are brought here into this city.

29 And he took me into the midst of the city, by the twelve walls (to the twelfth wall, Copt.). Now there was in that place an higher wall; and I asked and said: Is there in the city of Christ a wall more excellent in honour than this place? And the angel answered and said unto me: The second is better than the first, and likewise the third than the second; for one excelleth the other even unto the twelfth wall. And I said: Wherefore Lord, doth one excel another in glory? show me. And the angel answered and said unto me: All they that have in them even a little slandering or envy or pride, somewhat is taken away from his glory, even if he be in the city of Christ. Look thou behind thee. And I turned myself and saw golden thrones set at the several gates, and upon them men having golden crowns and jewels: and I looked and saw within among the twelve men, thrones set in another order (row, fashion?), which appeared of much glory so that no man is able to declare the praise of them. And I asked the angel and said: Lord, who is upon the throne? And the angel answered and said unto me: These are the thrones of them that had goodness and understanding of heart and yet made themselves foolish for the Lord God's sake, knowing neither the Scriptures nor many psalms, but keeping in mind one chapter of the precepts of God they performed it with great diligence, and had a right intent before the Lord God; and for these great wonder shall take hold upon all the saints before the Lord God, who shall speak one with another, saying: Stay and behold the unlearned that know nothing [more], how they have earned such and so fair raiment and so great glory because of their innocency. And I saw in the midst of the city an altar exceeding high. And there was one standing by the altar whose visage shone like the sun, and he held in his hands a psaltery and an harp and sang praises, saying: Alleluia. And his voice filled all the city. And when all that were upon the towers and the gates heard him, they answered: Alleluia, so that the foundations of the city were shaken. And I asked the angel and said: Who is this, Lord, that is of so great might? And the angel said unto me: This is David. This is the city of Jerusalem; and when Christ the king of eternity shall come in the fullness (confidence, freedom) of his kingdom, he shall again go before him to sing praises, and all the righteous together shall sing praises, answering: Alleluia. And I said: Lord, how is it that David only above the rest of the saints maketh (made) the beginning of singing praises? And the angel answered and said unto me: When (or, because) Christ the Son of God sitteth on the right hand of his Father, this David shall sing praises before him in the seventh heaven: and as it is done in the heavens, so likewise is it below: for without David it is not lawful to offer a sacrifice unto God: but it must needs be that David sing praises at the hour of the offering of the body and blood of Christ: as it is performed in heaven, so also is it upon earth.

30 And I said unto the angel: Lord, what is Alleluia? And the angel answered and said unto me: Thou dost examine and inquire of all things. And he said unto me: Alleluia is spoken in the Hebrew, that is the speech of God and of the angels: now the interpretation of Alleluia is this: tecel . cat . marith . macha (Gr.thebel marematha). And I said: Lord, what is tecel cat marith macha? And the angel answered and said unto me: This is tecel cat marith macha: Let us bless him all together. I asked the angel and said: Lord, do all they that say Alleluia bless God? And the angel answered and said unto me: So it is: and again, if any sing Alleluia, and they that are present sing not with him, they commit sin in that they sing not with him. And I said: Lord, doth a man likewise sin if he be doting or very aged? The angel answered and said unto me: Not so: but he that is able, and singeth not with him, know ye that such a one is a despiser of the word, for it would be proud and unworthy that he should not bless the Lord God his creator.

31 And when he had ceased speaking unto me, he led me out without the city through the midst of the trees and back from the place of the land of good things (or, men) and set me at the river of milk and honey: and after that he led me unto the ocean that beareth the foundations of the heaven. The angel answered and said unto me: Perceivest thou that thou goest hence? And I said: Yea, Lord. And he said unto me: Come, follow me, and I will show thee the souls of the ungodly and the sinners, that thou mayest know what manner of place they have. And I went with the angel and he took me by the way of the sunsetting, and I saw the beginning of the heaven founded upon a great river of water, and I asked: What is this river of water? And he said unto me: This is the ocean which compasseth the whole earth about. And when I was come beyond (to the outside of) the ocean, I looked and there was no light in that place, but darkness and sorrow and sadness: and I sighed. And I saw there a river of fire burning with heat, and in it was a multitude of men and women sunk up to the knees, and other men up to the navel; others also up to the lips and others up to the hair: and I asked the angel and said: Lord, who are these in the river of fire? And the angel answered and said unto me: They are neither hot nor cold.; for they were not found either in the number of the righteous or in the number of the wicked, for they passed the time of their life upon the earth, spending some days in prayer, but other days in sins and fornications, until their death. And I asked and said: Who are these, Lord, that are sunk up to their knees in the fire? He answered and said unto me: These are they which when they are come out of the church occupy themselves in disputing with idle (alien) talk. But these that are sunk up to the navel are they who, when they have received the body and blood of Christ, go and commit fornication, and did not cease from their sins until they died; and they that are sunk up to their lips are they that slandered one another when they gathered in the church of God; but they that are sunk up to the eyebrows are they that beckon one to another, and privily devise evil against their neighbours.

32 And I saw on the north side a place of sundry and diverse torments, full of men and women, and a river of fire flowed down upon them. And I beheld and saw pits exceeding deep, and in them many souls together, and the depth of that place was as it were three thousand cubits; and I saw them groaning and weeping and saying: Have mercy on us, Lord. And no man had mercy on them. And I asked the angel and said: Who are these, Lord? And the angel answered and said unto me: These are they that trusted not in the Lord that they could have him for their helper. And I inquired and said: Lord, if these souls continue thus, thirty or forty generations being cast one upon another, if (unless?) they be cast down yet deeper, I trow the pits would not contain them. And he said to me; The abyss hath no measure: for beneath it there followeth also that which is beneath: and so it is that if a strong man took a stone and cast it into an exceeding deep well and after many hours (long time) it reacheth the earth, so also is the abyss. For when the souls are cast therein, hardly after five hundred years do they come at the bottom.

33 And I when I heard it, mourned and lamented for the race of men. The angel answered and said unto me: Wherefore mournest thou? art thou more merciful than God? for inasmuch as God is good and knoweth that there are torments, he beareth patiently with mankind, leaving every one to do his own will for the time that he dwelleth on the earth.

34 Yet again I looked upon the river of fire, and I saw there a man caught by the throat (Copt. an old man who was being dragged along, and they immersed him up to the knees. And the angel Aftemeloukhos came with a great fork of fire, &c. Syr. similar. Some sentences are lost in Lat.) by angels, keepers of hell (Tartaruchi), having in their hands an iron of three hooks wherewith they pierced the entrails of that old man. And I asked the angel and said: Lord, who is this old man upon whom such torments are inflicted? And the angel answered and said unto me: He whom thou seest was a priest who fulfilled not well his ministry, for when he was eating and drinking and whoring he offered the sacrifice unto the Lord at his holy altar.

35 And I saw not far off another old man whom four evil angels brought, running quickly, and they sank him up to his knees in the river of fire, and smote him with stones and wounded his face like a tempest, and suffered him not to say: Have mercy on me. And I asked the angel and he said unto me: He whom thou seest was a bishop, and he fulfilled not well his bishopric: for he received indeed a great name, but entered not into (walked not in) the holiness of him that gave him that name all his life; for he gave not righteous judgement, and had not compassion on widows and orphans: but now it is recompensed unto him according to his iniquity and his doings.

36 And I saw another man in the river of fire sunk up to the knees: and his hands were stretched out and bloody, and worms issued out of his mouth and his nostrils, and he was groaning and lamenting and crying out, and said: Have mercy on me for I suffer hurt more than the rest that are in this torment. And I asked: Who is this, Lord? And he said unto me: This whom thou seest was a deacon, who devoured the offerings and committed fornication and did not right in the sight of God: therefore without ceasing he payeth the penalty. And I looked and saw beside him another man whom they brought with haste and cast him into the river of fire, and he was there up to the knees; and the angel that was over the torments came, having a great razor, red-hot, and therewith he cut the lips of that man and the tongue likewise. And I sighed and wept and asked: Who is this man, Lord? And he said unto me: This that thou seest was a reader and read unto the people: but he kept not the commandments of God: now also he payeth his own penalty.

37 And I saw another multitude of pits in the same place, and in the midst thereof a river filled with a multitude of men and women, and worms devoured them. But I wept and sighed and asked the angel: Lord, who are these? And he said unto me: These are they that extorted usury on usury and trusted in their riches, not having hope in God, that he was their helper. And after that I looked and saw a very strait place, and there was as it were a wall, and round about it fire. And I saw within it men and women gnawing their tongues, and asked: Who are these, Lord? And he said unto me: These are they that mocked at the word of God in the church, not attending thereto, but as it were making nought of God and of his angels: therefore now likewise do they pay the due penalty.

38 And I looked in and saw another pool (lat. old man!) beneath in the pit, and the appearance of it was like blood: and I asked and said: Lord, what is this place? And he said unto me: Into this pit do all the torments flow. And I saw men and women sunk up to the lips, and asked: Who are these, Lord? And he said unto me: These are the sorcerers which gave unto men and women magical enchantments, and they found no rest (i.e. did not cease?) until they died. And again I saw men and women of a very black countenance in a pit of fire, and I sighed and wept and asked: Who are these, Lord? And he said unto me: These are whoremongers and adulterers who, having wives of their own, committed adultery, and likewise the women after the same sort committed adultery, having their own husbands: therefore do they pay the penalty without ceasing.

39 And I saw there girls clad in black raiment, and four fearful angels holding in their hands red-hot chains, and they put them upon their necks (heads) and led them away into darkness. And again I wept and asked the angel: Who are these, Lord? And he said unto me: These are they which being virgins defiled their virginity, and their parents knew it not: wherefore without ceasing they pay the due penalty. And again I beheld there men and women with their hands and feet cut off and naked, in a place of ice and snow, and worms devoured them. And when I saw it I wept and asked: Who are these, Lord? and he said unto me: These are they that injured the fatherless and widows and the poor, and trusted not in the Lord: wherefore without ceasing they pay the due penalty. And I looked and saw others hanging over a channel of water, and their tongues were exceeding dry, and many fruits were set in their sight, and they were not suffered to take of them. And I asked: Who are these, Lord? And he said unto me: These are they that brake the fast before the time appointed: therefore without ceasing do they pay this penalty. And I saw other men and women hanged by their eyebrows and their hair, and a river of fire drew them, and I said: Who are these, Lord? And he said unto me: These are they that gave themselves not unto their own husbands and wives, but unto adulterers, and therefore without ceasing they pay the due penalty. (For this Copt. has: men and women hung head downwards torches burning before their faces, serpents girt about them devouring them. These are the women that beautified themselves with paints and unguents and went to church to ensnare men. Syr. and Gr. omit.) And I saw other men and women covered with dust, and their appearance was as blood, and they were in a pit of pitch and brimstone and borne down in a river of fire. And I asked: Who are these, Lord? And he said unto me: These are they that committed the wickedness of Sodom and Gomorrah, men with men, wherefore they pay the penalty without ceasing. (Copt., Syr., Gr. omit this paragraph.)

40 And I looked and saw men and women clad in white (bright) apparel, and their eyes were blind, and they were set in a pit, and I asked: Who are these, Lord? And he said unto me: These are they of the heathen that gave alms and knew not the Lord God; wherefore without ceasing they pay the due penalty. And I looked and saw other men and women upon a spit of fire, and beasts tearing them, and they were not suffered to say: Lord, have mercy on us. And I saw the angel of the torments (Aftemeloukhos, Copt.) laying most fierce torments upon them and saying: Acknowledge the Son of God. For it was told you before, but when the scriptures of God were read unto you, ye paid no heed: wherefore the judgement of God is just, for your evil doings have taken hold upon you, and brought you into these torments. But I sighed and wept, and I inquired and said: Who are these men and women that are strangled in the fire and pay the penalty? And he answered me: These are the women which defiled the creation of God when they brought forth children from the womb, and these are the men that lay with them. But their children appealed unto the Lord God and unto the angels that are over the torments, saying: Avenge us of our parents: for they have defiled the creation of God. Having the name of God, but not observing his commandments, they gave us for food unto dogs and to be trampled on by swine, and others they cast into the river (Copt. adds: and did not permit us to grow up into righteous men and to serve God). But those children were delivered unto the angels of Tartarus (Gr. unto an angel) that they should bring them into a spacious place of mercy: but their fathers and mothers were haled (strangled) into everlasting torment. And thereafter I saw men and women clad in rags full of pitch and brimstone of fire, and there were dragons twined about their necks and shoulders and feet, and angels having horns of fire constrained them and smote them and closed up their nostrils, saying unto them: Wherefore knew ye not the time wherein it was right for you to repent and serve God, and ye did not? And I asked: Who are these, Lord? And he said unto me: These are they that seemed to renounce the world (lat. God), wearing our garb, but the snares of the world made them to be miserable: they showed no charity and had no pity upon the widows and fatherless: the stranger and pilgrim they did not take in, neither offered one oblation nor had pity on their neighbour: and their prayer went not up even one day pure unto the Lord God; but the many snares of the world held them back, and they were not able to do right in the sight of God. And the angels carried (lat. surrounded) them about into the place of torments: and they that were in torments saw them and said unto them: We indeed when we lived in the world neglected God, and ye did so likewise. And we when we were in the world knew that we were sinners, but of you it was said: These are righteous and servants of God: now we know that ye were only called by the name of the Lord. Wherefore also they pay the due penalty. And I sighed and wept and said: Woe unto men! woe unto the sinners! to what end were they born? And the angel answered and said unto me: Wherefore weepest thou? Art thou more merciful than the Lord God which is blessed for ever, who hath established the judgement and left every man of his own will to choose good or evil and to do as pleaseth him? Yet again I wept very sore, and he said unto me: Weepest thou, when as yet thou hast not seen the greater torments? Follow me, and thou shalt see sevenfold greater than these.

41 And he took me from the north side (to the west, Syr.) and set me over a well, and I found it sealed with seven seals. And the angel that was with me answered and said unto the angel of that place: Open the mouth of the well, that Paul the dearly beloved of God may behold; for power hath been given unto him to see all the torments of hell. And the angel said unto me: Stand afar off, that thou mayest be able to endure the stench of this place. When therefore the well was opened, straightway there arose out of it a stench hard and evil exceedingly, which surpassed all the torments: and I looked into the well and saw masses (lumps) of fire burning on every side, and anguish, and there was straitness in the mouth of the pit so as to take but one man in. And the angel answered and said unto me: If any be cast into the well of the abyss, and it be sealed over him, there shall never be remembrance made of him in the presence of the Father and the Son and the Holy Ghost or of the holy angels. And I said: Who are they, Lord, that are cast into this well? And he said unto me: They are whosoever confesseth not that Christ is come in the flesh and that the Virgin Mary bare him and whosoever saith of the bread and the cup of blessing of the Eucharist that it is not the body and blood of Christ.

42 And I looked from the north unto the west and saw there the worm that sleepeth not, and in that place was gnashing of teeth. And the worms were of the measure of one cubit, and on them were two heads; and I saw there men and women in cold and gnashing of teeth. And I asked and said: Lord, who are they that are in this place? And he said unto me: These are they which say that Christ rose not from the dead, and that this flesh riseth not again. And I inquired and said: Lord, is there no fire nor heat in this place? And he said unto me: In this place is nothing else but cold and snow. And again he said to me: Even if the sun (seven suns, Copt.) rose upon them, they would not be warmed, because of the excessive cold of this place, and the snow. And when I heard this I spread forth mine hands and wept and sighed, and again I said: It were better for us if we had not been born, all we that are sinners.

43 But when they that were in that place saw me weeping, with the angel, they also cried out and wept, saying: Lord God, have mercy upon us. And after that I beheld the heaven open and Michael the archangel coming down out of heaven, and with him all the host of the angels; and they came even unto them that were set in torment. And they when they saw them wept again and cried out and said: Have mercy upon us, thou Michael, archangel, have mercy upon us and upon the race of men, for it is by thy prayers that the earth standeth. We have now seen the judgement and have known the Son of God. It was not possible for us to pray for this before we came into this place: for we heard that there was a judgement, before we departed out of the world, but the snares and the life of the world suffered us not to repent. And Michael answered and said: Hearken when Michael speaketh: I am he that stands in the presence of God alway. As the Lord liveth, before whose face I stand, I cease not for one day nor one night to pray continually for the race of men; and I indeed pray for them that are upon earth: but they cease not from committing wickednesses and fornication. And they bring not forth aught of good while they are upon earth; and ye have wasted in vanity the time wherein ye ought to have repented. But I have prayed alway, and now do I entreat that God would send dew and that rain may be sent upon the earth, and still pray I until the earth yield her fruits: and I say that if any man doeth but a little good I will strive for him and protect him until he escape the judgement of torment. Where then be your prayers? Where be your repentances? ye have lost the time despicably. Yet now weep ye, and I will weep with you, and the angels that are with me, together with the dearly beloved Paul, peradventure the merciful God will have pity and grant you refreshment. And they when they heard these words cried out and wept sore, and all said with one voice: Have mercy upon us, O Son of God. And I, Paul, sighed and said: O Lord God, have mercy upon thy creature, have mercy on the children of men, have mercy upon thine image.

44 I beheld and saw the heaven shake like unto a tree that is moved by the wind: and suddenly they cast themselves down upon their faces before the throne: and I saw the four-and- twenty elders and the four beasts worshipping God: and I saw the altar and the veil and the throne, and all of them were rejoicing, and the smoke of a sweet odour rose up beside the altar of the throne of God; and I heard a voice saying: For what cause do ye entreat me, our angels, and our ministers? And they cried out, saying: We entreat thee, beholding thy great goodness unto mankind. And thereafter I saw the Son of God coming down out of heaven, and on his head was a crown. And when they that were in torments saw him they all cried out with one voice, saying: Have mercy upon us, O exalted Son of God (or, Son of God Most High): thou art he that hast granted refreshment unto all that are in heaven and earth; have mercy upon us likewise: for since we beheld thee we have been refreshed. And there went forth a voice from the Son of God throughout all the torments, saying: What good works have ye done that ye should ask of me refreshment? My blood was shed for you, and not even so did ye repent: for your sake I bare a crown of thorns on mine head, for you I received buffets upon my cheeks, and not even so did ye repent. I asked for water when I hanged upon the cross, and they gave me vinegar mingled with gall: with a spear did they open my right side: for my name's sake have they slain my servants the prophets, and the righteous: and for ail these things did I give you a place of repentance, and ye would not. Yet now because of Michael the archangel of my covenant and the angels that are with him, and because of Paul my dearly beloved whom I would not grieve. and because of your brethren that are in the world and do offer oblations, and because of your sons, for in them are my commandments, I and yet more because of mine own goodness: on that day whereon I rose from the dead I grant unto all you that are in torment refreshment for a day and a night for ever. And all they cried out and said: We bless thee, O Son of God, for that thou hast granted us rest for a day and a night: for better unto us is the refreshment of one day than the whole time of our life wherein we were upon earth: and if we had known clearly that this place was appointed for them that sin, we should have done none other work whatsoever, neither traded nor done any wickedness. For what profit was our pride in the world? (Copt. What profit was it to us to be born into the world?) For this our pride is taken captive, which came up out of our mouth against our neighbour (Copt. our life is like the breath of our mouth): and this pain and our sore anguish and tears and the worms which are under us, these are worse unto us than the torments which we suffer. (This is hardly sense, but Copt. agrees; should it not have been ' these are worse than not to have been born '?) And as they thus spake, the angels of torment and the evil angels were wroth with them and said: How long have ye wept and sighed? for ye have had no mercy. For this is the judgement of God on him that hath not had mercy. Yet have ye received this great grace, even refreshment for the night and day of the Lord's day, because of Paul the dearly beloved of God who hath come down unto you.

45 And after these things the angel said unto me: Hast thou seen all these things? And I said: Yea, Lord. And he said unto me: Follow me, and I will bring thee into Paradise, that the righteous which are there may see thee: for, behold, they hope to see thee, and are ready to come and meet thee with joy and exultation. And I followed after the angel in the swiftness of the Holy Ghost, and he set me in Paradise and said unto me: This is Paradise, wherein Adam and his wife erred. And I entered into Paradise and saw the head of the waters, and the angel beckoned unto me and said to me: Behold, saith he, these waters: for this is the river Phison that compasseth about all the land of Evila. and this other is Geon that goeth about all the land of Egypt and Ethiopia, and this other is Tigris that is over against the Assyrians, and this other is Euphrates that watereth the land of Mesopotamia. And I entered in further and saw a tree planted, out of whose roots flowed waters, and out of it was the beginning of the four rivers, and the Spirit of God rested upon that tree, and when the spirit breathed the waters flowed forth: and I said: Lord, is this tree that which maketh the waters to flow? And he said unto me: Because in the beginning, before the heaven and the earth were made to appear, and all things were invisible, the Spirit of God moved (was borne) upon the waters; but since by the commandment of God the heaven and the earth appeared the spirit hath rested upon this tree; wherefore when the spirit breatheth, the waters flow out from the tree. And he took hold on mine hand and led me unto the tree of the knowledge of good and evil, and said: This is the tree whereby death entered into the world, and Adam taking of it from his wife did eat, and death entered into the world. And he showed me another tree in the midst of Paradise, and saith unto me: This is the tree of life.

46 And as I yet looked upon the tree, I saw a virgin coming from afar off, and two hundred angels before her singing hymns: and I inquired and said: Lord, who is this that cometh in such glory? and he said unto me: This is Mary the virgin, the mother of the Lord. And she came near and saluted me, and said: Hail, Paul, dearly beloved of God and angels and men. For all the saints have besought my son Jesus who is my Lord, that thou shouldest come here in the body that they might see thee before thou didst depart out of the world. And the Lord said to them: Wait and be ye patient: yet a little while, and ye shall see him, and he shall be with you for ever. And again they all with one accord said unto him: Grieve us not, for we desire to see him while he is in the flesh, for by him hath thy name been greatly glorified in the world, and we have seen that he hath excelled (done away with) all the works whether of the lesser or the greater. For we inquire of them that come hither, saying: Who is he that guided you in the world? and they have told us: There is one in the world whose name is Paul; he declareth Christ, preaching him, and we believe that by the power and sweetness of his speech many have entered into the kingdom. Behold, all the righteous are behind me, coming to meet thee. But I say unto thee, Paul, that for this cause I come first to meet them that have performed the will of my son and my Lord Jesus Christ, even I come first to meet them and leave them not as strangers until they meet with him in peace.

47 While she was yet speaking I saw three men coming from afar, very beautiful, after the appearance of Christ, and their forms were shining, and their angels; and I asked: Who are these, Lord? And he answered: These are the fathers of the people, Abraham, Isaac, and Jacob. And they came near and greeted me, and said: Hail, Paul, dearly beloved of God and men: blessed is he that endureth violence for the Lord's sake. And Abraham answered me and said: This is my son Isaac, and Jacob my best beloved, and we knew the Lord and followed him. Blessed are all they that have believed thy word that they may inherit the kingdom of God by labour and self-sacrifice (renunciation) and sanctification and humility and charity and meekness and right faith in the Lord: and we also had devotion unto the Lord whom thou preachest, covenanting that we will come unto every soul of them that believe in him, and minister unto him as fathers minister unto their sons. While they yet spake I saw twelve men coming from afar with honour, and I asked: Who are these, Lord? And he said: These are the patriarchs. And they came and saluted me and said: Hail, Paul, dearly beloved of God and men. The Lord hath not grieved us, that we might see thee yet being in the body, before thou departedst out of the world. And every one of them signified his name unto me in order, from Ruben unto Benjamin; and Joseph said unto me: I am he that was sold; and I say unto thee, Paul, that for all that my brethren did unto me, in nothing did I deal evilly with them, not in all the labour which they laid upon me, nor did I hurt them in any thing (Copt. kept no evil thought against them) from morning until evening. Blessed is he that is hurt for the Lord's sake and hath endured, for the Lord will recompense him manifold more when he departeth out of the world.

48 While he yet spake I saw another coming from afar, beautiful, and his angels singing hymns, and I asked: Who is this, Lord, that is fair of countenance? And he said unto me: Dost thou not know him? And I said: No, Lord. And he said to me: This is Moses the lawgiver, unto whom God gave the law. And when he was nigh me, straightway he wept, and after that he greeted me; and I said unto him: Why weepest thou? for I have heard that thou excellest all men in meekness. And he answered, saying: I weep for them whom I planted with much labour, for they have borne no fruit, neither doth any of them do well. And I have seen all the sheep whom I fed that they are scattered and become as having no shepherd, and that all the labours which I have endured for the children of Israel are come to nought, and however great wonders I did in their midst [and] they understood not: and I marvel how the strangers and uncircumcised and idolaters are converted and entered into the promises of God, but Israel hath not entered in: and now I say unto thee, O brother Paul, that in that hour when the people hanged up Jesus whom thou preachest, God the Father of all, which gave me the law, and Michael and all the angels and archangels, and Abraham and Isaac and Jacob and all the righteous wept over the Son of God that was hanged on the cross. And in that hour all the saints waited upon me, looking on me and saying: Behold, Moses, what they of thy people have done unto the Son of God. Therefore blessed art thou O Paul, and blessed is the generation and people that hath believed thy word.

49 While he yet spake there came other twelve and saw me and said: Art thou Paul that is glorified in heaven and upon earth? And I answered and said: Who are ye? The first answered and said: I am Esaias whose head Manasses cut with a saw of wood. And the second said likewise: I am Jeremias who was stoned by the children of Israel, and slain. And the third said: I am Ezechiel whom the children of Israel dragged by the feet over the stones in the mountain until they scattered my brains abroad: and all of us endured these labours, desiring to save the children of Israel: and I say unto thee that after the toils which they laid upon me I would cast myself down upon my face before the Lord, praying for them and bowing my knees unto the second hour of the Lord's day, even until Michael came and raised me up from the earth. Blessed art thou, Paul, and blessed is the people that hath believed through thee. And as they passed by, I saw another, fair of countenance and asked: Who is this, Lord? [And when he saw me he was glad] and he said unto me: This is Lot, which was found righteous in Sodom. And he came near and greeted me and said: Blessed art thou, Paul, and blessed is the generation unto whom thou hast ministered. And I answered and said unto him: Art thou Lot, that wast found righteous in Sodom? And he said: I entertained angels in mine house as strangers, and when they of the city would have done them violence I offered them my two daughters, virgins, that had never known man, and gave them to them, saying: Use them as ye will, only do no ill unto these men, for therefore have they entered under the roof of mine house. Therefore ought we to have confidence, and know that whatsoever any man hath done, God recompenseth him manifold more when he cometh (they come) unto him. Blessed art thou Paul, and blessed is the generation which hath believed thy word. When therefore he had ceased speaking unto me, I saw another coming from afar off, very beautiful in the face, and smiling, and his angels singing hymns, and I said unto the angel that was with me: Hath, then, every one of the righteous an angel for his fellow? And he saith to me: Every one of the saints hath his own, that standeth by him and singeth hymns, and the one departeth not from the other. And I said: Who is this, Lord? And he said: This is Job. And he drew near and greeted me and said: Brother Paul, thou hast great praise with God and men. Now I am Job, which suffered much for the season of thirty years by the issue of a plague, and in the beginning the blains that came forth of my body were as grains of wheat; but on the third day they became like an ass's foot, and the worms that fell from them were four fingers long: and thrice the devil appeared unto me and saith to me: Speak a word against the Lord, and die. But I said unto him: If thus be the will of God that I continue in the plague all the time of my life until I die, I will not rest from blessing the Lord God, and I shall receive the greater reward. For I know that the sufferings of this world are nought compared with the refreshment that is thereafter: wherefore blessed art thou, Paul, and blessed is the people which hath believed by thy means.

50 While he yet spake there came another crying out from afar off and saying: Blessed art thou, Paul, and blessed am I that have seen thee the beloved of the Lord. And I asked the angel: Who is this, Lord? and he answered and said unto me: This is Noe of the days of the flood. And straightway we greeted one another, and he, rejoicing greatly, said unto me: Thou art (or, Art thou) Paul the best beloved of God. And I asked him: Who art thou? And he said: I am Noe that was in the days of the flood: but I say unto thee, Paul, that I spent an hundred years making the ark, not putting off the coat (tunic) which I wore, and I shaved not the hair of mine head. Furthermore I kept continence, not coming near mine own wife, and in those hundred years the hair of mine head grew not in greatness, neither was my raiment soiled. And I besought men at that time, saying: Repent, for a flood of waters cometh upon you. But they mocked me and derided my words; and again they said unto me: This is the time of them that would play and sin as much as they will, that have leave to fornicate not a little (lat. confused; other versions omit): for God looketh not on these things, neither knoweth what is done of us men, and moreover there is no flood of waters coming upon this world. And they ceased not from their sins until God blotted out all flesh that had the breath of life in it. But know thou that God loveth one righteous man more than all the world of the wicked. Therefore blessed art thou, O Paul, and blessed is the people that hath believed by thy means.

51 And I turned myself and saw other righteous ones coming from afar off, and I asked the angel: Who are these, Lord? and he answered me: These are Elias and Eliseus. And they greeted me, and I said unto them: Who are ye? And one of them answered and said: I am Elias the prophet of God. I am Elias that prayed, and because of my word the heaven rained not for three years and six months, because of the iniquities of men. Righteous and true is God, who doeth the will of his servants; for oftentimes the angels besought the Lord for rain, and he said: Be patient until my servant Elias pray and entreat for this, and I will send rain upon the earth.

And he gave not, until I called upon him again; then he gave unto them. But blessed art thou, O Paul, that thy generation and those thou teachest are the sons of the kingdom. And know thou, O Paul, that every man who believes through thee hath a great blessing, and a blessing is reserved for him. Then he departed from me.

And the angel who was with me led me forth, and said unto me: Lo, unto thee is given this mystery and revelation: as thou pleasest, make it known unto the sons of men.

And I, Paul, returned unto myself, and I knew all that I had seen: and in life I had not rest that I might reveal this mystery, but I wrote it and deposited it under the ground and the foundations of the house of a certain faithful man with whom I used to be in Tarsus a city of Cilicia. And when I was released from this life of time, and stood before my Lord, thus said he unto me: Paul, have we shown all these things unto thee that thou shouldst deposit them under the foundations of a house? Then send and disclose concerning this revelation, that men may read it and turn to the way of truth, that they also may not come to these bitter torments.

Unitary and instrumentalist anthropological models as keys to interpreting the structure of Patristic eschatology

(Jovinian opposed the idea of degrees of reward and punishment, and this article is a good source for the arguments of the Church Fathers who discussed this issue)

5.2.4. The controversy with Jovinian

It was maintained by many Patristic writers that there were distinctions of rewards and the corresponding glory of the resurrection body among the righteous.<sup>80</sup> The principal passages used in support of this idea were John 14:2, in my Father's house there are many mansions,<sup>81</sup> and 1 Corinthians 15:41, The sun has one kind of splendour, the moon another and the stars another; and star differs from star in splendour.<sup>82</sup> Differences of punishment for the wicked are also asserted on such grounds as that "it will be more tolerable for the land of Sodom on the day of judgement" than for those who rejected Christ.<sup>83</sup> The most extensive discussion of this subject is perhaps that found in the rebuttal by Jerome of the view held by Jovinian,<sup>84</sup> namely that there were no differences in the rewards or punishments given to the dead at the judgement: the same reward or punishment was given to all.<sup>85</sup> Jovinian was opposing the view that differences of reward and punishment were associated with different earthly states: virgins, widows, wives, monks, priests, laymen. Jovinian also taught the equality of marriage and virginity,<sup>86</sup> the uselessness of fasting, and that the baptised could not be induced to sin by the devil.<sup>87</sup>

Jerome saw his rejection of the differences of rewards and punishments as an attack on the value of the merits of the saints, and a denial of the seriousness of the depravity of some sinners, since all were punished alike.<sup>88</sup> While the details of the controversy take us away from our theme, it is of interest in that here Jerome is specifically defending the idea that while it is valid to distinguish between the just and the unjust, as Jovinian did, it is also legitimate to make distinctions among those in each group.

To establish his position, Jovinian cited various passages of Scripture. In the parable of the ten virgins, five remained outside and five went in to the marriage feast. With Noah's ark, and in Sodom and Gomorrah, the righteous were delivered and the sinners perished. In Egypt the ten plagues fell with equal violence on all that sinned, and at the Red Sea the righteous passed over while the sinners were destroyed. Thus, at the judgement there will be two classes: the sheep and the goats, the just and the unjust. With these and similar examples, Jovinian sought to show there were only two classes: the sinners and the righteous.<sup>89</sup>

Jerome attempts to refute Jovinian by showing that in the parable of the sower [Matthew 13], there were three degrees of fruitfulness and of sterility,<sup>90</sup> while Jovinian focused on the fact that there was a difference between good soil and bad soil. Similarly he accepts that there is a distinction between the good and the bad, as in the examples given by Jovinian, but he then asks:

But what are we to think of your assertion, that because there is a division into good and bad, the good, or the bad it may be, are not distinguished one from another, and that it makes no difference whether one is a ram in the flock or a poor little sheep?<sup>91</sup>

Jovinian had argued that as one star differs from another in glory, so spiritual persons differ from carnal. He argues that the one who calls his brother a fool, a murderer and an adulterer, will all be sent to Gehenna, in spite of the differences in their sins.

Similarly some martyrs were burned, some were strangled, and some beheaded, but all share the same victor's crown. He cites especially the parable of the labourers in the vineyard who all laboured for different periods, but were all nevertheless paid the same wages.<sup>92</sup> Jerome argues that this is twisting Scripture with perverse ingenuity, and a Stoic outlook on rewards and punishments.<sup>93</sup> He says that to say that all sins are equal is to say that all deserve the same punishment, and a hungry man stealing food is as guilty as a murderer. He wishes to maintain the distinction of merits and punishments, correlated with the distinctions in the resurrection bodies among both the wicked and the just, so that we do not all receive identical rewards and punishments.<sup>94</sup> Jerome argues from Ezekiel 34:17, I will judge between one sheep and another, and between rams and goats, that God will indeed distinguish not only between the sinners and the saints, but also between those in each group.<sup>95</sup>

Jerome uses many other texts to establish his case, and he is convinced of the justice of making distinctions among the righteous and among the wicked, seeing them as deserving of different rewards and punishments.<sup>96</sup> A similar argument is found in the works of Ambrose, who also wrote against Jovinian.<sup>97</sup> Again 1 Corinthians 15:40-44 is used to support this idea.

All men rise again, but let no one lose heart, and let not the just grieve at the common lot of rising again, since he awaits the chief fruit of his virtue. All indeed shall rise again, but, as says the Apostle, each in his own order. The fruit of the divine mercy is common to all, but the order of merit differs. The day gives light to all, the sun warms all, the rain fertilises the possessions of all with genial showers. We are all born, and we shall all rise again, but in each state, whether of living or of living again, grace differs and the condition differs.<sup>98</sup>

The phrase, each in his own order, was thus understood by Ambrose to refer to the differing merits of those raised,<sup>99</sup> as can be seen from his view that the resurrection is an "order of grace" in which "all are raised again in a moment, yet all are raised in the order of their merits."<sup>100</sup>

Chrysostom answers the problem of the differences of rewards not by the distinction of the groups who shall face judgement, but by distinctions in the glory of the resurrection which the righteous share, as well as the differences in the resurrection bodies of the sinners. Some receive honour and others dishonour, fates which are reflected in the character of the bodies they receive.all

As he also said in the former epistle, We shall all be raised, but each in his own order [1 Corinthians 15:22,23]. And, There are celestial bodies, and bodies terrestrial [1 Corinthians 15:40]. For the resurrection indeed is common to all, but the glory is not common; but some shall rise in honour and others in dishonour, and some to a kingdom but others to punishment.<sup>101</sup>

The resurrection is general, he says, as indicated in 1 Corinthians 15 by the image of the seed, and all will be raised; but the honour received by each differs, and only those who are in Christ are raised in glory.<sup>102</sup> The difference between the resurrection bodies is described by Paul in the imagery of the differences between the sun, the moon and the stars. Thus there are also distinctions between the different saints, as well as a general distinction between the saints and the sinners. Chrysostom insists that while disbelief in the resurrection results in carelessness about behaviour (on the assumption there is no judgement to face), the idea that all receive the same reward makes people lazy. Just as the sun, moon and stars are all in the heavens yet differ in their glory, so too all the believers will be saved but will differ in their rewards. Nor will all sinners receive the same punishment.<sup>103</sup> He maintains then, as did many other Patristic writers, that there are distinctions of merit in the resurrection, and different degrees of glory for the saints. The consistent conclusion drawn from making distinctions among those resurrected is the distinctions of rewards and punishments.

Emma Disley states that “The writings of the Fathers were weightily disposed towards the concept of degrees of reward and punishment...”<sup>104</sup> She argues that

Men’s ideas of a hierarchic heaven seem to have been constructed to reflect social patterns on earth: the notion of an equality of heavenly bliss, or of hellish torments, seems to have played no part in the medieval picture of the hereafter. Jovinian’s ideas, that all sins are equal and that there is but one grade of punishment and one of reward in the future states, seem to have been effectively silenced after their condemnation at the synods of Rome and Milan (c. 390).

Jerome’s refutation of Jovinian had been constructed upon the argument that all sins are not equal, and that degrees of holiness (Jerome referred specifically to chastity and martyrdom) attained in this life, are intimately linked with our future position within the hierarchy of heaven. It seemed self-evident that some sins were graver than others, that a truly evil man would receive severer punishments in the depths of hell than one who had committed sins of a more “trivial” nature. Hence the Church’s division of sins into classes of “venial” and “mortal.”...

Once the notion of varying degrees of torment in hell had been accepted, it seemed logical to extend the idea to heaven and to varying degrees of reward, associated with the varying degrees of holiness achieved in this life.<sup>105</sup>

The notion of a hierarchy is inconsistent with a coherent concept of the people of God, with a diversity of offices, which does not elevate one office over others which are subordinated to it.<sup>106</sup>

Notes:

80 Augustine also asserts, but without giving textual support, that there shall be degrees of reward, apparently considering it evident enough, as he says simply “it cannot be doubted that there shall be degrees [of honour and glory].” The City of God 22.30. NPNF 1/2, p. 510. See also Ambrose. Exposition of the Gospel according to Luke 7.220. PL 15, 1848. Letter 42 to Siricius. PL 16, 1172-1177.

81 For example, an early use of John 14:2 (in conjunction with Matthew 13:8) which leads to the idea of the distinctions of rewards is found in Irenaeus. Against Heresies 5.36.2. ANF 1, p. 567.

82 Cf. for instance Augustine, who cites 1 Corinthians 15:40-43 and says, "You see, glory was promised to the bodies of the saints and different degrees of glory because the merits of charity are different." Sermon 241.8. FC 38, p. 263. Augustine discusses these two passages in other places. Tractate in John 67.2. NPNF 1/7, p. 321. Tractate in John 68.3. NPNF 1/7, pp. 323-324. However, Jerome interprets Daniel 12:3 to mean that the "learned teachers" will shine brighter than the "righteous who are without learning," so that there are different degrees of glory depending on intellectual attainment, an elitist idea at odds with the gospel. Commentary on Daniel 12.3. G L Archer, pp. 146-147. This is also found in another of his writings: "In the close of his most solemn vision Daniel declares that the righteous shall shine as the stars; and the wise, that is the learned, as the firmament. You can see, therefore, how great is the difference between righteous ignorance and instructed righteousness. Those who have the first are compared with the stars, those who have the second with the heavens. Yet, according to the exact sense of the Hebrew, both statements may be understood of the learned, for it is to be read in this way: They that be wise shall shine as the brightness of the firmament; and they that turn many to righteousness as the stars forever and ever." Jerome. Letter 53.3. NPNF 2/6, pp. 97-98. Cf. by way of contrast the words of Herman Bavinck on his deathbed: "My learning does not help me now; neither does my Dogmatics; faith alone saves me." 85 For Jovinian the equality of all Christians based on their common baptism was the starting point of his thought. David G Hunter. "Resistance to the virginal ideal in late fourth-century Rome: the case of Jovinian." Theological Studies 48 (1987) 47.

86 Augustine attacked this view in his tractate Of Holy Virginity 6, where for instance he asserted that virgins give birth to spiritual children in Christ, while mothers give birth to fleshly children in Adam. NPNF 1/3, p. 419. Jovinian was also condemned for his view in an encyclical of pope Siricius. Letter 7. Against Jovinian the heretic. PL 13, 1168-1172. Siricius also wrote the first papal document insisting on clerical celibacy. Decretal to Bishop Himerius. PL 13, 1131-1147. See the discussion of these documents by Daniel Callam. "Clerical continence in the fourth century: Three papal decretals." Theological Studies 41 (1980) 3-50.

87 David G Hunter has shown that Jovinian was attacking the Manichean heresy, and that each of his points has its opposite proposition in Manichean teaching as well as in Priscillianism. The sensitivity of Jerome and Ambrose to the views of Jovinian is because their exegesis of the Scriptural passages in dispute is identical to that of the Manicheans and the Priscillianists, whom Jovinian was attacking. Hunter says that while Augustine tried to distinguish between Manichean and orthodox Christian asceticism, Jovinian tried to undercut the appeal to asceticism as such, since he saw it as a denigration of the goodness of marriage and bodily life. As a result, Jovinian held to the equality of the rewards for the saints, with no advantage given to ascetics. "Resistance to the virginal ideal in late fourth-century Rome: the case of Jovinian." Theological Studies 48 (1987) 45-64.

88 However, although both Jerome and Jovinian agreed that all sins can be forgiven in baptism, Jovinian opposed the idea of rank among Christians whether here or hereafter. Elizabeth Clark. "The place of 90 This idea appears also in Irenaeus. Against Heresies 5.36.2. ANF 1, p. 567. Pseudo-Cyprian. Sermo de centesima, sexagesima, tricesima. PLS 1, 53-67, identifies the "thirty-fold" fruit of the seed as the reward of married people who practice chastity. Brian E Daley. The hope of the early Church, p. 234, n. 13. 91 Jerome. Against Jovinian 2.22. NPNF 2/6, p. 404. Jerome said elsewhere that if a human king is not satisfied with a single order of servants, instead of a hierarchy of officers, why should God, the King of kings, accept this? Commentary on Ephesians 1. PL 26, 491-492. Cited in: Elizabeth Clark. "The place of Jerome's Commentary on Ephesians in the Origenist controversy: the apokatastasis and ascetic ideals." Vigiliae Christianae 41 (1987) 160.

92 Cited by Jerome. Against Jovinian 2.20. NPNF 2/6, p. 403. Tertullian had earlier used this text to demonstrate the equality of all but the difference in the reward given. "Consequently, we who shall be with God shall be together; since we shall all be with the one God - albeit the wages be various, albeit there be "many mansions" in the house of the same Father - having laboured for the "one penny" of the self-same hire, that is, of eternal life..." On Monogamy 10. ANF 4, p. 67. Thus Tertullian provides a precedent for Jovinian's interpretation, even though he wishes to allow for different rewards as well.

93 Jerome also accused Jovinian of being an Epicurean (Against Jovinian 1.1, 1.4, 2.6, 2.21, 2.36. NPNF 2/6, pp. 346-416) as did Augustine (Letter 167.2.4. NPNF 1/1, p. 534). This Patristic tendency to trace heretical ideas to pagan philosophers such as Epicurus is frequently based on a gross oversimplification of the ideas of both Epicurus and the opponents of the Fathers, but was used to impute hedonistic motives to anyone who cast aspersions on the value placed on ascetic life. R Jungkuntz. "Fathers, Heretics and Epicureans." Journal of Ecclesiastical History 17 (1966) 3-10. It is interesting to note that Jerome's treatise against Jovinian "marks the full revival of his unrestrained use of the pagan classics and of 'rhetoric'." J N D Kelly. Jerome. His life, writings and controversies, p. 182.

94 Elizabeth Clark argues that the desire to allow for a heavenly hierarchy with distinctions of merits based on ascetic renunciation is one reason why Jerome rejected Origen's doctrine of apokatastasis, which did not allow for this because of the universal restitution to goodness. This is found in his Commentary on Ephesians which he wrote before the controversy with Jovinian, as well as in his Letter 84.7. NPNF 2/6, p. 179. "The place of Jerome's Commentary on Ephesians in the Origenist controversy: the apokatastasis and ascetic ideals." Vigiliae Christianae Against Jovinian 2.21-22. NPNF 41 (1987) 155.

95 Jerome. 2/6, p. 404.

96 Cf. Herman Bavinck, who also says there are distinctions of rewards and punishments, basing his view on passages such as Romans 2:6, 12, Matthew 10:15, 11:22, 24, 16:27, Luke 12:47. Our Reasonable Faith, p. 565.

97 Jovinian was condemned in a letter by Ambrose [Letter 42, to Siricius. PL 16, 1172-1177] resulting from a synod in Milan. On another occasion Ambrose also condemned two monks who taught much the same ideas, labelling them Epicureans. Letter 63.7-19. NPNF 2/10, pp. 457-459. Ambrose also condemned the Novatianists who considered all sins alike. On repentance 1.5. NPNF 2/10, p. 330.

This idea appears in one of Chrysostom’s earliest writings. “He shall reward every man according to his works [Romans 2:6]. And not only in hell, but also in the kingdom one will find many differences, for he said, in my Father’s house are many mansions, and, there is one glory of the sun, and another glory of the moon. And what wonder, if in dealing with such great matters he has spoken with such precision, seeing that He declares there is a difference in that world even between one star and another?” To the fallen Theodore 1.19. #### Letter XLII to Pope Siricius regarding Jovinian

In this, their reply to Siricius, drawn up in all probability by S. Ambrose himself, the Council of Milan thank him for his care, and announce that they have followed his example and condemned Jovinian and his followers in the same way. They dwell upon his errors, particularly on his disparagement of virginity, on his denial of the true virginity of our Lord's Mother, on his contempt of widowhood, and of fasting, and condemn him as a follower of Manes. They argue in especial detail against his argument with regard to the Virgin Mary, which differs from that of Helvidius and other assailants.

To their Lord, their Dearly Beloved Brother, Pope Siricius: Ambrose, Sabinus, Bassanius, and the Rest Send Greeting.

1. In your Holiness' Letter we recognized the vigilance of a good shepherd, for you faithfully guard the door which has been entrusted to you, and with pious solicitude watch over the fold of Christ, being worthy to be heard and followed by the sheep of the Lord. Knowing therefore the lambs of Christ, you will easily discover the wolves, and meet them as a wary shepherd, so as to keep them from scattering the Lord's flock by their unbelieving life and dismal barking.

2. We praise you for this, our Lord and brother dearly beloved, and join in cordial commendations of it. Nor are we surprised that the Lord's flock was terrified at the rage of wolves in whom they recognized not the voice of Christ. For it is a savage barking to shew no reverence to virginity, observe no rule of chastity, to seek to place every thing on a level, to abolish the different degrees of merit, and to introduce a certain meagreness in heavenly rewards, as if Christ had only one palm to bestow, and there was no copious diversity in His rewards.

3. They pretend that they are giving honour to marriage. But what praise can rightly be given to marriage if no distinction is paid to virginity? We do not deny that marriage was hallowed by Christ, for the Divine words say, And they twain shall be one flesh, and one spirit, but our birth precedes our calling, and the mystery of the Divine operation is much more excellent than the remedy of human frailty. A good wife is deservedly praised, but a pious virgin is more properly preferred, for the Apostle says, He that giveth his virgin in marriage doeth well, but he that giveth her not in marriage doeth better; for the one careth for the things of the Lord, the other for the things of the world. The one is bound by the chains of marriage, the other is free from chains; the one is under the Law, the other under Grace. Marriage is good, for thereby the means of continuing the human race has been devised, but virginity is better, for thereby the heritage of the heavenly kingdom is regained, and the mode of attaining to heavenly rewards discovered. By a woman care entered the world; by a virgin salvation was brought to pass. Lastly, Christ chose virginity as His own special gift, and displayed the grace of chastity, thus making an exhibition of that in His own person which in His Mother He had made the object of His choice.

18. His fourth and last contention is that there are two classes, the sheep and the goats, the just and the unjust: that the just stand on the right hand, the other on the left: and that to the just the words are spoken: S. Matt. xxv. 34. "Come, ye blessed of my Father, and inherit the kingdom prepared for you from the foundation of the world." But that sinners are thus addressed: S. Matt. xxv. 41. "Depart from me, ye cursed, into the eternal fire which is prepared for the devil and his angels." That a good tree cannot bring forth evil fruit, nor an evil tree good fruit. Hence it is that the Saviour says to the Jews: S. John viii. 44. "Ye are of your father the devil, and the lusts of your father it is your will to do." He quotes the parable of the ten virgins, the wise and the foolish, and shows that the five who had no oil remained outside, but that the other five who had gotten for themselves the light of good works went into the marriage with the bridegroom. He goes back to the flood, and tells us that they who were righteous like Noah were saved, but that the sinners perished all together. We are informed that among the men of Sodom and Gomorrha no difference is made except between the two classes of the good and the bad. The righteous are delivered, the sinners are consumed by the same fire. There is one salvation for those who are released, one destruction for those who stay behind. Lot's wife is a clear warning that we must not deviate a hair's breadth from right. If, however, he says, you object and ask me why the righteous toils in time of peace, or in the midst of persecution, if he is to gain nothing nor have a greater reward, I would assert that he does this, not that he may gain a further reward but that he may not lose what he has already received. In Egypt also the ten plagues fell with equal violence upon all that sinned, and the same darkness hung over master and slave, noble and ignoble, the king and the people. Again at the Red Sea the righteous all passed over, the sinners were all overwhelmed. Six hundred thousand men, besides those who were unfit for war through age or sex, all alike fell in the desert, and two who were alike in righteousness are alike delivered. For forty years all Israel toiled and died alike. As regards food, an homer of manna was the measure for all ages: the clothes of all alike did not wear out: the hair of all alike did not grow, nor the beard increase: the shoes of all lasted the same time. Their feet grew not hard: the food in the mouths of all had the same taste. They went on their way to one resting place with equal toil and equal reward. All Hebrews had the same Passover, the same Feast of Tabernacles, the same Sabbath, the same New Moons. In the seventh, the Sabbatical Year, all prisoners were released without distinction of persons, and in the year of Jubilee all debts were forgiven to all debtors, and he who had sold land returned to the inheritance of his fathers.

19. Then, again, as regards the parable of the sower in the Gospel, we read that the good ground brought forth fruit, some a hundred fold, some sixty fold, and some thirty fold; and, on the other hand, that the bad ground admitted of three degrees of sterility: but Jovinianus makes only two classes, the good soil and the bad. S. Matt. xix. 29; S. Mark x. 29, 30; S. Luke xviii. 29, 30. And as in one Gospel our Lord promises the Apostles a hundred fold, in another seven fold, for leaving children and wives, and in the world to come life eternal; and the seven and the hundred mean the same thing: so, too, in the passage before us, the numbers describing the fertility of the soil need not create any difficulty, particularly when the Evangelist Mark gives the inverse order, thirty, sixty, and a hundred. The Lord says, S. John vi. 56. "He that eateth my flesh and drinketh my blood abideth in me, and I in him." As, then, there are not varying degrees of Christ's presence in us, so neither are there degrees of our abiding in Christ. S. John xiv. 23. "Every one that loveth me will keep my word: and my Father will love him, and we will come unto him, and make our abode with him." He that is righteous, loves Christ: and if a man thus loves, the Father and the Son come to him, and make their abode with him. Now I suppose that when the guest is such as this the host cannot possibly lack anything. And if our Lord says, S. John xiv. 2. "In my Father's house are many mansions," His meaning is not that there are different mansions in the kingdom of heaven, but He indicates the number of Churches in the whole world, for though the Church be seven-fold she is but one. "I go," He says, "to prepare a place for you," not places. If this promise is peculiar to the twelve apostles, then Paul is shut out from that place, and the chosen vessel will be thought superfluous and unworthy. John and James, because they asked more than the others, did not obtain it; and yet their dignity is not diminished, because they were equal to the rest of the apostles. 1 Cor. iii. 16; vi. 19. "Know ye not that your bodies are a temple of the Holy Ghost?" A temple, He says, not temples, in order to show that God dwells in all alike. S. John xvii. 20–23. "Neither for these only do I pray, but for them also that believe on me through their word; as thou, Father, in me, and I in thee, are one, so they may be all one in us. And the glory which thou hast given me I have given unto them. I have loved them, as thou hast loved me. And as we are Father, Son, and Holy Ghost, one God, so may they be one people in themselves, that is, like dear children, partakers of the divine nature." Call the Church what you will, bride, sister, mother, her assembly is but one and never lacks husband, brother, or son. Her faith is one, and she is not defiled by variety of doctrine, nor divided by heresies. She continues a virgin. Whithersoever the Lamb goeth, she follows Him: she alone knows the Song of Christ.

20. "If you tell me," says he, "that one star differeth from another star in glory, I reply, that one star does differ from another star; that is, spiritual persons differ from carnal. We love all the members alike, and do not prefer the eye to the finger, nor the finger to the ear: but the loss of any one is attended by the sorrow of all the rest. We all alike come into this world, and we all alike depart from it. There is one Adam of the earth, and another from heaven. The earthly Adam is on the left hand, and will perish: the heavenly Adam is on the right hand, and will be saved. He who says to his brother, 'thou fool,' and 'raca,' will be in danger of Gehenna. And the murderer and the adulterer will likewise be sent into Gehenna. In times of persecution some are burnt, some strangled, some beheaded, some flee, or die within the walls of a prison: the struggle varies in kind, but the victors' crown is one. No difference was made between the son who had never left his father, and his brother who was welcomed as a returning penitent. To the labourers of the first hour, the third, the sixth, the ninth, and the eleventh, the same reward of a penny was given, and what may perhaps seem still more strange to you, the first to receive the reward were they who had toiled least in the vineyard."

21. Who is there even of God's elect that would not be disturbed at these and similar passages of Holy Scripture which our crafty opponent, with a perverse ingenuity, twists to the support of his own views? The Apostle John says that many Antichrists had come, and to make no difference between John himself and the lowest penitent is the preaching of a real Antichrist. At the same time, I am amazed at the portentous forms which Jovianus, as slippery as a snake and like another Proteus, so rapidly assumes. In sexual intercourse and full feeding he is an Epicurean; in the distribution of rewards and punishments he all at once becomes a Stoic. He exchanges Jerusalem in Cyprus, where Zeno the founder of the Stoic school was born. Cition, Judæa for Cyprus, Christ for Zeno. If we may not depart a hair's breadth from virtue, and all sins are equal, and a man who in a fit of hunger steals a piece of bread is no less guilty than he who slays a man: you must, in your turn, be held guilty of the greatest crimes. The case is different if you say that you have no sin, not even the least, and if, although all apostles and prophets and all the saints (as I have maintained in dealing i.e., Jovianus. Jerome for the moment addresses the reader. his second proposition) bewail their sinfulness, you alone boast of your righteousness. But a minute ago you were barefooted: now you not only wear shoes, but decorated ones. Just now you wore a rough coat and a dirty shirt, you were grimy, and haggard, and your hand was horny with toil: now you are clad in linen and silks, and strut like an exquisite in the fashions of the Atrebatæ and the Laodiceans. Your cheeks are ruddy, your skin sleek, your hair smoothed down in front and behind, your belly protrudes, your shoulders are little mountains, your neck full and so loaded with fat that the half-smothered words can scarce make their escape. Surely in such extremes of dress and mode of life there must be sin on the one side or the other. I will not assert that the sin lies in the food or clothing, but that such fickleness and changing for the worse is almost censurable in itself. And what we censure, is far removed from virtue; and what is far from virtue becomes the property of vice; and what is proved to be vicious is one with sin. Now sin, according to you, is placed on the left hand, and corresponds to the goats. You must, therefore, return to your old habits if you are to be a sheep on the right hand; or, if you perversely repent of your former views and change them for others, whether you like it or not, and although you shave off your beard, you will be reckoned among the goats.

22. But what is the good of calling Persius I. 128, Conington's translation. one-eyed man Old One-eye, and of showing the inconsistency of an assailant, when we have to refute a whole series of statements? That the sheep and the goats on the right hand and on the left are the two classes of the righteous and the wicked, I do not deny. That a good tree does not bring forth evil fruit, nor an evil one good fruit, no one doubts. The ten virgins also, wise and foolish, we divide into good and bad. We are not ignorant that at the deluge the righteous were delivered, and sinners overwhelmed with the waters. That at Sodom and Gomorrhæ the just man was rescued, while the sinners were consumed by fire, is clear to everyone. We are also aware that Egypt was stricken with the ten plagues, and that Israel was saved. Even little children in our schools sing how the righteous passed through the Red Sea, and Pharaoh with his host was drowned. That six hundred thousand fell in the desert because they were unbelieving, and that two only entered the land of promise, is taught by Scripture; and so is the rest of your description of the two classes, good and bad, down to the labourers in the vineyard. But what are we to think of your assertion, that because there is a division into good and bad, the good, or the bad it may be, are not distinguished one from another, and that it makes no difference whether one is a ram in the flock or a poor little sheep? whether the sheep have the first or the second fleece? whether the flock is diseased and covered with the scab, or full of life and vigour? Ezek. xxxiv. 17, 20, 21. especially when by the authoritative utterances of His own prophet Ezekiel God clearly points out the difference between flock and flock of His rational sheep, saying, "Behold I judge between cattle and cattle, and between the rams and the he-goats, and between the fat cattle and the lean. Because ye have thrust with side and with shoulder, and pushed all the diseased with your horns, until they were scattered abroad." And that we might know what the cattle were, He immediately added: Ezek. xxxiv. 31. "Ye my flock, the flock of my pasture, are men." Will Paul and that penitent who had lain with his father's wife be on an equality, because the latter repented and was received into the Church: and shall the offender because he is with him on the right hand shine with the same glory as the Apostle? How is it then that tares and wheat grow side by side in the same field until the harvest, that is the end of the world? What is the significance of good and bad fish being contained in the Gospel net? Why, in Noah's ark, the type of the Church, are there different animals with different abodes according to their rank? Why standeth the queen upon the Lord's right hand, in raiment of wrought gold, in a vesture of gold? Why had Joseph, representing Christ, a coat of many colours? Why does the Apostle say to the Romans: Rom. xii. 3 sq. "According as God had dealt to each man a measure of faith. For even as we have 405 many members in one body, and all the members have not the same office: so we, who are many, are one body in Christ, and severally members one of another. And having gifts differing according to the grace that was given to us, whether prophecy, let us prophesy according to the proportion of our faith; or ministry, let us give ourselves to our ministry; or he that teacheth, to his teaching; or he that exhorteth, to his exhorting: he that giveth, let him do it with liberality; he that ruleth, with diligence,” and so on. And elsewhere: Rom. xiv. 5. “One man esteemeth one day above another: another esteemeth every day alike. Let every man be fully persuaded in his own mind.” To the Corinthians he says: 1 Cor. iii. 6 sq. “I have planted, Apollos watered: but God gave the increase. So then, neither is he that planteth any thing, neither he that watereth: but God that giveth the increase. Now he that planteth and he that watereth are one: and every man shall receive his own reward according to his own labour. For we are labourers together with God, ye are God’s husbandry, ye are God’s building.” And again elsewhere: 1 Cor. iii. 10 sq. “According to the grace of God which is given unto me, as a wise master-builder I laid a foundation, and another buildeth thereon. But let each man take heed how he buildeth thereupon. For other foundation can no man lay, than that which is laid, which is Jesus Christ. But if any man buildeth on the foundation, gold, silver, costly stones, wood, hay, stubble: each man’s work shall be made manifest: for the day shall reveal it, because it is revealed in fire: and the fire itself shall prove each man’s work of what sort it is. If any man’s work shall abide which he built thereon, he shall receive a reward. If any man’s work shall be burned, he shall suffer loss: but he himself shall be saved; yet so as through fire.” If the man whose work is burnt and is to suffer the loss of his labour, while he himself is saved, yet not without proof of fire: it follows that if a man’s work remains which he has built upon the foundation, he will be saved without probation by fire, and consequently a difference is established between one degree of salvation and another. Again in another place he says: 1 Cor. iv. 1, 2. “Let a man so account of us, as of ministers of Christ, and stewards of the mysteries of God. Here, moreover, it is required in stewards, that a man be found faithful.” Would you be assured that between one steward and another there is a great difference (I am not speaking of bad and good, but of the good themselves who stand on the right hand)? then listen to the sequel: 1 Cor. ix. 13 sq. “Know ye not that they which minister about the sacrifices, eat of the sacrifices, and they which wait upon the altar have their portion with the altar? Even so did the Lord ordain that they which proclaim the gospel should live of the gospel. But I have used none of these things: and I wrote not these things that it may be so done in my case: for it were good for me rather to die, than that any man should make my glorying void. For if I preach the gospel, I have nothing to glory of; for necessity is laid upon me; for woe is unto me if I preach not the gospel. For if I do this of mine own will, I have a reward: but if not of mine own will, I have a steward-ship intrusted to me. What then is my reward? That, when I preach the gospel, I may make the gospel without charge, so as not to use to the full my right in the gospel. For though I was free from all men, I brought myself under bondage to all, that I might gain the more.” You surely cannot say that men commit sin by living by the Gospel, and partaking of the sacrifices. Of course not. The Lord himself made the rule that they who preach the Gospel, should live by the Gospel. But an Apostle who does not abuse this freedom, but labours with his hands that he may not be a burden to anyone, and toils night and day and ministers to his companions of course does this, that for his greater toil he may receive a greater reward.

23. Let us hasten to what remains. 1 Cor. xii. 4. “There are diversities of gifts, but the same Spirit. And there are diversities of ministrations, and the same Lord. And there are diversities of operations, but the same God who worketh all things in all. But to each one is given the manifestation of the Spirit to profit withal.” And again: 1 Cor. xii. 12. “As the body is one, and hath many members, and all the members of the body, being many, are one body: so also is Christ.” But he precludes you from saying that the different members of the one body have the same rank; for he immediately describes the orders of the Church, and says: 1 Cor. xii. 28 sq. “And God hath set some in the Church, first, apostles; secondly, prophets; thirdly, teachers; then miracles, then gifts of healings, helps, governments, divers kinds of tongues. Are all apostles? are all prophets? are all teachers? are all workers of miracles? have all gifts of healings? do all speak with tongues? do all interpret? But desire earnestly the greater gifts. And a still more excellent way shew I unto you.” And after discoursing more in detail of the graces of 406 charity, he added: 1 Cor. xiii. 8, 9, 10. “Whether there be prophecies, they shall be done away; whether there be tongues, they shall cease; whether there be knowledge, it shall be done away. For we know in part, and we prophesy in part: but when that which is perfect is come, then that which is in part shall be done away.” And afterwards we read: 1 Cor. xiii. 18; xiv. 1. “But now abideth faith, hope, love, these three; and the greatest of these is love. Follow after love; yet desire earnestly spiritual gifts, but rather that ye may prophesy.” And again: 1 Cor. xiv. 5. “I would have you all speak with tongues, but rather that ye should prophesy: and greater is he that prophesieth than he that speaketh with tongues.” And again: 1 Cor. xiv. 18. “I thank God, I speak with tongues more than you all.” Where there are different gifts, and one man is greater, another less, and all are called spiritual, they are all certainly sheep, and they stand on the right hand; but there is a difference between one sheep and another. It is humility that leads the Apostle Paul to say: 1 Cor. xv. 9, 10. “I am the least of the apostles, that am not meet to be called an apostle, because I persecuted the church of God. But by the grace of God I am what I am: and his grace which was bestowed upon me was not found vain: but I laboured more abundantly than they all: yet not I, but the grace of God which was with me.” But the very fact of his thus humbling himself shows the possibility of there being apostles of higher or lower rank, and God is not unjust that He will forget the work of him who is called the chosen vessel of election, and who laboured more abundantly than they all, or assign equal rewards to unequal deserts. Afterwards we read, 1 Cor. xv. 22. “As in Adam all die, so also in Christ shall all be now alive. But each in his own order.” If each is to rise in his own order, it follows that those who rise are of different degrees of merit. 1 Cor. xv. 39. “All flesh is not the same flesh; but there is one flesh of men, and another flesh of beasts, and another flesh of birds, and another of fishes. There are also celestial bodies, and bodies terrestrial: but the glory of the celestial is one, and the glory of the terrestrial is another. There is one glory of the sun, and another glory of the moon, and another glory of the stars; for one star differeth from another star in glory. So also is the resurrection of the dead.” Like a learned commentator, you have explained this passage by saying that the spiritual differ from the carnal. It follows that in heaven there will be both spiritual and carnal persons, and not only will the sheep climb thither, but your goats also. “One star,” he says, “differeth from another star in glory”: this is not the distinction of sheep and goat, but of sheep and sheep, star and star. Lastly, he says, “there is one glory of the sun, and another glory of the moon.” But for this, you might maintain that the phrase one star from another star covers the whole human race; but he introduces the sun and moon, and you cannot possibly reckon them among the goats. “So,” says he, “is also the resurrection of the dead”—the just will shine with the brightness of the sun, and those of the next rank will glow with the splendour of the moon, so that one will be a Lucifer, another an Arcturus, a third an Orion, another Mazzaroth, or some other of the stars whose names are hollowed in the book of Job. Job ix. 9; xxxviii. 32. 2 Cor. v. 10. “For we all,” he says, “must be made manifest before the judgment-seat of Christ; that each one may receive the things done in the body, according to what he hath done, whether it be good or bad.” And you cannot say that the mode of our manifestation before the judgment-seat of Christ is such that the good receive good things, the bad evil things; for he 2 Cor. ix. 6. teaches us in the same epistle that he who soweth sparingly shall reap also sparingly, and he that soweth bountifully shall reap also bountifully. Surely he who sows more and he who sows less are both on the right side. And although they belong to the same class, that of the sower, yet they differ in respect of measure and number. The same Paul, writing to the Ephesians, says: Eph. iii. 10. “to the intent that now unto the principalities and the powers in the heavenly places might be made known through the church the manifold wisdom of God.” You observe that it is a varied and manifold wisdom of God which is spoken of as existing in the different ranks of the church. And in the same epistle we read, Eph. iv. 7. “Unto each one of us was the grace given according to the measure of the grace of Christ”: not that Christ’s measure varies, but only that so much of His grace is poured out as we can receive.

24. In vain, therefore, do you multiply instances of sheep and goats, of the five wise and five foolish virgins, of Egyptians and Israelites, and so forth, because retribution is not in the present, but will be in the future. Hence we find that the day of judgment is promised at the end of all things, because the judgment is not now. For it would be absurd to call the last day the day of judgment, if God were judging at the present time. Now we sail the ship, wrestle, and fight, that at last we may reach the haven, be crowned, and triumph. But you, with no less adroitness than perversity, make the life of this world illustrate that of the world to come, although we know full well that here unrighteousness prevails, there, righteousness: Ps. lxxiii. 17. “until we go into the sanctuary of God, and understand the end of those men.” The saint does not die one way, the sinner another. Those who sail the same sea have the same calm and storm. A violent death is not one thing to the robber, another to the martyr. Children are not born one way of adultery and prostitution, in another of pure marriage. Certainly our Lord and the robbers incurred the same penalty of crucifixion. If the judgment of this world and of that which is to come be the same, it follows that they who were here crucified side by side, will also be esteemed of equal rank hereafter. Paul and they who bound him, sailed together, endured the same storm, escaped together to the shore when the ship was broken with the waves. You cannot deny that the prisoner and the keepers were of unequal merit. And what were the circumstances of that same shipwreck of the Apostle and the soldiers? The Apostle Paul afterwards See Acts xxvii. 23 and the context. related a vision, and said that they who were with him in the ship had been given to him by the Lord. Are we to suppose that he to whom they were given, and they who were given to him, were of one degree of merit? Ten righteous men can save a sinful city. Lot together with his daughters was delivered from the fire: his sons-in-law would also have been saved, had they been willing to leave the city. Now there was surely a great difference between Lot and his sons-in-law. One city out of the five, Gen. xix. 18–21, Zoar, was saved, and a place which lay under the same sentence as Sodom, Gomorrhah, Admah, and Zeboiim, was preserved by the prayers of a holy man. Lot and Zoar were of different merit, but both of them escaped the fire. 1 Sam. xxx. 1. The robbers who in the absence of David had laid waste Ziklag, and made a prey of the wives and children of the inhabitants were slain on the third day in the plain, but forty men mounted on camels fled. Will you maintain that there was some difference between those who were slain and those who made good their escape? We read in the S. Luke xiii. 4. Gospel that the tower of Siloam fell upon eighteen men who perished in the ruins. Certainly our Saviour did not regard them as the only sinners: but they were punished to terrify the rest: it was like scourging a pestilent fellow to teach fools wisdom. If all sinners are punished alike, it is unjust for one to be slain while another is admonished by his comrade's death.

25. You raise the objection that all Israelites had the same measure of manna, an homer, and were alike in respect of dress, and hair, and beard, and shoes; as though we did not all alike partake of the body of Christ. In the Christian mysteries there is one means of sanctification for the master and the servant, the noble and the low-born, for the king and his soldiers, and yet, that which is one varies according to the merits of those who receive it. 1 Cor. xi. 27. "Whosoever shall eat or drink unworthily shall be guilty of the body and blood of the Lord." Does it follow that because Judas drank of the same cup as the rest of the apostles, that he and they are of equal merit? But suppose that we do not choose to receive the sacrament, at all events we all have the same life, breathe the same air, have the same blood in our veins, are fed on the same food. Moreover, if our viands are improved by culinary skill and are made more palatable for the consumer, food of this kind does not satisfy nature, but tickles the appetite. We are all alike subject to hunger, all alike suffer with cold: we alike are shrivelled with the frost, or melted with the broiling heat. The sun and the moon, and all the company of the stars, the showers, the whole world run their course for us all alike, and, as the Gospel tells us, the same refreshing rain falls upon all, good and bad, just and unjust. If the present is a picture of the future, then the Sun of Righteousness will rise upon sinners as well as upon the righteous, upon the wicked and the holy, upon the heathen as well as upon Jews and Christians, though the Scripture says, Mal. iv. 2. "Unto you that fear the Lord shall the Sun of Righteousness arise." If He will rise to those that fear, He will set to the despisers and the false prophets. The sheep which stand on the right hand will be brought into the kingdom of heaven, the goats will be thrust down to hell. The parable does not contrast the sheep one with another, or on the other hand the goats, but merely makes a difference between sheep and goats. The whole truth is not taught in a single passage: we must always bear in mind the exact point of an illustration. For instance, the ten virgins are not examples of the whole human race, but of the careful and the slothful: the former are ever anticipating the advent of our Lord, the latter abandon themselves to idle slumber without a thought of future judgment. And so at the end of the parable it is said, S. Matt. xxv. 13. "Watch, for ye know not the day, nor the hour." If at the deluge Noah was delivered, and the whole world perished, all men were flesh, and therefore were destroyed. You must either say that the sons of Noah and Noah for whose sake they were delivered were of unequal merit, or you must place the accursed Ham in the same rank as his father because he was delivered with him from the flood. At the passion of Christ all wavered, all were unprofitable together: there was none that did good, no not one. Will you therefore dare to say that Peter and the rest of the Apostles who fled denied the Saviour in the same sense as Caiaphas and the Pharisees and the people who cried out, S. John xix. 6. "Crucify him, crucify him"? And, to say no more about the Apostles, do you think Annas and Caiaphas, and Judas the traitor guilty of no greater crime than Pilate who was compelled against his will to give sentence against our Lord? The guilt of Judas is proportioned to his former merit, and the greater the guilt, the greater the penalty too. Wisd. vi. 7. "For the mighty shall mightily suffer torment." An evil tree does not bear good fruit, nor a good tree evil fruit. If this be so, tell me how it was that Paul though he was an evil tree and persecuted the Church of Christ, afterwards bore good fruit? And Judas, though he was a good tree and wrought miracles like the other Apostles, afterwards turned traitor and brought forth evil fruit? The truth is that a good tree does not bear evil fruit, nor an evil tree good fruit, so long as they continue in their goodness, or badness. And if we read that every Hebrew keeps the same Passover, and that in Ex. xxi. 2. the seventh year every prisoner is set free, and that at Jubilee, that is the fiftieth year, Lev. xxv. 13. every possession returns to its owner, all this refers not to the present, but to the future; for being in bondage during the six days of this world, on the seventh day, the true and eternal Sabbath, we shall be free, at any rate if we wish to be free while still in bondage in the world. If, however, we do not desire it, our ear will be bored in token of our disobedience, and together with our wives and children, whom we preferred to liberty, that is, with the flesh and its works, we shall be in perpetual slavery.

26. As for the parable of the sower which makes both good and bad ground bear a triple crop, and the passage from the apostle in which upon Christ as the foundation one man builds gold, silver, costly stones, another wood, hay, stubble, the meaning is perfectly clear. We know that in a great house there are different vessels, and to wish to contradict so plain a truth would be sheer impudence. Yet that Jovinianus may not triumph in a lie and quote the instance of the apostles by way of discrediting the hundred fold, sixty fold, and thirty fold, let me inform him that in S. Matt. xix. 29; S. Mark x. 30; S. Luke xviii. 30. In S. Matthew some authorities agree with S. Luke in reading "manifold." Matthew and Mark a hundred fold is promised to the apostles who had left all. And I would tell him further, that in the Gospel of Luke we find much more, that is πολύ πλείονα, and that there is absolutely no instance in the Gospels of a hundred standing for seven; and that he is convicted either of forgery, or of ignorance; and that our cause is not prejudiced by the fact that in one Gospel the enumeration begins at a hundred, in another at thirty, since it is a rule with all Scripture, and especially with the older writings, to put the lowest number first and so ascend by degrees to the higher. For instance, suppose one to say that so-and-so lived five and seventy and a hundred years, it does not follow that five and seventy are more than a hundred because they were first mentioned. If you do not on the side of good admit the difference between a hundred, sixty, and thirty, neither will you do so on the side of evil, and the seed which fell by the wayside, upon the rock, and among thorns, will be equally faulty. But if the former three, or the latter three, on the side of good, or on the side of evil respectively, are one and the same, it was foolish instead of speaking of two things to enumerate six kinds, and all the more because according to the account of the parable in Matthew, Mark, and Luke, the Saviour always added: "He that hath ears to hear, let him hear." Where there is no deep inner meaning, it is useless to draw our attention to the mystic sense.

27. You give it as your opinion that, since the Father and the Son make their abode with the faithful, and since Christ is their guest, nothing is lacking. I suppose, however, that Christ's abiding with the Corinthians was one thing, with the Ephesians another: it was one thing, I say, for Him to abide with those whom Paul blamed for many sins, another for Him to dwell with those to whom the apostle revealed mysteries hidden from the beginning of the world; one thing for Him to be in Titus and Timothy, another in Paul. Certainly amongst them that have been born of women, there has not arisen a greater than John the Baptist. But the term greater implies others who are less. And Matt. xi. 11. "he who is least in the kingdom of heaven is greater than he." You see then that in heaven one is greatest and another is least, and that among the angels and the 409 invisible creation there is a manifold and infinite diversity. Why do the apostles say: S. Luke xvii. 5. "Lord, increase our faith," if there is one measure for all? And why did our Lord rebuke His disciple, saying: Matt. xiv. 31. "O thou of little faith, wherefore didst thou doubt?" In Jeremiah also we read concerning the future kingdom: Jer. xxxi. 31. "Behold, the days come, saith the Lord, that I will make a new covenant with the house of Israel, and with the house of Judah not according to the covenant that I made with their fathers." And so on after: Jer. xxxi. 33, 34. "I will put my law in their inward parts, and in their heart will I write it; and I will be their God and they shall be my people: and they shall teach no more every man his neighbour, and every man his brother, saying, Know the Lord: for they shall all know me, from the least of them unto the greatest of them.” The context of this passage clearly shows that the prophet is describing the future kingdom, and how can there possibly be in it a least or greatest, if all are to be equal? The secret is disclosed in the Gospel: S. Matt. v. 19. “Whosoever shall do and teach, he shall be called great in the kingdom of heaven: but whosoever shall teach, and not do, shall be least.” S. Luke xiv. 9. The Saviour taught us at a feast to take the lowest place, lest, when one greater than us came, we should be thrust with disgrace from the higher place. If we cannot fall, but only raise ourselves by penitence, what is the meaning of the ladder at Bethel, on which the angels come from heaven to earth and descend as well as ascend? Surely while on that ladder they are reckoned among the sheep and stand on the right hand. There are angels who descend from heaven; but Jovinianus is sure that they retain their inheritance.

28. But when Jovinianus supposes that the many mansions in our Father’s house are churches scattered throughout the world, who can refrain from laughing; since Scripture plainly teaches in John’s Gospel that our Lord was discoursing not of the number of the churches, but of the heavenly mansions, and the eternal tabernacles for which the prophet longed? S. John xiv. 2, 3. “In my Father’s house,” He says, “are many mansions: if it were not so, I would have told you; for I go to prepare a place for you. And if I go and prepare a place for you I will come again, and will receive you unto myself, that where I am, there ye may be also.” The place and the mansions which Christ says He would prepare for the apostles are of course in the Father’s house, that is, in the kingdom of heaven, not on earth, where for the present He was leading the apostles. And at the same time regard must be had to the sense of Scripture: “I might tell you,” He says, “that I go to prepare a place for you, if there were not many mansions in my Father’s house, that is to say, if each individual did not prepare for himself a mansion through his own works rather than receive it through the bounty of God. The preparation is therefore not mine, but yours.” This view is supported by the fact that it profited Judas nothing to have a place prepared, since he lost it by his own fault. And we must interpret in the same way what our Lord says to the sons of Zebedee, one of whom wished to sit on His left hand, the other on His right: S. Matt. xx. 23. “My cup indeed ye shall drink: but to sit on my right hand, and on my left hand, is not mine to give, but it is for them for whom it hath been prepared of my Father.” It is not the Son’s to give; how then is it the Father’s to prepare? There are, He says, prepared in heaven, many different mansions, destined for many different virtues, and they will be awarded not to persons, but to persons’ works. In vain therefore do you ask of me what rests with yourselves, a reward which my Father has prepared for those whose virtues will entitle them to rise to such dignity. Again when He says: S. John xiv. 3. “I will come again, and will receive you unto myself: that where I am, there ye may be also,” He is speaking especially to the apostles, concerning whom it is elsewhere written, “That as I and thou, Father, are one, so they also may be one in us,” inasmuch as they have believed, have been perfected, and can say, Ps. lxxiii. 26. “the Lord is my portion.” If, however, there are not many mansions, how is it taught in the Old Testament correspondingly with the New, that the chief priest has one rank, the priests another, the Levites another, the door-keepers another, the sacristans another? How is it that in the Ez. xliv. 10 .book of Ezekiel, where a description is given of the future Church and of the heavenly Jerusalem, the priests who have sinned are degraded to the rank of sacristans and doorkeepers, and although they are in the temple of God, that is on the right hand, they are not among the rams, but among the poorest of the sheep? How again is it that in the river which flows from the temple, and replenishes the salt sea, and gives new life to everything, we read there are many kinds of fish? Why do we read that in the kingdom of heaven there are Archangels, Angels, Thrones, Dominions, Powers, Cherubim and Seraphim, and every name which is named, not only in this present world, but also that which is to come? A difference of name is meaningless where there is not a difference of rank. An Archangel is of course an Archangel to other inferior angels, and Powers, and Dominions have other spheres over which they exercise authority. This is what we find in heaven and in the administration of God. You must not therefore smile and sneer at us, as is your wont, for making a graduated series of emperors, præfects and counts, tribunes and centurions, companies, and all the other steps in the service.

29. It is mere trifling to quote the passage: 1 Cor. vi. 19. “Know ye not that your bodies are a temple of the Holy Ghost,” for it is customary in Holy Scripture to speak of a single object as though it were many, and of many as though they were one. And Jovinianus himself should know that even in a temple there are many divisions—the outer and the inner courts, the vestibules, the holy place, and the Holy of Holies. There are also in a temple kitchens, pantries, oil-cellars, and cupboards for the vessels. And so in the temple of our body there are different degrees of merit. God does not dwell in all alike, nor does He impart Himself to all in the same degree. A portion of the spirit of Moses was taken and given to the seventy elders. I suppose there is a difference between the abundance of the river, and that of the rivulets. Correctly, a portion of two, i.e., the portion of a first-born. Deut. xxi. 17. Elijah’s spirit was given in double measure to Elisha, and thus double grace wrought greater miracles. Elijah while living restored a dead man to life; Elisha after death did the same. Elijah invoked famine on the people; Elisha in a single day put the enemy’s forces in the power of the city which they besieged. No doubt the words, “Know ye not that your bodies are a temple of the Holy Ghost,” refer to the whole assembly of the faithful, who, joined together, make up the one body of Christ. But the question now is, who in the body is worthy to be the feet of Christ, and who the head? who is His eye, and who His hand?—a distinction indicated by the S. Luke vii., S. Matt. xxvi., S. Mark xiv., S. John xii. two women in the Gospel, the penitent and the holy woman, one of whom held His feet, the other His head. Some authorities, however, think there was only one woman, and that she who began at His feet gradually advanced to His head. Jovinianus further urges against us our Lord’s words, S. John xvii. 20, 21. “I pray not for these only, but also for those who shall believe on me through their word: that as I, Father, in thee and thou in me are one, so they all may be one in us,” and reminds us that the whole Christian people is one in God, and, as His well-beloved sons, are 2 Pet. i. 4. “partakers of the divine nature.” We have already said, and the truth must now be inculcated more in detail, that we are not one in the Father and the Son according to nature, but according to grace. For the essence of the human soul and the essence of God are not the same, as the Manichæans constantly assert. But, says our Lord: S. John xvii. 23. “Thou hast loved them as thou hast loved me.” You see, then, that we are privileged to partake of His essence, not in the realm of nature, but of grace, and the reason why we are beloved of the Father is that He has loved the Son; and the members are loved, those namely of the body. S. John i. 12, 13. “For as many as received Christ, to them gave He power to become sons of God, even to them that believe on His name: which were born not of blood, nor of the will of the flesh, nor of the will of man, but of God.” The Word was made flesh that we might pass from the flesh into the Word. The Word did not cease to be what He had been; nor did the human nature lose that which it was by birth. The glory was increased, the nature was not changed. Do you ask how we are made one body with Christ? Your creator shall be your instructor: S. John vi. 57 sq. “He that eateth my flesh and drinketh my blood abideth in me, and I in him. As the living Father sent me, and I live because of the Father, so he that eateth me, he also shall live because of me. This is the bread which came down out of heaven.” But the Evangelist John, who had drunk in wisdom from the breast of Christ, agrees herewith, and says: 1 John iv. 13, 15. “Hereby know we that we abide in him, and he in us, because he hath given us of his Spirit. Whosoever shall confess that Jesus is the Son of God, God abideth in him, and he in God.” If you believe in Christ, as the apostles believed, you shall be made one body with them in Christ. But, if it is rash for you to claim for yourself a faith and works like theirs when you have not the same faith and works, you cannot have the same place.

30. You repeat the words bride, sister, mother, and affirm that all these are titles of the one Church and names applied to all believers. The fact goes against you. For if the Church admits but one rank, and has not many members in one body, what necessity is there for calling her bride, sister, mother? It must be that she is the bride of some, the sister of others, the mother of others. All indeed stand on the right hand, but one stands as a bridegroom, another as a brother, a third as a son. Gal. iv. 19. “My little children” says the Apostle, “of whom I am again in travail 41 until Christ be formed in you.” Do you think that the children who are being born and the apostle who is in travail are of equal rank? And the folly of your contention that we love all the members alike, and do not prefer the eye to the finger, nor the hand to the ear, but that if one be lost all mourn, is proved by the lesson which the apostle teaches the Corinthians: 1 Cor. xii. 22–24. “Some members are more honourable, others excite the sense of shame: and those parts to which shame attaches are clothed with more abundant honour; whereas our comely parts have no need of our care.” Do you think that the mouth and the belly, the eyes and the outlets of the body are to be classed together as of equal merit? S. Luke xi. 34. “The lamp of thy body,” he says, “is thine eye. If thine eye be blinded, thy whole body is in darkness.” If you cut off a finger, or the tip of the ear, there is indeed pain, but the loss is not so great, nor is the disfigurement attended by so much pain as it would be were you to take out the eyes, mutilate the nose, or saw through a bone. Some members we can dispense with and yet live: without others life is an impossibility. Some offences are light, some heavy. It is one thing to owe ten thousand talents, another to owe a farthing. We shall have to give account of the idle word no less than of adultery; but it is not the same thing to be put to the blush, and to be put upon the rack, to grow red in the face and to ensure lasting torment. Do you think I am merely expressing my own views? Hear what the Apostle John says: 1 John v. 16. "He who knows that his brother sinneth a sin not unto death, let him ask, and he shall give him life, even to him that sinneth not unto death. But he that hath sinned unto death, who shall pray for him?" You observe that if we entreat for smaller offences, we obtain pardon: if for greater ones, it is difficult to obtain our request: and that there is a great difference between sins. And so with respect to the people of Israel who had sinned a sin unto death, it is said to Jeremiah: Jer. vii. 16. "Pray not thou for this people, neither entreat for them, and do not withstand me, for I will not hear thee." Moreover, if it be true that we all alike enter the world and all alike leave it, and this is a precedent for the world to come, it follows that whether righteous or sinners we shall all be equally esteemed by God, because the conditions of our birth and death are now the same. And if you contend that there are two Adams, the one of the earth, the other from heaven; and that they who were in the earthly Adam stand on the left hand, those who were in the heavenly are on the right hand, before we go further, let me ask you a question concerning two brothers: Was Esau in the earthly Adam, or in the heavenly? No one doubts that you will reply, he was in the earthly. In which was Jacob? Without hesitation you will say, in the heavenly. How then was he in the heavenly when Christ had not yet come in the flesh—Christ who is called the second Adam from heaven? You must either reckon all before the incarnation of Christ in the old Adam, and even the just in the man from the earth, and then they will be on the left among your goats; or, if it be impious to give Isaac the same place as Ishmael, Jacob as Esau, the saints as sinners, the last Adam will date from the time when Christ was born of a Virgin, and your argument from the two Adams will not benefit your sheep and goats, because we have proved that in the first Adam there were both sheep and goats, and that of those who were in one and the same man, some stood on the right hand of God, others on the left: Rom. v. 14. "For from Adam even until Moses death reigned over all, even over them that had not sinned after the likeness of Adam's transgression."

31. As regards your attempt to show that railing and murder, the use of the expression raca and adultery, the idle word and godlessness, are rewarded with the same punishment, I have already given you my reply, and will now briefly repeat it. You must either deny that you are a sinner if you are not to be in danger of Gehenna: or, if you are a sinner you will be sent to hell for even a light offence: Wisd. i. 11. "The mouth that lieth," says one, "kills the soul." I suspect that you, like other men, have occasionally told a lie: Ps. cxvi. 11; Rom. iii. 4. for all men are liars, that God alone may be true, Ps. li. 4. and that He may be justified in His words, and may prevail when He judges. It follows either that you will not be a man lest you be found a liar: or if you are a man and are consequently a liar, you will be punished with parricides and adulterers. For you admit no difference between sins, and the gratitude of those whom you raise from the mire and set on high will not equal the rage against you of those whom for the trifling offences of daily life you have thrust into utter darkness. And if it be so that in a persecution one is stifled, another beheaded, another flees, or the fourth dies within the walls of a prison, and one crown of victory awaits various kinds of struggle, the fact tells in our favour. For in martyrdom it is the will, which gives occasion to the death, that is crowned. My duty is to resist the frenzy of the heathen, and not deny the Lord. It rests with them either to behead, or to burn, or to shut up in prison, or enforce various other penalties. But if I escape, and die in solitude, there will not at my death be the same crown for me as for them, because the confession of Christ will not have been to me as to them the cause of death. As for your remark that absolutely no difference was made between the brother who had always been with his father, and him who was afterwards welcomed as a penitent, I am willing to add, if you like, that the one drachma which was lost and was found was put with the others, and that the one sheep which the good shepherd, leaving the ninety and nine, sought and brought back, made up the full tale of a hundred. But it is one thing to be a penitent, and with tears sue for pardon, another to be always with the father. And so both the shepherd and the father say by the mouth of Ezekiel to the sheep that was carried back, and to the son that was lost, Ezek. xvi. 62, 63. "And I will establish my covenant with thee; and thou shalt know that I am the Lord: that thou mayest remember, and be confounded, and never open thy mouth ever more, because of thy shame, when I have forgiven thee all that thou hast done.” That penitents may have their due it is enough for them to feel shame instead of all other punishment. Hence in another place it is said to them, Ezek. xxxvi. 31, 32. “Then shall ye remember your evil ways, and all the crimes wherewith ye were defiled, and ye shall loathe yourselves in your own sight for all the wickedness that ye have done; and ye shall know that I am the Lord, when I shall have done you good for my name’s sake, and not according to your evil ways, nor according to your evil doings.” The son, moreover, was reprov’d by his father for envying his brother’s deliverance, and for being tormented by jealousy while the angels in heaven were rejoicing. The parallel, however, is not to be drawn between the merits of the two sons (one of whom was temperate, the other a prodigal) and those of the whole human race, but the characters depicted are either Jews and Christians, or saints and penitents. In the lifetime of Bishop Damasus I dedicated to him a small treatise upon this parable. Letter XXI.

32. And if a penny was given to all the labourers, those of the first, the third, the sixth, the ninth, and the eleventh hours, and they came first for the reward who were the last to work in the vineyard, even here the persons described do not belong to one time or one age, but from the beginning of the world to the end of it there are different calls and a special meaning attaches to each. Abel and Seth were called at the first hour: Enoch and Noah at the third: Abraham, Isaac, and Jacob at the sixth: Moses and the prophets at the ninth: at the eleventh the Gentiles, to whom the recompense was first given because they believed on the crucified Lord, and inasmuch as it was hard for them to believe they earned a great reward. Many kings and prophets have desired to see the things that we see, and have not seen them. But the one penny does not represent one reward, but one life, and one deliverance from Gehenna. And as by the favour of the sovereign those guilty of various crimes are released from prison, and each one, according to his toil and exertions, is in this or that condition of life, so too the penny, as it were by the favour of our Sovereign, is the discharge from prison of us all by baptism. Now our work is, according to our different virtues, to prepare for ourselves a different future.

33. So far I have replied to the separate portions of his argument; I shall now address myself to the general question. Our Lord says to his disciples, S. Matt. xx. 26. “Whosoever would become great among you, let him be least of all.” If we are all to be equal in heaven, in vain do we humble ourselves here that we may be greater there. Of the two debtors who owed, one five hundred pence, the other fifty, he to whom most was forgiven loved most. And so the Saviour says, S. Luke vii. 47. “I say to you, her sins which are many are forgiven her, for she hath loved much. But to whom little is forgiven, the same loveth little.” He who loves little, and has little forgiven, he will of course be of inferior rank. S. Matt. xxv. 15 sq. The householder when he set out delivered to his servants his goods, to one five talents, to another two, to another one, to each according to his ability. Just as in another Gospel it is written that a nobleman setting out for a far country to receive for himself a kingdom and return, called the servants, and gave them each a sum of money, with which one gained ten pounds, another five, and they, each according to his ability and the gain he had made, received ten or five cities. But one who had received a talent, or a pound, buried it in the ground, or tied it up in a napkin, and kept it until his master’s return. Our first thought is that if, according to the modern Zeno, the righteous do not toil in hope of reward, but to avoid the loss of what they already have, he who buried his pound or talent that he might not lose it, did no wrong, 413 and the caution of him who kept his money is worthy of more praise than the fruitless toil of those who wore themselves out and yet received no reward for their labour. Then observe that the very talent which was taken from the timid or negligent servant, was not given to him who had the smaller profit, but to him who had gained the most, that is, to him who had been placed over ten cities. If difference of rank is not constituted by the difference in number, why did our Lord say, “He gave to everyone according to his ability”? If the gain of five talents and ten talents is the same, why were not ten cities given to him who gained the least, and five to him who gained the most? But that our Lord is not satisfied with what we have, but always desires more, He himself shows by saying, “Wherefore didst thou not give my money to the money-changers, that so when I came I might have received it with usury?” The Apostle Paul understood this, and Phil. iii. 13. forgetting those things which were behind, reached forward to those things which were in front, that is, he made daily progress, and did not keep the grace given to him carefully wrapped up in a napkin, but his spirit, like the capital of a keen man of business, was renewed from day to day, and if he were not always growing larger, he thought himself growing less. Six cities of refuge are mentioned in the law, provided for fugitives who were involuntary homicides, and the cities themselves belonged to the priests. I should like to ask whether you would put those fugitives among your goats, or among our sheep. If they were goats, they would be slain like other homicides, and would not enter the cities of God's ministers. If you say they were sheep, they will not possibly be such sheep as can enjoy full liberty and feed without fear of wolves. And it will be plain to you that sheep indeed they are, but wandering sheep: that they are on the right hand, but do not stand there: they flee until the High Priest dies and descending into hell liberates their souls. The Gibeonites met the children of Israel, and although other nations were slaughtered, they were kept Josh. ix. 27. for hewers of wood and drawers of water. 2 Sam. xxi. 1. And of such value were they in God's eyes, that the family of Saul was destroyed for the wrong done to them. Where would you put them? Among the goats? But they were not slain, and they were avenged by the determination of God. Among the sheep? But holy Scripture says they were not of the same merit as the Israelites. You see then that they do indeed stand on the right hand, but are of a far inferior grade. Jonathan came between David, the holy man, and Saul, the worst of kings, and we can neither place him among the kids because he was worthy of a prophet's love, nor amongst the rams lest we make him equal to David, and particularly when we know that he was slain. He will, therefore, be among the sheep, but low down. And just as in the case of David and Jonathan, you will be bound to recognize differences between sheep and sheep. S. Luke xii. 47, 48. "That servant, which knew his lord's will, and made not ready, nor did according to his will, shall be beaten with many stripes; but he that knew not, and did things worthy of stripes, shall be beaten with few stripes. And to whomsoever much is given, of him shall much be required: and to whom they commit much, of him will they ask the more." Lo! more or less is committed to different servants, and according to the nature of the trust, as well as of the sin, is the number of stripes inflicted.

34. The whole account of the land of Judah and of the tribes is typical of the church in heaven. Let us read Joshua the son of Nun, or the concluding portions of Ezekiel, and we shall see that the historical division of the land as related by the one finds a counterpart in the spiritual and heavenly promises of the other. What is the meaning of the seven and eight steps in the description of the temple? or again, what significance attaches to the fact that in the Psalter, after being taught the mystic alphabet by the Ps. cxix. in our arrangement of the Psalter. The psalm is divided into twenty-two portions, which begin with the successive letters of the Hebrew alphabet. The following fifteen psalms are called in our Authorized Version, Songs of Degrees (Vulgate, graduum, steps). For the origin of the title, Wordsworth, or Neal and Littledale on Ps. cxx. may be consulted. one hundred and eighteenth psalm we arrive by fifteen steps at the point where we can sing: Ps. cxxxiv. 1. "Behold, now bless the Lord, all ye servants of the Lord: ye who stand in the house of the Lord, in the courts of the house of our God." Why did Numb. xxxiv. 15; Josh. xiv. 3. two tribes and a half dwell on the other side of Jordan, a district abounding in cattle, while the remaining nine tribes and a half either drove out the old inhabitants from their possessions, or dwelt with them? Why did the tribe of Levi Numb. xviii. 20. receive no portion in the land, but have the Lord for their portion? And how is it that of the priests and Levites, themselves, the Lev. xvi. 2; Heb. ix. 7. high priest alone entered the Holy of Holies where were the cherubim and the mercy-seat? Why did the other priests wear Ex. xxviii. etc. linen raiment only, and not have their clothing of wrought gold, blue, scarlet, purple, and fine cloth? The priests and Numb. vii. 5. Levites of the lower order took care of the oxen and wains: those of the higher order carried the ark of the Lord on their shoulders. If you do away with the gradations of the tabernacle, the temple, the Church, if, to use a common military phrase, all upon the right hand are to be "up to the same standard," bishops are to no purpose, priests in vain, deacons useless. Why do virgins persevere? widows toil? Why do married women practise continence? Let us all sin, and when once we have repented, we shall be on the same footing as the apostles.

16. C. My dear Atticus, your speech is really a clever feat of memory. But the labour you have spent in mustering this host of authorities is to my advantage. For I do not any more than you compare man with God, but with other men, in comparison with whom he who takes the trouble can be perfect. And so, when we say that man, if he chooses, can be without sin, the standard is the measure of man, not the majesty of God, in comparison with Whom no creature can be perfect.

A. Critobulus, I am obliged to you for reminding me of the fact. For it is just my own view that no creature can be perfect in respect of true and finished righteousness. But that one differs from another, and that one man's righteousness is not the same as another's, no one doubts; nor again that one may be greater or less than another, and yet that, relatively to their own status and capacity, men may be called righteous who are not righteous when compared with others. For instance, the Apostle Paul, the chosen vessel who laboured more than all the Apostles, was, I suppose, righteous when he wrote to Timothy, 2 Timothy 4:7-8 "I have fought the good fight, I have finished the course, I have kept the faith: henceforth there is laid up for me the crown of righteousness, which the Lord, the righteous judge, shall give to me at that day: and not only to me, but also to all them that love His appearing." Timothy, his disciple and imitator, whom he taught the rules of action and the limits of virtue, was also righteous. Are we to think there was one and the same righteousness in them both, and that he had not more merit who laboured more than all? "In my Father's house are many mansions." I suppose there are also different degrees of merit. "One star differs from another star in glory," and in the one body of the Church there are different members. The sun has its own splendour, the moon tempers the darkness of the night; and the five heavenly bodies which are called planets traverse the sky in different tracks and with different degrees of luminousness. There are countless other stars whose movements we trace in the firmament. Each has its own brightness, and though each in respect of its own is perfect, yet, in comparison with one of greater magnitude, it lacks perfection. In the body also with its different members, the eye has one function, the hand another, the foot another. Whence the Apostle says, "The eye cannot say to the hand, I have no need of you: or again the head to the feet, I have no need of you. Are all Apostles? Are all prophets? Are all teachers? Are all workers of miracles? Have all gifts of healing? Do all speak with tongues? Do all interpret? But desire earnestly the greater gifts. But all these works the one and the same Spirit, dividing to each one severally even as He will." And here mark carefully that he does not say, as each member desires, but as the Spirit Himself will. For the vessel cannot say to him that makes it, Romans 9:21 "Why do you make me thus or thus? Hath not the potter a right over the clay, from the same lump to make one part a vessel unto honour, and another unto dishonour?" And so in close sequence he added, "Desire earnestly the greater gifts," so that, by the exercise of faith and diligence, we may win something in addition to other gifts, and may be superior to those who, compared with us, are in the second or third class. In a great house there are different vessels, some of gold, some of silver, brass, iron, wood. And yet while in its kind a vessel of brass is perfect, in comparison with one of silver it is called imperfect, and again one of silver, compared with one of gold, is inferior. And thus, when compared with one another, all things are imperfect and perfect. In a field of good soil, and from one sowing, there springs a crop thirty-fold, sixty-fold, or a hundred-fold. The very numbers show that there is disparity in the parts of the produce, and yet in its own kind each is perfect. Elizabeth and Zacharias, whom you adduce and with whom you cover yourself as with an impenetrable shield, may teach us how far they are beneath the holiness of blessed Mary, the Lord's Mother, who, conscious that God was dwelling in her, proclaims without reserve, "Behold, from henceforth all generations shall call me blessed. For He that is mighty has done to me great things; and holy is His name. And His mercy is unto generations and generations of them that fear Him: He has showed strength with His arm." Where, observe, she says she is blessed not by her own merit and virtue, but by the mercy of God dwelling in her. And John himself, a greater than whom has not arisen among the sons of men, is better than his parents. For not only does our Lord compare him with men, but with angels also. And yet he, who was greater on earth than all other men, is said to be less than the least in the kingdom of heaven.

17. Need we be surprised that, when saints are compared, some are better, some worse, since the same holds good in the comparison of sins? To Jerusalem, pierced and wounded with many sins, it is said, Lamentations 4:6 “Sodom is justified by you.” It is not because Sodom, which has sunk for ever into ashes, is just in herself, that it is said by Ezekiel, Ezekiel 16:55 “Sodom shall be restored to her former estate”; but that, in comparison with the more accursed Jerusalem, she appears just. For Jerusalem killed the Son of God; Sodom through fullness of bread and excessive luxury carried her lust beyond all bounds. The publican in the Gospel who smote upon his breast as though it were a magazine of the worst thoughts, and, conscious of his offenses, dared not lift up his eyes, is justified rather than the proud Pharisee. And Tamar in the guise of a harlot deceived Judah, and in the estimation of this man himself who was deceived, was worthy of the words, Genesis 38:26 “Tamar is more righteous than I.” All this goes to prove that not only in comparison with Divine majesty are men far from perfection, but also when compared with angels, and other men who have climbed the heights of virtue. You may be superior to some one whom you have shown to be imperfect, and yet be outstripped by another; and consequently may not have true perfection, which, if it be perfect, is absolute.

Book 22 (Excerpts)

1. Of the creation of angels and men

As we promised in the immediately preceding book, this, the last of the whole work, shall contain a discussion of the eternal blessedness of the city of God. This blessedness is named eternal, not because it shall endure for many ages, though at last it shall come to an end, but because, according to the words of the gospel, 'of His kingdom there shall be no end.' Neither shall it enjoy the mere appearance of perpetuity which is maintained by the rise of fresh generations to occupy the place of those that have died out, as in an evergreen the same freshness seems to continue permanently, and the same appearance of dense foliage is preserved by the growth of fresh leaves in the room of those that have withered and fallen; but in that city all the citizens shall be immortal, men now for the first time enjoying what the holy angels have never lost. And this shall be accomplished by God, the most almighty Founder of the city. For He has promised it, and cannot lie, and has already performed many of His promises, and has done many unpromised kindnesses to those whom He now asks to believe that He will do this also.

For it is He who in the beginning created the world full of all visible and intelligible beings, among which He created nothing better than those spirits whom He endowed with intelligence, and made capable of contemplating and enjoying Him, and united in our society, which we call the holy and heavenly city, and in which the material of their sustenance and blessedness is God Himself, as it were their common food and nourishment. It is He who gave to this intellectual nature free-will of such a kind, that if he wished to forsake God his blessedness, misery should forthwith result. It is He who, when He foreknew that certain angels would in their pride desire to suffice for their own blessedness, and would forsake their great good, did not deprive them of this power, deeming it to be more befitting His power and goodness to bring good out of evil than to prevent the evil from coming into existence. And indeed evil had never been, had not the mutable nature—mutable, though good, and created by the most high God and immutable Good, who created all things good—brought evil upon itself by sin. And this its sin is itself proof that its nature was originally good. For had it not been very good, though not equal to its Creator, the desertion of God as its light could not have been an evil to it. For as blindness is a vice of the eye, and this very fact indicates that the eye was created to see the light, and as, consequently, vice itself proves that the eye is more excellent than the other members, because it is capable of light (for on no other supposition would it be a vice of the eye to want light), so the nature which once enjoyed God teaches, even by its very vice, that it was created the best of all, since it is now miserable because it does not enjoy God. It is He who with very just punishment doomed the angels who voluntarily fell to everlasting misery, and rewarded those who continued in their attachment to the supreme good with the assurance of endless stability as the meed of their fidelity. It is He who made also man himself upright, with the same freedom of will—an earthly animal, indeed, but fit for heaven if he remained faithful to his Creator, but destined to the misery appropriate to such a nature if he forsook Him. It is He who, when He foreknew that man would in his turn sin by abandoning God and breaking His law, did not deprive him of the power of free-will, because He at the same time foresaw what good He Himself would bring out of the evil, and how from this mortal race, deservedly and justly condemned, He would by His grace collect, as now He does, a people so numerous, that He thus fills up and repairs the blank made by the fallen angels, and that thus that beloved and heavenly city is not defrauded of the full number of its citizens, but perhaps may even rejoice in a still more overflowing population....

3. Of the promise of eternal blessedness to the saints, and everlasting punishment to the wicked

Wherefore, not to mention many other instances besides, as we now see in Christ the fulfilment of that which God promised to Abraham when He said, 'In thy seed shall all nations be blessed,' so this also shall be fulfilled which He promised to the same race, when He said by the prophet, 'They that are in their sepulchres shall rise again;' and also, 'There shall be a new heaven and a new earth: and the former shall not be mentioned, nor come into mind; but they shall find joy and rejoicing in it: for I will make Jerusalem a rejoicing, and my people a joy. And I will rejoice in Jerusalem, and joy in my people, and the voice of weeping shall be no more heard in her.' And by another prophet He uttered the same prediction: 'At that time thy people shall be delivered, every one that shall be found written in the book. And many of them that sleep in the dust' (or, as some interpret it, 'in the mound') 'of the earth shall awake, some to everlasting life, and some to shame and everlasting contempt.' And in another place by the same prophet: 'The saints of the Most High shall take the kingdom, and shall possess the kingdom for ever, even for ever and ever.' And a little after he says, 'His kingdom is an everlasting kingdom.'... [T]hese predictions shall be fulfilled, as those also have been which unbelieving men supposed would be frustrate. For it is the same God who promised both, and predicted that both would come to pass—the God whom the pagan deities tremble before, as even Porphyry, the noblest of pagan philosophers, testifies....

18. Of the perfect Man, that is, Christ; and of His body, that is, the Church, which is His fulness

To understand what the apostle means when he says that we shall all come to a perfect man, we must consider the connection of the whole passage, which runs thus: 'He that descended is the same also that ascended up far above all heavens, that He might fill all things. And He gave some, apostles; and some, prophets; and some, evangelists; and some, pastors and teachers; for the perfecting of the saints, for the work of the ministry, for the edifying of the body of Christ: till we all come to the unity of the faith and knowledge of the Son of God, to a perfect man, to the measure of the age of the fulness of Christ: that we henceforth be no more children, tossed and carried about with every wind of doctrine, by the sleight of men, and cunning craftiness, whereby they lie in wait to deceive; but, speaking the truth in love, may grow up in Him in all things, which is the Head, even Christ: from whom the whole body fitly joined together and compacted by that which every joint supplieth, according to the effectual working in the measure of every part, maketh increase of the body, unto the edifying of itself in love.' Behold what the perfect man is—the head and the body, which is made up of all the members, which in their own time shall be perfected. But new additions are daily being made to this body while the Church is being built up, to which it is said, 'Ye are the body of Christ and His members;' and again, 'For His body's sake,' he says, 'which is the Church;' and again, 'We being many are one head, one body.' It is of the edification of this body that it is here, too, said, 'For the perfecting of the saints, for the work of the ministry, for the edification of the body of Christ;' and then that passage of which we are now speaking is added, 'Till we all come to the unity of the faith and knowledge of the Son of God, to a perfect man, to the measure of the age of the fulness of Christ,' and so on. And he shows of what body we are to understand this to be the measure, when he says, 'That we may grow up into Him in all things, which is the Head, even Christ: from whom the whole body fitly joined together and compacted by that which every joint supplieth, according to the effectual working in the measure of every part.' As, therefore, there is a measure of every part, so there is a measure of the fulness of the whole body which is made up of all its parts, and it is of this measure it is said, 'To the measure of the age of the fulness of Christ.' This fulness he spoke of also in the place where he says of Christ, 'And gave Him to be the Head over all things to the Church, which is His body, the fulness of Him that filleth all in all.' But even if this should be referred to the form in which each one shall rise, what should hinder us from applying to the woman what is expressly said of the man, understanding both sexes to be included under the general term 'man?' For certainly in the saying, 'Blessed is he who feareth the Lord,' women also who fear the Lord are included. ...

21. Of the new spiritual body into which the flesh of the saints shall be transformed

Whatever, therefore, has been taken from the body, either during life or after death, shall be restored to it, and, in conjunction with what has remained in the grave, shall rise again, transformed from the oldness of the animal body into the newness of the spiritual body, and clothed in incorruption and immortality. But even though the body has been all quite ground to powder by some severe accident, or by the ruthlessness of enemies, and though it has been so diligently scattered to the winds, or into the water, that there is no trace of it left, yet it shall not be beyond the omnipotence of the Creator—no, not a hair of its head shall perish. The flesh shall then be spiritual, and subject to the spirit, but still flesh, not spirit, as the spirit itself, when subject to the flesh, was fleshly, but still spirit and not flesh....

24. Of the blessings with which the Creator has filled this life, obnoxious though it be to the curse

But we must now contemplate the rich and countless blessings with which the goodness of God, who cares for all He has created, has filled this very misery of the human race, which reflects His retributive justice. That first blessing which He pronounced before the fall, when He said, 'Increase, and multiply, and replenish the earth,' He did not inhibit after man had sinned, but the fecundity originally bestowed remained in the condemned stock; and the vice of sin, which has involved us in the necessity of dying, has yet not deprived us of that wonderful power of seed, or rather of that still more marvellous power by which seed is produced, and which seems to be as it were inwrought and inwoven in the human body. But in this river, as I may call it, or torrent of the human race, both elements are carried along together—both the evil which is derived from him who begets, and the good which is bestowed by Him who creates us. In the original evil there are two things, sin and punishment; in the original good, there are two other things, propagation and conformation. But of the evils, of which the one, sin, arose from our audacity, and the other, punishment, from God's judgment, we have already said as much as suits our present purpose. I mean now to speak of the blessings which God has conferred or still confers upon our nature, vitiated and condemned as it is. For in condemning it He did not withdraw all that He had given it, else it had been annihilated; neither did He, in penally subjecting it to the devil, remove it beyond His own power; for not even the devil himself is outside of God's government, since the devil's nature subsists only by the supreme Creator, who gives being to all that in any form exists....

It is He, then, who has given to the human soul a mind, in which reason and understanding lie as it were asleep during infancy, and as if they were not, destined, however, to be awakened and exercised as years increase, so as to become capable of knowledge and of receiving instruction, fit to understand what is true and to love what is good. It is by this capacity the soul drinks in wisdom, and becomes endowed with those virtues by which, in prudence, fortitude, temperance, and righteousness, it makes war upon error and the other inborn vices, and conquers them by fixing its desires upon no other object than the supreme and unchangeable Good. And even though this be not uniformly the result, yet who can competently utter or even conceive the grandeur of this work of the Almighty, and the unspeakable boon He has conferred upon our rational nature, by giving us even the capacity of such attainment? For over and above those arts which are called virtues, and which teach us how we may spend our life well, and attain to endless happiness—arts which are given to the children of the promise and the kingdom by the sole grace of God which is in Christ—has not the genius of man invented and applied countless astonishing arts, partly the result of necessity, partly the result of exuberant invention, so that this vigour of mind, which is so active in the discovery not merely of superfluous but even of dangerous and destructive things, betokens an inexhaustible wealth in the nature which can invent, learn, or employ such arts? What wonderful—one might say stupefying—advances has human industry made in the arts of weaving and building, of agriculture and navigation! With what endless variety are designs in pottery, painting, and sculpture produced, and with what skill executed! What wonderful spectacles are exhibited in the theatres, which those who have not seen them cannot credit! How skilful the contrivances for catching, killing, or taming wild beasts! And for the injury of men, also, how many kinds of poisons, weapons, engines of destruction, have been invented, while for the preservation or restoration of health the appliances and remedies are infinite! To provoke appetite and please the palate, what a variety of seasonings have been concocted! To express and gain entrance for thoughts, what a multitude and variety of signs there are, among which speaking and writing hold the first place! what ornaments has eloquence at command to delight the mind! what wealth of song is there to captivate the ear! how many musical instruments and strains of harmony have been devised! What skill has been attained in measures and numbers! with what sagacity have the movements and connections of the stars been discovered! Who could tell the thought that has been spent upon nature, even though, despairing of recounting it in detail, he endeavoured only to give a general view of it? In fine, even the defence of errors and misapprehensions, which has illustrated the genius of heretics and philosophers, cannot be sufficiently declared. For at present it is the nature of the human mind which adorns this mortal life which we are extolling, and not the faith and the way of truth which lead to immortality. And since this great nature has certainly been created by the true and supreme God, who administers all things He has made with absolute power and justice, it could never have fallen into these miseries, nor have gone out of them to miseries eternal—saving only those who are redeemed—had not an exceeding great sin been found in the first man from whom the rest have sprung.

Moreover, even in the body, though it dies like that of the beasts, and is in many ways weaker than theirs, what goodness of God, what providence of the great Creator, is apparent! The organs of sense and the rest of the members, are not they so placed, the appearance, and form, and stature of the body as a whole, is it not so fashioned, as to indicate that it was made for the service of a reasonable soul? Man has not been created stooping towards the earth, like the irrational animals; but his bodily form, erect and looking heavenwards, admonishes him to mind the things that are above. Then the marvellous nimbleness which has been given to the tongue and the hands, fitting them to speak, and write, and execute so many duties, and practise so many arts, does it not prove the excellence of the soul for which such an assistant was provided? And even apart from its adaptation to the work required of it, there is such a symmetry in its various parts, and so beautiful a proportion maintained, that one is at a loss to decide whether, in creating the body, greater regard was paid to utility or to beauty. Assuredly no part of the body has been created for the sake of utility which does not also contribute something to its beauty....

How can I tell of the rest of creation, with all its beauty and utility, which the divine goodness has given to man to please his eye and serve his purposes, condemned though he is, and hurled into these labours and miseries? Shall I speak of the manifold and various loveliness of sky, and earth, and sea; of the plentiful supply and wonderful qualities of the light; of sun, moon, and stars; of the shade of trees; of the colours and perfume of flowers; of the multitude of birds, all differing in plumage and in song; of the variety of animals, of which the smallest in size are often the most wonderful—the works of ants and bees astonishing us more than the huge bodies of whales? Shall I speak of the sea, which itself is so grand a spectacle, when it arrays itself as it were in vestures of various colours, now running through every shade of green, and again becoming purple or blue? Is it not delightful to look at it in storm, and experience the soothing complacency which it inspires, by suggesting that we ourselves are not tossed and shipwrecked? What shall I say of the numberless kinds of food to alleviate hunger, and the variety of seasonings to stimulate appetite which are scattered everywhere by nature, and for which we are not indebted to the art of cookery? How many natural appliances are there for preserving and restoring health! How grateful is the alternation of day and night! how pleasant the breezes that cool the air! how abundant the supply of clothing furnished us by trees and animals! Who can enumerate all the blessings we enjoy? If I were to attempt to detail and unfold only these few which I have indicated in the mass, such an enumeration would fill a volume. And all these are but the solace of the wretched and condemned, not the rewards of the blessed. What then shall these rewards be, if such be the blessings of a condemned state? What will He give to those whom He has predestined to life, who has given such things even to those whom He has predestined to death? What blessings will He in the blessed life shower upon those for whom, even in this state of misery, He has been willing that His only-begotten Son should endure such sufferings even to death? Thus the apostle reasons concerning those who are predestined to that kingdom: 'He that spared not His own Son, but delivered Him up for us all, how shall He not with Him also give us all things?' When this promise is fulfilled, what shall we be? What blessings shall we receive in that kingdom, since already we have received as the pledge of them Christ's dying? In what condition shall the spirit of man be, when it has no longer any vice at all; when it neither yields to any, nor is in bondage to any, nor has to make war against any, but is perfected, and enjoys undisturbed peace with itself? Shall it not then know all things with certainty, and without any labour or error, when unhindered and joyfully it drinks the wisdom of God at the fountainhead? What shall the body be, when it is in every respect subject to the spirit, from which it shall draw a life so sufficient, as to stand in need of no other nutriment? For it shall no longer be animal, but spiritual, having indeed the substance of flesh, but without any fleshly corruption....

29. Of the beatific vision

And now let us consider, with such ability as God may vouchsafe, how the saints shall be employed when they are clothed in immortal and spiritual bodies, and when the flesh shall live no longer in a fleshly but a spiritual fashion. And indeed, to tell the truth, I am at a loss to understand the nature of that employment, or, shall I rather say, repose and ease, for it has never come within the range of my bodily senses. And if I should speak of my mind or understanding, what is our understanding in comparison of its excellence? For then shall be that 'peace of God which,' as the apostle says, 'passeth all understanding'—that is to say, all human, and perhaps all angelic understanding, but certainly not the divine. That it passeth ours there is no doubt; but if it passeth that of the angels—and he who says 'all understanding' seems to make no exception in their favour—then we must understand him to mean that neither we nor the angels can understand, as God understands, the peace which God Himself enjoys. Doubtless this passeth all understanding but His own. But as we shall one day be made to participate, according to our slender capacity, in His peace, both in ourselves, and with our neighbour, and with God our chief good, in this respect the angels understand the peace of God in their own measure, and men too, though now far behind them, whatever spiritual advance they have made. For we must remember how great a man he was who said, 'We know in part, and we prophesy in part, until that which is perfect is come;' and 'Now we see through a glass, darkly; but then face to face.' Such also is now the vision of the holy angels, who are also called our angels, because we, being rescued out of the power of darkness, and receiving the earnest of the Spirit, are translated into the kingdom of Christ, and already begin to belong to those angels with whom we shall enjoy that holy and most delightful city of God of which we have now written so much. Thus, then, the angels of God are our angels, as Christ is God's and also ours. They are God's, because they have not abandoned Him; they are ours, because we are their fellow-citizens. The Lord Jesus also said, 'See that ye despise not one of these little ones: for I say unto you, That in heaven their angels do always see the face of my Father which is in heaven.' As, then, they see, so shall we also see; but not yet do we thus see. Wherefore the apostle uses the words cited a little ago, 'Now we see through a glass, darkly; but then face to face.' This vision is reserved as the reward of our faith; and of it the Apostle John also says, 'When He shall appear, we shall be like Him, for we shall see Him as He is.' By 'the face' of God we are to understand His manifestation, and not a part of the body similar to that which in our bodies we call by that name.

And so, when I am asked how the saints shall be employed in that spiritual body, I do not say what I see, but I say what I believe, according to that which I read in the psalm, 'I believed, therefore have I spoken.' I say, then, they shall in the body see God; but whether they shall see Him by means of the body, as now we see the sun, moon, stars, sea, earth, and all that is in it, that is a difficult question. For it is hard to say that the saints shall then have such bodies that they shall not be able to shut and open their eyes as they please; while it is harder still to say that every one who shuts his eyes shall lose the vision of God. For if the prophet Elisha, though at a distance, saw his servant Gehazi, who thought that his wickedness would escape his master's observation and accepted gifts from Naaman the Syrian, whom the prophet had cleansed from his foul leprosy, how much more shall the saints in the spiritual body see all things, not only though their eyes be shut, but though they themselves be at a great distance? For then shall be 'that which is perfect,' of which the apostle says, 'We know in part, and we prophesy in part; but when that which is perfect is come, then that which is in part shall be done away.' Then, that he may illustrate as well as possible, by a simile, how superior the future life is to the life now lived, not only by ordinary men, but even by the foremost of the saints, he says, 'When I was a child, I understood as a child, I spake as a child, I thought as a child; but when I became a man, I put away childish things. Now we see through a glass, darkly; but then face to face: now I know in part; but then shall I know even as also I am known.' If, then, even in this life, in which the prophetic power of remarkable men is no more worthy to be compared to the vision of the future life than childhood is to manhood, Elisha, though distant from his servant, saw him accepting gifts, shall we say that when that which is perfect is come, and the corruptible body no longer oppresses the soul, but is incorruptible and offers no impediment to it, the saints shall need bodily eyes to see, though Elisha had no need of them to see his servant? For, following the Septuagint version, these are the prophet's words: 'Did not my heart go with thee, when the man came out of his chariot to meet thee, and thou tookedst his gifts?' Or, as the presbyter Jerome rendered it from the Hebrew, 'Was not my heart present when the man turned from his chariot to meet thee?' The prophet said that he saw this with his heart, miraculously aided by God, as no one can doubt. But how much more abundantly shall the saints enjoy this gift when God shall be all in all? Nevertheless the bodily eyes also shall have their office and their place, and shall be used by the spirit through the spiritual body. For the prophet did not forego the use of his eyes for seeing what was before them, though he did not need them to see his absent servant, and though he could have seen these present objects in spirit, and with his eyes shut, as he saw things far distant in a place where he himself was not. Far be it, then, from us to say that in the life to come the saints shall not see God when their eyes are shut, since they shall always see Him with the spirit....

30. Of the eternal felicity of the city of God, and of the perpetual Sabbath

How great shall be that felicity, which shall be tainted with no evil, which shall lack no good, and which shall afford leisure for the praises of God, who shall be all in all! For I know not what other employment there can be where no lassitude shall slacken activity, nor any want stimulate to labour. I am admonished also by the sacred song, in which I read or hear the words, 'Blessed are they that dwell in Thy house, O Lord; they will be still praising Thee.' All the members and organs of the incorruptible body, which now we see to be suited to various necessary uses, shall contribute to the praises of God; for in that life necessity shall have no place, but full, certain, secure, everlasting felicity. For all those parts of the bodily harmony, which are distributed through the whole body, within and without, and of which I have just been saying that they at present elude our observation, shall then be discerned; and, along with the other great and marvellous discoveries which shall then kindle rational minds in praise of the great Artificer, there shall be the enjoyment of a beauty which appeals to the reason. What power of movement such bodies shall possess, I have not the audacity rashly to define, as I have not the ability to conceive. Nevertheless I will say that in any case, both in motion and at rest, they shall be, as in their appearance, seemly; for into that state nothing which is unseemly shall be admitted. One thing is certain, the body shall forthwith be wherever the spirit wills, and the spirit shall will nothing which is unbecoming either to the spirit or to the body. True honour shall be there, for it shall be denied to none who is worthy, nor yielded to any unworthy; neither shall any unworthy person so much as sue for it, for none but the worthy shall be there. True peace shall be there, where no one shall suffer opposition either from himself or any other. God Himself, who is the Author of virtue, shall there be its reward; for, as there is nothing greater or better, He has promised Himself. What else was meant by His word through the prophet, 'I will be your God, and ye shall be my people,' than, I shall be their satisfaction, I shall be all that men honourably desire—life, and health, and nourishment, and plenty, and glory, and honour, and peace, and all good things? This, too, is the right interpretation of the saying of the apostle, 'That God may be all in all.' He shall be the end of our desires who shall be seen without end, loved without cloy, praised without weariness. This outgoing of affection, this employment, shall certainly be, like eternal life itself, common to all.

But who can conceive, not to say describe, what degrees of honour and glory shall be awarded to the various degrees of merit? Yet it cannot be doubted that there shall be degrees. And in that blessed city there shall be this great blessing, that no inferior shall envy any superior, as now the archangels are not envied by the angels, because no one will wish to be what he has not received, though bound in strictest concord with him who has received; as in the body the finger does not seek to be the eye, though both members are harmoniously included in the complete structure of the body. And thus, along with his gift, greater or less, each shall receive this further gift of contentment to desire no more than he has.

Neither are we to suppose that because sin shall have no power to delight them, free will must be withdrawn. It will, on the contrary, be all the more truly free, because set free from delight in sinning to take unfailing delight in not sinning. For the first freedom of will which man received when he was created upright consisted in an ability not to sin, but also in an ability to sin; whereas this last freedom of will shall be superior, inasmuch as it shall not be able to sin. This, indeed, shall not be a natural ability, but the gift of God. For it is one thing to be God, another thing to be a partaker of God. God by nature cannot sin, but the partaker of God receives this inability from God. And in this divine gift there was to be observed this gradation, that man should first receive a free will by which he was able not to sin, and at last a free will by which he was not able to sin—the former being adapted to the acquiring of merit, the latter to the enjoying of the reward. But the nature thus constituted, having sinned when it had the ability to do so, it is by a more abundant grace that it is delivered so as to reach that freedom in which it cannot sin. For as the first immortality which Adam lost by sinning consisted in his being able not to die, while the last shall consist in his not being able to die; so the first free will consisted in his being able not to sin, the last in his not being able to sin. And thus piety and justice shall be as indefeasible as happiness. For certainly by sinning we lost both piety and happiness; but when we lost happiness, we did not lose the love of it. Are we to say that God Himself is not free because He cannot sin? In that city, then, there shall be free will, one in all the citizens, and indivisible in each, delivered from all ill, filled with all good, enjoying indefeasibly the delights of eternal joys, oblivious of sins, oblivious of sufferings, and yet not so oblivious of its deliverance as to be ungrateful to its Deliverer.

The soul, then, shall have an intellectual remembrance of its past ills; but, so far as regards sensible experience, they shall be quite forgotten. For a skilful physician knows, indeed, professionally almost all diseases; but experimentally he is ignorant of a great number which he himself has never suffered from. As, therefore, there are two ways of knowing evil things—one by mental insight, the other by sensible experience, for it is one thing to understand all vices by the wisdom of a cultivated mind, another to understand them by the foolishness of an abandoned life—so also there are two ways of forgetting evils. For a well-instructed and learned man forgets them one way, and he who has experimentally suffered from them forgets them another—the former by neglecting what he has learned, the latter by escaping what he has suffered. And in this latter way the saints shall forget their past ills, for they shall have so thoroughly escaped them all, that they shall be quite blotted out of their experience. But their intellectual knowledge, which shall be great, shall keep them acquainted not only with their own past woes, but with the eternal sufferings of the lost. For if they were not to know that they had been miserable, how could they, as the Psalmist says, for ever sing the mercies of God? Certainly that city shall have no greater joy than the celebration of the grace of Christ, who redeemed us by His blood. There shall be accomplished the words of the psalm, 'Be still, and know that I am God.' There shall be the great Sabbath which has no evening, which God celebrated among His first works, as it is written, 'And God rested on the seventh day from all His works which He had made. And God blessed the seventh day, and sanctified it; because that in it He had rested from all His work which God began to make.' For we shall ourselves be the seventh day, when we shall be filled and replenished with God's blessing and sanctification. There shall we be still, and know that He is God; that He is that which we ourselves aspired to be when we fell away from Him, and listened to the voice of the seducer, 'Ye shall be as gods,' and so abandoned God, who would have made us as gods, not by deserting Him, but by participating in Him. For without Him what have we accomplished, save to perish in His anger? But when we are restored by Him, and perfected with greater grace, we shall have eternal leisure to see that He is God, for we shall be full of Him when He shall be all in all. For even our good works, when they are understood to be rather His than ours, are imputed to us that we may enjoy this Sabbath rest. For if we attribute them to ourselves, they shall be servile; for it is said of the Sabbath, 'Ye shall do no servile work in it.' Wherefore also it is said by Ezekiel the prophet, 'And I gave them my Sabbaths to be a sign between me and them, that they might know that I am the Lord who sanctify them.' This knowledge shall be perfected when we shall be perfectly at rest, and shall perfectly know that He is God.

This Sabbath shall appear still more clearly if we count the ages as days, in accordance with the periods of time defined in Scripture, for that period will be found to be the seventh. The first age, as the first day, extends from Adam to the deluge; the second from the deluge to Abraham, equalling the first, not in length of time, but in the number of generations, there being ten in each. From Abraham to the advent of Christ there are, as the evangelist Matthew calculates, three periods, in each of which are fourteen generations—one period from Abraham to David, a second from David to the captivity, a third from the captivity to the birth of Christ in the flesh. There are thus five ages in all. The sixth is now passing, and cannot be measured by any number of generations, as it has been said, 'It is not for you to know the times, which the Father hath put in His own power.' After this period God shall rest as on the seventh day, when He shall give us (who shall be the seventh day) rest in Himself. But there is not now space to treat of these ages; suffice it to say that the seventh shall be our Sabbath, which shall be brought to a close, not by an evening, but by the Lord's day, as an eighth and eternal day, consecrated by the resurrection of Christ, and prefiguring the eternal repose not only of the spirit, but also of the body. There we shall rest and see, see and love, love and praise. This is what shall be in the end without end. For what other end do we propose to ourselves than to attain to the kingdom of which there is no end?

I think I have now, by God's help, discharged my obligation in writing this large work. Let those who think I have said too little, or those who think I have said too much, forgive me; and let those who think I have said just enough join me in giving thanks to God. Amen.

Homily 67

Let not your heart be troubled: believe in God, believe also in Me. In My Father's house are many mansions; if it were not so, I would have told you, that I go to prepare a place for you. And if I go and prepare a place for you, I come again, and will receive you unto Myself; that where I am, there ye may be also.

1. We must lift ourselves up, my brethren, to God with greater intentness, that as the words of the holy Gospel have now sounded in our ears, we may also in whatever sort be able to take them in with the mind. For the Lord Jesus saith, Let not your heart be troubled. Believe in God, and believe also in Me. That they might not as men fear death, and therefore be troubled, He consoles them, assuring them that He is also God. Believe, saith He, in God, and believe in Me. For it follows, that if ye believe in God, ye ought also to believe in Me: which would not follow, if Christ were not God. Believe in God, and believe in Him to Whom it is nature, not robbery, to be equal with God: for He emptied Himself, yet not losing the form of God, but taking the form of a servant. Ye fear death for this form of a servant: let not your heart be troubled; the form of God shall raise that to life again.

2. But what is this that follows, In My Father's home are many mansions, but, that they were also afraid for themselves? Wherefore it was meet to be said to them, Let not your heart be troubled. For which of them would not be In the Life Eternal which is common to all the saved, afraid, when to Peter, the more confident and forward, it was said, The cock shall not crow until thou have denied Me thrice? As if then they must perish from Him, with good reason were they troubled; but when they are told, In the house of My Father are many mansions: if it were not so, I would have told you, that I go to prepare a place for you; they are refreshed from their perturbation, assured and confident that even after perils of temptations they shall dwell where Christ is, with God. For albeit one be stronger than another, one wiser than another, one more righteous than another, one holier than another; in the Father's house are many mansions; none of them shall be estranged from that house; where there shall be a mansion for each according to his deserving. True, they all equally receive that penny which the Householder, commands to be given to all them which have wrought in the vineyard; in that, making no distinction who have laboured less and who more: by which penny of course is signified eternal life, where none lives more than other, because living hath no diverse measure in eternity. But the many mansions signify the diverse dignities of merits in the one life eternal. For there is one glory of the sun, another glory of the moon, another glory of the stars: for one star differeth from another star in glory; so also is the resurrection of the dead. As the stars, the saints have allotted unto them diverse mansions of diverse glory: as those in the firmament, so they in the kingdom; but as touching the one penny, none is separated from the kingdom: and so shall God be all in all, that, since God is love, by love it shall come to pass, that what they severally have shall be common to all. For so is each one himself the lover, when he loves in the other what himself hath not. So shall there not be any invidiousness of unequal glory, since the unity of charity shall reign in all.

3. Therefore they are to be rejected from a Christian heart, who imagine that this saying of the many mansions means, that without the kingdom of heaven there will be some condition wherein may dwell the blessed innocents who have departed this life without baptism, seeing that without it they shall not be able to enter into the kingdom of heaven. This faith is not faith, because it is not the true and catholic faith. What? ye foolish people and blinded with carnal imaginations, whereas ye would deserve to be reprobated, if ye should separate from the kingdom of heaven the mansion, ~~ I do not say of Peter or of Paul or of any of the Apostles, but of any soever baptized little one, do ye not think ye deserve to be reprobated, that ye separate therefrom the House of God the Father? For the Lord saith not, In the whole world, or, In the whole creation, or, In the Life or Bliss everlasting, are many mansions, but, In My Father's house are many mansions. Is not this the house where we have a building of God, an house not made with hands, eternal in the heavens? Is not this the house, of which we sing to the Lord, Blessed are they that dwell in Thine house; P9.84,4. for ever and ever they shall praise Thee? And will ye then dare to separate from the kingdom of heaven, not the house of any baptized brother, but the house of God the Father Himself, to Whom all we the brethren say, Our Father, Which art in heaven; or dare so to divide it, that some of its mansions shall be in the kingdom of heaven, others out of the kingdom of heaven? God forbid! forbid it, that they who wish to dwell in the kingdom of heaven, should wish to dwell with you in this foolishness; forbid it, I say, that whereas every house of reigning sons cannot be elsewhere than in the kingdom, of the royal house itself there should be some part not in the kingdom.

Homily 68

1. That we owe you, beloved brethren, and that we must now pay you that which we had deferred, we acknowledge: namely, how these two sayings can be understood to be not contrary the one to the other: that, whereas the Lord had said, In My Father's house are many mansions: if it were not so, I would have told you that I go to prepare a place for you — where He shews plainly enough, that in saying this to them He affirmed that there are already many mansions there, and that there is no need to prepare any — again He saith, And if I go and prepare a place for you, I come again and will receive you unto Myself, that where I am ye may be also. How go and prepare a place, if already there are many mansions? Had it not been so, He would have said, I go to prepare. Or, if it is yet to be prepared, why should He not with good reason have said, I go to prepare? Is it so, that these mansions both are in being, and yet are to be prepared? For were they not in being, He would have said, I go to prepare. And yet, because though they are in being, they are yet to be prepared, it is not as they are that He goes to prepare them; but if He go away and prepare them as they are to be, then at His coming again He will receive His own unto Himself, that where He is, they may be also. Then in what sense is it that the mansions in the Father's house, not others but the same, both without doubt already are as they are not to be prepared, and not yet are as they are to be prepared? In what sense suppose we this to be, but as the Prophet also saith of God that He hath done what is yet future? For He saith not, Who is about to do the things that are future, but, Who hath done the things that are future. Therefore, both hath done, and is about to do them. For neither are they done if He hath not done them, nor are they future if He shall not do them. He did them therefore by predestinating, is about to do them by working. Just as concerning the disciples, at what time He chose them, the Gospel sufficiently declares; namely, at that time when He called them: and yet the Apostle saith, He chose us before the foundation of the world: by predestinating, to wit, not by calling. But whom He predestinated them He also called: chose, by predestinating before the foundation of the world; chose, by calling before the consummation of the world. So likewise the mansions, He both hath prepared and is preparing; and not others, but those which He hath prepared the same He is preparing, Who hath done the things that are future: the same which He hath prepared by predestinating He is preparing by working. Already therefore they are, in predestination: were it not so, He would have said, I will go and prepare, i. e. will predestinate. But, because they do not yet exist in working, He saith, And if I go away, and prepare a place for you, I come again, and will receive you unto Myself.

2. But, in some sort, He prepares the mansions (or, dwellings) by preparing dwellers for the dwellings. For, in fact, seeing He hath said, In My Father's house are many mansions, what take we the house of God to be but the temple of God? But what that is, let the Apostle be interrogated and make answer: For the temple of God is holy, which temple iCor.5, are ye. This is also the kingdom of God, which the Son is to deliver to the Father: whence saith this same Apostle, The beginning, Christ; afterward, they that are Christ at His coming: then the end, when He shall have delivered up the kingdom to God, even the Father; i. e. whom He hath redeemed by His blood, He shall have delivered up to His Father beholding Him also. This is the kingdom of heaven, of which it is said, The kingdom of heaven is like a man which sowed good seed in his field. Now the good seed, these are the children of the kingdom: and albeit now 33 43. they have the tares mixed with them, the King Himself in the end shall send His Angels, and they shall gather out of His kingdom all offences. Then shall the just shine as the sun in the kingdom of their Father. The kingdom shall shine in the kingdom, when to the kingdom shall have come Matt. 6, the kingdom, which now we pray for and say, Thy kingdom come. Therefore now it is already called the kingdom, but as yet it is in process of being called together: for were it not called kingdom, it should not be said, They shall gather out of the kingdom all offences. But it doth not yet reign, this same kingdom. Consequently it is in such sort a kingdom already, that, when from it all offences shall be gathered, then it shall come to be a kingdom: so as to have not only the name of kingdom, but also the power of reigning. For to this kingdom, standing at the right hand, it shall be said Mat.25:34, in the end, Come, ye blessed of My Father, receive ye the kingdom: i. e. Ye who were a kingdom, yet did not reign, come, reign; that what ye were in hope, ye may be able also to be in reality. This house, therefore, of God, this temple of God, this kingdom of God, and kingdom of heaven, is yet in building, yet in fashioning, yet in preparing, yet in being gathered together. In that, there will be mansions, so as the Lord is as yet preparing them: in that, already they are, so as the Lord hath predestinated them already.

8. But what meaneth it, that to prepare He went away, since doubtless we are that which He was to prepare: which thing He will not do, if He leave us? I take Thy meaning, Lord, as I am able: in truth thou signifies! this, that, in order Rom. i, to the preparing of these mansions, the just must live by faith. 2 Cor 5 that He be not seen: be hidden, that He may be believed on. For then hath one a place in preparing, if he be living by faith. Believed, let Him be desired, that desired, He may be had: the desire of love is the preparing of a mansion. So, Lord, prepare that which Thou preparest: for Thou preparest us for Thee, and Thee for us: since Thou preparest place both for Thee in us and for us in Thee. For Thou hast said, Abide in Me, and I in you. In what degree each shall be partaker of Thee, one less, another more, this shall be the diversity of rewards in proportion to the diversity of merits: this shall be the multitude of mansions, according to the inequality of the dwellers therein, who nevertheless all alike have eternity of life and endlessness of bliss. What meaneth it that Thou goest? What meaneth it that Thou comest? If I understand Thee aright, neither whence Thou goest, nor whence Thou comest, departest Thou: Thou goest by being unseen, comest by appearing. But unless Thou abide by ruling that we may make progress in well living, how shall there be a place prepared where we may abide by enjoying? Let it be enough to have said thus much concerning the words of the Gospel which have been read, as far as to where the Lord saith, I come again, and will receive you unto Myself. But what that means which follows, that where I am, ye may be also; and whither I go ye know, and the way ye know this, after the question then ensuing, put by the disciple, as if we also asked by him, we shall better hear, and more seasonably handle.

Chapter 111.— After the Resurrection There Shall Be Two Distinct Kingdoms, One of Eternal Happiness, the Other of Eternal Misery.

After the resurrection, however, when the final, universal judgment has been completed, there shall be two kingdoms, each with its own distinct boundaries, the one Christ's, the other the devil's; the one consisting of the good, the other of the bad,—both, however, consisting of angels and men. The former shall have no will, the latter no power, to sin, and neither shall have any power to choose death; but the former shall live truly and happily in eternal life, the latter shall drag a miserable existence in eternal death without the power of dying; for the life and the death shall both be without end. But among the former there shall be degrees of happiness, one being more pre-eminently happy than another; and among the latter there shall be degrees of misery, one being more enduringly miserable than another.

Yet Star Differeth From Star In Glory; So Also Resurrection Of Dead. These Are Different Merits Of Saints; If By That Penny Heaven Were Signified, Have Not All Stars In Common To Be In Heaven?

Miscellaneous Treatise On Holy Virginit

(published in English in 1852)

xxvi. 26. What then, say they, is the meaning of that penny, Saints, equal in eternal life, differ in glory. which is given in payment to all alike when the work of the the vineyard is ended? whether it be to those who have laboured from the first hour, or to those who have laboured one hour?

What assuredly doth it signify, but something, which all shall have in common, such as is life eternal itself, the kingdom of heaven itself, where shall be all, whom God hath predestinated, called, justified, glorified? For it behoveth that this corruptible put on incorruption, and this mortal put on immortality. . This is that penny, wages for all. Yet star differeth from star in glory; so also the resurrection of the dead. These are the different merits of the Saints. For, if by that penny the heaven were signified, have not all the stars in common to be in the heaven? And yet, there is one glory of the sun, another glory of the moon, another of the stars. If that penny were taken for health of body, have not all the members, when we are well, health in common; and, should this health continue even unto death, is it not in all alike and equally? And yet, God hath set the members, each one of them, in the body, as He would; that neither the whole be an eye, nor the whole hearing, nor the whole smelling: and, whatever else there is, it hath its own property, although it have health equally with all. Thus because life eternal itself shall be alike to all, an equal penny was assigned to all; but, because in that life eternal itself the lights of merits shall shine with a distinction, there are many mansions in the house of the Father: and, by this means, in the penny not unlike, one lives not longer than another; but in the many mansions, one is honoured with greater brightness than another.

27. Therefore go on, Saints of God, boys and girls, males and females, unmarried men and women; go on and persevere unto the end. Praise more sweetly the Lord, Whom ye think on more richly: hope more happily in Him, Whom ye serve more instantly: love more ardently Him, Whom ye please more attentively. With loins girded, and lamps burning, wait for the Lord, when He cometh from the marriage.

1 Corinthians chapter 15, verse 35 and 1 Corinthians chapter 15, verse 36

But some one will say, How are the dead raised? and with what manner of body do they come? Thou foolish one, that which thou thyself sowest is not quickened, except it die.

1. Gentle and lowly as the apostle is to a great degree every where, he here adopts a style rather pungent, because of the impiety of the gainsayers. He is nothowever content with this, but he also employs reasons and examples, subduing thereby even the very contentious. And above he saith, "Since by man came death, by man came also the resurrection of the dead;" but here he solves an objection brought in by the Gentiles. And see how again he abates the vehemence of his censure; in that he said not, "but perhaps ye will say," but he set down the objector indefinitely, in order that, although employing his impetuous style with all freedom, he might not too severely wound his hearers. And he states two difficulties, one touching the manner of the resurrection, the other, the kind of bodies. For of both they on their part made a question, saying, "How is that which hath been dissolved raised up?" and, "with what manner of body do they come?" But what means, "with what manner of body?" It is as if they had said, "with this which hath been wasted, which hath perished, or with some other?"

Then, to point out that the objects of their enquiry are not questionable but admitted points, he at once meets them more sharply, saying, "Thou foolish one, that which thou thyself sowest is not quickened, except it die." Which we also are wont to do in the case of those who gainsay things acknowledged.

And wherefore did he not at once appeal to the power of God? Because he is discoursing with unbelievers. For when his discourse is addressed to believers, he hath not much need of reasons. Wherefore having said elsewhere, "He shall change the body of your humiliation, that it may be fashioned like to the body of his glory," (Philippians chapter 3, verse 2) and having indicated somewhat more than the resurrection, he stated no analogies, but instead of any demonstration, brought forward the power of God, going on to say, "according to the working whereby He is able to subject all things to Himself." But here he also urges reasons. That is, having established it from the Scriptures, he adds also in what comes after, these things over and above, with an eye to them who do not obey the Scriptures; and he saith, "O foolish one, that which Thou sowest:" i.e., "from thyself thou hast the proof of these things, by what thou doest every day, and doubttest thou yet? Therefore do I call thee foolish because of the things daily done by thine own self thou art ignorant, and being thyself an artificer of a resurrection, thou doubtest concerning God." Wherefore very emphatically he said, "what Thou sowest," thou who art mortal and perishing.

And see how he uses expressions appropriate to the purpose he had in view: thus, "it is not quickened," saith he, "except it die." Leaving, you see, the terms appropriate to seed, as that "it buds," and "grows," and "is dissolved," he adopts those which correspond to our flesh, viz. "it is quickened," and, "except it die;" which do not properly belong to seeds, but to bodies.

And he said not, "after it is dead it lives," but, which is a greater thing, "therefore it lives, because it dies." Seest thou, what I am always observing, that he continually gives their argument the contrary turn? Thus what they made a sure sign of our not rising again, the same he makes a demonstration of our rising. For they said, "the body rises not again, because it is dead." What then doth he, retorting their argument, say? "Nay, but unless it died, it could not rise again: and therefore it rises again, because it died." For as Christ more clearly signifies this very thing, in the words, "Except a grain of wheat fall into the ground and die, it abideth by itself alone: but if it die, it beareth much fruit:" (John chapter 12, verse 24) thence also Paul, drawing this example, said not, "it doth not live," but, "is not quickened;" again assuming the power of God and showing that not the nature of the ground, but God Himself, brings it all to pass.

And what can be the reason that he did not bring that forward, which was more akin to the subject: I mean, the seed of mankind? (For our generation too begins from a sort of decay, even as that of the corn.) Because it was not of equal force, but the latter was a more complete instance: for he wants a case of something that perished entirely, whereas this was but a part; wherefore he rather alleges the other. Besides, that proceeds from a living body and falls into a living womb; but here it is no flesh, but the earth into which the seed is cast, and into the same it is dissolved, like the body which is dead. Wherefore on this account too the example was more appropriate.

[3.] Ver. 37. "And he who soweth, soweth not that body that shall be."

For the things before spoken meet the question, "how they are raised;" but this, the doubt, "with what manner of body they come." But what is, "thou sowest not that body which shall be?" Not an entire ear of corn, nor new grain. For here his discourse no longer regards the resurrection, but the manner of the resurrection, what is the kind of body which shall rise again; as whether it be of the same kind, or better and more glorious. And he takes both from the same analogy, intimating that it will be much better.

But the heretics, considering none of these things, dart in upon us and say, "one body falls and another body rises again. How then is there a resurrection? For the resurrection is of that which was fallen. But where is that wonderful and surprising trophy over death, if one body fall and another rise again? For he will no longer appear to have given back that which he took captive. And how can the alleged analogy suit the things before mentioned?" Why, it is not one substance that is sown, and another that is raised, but the same substance improved. Else neither will Christ have resumed the same body when He became the first-fruits of them that rise again: but according to you He threw aside the former body, although it had not sinned, and took another. Whence then is that other? For this body was from the Virgin, but that, whence was it? Seest thou to what absurdity the argument hath come round? For wherefore shows He the very prints of the nails? Was it not to prove that it is that same body which was crucified, and the same again that rose from the dead? And what means also His type of Jonah? For surely it was not one Jonah that was swallowed up and another that was cast out upon dry land. And why did He also say, "Destroy this temple, and in three days I will raise it up?" For that which was destroyed, the same clearly He raised again. Wherefore also the Evangelist added, that "He spake of the temple of His body." (John chapter 2, verse 19 and John chapter 2, verse 21)

What is that then which he saith, "Thou sowest not the body that shall be?" i.e. not the ear of corn: for it is the same, and not the same; the same, because the substance is the same; but not the same, because this is more excellent, the substance remaining the same but its beauty becoming greater, and the same body rising up new. Since if this were not so, there were no need of a resurrection, I mean if it were not to rise again improved. For why did He at all pull down His house, except He were about to build it more glorious?

This now, you see, he said to them who think that it is utter corruption. Next, that none again might suspect from this place that another body is spoken of, he qualifies the dark saying, and himself interprets what he had spoken, not allowing the hearer to turn his thoughts from hence in any other direction. What need is there then of our reasonings? Hear himself speaking, and explaining the phrase, "Thou sowest not the body that shall be." For he straightway adds, "but a bare grain, it may chance of wheat, or of some other kind;" i.e., it is not the body that shall be; not so clothed, for instance; not having a stalk and beard, but "a bare grain, it may chance of wheat, or of some other kind."

Ver. 38. "But God giveth it a body even as it pleased Him."

"Yes," saith one, "but in that case it is the work of nature." Of what nature, tell me? For in that case likewise God surely doeth the whole; not nature, nor the earth, nor the rain. Wherefore also he making these things manifest, leaves out both earth and rain, atmosphere, sun, and hands of husbandmen, and subjoins, "God giveth it a body as it pleased Him." Do not thou therefore curiously inquire, nor busy thyself with the how and in what manner, when thou hearest of the power and will of God.

"And to each seed a body of its own." Where then is the alien matter which they speak of? For He giveth to each "his own." So that when he saith, "Thou sowest not that which shall be," he saith not this, that one substance is raised up instead of another, but that it is improved, that it is more glorious. For "to each of the seeds," saith he, "a body of its own."

[4.] From hence in what follows, he introducing also the difference of the resurrection which shall then be. For do not suppose, because grain is sown and all come up ears of corn, that therefore there is also in the resurrection an equality of honor. For in the first place, neither in seeds is there only one rank, but some are more valuable, and some inferior. Wherefore also he added, "to each seed a body of its own."

However, he is not content with this, but seeks another difference greater and more manifest. For that thou mayest not, when hearing, as I said, that all rise again, suppose that all enjoy the same reward; he laid before even in the preceding verses the seeds of this thought, saying, "But each in his own order." But he brings it out here also more clearly, saying,

Ver. 39. "All flesh is not the same flesh."

For why speak I, saith he, in respect of seeds? In respect of bodies let us agitate this point, concerning which we are discoursing now. Wherefore also he addeth, and saith,

"But there is one flesh of men, another flesh of beasts, another of birds, and another of fishes."

Ver. 40. "There are also celestial bodies, and bodies terrestrial; but the glory of the celestial is one, and the glory of the terrestrial is another."

Ver. 41. "There is one glory of the sun, and another glory of the moon, and another glory of the stars: for one star differeth from another star in glory."

And what means he by these expressions? Wherefore from the resurrection of the body did he throw himself into the discourse of the stars and the sun? He did not throw himself out, neither did he break off from his purpose; far from it: but he still keeps to it. For whereas he had established the doctrine concerning the resurrection, he intimates in what follows that great will be then the difference of glory, though there be but one resurrection. And for the present he divides the whole into two: into "bodies celestial," and "bodies terrestrial." For that the bodies are raised again, he signified by the corn: but that they are not all in the same glory, he signifies by this. For as the disbelief of the resurrection makes men supine, so again it makes them indolent to think that all are vouchsafed the same reward. Wherefore he corrects both. And the one in the preceding verses he had completed; but this he begins now. And having made two ranks, of the righteous and of sinners, these same two he subdivides again into many parts, signifying that neither righteous nor sinners shall obtain the same; neither righteous men, all of them, alike with other righteous, nor sinners with other sinners.

Now he makes, you see, first, one separation between righteous and sinners, where he says, "bodies celestial, and bodies terrestrial:" by the "terrestrial" intimating the latter, and by the "celestial," the former. Then farther he introduces a difference of sinners from sinners, saying, "All flesh is not the same flesh, but there is one flesh of fishes, another of birds, and another of beasts." And yet all are bodies; but some are in more, and some in lesser vileness. And that in their manner of living too, and in their very constitution.

And having said this, he ascends again to the heaven, saying, "There is one glory of the sun, and another glory of the moon." For as in the earthly bodies there is a difference, so also in the heavenly; and that difference no ordinary one, but reaching even to the uttermost: there being not only a difference between sun and moon, and stars, but also between stars and stars. For what though they be all in the heaven? yet some have a larger, others a less share of glory. What do we learn from hence? That although they be all in God's kingdom, all shall not enjoy the same reward; and though all sinners be in hell, all shall not endure the same punishment. Wherefore he added,

Ver. 42. "So also is the resurrection of the dead."

"So," How? with considerable difference. Then leaving this doctrine as sufficiently proved, he again comes to the proof itself of the resurrection and the manner of it, saying,

[5.] "It is sown in corruption, it is raised in incorruption." And observe his consideration. As in the case of seeds, he used the term proper to bodies, saying, "it is not quickened, except it die:" so in the case of bodies, the expression belonging to seeds, saying, "it is sown in corruption, it is raised in incorruption." He said not, "is produced," that thou mightest not think it a work of the earth, but is "raised." And by sowing here, he means not our generation in the womb, but the burial in the earth of our dead bodies, their dissolution, their ashes. Wherefore having said, "it is sown in corruption, it is raised in incorruption," he adds,

Ver. 43. "It is sown in dishonor." For what is more unsightly than a corpse in dissolution? "It is raised in glory."

"It is sown in weakness." For before thirty days the whole is gone, and the flesh cannot keep itself together nor hold out for one day. "It is raised in power." For there shall nothing prevail against it for all the future.

Here is why he stood in need of those former analogies, lest many on hearing of these things, that they are "raised in incorruption and glory and power," might suppose that there is no difference among those who rise again. For all indeed rise again, both in power and in incorruption; and in this glory of their incorruption yet are not all in the same state of honor and safety.

Ver. 44. "It is sown a natural body, it is raised a spiritual body. There is a natural body, and there is a spiritual body."

What sayest thou? Is not "this" body spiritual? It is indeed spiritual, but that will be much more so. For now oftentimes both the abundant grace of the Holy Ghost flies away on men's committing great sins; and again, the Spirit continuing present, the life of the flesh depends on the soul: and the result in such a case is a void, without the Spirit. But in that day not so: rather he abides continually in the flesh of the righteous, and the victory shall be His, the natural soul also being present.

For either it was some such thing which he intimated by saying, "a spiritual body," or that it shall be lighter and more subtle and such as even to be wafted upon air; or rather he meant both these. And if thou disbelieve the doctrine, behold the heavenly bodies which are so glorious and (for this time) so durable, and abide in undecaying tranquillity; and believe thou from hence, that God can also make these corruptible bodies incorruptible and much more excellent than those which are visible.

[6.] Ver. 45. "So also it is written, (Genesis chapter 2, verse 7) the first man Adam became a living soul: the last Adam became a life-giving Spirit."

And yet the one indeed is written, but the other not written. How then said He, "it is written?" He modified the expression according to the issue of events: as he is wont continually to do: and indeed as it is the way of every prophet. For so Jerusalem, the prophet said, should be "called a city of righteousness;" (Isaiah chapter 1, verse 26) yet it was not so called. What then? Did the prophet speak false? By no means. For he is speaking of the issue of events. And that Christ too should be called Immanuel; (Isaiah chapter 7, verse 14) yet was he not so called. But the facts utter this voice; so also here, "the last Adam became a life-giving Spirit."

And these things he said that thou mayest learn that the signs and pledges both of the present life and of that which is to come have already come upon us; to wit, of the present life, Adam, and of the life to come, Christ. For since he sets down the better things as matters of hope, he signifies that their beginning hath already come to pass, and their root and their fountain been brought to light. But if the root and the fountain be evident to all, there is no need to doubt of the fruits. Wherefore he saith, "The last Adam became a life-giving Spirit." And elsewhere too, He "shall quicken your mortal bodies through His Spirit that dwelleth in you." (Romans chapter 7, verse 11) It is the Spirit's work then to quicken.

Further, lest any should say, "why are the worse things the elder? and why hath the one sort, to wit, the natural, come to pass not merely as far as the first-fruits, but altogether; the other as far as the first-fruits only?"-he signifies that the principles also of each were so ordered.

Ver. 46. "For that is not first," saith he, "which is spiritual, but that which is natural, then that which is spiritual."

And he saith not, why, but is content with the ordinance of God, having the evidence from the facts testifying to that most excellent oeconomy of God, and implying that our state is always going forward to the better; at the same time by this also adding credibility to his argument. For if the lesser have come to pass, much more ought we to expect the better.

[7.] Since then we are to enjoy so great blessings, let us take our station in this array, and bewail not the departed, but rather those that have ended their life ill. For so the husbandman, when he sees the grain dissolving, doth not mourn; rather, as long as he beholds it continuing solid in the ground he is in fear and trembling, but when he sees it dissolved rejoices. For the beginning of the future crop is its dissolving. So let us also then rejoice when the corruptible house falls, when the man is sown. And marvel not if he called the burial "a sowing;" for, in truth, this is the better sowing: inasmuch as that sowing is succeeded by deaths and labors and dangers and cares; but this, if we lived well, by crowns and rewards; and that, by corruption and death but this by incorruption and immortality, and those infinite blessings. To that kind of sowing there went embraces and pleasures and sleep: but to this, only a voice coming down from heaven, and all is at once brought to perfection. And he that rises again is no more led to a life full of toil, but to a place where anguish and sorrow and sighing are fled away.

If thou requirest protection and therefore mournest thy husband, betake thyself to God, the common Protector and Saviour and Benefactor of all, to that irresistible alliance, to that ready aid, to that abiding shelter which is every where present, and is as a wall unto us on every side.

"But your intercourse was a thing desirable and lovely." I too know it. But if thou wilt trust sound reason with this grief, and wilt consider with thyself who hath taken him away, and that by nobly bearing it thou offerest thy mind as a sacrifice to our God, even this wave will not be too strong for thee to stem. And that which time brings to pass, the same do thou by thy self-command. But if thou shalt yield to weakness, thine emotion will cease indeed in time, but it will bring thee no reward.

And together with these reasons collect also examples, some in the present life, some in the Holy Scriptures. Consider that Abraham slew his own son, and neither shed a tear nor uttered a bitter word. "But he," you say, "was Abraham." Nay, thou surely hast been called to a nobler field of action. And Job grieved indeed, but so much as was proper for a father who loved his children and was very solicitous for the departed; whereas what we now do, is surely the part of haters and enemies. For if when a man was taken up to court and crowned, thou wert smiting thyself and lamenting, I should not say that thou wast a friend of him who was crowned, but a great enemy and adversary. "Nay," say you, "not even as it is do I mourn for him, but for myself." Well, but this is not the part of an affectionate person, to wish for thine own sake that he were still in the conflict and subject to the uncertainty of the future, when he might be crowned and come to anchor; or that he should be tossed in mid ocean, when he might have been in port.

[8.] "But I know not whither he hath gone," say you. Wherefore knowest thou not, tell me? For according as he lived well or otherwise, it is evident whither he will go. "Nay, on this very account I lament," say you, "because he departed being a sinner." This is a mere pretext and excuse. For if this were the reason of thy mourning for the departed, thou oughtest to have formed and corrected him, when he was alive. The fact is thou dost every where look to what concerns thyself, not him.

But grant that he departed with sin upon him, even on this account one ought to rejoice, that he was stopped short in his sins and added not to his iniquity; and help him as far as possible, not by tears, but by prayers and supplications and alms and offerings. For not unmeaningly have these things been devised, nor do we in vain make mention of the departed in the course of the divine mysteries, and approach God in their behalf, beseeching the Lamb Who is before us, Who taketh away the sin of the world;-not in vain, but that some refreshment may thereby ensue to them. Not in vain cloth he that standeth by the altar cry out when the tremendous mysteries are celebrated, "For all that have fallen asleep in Christ, and for those who perform commemorations in their behalf." For if there were no commemorations for them, these things would not have been spoken: since our service is not a mere stage show, God forbid! yea, it is by the ordinance of the Spirit that these things are done.

Let us then give them aid and perform commemoration for them. For if the children of Job were purged by the sacrifice of their father, why dost thou doubt that when we too offer for the departed, some consolation arises to them? since God is wont to grant the petitions of those who ask for others. And this Paul signified saying, "that in a manifold Person your gift towards us bestowed by many may be acknowledged with thanksgiving on your behalf." (2 Corinthians chapter 1, verse 11) Let us not then be weary in giving aid to the departed, both by offering on their behalf and obtaining prayers for them: for the common Expiation of the world is even before us. Therefore with boldness do we then intreat for the whole world, and name their names with those of martyrs, of confessors, of priests. For in truth one body are we all, though some members are more glorious than others; and it is possible from every source to gather pardon for them, from our prayers, from our gifts in their behalf, from those whose names are named with theirs. Why therefore dost thou grieve? Why mourn, when it is in thy power to gather so much pardon for the departed?

[9.] Is it then that thou art become desolate and hast lost a protector? Nay, never mention this. For thou hast not surely lost thy God. And so, as long as thou hast Him, He will be better to thee than husband and father and child and kinsman: since even when they were alive, He it was who did all things.

These things therefore think upon, and say with David, "The Lord is my light and my Saviour, whom shall I fear? (Ps. xxvii. 1) Say, Thou art a Father of the fatherless, and a Judge of the widows: "(Psalms chapter 68, verse 5) and draw down His aid, and thou shalt have Him to care for thee now more than before, by how much thou art in a state of greater difficulty.

Or hast thou lost a child? Thou hast not lost it; say not so. This thing is sleep, not death; removal, not destruction; a journeying from the worse unto the better. Do not then provoke God to anger; but propitiate Him. For if thou bearest it nobly, there will thence accruesome relief both to the departed and to thyself; but if the contrary, thou dost the more kindle God's anger. For if when a servant was chastised by his master, thou didst stand by and complain, thou wouldest the more exasperate the master against thyself. Do not then so; but give thanks, that hereby also this cloud of sadness may be scattered from thee. Say with that blessed one, "the Lord gave, and the Lord hath taken away." (Job chapter 1, verse 21) Consider how many more well-pleasing in His sight have never received children at all, nor been called fathers. "Nor would I wish to have been so," say you, "for surely it were better not to have had experience than after having tasted the pleasure to fall from it." Nay, I beseech thee, say not so, provoke not thus also the Lord to wrath: but for what thou hast received, give Him thanks; and for what thou hast not to the end, give Him glory. Job said not that which thou sayest un-thankfully, "it were better not to have received," but both for the one he gave thanks, saying, "The Lord gave;" and for the other he blessed God, saying, "The Lord hath taken away, blessed be the name of the Lord for ever." And his wife he thus silenced, justifying himself against her, and uttering those admirable words, "Have we received good at the hand of the Lord, and shall we not receive evil?" And yet after this a fiercer temptation befel him: yet was he not even thus unnerved, but in like manner bore it nobly and glorified God.

This also do thou, and consider with thyself that man hath not taken him, but God who made him, who more than thyself cares for him and knows what is good for him: who is no enemy nor liar-in-wait. See how many, living, have made life intolerable to their parents. "But seest thou not the right-hearted ones?" say you. I see these too, but even these are not so safe as thy child is. For though they are now approved, yet it is uncertain what their end will be; but for him thou hast no longer any fear, nor dost thou tremble lest anything Should happen to him or he experience any change.

These things also do thou consider respecting a good wife and guardian of thine house, and for all things give thanks unto God. And even if thou shalt lose a wife, give thanks. Perhaps God's will is to lead thee to continence, He calls thee to a nobler field of conflict, He was pleased to set thee free from this bond. If we thus command ourselves, we shall both gain the joy of this life and obtain the crowns which are to come, &c. &c.

Conferences

The First Conference Of Abbot Chaeremon: On Perfection

Although many of the saints who are taught by your example can scarcely emulate the greatness of your perfection, with which you shine like great luminaries with marvellous brightness in this world, yet still you, O holy brothers Honoratus and Eucherius, are so stirred by the great glory of those splendid men from whom we received the first principles of monasticism, that one of you, presiding as he does over a large monastery of the brethren, is hoping that his congregation, which learns a lesson from the daily sight of your saintly life, may be instructed in the precepts of those fathers, while the other has been anxious to make his way to Egypt to be edified by the sight of these in the flesh, that he might leave this province that is frozen as it were with the cold of Gaul, and like some pure turtle dove fly to those lands on which the sun of righteousness looks and to which it approaches nearest, and which abound with the ripe fruits of virtues. As a matter of course the greatness of my love wrings this from me; viz., that considering the desire of the one and the labour of the other, I should not decline the danger and peril of writing, if only to the one there may be added authority among his children, and from the other may be removed the necessity for so risky a journey. Further since neither the Institutes of the Cœnobia which we wrote to the best of our ability in twelve books for Bishop Castor of blessed memory, nor the ten Conferences of the fathers living in the desert of Scete, which we composed somehow or other at the bidding of Saints Helladius and Leontius the Bishops, were able to satisfy your faith and zeal, now in order that the reason for our journey may be also known, I have thought that seven Conferences of the three fathers whom we first saw living in another desert, might be written in the same style and dedicated to you, in which whatever has been in our previous works perhaps obscurely explained or even omitted on the subject of perfection, may be supplied. But if even this is not enough to satisfy the holy thirst of your desires, seven other Conferences, which are to be sent to the holy brethren living in the islands of the Stœchades, will, I fancy, satisfy your wants and your ardour.

Abbot Chæremon's statement that faults can be overcome in three ways.

Then the blessed Chæremon: There are, said he, three things which enable men to control their faults; viz., either the fear of hell or of laws even now imposed; or the hope and desire of the kingdom of heaven; or a liking for goodness itself and the love of virtue. For then we read that the fear of evil loathes contamination: "The fear of the Lord hates evil." Proverbs 8:13 Hope also shuts out the assaults of all faults: for "all who hope in Him shall not fail." Love also fears no destruction from sins, for "love never fails;" 1 Corinthians 13:8 and again: "love covers a multitude of sins." 1 Peter 4:8 And therefore the blessed Apostle confines the whole sum of salvation in the attainment of those three virtues, saying "Now abides faith, hope, love, these three." 1 Corinthians 13:13 For faith is what makes us shun the stains of sin from fear of future judgment and punishment; hope is what withdraws our mind from present things, and despises all bodily pleasures from its expectation of heavenly rewards; love is what inflames us with keenness of heart for the love of Christ and the fruit of spiritual goodness, and makes us hate with a perfect hatred whatever is opposed to these. And these three things although they all seem to aim at one and the same end (for they incite us to abstain from things unlawful) yet they differ from each other greatly in the degrees of their excellence. For the two former belong properly to those men who in their aim at goodness have not yet acquired the love of virtue, and the third belongs specially to God and to those who have received into themselves the image and likeness of God. For He alone does the things that are good, with no fear and no thanks or reward to stir Him up, but simply from the love of goodness. For, as Solomon says, "The Lord has made all things for Himself." Proverbs 16:4 For under cover of His own goodness He bestows all the fullness of good things on the worthy and the unworthy because He cannot be wearied by wrongs, nor be moved by passions at the sins of men, as He ever remains perfect goodness and unchangeable in His nature.

By what steps we can ascend to the heights of love and what permanence there is in it.

If then any one is aiming at perfection, from that first stage of fear which we rightly termed servile (of which it is said: "When you have done all things say: we are unprofitable servants," Luke 17:10) he should by advancing a step mount to the higher path of hope— which is compared not to a slave but to a hireling, because it looks for the payment of its recompense, and as if it were free from care concerning absolution of its sins and fear of punishment, and conscious of its own good works, though it seems to look for the promised reward, yet it cannot attain to that love of a son who, trusting in his father's kindness and liberality, has no doubt that all that the father has is his, to which also that prodigal who together with his father's substance had lost the very name of son, did not venture to aspire, when he said: "I am no more worthy to be called your son;" for after those husks which the swine ate, satisfaction from which was denied to him, i.e., the disgusting food of sin, as he "came to himself," and was overcome by a salutary fear, he already began to loathe the uncleanness of the swine, and to dread the punishment of gnawing hunger, and as if he had already been made a servant, desires the condition of a hireling and thinks about the remuneration, and says: "How many hired servants of my father have abundance of bread, and I perish here with hunger. I will then return to my father and will say unto him, 'Father I have sinned against heaven and before you, and am no more worthy to be called your son: make me as one of your hired servants.'" Luke 15:17-19 But those words of humble penitence his father who ran to meet him received with greater affection than that with which they were spoken, and was not content to allow him lesser things, but passing through the two stages without delay restored him to his former dignity of sonship. We also ought immediately to hasten on that by means of the indissoluble grace of love we may mount to that third stage of sonship, which believes that all that the father has is its own, and so we may be counted worthy to receive the image and likeness of our heavenly Father, and be able to say after the likeness of the true son: "All that the Father has is mine." John 16:15 Which also the blessed Apostle declares of us, saying: "All things are yours, whether Paul or Apollos or Cephas, or the world, or life, or death, or things present, or things to come; all are yours." 1 Corinthians 3:22 And to this likeness the commands of our Saviour also summon us: "Be," says He, "perfect, even as your Father in heaven is perfect." Matthew 5:48 For in these persons sometimes the love of goodness is found to be interrupted, when the vigour of the soul is relaxed by some coldness or joy or delight, and so loses either the fear of hell for the time, or the desire of future blessings. And there is indeed in these a stage leading to some advance, which affects us so that when from fear of punishment or from hope of reward we begin to avoid sin we are enabled to pass on to the stage of love, for "fear," says one, "is not in love, but perfect love casts out fear: for fear has torment, but he who fears is not perfect in love. We therefore love because God first loved us." 1 John 4:18-19 We can then only ascend to that true perfection when, as He first loved us for the grace of nothing but our salvation, we also have loved Him for the sake of nothing but His own love alone. Wherefore we must do our best to mount with perfect ardour of mind from this fear to hope, from hope to the love of God, and the love of the virtues themselves, that as we steadily pass on to the love of goodness itself, we may, as far as it is possible for human nature, keep firm hold of what is good.

How greatly those excel who depart from sin through the feeling of love.

For there is a great difference between one who puts out the fire of sin within him by fear of hell or hope of future reward, and one who from the feeling of divine love has a horror of sin itself and of uncleanness, and keeps hold of the virtue of purity simply from the love and longing for purity, and looks for no reward from a promise for the future, but, delighted with the knowledge of good things present, does everything not from regard to punishment but from delight in virtue. For this condition can neither abuse an opportunity to sin when all human witnesses are absent, nor be corrupted by the secret allurements of thoughts, while, keeping in its very marrow the love of virtue itself, it not only does not admit into the heart anything that is opposed to it, but actually hates it with the utmost horror. For it is one thing for a man in his delight at some present good to hate the stains of sins and of the flesh, and another thing to check unlawful desires by contemplating the future reward; and it is one thing to fear present loss and another to dread future punishment. Lastly it is a much greater thing to be unwilling to forsake good for good's own sake, than it is to withhold consent from evil for fear of evil. For in the former case the good is voluntary, but in the latter it is constrained and as it were violently forced out of a reluctant party either by fear of punishment or by greed of reward. For one who abstains from the allurements of sin owing to fear, will whenever the obstacle of fear is removed, once more return to what he loves and thus will not continually acquire any stability in good, nor will he ever rest free from attacks because he will not secure the sure and lasting peace of chastity. For where there is the disturbance of warfare there cannot help being the danger of wounds. For one who is in the midst of the conflict, even though he is a warrior and by fighting bravely inflicts frequent and deadly wounds on his foes, must still sometimes be pierced by the point of the enemy's sword. But one who has defeated the attack of sins and is now in the enjoyment of the security of peace, and has passed on to the love of virtue itself, will keep this condition of good continually, as he is entirely wrapped up in it, because he believes that nothing can be worse than the loss of his inmost chastity. For he deems nothing dearer or more precious than present purity, to whom a dangerous departure from virtue or a poisonous stain of sin is a grievous punishment. To such an one, I say, neither will regard for the presence of another add anything to his goodness nor will solitude take anything away from it: but as always and everywhere he bears about with him his conscience as a judge not only of his actions but also of his thoughts, he will especially try to please it, as he knows that it cannot be cheated nor deceived, and that he cannot escape it.

That love not only makes sons out of servants, but also bestows the image and likeness of God.

And if to anyone relying on the help of God and not on his own efforts, it has been vouchsafed to acquire this state, from the condition of a servant, wherein is fear, and from a mercenary greed of hope, whereby there is sought not so much the good of the donor as the recompense of reward, he will begin to pass on to the adoption of sons, where there is no longer fear, nor greed, but that love which never fails continually endures. Of which fear and love the Lord in chiding some shows what is befitting for each one: "A son knows his own father, and a servant fears his lord: And if I be a Father, where is My honour: and if I be a Lord, where is my fear?" Malachi 1:6 For one who is a servant must needs fear because "if knowing his lord's will he has done things worthy of stripes, he shall be beaten with many stripes." Luke 12:47 Whoever then by this love has attained the image and likeness of God, will now delight in goodness for the pleasure of goodness itself, and having somehow a like feeling of patience and gentleness will henceforth be angered by no faults of sinners, but in his compassion and sympathy will rather ask for pardon for their infirmities, and, remembering that for so long he himself was tried by the stings of similar passions till by the Lord's mercy he was saved, will feel that, as he was saved from carnal attacks not by the teaching of his own exertions but by God's protection, not anger but pity ought to be shown to those who go astray; and with full peace of mind will he sing to God the following verse: "You have broken my chains. I will offer to You the sacrifice of praise;" and: "except the Lord had helped me, my soul had almost dwelt in hell." And while he continues in this humility of mind he will be able even to fulfil this Evangelic command of perfection: "Love your enemies, do good to them that hate you, and pray for them that persecute you and slander you." Matthew 5:44 And so it will be vouchsafed to us to attain that reward which is subjoined, whereby we shall not only bear the image and likeness of God, but shall even be called sons: "that you may be," says He "sons of your Father which is in heaven, Who makes His sun to rise on the good and evil, and sends rain on the just and on the unjust:" and this feeling the blessed John knew that he had attained when he said: "that we may have confidence in the day of judgment, because as He is so are we also in this world." 1 John 4:17 For in what can a weak and fragile human nature be like Him, except in always showing a calm love in its heart towards the good and evil, the just and the unjust, in imitation of God, and by doing good for the love of goodness itself, arriving at that true adoption of the sons of God, of which also the blessed Apostle speaks as follows: "Every one that is born of God does not sin, for His seed is in him, and he cannot sin, because he is born of God;" and again: "We know that every one who is born of God sins not, but his birth of God preserves him, and the wicked one touches him not?" And this must be understood not of all kinds of sins, but only of mortal sins: and if any one will not extricate and cleanse himself from these, for him the aforesaid Apostle tells us in another place that we ought not even to pray, saying: "If a man knows his brother to be sinning a sin not unto death, let him ask, and He will give him life for them that sin not unto death. There is a sin unto death: I do not say that he should ask for it." But of those which he says are not unto death, from which even those who serve Christ faithfully cannot, with whatever care they keep themselves, be free, of these he says: "If we say that we have no sin we deceive ourselves and the truth is not in us;" and again: "If we say that we have not sinned, we make Him a liar, and His word is not in us." 1 John 1:8, 10 For it is an impossibility for any one of the saints not to fall into those trivial faults which are committed by word, and thought, and ignorance, and forgetfulness, and necessity, and will, and surprise: which though quite different from that sin which is said to be unto death, still cannot be free from fault and blame.

How it is the perfection of love to pray for one's enemies and by what signs we may recognize a mind that is not yet purified.

When then any one has acquired this love of goodness of which we have been speaking, and the imitation of God, then he will be endowed with the Lord's heart of compassion, and will pray also for his persecutors, saying in like manner: "Father, forgive them, for they know not what they do." Luke 23:34 But it is a clear sign of a soul that is not yet thoroughly purged from the dregs of sin, not to sorrow with a feeling of pity at the offenses of others, but to keep to the rigid censure of the judge: for how will he be able to obtain perfection of heart, who is without that by which, as the Apostle has pointed out, the full requirements of the law can be fulfilled, saying: "Bear one another's burdens and so fulfil the law of Christ," Galatians 6:2 and who has not that virtue of love, which "is not grieved, is not puffed up, thinks no evil," which "endures all things, bears all things." 1 Corinthians 13:4-7 For "a righteous man pities the life of his beasts: but the heart of the ungodly is without pity." And so a monk is quite certain to fall into the same sins which he condemns in another with merciless and inhuman severity, for "a stern king will fall into misfortunes," and "one who stops his ears so as not to hear the weak, shall himself cry, and there shall be none to hear him."

Chapter 11

A question why he has called the feeling of fear and hope imperfect.

Germanus: You have indeed spoken powerfully and grandly of the perfect love of God. But still this fact disturbs us; viz., that while you were exalting it with such praise, you said that the fear of God and the hope of eternal reward were imperfect, though the prophet seems to have thought quite differently about them, where he said: "Fear the Lord, all you His saints, for they that fear Him lack nothing." And again in the matter of observing God's righteous acts he admits that he has done them from consideration of the reward, saying: "I have inclined my heart to do your righteous acts forever, for the reward." And the Apostle says: "By faith Moses when he was grown up, denied himself to be the son of Pharaoh's daughter; choosing rather to be afflicted with the people of God than to have the pleasure of sin for a season, esteeming the reproach of Christ greater riches than the treasure of the Egyptians; for he looked unto the reward." Hebrews 11:24-26 How then can we think that they are imperfect, if the blessed David boasted that he did the righteous acts of God in hope of a recompense, and the giver of the Law is said to have looked for a future reward and so to have despised the adoption to royal dignity, and to have preferred the most terrible affliction to the treasures of the Egyptians?

The answer on the different kinds of perfection.

Chæremon: In accordance with the condition and measure of every mind Holy Scripture summons our free wills to different grades of perfection. For no uniform crown of perfection can be offered to all men, because all have not the same virtue, or purpose, or fervour, and so the Divine Word has in some way appointed different ranks and different measures of perfection itself. And that this is so the variety of beatitudes in the gospel clearly shows. For though they are called blessed, whose is the kingdom of heaven, and blessed are they who shall possess the earth, and blessed are they who shall receive their consolation, and blessed are they who shall be filled, yet we believe that there is a great difference between the habitations of the kingdom of heaven, and the possession of the earth, whatever it be, and also between the reception of consolation and the fullness and satisfaction of righteousness; and that there is a great distinction between those who shall obtain mercy, and those who shall be deemed worthy to enjoy the most glorious vision of God. "For there is one glory of the sun, and another glory of the moon, and another glory of the stars: for star differs from star in glory, so also is the resurrection of the dead." 1 Corinthians 15:41-42 While therefore in accordance with this rule holy Scripture praises those who fear God, and says "Blessed are all they that fear the Lord," and promises them for this a full measure of bliss, yet it says again: "There is no fear in love, but perfect love casts out fear: for fear has torment. But he that fears is not yet perfect in love." 1 John 4:18 And again, though it is a grand thing to serve God, and it is said: "Serve the Lord in fear;" and: "It is a great thing for you to be called My servant;" and: "Blessed is that servant whom his Lord, when He comes, shall find so doing," yet it is said to the Apostles: "I no longer call you servants, for the servant knows not what his Lord does: but I call you friends, for all things whatsoever I have heard from my Father, I have made known unto you.” John 15:14-15 And once more: “You are My friends, if you do whatever I command you.” John 15:13 You see then that there are different stages of perfection, and that we are called by the Lord from high things to still higher in such a way that he who has become blessed and perfect in the fear of God; going as it is written “from strength to strength,” and from one perfection to another, i.e., mounting with keenness of soul from fear to hope, is summoned in the end to that still more blessed stage, which, is love, and he who has been “a faithful and wise servant” Matthew 24:45 will pass to the companionship of friendship and to the adoption of sons. So then our saying also must be understood according to this meaning: not that we say that the consideration of that enduring punishment or of that blessed recompense which is promised to the saints is of no value, but because, though they are useful and introduce those who pursue them to the first beginning of blessedness, yet again love, wherein is already fuller confidence, and a lasting joy, will remove them from servile fear and mercenary hope to the love of God, and carry them on to the adoption of sons, and somehow make them from being perfect still more perfect. For the Saviour says that in His Father's house are “many mansions,” John 14:2 and although all the stars seem to be in the sky, yet there is a mighty difference between the brightness of the sun and of the moon, and between that of the morning star and the rest of the stars. And therefore the blessed Apostle prefers it not only above fear and hope but also above all gifts which are counted great and wonderful, and shows the way of love still more excellent than all. For when after finishing his list of spiritual gifts of virtues he wanted to describe its members, he began as follows: “And yet I show unto you a still more excellent way. Though I speak with the tongues of men and angels, and though I have the gift of prophecy and know all mysteries and all knowledge, and though I have all faith so that I can remove mountains, and though I bestow all my goods to feed the poor, and give my body to be burned, but have not love, it profits me nothing.” You see then that nothing more precious, nothing more perfect, nothing more sublime, and, if I may say so, nothing more enduring can be found than love. For “whether there be prophecies, they shall fail, whether there be tongues, they shall cease, whether there be knowledge, it shall be destroyed,” but “love never fails,” and without it not only those most excellent kinds of gifts, but even the glory of martyrdom itself will fail.

Of the fear which is the outcome of the greatest love.

Whoever then has been established in this perfect love is sure to mount by a higher stage to that still more sublime fear belonging to love, which is the outcome of no dread of punishment or greed of reward, but of the greatest love; whereby a son fears with earnest affection a most indulgent father, or a brother fears his brother, a friend his friend, or a wife her husband, while there is no dread of his blows or reproaches, but only of a slight injury to his love, and while in every word as well as act there is ever care taken by anxious affection lest the warmth of his love should cool in the very slightest degree towards the object of it. And one of the prophets has finely described the grandeur of this fear, saying: “Wisdom and knowledge are the riches of salvation: the fear of the Lord is his treasure.” Isaiah 33:6 He could not describe with greater clearness the worth and value of that fear than by saying that the riches of our salvation, which consist in true wisdom and knowledge of God, can only be preserved by the fear of the Lord. To this fear then not sinners but saints are invited by the prophetic word where the Psalmist says: “O fear the Lord, all you His Saints: for they that fear Him lack nothing.” For where a man fears the Lord with this fear it is certain that nothing is lacking to his perfection. For it was clearly of that other penal fear that the Apostle John said that “He who fears is not made perfect in love, for fear has punishment.” 1 John 4:18 There is then a great difference between this fear, to which nothing is lacking, which is the treasure of wisdom and knowledge, and that imperfect fear which is called “the beginning of wisdom,” and which has in it punishment and so is expelled from the hearts of those who are perfect by the incoming of the fullness of love. For “there is no fear in love, but perfect love casts out fear.” 1 John 4:18 And in truth if the beginning of wisdom consists in fear, what will its perfection be except in the love of Christ which, as it contains in it the fear which belongs to perfect love, is called not the beginning but the treasure of wisdom and knowledge? And therefore there is a twofold stage of fear. The one for beginners, i.e., for those who are still subject to the yoke and to servile terror; of which we read: “And the servant shall fear his Lord;” and in the gospel: “I no longer call you servants, for the servant knows not what his Lord does;” and therefore “the servant,” He tells us, “abides not in the house for ever, but the Son abides for ever.” For He is instructing us to pass on from that penal fear to the fullest freedom of love, and the confidence of the friends and sons of God. Finally the blessed Apostle, who had by the power of the Lord's love already passed through the servile stage of fear, scorns lower things and declares that he has been enriched with good things by the Lord, “for God has not given us” he says “a spirit of fear but of power and of love and of a sound mind.” 2 Timothy 1:7 Those also who are inflamed with a perfect love of their heavenly Father, and whom the Divine adoption has already made sons instead of servants, he addresses in these words: “For you have not received the spirit of bondage again to fear, but you received the spirit of adoption, whereby we cry, Abba, Father.” Romans 8:15 It is of this fear too, that the prophet spoke when he would describe that sevenfold spirit, which according to the mystery of the Incarnation, full surely descended on the God man: “And there shall rest upon Him the Spirit of the Lord: the Spirit of wisdom and of understanding, the Spirit of counsel and of might, the Spirit of knowledge and of true godliness,” and in the last place he adds as something special these words: “And the Spirit of the fear of the Lord shall fill Him.” Isaiah 11:2-3 Where we must in the first place notice carefully that he does not say “and there shall rest upon Him the Spirit of fear,” as he said in the earlier cases, but he says “there shall fill Him the Spirit of the fear of the Lord.” For such is the greatness of its richness that when once it has seized on a man by its power, it takes possession not of a portion but of his whole mind. And not without good reason. For as it is closely joined to that love which “never fails,” it not only fills the man, but takes a lasting and inseparable and continual possession of him in whom it has begun, and is not lessened by any allurements of temporal joy or delights, as is sometimes the case with that fear which is cast out. This then is the fear belonging to perfection, with which we are told that the God-man, who came not only to redeem mankind, but also to give us a pattern of perfection and example of goodness, was filled. For the true Son of God “who did no sin neither was guile found in His mouth,” 1 Peter 2:22 could not feel that servile fear of punishment.

The Celestial Hierarchy

Chapter 3

What is Hierarchy and what the use of Hierarchy

Hierarchy is, in my judgment, a sacred order and science and energy—assimilated, as far as permissible, to the likeness of God, and conducted to the illuminations granted to itself from God, in due order, with a view to the Divine imitation. Now the Divine attractiveness, as being uncompounded, as good, as source of initiation, is altogether free from any dissimilarity. But it imparts its own proper light to each according to their fitness, and perfects in most Divine initiation in proportion to the unvarying likeness of those who are being initiated into harmony with itself. The scope, then, of Hierarchy is the assimilation and oneness with God, holding Him as the Leader of all religious science and energy, looking unflinchingly to His most Divine comeliness, and moulding itself as far as possible, and perfecting its own followers as Divine images, as mirrors luminous and without flaw, receptive of the primal light and the Divine ray, and devoutly filled with the radiance committed to itself, but, on the other hand, spreading this radiance ungrudgingly to those after it, in accordance with the Divinely-fixed regulations. For it is not permitted to the initiators in Divine things, nor to those who are being religiously initiated, to practise anything whatever beyond the sacred regulations of their own function. Nor even must they attempt otherwise, if they desire to attain its deifying splendour, and if they regard it in a religious light, and mould themselves after the example of each of the holy minds. He, then, who mentions Hierarchy describes a certain, altogether Holy Order, an image of the Divine Beauty, which performs the mysteries of its own illumination in due order and with religious science, derived from the Hierarch and which is assimilated to its own proper author as far as permissible.

For each of those who have been called into the Hierarchy find their perfection in being carried to the Divine initiation in their own proper degree; and, what is more Divine than all, as the oracles say, in becoming a fellow-worker with God, and in shewing the Divine energy dwelling in itself, manifested as far as possible to others. For it is an Hierarchical regulation that some are purified and that others purify; that some are enlightened and others enlighten; that some are perfected and others perfect. So that each one will accomplish the Divine imitation in his own several manner. The Divine Blessedness, then, to speak after the manner of men, is unstained by any dissimilarity, but is filled with invisible light—perfect, and needing no perfection; cleansing, illuminating and perfecting. Yea, rather it is a holy purification and illumination and perfection—above purification, above light, pre-eminently perfect, self-perfection, and cause of every Hierarchy, but elevated pre-eminently above every holy thing. It is necessary then—as I think that those who are being purified should be entirely perfected, so as to be without stain—that those who are being illuminated should be filled with the Divine Light, conducted to the habit and faculty of contemplation in all purity of mind; that those who are being initiated should be separated from the profane, and become recipients of that science which makes perfect the holy men who are initiated into the highest mysteries.

Further, that those who purify should impart from their own abundance of purity their own proper holiness; that those who illuminate, as being luminous intelligences, whose function it is to receive and to impart light, and who are joyfully filled with holy gladness, that these should impart, in proportion to their own overflowing light, to those who are worthy of enlightenment. But that those who make perfect, as being skilled in the impartation of perfection, should perfect those who are being initiated, through the holy instruction, in the science of holy men who have been initiated in the higher mysteries. Thus each rank of the Hierarchical Order is led in its own degree to the Divine cooperation by performing, through grace and God-given power, those mysteries which are essentially and super-essentially in the Godhead, and are accomplished by It supernaturally, and are manifested to us through our Hierarchy for its imitation of the God-loving minds to the highest permissible extent.

Concerning the Seraphin and Cherubin and Thrones, and concerning their Hierarchy, which is first.

We, whilst admitting this as the arrangement of the Hierarchies, affirm that every appellation of the celestial minds denotes the Godlike characteristic of each; and those who know Hebrew affirm that the holy designation of the Seraphin denotes that they are fiery or burning; but that of Cherubin, a fulness of knowledge and stream of wisdom. Naturally, then, the first of the heavenly Hierarchies is ministered by the most exalted Beings, holding, as it does, a rank which is higher than all, by the fact that it is established immediately around God, and that the first-wrought Divine manifestations and perfections pass earlier to it, as being nearest. They are called, then, Burning and Thrones, and Stream of Wisdom—by a name which explains their Godlike dispositions.

The appellation of Seraphin plainly teaches their ever moving around things Divine, and constancy, and warmth, and keenness, and the seething of that persistent, indomitable, and inflexible perpetual motion, and that vigorous transformation of the subordinate, by precept and example, as giving new life and rekindling them to the same heat; and purifying through fire and burnt offering, and the light-like and light-shedding characteristic which can never be concealed or consumed, and remains always the same, which destroys and dispels every kind of obscure darkness.

But the appellation of the Cherubin denotes their knowledge and their vision of God, and their readiness to receive the highest gift of light, and their power of contemplating the Divine comeliness in its first revealed power, and their being filled with the impartation which maketh wise, and their ungrudging communication to those next to them by pouring forth the wisdom given to themselves.

The appellation of the most exalted and pre-eminent Thrones denotes their manifest exaltation above every grovelling inferiority, and their celestial tendency towards higher things; and their unswerving separation from all remoteness; and their invariable and firmly-fixed settlement around the veritable Highest, with the whole force of their powers; and their capacity for receiving the approaches of the Godhead, through the absence of all passion and earthly tendency, and their bearing God; and the ardent expansion of themselves for the Divine receptions.

This, then, is the explanation of their names, so far as we can give it; but we ought to say what we think their Hierarchy is.

For I suppose we have sufficiently shown above that the purpose of every Hierarchy is an unswerving devotion to the imitation of the Divine Likeness, and that every Hierarchical function is set apart for the sacred reception and distribution of an undefiled purification, and Divine Light and perfecting science.

But now I pray that I may speak worthily of the most exalted minds—how their Hierarchy is exhibited through the oracles.

One must consider, then, that the Hierarchy belongs properly, and is in every respect like, to the first Beings, who are established after the Godhead, who gave them Being, and who are marshalled, as it were, in its very vestibule, who surpass every unseen and seen created power. Now, so far as they are pure, we must regard them, not as though they have been freed from unholy stains and blemishes, nor as though they were unreceptive of earthly fancies, but as far exalted above all stain of inferiority and every transient holiness in accordance with the highest degree of purity— established above the most Godlike powers, and clinging unflinchingly to their own self-moved and same-moved order in their invariable love of God, conscious in no respect whatever of any declivity to a worse condition, but having the invariable fixity of their own godlike identity— never liable to fall, and always unmoved.

Again, so far as they are contemplative, we must not regard them as contemplating sensible signs intellectually, nor as being led to the Divine by the varied texture of holy representations written for our meditation, but as being filled with all kinds of unearthly knowledge of higher light, and satiated, as permissible, with the beautifying and princely beauty superessential and thrice manifested. Thus, deemed worthy of Communion with Jesus, they do not stamp the deifying similitude in the bodily forms of divinely-pictured images, but as being in very truth near to Him in first enjoyment of the knowledge of His deifying illuminations.

Further, because the imitation of God is given to them in the highest possible degree, they participate, so far as possible, in His God-wrought and philanthropic virtues, in the power of a first manifestation. But, so far as they are perfected, we must not think of them as being illuminated with a sacred subtlety according to analytic science, but as being filled with a first and pre-eminent deification, as following from the most exalted science of the Divine operations which Angels can possibly possess. For, not through other holy Beings, but from the very Godhead, are they directed in spiritual things, by their elevation to Itself immediately, by their power, and order, and rank surpassing all.

They are both planted near the All-Holy without any shadow of turning, and are conducted for contemplation to the unearthly, immaterial, and spiritual comeliness as far as possible, and to the reasons which make known the Divine operations, and as being first around God they are instructed from the source of mystery itself, and supremely directed in Divine mysteries. This, then, the theologians distinctly shew that the subordinate Orders of the heavenly Beings are taught by the superior, in due order, the deifying sciences, and that those who are higher than all are illuminated from the Godhead itself, as far as permissible, in revelations of the Divine mysteries. For they introduce some of them as being religiously instructed by those of a higher rank, that He, Who was raised to Heaven as befits man, is the Lord of the heavenly Powers and King of Glory. Others, as putting the question to Jesus Himself, and as desiring to learn exactly the nature of His Divine work on our behalf, and Jesus, as instructing them directly, and shewing to them at first hand the work of His goodness out of love to man. "For I, He says, am pondering over righteousness and judgment of Salvation." Now I am astonished that even the first of the Beings in Heaven, and so far above all others, should reverently strive after the Divine illuminations, as though they were intermediate Beings. For they do not ask directly, "Wherefore are Thy garments red?" but they first raise the difficulty among themselves, thus shewing that they desire to learn, and crave the deifying knowledge, but not impeding the Divine illumination given to them after a Divine procedure. The first Hierarchy, then, of the heavenly minds is purified, and enlightened, and perfected by being religiously directed by the Author of initiation Himself, by its elevation to Himself immediately, and by being filled, according to its degree, with the most holy purification of the unapproachable Light of the most perfect source of initiation, and being unstained by any inferiority and full of primal Light, and perfected by its participation in first-given knowledge and science. But to sum up, I may say this, not inappropriately, that the reception of Divine Science is both purification, and enlightenment, and perfecting—purifying, as it were, from ignorance, by the knowledge of the more perfect revelations imparted to it according to its fitness, but enlightening by the self-same Divine knowledge, through which it also purifies that order which did not before contemplate the things which are now made manifest through the higher illumination; and perfecting further, by the self-same Light the abiding science of the mysteries made clearly manifest.

This, then, according to my most accurate knowledge, is the first rank of the heavenly Beings which encircle and stand immediately around God, and without symbol, and without interruption, dances around His eternal knowledge in the most exalted and ever-moving stability; viewing with pure eyes many and blessed contemplations, but illuminated with unique and immediate splendours; filled with a Divine nourishment—numerous indeed in its first-given profusion, but one in the unvariegated and unifying oneness of the Divine Food.

It is thus deemed worthy of much participation and co-operation with God, by the assimilation to Him, as far as possible, in excellent habits and energies. They thus know many Divine things pre-eminently, and participate in Divine science and knowledge to the utmost. Wherefore the Word of God has transmitted their hymns to those on earth, in which are Divinely shewn the excellency of its most exalted illumination. For some of them, to speak after the manner of men, proclaim as the "voice of many waters," "Blessed is the glory of the Lord, from His place." But others cry aloud that frequent and most august word of God, "Holy, Holy, Holy, Lord of Sabaoth," "The whole earth is full of His glory." These most excellent hymnologies of the super-celestial minds, we have already unfolded to the best of our ability in the Treatise concerning the Divine hymns, and have spoken sufficiently concerning them in that Treatise, from which, by way of remembrance, it is enough to produce so much as is necessary to our present purpose, namely, "That the first Order, having been instructed in theological science from the Divine Goodness itself, as a Hierarchy reflecting that Goodness, transmitted it to the Order next after itself." To speak briefly, it teaches this—"That the august Godhead—itsself both above praise and all praiseworthy—is rightly eulogised by the minds who receive God, so far as He is permitted to be known and sung For they, according to the oracles, as images of God, are the Divine places of the Divine repose. Yea further, they affirm that He is alone, and One of three-fold subsistence, sending forth His most kindly forethought to all created things, from the supercelestial minds to the lowest of the earth; as Prince above principality and cause of all creation, and grasping all things supernaturally in His resistless embrace.

Concerning Lordships and Powers and Authorities, and concerning their middle Hierarchy.

Let us now pass to the middle order of the heavenly minds, gazing as far as we may, with celestial vision, upon those Lordships and the truly terrible visions of the Divine Authorities and Powers. For each appellation of the minds above us denotes those characteristics by which they Divinely imitate the Divine Likeness. I think, then, that the explanatory name of the Holy Lordships denotes a certain unslavish tendency to higher things, free from all grovelling subserviency, which does not submit in any way whatever to one single imperious force dissimilar to itself, as befits the freedom of unbending Lordship; superior to every kind of cringing slavery, indomitable to every lower tendency, and elevated above every dissimilarity, ever seeking the true Lordship, and source of Lordship; and moulding as an image of goodness, itself and those after it, to His Lordly Likeness, turning itself wholly to none of the things that vainly seem, but to the Lordly

Being, and ever sharing in the Lordly Likeness of God. The appellation of the Holy Powers denotes the possession to the highest possible extent of a certain masculine and unflinching manliness towards all those Godlike energies within themselves — not feebly weak, for the reception of any of the Divine illuminations vouchsafed to it— vigorously conducting itself to the Divine imitation; not forsaking the Godlike movement through its own cowardice, but unflinchingly looking to the superessential and powerful making Power; and becoming an image of this, as far as is permissible, in the likeness of His power, and powerfully turning itself to this as Source of Power, but issuing forth to those next in degree, in its gift of Power and in its likeness to God. But the appellation of the Holy Authorities denotes their being of the same rank as the Divine Lordships and Powers, their beautiful and unconfused good order with regard to the Divine receptions, and the marshalling of the celestial and spiritual Authority, not using their authoritative powers imperiously for base purposes, but conducting themselves in the highest possible degree towards Divine things in due order, and conducting those after them benignly; and being assimilated, as far as permissible to the Authority giving Source of Authority, and making this visible, as is possible to Angels, in the well-ordered regulations of the Authority giving power. The middle order of the heavenly minds, having these Godlike characteristics, is purified and illuminated in the manner described, through the Divine illuminations vouchsafed to it at second hand, which pass through the first Hierarchical Order, and through this middle as a secondary manifestation. Without dwelling upon that message, which is said to pass through one angel to another, let us take it as a symbol of a message delivered from afar, and obscured in its passage so as to become a secondary revelation. For, as men skilled in our initiation say, the knowledge of Divine things, manifested directly to ourselves, is more perfect than the Divine contemplations imparted through others. Thus, I think, with regard to the angelic ranks, the immediate participation in knowledge of those elevated to the nearest proximity to God, is more clear than that of those who are initiated through the instrumentality of others. Wherefore, by our sacerdotal tradition, the first minds are named, perfecting, illuminating, and purifying Powers, of the subordinate on the ground that these are conducted through them to the superessential Origin of all things; and are placed in possession, as far as is permissible to them, of the consecrating purifications, and illuminations, and perfections. For this is absolutely fixed by the Divinely-established law of consecration, that through the first, the second should partake of the Divine illuminations.

This you will find declared by the theologians in many ways. For when the Divine and Paternal Love towards man had chastened in a remarkable manner, His people Israel, with a view to their spiritual salvation, and had delivered them to terrible and savage nations for correction, by every kind of providential training to better things, He both liberated them from their misery, and led them back, through His compassion, to their former state of comfort. Then, one of the theologians, Zechariah, saw in a vision one of the first Angels, as I think, around God (for the name of Angels is common, as I said, to them all), who learned from God Himself the comforting words, as we say, concerning this matter. But he saw another Angel, of inferior rank, advancing to meet the first Angel, for the purpose of receiving and explaining an illumination. Then, from him, instructed as from a Hierarch, and charged to reveal to the theologian, that Jerusalem should be abundantly occupied by a multitude of people. But another theologian, Ezekiel, says that this was righteously ordained by the glorious Godhead itself, exalted above the Cherubin. For the Paternal Love towards man, whilst conducting Israel through an education to better things, by a righteousness worthy of God, decided to separate the guilty from the guiltless. This is revealed to one first after the Cherubin — He who was bound about the loins with a sapphire, and wore displayed the hierarchical robe coming down to the feet as a symbol of Hierarchical Office. But the other Angels, who bore the battle-axe, the Divine Government compels to be instructed from the former, as to the Divine judgment in this matter. For, to one, He said that he should go through the midst of Jerusalem, and place the sign upon the forehead of the just men. But to the others, "Go into the city after him and strike, and spare not your eyes, but to every one upon whom is the sign draw not near."

What would any one say concerning the Angel who said to Daniel, "The word has gone forth?" or concerning him of the first Order, who took the fire from the midst of the Cherubin; or what is more remarkable than this, foreshowing the good order that reigns amongst the Angels, the Cherubin casts the fire into the hands of him wearing the sacred stole; or concerning him who called the most Divine Gabriel, and said to him, "Make this man understand the vision," or whatever else is recorded by the holy theologians concerning the Godlike Order of the celestial Hierarchies, to which the good order of our Hierarchy, after being assimilated to the greatest possible extent, will bear the likeness of the angelic comeliness, as it were, in reflection, taking its whole form from this, and conducted to the superessential source of order in every Hierarchy.

Concerning the Principalities, Archangels and Angels, and concerning their Hierarchy which is last.

There remains for our religious contemplation an Order which completes the Angelic Hierarchies, which is composed of the Godlike Principalities, Archangels, and Angels. I think it necessary, first to declare the meaning of their sacred appellations. For the appellation of the heavenly Principalities denotes their ruling and guiding after the Divine example with religious order most befitting the Princely Powers, and their being wholly turned to the Principality above Principality, and their directing others in a princely fashion, and their being moulded to the distinguished Principality itself, the Maker of Princedom, and that they make manifest their superessential Source of order by the regularity of their princely powers.

The Order of the Holy Archangels is of the same rank with the heavenly. Principalities. For there is one Hierarchy and rank, as I said, of themselves and the Angels. But since there is not a Hierarchy which does not possess first and middle and last powers, the holy order of Archangels occupies the middle position in the Hierarchy between the extremes. For it belongs alike to the most holy Principalities and to the holy Angels. To the Principalities because it is turned in a princely fashion to the super-essential Prince, and is moulded to it as far as possible, and unites the Angels after the fashion of its own well-regulated and marshalled and invisible Leadership. But it belongs to the Angels because it is of the prophetic Order, receiving in a sacerdotal fashion the Divine illumination from the first powers, and conveys the same to the Angels after the example of God, and through Angels manifests them to us in proportion to the sacred aptitude of each one of the godly persons illuminated. For the Angels, as we have already previously said, complete the whole series of celestial minds as being the last Order of the heavenly Beings, who possess the Angelic characteristic. Yea, rather, they are more properly named Angels by us than those of higher degree. Especially because their Order is occupied in making known, and is more particularly concerned with the things of the world.

For the very highest Order, as being placed in the first rank near the Hidden One, we must consider as directing in spiritual things in a more hidden fashion than the Order next to itself. But the second Order, which is composed of the holy Lordships and Powers and Authorities, directs the Hierarchy of the Principalities and Archangels and Angels more clearly indeed than the first Hierarchy, but more hiddenly than the Order after it. We must bear in mind that the more revealing Order of the Principalities, Archangels, and Angels presides through each other over the Hierarchies amongst men, in order that the instruction, and conversion, and communion, and union with God may be in due order, and, in short, that the procession from God vouchsafed in a manner becoming His goodness to all the Hierarchies, and passing to all in common, may be in a most sacred regularity. Hence, the Word of God has assigned our Hierarchy to Angels, naming the distinguished Michael as Ruler of the Jewish people, and others over other nations. For the Most High established borders of nations according to number of Angels of God. But if anyone should say, "How then were the people of the Hebrews alone conducted to the Divine illuminations?" we must answer that we ought not to throw the blame of the other nations wandering after those which are no gods, upon the faithful superintendence of the Angels. But they themselves, by their own declension, fell away from the faithful conduct towards the Divine, through self-conceit and self-will, and through their irrational reverence for things which appeared to themselves worthy of God.

Even the Hebrew people are testified to have suffered the same thing; for He says, "Thou hast cast away knowledge of God, and hast gone after thine own heart." For neither have we a life governed by necessity, nor, on account of the free will of those who are objects of providential care, are the Divine rays of the providential illumination blunted. But the inaptitude of the mental visions makes the overflowing gift of Light, which comes from paternal goodness, either altogether unparticipated or impenetrable to their resistance, or makes the participations of the one fontal ray, diverse, small or great, obscure or brilliant, although that ray is one and simplex, and always the same, and ever overflowing. For even over the other nations, from whom even we have emerged to that boundless and bounteous sea of Divine Light, which is expanded for the ready reception of all, there were not placed certain alien gods. But there is one Prince of all, and to Him the Angels who religiously direct each nation conduct those who follow them. Let us consider Melchizedek<sup>4</sup> as being a Hierarch, most dear to God; not of gods which are not, but of Him Who is truly most high God. For the godly wise not only speak of him as being dear to God, but also as Priest in order that they may clearly shew to the wise that not only was he himself turned to the true God, but further, that he became as Hierarch, a guide to others, in that wisdom which leads to the true and only Godhead.

Let me also recall this to your Hierarchical judgment—that both to Pharaoh,<sup>5</sup> from the Angel who presided over the Egyptians, and to the Babylonian Prince, from his own Angel, the watchful and ruling care of the Providence and Lordship over all was made known in visions. And leaders who were worshippers of the true God were appointed over those nations. For the interpretation of things shaped by angelic visions was made known from God through Angels to holy men akin to the Angels—Daniel and Joseph. For there is one Prince and Providence over all.

And never must we think that the Godhead guides Jews by lot, but that Angels, independently, or as of equal rank, or as in opposition, or that certain other gods preside over the other nations. But that particular phrase of the Divine Word, must be accepted according to its very religious intention; not as though God had divided government amongst men with other gods or Angels, and had been elected by lot to the government and leadership of Israel, but in this sense—that, whereas there is one and the same forethought of the Supreme over all, which has assigned all men for their salvation to the elevating guidance of their own Angels, yet Israel, almost alone in comparison with the rest, turned itself to the Light-gift, and recognition of the true Lord. Hence the Word of God, in order to shew that Israel himself elected for the worship of the true God, says this, "He became<sup>1</sup> the Lord's portion." But as shewing that he was distributed equally with the other nations, to one of the holy Angels, for the recognition through him of the one Prince over all, he said, "That Michael<sup>2</sup> was the Leader of the Jewish people." From this it is evident that there is one Providence for the whole, pre-eminently established above all powers, unseen and seen, and that all the Angels who preside over each nation elevate as far as possible those who follow them with a willing mind, to Itself as their proper Head.

A Repetition and Summary concerning the Angelic Order.

We have concluded, then, that the most exalted order of the minds around God, whilst being sanctified by the perfecting illumination, is purified, and illuminated, and perfected by a gift of light, at once more hidden and more manifest—more hidden, indeed, as being more intellectual, and more simplifying, and more unifying—more manifest, as being a first gift and a first manifestation, and more complete, and more shed forth to it as being more transparent. But from this order again, in due degree, the second, and from the second, the third, and from the third our Hierarchy is religiously conducted to the Beginning above beginning, and End of all good order, according to the self-same law of well-ordered regularity, in Divine harmony and proportion. But all Angels are interpreters of those above them.

The very highest, indeed, of God, Who moves them, but the rest in due order of those who have been moved by God. For, to such an extent has the super-essential harmony of all things provided for the religious order, and the regulated conduct of each of the rational and intellectual beings, that each rank of the Hierarchies has been placed in sacred order, and we observe every Hierarchy distributed into first and middle and last Powers.

But to speak accurately, He divided each order itself, by the same Divine harmonies, on which account the theologians say that the most Divine Seraphin cry one to another, indicating distinctly, as I think, by this, that the first impart their theological knowledge to the second. I might add this not inappropriately, that each celestial and human mind has within itself its own special first and middle and last rank and power, corresponding to the foresaid peculiar instructions of the several Hierarchical illuminations made known in due order, in accordance with which each one participates, so far as is lawful and permissible to himself, in the most spotless purification, the most copious light, the pre-eminent perfection. For there is nothing that is self-perfect, or absolutely without need of perfecting, except the self-perfect and pre-eminently perfect One.

Elect Are Those Who Go Into Eternal Rest On Account Of Confession, Penitence, Largesse In Almsgiving; What Do Just Do In Order That They May Not Enter In Judgment? Just As Servant Who Performed Well For His Master Will Receive Liberty, So Too Will Just In Kingdom Of Heaven

Vision of Ezra (Christian Apocalypse)

Date: 4th - 7th century A.D.

Ezra prayed to the Lord, saying “Grant me courage, O Lord, that I might not fear when I see all the judgments of the sinners.” And there were granted to him seven angels of hell who carried him beyond the seventieth grade in the infernal regions. And I saw fiery gates, , and seventy-two foot-soldiers outside the gates and I was entering through this flame and at these gates he saw two lions lying there from whose mouth and nostrils and eyes proceeded the most powerful flames. The most powerful men were entering and passing through the fire, and it did not touch them. And Ezra said, “Who are they, who advance so safely?” The angels said to him, “They are the just whose repute has ascended to heaven, who gave alms generously, clothed the naked, and desired a good desire.”

And others were entering that they might pass through the gates, and dogs were ripping them apart and fire was consuming them. And Ezra said, “Who are they?” The angels said, “They denied the Lord, and sinned with women on the Lord’s Day.” And Ezra said, “Lord, have mercy on the sinners!”

And they led him lower beyond the fiftieth grade, and he saw in that place men standing in torments. Some were throwing fire in their faces, others, however, were whipping them with fiery scourges. And the earth cried aloud, saying, “Whip them and refuse to have mercy on them, because they worked impiety upon me.” And Ezra said, “Who are they, tho are in such torments daily?” The angels said, “They swelled with married women; the married women are those who adorned themselves not for their husbands, but that they might please others, desiring an evil desire.” Ezra said. “Lord, have mercy on the sinners!”

And again they brought him to the south, and he saw a fire, and poor ones and also women hanging, and angels were whipping them with fiery clubs. And Ezra said, “Lord have mercy on the sinners! Who are they?” And the angels said, “They dwelled with their mothers, desiring an evil desire.” And Ezra said, “Lord, have mercy on the sinners!”

And they led (him) downward in the infernal regions, and he saw a caldron in which were sulfur and bitumen, and it was roiling just like the waves of the sea. And the just were entering, and in the midst of it they were walking over the fiery waves, praising greatly the name of the Lord, just like those who walk over dew of cold water. And Ezra said, “Who are they?” The angels said, “They are the ones who daily were making better confession before God and the holy priests, freely bringing alms (and) resisting sins.” And the sinners came, wishing to pass over, and the angels of hell came and submerged them in the fiery stream. And from the fire they cried out, saying, “Lord, have pity on us!” But he did not have pity. A voice was heard, but a body was not seen because of the fire and the anguish. And Ezra said, “Who are they?” The angels said, “They were brought down by lust all their days, they did not receive strangers, they did not give alms; they took unjustly the things of others for them selves; they had an evil desire; therefore, they are in anguish.” And Ezra said, “Lord, have mercy on the sinners!”

And he walked as before and he saw in an obscure place and immortal worm, its magnitude he was not able to reckon. And in front of its mouth stood many sinners, and when it drew a breath, like flies they entered into its mouth; then when it exhaled, they all exited a different color. And Ezra said, “Who are they?” And they said. “They were full of every bad thing and they went about without confession or penitence.”

And he saw a person witting on a fiery throne, and his counselors stood around him in the fire, and they served him from the fire and out of every side. And Ezra said, “Who is that?” And the angels said, “That man, whose name is Herod, was king for a long time, who, in Bethlehem of Judea, slew the infant males on account of the Lord.” And Ezra said, “Lord judge a right judgment!”

And he walked and saw men who were bound and the angels of hell were pricking their eyes with thorns. And Ezra said, “Who are they?” The angels said, “They showed strange paths to those wandering.” Ezra said, “Lord, have mercy on the sinners!” And he saw virgins with five-hundred-pound neck irons on, as if near death, coming to the west. And Ezra said, “Who are they?” And the angels said, “They violated their virginity before marriage.” And there was a multitude of old men, lying prostrate, and over them molten iron and lead being poured. And he said, “Who are they?” And the angels said, “They are the doctors of the Law who confuses baptism and the law of the Lord, because they were teaching with words, but they did not spur on to work; and in this they are judged.?” And Ezra said, “Lord have mercy on the sinners!”

And he saw visions of a furnace, against the setting sun, burning with great fire, into which were sent many kings and princes of this world; and many thousands of poor people were accusing them and saying, “They, through their power. Wounded us and dragged free men into servitude.” And he saw another furnace, burning with pitch and sulfur, into which sons were cast who acted wretchedly at the hands of their parents and caused injury by means of their mouth. And he saw in a most obscure place another furnace burning, into which many women were cast. And he said, “Who are they?” And the angels said, “They had sons in adultery and killed them” And those little ones themselves accused them, saying, “Lord, the souls which you gave to us these (women) took away.” And he said, “Who are they?” And the angels said, “They killed their sons.” And Ezra said, “Lord, have mercy on the sinners!”

Then Michael and Gabriel came and said to him, “Come into heaven!” And Ezra said, “As my Lord lives, I may not come until; I see every judgment of sinners.” And they led him downward in to the infernal regions beyond the fourteenth level. And he saw lions and little dogs lying around fiery flames. And the just came through them and they crossed over into Paradise. And he saw many thousands of the just and their habitations were the most splendid of any time.

And after he saw this, he was lifted up into heaven, and he came to a multitude of angels, and they said to him, “Pray to the Lord for the sinners,” And they put him down within the sight of the Lord. And he said, “Lord, have mercy on the sinners!” And the Lord said, “Ezra, let them receive according to their works.” And Ezra said, “Lord, you have shown more clemency to the animals. Which eat the grass and have not returned you praise, than to us; they die and have no sin; however, you torture us, living and dead.” And the Lord said, “In my image I have formed man and I have commanded that they not sin and they sinned; therefore they are in torments. And the elect are those who go into eternal rest on account of confession, penitence, and largesse in almsgiving.” And Ezra said, “Lord, what do the just do in order that they may not enter into judgment?” And the Lord said to him “(just as) the servant who performed well for his master will receive liberty, so too (will) the just in the kingdom of heaven.” Amen..

And after he saw this, he was lifted up into heaven, and he came to a multitude of angels, and they said to him, 'pray to the Lord for the sinners.' And they put him down within the sight of the Lord. And he said, 'Lord, have mercy on the sinners!' And the Lord said, 'Ezra, let them receive according to their works.' And

Ezra said, 'Lord, you have shown more clemency to the animals, which eat the grass and have not returned you praise, than to us; they die and have no sin; however, you torture us, living and dead.' And the Lord said, 'In my image I have formed man and I have commanded that they may not sin and they sinned; therefore they are in torment. And the elect are those who go into eternal rest on account of confession, penitence, and largesse in almsgiving.' And Ezra said, 'Lord, what do the just do in order that they may not enter in judgment?' And the Lord said to him, '(Just as) the servant who performed well for his master will receive liberty, so too (will) the just in the kingdom of heaven.' Amen. ((J.R. Mueller and G.A. Homily on the Great Sunday of the Resurrection

Supplication For The Grace To Speak Of The Lord's Victory

On the great day of yours, in which the whole creation rejoices, allow me to speak abundantly about your resurrection.
On the feast that gladdened both the angels and the disciples make me also joyful by your gift to sing about you.
O Valiant One who ascended brilliant from within the tomb;
Let me speak about you, concerning your victory filled with wonder.
On your great feast heaven is glad and earth exults because in you heaven and earth, that were at enmity, were reconciled.

The Sunday Of Resurrection: The Day Of Light, Life And Renewal

This is the day in which the generations that were worn out were renewed and in the resurrection they came into existence after they had fallen.
It is the first day in which the creation took beginning and behold, again from it life began to be transmitted.
On this day<sup>3</sup> the world began to be established and now behold, on it again it began to be renewed.
On this day the Lion's whelp crouched over death and torn it into pieces in its den and brought out the prey gathered by it.
On this day Light has shone forth amidst darkness and the resurrection stood holding the beginning of the new world.
Today Life began to tread under foot the region of death and set up mile-stones on the fearful road so that it should not fail again.
This is the feast in which the walls of Sheol were uprooted;
because the slaughtered King entered into it [Sheol] and subjugated it and forced a passage through them
[the walls of Sheol].
Today is the first (of days) in which the First-Born rose up from among the dead so that the race of His mother might be raised up into the land of His Father.

 On this day the crucifiers who guarded the tomb were ashamed, because the Mighty-One rose up and the bars of Sheol<sup>5</sup> did not withstand in His presence.
 This is the day that carries all good tidings so that it should console the sorrowful disciples who were mourning.
 On this feast the disciples left behind their hiding places.
 Then the perturbed (disciples) seized by exultation made haste to the tomb, the bridal chamber.
 Today the lambs which were scattered have gathered together, because the Shepherd has risen up and the wolves fled and the herdsmen gathered themselves.
 On this day (there was) mourning for the band of Caiaphas, and exultation for the company of Simon, which had been sorrowful.
 On this day the heart of the women disciples became joyful because they saw as a Gardener the One who makes everything grow (risen) from the sepulchre
 Today the banner of life has been set up in the place of death and the clamour of watchers and the apostles was heard on it.
 Today the ranks trampled Sheol, which was broken through and its walls fell, and the way for the groups came into being.
 On this day let us ask death, where is your sting?
 Or, where is the victory of Sheol which has been conquered?
 On this feast the head of the apostolic group is exalted because they [the Apostles] saw the slaughtered Teacher raised up as He promised.
 Today the Scribes armed themselves with calumny because the Valiant One rose up and they falsely accused Him (saying), "He is stolen away."
 On this day the company of Annas put on mourning, and consolation entered the beloved company of John.
 On this day let teaching stand up with confidence, because He is the head and fulfilment of preaching.

The New Creation And Life In The Resurrection

The resurrection of the Son is a new creation<sup>8</sup> to the whole world, and the world is new on account of it [the resurrection] and hence it the world] is beyond sufferings.
 From His resurrection life reigned over mortals, and we have truly stripped off the old order by His death.
 The Mighty One rose up and He made us, those who were thrown down, rise up with Him.
 He descended alone, but with many He ascended from the tomb.
 The day before yesterday Scribes were mocking at Him [saying], "Save Yourself," and today the watchers are kissing His tomb which He has left and gone out.
 Yesterday the Dead One was lying concealed and silent in the habitation of Sheol but today He is alive and gives life to the dead and raises all to life.
 The day before yesterday, lance, gall and vinegar and crucifixion, but today glory and clamour of the watchers with praise.
 The day before yesterday the Only-Begotten placed His soul in the hands of His Father but today He assumed it [the soul] for He has authority as He commands all.
 Yesterday He had mounted the wood of crucifixion, but today there is strength, resurrection of the dead and power.
 The day before yesterday Simon repeatedly renounced (saying) that he does not know Him but today he runs to see His tomb because He was raised up.
 The Friday of the sufferings prepared ambushes for the apostolic group;
 but on Sunday, a new vision and cheerfulness.
 Yesterday the King was held in sleep in Sheol, but today He woke up and stood like a man who has shaken off his wine.
 The other day there were sufferings and sorrow for the women disciples but today exultation because they were seeing Him as the Gardener.

On the sorrowful Sabbath that Free-Born was among the dead, but on Sunday He was escorted about by the companies of watchers.
Friday scattered the apostolic group in desolation, but today has given joy to, and gathered together the company of the disciples.
Yesterday the apostles were lying in concealment, but today they went out to see the resurrection with wonder.
The other day (they had) to flee, to be scattered, and to hide themselves, but today to run, to be gathered together and to bring the tidings.

The False Accusers And The Rejectors Of The Truth

The guards who guarded the tomb of the Lion's Whelp were ashamed, because He had roared in the region of the dead and its foundations trembled.
The priests are despicable in as much as they accused falsely the truth about the story of the Son, and neither did they believe in Him that He is the Son of God when He rose up.
If they were diligent to seek out the truth, once He had risen, how did they accuse Him iniquitously?
Why did they give money to the guards to say that He was stolen away, and that (fact) which happened, they did hide, lest it should be spoken of?
The guards shouted, "His disciples came and stole Him."
but (the fact that) the angels came down, why was this (matter) suppressed like the other?
And if they did not believe the apostles who were true, about the angels who visited His tomb, why were they doubtful?
Why was a bribe offered to the guards, and they were ordered not to reveal what had happened?
They are deceitful and calumny is found in them, and all of them stand against the truth in perversion.
They rejected the Son falsely along the whole course of His activity because they were against Him (both) before He suffered and after He was risen.
They were saying to Him, "Save yourself and we shall believe in you," but when they heard that He was alive, they played false and rejected, failing to believe (Him).
"If you are the Son of God, descend from the Cross," the fact that He rose up from the tomb is greater (than the other), but still they hate Him.
They bound the Son and carried Him and placed Him in the house of the departed;
but the Mighty One rose up and broke the gates of Sheol.
They had rolled in a big stone in front of Him out of their hatred, but a watcher stood there, rolled it away and overturned it and reproved them.

Sons Of Light, The True Witnesses Of The Resurrection

From the reading let us learn the story of the Son of God; and let us despise the infidels who crucified Him, seeing how much they accused Him falsely.
There are true witnesses for His resurrection and it is proper for them to speak about His resurrection with great wonder.
Let the radiant sons of light come with their discourses.
Let the apostles of truth speak of His story as they perceived it.
Let the voices of the sons of thunder come abundantly and impart the story of the Son to the earth with their trumpets.
As they have seen let them narrate to us how He rose up, because it is fair for them to tell the truth for they are aware of it.
From John let the Church hear about the resurrection of the Chief Shepherd who gathered His sheep that were scattered.
Today let that disciple swift in running speak;

because he beheld His resurrection, let him narrate it just as he saw it.
From a reading of him we shall grasp the order of the truths, and how they came to pass, let him tell of them, in their various manners.

Mary Magdalene's Visit To The Tomb Of The Lord

On the Sunday, while still dark, Mary went out, and saw the tomb, with the stone removed and its door opened.
And she hurried and came to John and Simon and with sadness announced what she had seen.
"They have carried away my Lord and I do not know where they have placed Him;
He is not in the tomb, and who has stolen Him, I am not aware of."
The Mighty One rose from the tomb with great power; and Mary thought that people had stolen Him as though He were weak.
O blessed woman, who is able to steal away Light or conceal the great Ocean and not be uncovered?
Who was concealing the Sun in his lap and people do not see Him, or confines all the brilliance in the palm of his hands secretly?
Who was able to carry the Flame in his bosom, and change it to a place in concealment and is not unmasked?
Nobody has stolen the Mighty One of the ages, do not be afraid.
He broke His bonds and conquered death and rose up from the tomb.
"They have carried away my Lord and I do not know where they have placed Him."
The disciples heard and hurried to see where they have taken (Him).

Simon And John, Holiness And Virginity, Running To The Tomb

Simon went out on the road of the tomb with John, and the beloved young (disciple) overtook the old one full of splendour.
The disciples ran to seek the Great One among the dead, but they were not aware of the fact that He had risen valiantly.
Swift turbulence took hold of them on account of their trembling, for they reckoned the Mighty One to be stolen away as they had been told.
John ran overtaking Simon and reached the tomb:
the young virgin (surpassing) that holy head of the disciples.
Holiness and virginity have taken up running, but the swift wings of virginity were first.
The undefiled flew swiftly and overtook but he [the undefiled]<sup>4</sup> did not enter until the one full of sanctity came.
John arrived at the door of the tomb of the Bridegroom, the King, but he did not enter until the perfect Simon came.
He was looking for the one who was carrying the keys of the treasury to come, so that he should first open and enter as the steward. John stood like a wise man but did not enter, so that the due order of proclamation might not be confused.
He waited for the head of the disciples to come, who had been left behind by him, so that he, the first, should see and give witness to his resurrection.
Simon Peter [Kepha], head of the foundations, came and entered before him, so that he should be placed as the first upon the building of the apostolic tradition.
The young one in spirit had kept the order for the honourable elder so that he should become the first, as the foundation for the proclamation.
Then Simon came and reached the tomb and entered first and then entered John too following Simon.

The Exchange Of 'The Garments Of The Dead' For 'The Garments Of Glory'

The glorious friends of the bridegroom entered where the Bridegroom slept.
They saw the couch of His sleep, which was vacant because He had left it behind and gone out.

The Lord of the marriage feast had been raised valiantly, and when they sought Him they did not see I-Him on His couch.

They saw the linen clothes placed in the tomb, because they were not needed to be worn after the Resurrection.

He was clothed with the glory of the Resurrection from within the tomb and He left behind Him the garments of the dead as well as their trappings.

In the new world, no one arises with his clothes;

He has something else to put on, for which he is worthy.

There are garments of glory for the Resurrection, which are kept for it and from them is provided to the one who attains to it to put on.

The garments of the earth remain on the earth, on the dust, and the body clothes itself in glory and rises up from perdition.

Great is the glory of the garments of the children of Resurrection; they are clothed neither in linen nor in wool after the Resurrection.

Our Lord left behind His clothes in the tomb when He came out in order to demonstrate the totality of His resurrection in the due order to those who are worthy of it.

The Linen Clothes, A Sign To The Disciples And An Object Of Fright For Death

The disciples entered and saw the linen clothes as they had been placed, which He had left when He went out alive from the tomb.

The Sleeping One woke up and rose up from the sleep in which He had been encompassed, and He shed off from himself the garments of the dead in the abode of Sheol.

He rose up gently, laid aside the linen clothes in which He was wrapped, and He clothed himself with the garments of glory from the house of His Father and went out.

They saw the linen clothes and the headband that was on His head, which was rolled and placed, not with the linen clothes but apart.

As from sleep the Valiant One shook himself without dismay and quietly He had loosened His face which was girded round.

He removed the sorrowful veil of the dead with which He was wrapped, and He rolled up the headband and set it aside where He had slept.

He folded up the headband and set it apart as He was going out, so that He might show that He was not terrified by destruction.

His sleep fled and He uncovered His face that was covered up and He placed His clothes in the region of the dead in which He was reclining.

He was not agitated when He was going out of the darkness, because His linen clothes too He folded up quietly and left them.

He constituted it as an object of fright for death in the garments that He left, so that on seeing them it [death] might tremble at the Resurrection."

The nail of life He fixed in Sheol and went out from it, so that its [Sheol's] gates" might be shaken everyday at its fall.

In the middle of the tomb He left His clothes and went out and departed; so that all who should come and see might believe that He had risen.

He left His garments so that they might be a sign for His disciples that He was raised up and had conquered death and risen up from the tomb.

The Victorious Resurrection Of The Mighty One

He left behind in the tomb the infirmity which entered with Him and clothed manly strength in the rising up as a result of the Resurrection.

The burden of sufferings He set aside from Him together with the linen clothes, and without corruption He rose up from the tomb in great power.

He stripped off the wounds and the stripes on His back with which He was clothed, and the borrowed garments which Joseph<sup>15</sup> gave Him when He entered.
He gave rest to the pains which He carried on Golgotha,
Because the wearied one had slept, and taken rest and was woken up with manly power.
He set aside from Him the great burden of the crucifixion, sufferings, and pains and the wounds and rose up as the Mighty One.
He took away from himself the mantle of the dead that had entered with Him and rolled it up and placed it so that it might remain there in the tomb.
He removed from His face the spittle and mocking together with the headband, and He cast off from himself sufferings and dishonour and rose up victorious.
The Father visited Him and gave Him (His) hand in the darkness.
Then He did not leave Him to see corruption in the abode of Sheol.
He slept from the sufferings, and left the weariness of crucifixion, and He had taken rest in the sleep and woke up suddenly with manly might in the Resurrection.
His face was uncovered which had been covered as if (He were) weak and like a mighty man He trampled death under foot there in its place.

The Believing Disciples As The Advocates Of The Truth

The disciples saw that the Slaughtered One was not there in the tomb and they believed that He had risen, and they became confirmed in the things revealed.
They saw the covering of borrowed garments placed aside by Him, and they had perceived that He had clothed himself in glory and manly power.
They saw the resurrection and they became confirmed on account of its effects; and they clothed themselves in power so that they might become mouth-pieces for His proclamation.
They saw that the region of death had been trodden under foot at the Resurrection of the dead.
Then they returned to become witnesses in the world about the Resurrection.
They saw that birthpangs had struck Sheol and it gave birth to Life and they accepted upon themselves to become advocates of the Truth to the new world.
They returned from the tomb with confidence to their companions while the proclamation about His victory was resounding within them.
The lambs spoke about the Shepherd together with their brethren (saying), "He has risen up with power"; let us have no fear of the robbers.
Consolation rose up among the disciples and it made them joyful, because they were confirmed in the Resurrection of the Slaughtered Master.
The story of Life imparted its voice into the apostolic group.
The tidings of death were put out by the Resurrection that was proclaimed.
The Resurrection of the Son set the peoples free from error.
Blessed is the Slaughtered One who gave us life through His crucifixion.
End of the homily on the Resurrection of our Lord.

521 AD

Jacob of Serug (451 AD-521 AD)

Homily "On That Chariot That Ezekiel The Prophet Saw"

2002 article by Alexander Golitzin, Marquette University

The Image And Glory Of God In Jacob Of Serug's Homily, "On That Chariot That Ezekiel The Prophet Saw"

Based on a paper given at the North American Patristics Society Conference, May 1998, at Loyola, Chicago, and under review for St Vladimir's Theological Quarterly

The Homily on the Chariot

The homily is very long, indeed, between thirteen and fourteen hundred lines and running to over sixty pages in Paulus Bedjan's edition of Jacob's homilies [22]. If length is any indication of the importance a writer accords his topic, then Jacob very clearly thought Ezekiel's vision rated quite special attention. I myself believe, although this would have to be the subject of another paper, that he is directing his words to certain among his listeners who were attracted by the idea of ascending to the heavenly throne, like Enoch in the old apocalypses, and, if one friend of mine who is more versed than I in matters Jacobean is correct in understanding his audience as primarily monks [23], then we are in fact in the presence of those ancient currents of ascetical mysticism which are of particular interest to me. As I just noted, however, Jacob sets his face against the notion of ascent, and his opposition to this tradition comprises what I would venture to call the secondary theme, or even the subtext, of his homily. The latter's first concern, though, is to link the chariot vision with the divine economy in Christ.

With these preliminary remarks in mind, let me proceed to a sketch of the homily and then to a few concluding remarks. The whole huge piece revolves around three fundamental texts: Ezekiel 1, especially verses 26-28; Genesis 1, again particularly verses 26-27; and, as noted above, Phillipians 2:6-7. The link between all three is the Syriac term, dmuta or "likeness". In Jacob's Syriac Bible, the Peshitta, this is the single word which is used to render at once its Hebrew equivalent, demut, found in both Gen. 1:26 and Ezk. 1:26 and 28, and the morphe, "form", of Phil. 2:6-7. Jacob is the only the patristic author I know of to dwell at such length on the linkage of these three texts, though he is obviously helped by the translation he used.

Divine Transcendence, the Imago Dei, and Macrocosm/Microcosm

The homily opens with what is for Jacob a typically apophatic note, stressing the mystery of God's transcendence, the "hidden One" Who is "seated on the unsearchable chariot" and is infinitely above the angels, the "assemblies of the sons of light" (543-4) [24]. Again typically, Jacob begs for the gift of "a new mouth" in order to offer fitting praise: "Lord most high, my mouth is insufficient for Your praise: make a new mouth for me that it may proclaim Your song" (544:18-19) [25] It is at this point that the first note of the imago dei appears, that is, that it is precisely the office of the human tongue -- or, indeed, as we might say, of the mind -- to offer up worship. While God could have made the dumb creation sing His praises, this task has been set aside specifically for the speech-endowed image. As Jacob writes:

Let everything created abide in what is its own, as at its creation:
The sea for fish and the earth that it may bear the sons of men.
And the image with speech, that it may be stirred all the day to Your praise.
The very pulse of my created being requires Your praise (546:2-8) [26].

In the next section of over a hundred lines, Jacob moves in effect to a paraphrase and meditation on the opening lines of Genesis. After dwelling again at length on God's infinity and unsearchability (546:12-7:18), he moves on to consider the divine power, haila, and sign, remza, which uphold and govern the universe after bringing it into being from nothing (547:18-552:2) [27]. God's power carries the cosmos like the force of a man's arm sustains a stone thrown into the air (552:3-3:19). This similitude allows Jacob to bring into play the ancient theme of the human being as microcosm: "The Power abides in the creation", he writes, "like a soul [abides] in its members" (553:20 and ff.) [28]. Here I should add that, at least on occasion, the term "power" is more than simply a way for Jacob of speaking about God ad extra. It sometimes overlaps with the Second Person of the Trinity [29]. Put another way, I take him as engaging in something very like the old Logos theology of the Apologists and Alexandrines, with the Word of God acting as the divine immanence and power at work in creation, indeed, as almost a kind of world soul [30]. Microcosmos and macrocosmos, or anthropos and makranthropos, reflect one another, and Jacob thus goes on to speak of the human intellect, hauna, specifically as the "image [tsalma] of the Great Being" (556:2 ff.) [31]. Both, the image and the original, are not confined by their respective bodies:

Heaven does not contain the Lord, although He dwells in it,

Nor does the body contain the intellect, though it soujourns in it. (556:10-11)

If the body does not contain the intellect, it still seems to be the appointed place for the latter to gather itself and meet God. I venture this thought, which Jacob does not elaborate on in this homily (or in any other of his works that I have read), because it is a fundamental theme in the Christian spiritual tradition to which I think he belonged, and for which there were many precedents in both Syriac and Greek Christian literature. We shall come back, briefly, to this note later on in the essay. For now, however, there is the matter of Ezekiel's markabto.

Ezekiel and the Chariot Vision: A Great Mystery

The fallen intellect's penchant for travelling outside the bounds in which it ought to remain -- "If your intellect obeys you", Jacob writes, "confine it to the place of the body, that it may gaze within" (557:9-10) -- provides our homilist with the opening for his discussion of Ezekiel's vision. In the prophet's case, the heavens were truly opened. Trembling, Jacob says, he beheld the fiery angels and

The high throne...and, glorious upon the backs
Of the ministering cherubim of fire who bear it,
The wondrous Glory ...the Son of the Creator,
Who is seated there on the high place...(558:15-19)

Let me pause here to note the clear identification of the Second Person with the divine Glory that Ezekiel sees on the chariot throne of the theophany, "in appearance as the likeness of a man" (Ezk 1:26, kmar'eh demut adam). In this instance, the Syriac word for "glory" that Jacob uses is shubha, but he deploys the more technical terms, shekinta (the Aramaic equivalent of the Rabbinic shekinah), iqara (the Aramaic term which usually renders the Hebrew kavod, "glory", in the Peshitta), and rabbuta (majesty or, more literally, "greatness") in other passages of the homily, just as we have seen him identify the Word, at least occasionally, with the haila or power [32]. At this point Jacob sounds a theme that he will come back to, the secondary one or subtext I noted above. The vision of the heavenly throne and its ministering angels, he writes, which the "questing intellect" seeks is dreadful and terrible while, on the other hand, "the table of the King is full of blessing for whomever reclines at it" (559:15-16). Not for us humans, in other words, is the vision of the chariot assigned the angels, but rather the altar of the Eucharist -- though perhaps also suggested here is the idea that the human being is him- or herself to become a "table of blessings" for others [33].

Ezekiel is then interrogated about his vision, and Jacob paraphrases the biblical passage at length, dwelling with particular gusto on the strange forms of the "living creatures", the haywata (Hebrew hayyot), who carry and accompany the throne, and who appear so prominently in some Old Testament pseudepigrapha as well as in the Jewish merkabah literature [34], together with the appearance of the Glory (here iqara) as a man seated on the sapphire throne (560:5-563:2). How then, Jacob wonders at considerable length, are we to interpret this extraordinary vision, unique in the prophetic books (563:3-568:13)? Not, he insists, by "prying into that Lamp [i.e., the Son] of the Great Light". The vision, the forms which the angels take on within it, and the appearance of the Lamp and Glory as a man, properly overwhelm rational thought. Only learned fools would seek to explain it in the terms of the worldly wise. So, our preacher says, he will "not promise an explanation, but rather wonder" before the paradox of "the Word of God mounted on the cherubim" even when it is He, the Son, Who is in truth the One Who carries both them and all creation (568:14-569:17).

The Mystery of the Incarnate Word Who Came to Reconcile Heaven and Earth

Although he promises no explanation, Jacob does, of course, set out to deliver one. It comes in two parts. In part one, we start by touching on the very important -- and ancient -- theme of the tie between the worship of heaven and earth. Jacob begins with the worship of heaven. The chariot is explained as having been created for the sake of the angels, since otherwise God, Who in Himself is hidden even from them, would have given the sons of light cause for confusion and alarm. I think the passage worth quoting at some length:

And they would have been looking in all directions in order to see Him.
And the assembly of the choirs on high would have been scattered by this,
And the powers would have disintegrated without any order [taksis],
And debates would have multiplied even there [i.e., on high], with this one saying to that one:

"Where is He? Where is the exalted One who is hidden, that we may praise Him in His place?" [cf. Ezk 3:12]

For this reason He harnessed the chariot and made the place known
...and depicted a place for his Presence/Glory [shekinta], that there it might dwell,
And He made it like a chariot, that on it He might be carried in state,
That the whole vision of the heavenly ones might be concentrated, caught up, and tied

To that one place where His banner is set...

And lightning and fearful radiance issue from the chariot, to assemble the heavenly ones to great praise...

They all cry out to one another at the entry to His place.

All the choirs gather and stand at the gate of the King...

[and the angels] all look toward that secondary place...

And are soothed by it, and shout praise before His Glory [iqara].

The angels would have been without means for praise had God not provided them with the "place" of the markabta, which is thus a fundamental part -- I would read it as the so-to-speak sanctuary or nave -- of the heavenly temple or palace (haikla, equivalent of the Hebrew hekhhal). Here again, we touch on traditions that extend back into the Second Temple era [36].

Our preacher then links the worship in the "place" on high to earth when he suggests that Ezekiel was granted his vision of the heavenly liturgy because he was in exile, mourning the loss of the Temple on Zion and of its services, and grieved by the proud display of Israel's foes. Thus the vision assures him that, "even if God's ministry in the land of Judah had ceased: See! His praise thunders richly among the cherubim!" (572:9-4:6, here 573:21-22). The sight of, in effect, the most sacred furniture of the celestial temple -- thus consider the likely relationship between the kapporet, "mercy seat", of the Ark and the chariot throne of the vision [37] -- comforts the prophet for the (temporary) loss of its terrestrial copy. Jacob will return in order to expand at greater length on this note of the linkage between the worship of heaven and earth, and of the "place" where God is to be sought and found.

For now, however, it is the prophetic vocation of the son of Buzi which draws Jacob's attention. In his understanding, all biblical prophecy touches on "the mysteries [raze] of the Son of God" (574:10). The use of the term, "mysteries", here refers not to some esoteric doctrine of Jesus, which Dr. Bondi seems to think is the case in her section on Jacob's "secret Jesus", but rather to the divine economy accomplished in Christ [38]. Mystery, raza, in this homily, as in all of Jacob's work, together with Aphrahat and Ephrem before him, is an Aramaic word taken from the lexicon of apocalyptic literature, where it signaled the secrecy of the divine counsel which is revealed to the seer, as, for example, in Daniel 2:18 ff. In the Pauline and deutero-Pauline epistles, such as most notably in Eph. 1:9 and Col. 1:26, its Greek translation, mysterion, is deployed to signal Christ, Who is God's intent or purpose for us and for all creation, the hitherto hidden goal and summation of the divine plan. This is then the sense in which it is used by the Syrian writers, who deploy it to signify the hidden meaning of the Old Testament. It is the justification for what Origen would call the "mystical" or "spiritual" sense of the Hebrew scriptures, or what we might call, simply, the christological reading [39]. It is therefore through the Son of God, Jacob says, that the Father spoke to all the prophets, and it is the same Son who is Himself the content of their message: "the mystery [raza] of all the mysteries [raze] of prophecy" (574:11-16). Ezekiel's vision is no exception to this rule: it was Christ whom the prophet saw on the chariot, just as Daniel had seen Him "borne on the clouds". Here we arrive at the literal and architectural center of the homily, the point where all three texts I noted earlier converge. Quoting Jacob:

Daniel saw Him borne on the clouds [Dan 7:13], and coming
As a man to judge the kings and their empires.
Ezekiel, too, sees Him on the high throne, [He Who] was also God,
That likeness [dmuta, here obviously rendering morphe] of the servant that He assumed within the womb [of Mary]
Was whispered on the wings of the heavenly beings (575:11-16).

The manifestation of the Son and Glory of God in human form signals the paradox and promise of the Incarnation, and, in Jacob's insistence on that paradox of the one Son, we can also discern a certain echo of the Christological controversy of the era. Our preacher is nothing if not insistent on the unity of God and man in Christ, as opposed to those -- dyophysites like Nestorius and his ilk -- who divide and "number" the one Son. The "appearance as a man" and, simultaneously, "as God in great splendor", is "the way", he tells us, "that was trodden by the Son of God, both divinely and humanly, though He is One" (576:12-13). Turning then to interpret the fire above and below the loins of the human figure in Ezekiel's vision (Ezk 1:27), Jacob asks:

Why was it necessary for the prophet to repeat [the description of] the vision,
Then To say "above" and repeat [the same] about [what is] below in his prophecy?
He wanted to show the higher and lower [aspects] of the Son of God,
How that supernal Being had become earthly,
And that He had become a mediator [cf. I Tim 2:5], because He stood in the midst between the [two] sides [i.e., heaven and earth]
In order to make peace [cf. Eph 2:14] between those and high and those below.
Thus He girded himself with peace in the prophecy,
For he [i.e., Ezekiel] saw something in the likeness of a [rain]bow in the clouds accompanying Him,
A sign of the peace that He would come and make with those below. (576:18- 577:4)

Here Jacob links the rainbow shown to Noah as sign of peace after the destruction of the Flood (Gen 9:11-16) with the rainbow shades of the theophany in Ezk 1:28. Both signal the peace, shaina, which the one Son wills to effect between the realms of heaven and earth, angels and human beings, and thus, more importantly, His overcoming of the estrangement between God and humanity that had resulted from the Fall:

And that strife which the serpent had started among the trees [of Eden]
He [the Son] will remove, and the quarrel will cease that had been inflamed.
And the hidden Father and the great Adam, who were at enmity,
Will be reconciled in the Son who stands as the mediator.
The whole Gospel of Christ, Jacob concludes, is thus depicted in the chariot vision (578:3-15).

Kenosis and the Imago Dei vs. Jewish (and Christian?) Mystical Anthropomorphism

Reconciling Prophets with Apostles: the Incarnation as Explanation of the Prophecy

The second half of the homily is devoted to the elaboration of this central point, often in fascinating and moving fashion. Space allows me only to touch on a few significant moments before moving on to Jacob's and then my own conclusions. The first is, again, another clear allusion to, and borrowing from, Phil. 2:6-7.

"Look closely at Him now [on the chariot]", Jacob tells the prophet:
... Who is splendid in His great glory,
And acknowledge that this is He when He has lowered Himself to poverty...
With this type that you have been shown upon the chariot,

The land sees His humility as He delivers it.
By these faces, which He has now asked that you be shown,
In them you will see Him when He has taken on a body in truth.
To this condition your Lord came down when He emptied Himself,
That the world might see Him in the form [dmuta] of a servant.
This is He who shall come in the flesh, openly [or, manifestly],
That in Him the human race may be set free from slavery.
The revelation depicted the whole path of the Son of God,
And it taught Ezekiel the mystery [of the Incarnation] through that chariot. (583:3-18)

If it were not a revelation of the Incarnation, Jacob continues, then the prophet's vision would have been simply ignored and, even, inexplicable:

Our Lord manifested Himself in the world when He came to it,
And illumined the face of prophecy, with the result that everyone recognized it [i.e., prophecy, as true]...
For if God had not appeared as a man,
Ezekiel would not have been renowned for these riches,
And people would not have comprehended the scroll of his prophecy...
Yet now, because the Son of God came to the world,
Ezekiel is glorified who saw His mystery (584:3-4, 10-14).
Without the coming of Christ, the human figure on the chariot would have been cause for a genuine, theological scandal, and rightly criticized for giving shape to God who is infinite, without any limit or form:
And it would have been asked, "why did he see Him as a man "Who, without any likeness, is glorious in the hiddenness of His high place?"
"What is this, that he saw the cherubim in great splendor,
"And yet [saw] the Lord of the cherubim as a man?
"This appearance is [too] small to be about God,
"That a throne should hold Him Whose Glory even the heavens do not contain".
(585:2-7) [40]

I think that Jacob is also taking deliberate aim here at a contemporary, anthropomorphic interpretation not only of Ezekiel's vision, but of the God of the revelation, and we will see him addressing this issue quite openly in a moment. Right now, though, and with regard to the section of his homily under discussion here, I should like to underline a second reconciliation -- or, rather, a harmony -- that he wishes to establish, and that runs through his other works as well: the agreement of the Old Testament prophecy with the New Testament preaching of the Apostles, and, with that agreement, the justice of the Church's claim to the inheritance of Israel:

Because the prophecy depicted His [Christ's] type,
The apostleship also gave the truth of His body to the world.
It is proclaimed [both] by the prophecy and the apostleship
That He Who was, is He Who is embodied.

While those younger in the Spirit [the Apostles] declared that He had become a man,
The elders [i.e., the prophets], too, witnessed that they had seen Him as a man.
From the testimony of prophecy and of the apostleship,
Who is it who flees, except an enemy of the faith? (586:21-587:11) [41]

A Polemical Exchange with Jewish Anthropomorphism: The Incarnate Word as the True and Original Image of God

The phrase, "enemy of the faith", leads Jacob naturally -- in his own mind, at least -- to an interesting, polemical section addressed to an unnamed Jew, in which I think we catch allusions to the traditions attaching to the mystical vision of the body of God in rabbinic circles, the shi'ur qomah, or "measurement of the stature (of the divine body)", texts which are associated with the merkavah literature [42]. For Jacob, the interpretation of Ezekiel's vision in accordance this latter tradition is unacceptable for several reasons. By refusing to acknowledge Christ as the meaning of the prophet's Chariot, his Jewish opponent is led first of all into absurdities. The Father's transcendent "hiddenness" is compromised and reduced to human form:

If you do not affirm that the Son of God became a man, [then] it was the hidden Father [that] Ezekiel saw on the chariot like a human being, if it was not the form of His Only [-Begotten] One...

This leads to a series of sarcastic questions about a literalist reading of the Chariot and its angels:

Well then, were the wheels joined at the axle in order to proceed,
And were the wings really flying, as you are saying?
And [was] the throne the prophet saw made of stone,
And did the whole matter end [with the words] "on the throne like a man"?
(588:7-589:2)

The last question, whether the prophet's vision was all about seeing a humanlike figure on the cherubic throne, is surely directed against the merkavah tradition, for whose Jewish adepts this was in fact the point and the goal of their proposed mystical ascent to heaven. Jacob instead insists that Ezekiel's chariot was -- and is -- not the end of the story. First of all, I think it clear that he is aware of this Jewish tradition, and, as is arguable from elsewhere in his writings, that he is to some extent in actual conversation with contemporary Jews. His seven Homilies against the Jews, for example, display a broad knowledge of traditions current among them, and in one case feature what appears to be a direct appeal to, as it were, the "Jew in the street" over the heads of the latter's rabbinic teachers:

The scribes of your people have hidden the reality from you; and your teachers have not openly spoken the truth.
Consciously or unconsciously, they have hidden the reality, and they do not show from the texts [of Scripture] the image of the Son.
Ask them!...

Say, "O, Rabbi! Show me...
O Jew! Ask these questions of your teachers.
Ask, and see what they say about Jesus!
Judaism [yehoudayuta] is full of lies! [43]

Perhaps there were occasional, Jewish listeners who were drawn to hear the famous preacher, or, perhaps, this is rhetorical display for an exclusively Christian audience, though the latter explanation does not entirely persuade me. The appeal I just quoted seems quite immediate. In any case, and relative to my point about anthropomorphism, Jacob is, secondly, aware of this as both an exegetical option, and -- in the case of the merkavah texts -- as the stated goal of mystical experience. At a couple of points in our homily he himself plays on the shi'ur qomah tradition, as in the lines: "Ezekiel saw the likeness [dmuta] on the chariot/ As a man [a(i)k bar nasha] higher than the summit of the heavens" (591:19-20) [44]. The most striking instance and demonstration of his familiarity with the idea of the vast dimensions of the divine body, however, occurs in his prose homily on the Epiphany. Here he presents John the Baptist as having come to announce that "the Great Body [gushma rabba] has arrived to make itself visible", and to "infuse earnestly into her ears [i.e., of the Church as bride] the grandeur of the Lord [rabbuta d-marya] as well as his own [i.e., John's] smallness". Jacob concludes the relevant section of this homily with the following:

He [the Baptist] wanted to show the bride the loftiness of the stature [rawma d-qumta] of the Bridegroom while instructing her, and said

The sandals of your Betrothed are exalted above my head. As I extend my hands, I am not able to reach their laces...the beauty of His stature [shuphra d-qumteh] is well above my head...as the height is above the abyss, as heaven above the earth. [45]

The repetition here, which I take to be deliberate, of qumta, the precise Syriac equivalent of the Hebrew qomah, is itself striking, and moreso the accompanying image of Christ's enormous size, with the Baptist shorter than the arch of the Lord's foot, a point which the former then underlines by declaring that the difference between their respective sizes is more absolute than even that startling comparison: Christ's hugeness is to John's littleness "as the height is above the abyss, as heaven is above the earth" (cf., perhaps, Isa 66:1?). Perhaps most telling of all is the setting of these passages within the language of bride and bridegroom, which I would read as at least a partial and, again, deliberate echo of the Song of Songs. If so, this would underline Jacob's conscious play on the Jewish literature of the shi'ur qomah, since the latter tradition specifically linked the mystical vision of the divine body with the bride's enraptured description of the limbs of her beloved in Song of Songs 5:10-16 [46].

But if Jacob knows about these traditions, and is not above playing with them, he still insists on reading the appearance of the human form in Ezekiel's vision as a prophecy of the Son who is coming to be born of the Virgin:

[It is] for this that the chariot came down to the earth,
That through prophecy it might represent the descent of its Lord.
And the glorious throne and blue of chastity that [Ezekiel] saw there [Is] the womb of Mary, which He [the Lord] kept closed in order to bear the Son of God.

Also, that likeness which was seen upon the throne
[Is] the Son of God who came in the flesh as a man. (589:15-18)

It is of some note, I think, that the blue of the prophet's sapphire throne, which is itself surely an echo of the blue of the pavement beneath the divine throne in the theophany of Ex 24:10, denotes Mary Theotokos. This might suggest the reason for the traditional color -- blue -- most often associated with her in Christian iconography. Certainly Jacob is himself quite clear that the whole "throne and seat upon the chariot...[is] an image of the Virgin Mother" (590:6-7) [47], and we might in our turn recall that "throne" and "chariot" (and even "mountain" -- recalling the theophany at Sinai?) are, both of them, images of the Theotokos regularly deployed in Orthodox hymnography [48].

It is this insistence on God incarnate which is the key to Jacob's argument with the Jew, and therewith to his correction of the merkabah and shi'ur qomah traditions. The divine body is certainly a reality, but it is the body of the Word made flesh, who is also, however, and precisely as incarnate, the prototype of Adam. Here we arrive at Jacob's subsequent reiteration of the theme of the imago dei. All the wonders of Ezekiel's chariot throne, he writes, including the fiery spirits in their strange and terrible forms, the "fire of burning" and the wheels of flame, the crystal and the sapphire, all the heavenly assemblies, are dominated by a human form. The Lord of the angels, Jacob points out, was seen by Ezekiel "as a man". Here, in lines which recall Irenaeus of Lyons centuries earlier, we find Jacob's statement that Adam was created in the likeness of the incarnate Word:

Before creation the Father had drawn the image [tsalma] of His Son,
And depicted Him, and showed Him how He would shine forth on all the earth.
The Father gazed at the likeness [dmuta] of His Son, and molded Adam.

Since He was going to give [the Son] to the world, He delineated Him beforehand.
For this cause He said, "Let Us make man in Our image [tsalma, Gen 1:26]",
In this same likeness [dmuta] in which Mary gave birth to the Only[-Begotten] One.
The Father willed to send Him into the world as a man,
And drew beforehand His form [tsurta], the Great Image [tsalma rabba], in Adam.
Ezekiel saw the likeness [dmuta] on the chariot
Like a human being, [seated] above the backs of the heavenly beings. (591:11-20) [49]

Here again we should note the play of the three central texts which I pointed to earlier as the core of the homily: Gen 1:26-7, Ezk 1:26-28, and Phil 2:6-7, with the first two finding their explanation and coherence in the third, the proclamation of the self-emptying and Incarnation of the Son.

Visio dei: The Glory and the Image -- Polemic against an Archaic Christian Mysticism?

I might add that, in view of what we saw above concerning the microcosmos and macrocosmos, anthropos and makranthropos, it makes a kind of humorous sense for Jacob to have remarked earlier on that the "Word sits on the throne [before Ezekiel] in order to get accustomed /To human dimensions" (577:17-18). While he is obviously toying in a playful way with the shi'ur qomah traditions, it is also true that the imagery of the Power as makranthropos, i.e., of the Word investing the cosmos like the soul in a human body, "downsizing", as it were, in order to be incarnate is both ancient and frequent, particularly among Syriac-speaking Christians. We find it, for example, in the Odes of Solomon, in Aphrahat and Ephrem, and in the Syrian-influenced Macarian Homilies [50]. It might well comprise the original force of the kenosis passage of Phil 2:6-7 itself [51]. To be sure, Jacob, as a faithful -- not to say emphatic -- adherent of the Creed of Nicea-Constantinople and the homooousion, is obliged to understand the notion of "the Great One making himself small" in a metaphorical sense, not a literal one, but he is still just as clearly drawing on very old traditions of the imago dei in its relation to the divine Glory, the kevod YHWH [52]. Then, too, the notion that the Second Person particularly, as in the old Logos christology, is already in a sense vested with a body, that is, with the cosmos itself, lends extra force to the imagery here.

With regard to a "mythological", that is, literal reading of the divine body, I must add that I am not so sure that Jacob's debate is exclusively with Jewish exegesis and mysticism. I think, rather, that his remarks were also (or even primarily?) directed to some among his Christian audience who may well have been tempted by -- or, more accurately, who had never abandoned and continued to affirm -- an anthropomorphic understanding of the divine form, as well as a mysticism of ascent similar to the merkavah lore [53]. Criticism of anthropomorphism, perhaps especially in an ascetico-mystical context, together with the insistence on an interiorized reading of the ascent to heaven motif from apocalyptic literature, run together like a kind of crimson thread from the second and third centuries in Clement and Origen of Alexandria, through such fourth-century, monastic writers as Evagrius Ponticus and the Macarian Homilist, and all the way to the fourteenth-century, Byzantine Hesychasts. I have touched on this polemical current in other articles [54], so I shall not dwell on it here, save to note, first, that I find it impossible to believe that all this smoke does not point to some kind of fire. Second, we have only to glance at a couple of Jacob's immediate neighbors and contemporaries around the turn of the sixth century to see that he was not alone in his concerns. The Syrian mystic, Stephen bar Sudaili, presents us with a kind of curious, Christian variant of rabbinic-era, hekhhalot mysticism, while the much better known body of writings, written under the name of Dionysius the Areopagite, directly addresses the issues of both anthropomorphism and of ascent. Let it suffice me here to quote some phrases from the fourth chapter of Dionysius' famous little treatise, The Mystical Theology:

The Cause of all... has neither a body [soma], nor shape [schema], nor form [eidosis]...neither is He a place [topos], nor seen...nor perceived [by the senses]...
nor is He troubled by material passions...nor is He in need of light...nor does He have, nor is He any of the things which are perceived by the senses. [55]

All four of the Greek terms that I have highlighted are at issue, given their Syriac equivalents (respectively: gushma, eskhema, dmuta/tsurta, and atra), in Jacob's homily. All four (or five) -- body, form, likeness/shape, and place -- are also arguably important from the time of the Second Temple apocalypses, and they are decidedly so in the hekhalot and shi'ur qomah texts. The association of God with light, also highlighted in my text from Dionysius, is likewise fundamental to the earliest biblical theophanies, and it carries right on being so in subsequent Jewish and Christian mystical writings [56]. So far as Jacob is concerned, however, the merkavah is not the last word in divinity. Rather, he insists to his listeners that it is of little or no consequence. God transcends the chariot which, as we saw above, is merely an act of divine condescension for the needs of the angels, the sanctuary of their (created) heavenly temple. But, as for the godhead itself, that "citadel of light" which is the "place" and being of the triune mystery, the "holy of holies" of the divine essence:

There is no chariot there, either to ascend to, or to seek out,
Nor are there wheels, nor creatures in their [different] kinds
Where the Trinity dwells in great splendor. (601:1-3) [57]

Secondly, and specifically in reference to the matter of light and fire, Jacob recalls Dionysius' more famous apophaticism:

The place is empty, for it is filled with divinity...

And had [angelic]fire ascended to it, [that fire] would have been burnt up by His Breath...

It is not for the spirits or luminaries to be surrounded by Him,
And neither radiance nor honor enters to live with Him.

Nor does the glory of anything created come nigh Him.

The place is sublime...

The Trinity transcends the word of everything that speaks,
The divinity is in a place far from all inquirers,

The Father begetting and the Son begotten and the living Spirit:

The Being Whose place no one knows, save He alone. (601:9-602:5) [58]

Thus, a few pages later, we find an express prohibition directed against a mysticism of ascent to the divine chariot: "O Sinner! In your seeking, do not look for Him on high!" (606:3). The prohibition against making a heavenly journey suggests to me that some of Jacob's audience were interested in doing just that.

The "Place" of our Encounter with God: the Altar of the Church

A last highlight, before we move to my concluding remarks, concerns the "place" where Christians ought to be looking to encounter the splendor of divinity. This is, again, Jacob's subtext, and as well a reprise of the theme of a linkage between heavenly and earthly liturgies, of the mutual reflection of the celestial and terrestrial temples, that we saw him sketch in his initial explanation of the prophet's vision. In a wonderful passage, he takes up Ezk. 10, with its image of the "angel in white linen" approaching the chariot in order to receive coals of fire from the hand beneath the throne, which the angel then scatters over Jerusalem as a sign of the judgement ordained for the city. This picture, Jacob tells us, is a type of the Eucharist (and note the reference he works in to the temple vision in Isaiah 6:1-6):

The Son of God is all the beauty of prophecy,

And without Him there is neither prophecy nor revelation.

In the coals of fire are depicted the pearls of His body,

And in the chariot [is a portrait of] the holy altar of divinity...

These coals of fire that are in the chariot depict His body.

They were placed in it both for retribution and for forgiveness.

One [of them] was given to Isaiah, to forgive his iniquity,

And [others] were scattered in Jerusalem for punishment.

The liturgy of heaven and the worship of the Church are therefore one and the same:
Within the Chariot [were] holy coals of fire,
In the holy altar [are] precious pearls.
On the altar is the body, and on the chariot fire abides,
Since both above [in heaven] and below [on earth] there is a single mystery
[or, perhaps, sacrament] of the Only [-Begotten] One. (596:2-14) [59]

The angel himself is "a type of the [Christian] priest clothed with the form [tsurta] of the Son of God", while the hand beneath the chariot is an image of the Holy Spirit. It is the Latter Who is the agent of the Eucharistic change, as Jacob makes clear in an extended passage on the meaning of the consecratory epiklesis:

It is not the [human] priest who has authority to sacrifice the Only [-Begotten] One,
And to lift Him up before His Father as a sacrifice for sinners.
Rather, the Holy Spirit comes forth from the Father,
And descending, He overshadows [shra] and dwells [shken] within the bread, and makes it the Body...
And the Spirit Who is within stretches out to the priest who is outside,
Like the cherub stretched out to the man who was in white linen,
And [the priest] takes from Him the propitiatory fire in the hollow of his hand,
And, taking it out, he gives flowing wealth to all the world. (597:5-18) [60]

At this point, Jacob moves on to link together the worship of both the Old and the New Covenants with that of heaven. He rightly notes the expressly sacerdotal imagery of Ezekiel's angel in white linen:

The priests of the People [i.e., Israel] were clothed in [white] linen within the Holy of Holies [cf. Lev 16:2-14, the liturgy of Yom Kippur],
Just as the angel at the chariot was clothed in [white] linen.
It was not the angel who took his cue from the priest who was clothed,
But rather [it was] the priest who was made like that angel.

Which is to say, that the Old Covenant Tabernacle and Temple were also an image of heaven. Thus Jacob continues with a reference to Exodus 25:9 ff., that is, to God's revelation on Sinai of the heavenly "pattern" (in Hebrew, tabnit, and in the Peshitta -- again! -- dmuta) of worship:

Moses saw the whole form [tsurta] of these mysteries,
And he came down [from Sinai] to trace it in the tabernacle and its furnishings.
And, just as Moses saw, so Ezekiel saw [them] as well...
The mystery of the Church was prior to both Moses and Ezekiel,
And on it the angels, too, longed to gaze. (598:18-599:8)

Our preacher depends here on a tradition that was already old by the time of Christ, which is that, at the time of the revelation on Sinai, Moses was accorded a vision of -- or, in some accounts, an actual ascent to -- heaven where he was shown the celestial temple and liturgy [61]. Likewise, the reference here to the Church as antedating both Ezekiel and Moses is, first of all, dependent on another, related tradition: that Paradise was designed as a temple, and that Adam's original calling was to be priest. We find the idea implicitly in the accounts of the Hebrew scriptures themselves in the relationship obtaining between Genesis, Exodus (on the making of the tabernacle), and I Kings (the design and consecration of Solomon's temple). The idea then becomes explicit as early as Jubilees in the second century B.C., and it is quite prominent in Jacob's own beloved Ephrem, particularly in the latter's Hymns on Paradise [62]. As Jacob himself puts it in another homily:

God made the gift of priesthood to men

In order that they might be consecrated by means of it.
In His love for peace [shaina], He bestowed this gift on them
And exalted them, so that they might offer Him their sacrifices.
In order to mingle them with Himself in His glory [shubha] and majesty [rabbuta],
He established them in His spiritual ministry [teshmeshta]. [63]

The imagery of "mingling" is typical of Syriac-speaking Christians from the earliest texts we have in that language, and here it obviously denotes what the Greek Fathers refer to as deification, theosis, the gift of participation in God's uncreated glory. Adam did not fulfill this vocation. He did not make "peace", shaina, but Christ, as we have seen Jacob emphasize, did: "This deed our Lord came down and accomplished on the earth" [64]. Paradise, Sinai and Temple, heaven and the Church's worship, are all of them joined in Christ, who thus is the bond between both the beginning and the end, and between those on high and those below. I think it also worth noting that we find several of the terms I have dwelt on, particularly in the preceding section on mystical ascent and anthropomorphism, repeated here in reference to the liturgy of heaven and earth: body, form, likeness, and place. This is not accidental. The true "body of God" is here, on the altar. The "form of God" -- i.e., the incarnate Word -- is depicted in the celebrating priest; who reveals, together with the rest of us in solemn assembly, the "likeness" of heaven, and so the "place" of the divine rest [65].

Thus we arrive at the force of Jacob's concluding remarks. He follows his prohibition against heavenly ascent, which I cited at the close of the last section, with the following affirmation:

He has come to you, to your place. Look at Him! for He is with you
At the altar as [at] a meeting-place with you, so that you may see Him as He rests upon the table,
And from the particles of His body all creation is satisfied. (606:4-7)

This is why we are not to go looking for a way to climb up to heaven, nor be jealous of the angels' service of the merkavah. If anything, Jacob suggests, they should be jealous of us! The Presence, the shekinah, is right here:

All the wealth of the heavenly beings has descended to the earth
In Immanuel, Who is [both] with us, and is our God.
The hidden altar, which is ministered to in mystery --
Look! [It] is revealed, and is [lit. "stands"] among earthly angels [i.e., us]...
Look! in the ministry of the holy altar, at the time of the Mysteries, Are marshalled the [heavenly] powers, standing with their cries of "Holy".
We lack nothing that the angels have.
If the eye of our soul were as limpid as the prophet's, the shining throng of their hovering
All the mysteries that were hidden among the angels Come to pass in her [i.e., the Church], and it is she who is the schoolmistress of the heavenly beings. (609:7-8)

There is therefore a greater thing among us now than Ezekiel's chariot throne.
If in heaven the cherubim "bear Him upon their backs with wonder", in the Church on earth we may "hold Him fast in the hollows" of our hands (609:13-14).

Ruth Rabbah 3

3. It is said, That which is crooked cannot be made straight; and that which is wanting cannot be numbered (Eccl. 1, 15). In this world, he who is crooked can be made straight, and he who is straight can become crooked, but in the hereafter he who is crooked cannot be made straight, nor he who is straight crooked. 'And that which is wanting cannot be numbered.' Consider two wicked men who associated with one another in this world. One of them repented of his evil deeds before his death while the other did not, with the result that the former stands in the company of the righteous while his fellow stands in the company of the wicked. And beholding him he says, 'Woe is me, is there then favour shown here? We both of us committed robberies, we both of us committed murders together, yet he stands in the company of the righteous and I in the company of the wicked!' And they [the angels] reply to him and say, 'You fool! You were despicable after your death and lay for three days, and did not they drag you to your grave with ropes? The maggot is spread under thee, and the worms cover thee (Isa. xiv, II). And your associate understood and repented of his evil ways, and you, you also had the opportunity of repenting and you did not take it.'

He thereupon says to them, Permit me to go and repent!' And they answer him and say, You fool! Do you know that this world is like the Sabbath and the world whence you have come is like the eve of the Sabbath? If a man does not prepare his meal on the eve of the Sabbath, what shall he eat on the Sabbath? And do you not know also that the world is like the sea, and the world whence you have come is like the dry land? If a man does not prepare his food on the dry land, what shall he eat at sea? And do you not know also that this world is like the wilderness and the world whence you have come like cultivated land? If a man does not prepare his food on cultivated land, what shall he eat in the wilderness?' What does he do? He folds his hands and eats his flesh [in anguish], as it is said, The fool foldeth his hands together, and eateth his own flesh (Eccl. iv, 5), and he says, 'Permit me to look upon my associate in his glory,' and they answer him, 'You fool! We have been commanded by the Almighty that the wicked shall not stand by the side of the righteous, nor the righteous by the side of the wicked; neither impure with pure nor pure with impure.' To what does this commandment refer? To this gate, as it is said, This is the gate of the Lord; the righteous shall enter into it (Ps. cxviii, 20).

4. Once R. Hiyya Rabbah and R. Simeon b. Halafta were sitting studying the law in the Great College of Tiberias on the eve of Passover (some say on the eve of the Great Fast), and they heard the sound of people murmuring. Said one' to the other, What are these people doing?' He answered: 'He who has [money] is purchasing [his needs for the Festival] and he who has not is going to his employer that he may give it to him.' ale said, 'If so, I will also go to my Master that he should give me.' He went out and prayed in the Iltis" of Tiberias, and he beheld a hand holding out to him a pearl. He went and took it to our teacher who said to him: Whence have you this? It is priceless. Take these three dinars and go and make preparations in honour of the day, and after the Festival we shall advertise it, and whatever price we obtain for it, you shall have.' He took the three dinars and went and made his purchases and went home. Said his wife to him: Simeon! Have you turned thief? All your possessions do not amount to a hundred manehs, and whence then have you all these purchases?' He immediately related to her the incident, whereupon she said: Do you then desire that your canopy' should contain one pearl less than that of your fellow in the World to Come? ' He said to her: What then is to be done? ' She said to him, 'Go and return your purchases to their owners and the dinars to their owner and the pearl to its owner.' When our teacher heard of it, he was grieved, and he sent and brought her to him, and said to her, How much anguish have you caused this righteous man? ' She retorted, 'Do you then desire that his canopy should have one pearl less than yours in the world to come? ' He said to her, 'And even if it does lack it, cannot we make it up?' She answered him, 'Rabbi, in this world we are vouchsafed to see thy face, but [in the World to Come] did not Resh Lakish say: Every righteous man has his own chamber? '6 And he admitted that she was right. And not only so, but it is the custom of celestial beings to give but not to take back. [Nevertheless, the pearl was returned] and this latter miracle was greater than the former. When [R. Simeon]took it his hand was below and when he gave it back his hand was above, as a man who lends to his fellow'

Michael Will Blow Trumpet For Third Time, & All Dead Will Be Resurrected In Twinkling Of An Eye; Glory Of Some Will Be Greater Than Sun, Others Will Stand Up In Honor, Still Others In Misery; King Of Heaven & Earth Will Come & Reward All Men According To Their Deeds

Fifth Baruch (Ethiopic Apocalypse of Baruch)

Blessed be God, the Lord of Israel.

We shall write that which God has revealed to the blessed, holy, and praised Abba Baruch. When he was thirty-five years of age his parents took him to Jerusalem and put him in service with the High Priest, named Eskendros. The High Priest associated him with the doorkeepers of Jerusalem, and he remained in service for thirty years. He prayed as follows: "Let me not see the destruction of Jerusalem." After the thirty-fifth year had gone by he went to draw water. He drew water and covered it with a fig leaf. A deep sleep overcame him and so he slept. Then God raised up Nebuchadnezzar, the king of Babylon, at the time of Manasseh, the king of Judah. He captured Jerusalem and destroyed all its monuments, led away its priests and prophets, captured Zion, took the precious stone that Solomon had made for it, and took captive its men and animals.

A great angel named Sutu'el appeared. He exalted Baruch heavenward and let him see all the hidden and manifest things. He brought him into the Heavenly Jerusalem, and let him see established and high thrones, decorated places, shining crowns of various appearances, and white robes of various shapes.

I, Baruch, asked the angel who conducted me, and said to him: "Whose is this dwelling?" He answered and said to me: "It belongs to the martyrs who have despised and hated this ephemeral world, who have delivered themselves up to death for the sake of justice and [eternal] life, to those whose heads were cut and whose blood was shed."

Then he showed me the aspect of the Heavenly Jerusalem. I said to him: "(Was it made) before or after the creation?" He said to me: "Before the creation of Adam. The names of all the just, from Adam up to the end of the world, are written on this golden column."

Then he brought me into the middle (where the) column (was) and there I saw high and shiny seats, and robes whiter than milk, the sun, the moon, and the stars. The place was full of fruit. I asked the angel who conducted me and said to him: "Who enters through this gate?" He who guided me answered and said to me: "Blessed are those who enter through this gate. (Here) the husband remains with his wife and the wife remains with her husband."

Then he showed me a golden bed, a couch of precious stones, garments, and purses. I said to my guide: "Are they for those who remained in their virginity from their youth?" He said to me: "Yes, for those who guarded their virginity from their youth."

Then he took me to a great city and brought me into this city. There I saw many plants, numbering four thousand and seven, full of fruit. I said to my guide: "Who are those who enter into this house?" He answered and said to me: "Those who despised and hated the ephemeral world will enter through this gate that Adam built of old in this city. Many will hope for it, but few will enter through it."

Then he brought me to a stream of oil. I said to my guide: "Who will enter through this gate?" "Those who despised and hated this ephemeral world from their youth until the end of their lives; those who, having taken the pure monastical garment, were continent and of pure flesh and spirit."

Then he brought me across this stream of oil and showed me a stream of milk, greater than the sea and the deep waters. I asked my guide and said to him: "Who will enter into this Stream of -milk?" He answered and said to me: "This stream is for the children who were chosen while still in their mothers' wombs, and for all who were killed by iniquity, too. They will dwell in the end of days in the shadow of this stream of milk, together with their children. It is not for the children alone but also for the hermits, who were chosen in their mothers' wombs for the Heavenly Kingdom and did not mate with women from the day they put on the monastical cloth of chastity."

Then he brought me to a city which was white and shining, decorated with gold, hyacinth, and pearls, filled with fruit and plantations of almonds, nuts, and pomegranates. And I asked my guide: "Who are those who will enter into this city?" He said to me: "The kings and governors who observed justice; who did regard no man, rich or poor, small or big; those who loved the orphans, priests, and temples; and those who dressed them as well as the widows in fine raiment; those who loved justice and gave alms to the poor and indigent; those who fed the hungry and gave to the thirsty to drink. This then is the dwelling of the kings and governors."

Then he brought me to a place facing this one, and the city. I saw was brighter than the sun, the moon, and the stars ten million times over, decorated with pearls and filled with fruit and plants. I said to my guide: "Whose is this beautiful residence?" He answered and said to me: "Blessed is the man who will enter into this residence. It is for the mighty of the earth who killed no one, who were given not to idolatry, who confounded not one soul with another, who practiced neither magic nor sorcery. This then is their residence."

Then he took me opposite this place on a golden ship and brought me to the place of the City of God, and showed me all the kingdoms of glory that do not pass away but grow and are glorified a million times. I said to my guide: "What is the name of this city?" He said to me: "The City of God." I said to him: "Who will enter into this city?" My guide said to me: "The meek who kept no vengeance in their hearts, who made peace with their neighbors, who did not repay evil to the villain who had done them evil, who blessed those who cursed them, who shared their bread with the hungry, their cup with the thirsty, their clothes with the naked, who redeemed the captives with their wealth and lent of their gold to the poor. This is their residence."

He took me away from this gate and brought me to another city named Aqraba, which means the "Land of the Living." There I saw Enoch and Elijah writing down the deeds of the just of the earth.

In the days of this man the Holy Spirit will descend without cloud like rain for seven days and will be like oil. Without it man will not be purified from his sins and the drops of God's mercy will not be spread over the earth. In those days peace will reign and there will be no hatred, no agitation, and no robbery, but love, joy, offerings, and rejoicing. If someone asks but wood from his neighbor, he willingly will lend or give him all his wealth. In those days the fear of God will abound and the many churches that have previously been destroyed in the world will be rebuilt. Everything will be accomplished on the order of the king. Believers will abound and belief will be strong. In those days the priests will walk according to the prescribed laws and the ordinances of justice as did Melchizedek, Moses, and Aaron, the holy priests. Like them they will please God during their lifetimes. In those days love will abound as well as peace, joy, exultation, and knowledge of the Lord. In those days there will be no sorrow or distress, no hunger or thirst, no murder or controversy. In those days people will have one feeling and one thought, and they will walk in the straight path of grace.

Then I saw a stream of honey, that flowed like the water of the sea. I asked my guide: "Who will enter into this stream?" He answered me: "The blessed prophets who prophesied of the good that would come at the end."

Then he showed me, opposite that stream of honey, a stream of wine (that was) like a torrent of sea water. I asked my guide: "Who will enter into this stream?" He said to me: "Those who despised the world, who were given to hospitality, and who loved their neighbors as themselves."

Then the angel took me to the east and showed me a golden column on which was engraved an inscription in a thin writing brighter than the sun, the moon, and the stars of the sky. I asked him: "What is this golden column and what is this writing on it that has the likeness of the sun, the moon, and the shining stars?" He answered me: "The names of the just are written for eternal life on this golden column, where they wax not old or corrupt." I said to him: "Are the names alone engraved upon it; are not the features of the face engraved upon it, too?" He answered and said: "All the features of the faces of the just are engraved for eternal life on this golden column, where they neither wax old nor become corrupt. They are engraved with a golden pen; the deeds of the sinners are engraved with an iron pen." I asked my guide: "Whose is this city?" He said to me: "The Land of the Living. Those in it are Enoch and Elijah, who write God's commandments, and who live there forever."

Then he took me to another area and I saw at its gates big trees full of fruit. Many hermits were scattered there, suffering from great hunger and thirst. A stream was also in this place. When they wished to eat from the tree it ascended to the sky, and when they rose in order to eat it descended to the earth. When they wished to drink from the stream it vanished and entered into the heart of the earth, and when they despaired of drinking the stream came out and reappeared to them. Sorrowfully I asked the angel who conducted me, and said to him: "Whose is this city and who are these men?" He answered and said to me: "This city belongs to the hermits. They were perfect in fasting, adoration, prayer, and purity of the body but they were boastful and haughty." I said to him: "Did their haughtiness prevent them from entering into the Heavenly Kingdom?" He said to me: "The root of sin is haughtiness and loftiness."

Then he showed me a city a thousand thousand times brighter than the sun, the moon, and the stars, full of fruit trees yielding thousands of blessed fruits every hour. There were also shining raiment, crowns adorned and bright, golden belts, garments of precious stones, clothes, and shoes at the right and the left, branches of olive trees and branches of palm trees, the odor of which ravishes the heart and the taste of which makes the soul go forth from the body. Its beginning and end are not perceived. None knows it but God. Even the angels of God know it not, and the priests do not use it to burn incense. I asked him: "Whose is this residence?" He said to me: "It is the residence of the hermits." I said to him: "Will not all of them enter into this dwelling?" He said: "No." I said to him: "Who, then, are those who will enter into this residence?" He said to me: "Those who did not mate with women after they retired from this world; those who did not smite their neighbors with their slander; those who did not ride on mules; those who did not carry seats and sit on them; those who did not acquire gold and silver, the goods of this world, and who did not like them; those who despised and hated this world; those who did not love office; who did not lie on a bed or on a couch in this world; who did not claim to be eating, in fact, there is no joy for the hermits upon this earth, their pleasure begins when their soul leaves this world; those who did not like vain glory, who did not accept gold or silver or precious clothes from kings and princes, who did not set crowns upon their heads, and who did not take bribes to the disadvantage of the innocent. All these will enter into this residence."

Having heard this I praised the Lord.

Then he took me to the west. There I saw a column of fire on which was writing by a pen of fire. The writing was thin and compact and the column of fire was greater than the column of gold. I asked him: "What is that written on the column of fire?" He said to me: "The names of the sinners."

Opposite that column I saw virgins clothed in darkness, and the guide said to me: "These are mad virgins who were avaricious." I said to him: "Do they stay in this land of suffering, because of their avarice?" He said to me: "Yes."

Then I saw a stream of fire, with many men seated upon thrones of fire. I asked him: "Who are those who undergo such punishment?" He said to me: They are priests." I said to him: "Why are they punished so severely?" He said to me: "This is the punishment of priests and High Priests who introduced improper things into the temple and accepted bribes for the priesthood." I said to him: "As a matter of fact they introduced improper things into the sanctuary for bribes: children of the divorced, stutterers, the dumb and the deaf, the blind, the broken-handed, and the leprous, children of Kedar, the rich but not the poor. Therefore these priests are punished."

Then he showed me a big sea of fire, by which many people were being swallowed. I said to him: "Who are these that are being punished so severely?" He said to me: "Priests and teachers." I said to him: "Why are they punished?" He said to me: "Because they alone ate the firstlings in the sanctuary; they alone ate the tithe of the sanctuary; they ate the funeral meal of the poor and buried them not with honor; they walked not in the path of life; they taught not the glory of the Sabbath, saying, 'Honor it,' and introduce not into the dwellings donkeys, mules, oxen, sheep goats, or even hens: As for the teachers, they did not rebuke their children, neither sons nor daughters. Therefore will they be punished."

Then he showed me an abyss of fire, full of people who scoured burning charcoals with their hands and drew the streams of fire with their fingers. The streams of fire swallowed them entirely so that none could recognize their mouths or lips. I said to him "Who are these who are punished like this?" He said to me "Those who have lost their virginity in deserted places, without their parents giving them in marriage."

I also saw an abyss and a big pit of fire, and people without number were in it. The fire devoured some of them up to their knees, others up to their breasts, others up to their necks, others up to their mouths, and still others entirely. I said to him: "Who are these who undergo such severe punishment?" He said to me: "Those swallowed up to the knees uttered vehement words in the sanctuary. Those swallowed up to the reins fornicated with women in the house of God. Those swallowed up to their breasts slandered their neighbors in the sanctuary. Those devoured up to their necks spoke after their offering to God without cooling off the bread or the water. Those devoured entirely fornicated with man as with woman."

Then I saw an abyss and a pit of fire the depth of which was equal to eleven thousand and seven cubits. I said to him: "Who are these who go down into this stream?" He said: "Those who fornicated with a woman in childbed or with a woman in her uncleanness or with an ignominious woman; those who married the wife of one who died or the wife of a brother; those who fornicated with a daughter or with a sister or with the daughter of a brother; those who fornicated with domestic animals or with wild beasts. This is their punishment."

Then I saw big rocks of fire, and there I saw many men scattered through the fire. I said to him: "Who are these who are punished in this abyss of fire and in these rocks of fire?" He said to me: "Those who worshiped stones. Therefore their punishment is by stones of fire."

Then I saw big trees, all of fire. Many men were suspended from them, and serpents of fire and dogs of fire devoured them. I said to him: "Who are these who undergo this terrible punishment?" He said to me: "Priests, and widows who, being pregnant, drank medicines to kill the conceived being. The killed beings cried unto God saying: 'O Lord, O Lord, we might have been good or bad but they did not let us grow; some of us were eaten by dogs, others by beasts.' God ordered that the children be given to Temeleyakos; as for their parents, they undergo this punishment."

Then I saw a big caldron of fire in which there were many of the mighty kings, governors, and princes. I said to him: "Who are these who are punished like this?" He said to me: "The mighty kings, governors, and princes, who ate of the offerings and laid waste the sanctuary, who robbed the dwellings of the priests and laid desolate the land, who loved not the orphans. and gave not alms from what God had given them."

Woe unto you who spoil the world!

Woe unto you who eat of the offerings!

Woe, for your punishment will be severe!

Woe unto you who spoil with a razor God's creatures!

Woe unto you, kings and governors, who build sanctuaries to please the eye of man, but in your hearts, you like not the priests and chanters! You are like a bee with no honey or a pitcher with no water.

Woe unto you, kings and governors, who do not save the oppressed and the poor. You foolish ones, do you think that you will enter the Heavenly Kingdom because of your great riches? All the glory of your house will not go down with you and your terrestrial kingdom will be forgotten, for the existence of this world is ephemeral. The world is ephemeral and its concupiscence as well. Everything is ephemeral and wears out like a garment, and like linen clot a that you change and they are changed, for the existence of the world is ephemeral.

Blessed are the kings who pleased God during their lifetimes.

Blessed are the kings who loved the poor and the miserable.

Blessed are those who made <sup>127</sup> wisdom their mother.

Blessed are the kings who gave all their wealth to the poor and miserable as ransom for their souls, knowing that the existence of this world is ephemeral, that gold and silver deteriorate and garments wear out.

Woe unto you, kings, you who are creatures and yet exalt yourselves over other creatures.

Woe unto you, kings and governors, you are dust; <sup>1P8</sup> and why do you exalt yourselves over the dust?

Woe unto you, kings and governors, you are clay; and why do you exalt yourselves over the clay?

Woe unto you, kings and governors, who cut off the creatures of God with the razor and the sword; you can make neither white nor black even a single hair of your head. Heard you not what Scripture said: One man is more honorable than ninety-nine angels'?

Woe unto you, kings and governors, who rob the sanctuary and rebuke not your subordinates that they may not corrupt the world. If your governors corrupt the world and you rebuke them not, I shall require their blood of you, says God.

I, Baruch, saw horrible and great judgments, and each of them was terrifying. I saw great mountains of fire full of pitch[?] and sulphur, a terrifying caldron full of the great governors and princes engulfed in a sea of fire. I said to the angel Sutu'el who conducted me: "Who are these men who undergo this terrible punishment?" He said to me: "The wicked kings who corrupted the world and defiled the sanctuary."

Then I saw a large pit of fire full of princes and wealthy people, men and women. Serpents of fire were (suspended) on their garments and devoured them, vipers of fire stung them, dogs of fire bit and devoured them, angels of fire pierced them, rocks of fire fell upon them, and the pit of fire engulfed them up to their heads. I asked the angel: "Who are these who are punished so severely?" He said to me: "These are the hermits who were supposed to despise this world but despised it not and purified not their thoughts. They were like other men of the world, they had relations with women and married and forgot God during their lifetimes. They resemble the dog that returns to his own vomit, or the sow that was washed and returns to the mire, or Absalom who transgressed the commandments of his father. They resemble Lot's wife who became a pillar of salt. All things are vain."

Then I saw many men whom they made to run on burning sand. I said to him: "Who are these whose punishment is like this?" He said to me: "Deacons who did not promptly bring the offerings into the sanctuary."

Then I saw people suspended by burning ropes, their feet upward and their heads downward. I said to him: "Who are these who are punished like this?" He said to me: "Priests who did not offer Sunday sacrifices to God at sunrise; the rest day of the temple comes from God. Therefore are they punished."

Then I saw people whom they made to touch fire and to whom they gave cups of fire to drink. I said to him: "Who are these who are punished like this?" He said to me: "Priests and deacons who did not offer sacrifices with a pure heart, those who, being bound by the priesthood, transgressed it. This is their punishment."

Then I saw men whose hands were cut off. I said to him: "Who are these maimed people?" He said to me: "Those who wrote [magic] texts and carved. This is their punishment."

Then I saw people from whose mouths came fire and sulphur. I said to him: "Who are these who are punished like this?" He, said to me: "The tailors who sewed garments and kept for themselves even a small piece of thread."

Then I saw people brought in with cords of fire and searing flame. All kinds of fruit and limpid water passed in front of them, but when they wished to drink the water fled from them. I said to him: "Who are these who are punished like this?" He said to me: "Those who broke the fast and those who hastened to eat."

All this the angel Sutu'el showed to me.

Then I saw a terrible punishment, sealed with seven seals. He said to me: "O Baruch, wilt thou be strong enough to see this terrible and frightful [punishment]?" I said to him: "Speak, O Lord." Then he commanded the angel of Gehenna and said: "Show the seal of Gehenna to Baruch, the beloved of God." And he opened the seal and, behold, a great torment called Gehenna appeared, and a great cold, and snow. From the time of the creation of Heaven and earth until the end of the world, the shining sun would be unable to heat it. Those who are thrown into it will no more be mentioned among the living, and those who enter into it will remain there. As the prophet David says: "Therefore the wicked will not rise from Hell and the sinners will not remain in the congregation of the righteous." He also says: "Like the dust which the wind drives away from the surface of the earth."

Then I, Baruch, saw what he showed me: bad years, and numerous good years during which there will be love, corn, wheat, honey, and milk. The Holy Spirit will go down like the dew of the rain season; fasting and prayer will please [God]. The husband will speak agreeably with his wife, the daughter-in-law with her mother-in-law, the monk with his disciple, and the disciple with his teacher, the brother with his brother, the daughter with her mother, and the mother with her daughter, the father with his son, and the son with his father, the relative with his relatives, and the friend with his friends.

In the four-hundred-and-seventieth cycle, the six-thousandth year, and the fifth day, a queen will reign and there will be great joy. Qostanfinos and Teodros, the orthodox, will reign, and in their days there will be love and peace. They will build God's house which Diyoqleytanos, the heretic, destroyed. In their time five hundred and thirty years will be added to Gabra Masqal, the king of Aksum, because of his orthodoxy.

Then every year love will decrease. Small foxes will rise; they will destroy the whole world and they will exalt the ark of God into the Heavenly Zion. Wheat will grow less and water will flow four times less. Those who bring offerings, incense, and sacrifices to God's house will go up to Heaven. There will be good priests and bad priests. Those who minister in God's house will be the slothful, the foolish, the silly, and the scorners. At that time slothful teachers will be created. They will reduce everything to schemes. They will not be saved nor will they save their children. They will profane the Sabbath and violate the festivals.

In the twenty-fourth year of mercy the trees of the fields will rejoice, the mountains and hills will be joyful, as will creatures, man, and beast. Everything will go back to its first condition.

Then a righteous man will reign. Righteousness shall be the girdle of his loins and faithfulness the girdle of his reins. Justice shall spring out in his days. He will reign thirty years in the five-hundred-and-forty-eighth cycle.

After that the false messiah will come. He will say: "I am God," and will perform numerous signs and wonders. He shall cause the sun to rise in the west and the moon toward 'Elam; his right eye will be blended with blood, his right foot will be thin; the nails of his hands will be distorted and those of his hands and feet will be like scythes; his right [hand] will be for extermination; his left [hand] for death. He will reign seven years.

Then God will cause the false messiah to cease. The lion will then reign seven years or sixty-seven in the count of the cycles. He will summon a council of priests, monks, believers, and numerous armies. He will say to the Cross: "Take away all this," and the Cross will take it and ascend to Heaven. All of them will weep bitterly and will die; the king will die with them. Michael and Gabriel will come with their armies and will take them into the garden of joy. Then the demon Qoleyon will come with thirty thousand and seventy-seven others and will reign. They will eat rocks like reeds, will swallow fire, and will drink the blood of women in their impurity. They will reign seven years.

Then the eagle will reign and will reside in Jerusalem. He will devour ten thousand girls each evening, and ten thousand each morning. He will reign seven years.

Then the winds will reign. They will destroy God's houses and will unearth the bones of men. They will reign seven years.

The holy Michael will blow the horn for thirty years, and all the bones will assemble. Then he will sound the trumpet for The second time for thirty years. The bones will be sewn up again with flesh and all the bodies will assemble. Praise and glory be to Him forever. Amen.

If I, Baruch, were to tell you everything I saw and heard all the books would not contain it. The Spirit of God dictated it to Absalom and Abimelech, the priests of Jerusalem. He gave it to King Masfeyanos, who fears the Lord. Glory to God forever. Amen.

May This Ladder Teach You Spiritual Disposition Of Virtues; I Am At Summit Of Ladder, & As My Great Initiate (St Paul) Said: So Faith, Hope, Love Abide, These Three; But The Greatest Of These Is Love

The Ladder of Divine Ascent

Address by His Holiness Benedict XVI

Paul VI Audience Hall, Wednesday, 11 February 2009

Dear Brothers and Sisters,

Today I would like to return to presenting the great writers of the Church of the East and of the West in the Middle Ages. And I am proposing the figure of John known as Climacus, a Latin transliteration of the Greek term klimakos, which means of the ladder (klimax). This is the title of his most important work in which he describes the ladder of human life ascending towards God. He was born in about 575 a.d. He lived, therefore, during the years in which Byzantium, the capital of the Roman Empire of the East, experienced the greatest crisis in its history. The geographical situation of the Empire suddenly changed and the torrent of barbarian invasions swept away all its structures. Only the structure of the Church withstood them, continuing in these difficult times to carry out her missionary, human, social and cultural action, especially through the network of monasteries in which great religious figures such as, precisely, John Climacus were active.

John lived and told of his spiritual experiences in the Mountains of Sinai, where Moses encountered God and Elijah heard his voice. Information on him has been preserved in a brief Life (PG 88, 596-608), written by a monk, Daniel of Raithu. At the age of 16, John, who had become a monk on Mount Sinai, made himself a disciple of Abba Martyr, an "elder", that is, a "wise man". At about 20 years of age, he chose to live as a hermit in a grotto at the foot of the mountain in the locality of Tola, eight kilometres from the present-day St Catherine's Monastery. Solitude, however, did not prevent him from meeting people eager for spiritual direction, or from paying visits to several monasteries near Alexandria. In fact, far from being an escape from the world and human reality, his eremitical retreat led to ardent love for others (Life, 5) and for God (ibid., 7). After 40 years of life as a hermit, lived in love for God and for neighbour years in which he wept, prayed and fought with demons he was appointed hegumen of the large monastery on Mount Sinai and thus returned to cenobitic life in a monastery. However, several years before his death, nostalgic for the eremitical life, he handed over the government of the community to his brother, a monk in the same monastery.

John died after the year 650. He lived his life between two mountains, Sinai and Tabor and one can truly say that he radiated the light which Moses saw on Sinai and which was contemplated by the three Apostles on Mount Tabor!

He became famous, as I have already said, through his work, entitled The Climax, in the West known as the Ladder of Divine Ascent (PG 88, 632-1164). Composed at the insistent request of the hegumen of the neighbouring Monastery of Raithu in Sinai, the Ladder is a complete treatise of spiritual life in which John describes the monk's journey from renunciation of the world to the perfection of love. This journey according to his book covers 30 steps, each one of which is linked to the next. The journey may be summarized in three consecutive stages: the first is expressed in renunciation of the world in order to return to a state of evangelical childhood. Thus, the essential is not the renunciation but rather the connection with what Jesus said, that is, the return to true childhood in the spiritual sense, becoming like children. John comments: "A good foundation of three layers and three pillars is: innocence, fasting and temperance. Let all babes in Christ (cf. 1 Cor 3: 1) begin with these virtues, taking as their model the natural babes" (1, 20; 636). Voluntary detachment from beloved people and places permits the soul to enter into deeper communion with God. This renunciation leads to obedience which is the way to humility through humiliations which will never be absent on the part of the brethren. John comments: "Blessed is he who has mortified his will to the very end and has entrusted the care of himself to his teacher in the Lord: indeed he will be placed on the right hand of the Crucified One!" (4, 37; 704).

The second stage of the journey consists in spiritual combat against the passions. Every step of the ladder is linked to a principal passion that is defined and diagnosed, with an indication of the treatment and a proposal of the corresponding virtue. All together, these steps of the ladder undoubtedly constitute the most important treatise of spiritual strategy that we possess. The struggle against the passions, however, is steeped in the positive it does not remain as something negative thanks to the image of the "fire" of the Holy Spirit: that "all those who enter upon the good fight (cf. 1 Tm 6: 12), which is hard and narrow,... may realize that they must leap into the fire, if they really expect the celestial fire to dwell in them" (1,18; 636). The fire of the Holy Spirit is the fire of love and truth. The power of the Holy Spirit alone guarantees victory. However, according to John Climacus it is important to be aware that the passions are not evil in themselves; they become so through human freedom's wrong use of them. If they are purified, the passions reveal to man the path towards God with energy unified by ascesis and grace and, "if they have received from the Creator an order and a beginning..., the limit of virtue is boundless" (26/2, 37; 1068).

The last stage of the journey is Christian perfection that is developed in the last seven steps of the Ladder. These are the highest stages of spiritual life, which can be experienced by the "Hesychasts": the solitaries, those who have attained quiet and inner peace; but these stages are also accessible to the more fervent cenobites. Of the first three simplicity, humility and discernment John, in line with the Desert Fathers, considered the ability to discern, the most important. Every type of behaviour must be subject to discernment; everything, in fact, depends on one's deepest motivations, which need to be closely examined. Here one enters into the soul of the person and it is a question of reawakening in the hermit, in the Christian, spiritual sensitivity and a "feeling heart", which are gifts from God: "After God, we ought to follow our conscience as a rule and guide in everything," (26/1,5; 1013). In this way one reaches tranquillity of soul, hesychia, by means of which the soul may gaze upon the abyss of the divine mysteries.

The state of quiet, of inner peace, prepares the Hesychast for prayer which in John is twofold: "corporeal prayer" and "prayer of the heart". The former is proper to those who need the help of bodily movement: stretching out the hands, uttering groans, beating the breast, etc. (15, 26; 900). The latter is spontaneous, because it is an effect of the reawakening of spiritual sensitivity, a gift of God to those who devote themselves to corporeal prayer. In John this takes the name "Jesus prayer" (Iesou euche), and is constituted in the invocation of solely Jesus' name, an invocation that is continuous like breathing: "May your remembrance of Jesus become one with your breathing, and you will then know the usefulness of hesychia", inner peace (27/2, 26; 1112). At the end the prayer becomes very simple: the word "Jesus" simply becomes one with the breath.

The last step of the ladder (30), suffused with "the sober inebriation of the spirit", is dedicated to the supreme "trinity of virtues": faith, hope and above all charity. John also speaks of charity as eros (human love), a symbol of the matrimonial union of the soul with God, and once again chooses the image of fire to express the fervour, light and purification of love for God. The power of human love can be reoriented to God, just as a cultivated olive may be grafted on to a wild olive tree (cf. Rm 11: 24) (cf. 15, 66; 893). John is convinced that an intense experience of this eros will help the soul to advance far more than the harsh struggle against the passions, because of its great power. Thus, in our journey, the positive aspect prevails. Yet charity is also seen in close relation to hope: "Hope is the power that drives love. Thanks to hope, we can look forward to the reward of charity.... Hope is the doorway of love.... The absence of hope destroys charity: our efforts are bound to it, our labours are sustained by it, and through it we are enveloped by the mercy of God" (30, 16; 1157). The conclusion of the Ladder contains the synthesis of the work in words that the author has God himself utter: "May this ladder teach you the spiritual disposition of the virtues. I am at the summit of the ladder, and as my great initiate (St Paul) said: "So faith, hope, love abide, these three; but the greatest of these is love' (1 Cor 13: 13)!" (30, 18; 1160).

At this point, a last question must be asked: can the Ladder, a work written by a hermit monk who lived 1,400 years ago, say something to us today? Can the existential journey of a man who lived his entire life on Mount Sinai in such a distant time be relevant to us? At first glance it would seem that the answer must be "no", because John Climacus is too remote from us. But if we look a little closer, we see that the monastic life is only a great symbol of baptismal life, of Christian life. It shows, so to speak, in capital letters what we write day after day in small letters. It is a prophetic symbol that reveals what the life of the baptized person is, in communion with Christ, with his death and Resurrection. The fact that the top of the "ladder", the final steps, are at the same time the fundamental, initial and most simple virtues is particularly important to me: faith, hope and charity. These are not virtues accessible only to moral heroes; rather they are gifts of God to all the baptized: in them our life develops too. The beginning is also the end, the starting point is also the point of arrival: the whole journey towards an ever more radical realization of faith, hope and charity. The whole ascent is present in these virtues. Faith is fundamental, because this virtue implies that I renounce my arrogance, my thought, and the claim to judge by myself without entrusting myself to others. This journey towards humility, towards spiritual childhood is essential. It is necessary to overcome the attitude of arrogance that makes one say: I know better, in this my time of the 21st century, than what people could have known then. Instead, it is necessary to entrust oneself to Sacred Scripture alone, to the word of the Lord, to look out on the horizon of faith with humility, in order to enter into the enormous immensity of the universal world, of the world of God. In this way our soul grows, the sensitivity of the heart grows toward God. Rightly, John Climacus says that hope alone renders us capable of living charity; hope in which we transcend the things of every day, we do not expect success in our earthly days but we look forward to the revelation of God himself at last. It is only in this extension of our soul, in this self-transcendence, that our life becomes great and that we are able to bear the effort and disappointments of every day, that we can be kind to others without expecting any reward. Only if there is God, this great hope to which I aspire, can I take the small steps of my life and thus learn charity. The mystery of prayer, of the personal knowledge of Jesus, is concealed in charity: simple prayer that strives only to move the divine Teacher's heart. So it is that one's own heart opens, one learns from him his own kindness, his love. Let us therefore use this "ascent" of faith, hope and charity. In this way we will arrive at true life.

Steps or Rungs on the Ladder to Heaven

The steps consist of 30 chapters, or "rungs."

In the separation of the spiritual ascent by Evagrius of Pontus and others into the three levels, steps 1 through 3 are the "Break with the world", steps 4 through 26 are the "Active Life", and 27 through 30 are the "Contemplative Life."

The first seven steps and the last seven steps balance each other chiastically, being grouped in groups of four steps followed by three steps.

The sixteen steps in the middle about the vices actually contain 18 different vices, and nine of them are primary vices and the other nine are dependent upon one of the primary vices, though not in a one-for-one correspondence.

1-4: Renouncement of the world

1. Περὶ ἀποταγῆς (On renunciation of the world, or asceticism)
2. Περὶ ἀπροσπαθείας (On detachment)

3. Περί ξενιτείας (On exile or pilgrimage; concerning dreams that beginners have)
4. Περί υπακοής (On blessed and ever-memorable obedience (in addition to episodes involving many individuals))

5–7: Penitence and affliction

5. Περί μετανοίας (On painstaking and true repentance, which constitutes the life of the holy convicts, and about the Prison)
6. Περί μνήμης θανάτου (On remembrance of death)
7. Περί του χαροποιού πένθους (On joy-making mourning)

8–17: Defeat of lower levels of vices

8. Περί αοργησίας (On freedom from anger and on meekness)
9. Περί μνησικακίας (On remembrance of wrongs)
10. Περί καταλαλιάς (On slander or calumny)
11. Περί πολυλογίας και σιωπής (On talkativeness and silence)
12. Περί ψεύδους (On lying)
13. Περί ακηδίας (On despondency)
14. Περί γαστριμαργίας (On that clamorous mistress, the stomach)
15. Περί αγνείας (On incorruptible purity and chastity, to which the corruptible attain by toil and sweat)
16. Περί φιλαργυρίας (On love of money, or avarice)
17. Περί αναισθησίας (On non-possessiveness (that hastens one Heavenwards))

18–23: Avoidance of higher vices that are traps of asceticism

18. Περί ύπνου και προσευχής (On insensibility, that is, deadening of the soul and the death of the mind before the death of the body)
19. Περί αγρυπνίας (On sleep, prayer, and psalmody with the brotherhood)
20. Περί δειλίας (On bodily vigil and how to use it to attain spiritual vigil, and how to practice it)
21. Περί κενοδοξίας (On unmanly and puerile cowardice)
22. Περί υπερηφανείας (On the many forms of vainglory)
23. Περί λογισμών βλασφημίας (On mad pride and (in the same Step) on unclean blasphemous thoughts; concerning unmentionable blasphemous thoughts)

24–26: Highest virtues of the “Active” portion of the Path

24. Περί πραότητος και απλότητος (On meekness, simplicity, and guilelessness, which come not from nature but from conscious effort, and on guile)
25. Περί ταπεινοφροσύνης (On the destroyer of the passions, most sublime humility, which is rooted in spiritual perception)
26. Περί διακρίσεως (On discernment of thoughts, passions and virtues; on expert discernment; brief summary of all aforementioned)

27–29: Acquisition of hesychia, or peace of the soul, leading to God’s Presence

27. Περί ησυχίας (On holy stillness of body and soul; different aspects of stillness and how to distinguish them)
28. Περί προσευχής (On holy and blessed prayer, the mother of virtues, and on the attitude of mind and body in prayer)
29. Περί απαθείας (Concerning Heaven on earth, or Godlike dispassion and perfection, and the resurrection of the soul before the general resurrection)
30. Περί αγάπης, ελπίδος και πίστεως (Concerning the linking together of Charity, Hope, and Faith, the supreme trinity among the virtues; a brief exhortation summarizing all that has said at length in this book)

Isaac of Nineveh (Isaac the Syrian) Syriac Christian Monk
Alexander Golitzen, modern scholar of Early Judaism
What is Heaven? - St Isaac of Syria

St Isaac of Syria's teaching about hell is often quoted especially in Orthodox circles . His understanding of the nature of heaven is a little less well known however. I wanted to share a section from Archbishop Hilarion (Alfeyev's) book "The Spiritual World of Isaac the Syrian" on this subject.

"Though there are many mansions in the kingdom of heaven, none is to be found anywhere except inside that kingdom. Beyond its borders is only Gehenna. Isaac was not aware of any other intermediate state between these two realms:

In the future separation there will be no middle realm between the state that is completely on high and the state that is absolutely below. A person will either belong entirely to those who dwell on high, or entirely to those below; but within both the one state and the other there are diverse degrees of recompense. If this is true, which it most certainly is, what is more senseless and more foolish than those who say that 'It is enough for me to escape Gehenna, I do not seek to enter the kingdom!' For to escape Gehenna means precisely to enter the kingdom, even as falling away from the kingdom is entering Gehenna. Scripture has taught us nothing about the existence of three realms, but 'When the Son of God will come in his glory, he shall set the sheep on his right hand, but the goats on his left'.... How have you not understood by these things that falling short of the order on high is in fact, the Gehenna of torment?

“What then are paradise and Gehenna in Isaac's vision? The blessing of paradise, according to him, is human persons' participation in the love of God- itself 'the tree of life' and 'the heavenly bread':

Paradise is the love of God, wherein is the enjoyment of all blessedness, and there the blessed Paul partook of supernatural nourishment. When he tasted there of the tree of life, he cried out, saying 'Eye hath not seen, nor ear heard, neither have entered into the heart of man the things which God hath prepared for them that love him'. Adam was barred from this tree through the devils counsel. The tree of life is the love of God from which Adam fell away... When we find love, we partake of heavenly bread... The heavenly bread is Christ, who came down from heaven and gave life to the world... Therefore, the man who lives in love reaps the fruit of life from God, and while yet in this world, he even now breathes the air of resurrection; in this air the righteous will find delight in the resurrection.

"God shows us His love for mankind not only when we do good, but also when we offend and displease Him. How patiently He endures our transgressions; and when He chastises, how mercifully He chastises."

The Third Day

The most important work done on the third day was the creation of Paradise. Two gates of carbuncle form the entrance to Paradise,[76] and sixty myriads of ministering angels keep watch over them. Each of these angels shines with the lustre of the heavens. When the just man appears before the gates, the clothes in which he was buried are taken off him, and the angels array him in seven garments of clouds of glory, and place upon his head two crowns, one of precious stones and pearls, the other of gold of Parvaim,[77] and they put eight myrtles in his hand, and they utter praises before him and say to him, "Go thy way, and eat thy bread with joy." And they lead him to a place full of rivers, surrounded by eight hundred kinds of roses and myrtles. Each one has a canopy according to his merits,[78] and under it flow four rivers, one of milk, the other of balsam, the third of wine, and the fourth of honey. Every canopy is overgrown by a vine of gold, and thirty pearls hang from it, each of them shining like Venus. Under each canopy there is a table of precious stones and pearls, and sixty angels stand at the head of every just man, saying unto him: "Go and eat with joy of the honey, for thou hast busied thyself with the Torah, and she is sweeter than honey, and drink of the wine preserved in the grape since the six days of creation,[79] for thou hast busied thyself with the Torah, and she is compared to wine." The least fair of the just is beautiful as Joseph and Rabbi Johanan, and as the grains of a silver pomegranate upon which fall the rays of the sun.[80] There is no light, "for the light of the righteous is the shining light." And they undergo four transformations every day, passing through four states. In the first the righteous is changed into a child. He enters the division for children, and tastes the joys of childhood. Then he is changed into a youth, and enters the division for the youths, with whom he enjoys the delights of youth. Next he becomes an adult, in the prime of life, and he enters the division of men, and enjoys the pleasures of manhood. Finally, he is changed into an old man. He enters the division for the old, and enjoys the pleasures of age.

There are eighty myriads of trees in every corner of Paradise, the meanest among them choicer than all the spice trees. In every corner there are sixty myriads of angels singing with sweet voices, and the tree of life stands in the middle and shades the whole of Paradise.[81] It has fifteen thousand tastes, each different from the other, and the perfumes thereof vary likewise. Over it hang seven clouds of glory, and winds blow upon it from all four sides,[82] so that its odor is wafted from one end of the world to the other. Underneath sit the scholars and explain the Torah. Over each of them two canopies are spread, one of stars, the other of sun and moon, and a curtain of clouds of glory separates the one canopy from the other.[83] Beyond Paradise begins Eden, containing three hundred and ten worlds[84] and seven compartments for seven different classes of the pious. In the first are "the martyr victims of the government," like Rabbi Akiba and his colleagues;[85] in the second those who were drowned;[86] in the third[87] Rabbi Johanan ben Zakkai and his disciples; in the fourth those who were carried off in the cloud of glory;[88] in the fifth the penitents, who occupy a place which even a perfectly pious man cannot obtain; in the sixth are the youths[89] who have not tasted of sin in their lives; in the seventh are those poor who studied Bible and Mishnah, and led a life of self-respecting decency. And God sits in the midst of them and expounds the Torah to them.[90]

As for the seven divisions of Paradise, each of them is twelve myriads of miles in width and twelve myriads of miles in length. In the first division dwell the proselytes who embraced Judaism of their own free will, not from compulsion. The walls are of glass and the wainscoting of cedar. The prophet Obadiah,[91] himself a proselyte, is the overseer of this first division. The second division is built of silver, and the wainscoting thereof is of cedar. Here dwell those who have repented, and Manasseh, the penitent son of Hezekiah, presides over them. The third division is built of silver and gold. Here dwell Abraham, Isaac, and Jacob, and all the Israelites who came out of Egypt, and the whole generation that lived in the desert.[92] Also David is there, together with all his sons[93] except Absalom, one of them, Chileab, still alive. And all the kings of Judah are there, with the exception of Manasseh, the son of Hezekiah, who presides in the second division, over the penitents. Moses and Aaron preside over the third division. Here are precious vessels of silver and gold and jewels and canopies and beds and thrones and lamps, of gold, of precious stones, and of pearls, the best of everything there is in heaven.[94] The fourth division is built of beautiful rubies,[95] and its wainscoting is of olive wood. Here dwell the perfect and the steadfast in faith, and their wainscoting is of olive wood, because their lives were bitter as olives to them. The fifth division is built of silver and gold and refined gold,[96] and the finest of gold and glass and bdellium, and through the midst of it flows the river Gihon. The wainscoting is of silver and gold, and a perfume breathes through it more exquisite than the perfume of Lebanon. The coverings of the silver and gold beds are made of purple and blue, woven by Eve, and of scarlet and the hair of goats, woven by angels. Here dwells the Messiah on a palanquin made of the wood of Lebanon, "the pillars thereof of silver, the bottom of gold, the seat of it purple." With him is Elijah. He takes the head of Messiah, and places it in his bosom, and says to him, "Be quiet, for the end draweth nigh." On every Monday and Thursday and on Sabbaths and holidays, the Patriarchs come to him, and the twelve sons of Jacob, and Moses, Aaron, David, Solomon, and all the kings of Israel and of Judah, and they weep with him and comfort him, and say unto him, "Be quiet and put trust in thy Creator, for the end draweth nigh." Also Korah and his company, and Dathan, Abiram, and Absalom come to him on every Wednesday, and ask him: "How long before the end comes full of wonders? When wilt thou bring us life again, and from the abysses of the earth lift us?" The Messiah answers them, "Go to your fathers and ask them"; and when they hear this, they are ashamed, and do not ask their fathers.

In the sixth division dwell those who died in performing a pious act, and in the seventh division those who died from illness inflicted as an expiation for the sins of Israel.[97]

The Fourth Day

The fourth day of creation produced the sun, the moon, and the stars. These heavenly spheres were not actually fashioned on this day; they were created on the first day, and merely were assigned their places in the heavens on the fourth.[98] At first the sun and the moon enjoyed equal powers and prerogatives.[99] The moon spoke to God, and said: "O Lord, why didst Thou create the world with the letter Bet?" God replied: "That it might be made known unto My creatures that there are two worlds." The moon: "O Lord: which of the two worlds is the larger, this world or the world to come?" God: "The world to come is the larger." The moon: "O Lord, Thou didst create two worlds, a greater and a lesser world; Thou didst create the heaven and the earth, the heaven exceeding the earth; Thou didst create fire and water, the water stronger than the fire, because it can quench the fire; and now Thou hast created the sun and the moon, and it is becoming that one of them should be greater than the other." Then spake God to the moon: "I know well, thou wouldst have me make Thee greater than the sun. As a punishment I decree that thou mayest keep but one-sixtieth of thy light." The moon made supplication: "Shall I be punished so severely for having spoken a single word?" God relented: "In the future world I will restore thy light, so that thy light may again be as the light of the sun." The moon was not yet satisfied. "O Lord," she said, "and the light of the sun, how great will it be in that day?" Then the wrath of God was once more enkindled: "What, thou still plottest against the sun? As thou livest, in the world to come his light shall be sevenfold the light he now sheds." [100] The Sun runs his course like a bridegroom. He sits upon a throne with a garland on his head.[101] Ninety-six angels accompany him on his daily journey, in relays of eight every hour, two to the left of him, and two to the right, two before Him, and two behind. Strong as he is, he could complete his course from south to north in a single instant, but three hundred and sixty-five angels restrain him by means of as many grappling-irons. Every day one looses his hold, and the sun must thus spend three hundred and sixty-five days on his course. The progress of the sun in his circuit is an uninterrupted song of praise to God. And this song alone makes his motion possible. Therefore, when Joshua wanted to bid the sun stand still, he had to command him to be silent. His song of praise hushed, the sun stood still.[102]

The sun is double-faced; one face, of fire, is directed toward the earth, and one of hail, toward heaven, to cool off the prodigious heat that streams from the other face, else the earth would catch afire. In winter the sun turns his fiery face upward, and thus the cold is produced.[103] When the sun descends in the west in the evening, he dips down into the ocean and takes a bath, his fire is extinguished, and therefore he dispenses neither light nor warmth during the night. But as soon as he reaches the east in the morning, he laves himself in a stream of flame, which imparts warmth and light to him, and these he sheds over the earth. In the same way the moon and the stars take a bath in a stream of hail before they enter upon their service for the night.[104]

When the sun and the moon are ready to start upon their round of duties, they appear before God, and beseech him to relieve them of their task, so that they may be spared the sight of sinning mankind. Only upon compulsion they proceed with their daily course. Coming from the presence of God, they are blinded by the radiance in the heavens, and they cannot find their way. God, therefore, shoots off arrows, by the glittering light of which they are guided. It is on account of the sinfulness of man, which the sun is forced to contemplate on his rounds, that he grows weaker as the time of his going down approaches, for sins have a defiling and enfeebling effect, and he drops from the horizon as a sphere of blood, for blood is the sign of corruption.[105] As the sun sets forth on his course in the morning, his wings touch the leaves on the trees of Paradise, and their vibration is communicated to the angels and the holy Hayyot, to the other plants, and also to the trees and plants on earth, and to all the beings on earth and in heaven. It is the signal for them all to cast their eyes upward. As soon as they see the Ineffable Name, which is engraved in the sun, they raise their voices in songs of praise to God. At the same moment a heavenly voice is heard to say, "Woe to the sons of men that consider not the honor of God like unto these creatures whose voices now rise aloft in adoration." [106] These words, naturally, are not heard by men; as little as they perceive the grating of the sun against the wheel to which all the celestial bodies are attached, although the noise it makes is extraordinarily loud.[107] This friction of the sun and the wheel produces the motes dancing about in the sunbeams. They are the carriers of healing to the sick,[108] the only health-giving creations of the fourth day, on the whole an unfortunate day, especially for children, afflicting them with disease.[109] When God punished the envious moon by diminishing her light and splendor, so that she ceased to be the equal of the sun as she had been originally,[110] she fell,[111] and tiny threads were loosed from her body. These are the stars.[112]

Notes

76 Jub. 2. 7; BR 11. 9, 12. 5, 15. 3, 21. 9; 2 Enoch 21. 1. The prevalent view in the rabbinic sources is that paradise was created before the world; comp. Excursus I. In Konen 25 paradise is differentiated from its plants, presupposing that paradise is pre-existent, while the plants were created on the third day. This is an attempt to harmonize two different views.

77 On this gold, comp. Yoma 45a; BaR 11. 3; Tan. B. IV, 33; Tan. Naso 9. In all these passages it is stated that this gold bears fruit. In this and in other accounts of paradise the description of the future Jerusalem and the temple by the prophets is transferred to paradise; for later on paradise was identified with the heavenly Jerusalem. Alphabetot 96-97 contains many points which are analogous to the description given in the text, with this essential difference that the reward of the pious is postponed for the future world. As to the site of the earthly paradise, comp. vol. I, p. 11. The old rabbinic sources hardly contain anything definite on the earthly paradise; but in the Pseudepigraphical literature, particularly in the Books of Enoch (comp. Charles' edition, index, s. v.) and in later haggadic works a good deal is said about it.

78 According to Baba Batra 75a and PR 38, 163a, there are seven "canopies" given to each pious person.

79 These four streams are frequently mentioned in the legends; comp. 2 Enoch 8. 5; PR 38, 163a; Aggadat Shir 4, 83-84; see also vol. I, p. 132; vol. II, p. 315; Visio Pauli 23; Koran 47. 16-17. While in the Koran the stream of oil is replaced by a stream of fresh water, it is just this stream of balsam which is frequently alluded to in rabbinic literature; BR 62 (beginning); Ta'anit 25a; Yerushalmi 'Abodah Zarah 3, 42c; Tan. B. II, 131; Bacher, Agada der palästinensischen Amorer, II, 102, note 7; Jeremias, Babylonisches im NT, 47. On the wine preserved for the pious, comp. Sanhedrin 99a and Matthew 26. 29; Targum Eccl. 9. 7, where the Midrash given in the text was very likely made use of.

80 This picture is mentioned in the Talmud, Baba Mezi'a 48a, with reference to the beauty of R. Johanan, upon which our source is based; comp. PK 1, 3b.

81 I. e., the branches of this tree extend to the farthest ends of paradise. On the joys of the four different ages, which the pious experience, see Zohar I, 140a, where it is explained allegorically.

82 Instead of one word, read ("fanning", from "blew"); the variant seems to be an explanation of the difficult word, which, as a lectio difficilior, deserves preference. On the seven clouds of glory see vol. II, p. 374.

83 Comp. vol. IV, p. 205, with reference to the fragrance of paradise. Concerning the "canopies", see note 78.

84 Concerning these worlds see note 30. According to Zohar I, 125a, Eden is situated in the seventh heaven (according to another view, even above the seventh heaven), and paradise is situated on earth directly opposite to it. Comp. Berakot 34b; Sanhedrin 99a: No eye has ever seen Eden, Adam dwelt in the garden (=paradise) of Eden; comp. note 17, end.

83 The divisions of the dwellers in paradise (or Eden?) into seven classes is very frequently met with (Sifre D., 10 and 47; Midrash Tannaim 6; Tehillim 11, 10, and 16, 128; WR 30. 20; PK 28, 197b; PRK, Schönblum's edition, 36a). In one passage only is the number reduced to three (ARN 43, 120; comp. also note 97). Perhaps the difference of opinion on this point is in some way related to various opinions about the number of the heavens (comp. note 21); each heaven having a separate class of dwellers, the more pious, one is, the higher the heaven in which he dwells. It is said in Shir 6. 8 that sixty groups of the pious study the Torah under the shades of the tree of life, while eighty groups of the average men study the Torah within a short distance from that tree. Mention is often made of the habitations, or rather worlds, which every pious man receives according to his merit; comp. Shabbat 152a; Ruth R. 1, 16; PK 4, 75a; Tehillim 34 (end); ShR 42. 2; Koheleth 12. 5; Baba Batra 75a; 2 Enoch 61. 2; John 14. 2 - "Many Mansions". This view does not conflict with the division of the pious into classes, since the individual, though being one of a class, does not forfeit his independence.—The honor conferred upon R. Akiba and his colleagues as members of the first, i.e., the foremost division, is already mentioned in Baba Batra 10b.

86 I. e., as martyrs during the religious persecutions; comp. Gittin 57b.

87 Comp. Hagigah 14b where this Rabbi describes his disciples as belonging to the "third division".

88 Under these, the descendants of Moses (comp. vol. IV, p. 317) are to be understood.

89 In Berakot 34b two views are cited; according to one, those who repent are considered superior to those who have never sinned, while the other view maintains the opposite case. As to the high esteem in which innocent youths are held, comp. Pesahim 113a. On the study of the Torah under God's guidance, comp. note 194.

90 Perek Gan 'Eden, which is extant in many recensions: Yalkut I, 20 (from a poor text of Yalkut published by Jellinek in BHM II, 52-53, under the wrong title Seder Gan 'Eden); Baraita di-Shemuel 25 (text in manuscript by Rachlin, Bar Levoi, New York, 1906, pp. 82-84); Mahzor Vitry 735. Aggadat Shir and Targum Eccl., and probably also Zohar (comp. notes 79 and 81), seem to have made use of this description of paradise. Most of the legends relating to paradise and hell are attributed to R. Joshua b. Levi, who, according to a well-known tradition, already mentioned in the Talmud (Ketubot 77b), was permitted to enter paradise during his life-time. Hence the description of paradise begins: "R. Joshua b. Levi said: There are eighty myriads of trees in every corner of paradise, etc." In Baraita di-Shemuel, after this description of paradise, there follows in a second chapter another description of the seven divisions of the pious in paradise (comp. note 97). The entire tractate is headed Masseket Gan 'Eden. It is, however, quite obvious from the contents that the two descriptions are of different origin. That a description of hell followed the one of paradise is quite probable, and the designation of the latter as Perek Gan 'Eden clearly points to this direction; but the description of hell found in our text of Baraita di-Shemuel 30-32 (published in BHM I, 147-149), from another source, has been artificially attached to that of paradise. One of the descriptions is purely legendary, while the other is midrashic-haggadic; they therefore must be of different origin.

91 These seven divisions are obviously identical with those previously described. There are many other descriptions of these divisions; comp. note 97. Concerning the proselyte Obadiah, comp. vol. IV, pp. 240-241.

92 The views of the ancient authorities differ on the question whether the "generation of the wilderness" have a portion in the life to come (=paradise); comp. note 177 on vol. III, p. 79.

93 The sentence is to be placed after a different place; hence the translation in the text.

96 According to Yoma 45a, fine gold is the third best among the seven kinds of gold, whereas Parvaim gold (comp. note 77, as well as Masseket Kelim 89) is the very best.

97 Ma'aseh de-R. Joshua b. Levi 48-49. This description is partly (not in its entirety, as Jellinek asserts) incorporated into Konen 28-30, which source is to be used for the establishing of a correct text of Ma'aseh (comp. notes 94-95). Great caution must, however, be taken, since Konen had other sources, along with Ma'aseh, at its disposal for the description of paradise. R. Joshua b. Levi's description of paradise, found in Gaster's Ma'asiyyot 96-97, corresponds to ours in the introductory parts only, in which the adventure of this sage with the angel of death is mentioned (according to Ketubot 77b; comp. note 90), but not in the description of paradise proper. Very characteristic is the fact that this source knows only of three halls of paradise, one of glass, for proselytes; one of silver, for the righteous of Israel (on p. 97, line 24, read; one of gold, in which dwell the three patriarchs and Moses, Aaron, David, "the weeping" Messiah, and Elijah comforting him. On the division of paradise into three, comp. note 85. The most elaborate description of paradise is that given by Jellinek in BHM III, 131-140 (comp. also the additions, 194-198), published under the title of Seder Gan 'Eden. This description has been extensively made use of by kabbalistic authors (comp. Jellinek, Einleitung und Zusätze, as well as Zohar I, 41a; III, 167b) who describe it as a part of the Book of Enoch. It, however, shows traces of speculative mysticism (for instance, great emphasis is laid upon the difference between spirit and soul, on the union of the masculine with the feminine souls which result in the productions of new souls, and on many other views of speculative mysticism), and it therefore could not have originated earlier than the end of the twelfth century. The division of the pious into seven classes is also known to this source, but it differs from the divisions found elsewhere (Perek Gan 'Eden 52-53 and Sha'are Gan 'Eden 42-43 = Baraita di-Shemuel 28-29; comp. note 90). This source is also acquainted with a portion of paradise assigned to women, who, like the men, are divided into seven classes, each of which is under the supervision of some famous woman from biblical times. These are: Bithiah, the foster-mother of Moses, Jochebed, Miriam, Huldah the prophetess, Abigail, the four matriarchs, Sarah, Rebekah, Rachel, Leah. As nine women are given here as heads of seven divisions, the text must therefore be corrected in accordance with Zohar III, 167b. The distinction drawn here between the garden( =paradise) and Eden is old (comp. note 84 and Sha'are Gan 'Eden, loc. cit., where the dwellers of Eden are divided into twelve classes), but this source expresses this distinction in a different manner. To the old mysticism belongs the conception of the 390 heavens and 18000 worlds (comp. note 30), but this source gives a different interpretation of this mystic doctrine. Quite new is the conception of the secret chamber of the Messiah in paradise which is called here, as well as in Zohar II, 8a, by the peculiar name "bird's nest". On the whole, the Messiah plays an important part in this description of the life of the pious in paradise. Old is the view that the pious, particularly the patriarchs and the Messiah, grieve over Israel's suffering, and pray to God for their redemption; Berakot 18b; ShR 15. 26; BaR 19. 15; Tehillim 14, 115; Ekah 2, 11 (in the two last-named passages it is Jacob especially who is most concerned about Israel's suffering); Baba Mezi'a 85b (comp. this passage in vol. IV, p. 219); Mahzor Vitry 17; Pardes 54d; Seder Rashi 22; a kabbalistic source in Yalkut Reubeni on Deut. 23. 3; Tosafot on Sotah 34d (caption V113t4), and the passages cited there from the Talmud; see further PR 12, 46b-47a. Whereas Tehillim 30, 234 and 14 (according to the reading of Makiri, ad. loc., 79, bottom), and PR 2, 5b, state that the pious when dead continually praise God, later sources (PR 198a; BHM V, 43; Recanati on Gen. 3. 24; R. Bahya on Exod. 20. 8; Seder Gan 'Eden 138) maintain that on the Sabbath, festivals, and new-moons the dead rise from their graves, behold the Shekinah, and praise the Lord. Comp. also Zohar II, 8a (which very likely depends upon the Seder Gan 'Eden, loc. cit.); Yalkut Reubeni Gen. 19. 2; vol. III, p. 400. On Korah comp. vol. III, p. 300, and vol. IV, p. 234.—R. Joshua b. Levi is also the author of a description of hell which is given in vol. II, pp. 310, seq. For further details concerning the description of hell and paradise, comp. A fragment of a description of paradise is found in Steinschneider-Festschrift, Hebrew section, 55-56. Comp. also Abkat Rokel, II, 1.

98 Hagigah 12a. The view that the light created on the first day is identical with that of the heavenly bodies is given as that of the majority of scholars. But there are some who maintain that the light of the first day is entirely different from all the other lights. Comp. vol. I, pp. 8-9. Philo, De M. Opif., 3-4, asserts that the ideal world was created on the first day (concerning this explanation of the expression or comp. note 71), whereas the material world appeared on the following days. Similarly a Tanna of the middle of the second century asserts: Everything was created on the first day, except that some things appeared earlier and others later; Tan. B. I, 2; BR 12. 4; Origen on Gen. 2. 2; Ephraim, I, 127C; Basilius Hexaameron, 4. Comp. Ginzberg, Haggada bei den Kirchenv., 24. See also Ginzberg's remarks in R.E.J., LXVI II, 148. On the same view by the philosophers of the middle ages, see Horovitz, Ueber den Einfluss auf den Kalam, 22, note 2. Comp. also note 97 on vol. I, p. 82.

99 God created the sun and the moon in order to give the lie to the heathen who worship them as deities; had God only created one of them, the heathen would have apparently had good reason for adoring it. Similarly Philo, De M. Opif., 14-15; Theophilus 2. 15; Tadshe (beginning), which reads: God first created the plant world and then the heavenly bodies, in order that it should not be said that the latter produced the former; comp. also vol. I, p. 16, where the same idea is expressed with reference to the angels.

100 Konen 25-26, which is based on older sources; comp. BR 6. 3; Hullin 60b; Shebu'ot 9a (the sacrifice of atonement on the new-moon is God's acknowledgement that He dealt too severely with the moon); PRE 4 and 51; Targum Yerushalmi Gen. 1. 16 and Num. 28. 15. These sources, as well as others (Mekilta Bo 1, 3a; PK 5, 54a; PR 15, 78a; Tan. B. II, 47), also speak of the compensation received by the moon for its reduction in size: it became a symbol of Israel and the pious, whereas the sun represents Esau and the ungodly. Moreover the moon is sometimes seen also by day while the sun on the other hand is never seen by night. A reminiscence of the mythological conception of the diminution of the moon (the rationalistic explanation of the Haggadah by Back, Monatsschrift XXIX, 226, seq., must not be taken seriously) as a punishment for its rebellious conduct toward God may be found in Enoch 18. 15, where mention is made of the chastisement of the stars which "did not come at their appointed times". This corresponds to the reproach administered to the moon, mentioned in BR, loc. cit., for having encroached upon the province of its colleague (=the sun), i. e., for having shone during the day. The myth sought to explain the appearance of the moon by day, which, owing to the superiority of the sun over it, was rather baffling to the primitive mind. Hullin, loc. cit., as well as the later addition in BR, does not present the myth in its original form.—That the sun and moon are endowed with wisdom and passion like man is originally a mythological conception which had been maintained for a long time by Jews and Christians. On this conception in Pseudepigraphical literature and Philo, comp. Psalms of Solomon, end (the prayer at the appearance of the new-moon, in present use, which is already found in Sanhedrin 42a, partly corresponds to this psalm); Apocalypse of Baruch 48. 9; Enoch 2, 1-5, 3 (it is more than a poetic description of the order reigning in nature and the lack of order displayed by man); Philo, De Plant. Noe, 3; De Somn. 1, 4 and 2, 16. On the rabbinic sources containing this view, comp., besides the passages referred to at the beginning of this note, also those cited in notes 102, 104, 105, 112. For the Christian sources, see Origen, I, 7; Visio Pauli 4-6. Like the heavenly bodies, even so the earth, the plants, in short, all existing things, were conceived more or less by analogy to man; comp. note 193.—Concerning the motions of the heavenly bodies, the Books of Enoch, as well as the old rabbinic sources, contain a good deal of material which is on the boundary line of mythology and astronomy; comp. Pesahim 94a; Yerushalmi Rosh ha-Shanah 2, 58a; Baba Batra 25a; PK 29, 186a-186b; ER 2, 9-10; Hallel 89; Shir 3. 11; see also the two writings Baraita di-Shemuel and Baraita di-Mazzalot, which are entirely devoted to this subject. Old material is found also in Razi'el, which is particularly instructive for the history of astrology. Of interest is "the case" in which the disc of the sun is inserted, a conception often mentioned in old rabbinic literature as well as in the writings of the Persians and Arabs (comp. Grünbaum, Gesammelte Aufsätze, 145-146). It is noteworthy that this "case" is known in rabbinic sources (BR 6. 6; Koheleth 1. 5; PK 29, 186a; Nedarim 8b; 'Abodah Zarah 3b; Tehillim 19, 168 and 170; Tan. B. II, 98; Tan. Tezawweh 8; Hallel 89; Baraita di-Ma'aseh Bereshit 50) by the Greek word —Concerning the darkness of the sun and the moon, which occupied the minds of the ancients, comp. Mekilta Bo 1. 3a; Tosefta Sukkah 2. 6 and Babli 29a; Derek Erez 2; Nispahim 10; see also the references in note 112, and Index s. v. Eclipse. The view that the light of the sun is seven times as intense as that of the moon (Enoch 72. 37, 73. 2, and 78. 4, as well as 2 Enoch 11, 2) is based on Is. 30. 26. This opinion is also shared by the legend given in the text in accordance with Konen 24-25 concerning the restoration of the light of the moon and the sevenfold increase of the light of the sun in the future. The old midrashic sources (Midrash Tannaim 181; ShR 15. 21; Targum, ad loc.), however, conceive the passage of Is., loc. cit., in a different manner, and according to them the relationship between the light of the sun and that of the moon is 1: 49 or 1: 343. That the sun and the moon had been of equal size, as stated by Enoch 72. 37, is not stated explicitly in rabbinic literature, but the legend given in the text implies it. Similar is the view of modern scientists that the moon was originally an independent planet; comp. See, Researches, II. Like all first things created (comp. vol. I, p. 59), the moon was created in a fully developed form, so that there was full moon on the fourth day of creation; Seder 'Olam 4.

101? PRE 6; Baraita de-Ma'aseh Bereshit 50. The metaphor of the sun as bridegroom is, of course, taken from Ps. 19. 6. It is, however, questionable whether the crown and the wreath (in Hebrew these two things are represented by one word) belong to this conception. The wreath of the bridegroom is Jewish (comp. Sotah 9. 14) but the wreath of the sun may have been borrowed from the Greeks, as the Jews have often seen the image of the sun-god wreathed. The Greek Apocalypse of Baruch knows of the crown of the sun, as well as of its chariot; so also Enoch 75. 8; 2 Enoch 11. 2. Many of the rabbinic sources cited above employ the word 11=710 "chariot", which is, however, rendered "throne", in order to retain the picture of the bridegroom.

102 MHG I, 41-42; PRE 6; Tehillim 19, 168-170; Baraita deMa'aseh Bereshit 50; Koheleth 86; 'Aseret ha-Dibrot 64; Zohar Hadash on Gen. 4, 19b; 2 Enoch 11. 4; Greek Apocalypse of Baruch 6. Comp. also vol. I, p. 132. The song of praise of the heavenly bodies is partly based on Ps. 19, but presupposes also an acquaintance with the Pythagorean doctrine (perhaps of oriental origin) of the music of the spheres. The original text of Enoch 41. 7 very likely read "And they give thanks and they glorify; they would cease to exist if they would not praise." In consequence of the similarity between the letters 11 and n, the translator was misled into making the text say just the opposite. With regard to the music of the spheres, Philo, De Car., 3, refers to it in the very words which remind one of the anonymous Midrash quoted in Hadar, Deut. 32. 1. Comp. also DR 10. 1 and 2; Yelammedenu in Yalkut I, 729. See further vol. I, pp. 44, seq. The song of praise of the sun and moon did not strike the naive mind as strange, in view of the fact that the surfaces of these luminaries resemble the human countenance; comp. R. Benjamin b. Zerah (about 1050) in his piyyut num 11715tV4n the Roman and German Mahzor (comp. Zunz, Literaturgeschichte, 121), who undoubtedly made use of a version of Mid-rash Konen different from ours, but which Treves still had before him in his commentary on the Roman Mahzor entitled Kimha Dabishuna, ad loc. The human countenance of the sun is also referred to in the Greek Apocalypse of Baruch 6. Comp. also the preceding note as well as note 112 and note 6 on vol. IV, p. 4.

103 PRE 6; Baraita de-Ma'aseh Bereshit. See also 2 Enoch 37. 2. In the Midrashim (BR 5. 6; Koheleth 1. 5; Tehillim 19, 170; Baraita de-Ma'aseh Bereshit, loc. cit.) it is said that the sun is led through a stream, which is put up for that purpose in heaven, before it starts its revolution, to cool off its heat; otherwise it might consume the earth.

104 PRE 51 and 6; Baraita de-Ma'aseh Bereshit 50. The moon and the stars have light but no heat, and hence the "bath of hail". On the stream of fire in which the sun bathes, comp. also Enoch 17. 4 and Baba Batra 84a. The latter passage reads: The sun passes paradise in the morning and hell in the evening. Dawn is a reflection of the roses of paradise; the evening twilight of the fire of hell. The stream of fire in which the sun bathes, is identical with the Nehar di-Nur; comp. Luria on PRE 51 and note 62.

105 WR 31. 9; Tehillim 19, 169; ER 2, 11; MHG I, 42; Alphabetot 118; Baraita de-Ma'aseh Bereshit 50. Quite similar is the statement of the Greek Apocalypse of Baruch 8 to the effect that the angels remove the crown of the sun in the evening, bring it to heaven, and "renew" it there (the "renewing" of creation every day is also alluded to in the morning prayer, at the end of Yozer, comp. note 6), because the sun and its rays are becoming defiled on earth. With regard to the compulsory motion of the heavenly bodies, which do not wish to shed their light upon a sinful world, comp. vol. III, pp. 197-298; vol. IV, p. 309. In Visio Pauli 4-6, the sun, moon, stars, and the sea implore God to grant them the power to destroy the sinners. There is a widespread view, which is based on Deut. 31. 28, to the effect that the earth, the heaven, and the heavenly bodies bear witness for and against man, according to his actions; comp. Enoch 1. 7; Sifre D., 306; 'Abodah Zarah 3a. The following legend is quoted by many medieval authors (Mahzor Vitry 373; Zohar III, 275a; Sefer Mizwot Gadol, 42nd positive precept; Kaneh in Yalkut Reubeni I, 16, 8b) from an unknown midrashic source which reads: Whenever Satan brings accusations against Israel on the New Year, the day when God sits down to judge the whole universe, God commands him to produce witnesses in support of his accusations. But he can only secure one witness on that day, the sun, because the moon is invisible at that time; but when Satan appears ten days later, on the Day of Atonement, with his second witness, he is informed by the Lord that Israel repented of their sins during the ten days of penitence and that they were pardoned. Satan fares still worse in the legend given in PR 45, 185b-186a, according to which, while Satan is searching for more sins, God removes sins from the balance in which the good and evil deeds are weighed. On the appearance of the heavenly bodies, before and after their daily course, before God, comp. Baba Batra 25a and vol. III, p. 116.

106 Zohar Hadash Bereshit 4, 23a (on Gen. 2. 8); that God's name is engraved in the sun is already mentioned in PRE 6, as well as in the Baraita de-Ma'aseh Bereshit 50; whereas according to the Greek Apocalypse of Baruch 6, the bird running before the sun (comp. vol. I, p. 32) bears on its body an inscription of golden letters. In the old Midrashim (Tan. B. II, 112; Kinyan Torah; introduction to Ekah 2; Tan. Ki-Tissa 16; PK 15, 121a; ShR 41. 6) it is said that a heavenly voice proclaims daily on mount Horeb: "Woe to mankind for contempt of the Torah." The revelation which took place on Sinai-Horeb is a constant accusation against mankind for not walking in God's path, despite the Torah that was given to them. Similarly the daily appearance of the sun also is a constant accusation against the sinners who do not recognize their Creator.

107 BR 6. 7; ShR 5. 9; Koheleth Z. 86; Shemuel 9, 74; Yotna 20b-21a; PRE 34. On the grating of the sun against its wheel, comp. Sachs, Beitrage, I, 50; Perles, Etymologische Studien, 72; Grünbaum, Gesammelte Aufsätze, 145. This has nothing to do with the music of the spheres, despite the statement of Maimonides, Guide of the Perplexed, II, 8, and Zohar Hadash Bereshit 4. The old Jewish sources are not acquainted with the conception of the music of the spheres; comp. note 102. As to the noises which resound throughout the universe but are nevertheless inaudible to man, a good deal more is mentioned in the sources just quoted. These noises are at the birth and death of man, at the first sexual intercourse, as well as at the time of divorce, the felling of a fruitful tree and the sloughing of the skin of a serpent, the falling of rain (Yoma loc. cit., reads more accurately: the roaring of the taurine angel when he causes the water from the lower abyss to be poured into the upper abyss; comp. Ta'anit 25b; Baraita de-Ma'aseh Bereshit 49; Seder Rabba di-Bereshit 10; Responsen der Geonim, Harkavy's edition, No. 289. p. 142); finally there resounds out of Rome such a loud voice, that were it not for the grating of the sun, it would have been audible all over the world. In these sources mythological conceptions, as, for instance, the roaring of the taurine angel of the abyss, which is merely the Jewish recast of the Babylonian belief about the god "Ea", are found side by side with purely poetical images. As to the loud voice which resounds at the time of a divorce, comp. Index s. v. Divorce. See also vol. I, p. 59.

In the middle ages Monday (comp. vol. I, p. 15) and Wednesday were considered as unlucky days, and there is an accepted rule "one should not begin any undertaking on Monday or Wednesday". Briill, Jahrbilcher, IX, 5 (comp. also ibid., 66), accepts the explanation found in a manuscript, according to which the belief is due to the fact that 12 in Persian signifies "bad"; but this explanation is rather far-fetched.

110 Comp. vol. I, pp. 23-24.

111 It is not on earth but in heaven where the moon slipped in its terror of the punishment which was pronounced.

112 Hadar on Gen. 1. 16, which cites an unknown midrashic source; Toledot Yizhak on Gen., loc. cit., which is very likely based on Hadar. According to this legend, the word "stars" is connected with the word "was extinguished"; the light of the moon was dimmed because some of her parts fell off. On the etymology of "sun", and "moon", see Konen 25-26. The text of this passage is to be corrected in accordance with Zohar Hadash Bereshit 4, 19b) "servant of man". Jellinek emended it correctly without having known the parallel passage.—In the legends concerning the sun, moon, and the stars it is presupposed that these luminaries are endowed with consciousness and intelligence. This idea, as pointed out in note 100, was so widespread among the ancients that Maimonides, Guide of the Perplexed, II, 5 (comp. also Yad haHazzakah, Yesode ha-Torah, 3. 9), was justified in referring to the Haggadah as support for his doctrine which he borrowed from the Greeks, that the heavenly bodies were endowed with intelligence. Philo, De Plan. Noe, 3 and De Somn., 4, likewise calls attention to the agreement among the Jews and the Greeks concerning this view. It should, however, be observed that in the liturgy, at least as far as the old prayers are concerned, the conception of the heavenly bodies as intelligent or animate beings is entirely ignored, though the opportunity has frequently presented itself to make use of this idea, as, for instance, in the morning and evening prayer, in the passages of Yozer and Ma' crib 'Arabim. On the passages in Pseudepigraphical literature stating that the heavenly bodies are endowed with life and senses, comp. note 100, as well as Enoch 41. 5, and the passages cited by Charles. Not only Enoch 18. 13-16, but also the Talmud (Mo'ed Katan 16a) speaks of "rebellious" stars; comp. also vol. IV, p. 36, on Meroz (Jud. 5. 23). On the eclipse of the moon and sun comp. note 100. See further Philo, De M. OW., 19, and Steinschneider in Magazin fur Literatur d. Auslands, 1845, No. 80. Concerning the material of which the sun and moon were made very little is found in the Haggadah; according to Konen 25 the moon consists of light, the sun of fire. The statement made in the Greek Apocalypse of Baruch 9 to the effect that the moon has the likeness of a woman (in the original myth she must have been the wife of the sun) is unknown in Jewish sources. On the human form of the moon, however, see note 102. Comp. further Index, s.v. "Man in the Moon".

Discourse XIII - Of Christ's Resurrection

In what it consists—how Christ's resurrection takes place in us, and in it the resurrection of the soul. The mystery of this resurrection. Delivered on the Monday of the second week of Easter.

The Day Of Resurrection

Brethren and fathers,

Already Easter, that joyful day, that day of all gladness and delight, the day of Christ's resurrection, has arrived in the circle of the year. But rather, it happens daily and eternally in those who know its mystery, and so has filled our hearts with unspeakable joy and gladness. Likewise it has broken off the labor of the all-holy fast, or, rather, it has perfected our souls and encouraged them as well. So, as you see, it has come and invited all the faithful together to rest and to thanksgiving. Let us therefore give thanks to the Lord, who has brought us over the sea (Wis. 10:18) of Lent and led us with joy into the harbor of His resurrection. Let us give thanks to Him, both those who have nobly and zealously completed the course of Lent with fervent resolve and struggles of virtue, and those of us as well who have been weak in this matter through neglect and weakness of soul. He it is who in great generosity gives crowns to the zealous and duly rewards their labors, and also in mercy and loving-kindness grants forgiveness to the weaker. He sees the dispositions and intentions of our souls rather than the labors of our bodies, by which we exercise ourselves in virtue, whether we increase our asceticism out of eagerness of soul or practice less than the zealous ones because of the weakness of our bodies. According to our intentions He measures out the prizes and the gifts of the Spirit to each one, whether He grants fame and glory to one who is zealous or leaves him still in lowliness and in need of more strenuous purification.

Christ's Resurrection Mystically Reproduced In Us

But, if you will, let us look and carefully examine what is the mystery of that resurrection of Christ our God which takes place mystically in us at all times, if we are willing, and how Christ is buried in us as in a tomb and how He unites Himself to our souls and rises again, and raises us with Himself. Such is the aim of our discourse.

Christ our God was hanged on the cross and nailed on it (cf. Cot 2:14) the sin of the world. He tasted death (Heb. 2:9) and went down to the uttermost depths of hell (d: Eph. 4:9). Again, He returned from hell into His own spotless body, from which He had in no way been separated as He descended thither, and forthwith He arose from the dead. After that He ascended into heaven with great glory and power (Mt 24:30). So, likewise, as we have now come out of the world and entered into the tomb of repentance and humiliation by being assimilated to the sufferings of the Lord (Rom. 6:5; 2 Con 1:5; Phil. 3:10), He Himself comes down from heaven and enters into our body as into a tomb. He unites Himself to our souls and raises them up, though they were undoubtedly dead, and then grants to him who has thus been raised with Christ that he may see the glory of His mystical resurrection.

Union With The Mystical Reality

Christ's resurrection is thus our resurrection, ours who lie here below. He who has never fallen into sin (Heb. 4:15, 7:26), as it is written, nor lost anything whatever of His own glory, how will He ever be raised up or be glorified, since He is always glorified above all and remains the same, "far above all rule and authority (Eph. 1:21)? As has been said, Christ's resurrection and His glory are our glory. Through His resurrection in us it comes into being in us, is shown to us, and is seen by us. Once He has appropriated what is ours, that which He works in us He attributes to Himself. The resurrection of the soul is union with life. The body is dead and cannot live or be called alive unless it receives the living soul in itself and is joined to it, though not mingled with it. Likewise the soul cannot live unless it is ineffably and without confusion united to God, who is truly the life eternal (cf 1 John 5:20). Before this union in knowledge, vision, and perception it is dead, even though it is endowed with intellect and is by nature immortal. There is no knowledge without vision, nor vision without knowledge. This is what I want to say—there is vision, and in the vision there is knowledge and perception; but I say this about spiritual things, for in the physical realm there is perception even apart from vision. What do I mean? A blind man who hits his foot against a stone feels it, but a dead man does not. But in spiritual things, unless the mind comes to the contemplation of the things that are above thought, it does not perceive the mystical activity. He who has not arrived at contemplation in spiritual matters and claims that he perceives the things that are above intellect, word, and thought is like him whose eyes are blinded and who has a sensation of good or bad things that he experiences, but does not know what is in his hands or at his feet, even if they are for him a matter of life or death. Since he is deprived of the faculty and perception of vision he in no way perceives the bad or the good things that come upon him. Thus he will often lift up his staff to ward off his enemy and possibly strike his friend instead, while his enemy stands before his eyes and laughs at him.

Who Is Able To Experience The Resurrection

Most men believe in the resurrection of Christ, but very few have a clear vision of it. Those who have no vision thereof cannot even adore Christ Jesus as the Holy One and as Lord. As it is written, "No one can say, 'Jesus is Lord,' except by the Holy Spirit" (I Cot. 12:3), and, elsewhere, "God is spirit, and those who worship Him must worship in spirit and truth" (Jn. 4:24). That most sacred formula which is daily on our lips does not say, "Having believed in Christ's resurrection," but, "Having beheld Christ's resurrection, let us worship the Holy One, the Lord Jesus, who alone is without sin." How then does the Holy Spirit urge us to say, "Having beheld Christ's resurrection," which we have not seen, as though we had seen it, when Christ has risen once for all a thousand years ago, and even then without anybody's seeing it? Surely Holy Scripture does not wish us to lie? Far from it! Rather, it urges us to speak the truth, that the resurrection of Christ takes place in each of us who believes, and that not once, but every hour, so to speak, when Christ the Master arises in us, resplendent in array (cf Ps. 93A) and flashing with the lightnings of incorruption and Deity. For the light-bringing coming of the Spirit shows forth to us, as in early morning, the Master's resurrection, or, rather, it grants us to see the Risen One Himself. Therefore we say, "The Lord is God, and He has given us light" (Ps. 118:27), and we allude to His second Coming and add these words, "Blessed is He that cometh in the Name of the Lord" (Ps. 118:26). Those to whom Christ has given light as He has risen, to them He has appeared spiritually, He has been shown to their spiritual eyes. When this happens to us through the Spirit He raises us up from the dead and gives us life. He grants us to see Him, who is immortal and indestructible. More than that, He grants clearly to know Him who raises us up (cf. Eph. 2:6) and glorifies us (Rom. 8:17) with Himself, as all the divine Scripture testifies.

A Faith That Lives In Deeds

These, then, are the divine mysteries of Christians. This is the hidden power of our faith, which unbelievers, or those who believe with difficulty, or rather believe in part, do not see nor are able at all to see (1 Tim. 6:16). Unbelievers, those who believe with difficulty, or believe in part, are those who do not show their faith through works. Apart from works the demons also believe (Jos. 2:19) and confess Christ to be God and Master. "We know who you are" (Mk. 1:24), they say, "you are the Son of God" (Mt 8:29), and elsewhere, "These men are the servants of the Most High God" (Acts 16:17). Yet such faith will not benefit the demons, nor even humans. This faith is of no use, for it is dead, as says the divine apostle, "Faith apart from works is dead" (Jas. 2:26), just like works without faith. How is it dead? Because it has not in itself God who gives life (1 Tim. 6:13). It has not laid hold of Him who said, "He who loves Me will keep My commandments, and I and the Father will come and make Our home with him" (in. 14:21, 23), so that by His coming He may raise from the dead him who has attained faith and give him life, and grant him to see Him who has risen in him and who has raised him up. For this reason such faith is dead, or, rather, they are dead who have faith apart from works. Faith in God is always alive, and since it is living it gives life to those who come with a good intention and receive it. Even before they have practiced the commandments it has brought many out of death into life and has shown them Christ our God. Had they persevered in His commandments and kept them until death they too would have been preserved by them—that is, in the state to which faith alone had brought them. But since they "turned aside like a bent bow" (Ps. 78:57) and speared themselves on their former actions, they inevitably at once made shipwreck of their faith (1 Tim. 1:19) and miserably deprived themselves of the true riches, who is Christ our God.

So I urge you, let us keep God's commandments with all our might, so that we may not share in their fate, but enjoy both present and future blessings, that is, the very vision of Christ. To this may we all attain through the grace of our Lord Jesus Christ, to whom be glory forever. Amen.

DISCOURSE XVI - Ecstasy In The Light

On the activities of the Holy Spirit. The contemplation of His mysteries. How they are revealed to the pure in heart. A useful preliminary account of a young monk who received the Holy Spirit at the prayers of his spiritual father.

The Story Of A Novice—The Pursuit Of The Light

Brethren and fathers and children,

A young man has told me this story:

"I was the apprentice of a venerable father, of one who was equal to the great and exalted saints. From him I often heard of divine illuminations sent from heaven to those engaged in the spiritual struggle, consisting in a flood of light, and conversations between God and man thereby, and I marveled. So great", said he, "was my desire and longing for such a blessing that as I thought thereof I forgot all things earthly and heavenly, to the extent even of eating and drinking and bodily relief.

"This man, however, was a great saint (he is now among the saints!), a man endowed with the gift of prophecy. When he saw me carrying out the things that he enjoined on me to the exclusion even of eating and drinking, wholly absorbed in myself and as though I was wasting away through some poison, out of endless compassion he gave me a strict command and so, unwillingly, I ate, for," as he said. "I was afraid of being charged with disobedience. The more I partook of food, the more the fire consumed me and I could not bear the constraint. I poured out tears like rivers and so I often left the table. In my senselessness I thought that he was setting obstacles in the way of my desire out of ignorance of the great pain that I suffered within. In this state I, miserable wretch, did not know that he was aware even of the hidden thoughts of my heart, as will appear from what follows.

"It happened one day that we were going into the city<sup>2</sup> in which he had his dwelling, in order that we might visit his spiritual children. We spent the whole day among them, for there were many whom he helped even by his mere presence. At evening we came back to our cell, hungry and thirsty from much labor and the heat, for, however hot the day, he would never take the slightest nap, in spite of his age, though he was about sixty years old. When we sat down to partake of some bread I did not eat, for I was worn out by fatigue. I thought that if I were to take food and drink I should not at all be able to stand for prayer and seek what I desired. These," said he, "were my thoughts, as I was sitting, as though I were beside myself."

The Counsels Of Symeon The Pious

"When the saint saw me and considered the labor that I had endured with him he realized why I had undergone these things, since, as I have mentioned, he was endowed with prophetic insight. Moved with great compassion he spoke to me and strictly commanded me, 'Eat, my child, and drink, and from henceforth be not sad. Had not God willed to have mercy upon you, it would not have pleased Him that you should come to us.' So we ate," said he, "and drank, and more than we needed, for he too ate to put himself on the level of my weakness. Then when the meal was finished he said to me, 'Know this, my boy, that it is neither fasting, nor vigil, nor bodily effort, nor any other laudable action that pleases God so that He appears to us, but only a soul and heart that is humble, simple, and good.' When I heard this I marveled at the words and the admonition of the holy man. More than ever I was burning with ardor. With keenness of mind I called to mind in a single instant all my sins and was flooded with tears. I fell at his holy feet and laid hold of them and said, 'Pray for me, O saint of God, that I may find mercy through you, for none of the good things that you have mentioned belong to me, but only many sins, as you well know.' The holy man showed me even more compassion and shed tears. Then he bade me rise from the ground and said, 'I am confident that God, who has bestowed abundant grace on me, will bestow a double portion thereof on you simply because of the faith you show toward Him and toward my humble self.' So I received this word as though it came from God Himself and thought of that which Elijah did to Elisha (2 Kings 2:9-10). I believed that however unworthy I was, yet God is gracious to men, and quick to fulfill the desire of those who fear Him (Ps. 145:19). So again I made a bow of reverence and asked for his prayer and departed for my cell, having been told by him merely to recite the Trisagion<sup>3</sup> and go to sleep."

The Light And The Ecstasy

"So I entered the place where I usually prayed and, mindful of the words of the holy man I began to say, 'Holy God.' At once I was so greatly moved to tears and loving desire for God that I would be unable to describe in words the joy and delight I then felt. I fell prostrate on the ground, and at once I saw, and behold, a great light was immaterially shining on me and seized hold of my whole mind and soul, so that I was struck with amazement at the unexpected marvel and I was, as it were, in ecstasy. Moreover I forgot the place where I stood, who I was, and where, and could only cry out, 'Lord, have mercy,' so that when I came to myself I discovered that I was reciting this. But Father," said he, "who it was that was speaking, and who moved my tongue, I do not know—only God knows. 'Whether I was in the body, or outside the body' (2 Car. 12:2, 3), I conversed with this Light. The Light itself knows it; it scattered whatever mist there was in my soul and cast out every earthly care. It expelled from me all material denseness and bodily heaviness that made my members to be sluggish and numb. What an awesome marvel! It so invigorated and strengthened my limbs and muscles, which had been faint through great weariness, that it seemed to me as though I was stripping myself of the garment of corruption. Besides, there was poured into my soul in unutterable fashion a great spiritual joy and perception and a sweetness surpassing every taste of visible objects, together with a freedom and forgetfulness of all thoughts pertaining to this life. In a marvelous way there was granted to me and revealed to me the manner of the departure from this present life. Thus all the perceptions of my mind and my soul were wholly concentrated on the ineffable joy of that Light"

The Pain Caused By The Withdrawal Of The Light

"But when that infinite Light which had appeared to me—for I can call it by no other fitting or appropriate name," so he continued, "in some way had gently and gradually faded and, as it were, had withdrawn itself, I regained possession of myself and realized what its power had suddenly done to me. I reflected on its departure and considered how it had left me again to be alone in this life. So severe was the grief and pain that overcame me that I am at a loss properly to describe how great it was: A varied and most vehement pain was kindled like a fire in my heart. Imagine, father, if you can," said he, "the pain of being separated from it, the infinity of love, the greatness of my passion, the sublimity of this greatest of blessings! I on my part cannot express in words or comprehend with my mind the infinity of this vision."

The Enjoyment Of Such A Light

"But tell me, most venerable father and brother," said I, "more clearly and exactly what were the effects of what you have seen." But that dear man, full of the divine Spirit, who had been found worthy of such contemplation, at once replied with a voice most gentle and flowing like honey, "Father, when it appears it fills one with joy, when it vanishes it wounds. It happens close to me and carries me up to heaven. It is a pearl [of great price] (Mt 13:96). The light envelops me and appears to me like a star, and is incomprehensible to all. It is radiant like the sun, and I perceive all creation encompassed by it. It shows me all that it contains, and enjoins me to respect my own limits. I am hemmed in by roof and walls, yet it opens the heavens to me. I lift up my eyes sensibly to contemplate the things that are on high, and I see all things as they were before. I marvel at what has happened, and I hear a voice speaking to me secretly from on high, 'These things are but symbols and preliminaries, for you will not see that which is perfect as long as you are clothed in flesh. But return to yourself and see that you do nothing that deprives you of the things that are above. Should you fall, however, it is to recall you to humility! Do not cease to cultivate penitence, for when it is united to My love for mankind it blots out past and present failures.'"

When I had heard these things from him, fathers and brethren, I was almost ecstatic and trembled all over. I noted at once the great height of contemplation and knowledge to which he had readily ascended, solely because he loved and trusted his spiritual father. From mere beginnings he had been granted to see and enjoy such great blessings, as if he had already cast human weakness aside and become an angel instead of a man.

The Pursuit Of Purity Of Heart

I therefore entreat you, brethren in Christ, let us cast far from us every attachment and every care of this present life. Let us hate the pleasures of the flesh, bodily comfort, slackness, and idleness, by which that which is worse prevails over that which is better. Come, let us arm ourselves with genuine faith (cf. Eph. 6:16) toward God and toward our fathers and teachers who live - according to God. Let us acquire a contrite heart, a soul humbled in mind, and a heart that by means of tears and repentance is pure from every stain and defilement of sin. So shall we too be found worthy in due time quickly to rise to such heights that even here and now we may see and enjoy the ineffable blessings of the divine light, if not perfectly, at least in part, and to the extent to which we are able. So shall we both unite ourselves to God and God will be united to us. To those who come near us we shall become "light" and "salt" (cf Mt. 5:13-14) to their great benefit in Christ Jesus our Lord, to whom be glory forever. Amen.

DISCOURSE XXX - On Penitence

On penitence and the beginning of a life that is worthy of praise. How he who is penitent ought to behave every day. Of tears and compunction.

How Not To Lose The Kingdom Of Heaven

But if you are ignorant of the things I have told you, and do not even know whether you have sown in your ground—I mean the ground of your heart—any of the more excellent fruits, what good has it done you to encompass the ends of the earth and to go to the furthest parts of the sea (Ps. 139:9)? None whatever! Even if I show mercy to the whole world by giving what is not my own—even if it were my own—but ignore my nakedness and poverty (cf. Rev. 3:17), and have reached the extremity of destitution and so am about to die destitute of all goodness and to stand before the awesome judgment seat of Christ (Rom. 14:10), what good is it? We must depart from this life and from the body fully clothed and equipped if we wish to go in to the wedding feast of the king and to sit at table with his friends (cf. Mt. 22:11 ff). With what garment must I and indeed everybody be clothed, so that we may not be found naked on that day (cf 2 Con 5:2f)? Brethren, it is Christ (cf. Rom. 13:14) our God! Supposing I were to travel on a pilgrimage through all the earth under heaven as if it were a single house, without omitting any country or city or failing to enter any church to worship and pray there and carefully and accurately examine everything that is in them. Yet were I to lose the kingdom of heaven, would it not have been better for me never to have been born (Mk. 14:21; Mt 26:24) or to have fallen on the ground (Wis. 7:3), or to have breathed the air or seen the sun with my eyes? Indeed, it would have been far better for me!

What then shall I do, so that I may not fall out of it? If I were to practice all the things that I have mentioned, I would receive the Holy Ghost, for He is the seed of Christ, through which we poor mortals become Christ's kin. When it falls into the good soil it "bears fruit thirtyfold and sixtyfold and hundredfold" (Mk. 4:20), and this very thing is the kingdom of heaven. Apart from this all other things are useless. Brethren, if we fail to take pity on ourselves and through penitence find our souls purified and filled with light, the practice of all other things will avail us nothing, as our Lord and God tells us, "What will it profit a man, if he gains the whole world and loses his soul? Or what shall a man give in return for his soul?" (Mt 16:26). Again He says, "He who loses his life for my sake will find it, but he who finds it will lose it" (Mt. 10:39). If I do not lose my soul in the former way, as I have said, by giving myself to death for Christ's sake, and find it again alive with eternal life, what will I have been profited by all other things, friends and brethren? Nothing at all! Nothing will profit us at all, beloved servants of Christ; nothing will snatch us from eternal fire if we do not forsake all things and all people and take heed to ourselves alone!

DISCOURSE XXXI - SELF-EXAMINATION ON THE BEATITUDES

How every man ought to watch over himself and carefully examine that which concerns him. How one ought to compare one's conduct with the commandments of Christ.

Examination Of One's Self

Brethren and fathers,

In the preceding catechesis, when we left our subject incomplete in order that we might avoid prolonging our discourse to excess, we were discussing what it is to watch over oneself. Now we have come to pay the debt of the discourse we owe you by the present catechesis. It is for this purpose that we have been appointed to this position. We are always obliged to supply to your charity the due measure (cf Lk. 12:42) of the word.

What is it to take heed to oneself and to watch over oneself as we have mentioned before? That everyone should take heed to himself consists in this: that he says to himself: "Is there not some passion that has control over me? For, as I hear in the divine Scriptures, he who has even one passion only does not enter into the kingdom of heaven, for it is written, 'If a man keep the whole law, but fails in one point, he has become guilty of all of it'" (Jas. 2:10). Similarly, to watch over oneself consists in this, that one says to oneself, "Have I not neglected this commandment or that? Am I careless about it, do I ignore it and fail to practice it?" For Christ our God says, "Not an iota, not a dot, will pass from the law of My commandments until all is accomplished" (Mt. 5:8). Again He says, "He who breaks one of the least of these commandments and teaches men to do so shall be called least in the kingdom of heaven" (Mt. 5:19).

Humility

But we must be even more attentive to the divine Scriptures. While they are being read a man ought to look at himself, and reflect on his soul as in a mirror (Jas. 1:23). In what state is it? What do I mean? A man hears the Lord say, "Repent, for the kingdom of heaven is at hand" (Mt. 4:17). He must therefore call to mind how he spends his days. If he is duly penitent he will increase and prolong his work; if he is negligent he will mend his ways.

Again he hears Him say, "Blessed are the poor in spirit, for theirs is the kingdom of heaven" (Mt. 5:3). He must then constantly examine and test himself (cf 1 Cor. 11:28) on every occasion of humiliation—I mean, when he is insulted, dishonored, treated with contempt. He must look at himself, whether or not the virtue of humility be found in him, for he who has acquired it bears all things without being pained or burdened. Nothing that happens to him wounds his heart. If he is slightly wounded thereby, yet he is not completely disturbed; on the contrary he afflicts himself and counts himself worthless because of that wound of his heart, because he was even slightly grieved instead of receiving with joy that which happened to him. He is grieved and weeps as he enters into the inner chamber (Mt. 6:6) of his soul or into his cell. So he falls down before God and makes confession to Him, as though he had wholly lost his own life.

Being Afflicted

Then again he hears. "Blessed are those who mourn" (Mt. 5:4). Note that He does not say, "Those who have mourned," but "those who constantly mourn." Here too we must examine whether we mourn daily. For if we become humble from penitence, it is clear that not one day or night will pass for us with, out tears and mourning and compunction.

Meekness

And again (he hears), "Blessed are the meek" (Mt. 5:5). Is there anyone who mourns every day who can continue to live in a state of anger and not become meek? Just as a flame of fire is extinguished by water (cf Sir. 3:30), so anger of soul is quenched by mourning and tears; so much so that a man who has spent a long time being irascible sees the temper of his soul changed and transformed into total calm. Therefore a man must look at himself in this respect as well, to see whether he is truly meek. He who is this cannot in any way bear to see the transgression of God's commandment, but laments over those who commit sin as though he himself had committed it.

Hunger For Righteousness

Then likewise (he should examine himself) whether he hungers and thirsts for God's righteousness (Mt. 5:6). It is admittedly possible, if one searches, to find a person who is righteous, yet does not hunger and thirst for it. It is God who is righteousness (cf. 1 Co., 1:30), just as you hear him called "the sun of righteousness" (Mal. 4:2). So he who hungers and thirsts for Him counts the whole world and the things in it as refuse (Phil. 3:8). As for the honors of princes, he either counts them a disgrace, or else has no regard for human honors.

Mercy

And again, "Blessed are the merciful" (Mt. 5:7). Who, then, are the merciful? Those who give money or feed the poor? No. But who are they? Those who have become poor for the sake of Him who became poor for our sakes (cf 2 Cor. 8:9). They have nothing to give, yet they are constantly spiritually mindful of the poor, the widows, the orphans (cf. Jas. 1:27), and those who are sick. As they see them frequently, they have compassion on them and weep warm tears over them. Such was Job when he said, "I wept over every one who was infirm" (Job 30:25 LXX). Whenever they have anything they gladly give alms to them (cf. Rom. 12:8), and also generously remind them all of the things that serve for the salvation of their souls, by obeying Him who said, "I learned without guile and I impart without grudging" (Wis. 7-13). These are the ones whom the Lord calls blessed, those who are truly merciful; for it is from such mercy, as from a step, that they climb in order to reach perfect purity of the soul.

The Pure And Peaceful Heart

Following this, and on this basis God calls blessed those whose heart is pure, in that He says, "Blessed are the pure of heart, for they shall see God" (Mt. 5:8). He, our God and Lawgiver, knows that unless our soul attains to such a disposition it can neither constantly mourn nor become perfectly meek, nor yet thirst for God (Mt. 5:4-6), nor yet become pure as a mirror. But if it fails to become so, it will never contemplate the Master's face in itself. The soul, however, who has attained to this sees God from every (side) and is reconciled to Him (cf. Rom. 5:10). Peace is established between our Maker and God on the one hand and the soul that was once hostile to Him on the other, and it is then called blessed by God for having made peace, for He says, "Blessed are the peacemakers, for they shall be called sons of God" (Mt. 5:9). To Him who came to give peace to those who were near and to those who were far off (Eph. 2:17) they have consciously reconciled themselves. He came to reconcile us, who were enemies (Rom. 5:10), to His own Father and to unite into one those who had become separated (f. Eph. 2:13), impart His Holy Spirit to us and our flesh on Himself. It is clear, then, that those who see Him have been truly reconciled to Him, in that they have found the peace they had sought and become sons of God (f. Mk 5)9; In. 1:12). "It is God who justifies, who is he who condemns?" (Rom. 8:33). But if you do not love your brother whom you see, how can you love God whom you have not seen (1 John 4:20)? If we are not able, or rather, not willing to love Him, it is clear that we have not been reconciled to Him. Let us then be eager to see Him, to be reconciled to Him, and to "love Him," brethren, "of all our soul" (Mk. 12:30), as He Himself commanded us.

Enduring Persecution

Then again he hears Him say: "Blessed are those who are persecuted for righteousness' sake" (Mk 5:10). So he aims to examine himself whether he has been persecuted for the sake of a commandment of God, since, as the apostle says, "all who desire to live in Christ will be persecuted" (2 Tim. 3:12). Therefore Christ adds these words and says, "Blessed are you when men revile you and persecute you and utter all kinds of evil against you falsely on My account. Rejoice and be glad, for your reward is great in heaven" (Mt 5:11-12). Why then did he place those who are objects of persecution and reproach at the end, and command them, as He proclaimed with authority (cf: Mt. 7:29), to "Rejoice and be glad"? For he who has shown worthy penitence for his offenses and has thence become humble—I tell you the same things twice, so I repeat—he who has been found worthy of mourning each day and becomes meek, who hungers and thirsts with his soul for the "Sun of righteousness" (Mal. 4:2) becomes merciful and compassionate. He makes the passions of all men, their afflictions and their weaknesses, his own. As he weeps and is cleansed he sees God and is reconciled to Him and becomes in truth a peacemaker and is found worthy to be called a son of God. Such a person is able, even though he is persecuted, beaten, reproached, abused, insulted, and hears all evil spoken against him, to endure it with joy and unspeakable gladness. God, our Master, knowing this, solemnly declared, "Rejoice and be glad" (Mt. 5:12). But he who has not attained to this state and is not in possession of abundant and substantial joy within himself, how will he be able to endure all these things without vengeful thoughts? Not at all!

The Final Reward

Therefore, my fathers and brethren, let us never cease from judging and examining ourselves (1 Car. 4:3) with great zeal, day by day, even hour by hour if possible! Rather, as we have said, let us go through all the commandments and see ourselves as we examine and observe ourselves in each one of them. If we should find that we are fulfilling it, let us give thanks to God our Master and from henceforth observe it without fail. If, however, up till now we have forgotten it or failed to keep it, let us, I entreat you, run to embrace it and take hold of it, lest for contempt of it we should be called the least in the kingdom of heaven (Mt. 5:19). Thus as we ascend the ladder by one step after another we shall arrive, as well I know, to the very city of heaven. There, as I have said above, our Master stands and peers out, saying to us all, "Come to me, all who labor and are heavy-laden, and I will give you rest" (Mt 11:28). When we have arrived there we shall see Him as far as man is able so to do, and receive at His hands the kingdom of heaven, which is the Holy Ghost, and constantly have it within us (cf. Lk. 17:21), as the Master Himself explicitly proclaims. Thus we shall live as angels on the earth, or, rather, as sons of God. We shall be holy, and in all things of God (cf. Eph. 5:1) our Father. That most sweet vision of Him may we all enjoy, now and always, forever and ever. Amen.

Chapter 8

What Is Denoted By The Throne High And Lifted Up, And What The Temple Is, That Is Filled

Angelic spirits are, therefore, the 'high' throne, and the souls of the saints, who from this world's abyss have been translated to the joys of peace on high, are the throne 'lifted up'. God is represented as 'sitting on a throne high and lifted up', because He rules over both.

That which is said a little further on, however, 'the whole earth is full of His glory, means that every corporeal creature on earth is full of the glory of God. For as the divine essence by means of knowledge guides a spiritual creature, 'so does it fill that which is corporeal by ordering and ruling it. So, as it is said elsewhere, 'I fill heaven and earth', and again, 'the heaven is My throne, and the earth is My footstool', so in this place we have first, "I saw the Lord sitting upon a throne high and lifted up", and then 'the whole earth is full of His glory, and 'the things that were beneath it filled the temple'. 'The temple' is the power of understanding, whether of angels or of men, which temple is filled by the things that are beneath it. For the works of God so far transcend assessment that no creature has the power to understand them perfectly. The contemplation of them fills our heart, but our heart cannot compass their immensity. How, then, shall we comprehend the Maker of the works, when we cannot fully take in the works of the Maker?

We may say also that this throne high and lifted up, whereon God sits, is the eternity of the Godhead; for it is said of Him alone that He "inhabiteh eternity", not because God is one thing and His eternity another, but because a throne implies a ruler. He therefore is rightly represented as sitting upon the throne of eternity since, as there is neither beginning nor end to His being, so is there none either to His omnipotence. He always was. He always was omnipotent. Full ever in Himself and of Himself, He was at once perfect, and yet never overflowed. Well then may the prophet say, "I saw the Lord sitting upon a throne, high and lifted up", for the might of the Godhead at once precedes all creatures in eternity,, surpasses them in excellence, and orders them by power.

Next come the words, "and the things that were beneath it filled the temple". The temple may here be understood as meaning the cycle of the ages and revolutions of the centuries. For as the ages in their course return upon themselves, they seem by their cycles to mark out as it were the enclosure of a temple, 'the things that were beneath it filled the temple', is to be taken, therefore, as meaning that all the periods of time are full of the works of God, and that every generation tells of His wonderful acts. Or else it may be taken thus: 'the things that were beneath it filled the temple' that is, the things that filled the temple were beneath it, because whatever belongs to time is found below eternity. For the vastness of eternity includes below itself the narrow paths of time, in that it is both before time, since it has no beginning, and after time, in that it knows no end. It is above time too, for it admits no change.

Once More, The View Of Certain Persons As To Three Storeys In The Ark, And Of The Three Wills That Are In A Man

There is still something else that we can say about the first three storeys; for each of us has in himself three wills, whereof the first is carnal, the second natural, and the third spiritual. The carnal will wants to give free rein to concupiscence and unhesitating obedience to the desires of the flesh; it wishes to be subject to no law, to fear no one, and to do exactly what it likes. The eager desire of the spirit, on the other hand, is just the opposite; it so longs to cleave with its whole self to spiritual interests that it wants to dispense with bodily necessity. So between these two desires of the soul the natural will takes a middle course; it neither gives itself to the shameful deeds of the vices, nor does it submit to the trials of the virtues. Thus in seeking to moderate the bodily passions it is never prepared to endure those essential mortifications without which the desires of the spirit cannot be possessed. It wants to obtain the gift of chastity without disciplining or chastising the flesh, to acquire purity without the toil of vigils, and to exhibit Christ's humility without throwing worldly honour overboard. And finally it wants to pursue the benefits of the future, without losing those of the present.

Such a will would never lead us to true perfection, but would establish us in a deplorable state did not invading forces disrupt this most lukewarm interior condition. For when we follow this will and we want to relax a little, at once the stings of the flesh arise and they will certainly not allow us to remain in that hurtful purity of lukewarmness in which we take pleasure, but they drag us towards that way, frightening and full of the briars of vices, of which we stand in dread.

And again, when we are inflamed with spiritual fervour, we want to put down the works of the flesh without any regard to human frailty, and in the pride of our hearts would give our whole selves over to immoderate religious practices. But the weakness of the flesh intervenes to recall and restrain us from that blameworthy spiritual excess, and to reduce the pace. And so when each of these desires opposes the other in this conflict, it brings about a state in which the natural will, not wanting either to give itself wholly to carnal desires, nor to toil at the labours of the virtues, is tempered by just control. A certain equilibrium is established by balancing the spirit against the flesh in the scales of our body, and this prevents a preponderance either of the soul aflame with spiritual fervour on the one hand, or of the flesh with the stings of the vices on the other. This makes that lukewarm condition of our natural will impossible. For our soul's health we are compelled to come to that fourth condition which we do not desire, wherein we acquire the virtues not by idleness and ease, but by continual sweat and compunction of spirit; lest, if we remain in that thoroughly pernicious tepidity, God should begin to spew us out of His mouth.

It is of this conflict between flesh and spirit and of the fruit thereof that the apostle shows us when he says: "This I say then, Walk in the spirit, and ye shall not fulfil the lust of the flesh. For the flesh lusteth against the spirit, and the spirit against the flesh: and these are contrary the one to the other: so that whatsoever things ye would not, those ye do."

The Meaning Of The Three Storeys, The Cubit, And The Pillar Set Up In The Midst Of The Ark Of The Understanding, That Is To Say Of Wisdom

The three storeys in the ark of the understanding denote three kinds of thoughts, right, profitable, necessary. If, therefore, I have begun to love to meditate upon the Scriptures, and have always been ready to ponder the virtues of the saints, and the works of God, and whatever else there is that serves to improve my conduct and stimulate my spirit, then I have already begun to be in the first storey of the ark. But if I neglect to imitate the good I know, then I can say that my thought is right, but unprofitable. For it is good that I should think what I do think and know what I know about others, but it profits me nothing if I do not take it to myself as a pattern for living. For another person's virtue is of no profit to me, if I neglect to copy it as far as I am able. C A treasure hid, and knowledge hid,, what profit is in either?" hide my knowledge, if I do not put into practice the good that I know; and therefore it cannot .profit me that, knowing, I feign not to know.

But if I have taken pains not only to know, but also to perform good and profitable actions, and if my heart's preoccupation is to see how by self-control and a right way of living I can make my own the virtues which I love and admire in others, then I can say that my thought is profitable, then I have gone up to the second storey. My heart is now more at one with itself; in consequence, it does not gad about among vain and profitless things.

There remains the third kind of thought, that when I have begun to do the works of the virtues, I should labour to have the virtues themselves that is to say, that I should possess within myself the virtue which I show in outward works. Otherwise it will not be much good for me to have performed the works, unless I have also the virtues of the works. If, then, I direct the thought of my heart to this end, that I may strive to show inwardly before the eyes of God whatever good appears in me outwardly to human sight, then I have gone up into the third storey, where the essential virtues are to be found. But among all these there is one that is supremely necessary, namely, charity, which unites us to God; and that is why the ark is gathered into one at the top, that even now we should be thinking of the One, looking for the One, desiring the One, even our Lord Jesus Christ.

So in the first storey there is knowledge, in the second works, in the third virtue, and at the top the reward of virtue, Jesus Christ our Lord. These steps if you change the order to 'knowledge, discipline, and goodness' you have in the psalm where it says, c Teach me goodness, discipline, and knowledge, O Lord Jesus Christ.'

The pillar set up in the middle of the ark to the height of thirty cubits, to which the entire structure leans, and the top whereof measures a single cubit from corner to corner, this is the tree of life which was planted in the midst of paradise, namely, our Lord Jesus Christ, set up in the midst of His Church for all believers alike as the reward of work, the End of the journey, and the victor's crown. He it is who rose from earth and pierced the heavens, who came down to the depths, yet did not leave the heights, who is Himself both above and below, above in His majesty, below in His compassion, above that He may draw our longings thither, below that He may offer us His help. Below He is among us, above He is above us. Below is what He took from us, above is what He sets before us.

Chapter 10 Of The Four Steps Of The Ascents

Let us speak now about these steps in the ascents, whereby we climb to heaven, that no one whom the promised prize delights may fear the journey's toil. There is fair climbing there indeed, for, though the going is hard, the love that lies beneath alleviates the toil.

The first ascent, then, is made from the cold of the east that is, from the swelling of pride; for it behoves the sinner, who fell into sin by disobedience, first to be humbled, and then, by obedience, to rise up again.

The second ascent is made from the heat of the west, for the next thing needed is that we should tread our fleshly vices underfoot, so that we walk not after our own desires but mortify our members that are upon the earth, that we serve sin no more.

The third ascent is from the cold of the west, for when through abstinence and the practice of discipline we have extinguished in ourselves the passions of the flesh, then we shall be free to give ourselves up gladly to meditation, and to the teaching of Divine Scripture, so that by applying ourselves to reading and to meditation the eye of our mind may once more be enlightened, even as the psalmist says: 'Depart from me, ye evil-doers: for I will keep the commandments of my God.

The fourth ascent is from the heat of the east, when we have gone on from good to better. For by no means can we ever reach perfection, unless we strive unceasingly to grow in the good things we do.

Chapter 14 Of The Three Paradises, And The Tree Of Life In Each

There are three paradises. One is a garden of earth, whose inhabitant was the first, the earthly Adam. The second is a garden of faith, the Church of the saints which the second, the heavenly Adam, Christ, founded, and in which He dwells. The third is heavenly, and that is the kingdom of God, and eternal life, and the kind of the living, or rather the living land wherein God dwells.

In the first paradise the tree of life is a material tree. In the second, the tree of life is the Saviour's manhood. In the third, the tree of life is the wisdom of God, the word of the Father, the fount of life, the wellspring of good, and this is in truth the eternal life.

Now let us make comparison between them. Assuredly the tree of life in the earthly paradise could promote only an unfailling bodily life. But the tree of life of the faithful paradise, that is Jesus Christ, promises His own eternal life to those who eat His flesh and drink His blood; yet He Himself, desiring to show how far removed the sacrament is from the power, says, 'it is the spirit that quickeneth; the flesh profiteth nothing', which is as if He said: Do not imagine that it is enough for you to receive Me bodily in the sacrament, unless you have learnt to eat Me also in My function as the word of life, enlightening souls, making sinners righteous, and quickening the dead.

Chapter 15 Of The Fifteen Steps By Which Wisdom Arises And Grows In The Hearts Of The Saints

This, therefore, is the tree of life indeed, the word of the Father, the wisdom of God in the highest, which in the hearts of the saints, as in an unseen paradise, is sown in fear,

watered by grace,
dies through grief,
takes root by faith,
buds by devotion,
shoots up through compunction,
grows by longing,
is strengthened by charity,
grows green by hope,
puts out its leaves and spreads its branches through caution, flowers through discipline,
bears fruit through virtue,
ripens through patience, is harvested by death, and feeds by contemplation.

But as our discourse has gone on rather long, let us now have a little breathing-space, at the same time beseeching the same wisdom of God, that He who scorned not to redeem us by tasting bitter death, would deign to satisfy us with the taste of His own sweetness, to whom be honour and dominion unto the eternal ages of ages. Amen.

Book III

Chapter 4 Of The Three Kinds Of Men, And Of The Steadfastness Of Faith

We said in the fourth place that the tree of wisdom is rooted in faith. There are three kinds of people, those who have no faith, those who are weak in faith, and those who are full of faith. Those who have no faith are they who do not know God, or believe the gospel of Christ, who think there is no life beyond this one that we now have in time. These sink their roots in the earth, for their appetite for things present is in proportion to their ignorance of the eternal goods that are to follow. They strive for earthly things, and look to be happy here, since they believe that after this life they will be nothing. That fool was one of them, who is derided in the Book of Job by Eliphaz. "I saw the fool firmly rooted," he says, 'and I cursed his beauty forthwith.' A fool is one who does not know what he was made for, thinks that nothing exists beyond what he can see, does not foresee the evils that await him, and loves these transient and spurious goods as though they were to last for evermore. It seems sometimes, while he is prosperous, that such a one is firmly rooted. But the wise man 'curses his beauty forthwith', because he knows to what evils he will be snatched away, after these ephemeral good things. Of this same fool the psalmist says, 'The fool hath said in his heart, "There is no God"/ And then, including his fellows, "There is , he says, 'no fear of God before their eyes'. For how can they fear God, when they do not believe that God exists?

It is obvious from this that those to whom the fear of God has not come cannot attain to the beginning of wisdom either.

Now let us consider whether those whom we named second be rooted, or where their roots take hold. They seem to have no roots. For the weak in faith are those who have already acquired some conviction of the truth, but, halting between two opinions still, neither completely gainsay nor yet entirely accept that which is said in Holy Writ about the rewards that await the good, or the pains in store for the bad. For they perceive that certain things occur in this world, from which it may be inferred that God exists and has a care for the affairs of men, and that all men's deeds, whether good or evil, will be subject to His judgements. In view of this, therefore, they begin to fear that God is threatening them; and, driven by this fear, they set about to do what He commands and shun what He forbids. And it sometimes happens that, when they have been practised some while in this fear, they no longer only fear God's threats, but even begin with some inclination of heart to desire what He promises.

Yet again, when they see the wicked prospering in this world and perceive much else in life that goes so awry that it seems the world can never be governed by God's providence, the outcome of everything being subject to the chances of fate, then they start to strive for the peace of the wicked, and long that they too may prosper in this world. In their unspoken thoughts they tell themselves that it is vain to fear the Judgement, that there is nothing in the tales made up by fools about the pains of hell and the torments of the wicked, and that all this is a product, not of truth but of fear; since surely if God really weighed the works of men so strictly. He could have declared the fact by signs so obvious as to leave nobody hereafter in the slightest doubt.

Lastly, so they argue, to abandon the certain for the uncertain and to pursue unseen things concerning which it is given to no man to know whether they be true, or whether men have been deceived into imagining that they are so, is flatly contrary to reason. To do so is to scorn with a vile presumption assured and present benefits, which in the common judgement and opinion of all men are held to be not only good, but even strict necessities for human nature. This is so the more especially since it is clear that God created them solely for man's service, and it therefore does Him no wrong to use the good things He has made for no other purpose than that men should use them.

Men like these, who know only how to weigh their faith against the uncertain issues of events, can never be stable. For, as with a certain lightness of mind they easily believe for a time in the word of truth, they equally easily fall away from their belief in the truth in time of trial, since in temptation they are readily persuaded of its falsehood. Hence they were wavering formerly too, even when they seemed to stand.

The prophet described this sort of man in his own person when he said: 'But as for me, my feet were almost gone; my steps had well-nigh slipped. For I was envious at the foolish, when I saw the prosperity of the wicked,' And a little later, 'they say, "How doth God know, and is there knowledge in the Most High? Behold, these are the ungodly, who prosper in the world; they increase in riches".' For they question and they waver, and they are borne along on the currents of their own thoughts, not knowing in what direction their opinion should incline. They cannot believe, and they dare not deny. They hesitate to give assent, and yet they distrust faith.

But those who are full of faith, they have got roots; yet they do not fix them in the world, as do the unbelievers, but through faith and love they are rooted and grounded in God. They are the vineyard of the Lord in Soreq. They are the faithful vine, the righteous vine, which the Good Husbandman Himself has planted, yes and transplanted too, for He "brought a vine out of Egypt, and cast out the heathen, and planted it". Of these things the Lord says elsewhere by His prophet, "I will plant them, and not pluck them up". For our land and our country is God, in whom we are planted when we cleave to Him with our hearts' devotion, saying with the psalmist, 'But it is good for me to stay close to God, to put my hope in the Lord God'. From this land we shall not be pulled up any more, if we abide in His love to the end.

Of this rooting the Holy Spirit says also by the prophet: 'Whatsoever shall be left of the house of Judah shall take root downward, and bear fruit upward/ For by those that are left of the house of Judah the faithful are denoted; these take root downward, in that every thought of their heart is fixed on inward joys, and they bear fruit upward, since in their heavenly fatherland, which in this life they ever seek by love, they hereafter receive the gifts of life in recompense.

So the faithful both believe and wait for that which the faithless deny, and about which the weak in faith are hesitant. And the faithful flee that which the faithless love and the weak in faith are anxious to acquire. It is in faith, therefore, that wisdom is rooted, because by means of faith the mind is rendered steadfast and the will made strong. But he who is unsure in faith cannot be made perfect either in the fear of God or in His love. For we fear the thing we are not sure about in a different way from that in which we fear the thing that we believe. That which we believe, we really fear; that which we doubt, we generally fail to fear, because through our very doubtfulness we fall into a certain false security. The result is that we now judge that only to be right, which we see will not be incompatible with what we want; so that our deluded mind often thinks that what it would like our fortune to be will actually come to pass.

In order, therefore, that fear should not be insufficient, nor yet the will lukewarm, we need to have a strong, unshaken faith; so that, being rooted in that, we may establish our hold upon the benefits which we received by means of the three things that went before.

Chapter 8

Of The Powers Of Charity, And Of The Eight Beatitudes Compared With These Eight Steps

In the eighth place we added that the tree of wisdom is strengthened by charity. Charity is like wine. For wine makes those whom it inebriates sprightly, bold, brave, forgetful, and in a certain way insensible. So charity, by cleansing the conscience, puts new spirit into the heart; and then, as through purity of conscience it gains confidence, emboldens it. Hence it grows strong because, as Scripture testifies, he who trusts in the Lord is as strong as a lion. For a pure conscience cannot be overcome by any adverse circumstances. So long as it is inwardly confident that it will always have God's help, it readily despises and conquers whatever outward contradiction it endures. It also induces forgetfulness, because while it draws the whole attention of the soul towards desire for eternal things, it drives from it entirely the memory of all those that pass. It makes the soul insensible, filling the heart to overflowing with inward sweetness; so that it despises whatever outward bitterness it suffers, as though it did not feel it.

Thus charity strengthens wisdom, since it affords the soul both confidence and strength, and further gives it an insuperable constancy by rendering it in a way insensible.

We can, if we will, see the eight beatitudes expressed in these eight steps:

Our saying that the tree of wisdom is sown through fear will then correspond to 'Blessed are the poor in spirit: for theirs is the kingdom of heaven'.

Our saying that it is watered by grace will answer to 'Blessed are the meek: for they shall inherit the earth'.
Our saying that it dies through grief will answer to 'Blessed are they that mourn: for they shall be comforted'.
Our saying that it takes root by faith will answer to 'Blessed are they that hunger and thirst after righteousness: for they shall be filled'.

Our saying that it germinates through devotion will answer to 'Blessed are the merciful: for they shall obtain mercy'. Our saying that it shoots up through compunction will answer to 'Blessed are the pure in heart: for they shall see God'. Our saying that it grows by longing will answer to 'Blessed are the peacemakers: for they shall be called the children of God'. Our saying that it is strengthened by charity will answer to 'Blessed are they that are persecuted for righteousness' sake: for theirs is the kingdom of heaven'.

What The Hope Of Future Blessings Effects In A Man's Heart

In the ninth place we added that the tree of wisdom grows green through hope. The hope of future blessings in the mind is like a sparkling fire fed with kindling wood. For hope is as it were the memory of unseen joys which, hidden in man's heart, warms it inside, and in the winter of this present life will not allow the cold of infidelity to wither it. And as long as this hope lives in our mind, the tree of wisdom never wilts; but, as a tree preserves its foliage unharmed as long as it has moisture and warmth in the right proportions, so the soul cannot wither that is fostered by the warmth of the Holy Spirit descending from above, and watered by the practice of good works from below.

Book IV

A Further Threefold Distinction In The Works Of Restoration, According To The Division Of The Ark Into Three Storeys

There is yet another way in which, if we so wish, we may discern the height of the ark, so that, while the truth remains the same, the expositions of it may be multiplied. For we would have the reader notice this also, that often in this treatise we have presented the same thing in different ways, in order so to enrich our teaching that the wise soul may make trial of every path of knowledge, with this reservation only, that nothing that gainsays the truth be either thought or said. Therefore, as the ark is divided into three storeys, so also the works of restoration are divided into three classes. In the first class, as it were in the first storey, is the shadow. In the second class, as in the second storey, is the spirit. Or, if you prefer to use these terms, call the three things figure, actuality, and truth, and understand that the figure and the shadow are the same, the body and the actuality, and the spirit and the truth.

Those things are called shadows, which were done before Christ's coming under the natural and the written law, bodily and visibly, in order to prefigure the things that now, after His coming, are being done bodily and visibly in the time of grace. They are called shadows, because they were both corporal and figures of the corporal. Our sacraments themselves, which are now performed in Holy Church, are called the body. And the spirit is that which the grace of God effects invisibly beneath these visible sacraments. For instance, to take one example, the Red Sea prefigured baptism, which is now sanctified in Holy Church. And the same visible baptism signifies the cleansing from offences, which the Holy Spirit effects invisibly within our souls, beneath the washing of our bodies, in this sacrament

Thus the Red Sea is the shadow and the figure; the baptism of visible water, which we now have, is the body and the actuality; and the washing away of sins is the spirit and the truth.

Chapter 20

A Further Threefold Distinction In Respect Of The Same Height

There remains yet another way, of which we spoke just now, by which we can divide the height of the ark. For God performed the works of restoration partly through men, partly through angels, and partly by Himself. So in the first storey we put the works of men, in the second the works of angels, and in the third the works of God.

Or, if we take it morally, the first storey is faith, the second hope, and the third charity. Or, according to the analogical sense, the first storey is right thought, the second is wise meditation, and the third pure contemplation. Or, according to active life, the first storey is knowledge, the second discipline, and the third goodness. Or, according to the different states, the first is nature, the second the written law, and the third grace.

If indeed these three are considered from the point of view of time, they measure the length of the ark; if they are assessed according to their dignity, they divide its height. For as they followed each other in time, so did they precede each other in respect of dignity.

A Concluding Chapter In Praise And Commendation Of The Ark

What then is this ark, about which we have said so many things, and in which so many different paths of knowledge are contained? You do not think it is a maze, I hope? For it is not a maze, nor is there toil within, but rest. How do I know this? Because He lives in it who said: 'Come unto Me, all ye that labour and are heavy laden, and I will give you rest . . . and ye shall find rest unto your souls.' For if there is toil where He is, how do those find rest who come to Him? But now 'His place is in peace and His dwelling-place in Sion. There He hath broken the powers of bows, the shield, the sword and the battle/ In the place whence all tumult and disturbance is far off, joy and peace and rest are ever present.

What, then, is the ark like? Do you desire to know? Bear with me, that I may tell you a few things out of many. This ark is like a storehouse filled with all manner of delightful things. You will look for nothing in it that you will not find, and when you have found one thing, you will see many spread before your eyes. There all the works of restoration are contained in all their fulness, from the world's beginning to its end; and therein is represented the condition of the universal Church, Into it is woven the story of events, in it are found the mysteries of the sacraments, and there are set out the stages of affections, thoughts, meditations, contemplations, good works, virtues, and rewards. There we are shown what we ought to believe, and do, and hope. There the form of man's living and the sum total of perfection are contained. There that which is hidden comes to light, there burdensome tasks seem easy, and matters which might in isolation seem unfortunate, when viewed in their context are seen to be appropriate. There the sum of things is displayed, and the harmony of its elements explained. There another world is found, over against this passing, transitory one; because the things that go through different times in this world exist in that one simultaneously, as in a condition of eternity. There the present does not follow on the past, nor does the future supervene upon the present, but whatsoever is there, is there as in the present.

For this reason also those who dwell there, dwell there always, and always rejoice, grieving for nothing that is past, fearing nothing future, possessing what they love, seeing what they desire; and perhaps that is why the apostle said, 'The fashion of this world passeth', the form of this world, the appearance of this world, the beauty of this world. For there is another world, whose 'fashion' does not pass, nor does its form change, nor its appearance wither, nor its beauty fail. That world is in this world, and this world is less than that world, for that world contains Him whom this world cannot contain. Eyes of flesh see this world, the eyes of the heart behold that world after an inward manner. In this world men have their pleasures, but the delights in that world are ineffable. In this world men run after and applaud vain shows, but in that world they are occupied with inner silence, and the pure in heart rejoice in the sight of the truth.

I meant to speak but briefly, but I confess to you that I am pleased to have much to say; and perhaps there was still more which I might have said, had I not been afraid of wearying you. And now, then, as we promised, we must put before you the pattern of our ark. Thus you may learn from an external form, which we have visibly depicted, what you ought to do interiorly, and when you have impressed the form of this pattern on your heart, you may rejoice that the house of God has been built in you.

Chapter I

The Dignity of Man with Regard to his Soul

MANY are deeply learned in variety of arts and sciences, and all the while continue as profoundly ignorant of themselves: they are inquisitive about the affairs of other men, and perfectly void of thought or care for their own. Nay, even in their most useful and necessary studies, where God is the subject of the inquiry, they think to find him in the things without them, and overlook the evidences of him within their own breasts: none of which, though within them, is yet so intimate and close to them, as God. I desire then that I may proceed in a quite contrary method, and from external, retire to internal evidences; from objects within, rise up to those above me; that by these I may at last understand from whence I come, and whither I am bound; what I am, why I am, and from whom I am; that so this knowledge of myself may lead me up to the knowledge of God. For the more perfect understanding I have of my own condition, the nearer I shall approach to, and advance proportionably towards the right understanding of the Divine nature and perfections.

Now when I turn my eyes inward, I discover three distinct faculties in my soul, whereby I am qualified to remember, and contemplate, and desire God. These are the memory, the understanding and the will. By the first of which I recollect, by the second I discern, and by the last I love and embrace him. When I reflect upon God, I find him in my memory, and delight in him by those remembrances, according to that measure of satisfaction, which he is pleased to impart to me. By my intelligent faculty, I see what God is in himself, what in his angels and saints, what in men, and the other works of his hands; each of which contribute to the manifestation of his excellences. In himself he is incomprehensible, the beginning and the end, the beginning without conclusion, the end without any more excellent end to which it is ultimately referred. The consideration of myself convinces me how far God must needs exceed all comprehension, because I find myself unable perfectly to understand myself; who yet am but one of his creatures: considered in the angels, he appears lovely and desirable, because their constant happiness and employment is to behold and look into him. In the saints I find him full of delight, because those blessed spirits rejoice in him. In the creatures he appears wonderful, because creating all things by his power, governing all things by his wisdom, and disposing all things by a good and kind Providence.

In men he is the most worthy object of love, because he is their God, and they are his people. He dwells in them, as in his own house, and they are his temple, in which his Divine presence resides. He does not disdain the whole species, nor any individual person of it. Whoever remembers, and understands, and loves him, the same is with him. We ought to love him, because he first loved us. (1 John iv. 19.) He made us after his own image, in his own likeness, which was a privilege vouchsafed to no other creature besides. Now, when we are said to be made after God's image, the mystical meaning may be, that we are made to understand and be acquainted with the Son, by whom we come to an understanding of and acquaintance with the Father, and gain access to him. So near is the relation between us and the Son of God, that the Son of God is himself the express image of the Father, and we are made after that image of him. And this nearness of relation is farther signified by saying that we are made after his likeness, and not only in his image. (Gen. i. 26.) For that which is made in the image of another, must agree with the original model, and not only partake of an empty name, without any real similitude to justify it.

Let us be careful then to express this likeness, and make our resemblance to God appear in the desire of peace, the contemplation of truth, and the love of charity. Let us keep God in our remembrance, carry him in our consciences, and behave ourselves with that deference and respect, becoming men that believe Him to be always present with them. For it is in this regard, that our mind is his image, as it is capable of receiving and partaking of him. It is for that reason his image, because, like him, it remembers, understands, and loves itself; and more especially, because, while it does so, it is capable of rising higher, by remembering, considering, and loving its Maker; in the doing whereof consists its true improvement and wisdom. For nothing comes so near to that perfect wisdom above, as the rational mind; which by its three faculties, of memory, understanding and will, subsists in that inexplicable trinity of the Divine persons, as an image does in its original.

But in that original it does not truly subsist, except in conformity to it, it remember, and consider, and love it. Let it therefore be careful to remember that God, after whose image it was made; let it endeavour to understand and love him, by whom it is endued with a capacity of being for ever happy, together with himself.

For happy is that soul, with whom God takes up his residence, makes it the place of his rest. Happy, which can say, He that formed me, hath lodged and dwelt in my tabernacle; for to such a one he cannot deny the rest of heaven. Why then do we go out of ourselves, and seek God in external objects, who all the while is with and in us, if we do but make it our business to be with, and in him? For he is certainly with, and in us at present, by a lively faith, which is all the union we can attain to, till he admit us to see him face to face. Thus the apostle says; we know that Christ dwelleth in our hearts by faith; (Ephes. iii. 17.) for Christ is in our faith, faith in our soul, the soul in our heart, the heart in our breast. By faith then I reflect upon and remember God in the quality of my Creator, I adore him as my Redeemer, I wait for him as my Saviour. I believe that I see him in all his creatures, that I have him in myself, and (which is unspeakably more pleasant and happy than all the rest) that I know him as he is. For to know the Father, and Son, and Holy Ghost, is life eternal; (John xvii. 3.) consummate felicity, and the very perfection of transport and delight.

No mortal can conceive, how bright, how sweet, how ravishing we shall find that vision to be, when we shall see God face to face; that light of them who shine by his reflection; that repose of them who have been exercised by labours and sufferings; that country of them who are called home from exile; that life of them that live; the crown of them that overcome. In the meanwhile the image of that blessed glorious Trinity, which I find in my own soul, teaches me, that I ought to make the remembrance, and knowledge, and love of that Trinity which I resemble, the main design of all my actions, and the chief end of living. For the mind is the likeness of God, and in it are three powers, memory, understanding, and will. We attribute our advancement in knowledge to memory, though this be not strictly the faculty by which we think. We attribute all our knowledge to the understanding also, because by thinking we find out the truth, which when found, we commit to the custody of our memory. Memory is more particularly our resemblance to the Father, our understanding to the Son, and our will to the Holy Ghost. No part of us is so like the Holy Spirit, as our will or love: and kind affection is nothing else than a modification and exaltation of the will, in that which is its proper excellence. Love is not only the gift, but the best gift of God: (1 John iv. 7.) for that love which is of God, and which God is, is properly styled the Holy Spirit, by which the love of God is shed abroad in our hearts, and all the Trinity dwells in us.

Chapter III

Reflections upon the Excellent Nature and Privileges of the Soul

WHAT, my soul, what hast thou to do with the flesh? Thou, who art adorned with the likeness of thy Master, enriched with his holiness and immortality! What hast thou to do with that flesh which exposes thee to so much suffering and misery? For from this flesh it is, that the sin never actually committed by thee is laid to thy charge; that the righteousness of thy own doing is no better than filthy rags, and that thou art reduced so low, as to be esteemed little better than vanity and nothing. The flesh, with which thou maintainest so strict a friendship, is in itself no better than froth and bubble, clothed with a gay, but frail and decayed beauty; and a time will shortly come, when all its boasted charms shall sink into a rotten carcase, and be only food for worms: for, after all thy care to dress and set it off, thou canst not change its nature, nor make it cease to be flesh. Consider a little those constant evacuations, the discharges of thy mouth, and nose, and other passages, without which the body cannot subsist; and ask thyself how much this differs from a common-sewer. But there is a much more melancholy consideration yet behind; for, if thou wouldest sit down and undertake to compute, how this flesh is loaded with guilt, and frailty, entangled with vicious habits, urged and inflamed with unlawful desires, overborne with unruly passions, deluded with temptations and deceits, prone to evil perpetually; thus it will appear full of all manner of mischief and reproach. This is the thing that renders every man living altogether vanity (Psa. xxxix. 5.); for here the snares of concupiscence are laid, which captivate the mind, and draw it off to the love of vanity, and the commission of iniquity.

But, oh the heart-breaking, the grief and amazement, the howlings and doleful lamentations of that dismal day, when the wicked shall be severed from the conversation of the saints, and for ever banished the sight and presence of God; when they shall be abandoned to the fury of devils, and fruitless tears and groans, and cast into the lake that flows in streams of fire for ever and ever! Such is the desperate condition of the damned, shut out irrevocably from the regions of bliss, to be tormented without mercy in hell; doomed never to see the light, never to gain one minute's ease or respite, but to endure thousands of thousands of ages; at the hands of tormentors who shall never be weary, and in a state where the tormented shall never expire with their pains. For the fire so burns, as never entirely to consume; and the tortures are so inflicted, as to be ever new, ever increased. Nor will these be dealt promiscuously to all, but the quality of the punishment (we have reason to think) will be determined by the nature of each person's crimes; and they whose vices are of a sort, will find the same agreement in their sufferings. Weeping and wailing, howlings and groans, lamentations and gnashings, are the only sounds heard in those dismal prisons: worms, and ghosts, deformed and monstrous spectacles are all the objects presented to their eyes: their bodies shall burn in the fire, their souls be gnawed with the never-dying worm of an upbraiding conscience. Their pains intolerable, their fears inconceivably amazing, the stench suffocating beyond comparison, their soul and body ever dying, without the least glimpse of hope, or possibility of pardon and mercy. Thus must the soul be dealt with in the other world, capable of no middle state, but either tormented everlastingly in hell for sin unremitted, or inexpressibly happy in heaven for good works graciously accepted. And need we then to be persuaded which of these two we ought to choose, whether to be continually tormented with devils, or to be as continually in felicity with the saints? good and evil, life and death are set before us, and whether we had rather, that shall be given us. (Eccles. xv. 17.) The punishment indeed shall infinitely exceed all the descriptions, that have been here, or can be given of them: yet these descriptions sure are full of terror enough, to fright us into better manners. But if these terrors of the Lord fail to persuade, let us try if the mercies and rewards will invite us to amendment.

Chapter IV

The Rewards of good Men in the next Life

IT may suffice to say upon this occasion, that good men shall be recompensed for their labours by seeing God, by living with God, by living of God, being in him, who shall be all in all, and possessing him who is the supreme good: for where the supreme good is, there of necessity must be the most perfect happiness, -the most exquisite joy, true liberty, unbounded charity, and eternal security, fulness of knowledge, perfection of beauty, and all manner of blessedness. There shall be peace and piety, joy and sweetness, life everlasting, glory and praise, rest and concord. So blessed shall every man be with God, who, leave8 this world with a quiet and clear conscience, and to whom the Lord will not impute sin. (Psal. xxxii. 2.) He shall see God to the satisfying his desire, he shall enjoy him to the consummating of his pleasure: he shall shine in truth, rejoice in goodness, flourish in a never-decaying eternity: nor shall his duration be more enlarged, than his capacity of knowledge and felicity. He shall be free of that city above, of which the angels are denizens, the Father the temple, the Son the light, the Holy Spirit the cement of inviolable love. O happy mansion! O fruitful, peaceful country, whose territories are large enough for all thy inhabitants! whose people dwell securely, without strife or want! How glorious things are spoken of thee, thou city of God! (Psal. lxxxvii. 3.) In thee is nothing heard but the voice of praise and thanksgiving, the shouts and exultations of them that rejoice in God, whose sight is charming, whose words are sweet beyond expression. Thy presence, O Lord, is delightful: the possession of thee is entire satisfaction. Thou, thou alone art pleasant, thou art more than a sufficient reward; the highest merit, the sharpest sufferings, are overpaid in thee. Beyond thee there remains no new object for our wishes; for all that we can possibly propose to ourselves, is found in thee alone. The desires of beholding and possessing thee will be ever fresh and growing, and the delights of these ever new and entertaining. In thee our understandings will be enlightened, in thee our affections ever purified, so as to know and love the truth continually more and more. And this is the utmost perfection mankind are capable of, to know, and entirely to love their Creator.

What strange perverseness! What madness and dotage then is this we labour under, to thirst after the gall and wormwood of sin, to court the storms and shipwreck of worldly cares, to be content with the disasters of a perishing life, to submit tamely to the tyranny of an enemy that usurps a dominion over us; and not rather to aim at the bliss of saints, the society of angels, the magnificent joys above, and the pleasures of a devout and contemplative life, that so we may enter into the joy of our Lord, and be made partakers of the riches of his exceeding goodness? There we shall taste how gracious the Lord is, see the beauties of his holiness, the lustre of his saints, and the glories of his palace and throne: there we shall know the power of the Father, the wisdom of the Son, the most extensive love of the Holy Ghost; and get acquainted with that ever blessed and most mysterious Trinity. Now we see bodies with the eyes of our body; we form ideas of bodies by the powers of the soul; but then we shall see God himself with a clear intuitive knowledge. O the blessedness perpetually flowing from that vision, which sees God in himself, sees him in us, and us in him; which furnishes us with the utmost we can wish, and leaves no new objects for our desires; which shews us all we can see, and inflames us with the love of all we see, and renders us perfectly happy in that love. So shall we be blessed in the pleasures of love, blessed in the delights of contemplation. This shall be the sum of our contemplation, that the sum of our happiness. For the Divine nature shall then be understood by us in its abstracted essence and brightest perfections; the secrets and mysteries of the Trinity, and the harmony of providence, and the justice of his judgments, and all the wondrous works of God, shall lie fair and open to our view. The delights resulting from them, shall fill and satisfy our largest thirst after knowledge, and so consummate the happiness of the rational soul. And as truth shall shine, so charity shall burn bright; one voice, one will, one concert of praise: the whole assembly of saints united to each other; body and soul shall no more war and hold perpetual conflicts; nor then, as here, obstruct, but promote each other's happiness, and maintain good correspondence, and the human nature shall shine in glory, as the sun in its strength. The joy, the discourse, the entertainment of angels and men shall then be the game. Their love shall never grow cold, their hopes and expectations shall never languish by delays; for in God all good shall be present with them, and they shall all partake in common of the same wisdom, and power, and righteousness, and peace. No difference of language shall there be heard, but all things uniform, and hearts unanimous; the same dispositions and the same affections: in the overflowing river of this pleasure, there will be gratification to the full, the perfection of bliss, and glory, and gladness.

But who is sufficient, who shall be meet to partake of these things? Even every true penitent, even every faithful friend, even every obedient servant. The true penitent grieves and mourns for his past miscarriages, and gives all diligence to avoid the like for the time to come. For this is repentance indeed, to be continually under concern for the sins we have committed heretofore; and so to bewail what hath been done, as never more to do what we bewail. And reason tells us, that he who persists in practices, which he professes to be sorry for having ever been engaged in, does not repent, but mock God, and delude his own soul. If then thou wouldest approve thy sincerity in this matter, leave oft thy sins; for vain is that repentance which subsequent crimes of the same nature stain. Every obedient servant resigns his own inclinations and aversions to his master's pleasure, so as to be able to profess with the psalmist, My heart is ready, O God, my heart is ready, I am content, and delight to do thy will, O my God; yea, thy law is within my heart. I delight to dedicate my time to thee, to converse with thee in my prayer, to do good to my neighbours, and perform all offices of charity for thy sake; to keep a strict guard over myself, and to seek rest for my soul in the contemplation of heavenly things. A faithful friend is serviceable and obliging to all, and troublesome to none. He is serviceable to all, because devout towards God, kind to his brethren, reserved and moderate in his enjoyments, a servant to his Lord, a companion to his equal, a master of the world. The things above him minister to his delight; those upon the level with him, to his comfort and assistance; those below him, to his use and service. He is troublesome to nobody, because using and esteeming all things according to their proper spheres and capacities j pursuing and reaching to those that are more excellent, and retaining an absolute mastery over those that are beneath him. To the former he gives up himself in possession, but keeps undisturbed possession of the latter; and thus employs himself in those two most important, most necessary affairs, the contemplation of God, and the preservation of his own soul.

Let this then be thy first care, strictly to watch and guard thyself from sin and temptation; but know withal, that thy own strength is not sufficient for this great work; and therefore do not forget most humbly and earnestly to implore the Divine mercy and protection: let thy Saviour Jesus Christ be ever Hi thy thoughts and affections, and wear him as a signet upon thy heart: for when the door is sealed and kept by him, ' all thy faculties will be under his governance; no thought can go in or out, or lodge there, but by his permission: the family of heaven and earth will bear thee company; thousands of angels will pitch their tents about thee, and guard the passes of thy outward senses, that no unclean thing enter there. And the great adversary of souls, how mighty and formidable soever in himself, will not be able to break through these bright armies, nor dare to make his attacks which he foresees will prove unsuccessful. So great an awe will the dread of this Divine keeper, and the bright host of angels that attend him, strike; so sure a defence will these heavenly succours be, against that otherwise undaunted, that otherwise invincible enemy.

Chapter XVI

DELIVER me from mine enemies, O God, save me from the rage of them that hate me; for the mighty are gathered together against me; and they that thirst for blood, lie in wait for my soul. (Psal. lix. 1, 2.) By the assistance of thy heavenly grace, I desire and resolve from this day forward to live to my benefit and happiness, and to redeem that time which hath been hitherto mis-spent to my infinite detriment and danger: for sure we ought to employ the term allotted us in this world, as becomes men who have a lively hope; that when their perishing bodies shall be food for worms, their immortal souls shall enter into joy with the saints. Fit then it is that our mind should be set betimes into the right road to that place, which is appointed for its journey's end at last: for why should we not make the best of our way to those happy regions, where we shall live for ever secure from fear, or possibility of dying any more? If we are so immoderately fond of life here below, so short and so perpetually upon the decay, where we make so very hard a shift to live with tolerable comfort, where eating and drinking, sleeping, and the other necessities of this body devour so great a portion of our time and labour, and all does but just support this mass of clay. How much more passionately ought we to love, how much more earnestly to covet that eternal life, where neither labour nor pain shall have any place, where we shall enjoy pleasure and happiness, and freedom in perfection; where men shall be equal to the angels of God, and the righteous shall shine as the sun in the kingdom of their Father? How gloriously bright may we suppose the souls of men shall then be, when even their bodies shall be as resplendent as the stars in the firmament? No melancholy nor heaviness of heart, no pain or fear, no labour or decay, or death there, but ever-blooming youth and health unbroken continues out of danger of decay or interruption.

There is no sin, no misery, no discontent, no temptation, no inclination to wickedness, but holiness, and peace, and security, and joy, rest from toil, pleasures always new, the sight and fruition of God ever ravishing sweet. And who would not most eagerly desire to dwell in this blissful place? Who would not think himself happy in peace so undisturbed, in pleasure so exquisite, in the vision of God, so transcendently glorious? no stranger is admitted there, but all are citizens of that heavenly Jerusalem; and dwell secure in their own country, among their dearest friends, ever rejoicing, ever satisfied with good, and yet ever desiring more; and the more diligent a man hath been in the service of God, the larger reward in proportion shall he receive at the hand of his bountiful Master. The condition, though not the meritorious cause of our bliss everlasting, is obedience; and that obedience is accepted according to the sincerity and love from which it proceeds. And this love, as it recommends our services, so does it add to our recompense: for the more fervently we love God, the nearer shall we be suffered to approach, and have the clearer view of him; and the nearer we see, the more still we shall desire to see him, and be the more transported with the sight.

Chapter XVII

THE days of man upon earth are but a shadow, always in motion, and he in truth no better than vanity and nothing, even when he seems to be most substantial and at a stay. How foolish is it then for man to lay up treasures upon earth, since both he who heaps them up, and that which is heaped up, are eternally in motion, and pass away like water that runneth apace? What advantage, vain man, dost thou expect in this world? For the advantage of worldly-minded men is destruction, and the end of it is death. O that thou wert wise, that thou wouldest understand, that thou wouldest consider what will happen to thee in the latter days. I know, my soul, a certain person that hath lived in great familiarity with thee for several years, hath always sat at the same table, been fed by thy own hand, slept in thy own bosom, and conversed with thee as thy most intimate favourite and friend. This fellow is of right thy servant; but the kindness thou hast shewed him from the beginning, and the sparing those chastisements which his petulance deserved, have made him impudent and rebellious; for want of being kept under by the rod, he hath lift up his heel and kicked at thy life; nay, he hath ensnared his master, and repaid his indulgence with a most insolent and tyrannical cruelty. Thou wouldest ask, perhaps, whom I drive at all this while; it is the old man, who insults over and raises sedition against thy soul, to whose just dominion<sup>4</sup>je ought to submit, who proudly disdains the land of promise, and favours only the things that be of the flesh and sense. This man is blind, and deaf, and dumb from his birth; a wretch, hardened, and old in wickedness, an obstinate rebel to truth and virtue, and an irreconcilable enemy to the cross of Christ. He makes a laughing-stock of the innocent, and him that walketh in the uprightness of his heart; is always aiming at matters too high for him, bold and assuming, and boasts of things above his strength; bears no respect to any of his superiors, and in his foolish heart says, There is no God. (Psal. iv. 1.) He pines away and frets at the prosperity of others, but grows fat and triumphs in their misfortunes and misery; feeds upon carnal and unclean imaginations, and persists in impudent filthiness without remorse; squanders his own possessions like a spendthrift, scrambles and grasps at other men's like an insatiable miser; he treasures up shame and reproach to himself, and by his dissimulation and craft, and vile hypocrisy, provokes the wrath and vengeance of Almighty God.

This man was altogether born and bred up in sin, a friend of unrighteousness, a child of death, a vessel of wrath, fitted for destruction; and yet, notwithstanding these forbidden circumstances, this profligate wretch hath the confidence to preach God's laws, and take his covenant into his mouth. He hates reproof and discipline, and casts his Master's word behind his back; When he sees a thief, he consents unto him, and hath been partaker with the adulterers: he hath slandered and offended his own mothers son; (Psal. 1. 16, 17, 18, 19,20.) and made it his business, by a hard and impenitent heart, to treasure up wrath against the day of wrath. (Rom. ii. 5.) He labours to undermine thee in thy most valuable interest, would rob thee of thy inheritance; and thou art so tame, so treacherous to thyself, as not only to revenge, but even to connive at, and not be sensible of the injury: thou givest him not one hard word, nor castest one angry look, but smilest at him while he caresses and fawns upon thee. Thou playest with a scorners, and considerest not that thou art engaged with a mocking Ishmael. This is not a diversion of children, nor a recreation of simplicity and innocence; but a woeful delusion, a malicious persecution, a murdering of thy life. He casts thee into the pit himself had digged for thy destruction. Thou art softened into luxury, and sold to sin, miserably enslaved, and barbarously treated. O wretched man, who shall set thee free from the bond of this misery and reproach! Let God arise, and spoil this strong man, let his enemy fall before him, this despiser of his majesty, this idolatrous worshipper of himself, this lover of the world, this servant of Satan. What dost thou now think of this traitor, this tyrant? If thou resentest his behaviour as it deserves, thou wilt immediately cry out, He is guilty of death, let him be crucified. Do not therefore dissemble thy just indignation, do not delay thy revenge; let not thine eye spare, neither let it pity him. Crucify this man of sin boldly, resolutely, instantly, but crucify him with the cross of Christ, in which is life and salvation: for if thou cry for help to that merciful Saviour, who did not disdain to be crucified for thy sake, he will hear thee effectually, and according to his wonted goodness, return that comfortable answer, thou that art with me now upon the cross, shall also be with me this day in paradise.

Oh the bowels of compassion! Oh the riches of the mercy of Christ! Oh the surprising mystery of the redemption of lost sinners! So free, so ready is the love of God, so amazing his goodness, so far above all hope, his condescension .so unwearied, so invincible his clemency, that, when men fast bound in sin and afflictions cry to him in their distress, he hears them out of their prisons, and descends from his holy heaven to their relief, because his mercy endureth for ever. How unbounded is his kindness, how unparalleled his easiness of access, how inexpressible the happy change wrought by the hand of the Most High for most unworthy, most profligate creatures! Even for thee, my soul, the most abandoned of all creatures. Lately thou satest in darkness, and the shadow of death, but now art secure in the regions of light and glory. Lately a prey in the lion's mouth, who lay in wait to tear thy soul in pieces, but now in the hand of that faithful Shepherd, that powerful Mediator, out of which no malice, no force can ever pluck thee: lately within the gates of hell, now in the midst of paradise.

But to what purpose, Christian reader, do I recount these benefits, or put thee in mind of thy advantages or thy duty, by a book of pious admonitions, unless thou diligently peruse the book of conscience, and blot out all the black catalogue of sins written there against thee? I may write, and thou mayest read and understand these reflections, but all to no effect, till thou study and read, and thoroughly understand thy own self. Give heed therefore to this, above all other studies, consider, and resolve to continue no longer ignorant of the state of thy own soul. Read thus, that thou mayest love God, that thou mayest encounter and overcome the world, and every enemy that opposes thy peace and salvation. So shall thy labour end in rest, thy sorrow clear up into joy: and when the darkness of this transitory life scatters and wears off, a glorious morning shall dawn in comfort unspeakable, and the meridian sun of righteousness shall warm thee into new life, and shed his bright beams upon thy head. Then shalt thou see the bridegroom, and his mystical spouse in perfect unity and inviolable love; and rejoice at the marriage feast of that Lamb, who was dead, and is alive again, even that Lord of glory, who liveth and reigneth for ever and ever. Amen.

Oeuvres Complète de Saint Bernard

Tome VI, Sermon VI. Voici la suite: « Pierre dit à Jésus: Seigneur, où allez-vous? » Par ces paroles, Pierre répond à ce que le Seigneur avait dit plus haut: «Où je vais, vous n'y pouvez venir. L'apôtre n'avait pu entendre cette expression sans une grande douleur, et sa réplique se rapporte, non aux paroles actuelles de Jésus: « Je vous donne un commandement nouveau, » mais à celles qu'il avait proférées auparavant: « Où je vais, vous n'y pouvez venir; » Seigneur, dit-il, “où allez-vous?» Comme la main instruite palpe fréquemment le lieu où le corps souffre, de même la langue, amie du coeur, ne peut cacher l'amertume que le cœur ressent: ce que l'âme éprouve de souffrance au dedans, la langue le produit au dehors. Aussi la force de la douleur se ressent dans l'esprit, et se découvre par la voix qui se forme au palais au moyen de la langue. Voilà pourquoi la langue de Pierre ne pouvait cacher la douleur qu'il ressentait au fond de son coeur. Ayant entendu, « vous ne pouvez venir où je vais,» il écouta à peine les autres paroles de son maître. Aussitôt qu'eut été donné le double précepte de la charité, saisi d'un regret trop vif à la pensée de l'absence future de son maître, il interrompt le discours que Jésus faisait avec tant d'obscurité, et plein de tristesse il s'écrie: « Seigneur, où allez-vous? » C'est comme s'il s'écriait: cette mutuelle charité que vous nous recommandez, avec votre secours, nous la garderons pure, et sans atteinte, nous accomplirons tous les autres préceptes que vous nous donnerez. Mais ce mot que vous avez dit: “Vous ne pouvez venir où je vais, » nous a remplis d'une grande amertume. Et où allez-vous? Pourquoi nous abandonner? à qui nous laissez-vous dans notre désolation? Je ne veux plus vivre sans vous, ne me quittez pas, ne m'abandonnez pas.

2. Le Seigneur lui dit: "Où je vais, tu n'y peux venir présentement tu me suivras plus tard. » Le sens de ces paroles est celui-ci: je ne te quitte pas, je ne t'abandonne pas; je marche devant toi: là où il n'y a pas de route, je t'ouvre un chemin; du sentier je te fais une voie battue; à la place de la crainte, je mets la sécurité, et au lieu de la mort, je place la vie. Tu es craintif, tu es tremblant, tu n'es pas encore fortifié, tu ne peux me suivre présentement. Je te précéderai à l'opprobre, au gibet, en mourant, en ressuscitant, en montant au ciel. Tu n'es pas propre à recevoir la récompense, parce que tu n'es pas encore prêt à souffrir le supplice. Tu ne peux me suivre; moi qui suis la vie, parce que tu n'es pas encore prêt à mourir pour moi: « Plus tard, tu me suivras. » J'enverrai en vous le Saint-Esprit que je vous ai promis, il vous confirmera: "Et vous serez mes témoins dans Jérusalem, dans toute la Judée, dans Samarie et jusqu'aux extrémités de la terre (Act. I. 8.): » Et alors tu seras prêt à venir à ma suite, Pierre réplique «Pourquoi ne puis-je vous suivre tout de suite? » Je ne crains pas le châtement, je ne crains pas la mort: « Je suis prêt à aller avec vous au supplice et à la mort. "Que dites-vous, "que je ne puis vous suivre actuellement? Je donnerai ma vie pour vous. "Le Seigneur lui dit « Tu donneras ta vie pour moi? Tu te trompes, Pierre, tu n'es pas encore prêt, tu n'es pas encore revêtu de la vertu d'en haut. Quand cette force sera descendue en toi; alors tu livreras ton âme à la mort. Mais le moment n'est pas loin où, par crainte de la mort, tu renieras la vie, et tueras ton âme; où tu nieras d'être mon disciple, et tu feras périr ton esprit: l'heure et le temps approchent, où tu jureras ne point me connaître, afin de pouvoir échapper au péril: le coq ne chantera pas, que tu ne m'aies renié trois fois. Quelques belles protestations que tu fasses sonner, "avant que le coq chante, tu me renieras trois fois. "Voici ce sens: avant que le coq chante, tu me renieras. Et ce renoncement aura lieu trois fois, soit avant le premier chant du coq, soit avant le second.

3. A ces mots, la crainte, la frayeur et une grande douleur s'emparèrent de tous les disciples. Cela n'est pas étonnant. Ils avaient entendu le Seigneur dire à Pierre: "Avant que le coq chante, tu me renieras trois fois; "Pierre était remarquable parmi eux par l'éclat de sa sainteté, par la ferveur de son amour et par l'énergie de sa foi; il avait déjà confessé que Jésus était le Fils de Dieu par ces paroles qu'il lui avait adressées: "Vous êtes le Christ, le Fils du Dieu vivant (Matth. XVI. 16), "et ils redoutaient qu'il ne leur arrivât le même malheur qu'à lui. Et qu'un homme si grand dût le renier, ils avaient quelque incertitude, sur ce point et ils ne croyaient point parfaitement que leur maître ressuscitât le troisième jour d'entre les morts. A cela s'ajoutait la pensée que ce même Seigneur qu'ils entendaient présentement s'entretenir avec eux, devait bientôt mourir. Ce fut alors la tristesse, le deuil et la même plainte de tous. Ils étaient certains de l'absence que leur aimable Seigneur allait faire, de la mort qu'il était sur le point de subir, ils le voyaient encore en vie, et néanmoins ils le pleuraient déjà comme mort. Ils se rappelaient alors les flots très-suaves de la doctrine qu'ils avaient reçue de lui; la santé qu'il avait rendue aux malades, la vie qu'il avait redonnée aux morts, la très-tendre et très-exquise bonté qu'il avait toujours montrée pour eux, et ils se voyaient, si subitement privés de lui. Alors ils pleuraient très-amèrement, mes frères, et croyez-moi, ils ne pouvaient plus se consoler.

4. Les voyant verser des larmes si amères, le Seigneur voulut les consoler de sa mort; mais je pense qu'il ne le voulut pas alors, et qu'il les excitait plutôt alors à la tristesse, lorsqu'il leur disait: « Que votre coeur ne se trouble pas (Joan. XIV. 1). Je serais étonné s'il ne frémit pas en esprit, s'il ne se troubla pas lui-même en disant à ses disciples en pleurs: Que votre « coeur ne se trouble pas. "Je le crois, c'est pourquoi, je le dis, mon béni Seigneur Jésus-Christ dit en tout temps à ses disciples qui pleurent: « Que votre cœur ne se trouble pas. Vous croyez en Dieu, croyez aussi en moi. "Comme s'il leur disait ne vous troublez pas de mon absence, que ma mort ne vous affecte point. J'ai le pouvoir de quitter la vie et de la reprendre. Trois jours mon corps restera mort dans le tombeau, et après ces trois jours, il ressuscitera immortel et impassible. Jonas resta trois jours et trois nuits dans le ventre de la baleine et le Fils de l'homme ressuscitera des morts le troisième jour. « Que votre coeur ne se trouble point moi qui ai ressuscité Lazare, je puis ressusciter mon corps; moi qui ai ressuscité le fils de la veuve, après trois jours la mort n'aura plus d'empire sur moi. "Vous croyez en Dieu? Croyez aussi en moi.» Ne craignez rien à l'occasion de la mort de mon corps: je suis Dieu, je le ressusciterai. Les oeuvres que j'ai opérées rendent témoignage de moi. Si vous croyez en Dieu, conséquemment vous devez croire en moi, parce, que je suis Dieu. Et pour qu'ils ne doutassent pas qu'ils demeuraient eux aussi en Dieu avec Jésus-Christ pour la vie éternelle, le Seigneur continue et dit:

5. « Il y a plusieurs demeures dans la maison de mon Père. » Le sens de ces paroles est celui-ci: Vous régnerez avec moi dans la vie éternelle en laquelle il y a plusieurs demeures, c'est-à-dire plusieurs dignités. En cet heureux séjour, autre est la clarté du soleil, autre celle de la lune, autre celles des étoiles. La maison de Dieu le Père, c'est la prédestination et sa prescience. En cette maison, chaque âme parfaite obtient son séjour au moyen du denier qui est compté et donné également à tous, car il est la mesure égale et non diverse de la vie de l'éternité: Ou, d'une autre façon: La maison de mon Père est le temple de Dieu, le royaume de Dieu, c'est-à-dire les hommes justes, entre lesquels il existe beaucoup de différences. Et ce sont là les demeures de cette maison, c'est-à-dire les dignités qui sont préparées dans la prédestination, comme l'Apôtre le dit: "Il nous a choisis avant la création du monde "par la prédestination (Éph. I.); mais ces dignités, il faut les attendre des bonnes oeuvres. Aussi l'Apôtre ajoute: "Ceux qu'il a prédestinés, il les a appelés; et ceux qu'il a appelés, il les a purifiés (Rom. VIII. 32). » Et c'est ce que dit le Seigneur: si nonobstant cela, "je vous avais dit que je vais vous préparer une place: si je m'en vais et si je vous prépare une place, je reviendrai et je vous prendrai avec moi, afin que là où je suis, vous y soyez aussi. » Le sens est celui-ci: En la maison de mon Père, il y a diverses récompenses selon les mérites; si néanmoins, c'est-à-dire, si ces mérites n'existaient pas, « je vous aurais dit » que je vais vous préparer une place. Mais parce qu'elles s'y trouvent préparées par la prédestination, il n'est pas nécessaire que je vous y en prépare d'autres. Mais comme ces mérites ne sont pas encore acquis par les oeuvres, le Seigneur ajoute: "Mais si je m'en vais et vous prépare une place, ie viendrai encore et vous prendrai avec moi, afin que là où je suis, vous y soyez vous-mêmes. C'est comme sil disait: Vous avez un séjour dans la maison de mon Père en vertu de la prédestination: mais je vais à mon Père et je vous le préparerai par les bonnes oeuvres. Vous avez en cette maison une demeure éternelle, mais vous n'y pouvez arriver que par un grand travail. Cette demeure, vous l'avez seulement parle don et la grâce de Dieu; mais je veux que vous m'en soyez aussi redevables. Je me retire de vous selon la divinité, et je vous préparerai, selon l'humanité, cette béatitude ineffable que je vous ai disposée selon la divinité, depuis l'origine du monde. Ces joies inexprimables, vous ne pouvez les goûter d'aucune façon, si auparavant je n'ai quitté et repris mon corps de chair. Je monterai au ciel, je, vous enverrai le Saint-Esprit qui vous apprendra à agir par les oeuvres et l'action de grâces, de telle sorte que vous ayez droit, par vos efforts, à ce royaume de l'éternelle félicité qui vous a été préparé en vertu de la prédestination.

6. Le Seigneur Jésus prépare chaque jour une place à ses fidèles, en offrant à Dieu son Père sa chair qui a souffert pour le salut du genre humain; et ainsi il nous fait obtenir, par son humanité, le lieu qu'il nous avait préparé par sa divinité. Toutes les fois que nous faisons quelque bonne oeuvre, prière, jeûne, lecture, méditation, larmes versées sur nos péchés, ou causées par le désir de voir Jésus-Christ, visite des infirmes, secours distribués aux indigents et autres saintes actions qu'il est trop long d'énumérer, toujours nous est préparée, en retour, la bienheureuse demeure du paradis par les mains de celui qui a dit: « Sans moi vous ne pouvez rien faire. » Mais il nous y introduira si nous vivons en sa foi et en son amour, lorsqu'il viendra rendre à chacun selon ses mérites. Et c'est là ce qu'il assure: "Je viendrai de nouveau, et je vous prendrai avec moi, afin que là où je suis, vous y soyez vous aussi ". Paroles qui reviennent à dire; j'apparaîtrai dans le jugement et vous introduirai en ces demeures pour que vous y restiez éternellement avec moi. O souveraine, ô pleine félicité, habite avec Jésus-Christ! qui pourra parvenir à une si glorieuse béatitude! qui sera assez fortuné pour régner avec le Christ pour voir sa gloire et contempler sa beauté!

7. O Jésus, Jésus, que je voudrais mériter de vous voir, ô mon Jésus! Je crois en Dieu, je crois en vous, et néanmoins mon coeur est grandement troublé. Il ne le serait pas si j'avais entendu tomber de votre bouche ces paroles,: « que votre coeur ne s'inquiète, point ». Mais à présent mon âme est grandement agitée, parce que je ne puis vous voir tout de suite; je ne veux, je ne désire, je ne cherche, il ne me faut pas autre chose que de vous voir, vous mon Seigneur et mon Dieu: Je vous cherche et ne vous trouve point; je vous appelle et vous ne me répondez pas. Je brûle de vous voir et je n'y puis parvenir; vous êtes pourtant tout ce que je désire. Vous m'êtes témoin, ô Vérité souveraine, que mon coeur est grandement troublé: mais j'ai confiance en votre miséricorde, mon âme vous verra et sera rassasiée de vous, et par vous, et dans vous et pour vous, mais en vertu de mes mérites, mais par l'effet de vos bontés si grandes et si nombreuses, je vous verrai, Dieu mon Sauveur, et lorsque vous viendrez juger le siècle par le feu. Mais je vous conjure par , vous-même et par celle qui;vous a donné le jour, quand vous paraîtrez pour ce terrible jugement; attirez-moi à vous, afin que là où vous êtes en ce moment, je puisse m'y trouver avec vous et avec vos disciples à qui vous avez dit, étant sur le point d'aller à votre Père: «Et vous savez où je vais, et vous en connaissez le chemin ». Ils savaient, en effet, que vous alliez vers votre Père et que vous étiez la voie qui mène à lui, vous qui vivez et réglez avec le même Père en l'unité du Saint-Esprit, dans tous les siècles des siècles. Amen.

The writings of the Fathers were weightily disposed towards the concept of degrees of reward and punishment, and the tradition thus established was continued through the Middle Ages, largely through the agency of Peter Lombard's Sentences, which transmitted the ideas of Augustine on the matter, and was accepted by a Church which tended to think in hierarchic terms. (note: Peter Lombard, Sentences, iv. dist. 49, c. 1; cf. Aquinas, Commentary on the Sentences, dist. 49, q.5, art. 1)

Let us turn to the beatific vision that the blessed will enjoy in the hereafter. The elect will all "live happily in eternal life," without any desire to sin. Nevertheless, "some will be more distinguished than others," in accordance with the scriptural saying that there exist "many mansions" in the Father's house (Mt. 14:2).

Peter explains:

For, just as the lighting up of bodies will be different, so the glory of souls will be different as well. For star differeth from star, that is, one elect, from the other, in glory of mind and soul [1 Cor. 15:41]. For some will contemplate the appearance of God more closely and more clearly than others, and the very difference in contemplating God is called the diversity of mansions. The house, in fact, is one; that is. the denarius is one [see Mt 20:1] But the diversity is one of the mansions here: that is, it is a difference of clarity. This is so because both the beatitude and the life of all is one and the highest good, namely, God. All the elect will enjoy this good, but some more fully than others. They will, however, have the enjoyment by seeing by means of the appearances, and not through a glass in a dark manner (1 Cor 13). {Peter Lombard (Great Medieval Thinkers) by Philipp W. Chapter III

Again: How It Differs From And Rises Above The Second

We can now show the particular and special difference between these contemplations if we are willing to turn our attention more carefully to the representation of them. It is necessary that the propitiatory, as the covering of the ark, have some density, while gilding often—nay always—seems to have no solidity, not to mention thickness. For what can I more rightly call gilding, other than a kind of deception of the exterior sense? When gilding is placed over that ark it falsely declares to external sight that it is solid gold. So without doubt gilding is that knowledge which flows into the deep places of some wise persons but deceives the eyes of carnally foolish persons much more than it illumines them. For what does knowledge of exterior things mean to you unless perhaps it leads you to knowledge of interior things? Yet your wisdom is foolishness in the presence of God. Of what benefit is it for you to have known all other things and not to know yourself and to be ignorant of your Creator? Why do you boast of the world so much, O philosopher? If it is necessary to glory, do not glory in yourself, but in the Lord (2 Cor. 10:17). Certainly if this foolish wisdom and untaught teaching of yours advanced you to knowledge of yourself or even to knowledge of God, it would make you not so much tumid as timid. If you are rightly wise, if you are truly wise, do not have conceited wisdom but have fear. "What do you have that you have not received?" (1 Cor. 4:7). You ought to glory in the one from whom you have received and glorify the one from whom you have received. "Why do you glory as if you have not received?" (1 Cor. 4:7). "If I want to glory, I will not be foolish, for I will speak the truth" (2 Cor. 12:6). You surely see that I have the name from the thing: I am called a philosopher, a lover of wisdom: "I have said to wisdom, you are my sister, and I have called prudence my friend." (Prov. 7:4). You are deceived, deceived, O philosopher; the appearance of things deceives you and concupiscence overturns your heart. This which you reckon as wisdom and call wisdom is foolishness in the presence of God. Therefore you say, what place does it have in the ark of wisdom, or why is such a work in need of such gilding? If it shines on the surface, if it has no solidity, why does it have any place in such a work? Hear, if you will, what is acceptable in our work and what is unacceptable to us in your work. Your ark does not have a covering; you do not know how to make a propitiatory. But content with gilding alone, you glory concerning the completion of the work you do, and you do not know how to continue the work. This is clearly worthy of mockery by all because you have begun to build and you have not been able to complete. Foolish and unwise, you do not know, or else you pretend not to know, that a vessel that does not have a cover ought according to divine command to be broken to pieces at the first opportunity. It is right that the vessel should be broken to pieces since always and everywhere it lies open for all sorts of impurities. O impure philosopher, you clean your vase externally, hut internally it is full of all kinds of filth. Content with outward reputation alone, you show no zeal in purifying your conscience. Your ark shines outwardly; it is inwardly filthy inasmuch as it does not have a covering. Striver for outward reputation; neglecter of conscience: Do you not pay attention to something because it was necessary to do this and not necessary to omit that? Let your ark shine outwardly and let it shine no less inwardly. Let it shine outwardly on account of this statement: "So let your light shine before men that they may see your good works" (Matt. 5:16). And no less let it also shine inwardly on ac, count of this: "O blind Pharisee, first make clean the inside of the cup and the dish so that the outside may be made clean" (Matt. 23:26). Thus our ark has need of gilding, but it is not fitting for it to be content with gilding only. For without a covering it cannot maintain internal purity. Therefore strive according to the divine example to make the propitiatory; receive a cover of the sort that is suitable for the ark of wisdom. O unclean philosopher, if you wish to have an ark of wisdom clean within, if you crave to maintain purity of heart, ascend to this fourth stage of contemplation that is indicated by the propitiatory of the ark. We have already said above that this is that speculation that is concerned with invisible substances, namely human and even angelic spirits. Therefore the first thing in this consideration is that you should return to yourself, enter into your heart, and learn to estimate the worth of your spirit. Investigate what you are; what you have been; what you ought to I be; what you are able to be—what you have been by nature; what you are now by sin; what you ought to be by activity; what you are yet able to be by grace. From your spirit learn to know how you ought to estimate the worth of other spirits. This is the gate. This is the ladder. This is the entrance. This is the accent. By this we enter the innermost parts. By this we are raised up to the highest. This is the way to the summit of this speculation. This is the artful skill of making the propitiatory. This, without doubt, is the art by means of which purity of heart is recovered and, when recovered, is preserved. You certainly see how rightly we call this work the covering of the ark. By it we protect the purity of the innermost parts. Assuredly, if your ark with its gilding were under such a cover, namely a propitiatory of such sort; if your philosophy served such a philosophy it would also be acceptable to us. But our theologians know better than worldly philosophers how to use these things. Finally, hear what is acceptable to us in our work and what ought justly to be acceptable to you in the gilding of our ark. First: that it is placed upon wood; second: that it is placed underneath the propitiatory; third: that it is placed between the two. It is placed over wood so that it may stand out in relief and hide for you the concupiscence of the eyes, and you may have a covering for your eyes lest perchance your eyes may be uncovered and see vanity. It is placed underneath the propitiatory so that it may be lifted up to higher things and so that knowledge of lower things may serve higher things and sharpen by means of much exercise the eye of the mind for comprehending higher things. It is placed between the propitiatory and the wood so that it may separate them and stop the human soul from love of lower things lest perchance after being cast down from sublime things, drawn away by its own concupiscence from the place of pleasures and enticed after its own concupiscence, the soul should go and become a wanderer and a fugitive upon the earth.

Chapter IV

How It Differs From And How Much It Rises Above The Third

We have just compared the fourth stage of contemplation with the first and second stages; now if it seems right, it should be compared with the third stage. We can probably do this better if we turn our attention to the representation of each of these. And so, turning attention to the representation of both, namely the golden propitiatory and the golden crown, I discover many differences between them. I pass over in silence the fact that the crown is fastened to wood, for the third stage of contemplation is supported by imagination, as has been shown above, while the fourth stage (the one about which we speak here) strives zealously to tread underfoot all imagination by the loftiness of its investigation. For this reason, according to the expression of similitude, our propitiatory ought neither to adhere to wood nor to be attached to wood. I also pass over the fact that the crown, which stands, rises up into the heights, while the propitiatory, which lies down, expands itself round about in greater amplitude because through pleasure in the sweetness of this contemplation and sweetness in the pleasure, the soul finds for the first time a place of great security and a solitary place of marvelous tranquillity for itself. Such unaccustomed and unexperienced delight gathers the longing of the heart to quiet and sets it in order for peace. Now, however, I direct your attention to the size of both, and in this respect I do not pass over the difference between them without careful consideration. For behold what I am unable to deny: They do not differ at all in the quality of the material, but there is much in every way in which they differ from each other in the quantity of the material. Each is made out of gold, because each is engaged in reasoning. But the small amount of gold from which the crown is made is exceedingly small if it is compared with the size of the propitiatory. In fact the measurement of the propitiatory in length as well as in width is defined with great care by divine teaching. Divine teaching is completely silent, however, concerning the size of the crown. No measurement of it is given, as if the divine word were to hint silently concerning the making of the crown, that he who is able to understand will understand and any person will make as much as he is able to make. I think that if its height could have extended itself up to a half cubit, the divine word would not have passed by this in complete silence. But the Lord who teaches a person knowledge knew His creation and could not completely conceal from him how much a lack of gold supports error in this human work and how the limitation of human mental sense constricts him in the watchtower of this contemplation. For now one abounds with the gold of wisdom in this place where he lacks every instrument with which these things ought to be understood—or if he possesses an instrument it is dull. What sort of instrument, I ask, will a person find in order to comprehend that peace which surpasses all sense? By which sense, I ask, does he comprehend what eye has not seen, nor ear heard, nor has arisen in the heart of man? (1 Cor. 2:9; Isa. 64:4). For when Paul, or a person similar to Paul, is raised up above himself and snatched up to the third heaven, certainly he does not investigate by his own spirit those hidden things about which no person is allowed to speak, but God reveals them to him through His own Spirit. But whatever human understanding attains according to this mode by a sort of ecstasy of mind, the watchtower of the third consideration does not grasp it because of the immeasurable constriction of its limitation. In fact, whatever human experience sees when snatched away by means of ecstasy of mind pertains to another kind of contemplation and not to this kind. Therefore, why marvel if the limitation of its knowledge constricts the human mind especially in that consideration where the mind labors with great helplessness of sense with respect to those things which ought to be investigated? For whatever it gathers by means of thinking or discovers by means of the similitude of visible things concerning knowledge of invisible things, this is found to be almost nothing in comparison with truth. Why is it that no measure at all is prescribed for the crown, while a measure is portrayed so carefully in the description of the propitiatory? I think that it is clearly meant to be understood from this why there should be so much lack of gold in this present work.

Chapter V

How strongly the mind is able to pursue this contemplation and how it advances to it by much consideration and knowledge of itself

He who seeks to abound in the gold of wisdom ought to pursue this fourth contemplation according to his strength and to exert himself vigorously in constructing the propitiatory. For a work of this sort is very pleasing in every way, and in this work every person offers of his own accord almost always more than is necessary—not to say as much as suffices. An abundance of gold will never be lacking for the one who pursues this work vigorously. If you seek a reason, accept a reason. When you begin to pursue spiritual contemplations and to rise up through consideration of your spirit to contemplation of spirits and to make spiritual things from spiritual things in this way, you also begin in a like manner to be spiritual. In this contemplation you will undoubtedly complete what you began to be in the preceding contemplation, namely spiritual. Do you know sufficiently that the spiritual person judges all things, of what sort this knowledge will be, and how great will be the abundance of this gold that is able to judge all things? Do you still wish it to be shown openly to you from what source you can provide this abundance of gold for yourself? Does it go beyond comprehension that the kingdom of God is within us? Behold, you say, the kingdom of heaven is within us but is gold within us in a similar way? Why not, I say. So! Have you forgotten that the kingdom of heaven is like a treasure hidden in a field? Behold, from what source an abundance of gold abounds abundantly to you. You have it at hand. Dig it up, if you will. Go quickly, sell what you have, purchase this field, and seek the hidden treasure. Whatever in the world you crave, whatever in the world you hesitate to part with, expend it freely for freedom of the heart. After purchasing the field, dig in the depths of it, exulting no doubt like persons who dig up a treasure and rejoice greatly when they have discovered a sepulcher. It is necessary to seek this treasure in the depths because wisdom is drawn from a hidden place. But wretched me; from what source does gold come to me for the gilding, the crown, and the propitiatory? I do not have silver and gold, and from what and how can these things be made? By what art, I ask, can I procure this gold for myself? I am not able to dig; I blush to beg. I know what I shall do. I shall go quickly to my Father, the Father of mercies from whom comes every good gift and every perfect gift, because He who gives copiously to everyone and does not reproach them is rich toward all. And so I pour out my prayer in His presence; I announce before Him my poverty and lack of gold; and I shall say to Him: Lord, you know my lack of (wisdom; my property is like as nothing before you; give me understanding, Lord, and I have gold and am rich. Since I am weak, and my soul and I shall have a propitiatory of the sort I crave. O how great an abundance of gold existed for him who was able to sing in truth: "I have understood more than all who teach me. I have understood more than the elders because I have sought your commandments" (Ps. 118:99-100). O what kind of propitiatory he had who sang confidently before the Lord: "You have protected me from the assembly of the wicked, from the multitude of those working iniquity" (Ps. 63:3). Late but at last Paul made a propitiatory for himself when he declared openly, "I am aware of nothing against myself" (I Cor. 4:4). Without great counsel he would not have known how to cleanse the ark of his conscience and without a golden propitiatory he would not have been able to keep clean the secret places of the heart. But up to this time, when he had been persecuting the Church of God, I think that he did not have a propitiatory. However, since he did this unknowingly and did not have the gold from which he might make himself a propitiatory it was reckoned to him for an indulgence. In what way was he able to make the propitiatory when he saw nothing with open eyes? But after he received the light of his eyes (Acts 9:17-18) he became a man who sees his poverty and henceforth takes more attentive care of himself; and he returned into himself and learned by experience that the kingdom of heaven is undoubtedly within us. For after finding the treasure hidden in a field he was enriched very much; and after being made famous he began to possess much property, beyond measure, more than thousands of pieces of gold and silver. Finally listen to someone glorying not so much about the gold as about the treasure: "However, we have this treasure in earthen vessels" (2 Cor. 4:7). O man of riches; O man truly made famous! Was not that man who spoke of wisdom among the perfect the richest among all the Easterners? But what are we to say concerning that person who not lately like Paul but from the beginning of life has made for himself a propitiatory by which he also has preserved the purity of his heart? For this reason he also said: "For my heart does not reproach me with regard to all my days" (Job 27:6). Finally if you also desire to fulfill the Lord's command, guard your heart with all care and you have begun to make the sort of propitiatory the Lord requires from you. Learn by an example what it is advantageous to do; hear how David points himself out to you as an example: "I was meditating in the night with my heart; I was busily engaged and I searched my spirit" (Ps. 76:7). He was meditating with his heart; you also meditate with your heart. He searched his own spirit; you also search your own spirit. Occupy yourself with the field; pay attention to yourself. While pursuing this exercise you will undoubtedly discover the treasure hidden in a field.

Chapter VI

How From Speculation Of One's Self An Understanding Of Spiritual Things Is Secured Or Is Restored After Being Lost

On account of this exercise the abundance of gold increases, knowledge is multiplied, and wisdom is increased. On account of this exercise the eye of the heart is cleansed, natural capacity is sharpened, and understanding is enlarged. He who does not know himself cannot rightly estimate the value of anything. He who does not consider the worth of his original condition does not know how all earthly pride should lie under his feet. He who does not first reflect upon his spirit knows nothing; he does not know what he ought to think concerning the angelic spirit or the divine Spirit. If you are not able to enter into yourself, how will you be capable of examining those things which are within or above you? If you are not worthy to enter into the first tabernacle, with what impudence do you dare to enter into the second tabernacle, that is, into the Holy of Holies? If you are not able to struggle along the high paths so that with the Lord Jesus or at least with Moses you can ascend into a high mountain, with what impudence do you come forth to fly to the heavens? First return to yourself; then you may dare to examine those things which are above you. First the sun illumines the boundaries of its rising, then it mounts up to higher places. For this reason, it is said by Solomon: "The sun rises and sets, and it returns to its place, where rising again it wheels round to the south, and is turned to the north" (Eccles. 1:5-6). Therefore the sun returns to its place so that it may rise again there; and rising again little by little from that place, it raises itself up to higher places so that later it touches the peak of heaven. "The sun rises and sets, and it returns to its place" (Eccles. 1:5). The sun rises when understanding of truth is inspired in the heart. The sun sets when the ray of understanding is withdrawn. But after setting, the sun returns to its place in order that it may rise again. The very place of this sort of sun is the soul. Understanding is born from the soul itself when it is visited by divine grace. What does it mean that the sun returns to its place except that the sight of the mind turns back to consideration of itself? Therefore, after setting, the sun returns to its place because by the withdrawal of grace, the eye of the mind is caused to rebound to the consideration of its defects. When divine grace withdraws itself for the moment, a man is compelled to learn that he is nothing and that he is able to do nothing by himself. But the sun rises again after returning to its place because by consideration of his own weakness, lost understanding is restored.

Chapter VII

How Understanding That Has Been Received From Speculation Of One's Self Is Enlarged To All Things

In its place the sun, rising again little by little, ascends to higher places since by knowledge of himself a man rises up into contemplation of heavenly things. But when he is led all the way to the highest point, there he gladly remains since he is refreshed there by a marvelous delight of supercelestial manifestations. Zealously the sun contrives delays in this place where it bends its course into a circle. On that account it wheels round to the south, but it is not carried there by means of desire, but rather it is turned to the north. (Cf. Eccles. 1:6.) The southern region is very pleasant from the excess of light and the heat of the day because it is a very delightful and delectable sight to contemplate the orders of blessed spirits making merry in the splendor and charity of God. Undoubtedly the region of the north has nothing of such a sort, for it has been given over to perpetual darkness and condemned to continual cold because the hearts of the reprobates—being cold by malice and blind by ignorance—are deservedly tormented in such regions. Therefore the sun does not pass completely to that place but is only turned around, for I think it is not drawn by any longing to such an unlovable region. Nevertheless, it is turned so that it may look, as if from afar, at those things that are there and may know with what precaution it ought to seek to escape those evil things. In the east we receive knowledge of our moral character and the discretion between virtues and vices. In the south we contemplate the rewards of good merits, the joys of supernal citizens, and the secret things of divine mysteries. In the west we come to know the retributions of evil merits and the end of evil spirits and reprobate men. Do you see how much the full knowledge of himself can do for a man? For indeed, from this he advances to knowledge of everything celestial, terrestrial and infernal.

Chapter VIII

Concerning The Triple Sense By Means Of Which Consideration Of Self Is Able To Run Here And There
Therefore if you desire to fly up to the second or even the third heaven, you must pass through the first. For indeed, the spirit examines everything thoroughly, even the depths of God (1 Cor. 2:10). Therefore if you prepare to examine thoroughly the depths of God, examine first of all the depths of your own spirit. For indeed, the heart of man is deep—nay, rather it is perverse and inscrutable Jer. 17:9). Inscrutable, yes, except perhaps to one who is spiritual. For the spiritual person judges all things and is judged himself by no one because only spiritual persons have been found worthy to see the works of God and his marvelous things in the depths. Certainly in the depths you will find many things worthily awesome and wonderful; there it is possible to find another kind of orb, wide and full indeed, another kind of fullness from the orb of the earth. There the spiritual person has his own kind of earth; there he has his own heaven; not just one but a second after the first and a third after the first and second. And in order to separate this triple heaven by a suitable distinction let the first be called the imaginative, the second the rational and the third the intellectual. And so imagination takes a place in the first heaven, reason in the second, and understanding in the third. And of these, the first is gross and fleshly in comparison with the others, and in its own certain way it is touchable and corporeal since it is imaginary and phantastical, drawing after itself and retaining in itself forms and similitudes of corporeal things. But the remaining two are very subtle by comparison with something wholly corporeal and are very far from the denseness of that. So surely, without any doubt, it is evident that this exterior heaven that we call the firmament is visible and corporeal; and indeed, it is itself the first and lowest of all the heavens. What the earth is to this visible heaven, so bodily sense is to that internal, phantastical and imaginative heaven. For just as this visible heaven contains within the expanse of its vault the multitude of everything earth bears and nourishes, so imagination encloses within its bosom the similitudes of everything the senses touch and the faculty of desire brings to mind. And so similitudes and images of all visible things are contained in the first heaven. Meanwhile the rational principles, definitions and investigations of all things visible and invisible pertain to the second heaven. However, contemplations and understandings of spiritual things themselves and also divine things pertain to the third heaven.

Chapter IX

Concerning The Intellectual Sense By Which Alone Invisible Things Are Able To Be Seen

The eye of the understanding is that sense with which we see invisible things—not as with the eye of reason with which we seek and find hidden and absent things by means of investigation or as we often understand causes by effects or effects by causes, and now one set, now another set of things by every possible mode of reasoning. But just as we are accustomed to see corporeal things visibly, presently and corporeally by means of bodily sense, so the intellectual sense grasps invisible things invisibly, to be sure, but presently and essentially. However, this intellectual eye has before it a great spread-out veil that has been darkened on account of the delight of sin and intertwined with the changing multiplicity of so many fleshly desires. This keeps the sight of the contemplative from the secrets of divine mysteries, except insofar as divine esteem has admitted anyone for his own benefit or the benefit of another. The Prophet, who said to the Lord "Unveil my eyes," bears witness to this (Ps. 118:18). Certainly he who asks that they be unveiled by the Lord shows that he has veiled eyes. Nevertheless by means of this very eye, the soul sees those things which are on this side of the veil, that is the invisible things of itself, namely those things which are in itself. Yet it does not see all things because not all things are on this side of the veil. Also, by means of the eye with which it sees certain things of itself, it is not able to see itself, i.e., the essence of the soul itself. But there is doubt whether we are going to see those things which we have shown are beyond the veil by this same eye of the understanding or if there is one sense that we use in order to see invisible divine things and in the same way we use other senses in order to see the invisible things of ourselves. But those who assert that one sense has a sight of higher things and another has a sight of lower things should look from whence this can be proved. I believe that it is here that they completely confuse the signification of this word "understanding." For they restrict its signification, now concerning only the superior, now only the inferior speculation, and at another time they comprehend both senses under one signification of the word. Notwithstanding, are we to call this twin sight of superior and inferior things "twin" in the sense of "from one head," or are we to call it "twofold"? Instrument of the same sense, or twin effect of the same instrument: Whichever of these we wish to choose, nothing prevents us from saying that both of these pertain to the intellectual heaven. Why, is this heaven not said to have two great lights? Just as it is necessary to believe concerning other heavens, so it is that the more sublime and subtle speculation is the greater light in this highest heaven, and the lower and more obscure speculation is the lesser light.

Chapter X

Concerning The Intellectual Watchtower And Its Superior Height

This ultimate and highest heaven has its day. Without doubt it 'so has its night, and as long as we are in this life, if we direct our attention to this heaven what other than night do we have or are we able to have until night completes its course again, and the light of I awn, casting a reddish glow, drives away the darkness of night? Nevertheless, this night will be illumined like day because any day of this lowest heaven is surpassed by the brilliance of this night. Indeed, God placed the moon and stars in the power of the night and for that reason this night is my illumination in my delights. For it has its moon, that lesser light which we have indicated above, and it has stars, which expand their light everywhere and are assuredly the multiform modes of divine showings. But those who sleep, sleep at night. They cannot see the lights of this heaven nor sing with the Prophet before the Lord: "Because I shall see your heavens, the work of your fingers, the moon and stars which you have created" (Ps. 8:4). Likewise they cannot sing: "In the middle of the night I will rise up to praise you" (Ps. 118:62). What am I to say concerning such a man, since in vain he expects day and sees neither it nor the light of the rising dawn? Certainly those who are such "are taken away like wax that runs down; the fire has fallen upon them and they have not seen the sun" (Ps. 57:9). Happy are those who venture to sing confidently concerning the morning of this day: "In the morning I shall stand before you and see, for you are not a God who wills iniquity" (Ps. 5:5). I think that he signified the middle of the day who said concerning his beloved: "Show me where you, whom my soul loves, pasture, where you lie down in the middle of the day" (Cant. 1:6). I think that he wanted to signify the morning of this day and that he was warmed for a long time by desire for it, who said: "I hoped until the morning" (Isa. 38:13). Who among you rejoiced greatly that he might see this day, and then saw it and was happy? Certainly that one is great, whoever he is. Nevertheless, I believe that no one can reach the mid-point of this day, at least in this corruptible flesh, although I dare not deny this concerning the morning. Surely whoever among you can come to the brightness of this day when the sun has risen in heaven will see the truth of the judgment that the light seems softer and the sun more delightful to the eye. The sun of this day has its rising; but it knows no setting, just as the day itself does not have an evening although it begins from dawn. He knew that heaven of heavens for one day only. But one day in its courts is better than a thousand days in a lower heaven. For surely the second heaven has many days and also innumerable nights, according to which its sun rises and sets and returns to its place. So the first heaven received a moon in time, and its sun knew its own setting. But the sun and moon of the highest heaven remained in their dwelling place. For when the lights of this heaven have come to the summit they fix their course, and in the future they are never ever inclined to set. If entirely and without doubt the kingdom of heaven is within us, if it can be found within us, where, I ask, other than in this highest of heavens, is it sought more rightly, found more quickly and possessed more securely? I think that all the regions of that kingdom abound in gold because the kingdom of heaven is like a treasure hidden in a field. For if you seek and love the gold of knowledge and the treasure of wisdom where, I ask, will you be able to find more abundant riches than in this highest of heavens? Where, I beg you, will the brightness of the highest wisdom be able to shine forth better for you, other than in the express image of that One and in His most excellent work, namely in the creation, restoration and glorification of the soul? Surely from this watchtower, from a nearby point as it were, he is able and is accustomed to see what that loftiness of the angelic spirit is, what that supereminent magnitude of the divine Spirit is. In no place is it seen more nearly, is it discerned more clearly, than from the summit of this lofty seat which is that highest and sempiternal beatitude of supernal citizens. In no place other than from this most excellent of the heavens does that spirit who examines thoroughly all things, even the depths of God, contemplate more serenely those invisible things of God which are perceived by the intellect through those things which have been made. Nowhere in all His works, other than in the creation, restoration and glorification of the soul, does His power appear more (sublime, His wisdom more marvelous, His mercy more delightful. I think you surely see from whence comes to you that abundance of `gold that I promised to you earlier; namely how from much consideration and knowledge of your spirit you will be raised up to the knowledge and contemplation of the angelic spirit and the divine Spirit.

Chapter XI

The Triple Distinction Of The Fourth Speculation

But, since we already know through exposition from whence we abound with gold for such and so great a work, let us see what the Lord commands concerning the length and width of our propitiatory and why he is completely silent concerning its height. If we reflect on the nature of things, we shall be able to learn with regard to bodies themselves how we ought to proceed with an investigation into spiritual contemplations. We see in exterior things that every bodily thickness begins with length, increases with width, and ends with height. And so, the length of the propitiatory, if I am not mistaken, indicates those things which are in spiritual nature at the beginning; the width indicates those things which are for advancement; and the height indicates those things which seem to be for consummation. According to these three things we have mentioned we make a triple distinction of divine gifts in spiritual essences. First, the spiritual nature is created in order that it may exist. Second, it is made just so that it is good. Third, it is glorified so that it is blessed. And so by creation it starts toward good; by being made just it is enlarged in good; by glorification it is consummated in good. The goods of creation are for the beginning; the goods of justification are for advancement; the goods of glorification are for consummation. The first goods are gifts of the Creator; the second goods are both gifts of the Creator and merits of the creature; the third goods are gifts of the Creator and rewards of the creature, the consummation of gifts and the recompense of merits. And so, the first goods pertain to the length; the second, to the width; the last to the height. For in the first, as has been said, the rational creature starts toward the perfection of future fullness. On account of the second, it makes progress, increases and is enlarged. In the last it is raised to glory and is consummated in glory.

Chapter XII

Concerning the subdivision of the first stage of this contemplation

Therefore first let us see concerning the length of our propitiatory, which we are commanded to extend to two and one-half cubits. As often as we consider in the heart, investigate carefully, distinguish suitably and discuss sufficiently those spiritual goods of our creation which we have designated above, so often do we draw out the work of our propitiatory in length and extend it to a certain measure. And so in this drawing out of the construction of the propitiatory a threefold distinction of divine gifts suggests itself to us, concerning which alone, or most of all, the frequent and careful reexamination of our consideration ought to be engaged. From the very condition of its creation it is natural for every rational creature to exist, to know and to will. Think how necessary, how just, and how fitting it is for divine goodness to give discretion of good and evil to so worthy a creature and so excellent a nature, and at the same time to allow freedom of will so that its good might be both received and willed, both a gift and freely done. As long as you exert yourself in such a discussion, you labor in drawing out your propitiatory. Examine carefully, contemplate, and wonder at freedom of the will, discretion of judgment and sublimity of essence: With this you make your propitiatory according to the harmony of order and you draw out the due measure of quantity in length. I would be surprised if by yourself you did not pay attention to how useful or how necessary continual consideration of all these things is. For from this the mind is illumined, inflamed and confirmed in the good.

Chapter XIII

How In The First Stage Of This Contemplation The Mind Ought To Exercise Itself, And How Much Such Exercise Is Effective

Therefore, think about continually, consider earnestly, investigate carefully the will—not only your own, but also that of another, whether good or evil. Know your own will, so that you may know what to correct, and also for what you ought to give thanks. {Also, think about the souls of the perfect, and even of the perverse; the souls of good spirits and of malignant spirits, so that from the consideration of opposites there may shine forth what it is expedient to imitate and what to avoid. Pay attention to what you know; pay attention to how much you do not know. Come to know how much you are set above brute spirits according to natural ability; come to know how much you are below angelic spirits according to intellect. If you pay attention to how much you surpass a brute spirit by means of mental sense you will sing heartily, "I will bless the Lord who gave me understanding" (Ps. 15:7). If you think about angelic understanding you will surely declare: "God, you know my lack of wisdom" (Ps. 68:6). Therefore it is very beneficial and necessary for me to examine my ignorance in order that I may know what I lack and may say with the blessed Job: "If I have not known anything, my ignorance is my own" Job 19:4). But, as often as I direct attention into myself, how or how often has He shown me uncertain and hidden things of His wisdom? Surely my soul magnifies the Lord who teaches us more than the knowledge possessed by birds and draft-cattle because it is He who illumines all men who come into this world. (Cf. John 1:9.) You see how great the benefit of this twin consideration is: namely to direct attention to the affection of the rational will and also to the sense of reason. But what should I say concerning the third of the designated considerations: Do we contemplate in wondering and marvel in contemplating the essence of the soul, the nature of the essence and the excellence of the nature? I think one's own experience can easily teach each one how much this speculation is able to encourage the soul against vices and to stir it up toward good. Come to know your worth, O man, I beseech you; think about the excellent nature of your soul, how God made her according to His image and similitude, how He elevated her above every corporeal creature, and immediately you will begin to marvel how a famous virgin daughter of Zion has been expelled from heaven to earth, and in like manner you will begin to cry out to the Lord: "What do I have in heaven and what have I wished for upon the earth besides you?" (Ps. 72:25). What is marvelous, I ask you, if in remembrance of my original condition, if because of the glance of my soul, the disorder of my external appearance overwhelmed me suddenly and without delay? For who does not feel shame to have given over the mistress of the world, the citizen of heaven, the beloved of God, to servitude to the body; to have prostituted her to unclean spirits; to have held her for a long time under the yoke of servitude in order to take care of the flesh in its longings? Surely anyone will marvel, when he comes to know his soul, when he directs his attention correctly to what the soul is or ought to be. I say, he will marvel from what and to what she has been expelled: How a mistress of nations has been made a widow; how a princess of provinces has been placed under tribute. I think that he wished to recall us to this consideration who said: "How is it, Israel, that you are in the land of enemies; you row old in an alien land; you have been wholly defiled with dead persons; you have been counted with those who are in hell" (Bar. 3:11). And so, in this triple consideration we ought, as we have already said, to bring to completion the length of our propitiatory.

Chapter XIV

The Designation Of Those Things Which Cannot Be Comprehended In This Stage Of Speculation

Now in the first and second consideration you can extend your knowledge as far as a cubit, but in the third you cannot do this at all. For where you have an instrument apt for that which one ought to know, there you undoubtedly possess a cubit of extraordinary certitude, as it were, because you are able to grasp by experience an idea of the thing being known. For your knowledge increases to a full cubit, as it were, when you reach firmness of certitude by means of experience. But for whom I ask, has not his own experience taught what it is to will or to know? Does not each one gather this, as often as he wills in his own heart? Do you not know how limitless are the things you will; how limitless, those you do not Will; how innumerable, those you know; how innumerable, those you do not know? But how do you see your will, how do you come to know your thought? In like manner, how are you able to see or know the substance of your soul? Who, I say, in this present fleshly condition now sees or even has been able to see his soul or any spiritual substance whatsoever in its purity? Undoubtedly, in this respect the human intellect has been blind from birth and must of necessity cry daily to the Lord: "Illumine my eyes" (Ps. 12:4). Surely, if anyone in this corruptible flesh has been able to see what things of this sort are, he has been led above himself by ecstasy of mind. In that which he sees he passes beyond the limits of the human intellect, not by his own activity but on account of a divine showing. But whatever human experience has been able to reach in this way, it is undoubtedly evident that it does not pertain to this kind of contemplation but to another kind. Therefore, however much you exercise your natural ability in this consideration, however much you continue your effort without interruption, however much you enlarge your sense in this respect, you will not be able to extend your knowledge to a full cubit.

Chapter XV

That We Ought Not To Neglect Those Things Which We Comprehend Only In Part

Nevertheless, there are many things—and they ought not to be despised in the least—concerning the particular nature of spiritual essence that we are able either to gather from the authority of divine Scripture or to prove by the testimony of reason. Therefore let us strive to know in whatever way and as much as we are able, although we cannot extend it as far as a cubit by experience. Modest it is, but there is much that can be known in this consideration. Certainly, it is modest with regard to fullness, but much in every way with regard to benefit. Therefore, do not neglect what you can know concerning this cubit, even though you cannot complete it at all. That I may not be silent about the rest of the things that seem to pertain to this speculation, how much loss do we think you incur if you are ignorant concerning the immortality of the soul and do not believe it at all? For if it were not established concerning the immortality of the soul, who, I ask, would prepare himself for future retribution? Who, I beg you, would restrain his life so that he would not go after his passionate cravings? Who would make satisfaction for evils that have been committed? Who would gird himself for brave works? Who would have patience in the midst of so much bitterness of divine lashings if he utterly despaired of a future life? Everything that is affirmed concerning the redemption of the human race, everything that is believed concerning the divine sacraments, whatever is taught concerning divine instructions, whatever is hoped for concerning divine promises, is utterly destroyed if there is no hope for perpetual life for the soul. If we are persons who have hope in Christ in this life only, we are the most miserable of all people. See, we have left everything behind and have followed after Him. What, therefore, will we have if the dead do not rise again? Why do we die the whole day long on account of Him if no crown of justice is to be hoped for from Him, if the death of human beings and beasts is completely the same, and likewise the original condition of both? What advantage will it be for me if I do a great work of wisdom and justice? Do not they who eat and drink and pass their days in the good life and who feast ostentatiously daily do much better than those who are dying the whole day? Will it not be much better to go to the house of entertainment than to the house of mourning if after this life a person has no more than a beast has? (cf. Eccles. 7:3). If the dead do not rise again, why should I not rush and overflow with delights and enjoy the good things that exist? Why should we not willingly hear that voice which is saying: "Let us eat and drink, for tomorrow we die"? (1 Cor. 15:32; cf. Wisd. 2:6; Isa. 22:13, 56:12). You certainly see how many evils would follow if there were doubt concerning the immortality of the soul. We ought not to disdain in the least what we are able to accomplish with respect to this cubit, although we do not suffice for its completion. Therefore, the work of our propitiatory is begun with this triple consideration of essence (spiritual, that is) and of its discretion and will, and our work is drawn out to a definite measure. He who has exercised his soul fully in speculation of these things has finished the length of his propitiatory. Now that we have said these things concerning the length of the propitiatory, we now turn the hand of investigation to its width.

Chapter XVI

Concerning The Subdivision Of The Second Stage Of Contemplation

As we have said, those things which are at the beginning pertain to the width. However, justification enlarges our good that J begins with the work of creation and on account of this shows that it pertains to the width. Yet without two things this, work cannot be consummated. For it is never accomplished if the Creator does not cooperate with His creature. Indeed, if He willed, the Creator could complete everything by Himself without the work of the creature, just as when He willed, He was able to create so many and such great things from nothing. If we presume to push forward with our own strength without His aid, we labor in vain. He bears witness to this who says in His Gospel: "Without me you can do nothing" (John 15:5), because it is He "who works in us to will and to accomplish according to a good will" (Phil. 2:13). For it is "not of the one willing nor of the one running, but it is of God who shows mercy" (Rom. 9:16). For without Him, what will I be able to do by myself, who cannot even say "Jesus is Lord" except in the Holy Spirit (I Cor. 12:3)? Certainly it is He who works all things in all persons, apportioning to each one as He wills (I Cor. 12:11). Nevertheless, in the work of our justification voluntary consent is required by Him who says: "If you are willing and listen to me, you shall eat the good things of the land" (Isa. 1:19). He ascribes free will to persons when this work is hindered, where it is said: "If my people had listened to me, if Israel had walked in my ways, I would perhaps have humiliated their enemies for nothing and laid my hand upon those troubling them" (Ps. 80:14-15). If we do nothing at all in such a work, we appeal in vain for His aid, and falsely call Him helper. For it is one thing to do; it is another to give aid. For what does it mean to give aid except to cooperate with one who is working? That one understood that he had His aid and cooperation with regard to good who said, "Lord you are my helper and my deliverer; do not delay" (Ps. 69:6). We seek His aid daily when we cry out to Him in daily prayers: "Help us, O God our salvation" (Ps. 78:9). Therefore it is obvious that this work in which the Creator cooperates with His creature is accomplished by two. In this work, there is need for one's own activity and for divine grace. For anyone depends in vain upon free will unless he is supported by divine assistance. Our justification is accomplished by our own deliberation and divine inspiration. For to will only just things is already to be just. Indeed we are rightly said to be just or unjust from the will alone although we are judged in both cases from what we do. God cooperates with us in two modes, namely inwardly and outwardly: inwardly by secret aspiration; outwardly by the open aid of His works. But that cooperation which is exterior has nothing to do with this kind of contemplation, since our propitiatory must be made of pure gold, and this speculation ought to subsist in pure understanding. And so our own deliberation and divine inspiration are the two things by which the width of our propitiatory is brought to completion.

Chapter XVII

That, Similarly, There Are Some Things In The Second Stage Of This Contemplation That Cannot Be Comprehended

We learn by daily use what this deliberation is and after so much experience we cannot hesitate concerning certitude of it. For this reason we are able to extend our knowledge in this respect as far as a full cubit. But I ask, who in this life, at least, suffices to comprehend in what manner divine grace is accustomed to visit the heart and by its inspiration to incline everything to its will? However much we labor in this consideration we do not extend our work in this respect to a full cubit. For how can human understanding comprehend the manner of divine inspiration since in His Gospel the Lord reminds us of the incomprehensibility of the same thing: "The Spirit blows where it wills and you hear its voice, and you do not know whence it comes or whither it goes" (John 3:8). And so we are taught by the authority of Scripture about the assistance of divine grace, a thing we prove by the daily failure due to our infirmity and the clear effect of the cooperation of grace. Indeed with regard to this, His grace is often withdrawn from us so that human infirmity may be taught by its own failure how it cannot do anything good by itself. Again with regard to this, the same grace that earlier had been removed is restored again so that by its effect we may experience what we are as the result of a gift from God. Why is it that in one and the same thing now we are able, now we are not able, except that now we have helping grace, now we do not have it? And so it is clear that we are allowed to doubt very little concerning the assistance of divine grace, although we are able to comprehend very little about the modes of its cooperation. We are not able to complete a cubit in the work of this consideration of ours because we do not extend our natural ability as far as the limit of comprehension in the width of this investigation. The reason is clear why the width of our propitiatory cannot extend itself as far as two cubits and why, according to the divine example, it properly has one and one-half cubits. Therefore if you exercise your soul to the fullest in this twofold consideration, you complete the width of your propitiatory according to a suitable manner.

Chapter XVIII

Concerning The First And Second Distinctions Of This Contemplation And The Difference Between Them

Let no one think that the consideration of will that we proposed above is the same as this consideration of deliberation we now have assigned to the width. To the former pertains that which is done in the mind from the operation of nature only; to the latter, that which is done frequently in the mind from the work of activity. To the former pertains any power of the soul implanted in it naturally; to the latter, any virtue of the soul joined with it by activity. Finally, to the former pertains any motion of the soul that is moved by some natural force; to the latter, any motion of the soul that is produced by some guidance of rational disposition. We are accustomed to call "will" that power of the soul which is able and accustomed to form itself into so many affections and to change in manifold ways through the soul. I say, we are accustomed to call this power of the soul "will." In a similar way, if I may say so, we call the motion and the act of such an instrument "will," and we say that the will itself wills. We call "will" not only the act of willing that which is brought about by natural motion only but also that act of willing which any consent of the soul accompanies on account of deliberation. But in any case the lack of words compels us at one time to extend the signification of words, at another to restrict it, and to vary it suitably under the pressure of necessity. But in order that we may sufficiently distinguish what we ought to ascribe to this consideration, it seems that every consent of the soul and everything that is done in the soul from consent pertains to this consideration. In a similar manner, any sense or motion whatsoever of the soul that is done against consent or beyond consent is as described rightly to consideration of the length. For, as has already we said above, the goods of creation ought to be assigned to the length of our propitiatory while the goods of justification ought to be ascribed to its width. And we know that everything in the soul that is beyond consent is certainly not able to make a person just. And so to the first consideration pertains careful direction of our attention to those goods which the mind may naturally possess in abundance or be in want of. But to the second pertains knowledge of which goods the mind may already possess on account of virtue and which it may not yet be capable of possessing. It is easy, I think, to see or to have known how it is necessary or beneficial to possess both of these considerations intimately and to draw them into contemplation frequently. For from the first consideration a person discerns to which goods he is naturally more inclined, to which evils he is more liable; which endeavors he ought to pursue more vigorously, which evils he ought to guard against more earnestly; by which exercises he is able better to advance, by which vices he can more easily be corrupted. However, from the second consideration one discerns to which sins he is subject or by which merits he stands out, and what punishment or reward he is to expect for these; how much he advances or falls behind each day; with how much activity of soul he is to busy himself in order to blot out past evils, avoid present ones, and prevent future ones; with how much constancy of soul he is to strive in order to recover lost goods and keep or increase goods in his possession. What a pleasure, what a suitable, and how delightful a manifestation to draw to speculation according to the first consideration so many qualities of the soul, so many of its thoughts, and so many of its affections, and to suspend the soul in wonder at them. O how marvelous speculation! O how amazing a pleasure of delight to have before our eyes according to the second consideration so many virtues of the soul, so many of its exercises, so many of its efforts and merits, and to cling for a long time in contemplation of that sort.

Chapter XIX

That The Things Pertaining To The Third Distinction Can Be Comprehended By None Of Our Senses

But now it surely seems worthy to consider why he who has carefully described the length as well as the width has been completely silent concerning the height of our propitiatory. It has been shown above that those things which are for glorification undoubtedly pertain to this third consideration, just as those things which are for justification pertain to the width of the propitiatory. But what human sense is able to grasp the mode of our glorification? What reason is able to comprehend it? Who has seen the witness of such evidence in another or has deserved to be undergoing the experience of this thing in himself? Surely in this life a man neither has sufficient proof of this thing nor is capable of understanding any experience of it. Rightly, therefore, no measure for the altitude of the aforementioned work is commanded since the manner of our glorification, as has been said, can be comprehended by no sense of ours. And, indeed, the propitiatory is believed to have some thickness, but this is not reckoned in comparison to the dimension of the others. So in any case we hold by the witness of faith to the certitude of our glorification although we are not yet able to grasp by means of the understanding the mode of its quality or its extent. But human eagerness reckons for very little or almost for nothing everything that it cannot test by means of experience. However we know that after a full cleansing of conscience, after much practice of justice, the human mind at long last begins at some time to hope for that which earlier it had scarcely been able to believe in. In this way the measure of our propitiatory rises in height and grows in solidity. I believe that it pertains to the solidity of this propitiatory when the mind begins to glory in the Lord and give no small thanks for good testimony of conscience, so much so that it truly dares to make confession, since "our glory is this: the testimony of conscience" (2 Cor. 1:12). But if you want your propitiatory to increase in height and to receive a suitable solidity in the proportion that it is capable of becoming in this life, you must never cease, never be inactive until, as I have said, you possess some betrothal gifts of that future fullness, and receive the first fruits, however small, of eternal happiness, and begin to have a foretaste of the sweetness of divine pleasantness. Surely he wished to animate us to a longing for his who said: "Taste and see that the Lord is sweet" (Ps. 33:9). Therefore we believe that your propitiatory already has something of thickness if you have already tasted that the Lord is sweet. But however much you grow with respect to this grace, however much you advance in it, you ought always to reckon this to be very little and to consider it as nothing with regard to the greatness of future felicity. Surely this is what sacred Scripture means by remaining silent, for it said nothing at all concerning the height of our propitiatory. It is as if it might cry out more loudly and penetrate farther and better by keeping silent itself because everything the human mind is capable of grasping thus far in this life concerning the abundance of internal pleasantness ought to be reckoned as if it were nothing. By remaining silent it cries out that it considers itself wholly unworthy to instruct us concerning the measure of this work; in this life human infirmity is scarcely able to rise up to the beginning of the work.

Chapter XX

Now This Kind Of Contemplation Can Be Divided Into Five Stages, And What Things Pertain To The First Stage

But since we have divided into three portions the first consideration, which pertains to length, and also have divided into two portions that second one, which pertains to width, we can now cut this entire kind of contemplation into five portions and divide it into just as many stages. In the first stage of this contemplation we consider those things which pertain to the quality of the soul or the particular nature of its essence: that the soul is a kind of perpetual life that cannot be extinguished at any time by any pains or torments; that it is not only able itself to live in perpetuity but is able to animate the body to life and sense; that it needs no support; that it subsists eternally without assistance. Furthermore we consider how it has been diffused through so many members of the body since it is simple in itself and lacks individual essence in the parts; how in its whole body, in a kind of world of its own, as it were, it is certainly completely everywhere, just as God is found completely everywhere in all creatures of His; how in that world of its own it moves and disposes all things by the will alone just as in this world God, who created everything by the command of the will, rules all things by the same command of the will alone. In this manifestation and in others you will discover other things worthy of much consideration, which you cannot see without wonder and cannot wonder at without delight. Yet, what wonder is this if we discover many marvelous and awesome things in the rational spirit since it is the especial creature of God and has been made according to His image and similitude? For although God is marvelous in His works and very great and laudable in all His mighty deeds, nevertheless, I beg you, where will the more extraordinary marvels of His powers appear other than in His image, in His similitude? Without doubt the activity of the omnipotent Artisan, which appears marvelous everywhere, stands out singularly in such a work.

Chapter XXI

Concerning The Consideration Of Those Things Pertaining To The Second Stage

In the second stage of this contemplation those things are considered which are for knowing or can be devoted to the pursuit of truth, and whatsoever things come together and lead to an increase of knowledge. Surely in this consideration we rightly marvel with worthy awe and wonder at the fluency of thinking, the agility of imagination, the sharpness of natural ability, the examination of discretion, the capacity of memory, the liveliness of understanding and any other things whatever concerning this. For who is capable of thinking worthily; who is capable of estimating the value sufficiently; who is not terrified in the wonder of his consideration if he pays careful attention to that fluency of human thinking which is so manifold; the speed of it that is so restless and indefatigable, that runs through so many, such varied and such an infinite number of things; that keeps quiet for neither an hour nor a moment of time; that passes through so great an expanse of space or so great a duration of time in so much haste? Furthermore we ought to pay attention to how easy a passage, how agile a running through, lies open everywhere from highest to lowest, from lowest to highest; from oldest to newest, from newest to oldest. But concerning the agility of the imagination and the skill of that faculty, what are we going to say or what are we able to say worthily about that which portrays with such great speed the image of all those things which the soul supplies? Whatever the soul takes in from outside by means of hearing, whatever it conceives from within from thinking alone, the imagination forms the whole by means of a representation, without delay and laying aside all difficulty, and it represents the forms of any things whatsoever with marvelous haste. What is it, I ask, to execute pictures of so many things and of so much in a moment, in a blink of the eye, and again to remove the same things with the same ease, or to change in many ways in one and then another manner? When it wishes, does the soul not create daily by means of the imagination a new heaven and a new earth and in that world of phantasms as it were every hour another kind of creator causes and forms according to his will creatures of that sort as large as you like? Nevertheless, if we pay attention to the sharpness of natural ability, we more quickly discover what we ought to marvel at in that. See how many—no, almost how infinite—are the things that are accessible to human natural ability that cannot be reached at any time by bodily sense. See how that sharpness of human natural ability is accustomed to investigate deep things, to penetrate whatever things are innermost, hidden within, perplexing, obscure and placed in darkness—and to unfold, disentangle, make clear and bring them out into the light. With subtlety, so to speak, it daily approaches, bursts into and passes through the innermost bosom of hidden nature and the secret recesses of its liveliness, making haste and always striving with eagerness to penetrate into farther places and to mount up to higher things. Pay attention to how many disciplines of knowledge it discovers, how many arts it hammers out. Then you will begin to be struck with amazement and to faint from excessive wonder. So if you pay attention to the capacity of memory and its breadth, undoubtedly you will discover what you ought to marvel at worthily. How great, I ask, is that inner chamber of such immense breadth, that comprehends, conceals and preserves so many substances of things, so many forms of substances, so many kinds of things, so many species of kinds, so many individuals of species—indeed so many particular natures, so many qualities, so many quantities, actions and passions, conditions, positions and places of individuals during the revolution of its extent of time, and after having preserved them for a long time, it brings them forth in the midst of all? Think, if you are able, how great, how wide, how large, how deep, how high, those treasuries are that are able to collect from all sides and to preserve without confusion so many treasures of knowledge and jewels of wisdom. Without doubt the capacity of memory is marvelous but the liveliness of the understanding is no less marvelous. It is easy to ponder and gather how great and marvelous it is from the things already said. For whatever sense touches, thought produces; whatever imagination forms, natural ability investigates and memory conserves. The understanding grasps knowledge of these things, and when it pleases it admits them to consideration and draws them into contemplation.

C. The Wondrous Harmony Of Perfection

The perfected folk who sing with this voice "the sound of solemn celebration" will resound like a harmonious harp, whose "spiritual strings [are] stretched between two pieces of wood, an upper and a lower, prefiguring the mystery of the cross." On this harp Aelred hears the strings of the four fundamental virtues playing in harmony: "The first of these strings is temperance, through which one mortifying one's [physical] parts 'on the earth [(in 1:11r joins all to Christ. This string is fixed to the base of the cross, so that, founded in fear, it may emit the deep sound of confession and compunction." Aelred then turns his ear to "the second string, justice, [which] is attached to a higher part of the cross. In giving to each what is its due, it bursts forth with the brightest voice of true love. And the string of prudence, placed between the other two on the traverse wood of the cross, tempers the second string's keenness and the other's depth with the sweet sound of discretion." Aelred also hears a "fourth string, which is called fortitude [and] embraces the length of the cross, outstripping the others in the virtue of steadfastness and emitting the pleasant sound of patience. Truly, the strings of each of these virtues is joined side-by-side with the others, and these various sorts of several strings surely form, from numerical ratios, one spiritual harmony." The harmony of virtuous perfection accords perfectly, in Aelred's mind, with the order of the universe and with the economy of salvation.

The perfection that results brings an unexpected harmony to the whole person:

Whoever you are, O soul, whom the compassion of God has freed from unhappiness, you have been given rest from your labors and troubles, and from the harsh slavery to which you have been until now subject. You are surely surprised at how very easy continence has become for you. You are astonished at having thrown off the yoke of ingrained habit—even to the point that your nascent desperation at the great effort needed to get rid of it has been removed.... Rejoice with trembling; cry out in astonishment: "How is it that the oppressor has ceased, that the tribute is spared [Is 14:4]?"

Thus the harmony of the human with the divine, and of each human with all others," will sound forth in a music that is for Aelred the perfection of human life on earth: "If we persevere in this warfare and do not consent to vice, we shall have the kingdom of God within us in this life, that is, justice and peace and joy. Justice as a result of virtue, peace arising from the harmony of flesh and spirit—when they together agree on the good—joy from the testimony of a good conscience [see 2 Cor 1:12]."

D. The Perfection Of The Coming Life

The joy that perfected people experience in this world is as nothing when compared with the joys that they will experience in the next life. Speaking of the saints in heaven, Aelred says: "Now consider, brothers, if you can, how exalted are they in heaven who can be so exalted and honored on earth. Surely, brothers, if we could see, at one and the same time, all the glory of the world and all the praise of the world and all the joy of the world, in comparison with this joy of theirs it would seem nothing other than absolute misery." Aelred is convinced that a place in this company of the saints awaits all who have traveled the hard road of virtue. Indeed, he often places such a reward before his audience in the hope of encouraging their efforts.

Reward implies merit, and, since it is clear to Aelred that some folk are more meritorious than others, this brings up the question of whether the heavenly rewards are equal for all. One of the participants in Aelred's dialogue On the Soul puts the question this way: "Are there not some blessed souls more perfect than others, or are they all equal in perfection?" Aelred answers:

The Lord said: "In my Father's house there are many rooms 1Jn 14:21." He thus distinguished various degrees even among the perfect.... You know that, among the saints, there are distinctions of reward, just as of merit....Each room in the Father's house has its own perfection. So each person is said to be perfect who, in differentiation from all others, is found ready for that room for which she or he has been destined. So all will be equal in the same everlasting state, but different in the rooms [to which they are assigned]. So all will be equal in their happiness because, as one true love works its effect in them all, each will have what they all will have, and all will have what each one has.

But these distinctions fade from Aelred's thought when he considers that all God's folk, in whatever way or to whatever extent, are perfect because they have been perfected by God's free gift of salvation; they are the people of Israel who are "the people belonging to God, clearly those who were predestined 'to life everlasting [Ac 13:48].'" Thus, even those saints whose lives were characterized by exemplary spiritual and physical practices of virtue are, for Aelred, the recipients of celestial happiness, not the authors of it."

In his Life of Saint Edward, King and Confessor, Aelred states this position quite clearly by putting in the mouth of the dying saint these words: "...I go to the Father to receive the joys promised to the faithful. This is not for my merits but by the grace of the Lord our Savior, who has pity on whom he wills and shows mercy to whom he pleases." An appropriate, accepting response to God's loving-kindness allows the recipient a confident hope in everlasting happiness. Aelred prays: "May there be for us a spiritual resurrection when, progressing from fear to hope by a happy leap, and secure now in the remission of our sins, we sigh for that celestial good with a sort of mental rapture. Following our Lord, with our attachment and desire, in his ascension into heaven, let us now presume to sit with him in the heavens and reign with him."

In heaven, Aelred is sure, the holy folk reign together with Christ—and with each other. He sees Saint Edward welcomed into the celestial realm by other saints, including Peter, John the Evangelist, and Mary, the mother of Jesus: "...The citizens of heaven came to meet him. The ethereal key-bearer unlocked heaven for him; the disciple whom Jesus loved ran to meet him. As a virgin, with that virgin he follows 'the Lamb wherever he goes [Rv 14:4]." Once welcomed, the new citizen joins the community of the saints in their common activities of praising God and caring for those left behind in the community of those still struggling to join them:

Blessed Ninian, made perfect in life and mature in age, passed happily from the world and was borne to heaven, accompanied by angelic spirits, to receive an eternal reward. There, associated with the apostolic choir and added to the ranks of the martyrs, enlisted in the army of holy confessors and adorned with virginal flowers, he does not cease assisting those who hope in him, those who cry out to him, those who praise him.

The prayer and care of the saints for those still striving on earth is, for Aelred, a reflection of the profoundly social nature of all humans, who, he thinks, cannot be happy save in association with others" Thus, the saints in heaven "themselves care for our progress [in perfection], and they pray for us all the more devoutly as they know themselves incapable of perfection without us."

Aelred's heaven is thus a community, a community that rejoices together and resembles nothing so much as a celestial banquet—prefigured, Aelred thinks, by Christ's eating and drinking with his friends and disciples on earth:

After his resurrection our Lord wished to entrust great mysteries to us by means of certain physical signs. During those days he appeared to his disciples as they were fishing, and, at his bidding, they brought to shore "a net filled with large fish, one hundred and fifty-three [Jo 21:11 ]." This symbolizes those who, at the coming resurrection, will be presented to the Lord by the ministers of Christ. And that meal which he wished to share with his disciples signifies that banquet at which we shall, in his kingdom, eat and drink at his table [sec Lk 22:30]

E. The Final Fulfillment

From that heavenly banquet nothing that fills and fulfills humans will be missing. So splendid is the food of the heavenly banquet that it transcends Aelred's intellectual powers and defies his imagination to describe it "What the nature of that kingdom [will be] is something of which we cannot even think, much less tell or write. I do know that nothing at all will be lacking that you might wish to have present, that nothing will be there that you might wish to be absent."<sup>56</sup> Aelred seems to know much of what heaven is not, and, despite his disclaimer, he knows much of what heaven is as well:

So what are the goods there present? Where there is neither sorrow nor tears, what could there be but perfect joy? Where there is no tribulation or temptation, no variation in, or worsening of, weather, neither violent heat nor harsh winter, what could there be but the most moderate temperature and true and complete tranquility of mind and flesh? Where there is nothing for you to fear, what could there be but total security???

Heaven is, above all, a state of immersion in the glories of true love, for where there is no discord or envy or suspicion or any ambition, neither adulation nor detraction, what could there be but supreme and true love? Where there is no poverty or any covetousness, what could there be but abundance of all good things? Where there is no deformity, what will there be but true beauty? Where there is no toil or weakness, what will there be but complete rest and vigor? Where there is no prospect of old age, no fear of disease, what could there be but true health? Where there is neither night nor darkness, what will there be but perfect light? Where all death and mortality have been swallowed up [sec 1 Cor 15:54], what could there be but everlasting life???

That everlasting life and bliss are enjoyed by the whole human, both in body and in soul:

The body will be full of the majesty of the Lord, who will give life to the dead, cleanse the impure, heal the infirm, glorify the ignoble, make the temporal perpetual. And, if this will be the coming happiness of the body, of what sort, I ask, will be the happiness of the soul? ... There will be occasion for our joy in the contemplation of the Creator in his creatures, of love for the Creator in himself, for the praise of the Creator in both 59

1. The Vision of Truth

In the Lord's land,... no temptation will be able to gain access to the Lord's mountains, that is, to our spirits suspended in the excellent state of divine contemplation. ""<sup>o</sup> Those thus suspended "abide in the perfect vision of God."<sup>61</sup> They are like the virgin Mary, who "on the day

[of her assumption] passed on from this world and ascended to the heavenly kingdom where she began to contemplate his [God's] glory, power, and divinity...."<sup>62</sup> They are like Mary too, who "see him 'face to face [Mt 18:10]' and dwell forever in the holy vision of him." Is This, Aelred asserts, fulfills the gospel promise: "Blessed are the clean of heart, for they shall see God [Mt 5:8]. That is, we shall see his divinity, that excellence and beauty, as the angels see it, for we shall be 'like the angels of God in heaven [Mt 22:30]."

Clearly this contemplation brings knowledge, and Aelred sees the intellect perfected in this vision: "There [in heaven] 'I shall know as I am known [1 Cor 13:12],' for there 'we shall see him [God] as he is [1 Jn 3:2].' `Now we see in a glass but obscurely, but then face to face [1 Cor 13:12]." The vision of God, Aelred asserts, brings great knowledge of him, for "he will be seen in himself, seen in all his creatures, ruling over all without anxiety, sustaining all without toil, sharing himself with and, in a way, dispersing himself to each one according to his or her capacity—without diminution or division of himself That lovable and longed-for face, 'on which the angels desire to gaze [1 Pt 1:12],' will be seen. Who can speak of its beauty, of its light, of its delight?"

But Aelred does indeed speak of that beautiful, delightful vision:

The Father will be seen in the Son, the Son in the Father, the Holy Spirit in both. He will be seen "not obscurely as in a mirror, but face to face [1 Cor 13:12]." For he will be seen as he is [sec 1 Jn 3:2], fulfilling that promise which says: "Those who love me will be loved by my Father, and I shall love them and show myself to them [fn 14:21]." From this vision will come knowledge, about which he himself says: "This is everlasting life, that they should have knowledge of you, the one God, and him whom you have sent, Jesus Christ [Jn 17:3]."

Aelred is convinced that the complete fulfillment of the intellect in the knowledge that comes from heavenly perfection is a source of true happiness: "...In that perfect vision they enjoy perfect happiness."<sup>63</sup> The proper response, as Aelred sees it, is rejoicing and praise.

2. The Unity of Love

According to Aelred, knowledge leads to love, both in this life and after it.<sup>64</sup> The consequences of union with God in love are felt in the ordering of the will to God and in the victory of the ordered spirit over the "flesh," one's disordered will. After death and in heaven, Aelred is sure, "there will be perfect peace, perfect tranquility, for the flesh will be unable to resist the spirit or the spirit resist God. The devil will not be able to attack, and neither death nor infirmity will be able to oppress [the blessed]."

The peace and tranquility that infuse the will perfected in love are, for Aelred, a participation in the very peace and tranquility that unite the Trinity.<sup>65</sup> In the life to come, then, the wills of all who have been purged of self-centeredness in this life will be cleansed of all weakness.<sup>66</sup> Thus cleansed, their wills will be filled completely in their new homelands. And this fulfillment will be one of inseparable unity with and in God's love.

The Everlasting Memory

Those thus united in love with God are blessed in the afterlife with a memory restored from its beclouded and obscured state.<sup>67</sup> Aelred is confident that, in heaven,

My memory lasts for endless generations [Si 24:28]." If you had the remembrance of gold and silver, of riches, how far could this memory extend? Perhaps for many, even a hundred years. For who lives longer than that these days? But if you think of Christ, if you think of Wisdom, the remembrance of these can extend "for endless generations," everlastingly. Wisdom will always exist, and you can always exist with Wisdom, for, as is written, Wisdom is immortal [see Ws 1:15].<sup>18</sup>

As the intellect is perfected in knowledge and the will in love, the perfection of the memory is in a wisdom that lasts forever: "... If you think about the kingdom of heaven, of the glory of the angels, of the happiness there is in the vision of God, in incorruption and immortality, this remembrance can extend 'for endless generations [Si 24:28]'—everlastingly, that is—because these things will last forever." The intellect, will, and memory are all filled and fulfilled in the happiness that awaits the pilgrims who journey toward their final home.

Joyful Attachment

The affectus too will be filled—with great, indeed perfect, joys<sup>o</sup> It is a joy that will include the perfection of the friendship to which attachment aspires and in which it finds its fulfillment.<sup>81</sup> That friendship is both in and for God—in God when the friendship is for another blessed soul, for God who is the supreme friend.

The joy of friendship will reach its culmination in the communion in God of all the blessed:

This is that great and wondrous happiness which we await, with God himself acting and diffusing—between himself and the creatures whom he has lifted up, among those degrees and orders which he has differentiated, among the individuals whom he has chosen—so much friendship and true love that each one thus loves the others as herself or himself. By this, just as each one rejoices in his or her own happiness, so does each rejoice in the happiness of the others. 'Thus the happiness of each belongs to all, and the whole of the happiness of all belongs to each

All the problems that beset human friendships, from the choice of a friend to the great efforts needed to maintain friendship,<sup>84</sup> are overcome in the community of friends comprising the communion of saints: "There [in heaven], there is no hiding of thoughts, no concealment of affection. This is true and everlasting friendship, which begins in this [life] and is there [in the next] perfected, which here belongs to the few where few are good, but there belongs to all where all are good."<sup>85</sup> Thus, the glories and joys of friendship in this life will be transformed into inexpressible glory and joy in the next.

The Glorified Body

The vision, love, and joy that the soul experiences in heaven are not enough for Aelred. To the glories of the soul, he must add those of the body. But for him there is a history that must be acted out and played through in the body's glorification: "We, who have undergone death in body and soul, have the need to Se again in body and in soul. First, however, in the soul, and afterward in the body."

The physical death of the body should bring no fear, Aelred thinks, for "holy and perfected souls enter heaven immediately after this life." "Still," he adds, "their happiness is not complete until they receive their bodies on the day of judgment."<sup>88</sup> They are happy, but "those happy souls wait until the number of their companions is filled up, so that on the day of the [body's] resurrection, clad in the glory of a twofold robe [sec By 6:11], they may enjoy unending happiness of both body and soul." As Aelred puts it in a sermon for Advent: "By his first coming our Lord raised us up in the soul alone, but by his second coming he will raise us up in the body, so that, as we serve God by both, by the soul and the body, so shall we then possess in both perfect happiness with God."

Thus the resurrection of Jesus will be extended to all happy souls, now reunited with their glorified bodies: "This [Easter] day had a morning, when our Lord was resurrected. It will have a noon, when that glory, that splendor, that brightness, which today begins in the Head, will be poured out on all the parts. Then he will re-fashion 'our lowly body to be like his glorious body [Phil 3:21]." Consequently, "in paradise the body can be called a body of happiness and of justice, ... in that beatitude a body of happiness and of glory." The glorified body will contribute to the beauty of the restored unity of body and soul, and "no trace of diabolic power will remain in the Lord's land, in our flesh, now glorified in an everlasting resurrection."

The resurrected body will "arise with all the perfection and integrity of its nature, but with all its corruption annihilated.... Why, then, should we not believe that sensation and motion, having reverted [in death] to those elements from which the body was made, will be taken up again ...?" These natural powers will be restored in the body; other powers will be perfected to a preternatural condition: "Then in our bodies will be the perfections of health and beauty, of strength and swiftness ...."

As glorious as these gifts are to the body, Aelred concentrates his attention on two others, immortality and incorruption. The liberation of the body from its mortality and corruptibility is, for Aelred, accomplished through the Incarnation of the Son, which itself demonstrates to Aelred the intrinsic value of the human body that now "suffers from corruption, from death, on account of the condemnation for original sin and because of its own self-centeredness and illicit desires. Let us consider that it was so cleansed of the corruption of all its vices and sins that the Son of God himself was born of it and found his rest in it."]] Those who direct the body lovingly "will have such a reward from our Lord that their bodies will be whole and sound and free of all corruption."

F. The End And Consummation In Happiness

The resurrection of the body at the last judgment will bring, Aelred is sure, a happiness to which humans can look forward with confident hope and expectant joy: "Happy are those who exult in this [Easter] day! Happy are those who possess such a conscience that they not only do not fear the eight days of its octave—for the resurrection of the dead, that is—but rather exult in Arm On that day the contrast between the burdens of this life and the glories of the next will be experienced rather than merely described: "To this life belongs toil, to that life rest. To this life belongs temptation, to that life freedom from care. To this life belongs poverty, to that life riches. To this life belongs struggle, to that life consolation. To this life belong hunger and thirst, to that life satisfaction." The burdens of this life will then be dissolved: "Then will poverty be rewarded with everlasting riches; grief be changed to everlasting joy; for the hungry everlasting satisfaction stored up. No one doubts that all these—riches, joy, satisfaction—are not lacking in happiness." And, Aelred adds; "It is a good thing, brothers, to look forward to a future of everlasting riches, to perpetual delights, to unending joy, to happiness without end."

That future bliss has been prepared as a free gift by the one who was born in Bethlehem, a Bethlehem that can now be built in each human being:

You now build a Bethlehem in your soul, shedding the self-centered love of the world and its riches and false honors. You, yourselves little and humble, see [there] this humble, little boy Jesus. As you gaze on his delightful face, you hear his most pleasant voice: "Come, you blessed of my Father, take possession of the kingdom which has been prepared from the origin of the world [see Mt 25:344].",

The call is inviting; the result of the call's acceptance overwhelming: "Then you will enter that kingdom, and you will see the delightful and lovable Jesus. Then you will be readied and adorned as his bride [see Ry 21:2]; then you will be worthy of his embraces, for you will be without blemish or wrinkle [see Eph 5:27]. Then you will taste the vast array of his sweetnesses [see Ps 30:20] which fill up fully his lovers but which are hidden in this life from the fateful." For Aelred there is nothing more that needs to be said or can be said—save only an exhortation to his hearers to respond lovingly to God's overwhelming love. "Let us pass over," Aelred urges, "pass over by means of hope and longing, by means of love and attachment. 'We see

[now] in a mirror but obscurely [1 Cor 13:12], but, when we have passed over what is imperfect, then we shall see 'face to face [1 Cor 13:12]' that Jesus, our Lord, who lives and reigns with the Father and the Holy Spirit through all ages of ages.”

The 15 Promises Of Mary To Christians Who Recite The Rosary

(written in 1208)

Whoever shall faithfully serve me by the recitation of the rosary, shall receive signal graces.

I promise my special protection and the greatest graces to all those who shall recite the rosary.

The rosary shall be a powerful armor against hell, it will destroy vice, decrease sin, and defeat heresies.

It will cause virtue and good works to flourish; it will obtain for souls the abundant mercy of God; it will withdraw the hearts of men from the love of the world and its vanities, and will lift them to the desire of eternal things. Oh, that souls would sanctify themselves by this means.

The soul which recommends itself to me by the recitation of the rosary, shall not perish.

Whoever shall recite the rosary devoutly, applying himself to the consideration of its sacred mysteries shall never be conquered by misfortune. God will not chastise him in His justice, he shall not perish by an unprovided death; if he be just he shall remain in the grace of God, and become worthy of eternal life.

Whoever shall have a true devotion for the rosary shall not die without the sacraments of the Church.

Those who are faithful to recite the rosary shall have during their life and at their death the light of God and the plentitude of His graces; at the moment of death they shall participate in the merits of the saints in paradise.

I shall deliver from purgatory those who have been devoted to the rosary.

The faithful children of the rosary shall merit a high degree of glory in heaven.

You shall obtain all you ask of me by the recitation of the rosary.

All those who propagate the holy rosary shall be aided by me in their necessities.

I have obtained from my Divine Son that all the advocates of the rosary shall have for intercessors the entire celestial court during their life and at the hour of death.

All who recite the rosary are my sons, and brothers of my only son Jesus Christ.

Devotion of my rosary is a great sign of predestination.

This apocryphal writing was found in the Ritual M.S. preserved in the Library of St. Lazarus, numbered 570, — 6X10 inches — and written in the year 1208, on paper.

It is found only in the Armenian literature, and seems to be of Christian origin. I therefore give its English translation as a matter of interest to those who love antiquity, it being found only in one Manuscript of the Armenian Library of St. Lazarus.

I must however notice that the portion I give here, is only part of a longer writing; but the succeeding leaves of the MS. in which it is found being worn away, the writing has almost disappeared, and therefore it is impossible to complete the text.

The age of this writing is not known, but it is rightly supposed to date back beyond the VIIIth century.

It is probable that in the composition of this writing the author was inspired by the Hook of Enoch.

Inquiries Made By The Prophet Esdras Of The Angel Of The Lord Concerning The Souls Of Men.

The prophet Esdras having seen the Angel of God, inquired of him minutely, and the Angel answered him and declared that which shall happen at the end of time.

The prophet asked the Angel and said: « What has God prepared for the Righteous and for the Sinners? and when the last day shall come, what shall become of them, where shall they go, unto honour or unto punishment? »

The Angel answered the prophet: « For the Righteous is prepared great rejoicing and everlasting light, and for Sinners is prepared outer darkness and everlasting fire ».

The prophet said unto the Angel: « Lord, what man is there among the living that has not sinned against God? If it is so, then blessed are the beasts and the birds, who expect not resurrection, and wait not for the end. If Thou shall reward the Righteous, and the Prophets, and the Apostles, and the Martyrs, who have been tortured for Thee, and who with patience suffered all kinds of torments, when they used the flint and the hammer to strike their bodies so that their inward parts were laid bare, have mercy upon us sinners, who are deceived and held by Satan ».

The Angel answered and said: « Do not repeat thy words unto Him Who is above thee, unless a great evil should befall thee ».

The prophet said to the Angel: "O Lord, I dare to speak unto Thee a little more, and answer Thou me. When the Day of death comes, and God takes the soul, does He put it into the place of torments or into that of honour, until His final coming? »

The Angel answered and said: « Do not wait until the day of death, but like a flying eagle, hasten to do good works and charity. For that day is awful, pressing and exacting; it does not allow a man to his riches. It cometh suddenly and without pity and without respect it carries away its captive suddenly and unexpectedly; neither weeping, nor mourning shall obtain mercy. But when the day of death arrives, a good Angel comes to a good soul, and a wicked one to a bad soul. Like as one sent by a king unto the wicked man and unto the beneficent one; to the good he renders good, and unto the wicked evil: in like manner a good Angel comes to a good soul, and unto the wicked soul an evil one. Not that the Angel is bad, but their several deeds are bad. The Angel takes the soul and brings it eastward, and causes it to go through frost and through snow, and darkness and hail; and through ice and storm; through the bands of Satan, and through streams, and through storms of heavy rains, through awful and terrible ways, and through defiles and lofty mountains. O wonderful way! for one beholds there foot-prints, and a river of fire runs before it ».

The prophet was in amazement and said: « How wonderful and awful is that way »!

The Angel said: « When I make a soul to pass through that path, there are in it seven steps up to the Divinity. The first halting place is one of terror and wonder; the second is awful and unspeakable; the third is hell and icy cold. In the fourth there are quarrels and wars. In the fifth judgment is held: if it is the soul of a righteous man, it is enlightened, and if of a sinner, it becomes dark. Then in the sixth the soul of the righteous shines like the sun; and then through the seventh I carry it and bring it to prostrate itself before the great throne of the Divinity, over against paradise, before the glory of God, where dwells the transcendent Light ».

The prophet said unto the Angel: « My Lord, after thou makest the soul go through such terrors, as are quarrels, wars, and burning heat, why dost thou not bring it to meet the Divinity, but only lettest it reach the throne? »

The Angel said unto the prophet: « Thou art a vain man and thinkest according to human nature. I am an Angel and wait alway upon God, and have never seen the face of God; how canst thou think to present a sinful man before God? For the Godhead is awful and wonderful; and who dares look upon the uncreated Divinity? If one look thereon, he is melted like wax before the face of God. For the Godhead is of fire and wonderful, and around His throne there are such fiery guardians, as chambers of fire . . . , there are igneous hollows, vaulted ways filled with lamps. There are heard thunders and tremblings; there are seen fightings and wars; there the heat is excessive; there, there are cavities that revolve, where one sees reptiles shaped in fire, swarming in the flamer and forming bands of fire. And around the Divinity stand the incorporeal Seraphim, and the six-winged Cherubim, who with two wings cover their face, and with two other cover their feet, and with the other two they fly, crying: ' Holy, Holy, Holy, Lord of hosts; heaven and earth are full of Thy Glory'. Such are the guardians that are around the throne of the Godhead. »

Then the prophet asked the Angel saying: "Lord, what shall become of us? for we are all sinners and enslaved in the hands of Satan. Now how can we be delivered, or who is able to free us from his hands?"

The Angel answered and said: « After a man's death, if there is any one of his own people left, be it father, or mother, or brother, or sister, or son, or daughter, or any that is Christian, if they offer up prayers, or keep fasting, or give charity, or perform forty days' devotion<sup>1</sup>, through the sacrifice of Christ, they win for them great rest and mercy; because Christ was sacrificed for us upon the cross and delivered the souls of men of the six ages from the hands of Satan. O how a soul finds her freedom through a pious priest, if he fulfil the forty days' devotion in such way as is agreeable unto God, if . . . ho remain in the church those forty days and do not frequent the public places, but recite from hour to hour the psalms of David, and the hymns! It is this devotion that delivers you from the hands of Satan. Otherwise give to the poor. For your prayers are like this: According as a labourer rising goes forth and sows his seed, from which the plants come up well-shaped and comely, yielding fruit in abundance, but thorns and tares spring up and choke them, and man cannot gather much fruit. In like manner ye also, when ye go to the church, being willing to offer up prayer unto God, the cares of this world and the deceitfulness of riches enter in and choke you, and suffer you not to produce much fruit. For if your prayer were such as was that of Moses, who wept forty days and spake face to face with God, or as that of Elijah who was taken up to heaven in a chariot of fire, or such as was that of Daniel, who prayed in the den of the lion.

1. The text has a word the meaning of which is unknown.

i. It consists in making a priest say Mass forty days, for the rest of the soul of the dead, or offer up prayers for so many days.

1. Here I stop giving the translation; for two sheets of the MS. are lost, and there are six more sheets the margins of which are worn away, and therefore the sense becomes unintelligible; and then the remainder of the inquiries of Esdras are altogether wanting, the Manuscript being incomplete.

Prologue

1. To begin with, the first principle from Whom all illumination descends as from the Father of Light, by Whom are given all the best and perfect gifts [James, 1, 17], the eternal Father do I call upon through His Son, our Lord Jesus Christ, that by the intercession of the most holy Virgin Mary, mother of God Himself and of our Lord, Jesus Christ, and of the blessed Francis, our father and leader, He may enlighten the eyes of our mind to guide our feet into the way of that peace "which surpasses all understanding" [Eph., 1, 17; Luke, 1, 79; Phil., 4, 7], which peace our Lord Jesus Christ has announced and given to us; which lesson our father Francis always taught, in all of whose preaching was the annunciation of peace both in the beginning and in the end, wishing for peace in every greeting, yearning for ecstatic peace in every moment of contemplation, as a citizen of that Jerusalem of which that man of peace said, with those that hated peace he was peaceable [Ps., 119, 7], "Pray ye for the things that are for the peace of Jerusalem" [Ps., 121, 6]. For he knew that the throne of Solomon was nowise save in peace, since it is written, "His place is in peace and His abode in Sion" [Ps., 75, 3].

2. Since, then, following the example of the most blessed Father Francis, I breathlessly sought this peace, I, a sinner, who have succeeded to the place of that most blessed father after his death, the seventh Minister General of the brothers, though in all ways unworthy--it happened that by the divine will in the thirty-third year after the death of that blessed man I ascended to Mount Alverna as to a quiet place, with the desire of seeking spiritual peace; and staying there, while I meditated on the ascent of the mind to God, amongst other things there occurred that miracle which happened in the same place to the blessed Francis himself, the vision namely of the winged Seraph in the likeness of the Crucified. While looking upon this vision, I immediately saw that it signified the suspension of our father himself in contemplation and the way by which he came to it.

3. For by those six wings are rightly to be understood the six stages of illumination by which the soul, as if by steps or progressive movements, was disposed to pass into peace by ecstatic elevations of Christian wisdom. The way, however, is only through the most burning love of the Crucified, Who so transformed Paul, "caught up into the third heaven" [II Cor., 12, 2], into Christ, that he said, "With Christ I am nailed to the cross, yet I live, now not I, but Christ liveth in me" [Gal., 2, 19]; who therefore so absorbed the mind of Francis that his soul was manifest in his flesh and he bore the most holy stigmata of the Passion in his body for two years before his death. Therefore the symbol of the six-winged Seraph signifies the six stages of illumination, which begin with God's creatures and lead up to God, to Whom no one can enter properly save through the Crucified. For he who does not enter by the door but otherwise, he is a thief and a robber [John, 10, 1]. But if anyone does enter by this door, he shall go in and go out and shall find pastures [John, 9]. Because of this John says in his Apocalypse [22, 14], "Blessed are they that wash their robes in the blood of the Lamb, that they may have a right to the Tree of Life and may enter in by the gates into the City"; as if he were to say that one cannot enter into the heavenly Jerusalem through contemplation unless one enter through the blood of the Lamb as through a gate. For one is not disposed to contemplation which leads to mental elevation unless one be with Daniel a man of desires [Dan., 9, 23]. But desires are kindled in us in two ways: by the cry of prayer, which makes one groan with the murmuring of one's heart, and by a flash of apprehension by which the mind turns most directly and intensely to the rays of light [Ps., 37, 9].

4. Therefore to the cry of prayer through Christ crucified, by Whose blood we are purged of the filth of vice, do I first invite the reader, lest perchance he should believe that it suffices to read without unction, speculate without devotion, investigate without wonder, examine without exultation, work without piety, know without love, understand without humility, be zealous without divine grace, see without wisdom divinely inspired. Therefore to those predisposed by divine grace, to the humble and the pious, to those filled with compunction and devotion, anointed with the oil of gladness [Ps., 44, 8], to the lovers of divine wisdom, inflamed with desire for it, to those wishing to give themselves over to praising God, to wondering over Him and to delighting in Him, do I propose the following reflections, hinting that little or nothing is the outer mirror unless the mirror of the mind be clear and polished. Bestir yourself then, O man of God, you who previously resisted the pricks of conscience, before you raise your eyes to the rays of wisdom shining in that mirror, lest by chance you fall into the lower pit of shadows from the contemplation of those rays.

5. I have decided to divide my treatise into seven chapters, heading them with titles so that their contents may be the more easily understood. I ask therefore that one think rather of the intention of the writer than of his work, of the sense of the words rather than the rude speech, of truth rather than beauty, of the exercise of the affections rather than the erudition of the intellect. That such may come about, the progress of these thoughts must not be perused lightly, but should be meditated upon in greatest deliberation.

Chapter One

On the Stages in the Ascent to God and of His Reflection in His Traces in the Universe

1. Blessed is the man whose help is from Thee. In his heart he hath disposed to ascend by steps, in the vale of tears, in the place which he hath set [Ps., 83, 6]. Since beatitude is nothing else than the fruition of the highest good, and the highest good is above us, none can be made blessed unless he ascend above himself, not by the ascent of his body but by that of his heart. But we cannot be raised above ourselves except by a higher power raising us up. For howsoever the interior steps are disposed, nothing is accomplished unless it is accompanied by divine aid. Divine help, however, comes to those who seek it from their hearts humbly and devoutly; and this means to sigh for it in this vale of tears, aided only by fervent prayer. Thus prayer is the mother and source of ascent ("sursumactionis") in God. Therefore Dionysius, in his book, "Mystical Theology" [ch. 1, 13, wishing to instruct us in mental elevation, prefaces his work by prayer. Therefore let us pray and say to the Lord our God, "Conduct me, O Lord, in Thy way, and I will walk in Thy truth; let my heart rejoice that it may fear Thy name" [Ps., 85, 11].

2. By praying thus one is enlightened about the knowledge of the stages in the ascension to God. For since, relative to our life on earth, the world is itself a ladder for ascending to God, we find here certain traces [of His hand], certain images, some corporeal, some spiritual, some temporal, some aeviternal; consequently some outside us, some inside. That we may arrive at an understanding of the First Principle, which is most spiritual and eternal and above us, we ought to proceed through the traces which are corporeal and temporal and outside us, and this is to be led into the way of God. We ought next to enter into our minds, which are the eternal image of God, spiritual and internal; and this is to walk in the truth of God. We ought finally to pass over into that which is eternal, most spiritual, and above us, looking to the First Principle; and this is to rejoice in the knowledge of God and in the reverence of His majesty.

3. Now this is the three days' journey into the wilderness [Ex., 3, 18]; this is the triple illumination of one day, first as the evening, second as the morning, third as noon; this signifies the threefold existence of things, as in matter, in [creative] intelligence, and in eternal art, wherefore it is said, "Be it made, He made it," and "it was so done" [Gen., 1]; and this also means the triple substance in Christ, Who is our ladder, namely, the corporeal, the spiritual, and the divine.

4. Following this threefold progress, our mind has three principal aspects. One refers to the external body, wherefore it is called animality or sensuality; the second looks inward and into itself, wherefore it is called spirit; the third looks above itself, wherefore it is called mind. From all of which considerations it ought to be so disposed for ascending as a whole into God that it may love Him with all its mind, with all its heart, and with all its soul [Mark, 12, 30]. And in this consists both the perfect observance of the Law and Christian wisdom.

5. Since, however, all of the aforesaid modes are twofold--as when we consider God as the alpha and omega, or in so far as we happen to see God in one of the aforesaid modes as "through" a mirror and "in" a mirror, or as one of those considerations can be mixed with the other conjoined to it or may be considered alone in its purity--hence it is necessary that these three principal stages become sixfold, so that as God made the world in six days and rested on the seventh, so the microcosm by six successive stages of illumination is led in the most orderly fashion to the repose of contemplation. As a symbol of this we have the six steps to the throne of Solomon [III Kings, 10, 19]; the Seraphim whom Isaiah saw have six wings; after six days the Lord called Moses out of the midst of the cloud [Ex., 21, 16]; and Christ after six days, as is said in Matthew [17, 1], brought His disciples up into a mountain and was transfigured before them.

6. Therefore, according to the six stages of ascension into God, there are six stages of the soul's powers by which we mount from the depths to the heights, from the external to the internal, from the temporal to the eternal--to wit, sense, imagination, reason, intellect, intelligence, and the apex of the mind, the illumination of conscience ("Synteresis"). These stages are implanted in us by nature, deformed by sin, reformed by grace, to be purged by justice, exercised by knowledge, perfected by wisdom.

7. Now at the Creation, man was made fit for the repose of contemplation, and therefore God placed him in a paradise of delight [Gen., 2, 16]. But turning himself away from the true light to mutable goods, he was bent over by his own sin, and the whole human race by original sin, which doubly infected human nature, ignorance infecting man's mind and concupiscence his flesh. Hence man, blinded and bent, sits in the shadows and does not see the light of heaven unless grace with justice succor him from concupiscence, and knowledge with wisdom against ignorance. All of which is done through Jesus Christ, Who of God is made unto us wisdom and justice and sanctification and redemption [I Cor., 1, 30]. He is the virtue and wisdom of God, the Word incarnate, the author of grace and truth--that is, He has infused the grace of charity, which, since it is from a pure heart and good conscience and unfeigned faith, rectifies the whole soul in the threefold way mentioned above. He has taught the knowledge of the truth according to the triple mode of theology--that is, the symbolic, the literal, and the mystical--so that by the symbolic we may make proper use of sensible things, by the literal we may properly use the intelligible, and by the mystical we may be carried aloft to supermental levels.

8. Therefore he who wishes to ascend to God must, avoiding sin, which deforms nature, exercise the above-mentioned natural powers for regenerating grace, and do this through prayer. He must strive toward purifying justice, and this in intercourse; toward the illumination of knowledge, and this in meditation; toward the perfection of wisdom, and this in contemplation. Now just as no one comes to wisdom save through grace, justice, and knowledge, so none comes to contemplation save through penetrating meditation, holy conversation, and devout prayer. Just as grace is the foundation of the will's rectitude and of the enlightenment of clear and penetrating reason, so, first, we must pray; secondly, we must live holily; thirdly, we must strive toward the reflection of truth and, by our striving, mount step by step until we come to the high mountain where we shall see the God of gods in Sion [Ps., 83, 8]

9. Since, then, we must mount Jacob's ladder before descending it, let us place the first rung of the ascension in the depths, putting the whole sensible world before us as a mirror, by which ladder we shall mount up to God, the Supreme Creator, that we may be true Hebrews crossing from Egypt to the land promised to our fathers; let us be Christians crossing with Christ from this world over to the Father [John, 13, 1]; let us also be lovers of wisdom, which calls to us and says, "Come over to me, all ye that desire me, and be filled with my fruits" [Ecclesiasticus, 24, 26]. For by the greatness of the beauty and of the creature, the Creator of them may be seen [Wisdom, 13, 5].

10. There shine forth, however, the Creator's supreme power and wisdom and benevolence in created things, as the carnal sense reports trebly to the inner sense. For the carnal sense serves him who either understands rationally or believes faithfully or contemplates intellectually. Contemplating, it considers the actual existence of things; believing, it considers the habitual course of things; reasoning, it considers the potential excellence of things.

11. In the first mode, the aspect of one contemplating, considering things in themselves, sees in them weight, number, and measure [Wisdom, 11, 21]--weight, which directs things to a certain location;[2] number, by which they are distinguished from one another; and measure, by which they are limited. And so one sees in them mode, species, and order; and also substance, power, and operation. From these one can rise as from the traces to understanding the power, wisdom, and immense goodness of the Creator.

12. In the second mode, the aspect of a believer considering this world, one reaches its origin, course, and terminus. For by faith we believe that the ages are fashioned by the Word of Life [Hebr., 11, 3]; by faith we believe that the ages of the three laws--that is, the ages of the law of Nature, of Scripture, and of Grace--succeed each other and occur in most orderly fashion; by faith we believe that the world will be ended at the last judgment--taking heed of the power in the first, of the providence in the second, of the justice of the most high principle in the third.

13. In the third mode, the aspect of one inquiring rationally, one sees that some things merely are; others, however, are and live; others, finally, are, live, and discern. And the first are lesser things, the second midway, and the third the best. Again, one sees that some are only corporeal, others partly corporeal and partly spiritual, from which it follows that some are entirely spiritual and are better and more worthy than either of the others. One sees, nonetheless, that some are mutable and corruptible, as earthly things; others mutable and incorruptible, as celestial things, from which it follows that some are immutable and incorruptible, as the supercelestial things. From these visible things, therefore, one mounts to considering the power and wisdom and goodness of God as being, living, and understanding; purely spiritual and incorruptible and immutable.

14. This consideration, however, is extended according to the sevenfold condition of creatures, which is a sevenfold testimony to the divine power, wisdom, and goodness, as one considers the origin, magnitude, multitude, beauty, plenitude, operation, and order of all things. For the "origin" of things, according to their creation, distinction, and beauty, in the work of the six days indicates the divine power producing all things from nothing, wisdom distinguishing all things clearly, and goodness adorning all things generously. "Magnitude" of things, either according to the measure of their length, width, and depth, or according to the excellence of power spreading itself in length, breadth, and depth, as appears in the diffusion of light, or again according to the efficacy of its inner, continuous, and diffused operation, as appears in the operation of fire--magnitude, I say, indicates manifestly the immensity of the power, wisdom, and goodness of the triune God, Who exists unlimited in all things through His power, presence, and essence. "Multitude" of things, according to the diversity of genus, species, and individuality, in substance, form, or figure, and efficacy beyond all human estimation, clearly indicates and shows the immensity of the aforesaid traits in God. "Beauty" of things, according to the variety of light, figure, and color in bodies simple and mixed and even composite, as in the celestial bodies, minerals, stones and metals, plants and animals, obviously proclaims the three mentioned traits. "Plenitude" of things--according to which matter is full of forms because of the seminal reasons; form is full of power because of its activity; power is full of effects because of its efficiency--declares the same manifestly. "Operation," multiplex inasmuch as it is natural, artificial, and moral, by its very variety shows the immensity of that power, art, and goodness which indeed are in all things the cause of their being, the principle of their intelligibility, and the order of their living. "Order," by reason of duration, situation, and influence, as prior and posterior, upper and lower, nobler and less noble, indicates clearly in the book of creation the primacy, sublimity, and dignity of the First Principle in relation to its infinite power. The order of the divine laws, precepts, and judgments in the Book of Scripture indicates the immensity of His wisdom. The order of the divine sacraments, rewards, and punishments in the body of the Church indicates the immensity of His goodness. Hence order leads us most obviously into the first and highest, most powerful, wisest, and best.

15. He, therefore, who is not illumined by such great splendor of created things is blind; he who is not awakened by such great clamor is deaf; he who does not praise God because of all these effects is dumb; he who does not note the First Principle from such great signs is foolish. Open your eyes therefore, prick up your spiritual ears, open your lips, and apply your heart, that you may see your God in all creatures, may hear Him, praise Him, love and adore Him, magnify and honor Him, lest the whole world rise against you. For on this account the whole world will fight against the unwise [Prov., 5, 21]; but to the wise will there be matter for pride, who with the Prophet can say, "Thou hast given me, O Lord, a delight in Thy doings: and in the works of Thy hands I shall rejoice [Ps., 91, 5]. . . . How great are Thy works, O Lord; Thou hast made all things in wisdom; the earth is filled with Thy riches" [Ps., 103, 24].

Chapter Two

Of the Reflection of God in His Traces in the Sensible World

1. But since with respect to the mirror of sensible things it happens that God is contemplated not only through them, as by His traces, but also in them, in so far as He is in them by essence, potency, and presence; and to consider this is higher than the preceding; therefore a consideration of this sort holds next place as a second step in contemplation, by which we should be led to the contemplation of God in all creatures which enter into our minds through the bodily senses.

2. Let it be noted then that this world, which is called the "macrocosm," enters our souls, which are called the "microcosm," through the doors of the five senses, according to the apprehension, delectation, and judgment of sensible things themselves. This is apparent as follows: In the world some things are generating, some generated, some governing the former and the latter. The generating are simple bodies, celestial bodies, and the four elements. For from the elements, by virtue of the light which reconciles the contrariety of elements in mixtures, there can be generated and produced whatsoever things are generated and produced through the operation of a natural power. But the generated are bodies composed of the elements, like minerals, vegetables, sensible things, and human bodies. The rulers of the former and the latter are spiritual substances, either conjoined entirely, as are the animal souls; or conjoined though separable, as are the rational spirits; or entirely separated, as are the celestial spirits, which philosophers call "intelligences," but we "angels." These, according to the philosophers, move the celestial bodies; and thus there is attributed to them the administration of the universe by taking over from the First Cause, that is God, their active influence, which they pour out in accordance with the work of governing, which looks to the natural harmony of things. According to the theologians, however, there is attributed to them the rule of the universe in accordance with the power of the supreme God with respect to the work of reparation, wherefore they are called "ministering spirits," sent to minister to them who shall receive the inheritance of salvation [Hebr., 1, 14].

3. Therefore, man, who is called a "microcosm," has five senses like five doors, through which enters into his soul the cognition of all that is in the sensible world. For through sight enter the transparent, luminous, and other colored bodies; through touch the solid and terrestrial bodies; by the three intermediate senses the intermediates, as by taste the aqueous, by hearing the aerial, by odor the vaporous--all of which have something of a humid nature, something aerial, something fiery or warm, as appears in the smoke which is freed from incense. There enter then through these doors, not only simple bodies, but also composite, mixed from these. But since by sense we perceive not only these particular sensibles, which are light, sound, odor, savor, and the four primary qualities which touch apprehends, but also the common sensibles, which are number, magnitude, figure, rest, and motion, and since everything which is moved is moved by something, and some are self-moved and remain at rest, as the animals, it follows that when through these five senses we apprehend the motion of bodies, we are led to the cognition of spiritual movers, as through an effect we are led to a knowledge of its causes.

4. As far as the three kinds of things are concerned, this whole sensible world enters into the human soul through "apprehension." The external sensibles, however, are what first enter the soul through the five doors of the senses. They enter, I say, not through their substance, but through their similitudes. These are first generated in the medium, and from the medium are generated in the organ and pass from the external organ into the internal, and from there into the apprehensive power. And thus the generation of the [sensible] species in the medium and from the medium into the organ and the reaction of the apprehensive power to it [the species] produce the apprehension of all those things which the soul apprehends from without.

5. Upon this apprehension, if it be of the appropriate thing, there follows delight. Sense, however, takes delight in an object perceived through an abstracted similitude either by reason of its beauty, as in sight; or by reason of its agreeableness, as in odor and hearing; or by reason of wholesomeness, as in taste and touch, speaking with appropriation. All delight, however, is by reason of proportion. But since a species is form, power, and operation, according to whether it is thought of as related to the principle from which it comes, to the medium through which it passes, or to the end for which it acts, therefore proportion may be considered in similitude, inasmuch as it is a species or form and thus is called beauty, because beauty is nothing other than numerical equality or a certain relation of parts with agreeable color. Or else proportion may be considered as potency or power, and thus it is called "suavity," for active power does not exceed immoderately the powers of the recipient, since the senses are pained by extremes and delight in the mean. Or it may be considered, by thinking of species, as efficacy and impression, which is proportional when the agent by impression supplies what the recipient lacks; and this is to save and nourish it, which appears especially in taste and touch. And thus through delight the external pleasures enter into the soul by similitudes in a triple mode of delighting.

6. After the delight of apprehension comes judgment. By this we not only judge whether something is white or black, for this pertains to a special sense, not only whether it is healthful or harmful, for this pertains to the inner sense, but also why something is delightful. And in this act the question is raised about the reasons for our delight which sense derives from the object. This happens when we ask why something is beautiful, pleasant, and wholesome. And it is discovered that the answer is equality of proportion. equality, however, is the same in the great and the small, and is not spread out through a thing's dimensions; nor does it change and pass away when there is alteration through change or motion. Therefore it abstracts from place, time, and motion, and thus is unchangeable, inimitable, without ends, and in all ways spiritual. Judgment is, therefore, an action which causes the sensible species, received sensibly through sense, to enter the intellective faculty by purification and abstraction. And thus the whole world can enter into the human soul through the doors of the senses by the three aforesaid operations.

7. These all, however, are traces in which we can see the reflection of our God. For since the apprehended species is a likeness produced in the medium and then impressed upon the organ itself, and by means of that impression leads to its principle and source--that is to say, to the object of knowledge--manifestly it follows that the eternal light generates out of itself a likeness or coequal radiance which is consubstantial and coeternal. And He Who is the image and likeness of the invisible God [Col., 1, 15] and "the brightness of His glory and the figure of His substance" [Hebr., 1, 3], He Who is everywhere through His primal generation, as an object generates its likeness in the whole medium, is united by the grace of union to an individual of rational nature--as a species to a corporeal organ--so that by that union He may lead us back to the Father as to the primordial source and object. If then all knowable things can generate their likeness (species), obviously they proclaim that in them as in a mirror can be seen the eternal generation of the Word, the Image, and the Son, eternally emanating from God the Father.

8. In this way the species, delighting us as beautiful, pleasant, and wholesome, implies that in that first species is the primal beauty, pleasure, and wholesomeness in which is the highest proportionality and equality to the generator. In this is power, not through imagination, but entering our minds through the truth of apprehension. Here is impression, salubrious and satisfying, and expelling all lack in the apprehending mind. If, then, delight is the conjunction of the harmonious, and the likeness of God alone is the most highly beautiful, pleasant, and wholesome, and if it is united in truth and in inwardness and in plenitude which employs our entire capacity, obviously it can be seen that in God alone is the original and true delight, and that we are led back to seeking it from all other delights.

9. By a more excellent and immediate way are we led by judgment into seeing eternal truths more surely. For if judgment comes about through the reason's abstracting from place, time, and change, and therefore from dimension, succession, and transmutation, by the immutable, illimitable, and endless reason, and if there is nothing immutable, inimitable, and endless except the eternal, then all which is eternal is God or is in God. If, then, all things of which we have more certain this mode of reasoning, it is clear that this is the reason of all things and the infallible rule and light of truth, in which all things shine forth infallibly, indestructibly, indubitably, irrefragably, unquestionably, unchangeably, boundlessly, endlessly, indivisibly, and intellectually. And therefore those laws by which we make certain judgments concerning all sensible things which come into our consideration-- since they [the laws] are infallible and indubitable rules of the apprehending intellect--are indelibly stored up in the memory as if always present, are irrefragable and unquestionable rules of the judging intellect. And this is so because, as Augustine says [Lib. Arb., II, ch. 4], no one judges these things except by these rules. It must thus be true that they are incommutable and incorruptible since they are necessary, and boundless since they are inimitable, endless since eternal. Therefore they must be indivisible since intellectual and incorporeal, not made but uncreated, eternally existing in eternal art, by which, through which, and in accordance with which all things possessing form are formed. Neither, therefore, can we judge with certainty except through that which was not only the form producing all things but also the preserver of all and the distinguisher of all, as the being who preserves the form in all things, the directing rule by which our mind judges all things which enter into it through the senses.

10. This observation is extended by a consideration of the seven different kinds of number by which, as if by seven steps, we ascend to God. Augustine shows this in his book "On the True Religion" and in the sixth book "On Music," wherein he assigns the differences of the numbers as they mount step by step from sensible things to the Maker of all things, so that God may be seen in all. For he says that numbers are in bodies and especially in sounds and words, and he calls these "sonorous." Some are abstracted from these and received into our senses, and these he calls "heard." Some proceed from the soul into the body, as appears in gestures and bodily movements, and these he calls "uttered." Some are in the pleasures of the senses which arise from attending to the species which have been received, and these he calls "sensual." Some are retained in the memory, and these he calls remembered. Some are the bases of our judgments about all these, and these he calls "judicial," which, as has been said above, necessarily transcend our minds because they are infallible and incontrovertible. By these there are imprinted on our minds the "artificial" numbers which Augustine does not include in this classification because they are connected with the judicial number from which flow the uttered numbers out of which are created the numerical forms of those things made by art. Hence, from the highest through the middles to the lowest, there is an ordered descent. Thence do we ascend step by step from the sonorous numbers by means of the uttered, the sensual, and the remembered. Since, therefore, all things are beautiful and in some way delightful, and beauty and delight do not exit apart from proportion, and proportion is primarily in number, it needs must be that all things are rhythmical. And for this reason number is the outstanding exemplar in the mind of the Maker, and in things it is the outstanding trace leading to wisdom. Since this is most evident to all and closest to God, it leads most directly to God as if by the seven differentiae. It causes Him to be known in all corporeal and sensible thing while we apprehend the rhythmical, delight in rhythmical proportions, and though the laws of rhythmical proportions judge irrefragably.

11. From these two initial steps by which we are led to seeing God in His traces, as if we had two wings falling to our feet, we can determine that all creatures of this sensible world lead the mind of the one contemplating and attaining wisdom to the eternal God; for they are shadows, echoes, and pictures, the traces, simulacra, and reflections of that First Principle most powerful, wisest, and best; of that light and plenitude; of that art productive, exemplifying, and ordering, given to us for looking upon God. They are signs divinely bestowed which, I say, are exemplars or rather exemplifications set before our yet untrained minds, limited to sensible things, so that through the sensibles which they see they may be carried forward to the intelligibles, which they do not see, as if by signs to the signified.

12. The creatures of this sensible world signify the invisible things of God [Rom., 1, 20], partly because God is of all creation the origin, exemplar, and end, and because every effect is the sign of its cause, the exemplification of the exemplar, and the way to the end to which it leads; partly from its proper representation; partly from prophetic prefiguration; partly from angelic operation; partly from further ordination. For every creature is by nature a sort of picture and likeness of that eternal wisdom, but especially that which in the book of Scripture is elevated by the spirit of prophecy to the prefiguration of spiritual things. But more does the eternal wisdom appear in those creatures in whose likeness God wished to appear in angelic ministry. And most specially does it appear in those which He wished to institute for the purpose of signifying which are not only signs according to their common name but also Sacraments.

13. From all this it follows that the invisible things of God are clearly seen, from the creation of the world, being understood by the things that are made; so that those who are unwilling to give heed to them and to know God in them all, to bless Him and to love Him, are inexcusable [Rom., 1, 20], while they are unwilling to be carried forth from the shadows into the wonderful light of God [I Cor., 15, 57]. But thanks be to God through Jesus Christ our Lord, Who has transported us out of darkness into His wonderful light, when through these lights given from without we are disposed to re-enter into the mirror of our mind, in which the divine lights shine [I Peter, 2, 9].

Chapter Three

Of the Reflection of God in His Image Stamped upon our Natural Powers

1. The two steps mentioned above, by leading us to God by means of His Traces, whereby He shines forth in all creatures, have led us to the point of entering into ourselves, that is, into our minds in which the divine image shines. Now in the third place, as we enter into ourselves, as if leaving the vestibule and coming into the sanctum, that is, the outer part of the tabernacle, we should strive to see God through a mirror. In this mirror the light of truth is shining before our minds as in a candelabrum, for in it gleams the resplendent image of the most blessed Trinity. Enter then into yourselves and see, for your mind loves itself most fervently. Nor could it love itself unless it knew itself. Nor would it know itself unless it remembered itself, for we receive nothing through intelligence which is not present to our memory. And from this be advised, not with the eye of the flesh but with that of reason, that your soul has a threefold power. Consider then the operations and the functions of these three powers, and you will be able to see God in yourselves as in an image, which is to see through a glass darkly [I Cor., 13, 12].

2. The operation of memory is retention and representation, not only of things present, corporeal, and temporal, but also of past and future things, simple and eternal. For memory retains the past by recalling it, the present by receiving it, the future by foreseeing it. It retains the simple, as the principles of continuous and discrete quantities--the point, the instant, the unit--without which it is impossible to remember or to think about those things whose source is in these. Nonetheless it retains the eternal principles and the axioms of the sciences and retains them eternally. For it can never so forget them while it uses reason that it will not approve of them when heard and assent to them, not as though it were perceiving them for the first time, but as if it were recognizing them as innate and familiar, as appears when someone says to another, "One must either affirm or deny," or "Every whole is greater than its part," or any other law which cannot be rationally contradicted.

From the first actual retention of all temporal things, namely, of the past, present, and future, it has the likeness of eternity whose indivisible present extends to all times. From the second it appears that it is not only formed from without by images [phantasms], but also by receiving simple forms from above and retaining them in itself--forms which cannot enter through the doors of the senses and the images of sensible things. From the third it follows that it has an undying light present to itself in which it remembers unchangeable truths. And thus, through the operations of the memory, it appears that the soul itself is the image of God and His likeness, so present to itself and having Him present that it receives Him in actuality and is susceptible of receiving Him in potency, and that it can also participate in Him.

3. The operation of the intellect is concerned with the meaning of terms, propositions, and inferences. The intellect however, understands the meaning of terms when it comprehends what anything is through its definition. But a definition must be made by higher terms and these by still higher, until one comes to the highest and most general, in ignorance of which the lower cannot be defined. Unless, therefore, it is known what is being-in-itself, the definition of no special substance can be fully known. For can being-in-itself be known unless it be known along with its conditions: the one, the true, the good. Since being, however, can be known as incomplete or complete, as imperfect or perfect, as potential or actual, as relative or absolute, as partial or total, as transient or permanent, as dependent or independent, as mixed with non-being or as pure, as contingent or necessary (per se), as posterior or prior, as mutable or immutable, as simple or composite; since privations and defects can be known only through affirmations in some positive sense, our intellect cannot reach the point of fully understanding any of the created beings unless it be favored by the understanding of the purest, most actual, most complete, and absolute Being, which is simply and eternally Being, and in which are the principles of all things in their purity. For how would the intellect know that a being is defective and incomplete if it had no knowledge of being free from all defect? And thus for all the aforesaid conditions. The intellect is said to comprehend truly the meaning of propositions when it knows with certitude that they are true. And to know this is simply to know, since error is impossible in comprehension of this sort. For it knows that such truth cannot be otherwise than it is. It knows, therefore, that such truth is unchangeable. But since our mind itself is changeable, it cannot see that truth shining forth unchangeably except by some light shining without change in any way; and it is impossible that such a light be a mutable creature. Therefore it knows in that light which enlighteneth every man that cometh into this world [John, 1, 9], which is true light and the Word which in the beginning was with God [John, 1, 1]. Our intellect perceives truly the meaning of inference when it sees that a conclusion necessarily follows from its premises. This it sees not only in necessary terms but also in contingent. Thus if a man is running, a man is moving. It perceives, however, this necessary connection, not only in things which are, but also in things which are not. Thus if a man exists, it follows that if he is running, he is moved. And this is true even if the man is not existing. The necessity of this mode of inference comes not from the existence of the thing in matter, because that is contingent, nor from its existence in the soul because then it would be a fiction if it were not in the world of things. Therefore it comes from the archetype in eternal art according to which things have an aptitude and a comportment toward one another by reason of the representation of that eternal art. As Augustine says in his "On True Religion" [Ch. 39, 72], "The light of all who reason truly is kindled at that truth and strives to return to it." From which it is obvious that our intellect is conjoined with that eternal truth so that it cannot receive anything with certainty except under its guidance. Therefore you can see the truth through yourself, the truth that teaches you, if concupiscence and phantasms do not impede you and place themselves like clouds between you and the rays of truth.

4. The operation of the power of choice is found in deliberation, judgment, and desire. Deliberation is found in inquiring what is better, this or that. But the better has no meaning except by its proximity to the best. But such proximity is measured by degrees of likeness. No one, therefore, can know whether this is better than that unless he knows that this is closer to the best. But no one knows that one of two things is more like another unless he knows the other. For I do not know that this man is like Peter unless I know or am acquainted with Peter. Therefore the idea of the good must be involved in every deliberation about the highest good. Certain judgment of the objects of deliberation comes about through some law. But none can judge with certainty through law unless he be certain that that law is right and that he ought not to judge it. But the mind judges itself. Since, then, it cannot judge the law it employs in judgment, that law is higher than our minds, and through this higher law one makes judgments according to the degree with which it is impressed upon it. But there is nothing higher than the human mind except Him Who made it. Therefore our deliberative faculty in judging reaches upward to divine laws if it solves its problems completely. Now desire is of that which especially moves one. But that especially moves one which is especially loved. But happiness is loved above all. But happiness does not come about except through the best and ultimate end. Human desire, therefore, seeks nothing unless it be the highest good or something which leads to it or something which has some resemblance to it. So great is the force of the highest good that nothing can be loved except through desire for it by a creature which errs and is deceived when it takes truth's image and likeness for the truth. See then how close the soul is to God and how memory in its operations leads to eternity, intelligence to truth, the power of choice to the highest goodness.

5. Following the order and origin and comportment of these powers, we are led to the most blessed Trinity itself. From memory arises intelligence as its offspring, for then do we know when a likeness which is in the memory leaps into the eye of the intellect, which is nothing other than a word. From memory and intelligence is breathed forth love, which is the tie between the two. These three--the generating mind, the word, and love--are in the soul as memory, intelligence, and will, which are consubstantial, coequal, and coeval, mutually immanent. If then God is perfect spirit, He has memory, intelligence, and will; and He has both the begotten Word and spirated Love. These are necessarily distinguished, since one is produced from the other--distinguished, not essentially or accidentally, but personally. When therefore the mind considers itself, it rises through itself as through a mirror to the contemplation of the Blessed Trinity--Father, Word, and Love--three persons coeternal, coequal, and consubstantial; so that each one is in each of the others, though one is not the other, but all three are one God.

6. This consideration which the soul has of its threefold and unified principle through the trinity of its powers, by which it is the image of God, is supported by the light of knowledge which perfects it and informs it, and represents in three ways the most blessed Trinity. For all philosophy is either natural or rational or moral. The first deals with the cause of being, and therefore leads to the power of the Father. The second deals with the principle of understanding, and therefore leads to the wisdom of the Word. The third deals with the order of living, and therefore leads to the goodness of the Holy Spirit. Again, the first is divided into metaphysics, mathematics, and physics. The first concerns the essences of things; the second, numbers and figures; the third, natures, powers, and extensive operations. Therefore the first to the First leads Principle, the Father; the second, to His image, the Son; the third, to the gift of the Holy Spirit. The second is divided into grammar, which gives us the power of expression; logic, which gives us skill in argumentation; rhetoric, which makes us skillful in persuasion or stirring the emotions. And this similarly images the mystery of the most blessed Trinity. The third is divided into individual, family, and political problems. And therefore the first images the First Principle, which has no birth; the second, the family relationship of the Son; the third, the liberality of the Holy Spirit.

7. All these sciences have certain and infallible rules, like rays of light descending from the eternal law into our minds. And thus our minds, illumined and suffused by such great radiance, unless they be blind, can be led through themselves alone to the contemplation of that eternal light. The irradiation and consideration of this light holds the wise suspended in wonder; and, on the other hand, it leads into confusion the foolish, who do not believe that they may understand. Hence this prophecy is fulfilled: "Thou enlightenest wonderfully from the everlasting hills. All the foolish of heart were troubled" [Ps., 75, 5-6].

Chapter Four

Of the Reflection of God in His Image Reformed by the Gifts of Grace

1. But since not only by passing through ourselves but also within ourselves is it given to us to contemplate the First Principle, and this is greater than the preceding, therefore this mode of thought reaches to the fourth level of contemplation. It seems amazing, however, when it is clear that God is so near to our minds, that there are so few who see the First Principle in themselves. But the reason is close at hand. For the human mind, distracted by cares, does not enter into itself through memory; obscured by phantasms, it does not return into itself through intelligence; allured by concupiscence, it never returns to itself through the desire for inner sweetness and spiritual gladness. Thus, lying totally in this sensible world, it cannot return to itself as to the image of God.

2. And since, when anyone lies fallen, he must remain there prostrate unless someone give a helping hand and he falls in order to rise again [Isaiah, 24, 20], our soul has not been able to be raised perfectly from the things of sense to an intuition of itself and of the eternal Truth in itself unless the Truth, having assumed human form in Christ, should make itself into a ladder, repairing the first ladder which was broken in Adam. Therefore, however much anyone is illuminated only by the light of nature and of acquired science, he cannot enter into himself that he may delight in the Lord in himself, unless Christ be his mediator, Who says, "I am the door. By me, if any man enter in, he shall be saved; and he shall go in, and go out, and shall find pastures" [John, 10, 9]. We do not, however, approach this door unless we believe in Him, hope in Him, and love Him. It is therefore necessary, if we wish to enter into the fruition of Truth, as into Paradise, that we enter through the faith, hope, and charity of the Mediator between God and man, Jesus Christ, Who is as the tree of life in the middle of Paradise.

3. The image of our mind must therefore be clothed also in the three theological virtues by which the soul is purified, illuminated, and perfected; and thus the image is repaired and is made like the heavenly Jerusalem and part of the Church militant, which, according to the Apostle, is the child of the heavenly Jerusalem. For he says: "But that Jerusalem which is above is free, which is our mother" [Gal., 4, 26]. Therefore the soul which believes in, hopes in, and loves Jesus Christ, Who is the Word incarnate, uncreated, and spirated, that is, the way and the truth and the life, where by faith he believes in Christ as in the uncreated Word, which is the Word and the splendor of the Father, he recovers spiritual hearing and vision: hearing to receive the lessons of Christ, vision to look upon the splendor of His light. When, however, he yearns with hope to receive the spirated Word, through desire and affection he recovers spiritual olfaction. When he embraces the incarnate Word in charity, as one receiving from Him delight and passing into Him through ecstatic love, he recovers taste and touch. When these senses are recovered, when he sees his spouse and hears, smells, tastes, and embraces Him, he can sing like the Bride a Cantic of Canticles, as was done on the occasion of this fourth stage of contemplation, which no one knoweth but he that receiveth it [Apoc., 2, 17]. For it occurs in affective experience rather than in rational consideration. On this level, when the inner senses are renewed in order to perceive the highest beauty, to hear the highest harmony, smell the highest fragrance, taste the highest delicacy, apprehend the highest delights, the soul is disposed to mental elevation through devotion, wonder, and exultation, in accordance with those three exclamations which are in the Cantic of Canticles. Of these the first arises from the abundance of devotion, by which the soul becomes like a pillar of smoke of aromatic spices, of myrrh and frankincense [Cant., 3, 6]; the second, from the excellence of wonder, by which the soul becomes as the dawn, the moon, and the sun, like the series of illuminations which suspend the soul in wonder as it considers its spouse; the third, from the superabundance of exultation, by which the soul, overflowing with the sweetest delight, leans totally upon its beloved [Cant., 8, 5].

4. When this is accomplished, our spirit is made hierarchical to mount upward through its conformity to the heavenly Jerusalem, into which no one enters unless through grace it has descended into his heart, as John saw in his Apocalypse [21, 2]. But then it descends into one's heart when, by the reformation of the image through the theological virtues and through the delights of the spiritual senses and ecstatic elevation, our spirit has been made hierarchical, that is, purged, illuminated, and perfected. Likewise the soul is stamped by the following nine steps when it is disposed in an orderly way: perception, deliberation, self-impulsion, ordination, strengthening, command, reception, divine illumination, union,[1] which one by one correspond to the nine orders of angels, so that the first three stages correspond to nature in the human mind, the next three to industry, and the last three to grace.[2] With these acquired, the soul, entering into itself, enters into the heavenly Jerusalem, where, considering the orders of the angels, it sees God in them, Who living in them causes all their operations. Whence Bernard said to Eugenius that--"God in the seraphim loves as Charity, in the Cherubim He knows as Truth, in the Thrones He is seated as Equity, in the Dominations He dominates as Majesty, in the Principalities He rules as the First Principle, in the Powers He watches over us as Salvation, in the Virtues He operates as Virtue, in the Archangels He reveals as Light, in the Angels He aids as Piety." From all of which God is seen to be all in all through the contemplation of Him in the minds in which He dwells through the gifts of His overflowing Charity.

5. For this grade of contemplation there is especially and outstandingly added as a support the consideration of Holy Scripture divinely issued, as philosophy was added to the preceding. For Holy Scripture is principally concerned with the works of reparation. Wherefore it especially deals with faith, hope, and charity, by which the soul is reformed, and most of all with charity. Concerning this the Apostle says that the end of the Commandments is reached by a pure heart and a good conscience and an unfeigned faith [I Tim., 1, 5]. This is the fulfillment of the Law, as he says. And our Saviour adds that all the Law and the Prophets depend upon these two Commandments: the love of God and of one's neighbor. Which two are united in the one spouse of the Church, Jesus Christ, Who is at once neighbor and God, at once brother and Lord, at once king and friend, at once Word uncreated and incarnate, our maker and remaker, the alpha and omega. He is the highest hierarch, purging and illuminating and perfecting His spouse, the whole Church and any holy soul.

6. Of this hierarch and this ecclesiastical hierarchy is the entire Holy Scripture by which we are taught to be purified, illuminated, and perfected, and this according to the triple law handed down to us in it: the law of Nature, of Scripture, and of Grace; or rather according to the triple principal part of it: the Mosaic Law purifying, the prophetic revelation illuminating, and evangelical teaching perfecting; or above all, according to the triple spiritual meaning of it--the tropological which purifies us for an honest life, the allegorical which illuminates us for the clarity of understanding, the analogical which perfects us by mental elevation and the most delightful perceptions of wisdom--in accordance with the three aforesaid theological virtues and the spiritual senses reformed and the three above-mentioned stages of elevation and hierarchical acts of the mind, by which our mind retreats into itself so that it may look upon God in the brightness of the saints [Ps., 109, 3] and in them, as in a chamber, it may sleep in peace and take its rest [Ps., 4, 9] while the spouse adjures it that it stir not up till she pleases [Cant., 2, 7].

7. Now from these two middle steps, by which we proceed to contemplate God within ourselves as in the mirrors of created images--and this as with wings opened for flying which hold the middle place--we can understand that we are led into the divine by the powers of the rational soul itself placed therein by nature as far as their operations, habits, and knowledge are concerned, as appears from the third stage. For we are led by the powers of the soul reformed by virtues freely granted, by the spiritual senses, and by mental elevation, as appears from the fourth stage. We are nonetheless led through hierarchical operations, that is, by purgation, illumination, and perfection of human minds through the hierarchical revelations of the Holy Scriptures given to us, according to the Apostle, through the Angels in the hand of a mediator [Gal., 3, 19]. And finally we are led by hierarchies and hierarchical orders which are found to be ordered in our minds in the likeness of the heavenly Jerusalem.

8. Our mind, filled with all these intellectual illuminations, is inhabited by the divine wisdom as the house of God; become the daughter, the spouse, and the friend of God; made a member of Christ the head, the sister, and the fellow-heir; made nonetheless the temple of the Holy Spirit, founded by faith, elevated by hope, and dedicated to God by the sanctity of the mind and the body. All of this has been brought about by the most sincere love of Christ which is poured forth into our hearts by the Holy Spirit, Who is given to us [Rom., 5, 5], without which Spirit we cannot know the secrets of God. For just as no one can know the things of a man except the spirit of a man that is in him, so the things also that are of God no man knoweth but the spirit of God [I Cor., 2, 11] In charity then let us be rooted and founded, that we may be able to comprehend with all the saints what is the length of eternity, the breadth of liberality, the height of majesty and the depth of the wisdom which judges us [Eph., 3, 17 18].

Chapter Five

Of the Reflection of the Divine Unity in its Primary Name which is Being

1. It happens that we may contemplate God not only outside of us but also within us and above us. [Thus we contemplate Him] outside through His traces, inside through His image, and above us through His light, which has signed upon our minds the light of eternal Truth, since the mind itself is immediately formed by Truth itself. Those who exercise themselves in the first manner have already entered into the atrium of the tabernacle; the second have entered into the sanctum; but the third have entered into the Holy of Holies with the High Priest, the Holy of Holies where above the ark are the Cherubim of glory overshadowing the propitiatory. By these modes we understand two ways or degrees of contemplation of the invisible and eternal things of God, of which one deals with God's essential attributes, the other with the properties of the Persons.

2. The first way first and foremost signifies Him in Being itself, saying He Who Is is the primary name of God. The second signifies Him in His goodness, saying this [goodness] is the primary name of God. The former refers above all to the Old Testament, which preaches the unity of the divine essence, whence it was said to Moses, "I am Who I am." The second refers to the New Testament, which lays down the plurality of the Persons, by baptizing in the name of the Father and of the Son and of the Holy Spirit. Therefore our Master Christ, wishing to elevate the youth who had served the law to evangelical perfection, attributed the name of goodness principally and precisely to God. No one, He said, is good but God alone [Luke, 18, 19]. Damascenus ["De fide orthodox.," 1, 9] therefore, following Moses, says that "He Who Is" is the primary name of God. Dionysius, following Christ, says that goodness is God's primary name.

3. If you wish then to contemplate the invisible traits of God in so far as they belong to the unity of His essence, fix your gaze upon Being itself, and see that Being is most certain in itself; for it cannot be thought not to be, since the purest Being occurs only in full flight from Non-Being, just as nothingness is in full flight from Being. Therefore, just as the utterly nothing contains nought of Being nor of its conditions, so contrariwise Being itself contains no Non-Being, neither in actuality nor in potency, neither in matters of fact nor in our thinking. Since, however, Non-Being is the privation of Being, it cannot enter the intellect except through Being; Being, however, cannot enter through anything other than itself. For everything which is thought of is either thought of as Non-Being or as Being-in-potency or as Being-in-actuality. If, therefore, Non-Being is intelligible only through Being, and if Being-in-potency can be understood only through Being-in-actuality, and if Being is the name of that pure actuality of Being, Being then is what first enters the intellect, and that Being is pure actuality. But this is not particular Being, which is restricted Being, since that is mixed with potentiality. Nor is this analogous Being, for such has a minimum of actuality since it has only a minimum of being. It remains, therefore, that that Being is divine Being.

4. Marvelous then is the blindness of the intellect which does not consider that which is its primary object and without which it can know nothing. But just as the eye intent upon the various differences of the colors does not see the light by which it sees the other things and, if it sees it, does not notice it, so the mind's eye, intent upon particular and universal beings, does not notice Being itself, which is beyond all genera, though that comes first before the mind and through it all other things. Wherefore it seems very true that just as the bat's eye behaves in the light, so the eye of the mind behaves before the most obvious things of nature. Because accustomed to the shadows of beings and the phantasms of the sensible world, when it looks upon the light of the highest Being, it seems to see nothing, not understanding that darkness itself is the fullest illumination of the mind [Ps., 138, 11], just as when the eye sees pure light it seems to itself to be seeing nothing.

5. See then purest Being itself, if you can, and you will understand that it cannot be thought of as derivative from another. And thus necessarily that must be thought of as absolutely primal which can be derivative neither from nothing nor from anything. For what exists through itself if Being does not exist through itself and of itself? You will understand that, lacking Non-Being in every respect and therefore having no beginning nor end, it is eternal. You will understand also that it contains nothing in itself save Being itself, for it is in no way composite, but is most simple. You will understand that it has no potentialities within it, since every possible has in some way something of Non-Being, but Being is the highest actuality. You will understand that it has no defect, for it is most perfect. Finally, you will understand that it has no diversity, for it is One in the highest degree. Being, therefore, which is pure Being and most simply Being and absolutely Being, is Being primary, eternal, most simple, most actual, most perfect, and one to the highest degree.

6. And these things are so certain that Being itself cannot be thought of by an intellect as opposed to these, and one of these traits implies the others. For since it is simply Being, therefore it is simply primary; because it is simply primary, therefore it is not made from another nor from itself, and therefore it is eternal. Likewise, since it is primary and eternal, and therefore not from others, it is therefore most simple. Furthermore, since it is primary, eternal, and most simple, therefore it contains no potentiality mixed with actuality, and therefore it is most actual. Likewise, since it is primary, eternal, most simple, most actual, it is most perfect. To such a Being nothing is lacking, nor can anything be added, Since it is primary, eternal, most simple, most actual, most perfect, it is therefore one to the highest degree. For what is predicated because of its utter superabundance is applicable to all things. For what is simply predicated because of superabundance cannot possibly be applied to anything but the one.[1] Wherefore, if God is the name of the primary, eternal, most simple, most actual, most perfect Being, it is impossible that He be thought of as not being nor as anything save One alone. "Hear, O Israel, the Lord our God is one God." If you see this in the pure simplicity of your mind, you will somehow be infused with the illumination of eternal light.

7. But you have ground for rising in wonder. For Being itself is first and last, is eternal and yet most present, is simplest and greatest, is most actual and immutable, is perfect and immense, is most highly one and yet all inclusive. If you wonder over these things with a pure mind, while you look further, you will be infused with a greater light, until you finally see that Being is last because it is first. For since it is first, it produces all things for its own sake alone; and therefore it must be the very end, the beginning and the consummation, the alpha and the omega. Therefore it is most present because it is eternal. For since it is eternal, it does not come from another; nor does it cease to be nor pass from one thing to another, and therefore has no past nor future but only present being. Therefore it is greatest because most simple. For since it is most simple in essence, therefore it is greatest in power; because power, the more greatly it is unified, the closer it is to the infinite. Therefore it is most immutable, because most actual. For that which is most actual is therefore pure act. And as such it acquires nothing new nor does it lose what it had, and therefore cannot be changed. Therefore it is most immense, because most perfect. For since it is most perfect, nothing can be thought of which is better, nobler, or more worthy. And on this account there is nothing greater. And every such thing is immense. Therefore it is all-inclusive ("omnimodal"), because it is one to the highest degree. For that which is one to the highest degree is the universal source of all multiplicity. And for this reason it is the universal efficient cause of all things, the exemplary and the final cause, as the cause of Being, the principle of intelligibility, the order of living. And therefore it is all-inclusive, not as the essence of all things, but as the superexcellent and most universal and most sufficient cause of all essences, whose power, because most highly unified in essence, is therefore most highly infinite and most fertile in efficacy.

8. Recapitulating, let us say: Because, then, Being is most pure and absolute, that which is Being simply is first and last and, therefore, the origin and the final cause of all. Because eternal and most present, therefore it encompasses and penetrates all duration, existing at once as their center and circumference. Because most simple and greatest, therefore it is entirely within and entirely without all things and, therefore, is an intelligible sphere whose center is everywhere and whose circumference nowhere. Because most actual and most immutable, then "remaining stable it causes the universe to move" [Boethius, Cons. III, met. 9]. Because most perfect and immense, therefore within all, though not included in them; beyond all, but not excluded from them; above all, but not transported beyond them; below all, and yet not cast down beneath them. Because most highly one and all-inclusive, therefore all in all, although all things are many and it is only one. And this is so since through most simple unity, clearest truth, and most sincere goodness there is in it all power, all exemplary causality, and all communicability. And therefore from it and by it and in it are all things. And this is so since it is omnipotent, omniscient, and all-good. And to see this perfectly is to be blessed. As was said to Moses, "I will show thee all good" [Exod. 33, 19].

Chapter Six

On the Reflection of the Most Blessed Trinity in Its Name, which is Good

1. After a consideration of the essential traits [of God] the eye of the intelligence must be raised to look upon the most Blessed Trinity, in order that the second Cherub may be placed next to the first. Just as Being is the root and name of the vision of the essential traits, so Good is the principal foundation of our contemplation of the divine emanations [of the Trinity].

2. See then and pay heed, since the best which exists simply is that than which nothing better can be thought of. And this is such that it cannot be rightly thought not to be. For Being is in all ways better than Non-Being. This is such that it cannot rightly be thought of unless conceived of as both three and one. For the Good is said to be self-diffusive. The highest good is therefore the most self-diffusive. The greatest diffusion, however, can exist only if it is actual and intrinsic, substantial and hypostatic, natural and voluntary, free and necessary, lacking nothing and perfect. Unless, then, there be eternally in the highest good a production which is actual and consubstantial, and an hypostasis as noble as the producer through generation and spiration, so that it would be from the eternal principle eternally co-producing and would be beloved ("dilectus") in itself and co-loved ("condilectus"), generated, and spirated as are the Father and the Son and the Holy Spirit, in no way would it be the highest good, for it would not diffuse itself most highly. For temporal diffusion in creation is nothing else than central and punctiform with respect to the immensity of the eternal goodness. Whence also can some diffusion be conceived as greater than that--to wit, that in which the diffusive power communicates its whole substance and nature to another. Therefore the highest good would not exist if it could lack that characteristic either in existence or in thought. If then you can look with the mind's eye upon the purity of goodness, which is the pure actualization of the principle of Charity, pouring forth free and due love, and both mingled together, which is the fullest diffusion according to nature and will--the diffusion as Word, in which all things are expressed, and as Gift, in which all other gifts are given--you may see by the highest communicability of the Good that a Trinity of Father and Son and Holy Spirit is necessary. Because of the greatest goodness, it is necessary that there be in them the greatest communicability, and out of the greatest communicability the greatest consubstantiality, and from the greatest consubstantiality the greatest configurability, and from all these the greatest coequality; and therefore the greatest coeternity as well as, because of all the aforesaid, the greatest co-intimacy, by which one is in the other necessarily through the highest degree of mutual penetration and one operates with the other through the complete identity of substances and power and operation of the most Blessed Trinity itself.

3. But when you contemplate these things, see that you do not think yourself able to understand the incomprehensible. For you have still in these six stages to consider what most strongly leads our mind's eye into the stupor of wonder. For there in the Trinity is the greatest communicability with individuality of the persons, the greatest consubstantiality with plurality of the hypostases, the greatest configurability with distinct personality, the greatest co-equality with order, the greatest co-eternity with emanation, the greatest mutual intimacy with mission. Who in the face of such great marvels would not start in wonder? But we understand with greatest certitude that all these exist in the most Blessed Trinity if we raise our eyes to the goodness that excels all goodness. For if there is the greatest communication and true diffusion, there is also true origin and true distinction. And because the whole and not the part is communicated, therefore it is itself given as a whole and not as a part. Therefore the one emanating and the one producing are distinguished by their properties, and yet are essentially one. Since, then, they are distinguished by their properties, therefore they have personal properties and a plurality of hypostases and an emanation of origin and an order which is not of posteriority but of origin, and a mission not of local change but of free spiration, because of the authority of the producer which every sender has in respect to that which is sent. Because they are substantially one, therefore it must be true that there is unity in essence and in form, In dignity and in eternity, in existence and inimitability While therefore you consider these things one by one in themselves, you have a reason for contemplating the truth; when you compare them with one another, you have the wherewithal to hover in highest wonder; and therefore, that your mind may ascend in wonder to wonderful contemplation these things should be considered all together.

4. For these Cherubim signify this also, since they look at each other. Nor is this free from mystery, that they look toward each, their faces being turned toward the propitiatory [Exod., 25, 20], that there may be verified what the Lord said in John, "Now this is the eternal life: That they may know thee, the only true God, and Jesus Christ, Whom thou hast sent" [John, 17, 3]. For we should wonder not only at the essential and personal traits of God in themselves, but also in comparison with the superwonderful union of God and man in the unity of Christ's person.

5. For if you are the Cherub when you contemplate the essentials of God and you wonder because the divine Being is at once primary and last Being, eternal and most present most simple and greatest or unlimited, all everywhere and yet never bounded, most actual and never moved, most perfect and having nothing superfluous or lacking, and yet immense and infinite without bounds, one to the highest degree and yet all-inclusive as having all things in itself, as total power, total truth, total goodness, look to the propitiatory and wonder that in it the primal principle is joined to the last term, God joined with man formed on the sixth day, the eternal joined with temporal man, born in the fullness of time of a Virgin--the most simple joined with the most composite, the most actual with the most passive and mortal, the most perfect and immense with the little, the most highly unified and all-inclusive with the composite individual distinct from all else, namely, Jesus Christ.

6. If, however, you are the other Cherub when you contemplate the properties of the Persons, you will also wonder that communicability exists with individuality, consubstantiality with plurality, configurability with personality, co-equality with order, co-eternity with production, co-intimacy with mission, for the Son was sent by the Father, and the Holy Spirit by both, Who nevertheless is always with Them and never withdraws from Them. Look to the propitiatory and wonder because in Christ is a personal union with a trinity of substances and a duality of natures, an absolute agreement with a plurality of wills, a common speech between God and man with plurality of properties, an equal worship with plurality of ranks, an equal exaltation above all things with plurality of dignities, a condominium with plurality of powers

7. In this consideration is the perfection of the mind's illumination, when, as if on the sixth day, it sees man made in the image of God. If then the image is an express likeness when our mind contemplates in Christ the Son of God, Who is the natural image of the invisible God, our humanity now wonderfully exalted, now ineffably united, by seeing at once in one Being the first and the last, the highest and the lowest, the circumference and the center, the alpha and the omega, the caused and the cause, the creator and the creature, the book written within and without, it [the mind] arrives at a perfect being in order that it may arrive with God at the perfection of His illuminations on the sixth level, as if on the sixth day; nor does anything more remain save the day of rest, on which, by the elevation of the mind, its insight rests from all work which He had done.

Chapter Seven

Of Mental and Mystical Elevation, in which Repose is Given to the Intellect when the Affections Pass Entirely into God through Elevation

1. Now that these six considerations have been studied as the six steps of the true throne of Solomon by which one ascends to peace, where the truly peaceful man reposes in peace of mind as if in the inner Jerusalem; as if, again, on the six wings of the Cherub by which the mind of the truly contemplative man grows strong to rise again, filled with the illumination of supreme wisdom; as if, once again, during the first six days in which the mind has to be exercised that it may finally arrive at the Sabbath of rest after it has beheld God outside itself through His traces and in His traces, within itself by His image and in His image, above itself by the likeness of the divine light shining down upon us and in that light, in so far as is possible in this life and the exercise of our mind-- when, finally, on the sixth level we have come to the point of beholding in the first and highest principle and the Mediator of God and men, Jesus Christ, those things of which the likeness cannot in any wise be found in creatures and which exceed all the insight of the human intellect, there remains that by looking upon these things it [the mind] rise on high and pass beyond not only this sensible world but itself also. In this passage Christ is the way and the door, Christ is the stairway and the vehicle, like the propitiatory over the ark of God and the mystery which has been hidden from eternity [Eph, 3, 9].

2. He who with full face looks to this propitiatory by looking upon Him suspended on the cross in faith, hope, and charity, in devotion, wonder, exultation, appreciation, praise, and jubilation, makes a passover--that is, the phase or passage [Exod., 12, 11] with Him--that he may pass over the Red Sea by the staff of the cross from Egypt into the Desert, where he may taste the hidden manna and with Christ may rest in the tomb as if outwardly dead, yet knowing, as far as possible in our earthly condition, what was said on the cross to the thief cleaving to Christ: "Today thou shalt be with me in Paradise."

3. That was shown to the blessed Francis when, in the transport of contemplation on the high mountain--where I thought out these things which I have written--there appeared to him the Seraph with the six wings nailed to the cross, as I and several others have heard from the companion who was with him when he passed over into God through the transports of contemplation and became the example of perfect contemplation, just as previously he had been of action; as another Jacob is changed into Israel, so through him all truly spiritual men have been invited by God to passage of this kind and to mental transport by example rather than by word.

4. In this passage, if it is perfect, all intellectual operations should be abandoned, and the whole height of our affection should be transferred and transformed into God. This, however, is mystical and most secret, which no man knoweth but he that hath received it [Apoc., 2, 17], nor does he receive it unless he desire it; nor does he desire it unless the fire of the Holy Spirit, Whom Christ sent to earth, has inflamed his marrow. And therefore the Apostle says that this mystic wisdom is revealed through the Holy Spirit.

5. Since, therefore, nature is powerless in this matter and industry but slightly able, little should be given to inquiry but much to unction, little to the tongue but much to inner joy, little to the word and to writings and all to the gift of God, that is, to the Holy Spirit, little or nothing to creation and all to the creative essence, Father, Son, and Holy Spirit, saying with Dionysius to God the Trinity: "Trinity, superessential and superdivine and supergood guardian of Christian knowledge of God, direct thou us into the more-than-unknown and superluminous and most sublime summit of mystical eloquence, where new and absolute and unchangeable mysteries of theology are deeply hidden, according to the superluminous darkness of instructive silence--darkness which is supermanifest and super-resplendent, and in which all is aglow, pouring out upon the invisible intellects the splendors of invisible goodness." This to God. To the friend, however, to whom I address this book, let me say with the same Dionysius: "Thou then, my friend, if thou desirest mystic visions, with strengthened feet abandon thy senses and intellectual operations, and both sensible and invisible things, and both all nonbeing and being; and unknowingly restore thyself to unity as far as possible, unity of Him Who is above all essence and knowledge. And when thou hast transcended thyself and all things in immeasurable and absolute purity of mind, thou shalt ascend to the superessential rays of divine shadows, leaving all behind and freed from ties of all."

6. If you should ask how these things come about, question grace, not instruction; desire, not intellect; the cry of prayer, not pursuit of study; the spouse, not the teacher; God, not man; darkness, not clarity; not light, but the wholly flaming fire which will bear you aloft to God with fullest unction and burning affection. This fire is God, and the furnace of this fire leadeth to Jerusalem; and Christ the man kindles it in the fervor of His burning Passion, which he alone truly perceives who says, "My soul rather chooseth hanging and my bones death" [Job, 7, 15]. He who chooses this death can see God because this is indubitably true: "Man shall not see me and live" [Exod., 33, 20]. Let us then die and pass over into darkness; let us impose silence on cares, concupiscence, and phantasms; let us pass over with the crucified Christ from this world to the Father [John, 13, 1], so that when the Father is shown to us we may say with Philip, "It is enough for us" [John, 14, 8]; let us hear with Paul, "My grace is sufficient for thee" [II Cor., 12, 9]; let us exult with David, saying, "For Thee my flesh and my heart hath fainted away; Thou art the God of my heart, and the God that is my portion forever [Ps. 72, 26]. . . . Blessed be the Lord God of Israel from everlasting to everlasting; and let all the people say: So be it, so be it" [Ps., 105, 48]. AMEN.

The Multiplicity Of Rewards That Await Mankind In The World To Come In the Zohar
The Zohar

Zohar Genesis 23a

What, however, has been said above concerning the Supreme Cause is a secret which has been transmitted only to wise men and prophets. See now how many hidden causes there are enveloped in the Sefiroth and, as it were, mounted on the Sefiroth, hidden from the comprehension of human beings: of them it is said, "for one higher than another watcheth" (Eccl. v, 7). There are lights upon lights, one more clear than another, each one dark by comparison with the one above it from which it receives its light. As for the Supreme Cause, all lights are dark in its presence.

Zohar Genesis 59a

"And they shall go forth and look upon the carcasses of the men that have transgressed against me" (Is. LXVI "And ye shall tread down the wicked, for they shall be ashes under the soles of your feet" (Mal. In, 24 Happy are the righteous in this world and in the world to come; of them it is written, "the righteous shall for ever inherit the earth" (Is. Lx, 21), and also, "verily the righteous shall praise thy name, the upright shall dwell in thy presence" (Ps. cm, 14 Blessed is the Lord for ever, Amen and Amen.'

Consider this. Every man who fears God is secure in his faith, since he is whole-hearted in the service of his Master. But he who does not constantly fear his Master is not truly possessed of faith, nor is he accounted worthy of a share in the future world.' R. Simeon further discoursed on the text: But the path of the righteous is as the shining light, that shined; more and more unto the perfect day (Prov. Iv, 18). He said: 'Happy are the righteous in this world and the world to come, since God desires to glorify them. For their path is as "the shining light", that is to say, that radiant light which God created at the beginning of things, and which He set aside for the righteous in the future world. This "shined: more and more", for its brightness continually augments. But of the wicked it is written, "The way of the wicked is as darkness, they know not at what they stumble" (Ibid. 10. In truth they do know; but they walk in a crooked path, and will not stop to reflect that one day God will judge them in the future world, and chastise them with the punishments of Gehinnom. Then they will bewail themselves every day, saying, "Woe to us that we did not incline our ears and listen." But as for the righteous, God will illumine them in the future world and will give them their due reward in a place which eye has never beheld, as it is written, "For since the beginning of the world men have not heard, nor perceived by the ear, neither hath the eye seen, O God, beside thee, what he hath prepared for him that waiteth for him."

Zohar Genesis 62a

And Noah Begat Three Sons.<sup>1</sup> Said R. Hiya to It. Judah: 'Let me tell you what I have heard regarding this text. A man once entered the recesses of a cavern, and there - issued two or three children together, who differed from one another in their character and conduct: one was virtuous, a second vicious, and a third average. Similarly we find three strands of spirit which flit about and are taken up into three different worlds. The neshamah (spiritual soul) emerges and enters between the gorges of the mountains, where it is joined by the ruah (intellectual spirit). It descends then below where the nefesh (vital spirit) joins the ruah, and all three form a unity.' R. Judah said: The nefesh and the ruah are intertwined together, whereas the neshamah resides in a man's character—an abode which cannot be discovered or located. Should a man strive towards purity of life, he is aided thereto by a holy neshamah, whereby he is purified and sanctified and attains the title of "saint". But should he not strive for righteousness and purity of life, he is animated only by the two grades, nefesh and ruah, and is devoid of a holy neshamah. What is more, he who commences to defile himself is led further into defilement, and heavenly help is withdrawn from him. Thus each is led along the path which he chooses.'

Zohar Genesis 63

The Holy One, blessed be He, said to Daniel, "Thou shalt go towards the end, and wilt rest" (Dan. xII, 13). Daniel asked: "Rest in this world or in the next world?" "Rest in the next World", was the answer (cf. "They will rest in their beds", Is. tot, z), "and thou shalt stand up to thy lot at the end of days". Daniel asked, "Shall I be among the resurrected or not?" God answered, "And thou wilt stand up." Daniel then said, "I know full well that the dead will rise up in various classes, some righteous and some wicked, but I do not know among whom I shall be found." God answered, "To thy lot." Daniel then said, "As there is a right end and a left end, I do not know whether I shall go to the right end (I'gets hayamin) or to the end of days (I'gets hayamim)." The answer was, "To the end of the right (I'gets hayamin)."

Zohar 82a-b

Said Rabbi Isaac: "The words, 'And a river went forth out of Eden to water the garden' refer to the pillar on which the world stands. It is the river that watereth the garden of Eden and causeth fruits to abound that nourish and sustain the world, that also establish the secret doctrine and bring forth the souls of the just who are the fruits of the works of the Holy One, and because they are such, they arise each night and ascend on high, and at midnight the Holy One rules the garden of Eden to delight himself in their midst. It may be asked, whose souls are they?"

Said Rabbi Jose: "With all the souls of the just, whether yet living in the world below or those residing in the heavenly mansions in the world on high, He rejoices with all of them. Observe, the world above must first receive an impulse from the world below and when the soul of a just man ascends into the celestial regions it becomes garbed with a halo of light transcendently bright, which observing, the Holy One is pleased, for such a soul is the fruit of the divine operation within. For this reason such souls are called 'Israelites,' holy children, sons of God, as it is written, 'Ye are children of the Lord your God' (Deuter. XIV. 1)."

Zohar Genesis 97b-98a

And when the time comes for the days to depart from this world, they all approach the Most High King, as it is written, "And the days of David drew nigh that he should die" (1 Kings 11, 1), and again, "And the days of Israel drew nigh that he should die" (Gen. XLVII, z9). Man, however, whilst in this world, considers not and reflects not what it is he is standing on, and each day as it passes he regards as though it has vanished into nothingness. When the soul departs this world she knows not by what path she will be made to travel; for it is not granted to all souls to ascend by the way that leads to the realm of radiance where the choicest souls shine forth. [90] For it is the path taken by man in this world that determines the path of the soul on her departure. Thus, if a man is drawn towards the Holy One, and is filled with longing towards Him in this world, the soul in departing from him is carried upward towards the higher realms, by the impetus given her each day in this world.'

Zohar Genesis 128b—129a

Happy are the penitent who in the space of one day, one hour, nay, one second, can draw near to the Holy One, as near as even the truly righteous in the space of many years. Abraham did not reach that high grade until he was old, as already said. So, too, David, of whom it is written, "and King David was old, he came into ton. (1 Kings I, 1). But the penitent immediately finds entrance, and is brought close to the Holy One, blessed be He.' R. Jose said: 'We have been taught that the place assigned to the penitent in the next world is one where even the wholly righteous are not permitted to enter, as the former are the nearest of all to the King; they are more devoted and strive more intently to draw near to the King. For there are many abodes prepared by the Holy One, blessed be He, for the righteous in the next world, each one according to his grade.

It is written: "Happy is the man whom thou chooses; and bringest near, that he may dwell in thy courts", that is, those whom the Holy One brings near unto Him, those souls who mount from below on high so as to possess themselves of the heritage prepared for them; "that he may dwell in thy courts", to wit, the outer halls and grades, referred to in the words, "then I will give thee free access among these that stand by" (Zech. in, 7), i.e. a grade among the supernal holy angels. Those who attain that grade are messengers of the Lord, on an equality with the angels, and are constantly being used in the service of their Master, because in life they always strove to remain holy and keep afar from impurity. Contrariwise, whoever pollutes himself in this World draws to himself the spirit of uncleanness, and when his soul leaves him the unclean spirits pollute it, and its habitation is among them. For according to a man's strivings in this world is his habitation— in the next world; hence such a man is polluted by the spirits of uncleanness and cast into Gehinnom. Thus whoever sanctified himself and is on his guard against defilement in this world finds his habitation in the next world among the supernal holy [130a] angels, where they carry out God's messages. These are they who abide in the court—"the court of the Tabernacle" (Ex. mu, 9). But there are others who penetrate further, of whom David said, "we will be satisfied with the goodness of thy house" (Ps. LXV; 5). (The use of the term "we" here instead of "he", as we should have expected, is explained by the dictum that in the Temple Court no seats are permitted save to the kings of the Davidic dynasty.) Still further within is a compartment reserved for the pious of a 'higher grade, referred to in the verse, "and those that were to pitch before the tabernacle eastward, before the tent of meeting toward the sun rising, were Moses and Aaron and his sons, etc." (Num. In, 38). Thus there is in the next world a gradation of glorious abodes and resplendent lights, each outshining the other. 'As the works of the righteous differ in this world, so do their places and lights differ in the next world.

Zohar Genesis 193a-b

And whoever labours in the Torah and clearest unto her is privileged to take hold of the tree of life, as it is written: "She is a tree of life to them that lay hold upon her" (Ibid. in, x8). And whoso takes hold upon the tree of life in this world will also keep hold on it in the world to come, since the grades assigned to souls in the next world correspond to their state on departing from this world. Now the tree of life ramifies into various degrees, all differing from one another, although forming a unity, in the shape of branches, leaves, bark, stock, and roots. All the faithful ones of Israel lay hold upon the tree of life, some grasping the stock, some the branches, some the leaves, and others, again, the roots. But those who exert themselves in the study of the Torah [1936] grasp the very trunk of the tree, and so lay hold upon all; and so we affirm.'

Zohar Genesis 206a

Now the soul is a compound of grades, and hence [206a] it has three names, to wit, nefesh (vital principle), ruah (spirit), and neshamah (soul proper). Nefesh is the lowest of the three, ruah is a grade higher, whilst neshamah is the highest of all and dominates the others. These three grades are harmoniously combined in those men who have the good fortune to render service to their Master. For at first man possesses nefesh, which is a holy preparative for a higher stage. After he has achieved purity in the grade of nefesh he becomes fit to be crowned by the holy grade that rests upon it, namely ruah. When he has thus attained to the 'indwelling of nefesh and ruah, and qualified himself for the worship of his Master in the requisite manner, the neshamah, the holy superior grade that dominates all the others, takes up its abode with him and crowns him, so that he becomes complete and perfected on all sides; he becomes worthy of the world to come and is beloved of the Holy One, blessed be He; of him Scripture says: "To cause my beloved ones to inherit substance" (Prov. viii, 20, the "beloved ones" being those who have attained to the holy neshamah.' R. Judah remarked: 'If that be so, how can we understand the verse in the account of the Flood: "All in whose nostrils was the soul of the spirit (nishmath-ruah) of life . . . died" (Gen. vii, 22)?' R. Isaac replied: 'This bears out what I said. Among the generation of the Flood no one was left that possessed the holy neshamah, as, for instance, Enoch or Jered or any of the other righteous who by their merits could have saved the earth from destruction, and its inhabitants from being exterminated. Scripture thus tells us that "all in whose nostrils was the soul of the spirit of life, of all those on dry land, died", that is to say, they had died already and departed this world, so that none was left to shield the world at that time. Observe that nefesh, ruah, and neshamah are an ascending series of grades. The lowest of them, nefesh, has its source in the perennial celestial stream, but it cannot exist permanently save with the help of ruah, which abides between fire and water. Ruah, in its turn, is sustained by neshamah, that higher grade above it, which is thus the source of both nefesh and ruah. When ruah receives its sustenance from neshamah, then nefesh receives it in turn through ruah, so that the three form a unity.'

Zohar Genesis 223b-224a

Our teachers have said: "Happy the righteous whose days are without reproach and remain for the world to come, so that after death they are all joined together and formed into [2241]) robes of glory through which they are privileged to enjoy the delights of the future world, and in which they are destined to come to life again. But woe for the sinners whose days are defective, so that there is not left from them wherewith to cover themselves when they depart from the world?' We have further learnt that all the virtuous who have acquired a robe of glory through their days are crowned in the future world with crowns like those of the patriarchs, from the stream that flows continually into the Garden of Eden, and of them it is written, "the Lord shall lead thee continually and satisfy thy soul in dry places" (Is. unit, II), but the wicked who have not acquired such a garment will be "like the heath in the desert that shall not see when good cometh, but inhabits the parched places in the wilderness" (Jer. xvii, 6).' R. Isaac said: 'Of all men Jacob had the fairest prospect, because he was entitled to a robe on account both of his own days and of those of his fathers; hence he said: "I shall lie with my fathers." ' R. Judah said: 'When Jacob went in to his father to obtain a blessing, he was wearing the garments of Esau; nevertheless the text says that Isaac smelt his garments (Gen. not, 27), to indicate that he caught the odour of his raiment in the future world, and it was therefore that he blessed him. Hence, too, he said: "See the smell of my son is as the smell of a field which the Lord hath blessed", the reference being to the field of holy apples, in which every day drops dew from the place called heaven; hence he continued: "God give thee of the dew of the heaven." It has been taught that fifteen odours ascend every day from the Garden of Eden to perfume those precious garments in the other world.'

R. Judah asked how many garments there are. R. Eleazar said: 'The authorities differ on this point, but in truth there are three. One is for clothing the spirit (ruah) in the terrestrial Garden of Eden. A second, the most precious of all, is for investing the inner soul (neshamah) when among the bundle of the living in the circle of the King. The third is an outer garment which appears and disappears, and with which the vital soul (nefesh) is clothed. It flits about the world and Sabbaths and New Moons it attaches itself to the spirit in the terrestrial paradise and learns from it certain things which it goes and makes known in this world. It has been taught that on Sabbaths and New Moons the soul (nefesh) makes two visits. First it joins the spirit among the perfumes of the terrestrial paradise, and then in company with the spirit it joins the higher soul in the "bundle of the living", and feasts itself on the glorious radiance coming from both sides. This is hinted in the expression "The Lord shall satisfy thy soul in bright places" (Is. Lviii, 11), the plural including both the outer radiance of the place of the spirit and the radiance within radiance which they enjoy by associating with the higher soul in the "bundle of the living".'

Said R. Simeon: 'When I visit the Companions in Babylon they come together to hear me, and I discourse to them openly, but they go and seal up my teaching under an iron padlock which makes it inaccessible to all. How often have I taught them the ways of the Garden of the King and the doctrine of the King! How often have I taught them all the degrees of the righteous in the future world!

Zohar Exodus 24b

guile in his spirit. Moses was perfected to a higher degree than were the Patriarchs, since the Holy One spoke to him from a higher grade than to them, and Moses stood within the Palace of the King. Hence it says: "And I appeared unto Abraham, unto Isaac, and unto Jacob, by the name of EL SHADDAI, but by My name YHVH was I not known to them"; and so we affirm.'

Zohar Exodus 144b

There is an infinity of grades in the supernal spheres, each differing from the other.

Zohar Leviticus 70b-71a

In the book of King Solomon it is written that God has made three abodes for the righteous. One is for the souls of the righteous which have not yet left this world and are still here, and oh, how the world is in need of mercy and the living after themselves, these pray for mankind and go and inform those that sleep in Hebron, who being thus awakened go into the terrestrial Paradise where are the souls of the righteous in their crowns of light, and take counsel of them and decide what shall be, and God carries out their desire and has pity on the world. These souls of the righteous are in this world to protect the living and know their troubles, and these are they of whom the Companions say that the dead know the sorrows of the world and the punishment of the wicked. The second rank belongs to the terrestrial Paradise. In it God has made excellent chambers after the pattern of those of this world and of the celestial world, and palaces of two colours without number and sweet-smelling herbs that grow afresh every day. In that place abides that which is called the "spirit" of the righteous, each one being clad in a precious garment after the pattern of this world and of the upper world. The third grade is that holy celestial abode which is called "the bundle of the living", where that holy superior grade called the super-soul (neshamah) regales itself with the supernal delights. Now we have learnt that when the world requires mercy and those righteous ones take note of it, that soul of theirs which is in the world to shield mankind flits about the world to tell the spirit, and the spirit ascends and tells the super-soul, and this tells the Holy One, blessed be He. Then God has pity on the world and the reverse process takes place, the super-soul telling the spirit and the spirit the soul. Thus when the world requires mercy, the living go and inform the spirits of the righteous and weep over their graves, in order that soul may cleave to soul, [71a] and the souls of the righteous then come together and go and inform the sleepers of Hebron of the sorrows of the world, and then all enter the gateway of Paradise and inform the spirit, and those spirits which are crowned in Paradise like celestial angels join them and inform the super-soul, and this informs the Holy One, blessed be He, and God has mercy on the world for their sakes; and regarding this Solomon said: "Wherefore I praised the dead which are already dead more than the living that are still alive."

Zohar Deuteronomy 267b

Happy those to whom the love of their Master cleaves; there is no limit to their portion in the other world, to which Rabbi Isaac added, Many are the abodes of the righteous in the other world, one above another, and highest of all that of those to whom was attached the love of their Master, for their abode is linked with the palace that surpasses all, the Holy One, blessed be He, being crowned in this one.

Apocalypse of Gorgorios

Blessed be God, the Lord of Israel. This is the book of the prophet Gorgorios.

I said to the angel Michael: "Tell me about death and how the soul goes forth from the body." He said to me: "I shall tell thee how the soul leaves the body," and he said to me: "Death is bitter and painful to the righteous and the sinners as well, but for the man of good deeds it is salvation and rest when soul and body are separated. The bitterness of death is bearable for him because he sees gathered around him the beautiful angels whose faces are fair and full of mercies; they wear bright crowns and they receive the soul with praise and song. They bless the angel who stayed with him, drive away from him the unclean spirits, and raise his soul to Heaven with blessings, praise, and song."

"The death of the sinner is desolate. His departure from this ephemeral world is as follows: the angels of calamity who have no mercy, the ill-favored, disfigured, are sent to him. The soul of the sinner is entrusted to them in a terrible punishment. Then the evil spirits who were with him and devoured him come to him. When the man sees them he will repent that he did not accomplish good deeds in his lifetime. More punishment is inflicted upon him, and they raise his soul to Heaven in great pain and sore calamity and smite it with sticks of fire."

The angel said to me: "Look down upon the earth." Behold, I saw thousands and thousands of radiant angels, well favored, dressed in ornamented garments, who praised and sanctified God saying: "Praise, glory, and greatness are proper for Thee, for Thou art the grace of the righteous, the crown of the pure, the greatness of the humble, and the strength of the weak."

Then I saw an old good man who had died, and the angels raised his soul aloft. This soul was as bright as the sun. The angels received it and said joyfully: "O soul, thine affliction passed away because of God's word, and thou wilt find mercy at His side forever." After they had raised this soul to Heaven, all the angels shouted and said: "Praise to God alone, the Holy." And they said to this soul: "Peace and felicity to thee, forever," and they blessed the angel who was with her. Then I heard God's voice saying: "Bring this soul that she may rejoice and receive the fruit of her deeds and find her reward." The soul then prostrated herself with fear. The angel said to her: "Fear not, O soul, for thou hast accomplished good deeds before they raised thee. It will be reckoned to thee as righteousness and thou shalt receive the treasures of grace full of joy and gladness." I also heard God saying: "Place this soul with the souls of the hermits who are secluded and live on the mountains and hills serving God."

Then the angel said to me: "Look." And from the earth to Heaven, thousands and thousands of spirits disfigured, angels with dark faces from whose mouths burning charcoal came forth and who held sticks of fire in their hands. I saw it and was frightened and said to the angel: "What is this terrifying sight?" He said to me: "It is for a bad king who abandoned justice and was iniquitous."

And the order came from God to take his soul by force at the hand of bitter Death. And these, the angels of calamity and of wrath, were sent to him. Then I saw a dark one whose odor was bad and whose teeth and nails were of fire. As for the soul, she shouted and lamented: "Pity me, pity me." When she shouted they poured upon her burning charcoal from Heaven. When she drew nigh a sheet of fire like a wave of the sea came and hit her and brought her down to earth. Then the angels said: "Let us take her away." And I saw the angels and the spirits raise her as before, and they brought her to Heaven and said: "Bring not in this soul. She is unclean, since she was rebellious against her Creator and chose the earthly kingdom in vain rather than the Heavenly Kingdom and followed the commandments of Satan." Then a voice came from Heaven saying: "Say to this unclean and bad soul that she confess her faults and the sins she has committed." The soul answered, trembling: "I did things in my kingdom which were not proper, without thinking of the future or of the judgment that will overcome me." The angels said: "Woe unto thee, O soul! Didst thou not hear the words of the prophets and the commandments of God? Didst thou not read the words of the Scriptures? Didst thou not see the wonders of God upon the earth and His marvels in this world?" The soul answered and said: "I have confidence, O Lord, in Thy grace." The angels said to her: "When thou didst walk upon the earth we were gracious to thee there. Hadst thou made thy ways and doings good, thou wouldst have inherited the Heavenly Kingdom, but now thou wilt be rewarded according to thine actions." Then I heard the voice of God saying: "Bring this soul to the rebellious, iniquitous, transgressors, and unclean so that she be there in her punishment until the day of retribution."

Behold, the angels shouted in a loud voice saying: "Holy, Holy, Holy, God of Saba'ot, perfect in His deeds, the merciful and gracious, who exalts the humble and destroys the strong. Thou alone art the King of justice, the Lord of the law, and the Judge of judges."

Then the angel Michael said to me: "I have shown thee the departure of the souls of the sinners and of the just. And now follow me and I shall let thee see the place where the good and pure live." Then he held my hand and brought me into a wide place, the charm of which was like a precious pearl of various colors that shines like bright stars and like lamps that ravish the eyes. There were in it thousands of doors of sapphire brighter than the sun. The floor of this place was white as silver and as mirrors. Behold, a large stream and small springs flowing with light, and the stones of this stream were precious pearls, topazes, carbuncles, hyacinths, and emeralds. And around this stream were tall and short trees. It seemed a valley. Among all the trees there was not a dry one nor a fallen-down leaf nor a spoiled fruit. The odor of these trees was sweeter than all the odors upon the earth. When the dead in the graves smell this odor they will wake up and live. That place had no sun nor moon, but its light exceeded the light of the sun, and the darkness of the night came not near it and found it not.

Then I marveled, praised and blessed God. The angel said to me: "Marvel not, O Gorgorios. This is the Paradise in which Adam and Eve lived; in it there is neither odor nor cold nor sadness. If they had not transgressed the commandment of God they would have remained in it, they and their children, without affliction, sorrow, sickness, death, sin, or iniquity. God knew in advance what would happen." I said to Michael: "Who lives in this place?" He said to me: "Those who observe the law of God will stay here."

Then Michael said to me: "Follow me and I shall let thee see the temple containing the tabernacle built in Paradise of old in the name of the Holy God." I followed him and I saw the Temple of the Most High that preserved its length and width and was built of green emerald, the light of which shone in Paradise. And behold, columns and vaults, topazes, red hyacinths, and gold, and images of sky color adorned with precious pearls. The silent angels praised God and said: "Praise to the most high God who is above." And all the creatures of Heaven and earth were frightened.

There was in it a white sea pearl which shone brightly, and if one opened the interior of this Seyon it would illuminate the ends of the earth. Its light was brighter than the light of the sky. It was made of a shiny pearl and of pure gold, and the crown on its top was made of a green pearl like an emerald, adorned with three white pieces of silver that shone with so brilliant a light that no eye could look at it.

Behold, there were present four angels adorned like a rose-colored pearl and like a pearl of sky color set in pure gold tried in the fire. A voice came out of their mouths saying: "Holy is the King who dwells in the residence of the Holy." And the wood of the ark was like a white pearl, and nothing was like it in length and width. Images appeared whose colors vied with each other; they appeared first red, then green, then sky color, lily color, and other colors. Then I marveled, I fell on my face, and cried. The angel said to me: "What makes thee cry?" I said: "Because of the marvels God did to the sons of men; they are foolish but God maintains them."

The angel said to Gorgorios: "Now thou wilt see something that is greater than anything that is on earth and in Heaven. They are those who serve God with a pure heart. Who can know God?" I perceived a sound of songs and melodies that rejoiced the heart, praise, hymns, and a light that appeared like lightning, and a fragrance that revived the dead. Then I turned back and behold there was a woman dressed in purple and no eye could look at her because of her splendor. I marveled, praised God, then fled and knew not where I was. And when my mind was restored I said to the angel: "What is this marvel?" And he said to me: "This is the Heavenly Jerusalem." I said to the angel: "For whom is it prepared?" He said to me "Read what is written on the door of the tabernacle of the sanctuary." And behold, I saw a Roman inscription written in various lights that said: "This is the Heavenly Jerusalem for the one who gave himself for God's word, for those who despised the glory of the ephemeral world, for those who retired to the hills and caverns, and for the hermits who served God."

Then Michael said to me: "Now come and follow me and I shall show thee the punishment of Hell for the men who denied God, for the rebellious, the evil, and disobedient who did bad deeds before God." The angel took me and placed me on the top of a high mountain and said to me: "Turn back and look to thy right." And behold, I saw a big deep river flowing with pitch, dark as lead; burning charcoal came out of it, and it boiled like a pot; it was fetid. It flowed like the river of Egypt. Men were in it, suspended by their feet, and their heads were turned downward. They trembled and fainted. Then I wept and wailed; a great trembling and quaking fell upon me. I fell on my face and said to the angel: "Who are those, O Lord?" He said to me: "These are those who denied God and returned to sin. They will undergo this punishment that thou seest forever."

The angel then said to me: "Turn back and look to thy left." I turned and behold, a river as great as the preceding one flowing with pitch and asphalt. Waves of fire reaching the sky were in it; men were lying down in the fire that hit them. Their bodies withered away so that nothing but their bones remained; God again created flesh above them; the waves of fire came back and their bodies withered away as before. Their wailing was great. I said to the angel: "Who are those?" He said to me: "Those who honored not His Holy Name and those who despised a refuge in the name of God, the most high."

And I saw in this river black men standing up with pails of fire in their hands. They drew it and poured it upon them: this is their punishment forever. I said to the angel: "Who are those, O Lord?" He said to me: "These are the kings of the earth, the iniquitous and the oppressors."

Then the angel said to me: "Turn backward and look." And behold, I saw a great darkness, and cries and shouts came out therefrom. And the angel said: "I say to thee, O darkness, I was sent to thee by God in order that I may show to Gorgorios everything that is inside of thee; unveil thyself and then shalt thou become as before." The darkness was unveiled and behold, the bottom in all its length and width appeared, and it was entirely inflamed with darkness and fire. It was fetid. And men were in it, each of whom underwent a particular punishment. Some of them burned, their tongues were split and reached their chest. I said to the angel: "Who are those, O Lord?" He said to me: "Those who bore false witness against men."

Some of them were in a great cold worse than the fire and their teeth chattered; they trembled and wept bitterly. I said to the angel: "Who are these, O Lord?" He said to me: "These are the mighty who afflicted the houses of the poor and the strangers with cold and frost."

Some of them were subjected to the fire and were burned. Scorpions, a span in length, bit their bodies: I said to him: "Who are these?" He said to me: "Those who foreswore by the name of God."

Some of them stood on one foot; they wept bitterly and their teeth chattered. Water dropped upon water and fire upon fire. The angels came to them carrying pearls and rings of fire. Their bodies were frightened. He said to me: "They are those who believed in man and abandoned Him and His law."

Some of them had their hands spread in the middle of the fire and vipers of fire bit them. I said to him: "Who are those, O Lord?" "Those who stole the belongings of others."

Some stood in fire up to their knees; they shouted and wailed, saying: "Woe unto us, we took and inherited the eternal punishment." I said to the angel: "Who are those, O Lord?" He said to me: "Those who judged in iniquity and took bribes."

Some knelt on their knees in the fire and the angels slapped their faces with burning charcoal. They wept bitterly. I said to him: "Who are these, O Lord?" He said to me: "Those who were zealous for divinities other than God."

Others were covered by waves of fire. I said: "Who are these, O Lord?" "They are those who were soothsayers, used divination, led men astray through idols, birds, and charms, and abandoned His law."

Others hung by their feet and their heads were downward. Flames hit them from every side; serpents of fire with doglike heads bit them; angels struck them with swords of fire, dispersed their bodies and flaming charcoal fell upon them like hailstones. I said to him: "Who are those and what is their sin?" He said to me: "Those who killed the just and shed innocent blood."

Other angels took flaming charcoal and threw it into their mouths from all sides. I said to him: "Who are these, O Lord, and what is their sin?" "Those who fornicated with the body of their flesh, who committed adultery, who lusted exceedingly. This is their eternal punishment."

Then I wept, fell upon my face, and said: "Woe unto the children of Adam."

Then the angel took me and said to me: "Now thou wilt see great things; in fact, everyone is rewarded according to his deeds as thou hast seen. He who dies without repentance will not witness God's glory or His grace forever. He who fears Him will be freed from this bad world; he will leave it and will abide in the great abode of life that thou hast seen."

Gorgorios said: "Trembling overtook me, and I knew not where I was. And behold, I found myself alone in the cave on my couch. Then I praised and glorified God. I felt sad and great sorrow overcame me for I had perceived, the places of the holy and I had seen the great punishment prepared for the sons of men. Then I wrote down this spiritual story and sent it to all the countries so that it might be of use to all those who accept knowledge. God is gracious to those who do good deeds and who fear the day of reward and of the last judgment so that they may be prepared for the Heavenly Kingdom. I, Gorgorios, glorify and praise the holy God, the only, the gracious and merciful Lord.

We pray and beseech him that he free us from bad deeds, that he help us to accomplish his will, and give us the heritage through grace and pity forever.

Prayer of the angels! We praise God. Hallelujah. Great praise and glory are proper for Thee, the most high, who dwells up on high, for Thou as the grace of the just, the crown of the pure, the greatness of the humble, and the strength of the weak.

Hallelujah to the only God. Holy, Holy, Holy. Thou art gracious and merciful. Thou magnifiest the humble and destroyest the strong. Thou alone art the King of justice and the Lord of the law. Praise to God, the most high, who dwells on high. All the creatures of Heaven and earth stand in awe of Him, the Holy, the King who sits upon the seat of the holy. He is blessed in the Heaven above, His name is pure and holy. Praise and glory to God.

Blessed be God, the Lord of Israel and of all the creatures of Heaven and earth. Hallelujah to God, the King. Praise to the holy, living, just, gracious, strong, glorified, and terrible who sits upon His throne for the eternal pleasure.

Praise to Him, and blessing and wisdom and strength to our Lord. Hallelujah to God, to the King of praise, for Thou hast created everything, and all the creatures are extant by Thy will.

The angel said to me: "Thou seemest somewhat as a boat upon the sea. As for me, I glorified and praised God. God revealed thee everything, life and death, in a hundred and twenty-three days and showed thee the residences of the just and of the sinners. And now, go and inform all the foolish of thy sort, so that it may be of benefit to them and bring salvation to their souls, that they may understand and seek to do good before their souls and bodies separate, for there is no repentance after death."

"O Gorgorios, know and perceive that everyone who commits sins and transgressions, big or small, and then returns to God, lifts his eyes unto Him, and prays with a constant heart, I say and assert that all his sins, transgressions, and errors will be forgiven him and that he will find grace and pity from God forever. Those who believe not and return not to God and commit many sins and faults and then return to God and believe in Him will have their sins and errors forgiven. But if they return then to committing sins they will find a great punishment, for this sin is greater than the first one."

The angel said to me: "O Gorgorios, know that if a man or woman loves God with all his heart, with all his thoughts, and with all his deeds and does then a little good, God will help him, save him from punishment, and guide his way, for he abstains not from the commandments of God but loves His commandments and His teachings in the ephemeral world. Love not iniquity. As for God, He is praised above all. Humility is accepted in order that it cast out the love of this world."

Gorgorios says thus: "O brothers, come, let us give thanks to the Lord of Heaven and Earth. They will come in his city where there is fire and water and there is no escape. By doing justice only will man be saved.

"O brothers, be not slothful. O brothers, the days pass away while we say we shall return . . . The day of death draws nigh suddenly, like a flower of the valley. Let us thus, brothers, remember the day of our death. Death is bitter and comes suddenly (upon) the sinners like a robber. That day everything will be known and all men will stand before the Creator and will be rewarded according to their deeds. O soul, what wilt thou say if thou didst not good in this world, upon the earth?

"O brothers, deviate not to the right and walk not to the left. This world is a dream, believe not in it. Take the lamp of wisdom for your way so that you may share the heritage of the holy and the just in righteousness and in peace."

He says:

I am God, the Lord, who brought you out of Egypt, the house of bondage.

Thou shalt have no other God save me.

Thou shalt not make unto thee any graven gods of anything that is in the earth beneath and in the waters under the earth. Thou shalt not bow before them nor serve them, for I, thy God, am a jealous God, visiting the iniquity of the fathers upon the children unto the third and fourth generation of them that hate me. And showing mercy unto thousands of generations that love me and keep my commandments.

Thou shalt not swear falsely by the name of God, thy Lord; for God will not hold him guiltless that so swears.

Keep the Sabbath day as God, thy Lord, commanded thee. Six days shalt thou labor and do all thy work. But the seventh day is the Sabbath of the Lord, thy God. In it thou shalt not do any work, thou, nor thy son, nor thy daughter, nor thy manservant, nor thy maidservant, nor thine ox, nor thine ass, nor any of thy cattle, nor the stranger that is within thy gates. May thy manservant and maidservant rest as thou dost. Remember that thou wert a slave in the land of Egypt and that God, thy Lord, brought thee out from there with a mighty hand and an outstretched arm. Therefore God commanded thee to keep the Sabbath day and to hallow it.

Honor thy father and thy mother, as God commanded thee; that it may go well with thee and that thy days may be prolonged upon the land which God, thy Lord, gave thee.

Thou shalt not commit adultery."

Thou shalt not kill.

Thou shalt not steal.

Thou shalt not bear false witness against thy neighbor.

Thou shalt not covet thy neighbor's wife, nor his field, nor his manservant, nor his maidservant, nor his ox, nor his ass, nor his cattle, nor anything that is his.

God spoke all these words with a great voice to your assembly on the mountain out of the fire, the obscurity of the tempest, and the thick darkness; and he added no more. And he inscribed them on two tables of stone and delivered them unto me.

And when I heard the voice out of the midst of the fire, for the mountain did burn with fire, you came near unto me, you and the envoys of your tribes and your elders.

The old French mystical texts of the fourteenth century certainly are connected with the theological and ascetical tradition in France up to that time. This evolution is fairly clear. The Fathers of the Church, following the teachings of St. Paul, the interpretation of the Canticle of Canticles, and tinged with the neoplatonic terminology of moral and intuitive progress (Katharsis = purification, photismos = enlightenment, theosis = deification), try to explain the possibility of the union of the human soul with God not only in this world to come, but in this world.

Sermon on the Transfiguration

For an explanation of the present Feast and understanding of its truth, it is necessary for us to turn to the very start of today's reading from the Gospel: "Now after six days Jesus took Peter, James and John his brother, and led them up onto a high mountain by themselves" (Mt 17:1).

First of all we must ask, from whence does the Evangelist Matthew begin to reckon with six days? From what sort of day be it? What does the preceding turn of speech indicate, where the Savior, in teaching His disciples, said to them: "For the Son of Man shall come with his angels in the glory of His Father," and further: "Amen I say to you, there are some standing here who shall not taste death, until they have seen the Son of Man coming in His Kingdom" (Mt 16:27-28)? That is to say, it is the Light of His own forthcoming Transfiguration which He terms the Glory of His Father and of His Kingdom.

The Evangelist Luke points this out and reveals this more clearly saying: “Now it came to pass about eight days after these words, that He took Peter and John and James, and went up the mountain to pray. And as He prayed, His countenance was altered, and His raiment became a radiant white” (Lk 9:28-29). But how can the two be reconciled, when one of them speaks definitively about the interval of time as being eight days between the sayings and the manifestation, whereas the other (says): “after six days?”

There were eight on the mountain, but only six were visible. Three, Peter, James and John, had come up with Jesus, and they saw Moses and Elias standing there and conversing with Him, so altogether there were six of them. However, the Father and the Holy Spirit were invisibly with the Lord: the Father, with His Voice testifying that this was His Beloved Son, and the Holy Spirit shining forth with Him in the radiant cloud. Thus, the six are actually eight, and there is no contradiction regarding the eight. Similarly, there is no contradiction with the Evangelists when one says “after six days,” and the other says “eight days after these words.”

But these twofold sayings as it were present us a certain format set in mystery, and together with it that of those actually present upon the Mount. It stands to reason, and everyone rationally studying in accordance with Scripture knows that the Evangelists are in agreement one with another. Luke spoke of eight days without contradicting Matthew, who declared “after six days.” There is not another day added on to represent the day on which these sayings were uttered, nor is the day on which the Lord was transfigured added on (which a rational person might reasonably imagine to be added to the days of Matthew).

The Evangelist Luke does not say “after eight days” (like the Evangelist Matthew says “after six days”), but rather “it came to pass eight days after these words.” But where the Evangelists seem to contradict one another, they actually point out to us something great and mysterious. In actual fact, why did the one say “after six days,” but the other, in ignoring the seventh day, have in mind the eighth day? It is because the great vision of the Light of the Transfiguration of the Lord is the mystery of the Eighth Day, i.e., of the future age, coming to be revealed after the passing away of the world created in six days.

About the power of the Divine Spirit, through Whom the Kingdom of God is to be revealed, the Lord predicted: “There are some standing here who shall not taste death, until they have seen the Son of Man coming in His Kingdom” (Mt 16:28). Everywhere and in every way the King will be present, and everywhere will be His Kingdom, since the advent of His Kingdom does not signify the passing over from one place to another, but rather the revelation of its power of the Divine Spirit. That is why it is said: “come in power.” And this power is not manifest to simply ordinary people, but to those standing with the Lord, that is to say, those who have affirmed their faith in Him like Peter, James and John, and especially those who are free of our natural abasement. Therefore, and precisely because of this, God manifests Himself upon the Mount, on the one hand coming down from His heights, and on the other, raising us up from the depths of abasement, since the Transcendent One takes on mortal nature. Certainly, such a manifest appearance by far transcends the utmost limits of the mind’s grasp, as effectualized by the power of the Divine Spirit.

Thus, the Light of the Transfiguration of the Lord is not something that comes to be and then vanishes, nor is it subject to the sensory faculties, although it was contemplated by corporeal eyes for a short while upon an inconsequential mountaintop. But the initiates of the Mystery, (the disciples) of the Lord at this time passed beyond mere flesh into spirit through a transformation of their senses, effectualized within them by the Spirit, and in such a way that they beheld what, and to what extent, the Divine Spirit had wrought blessedness in them to behold the Ineffable Light.

Those not grasping this point have conjectured that the chosen from among the Apostles beheld the Light of the Transfiguration of the Lord by a sensual and creaturely faculty, and through this they attempt to reduce to a creaturely level (i.e., as something “created”) not only this Light, the Kingdom and the Glory of God, but also the Power of the Divine Spirit, through Whom it is meet for Divine Mysteries to be revealed. In all likelihood, such persons have not heeded the words of the Apostle Paul: “Eye has not seen, nor ear heard, nor has it entered into the heart of man, what things God has prepared for those who love Him. But to us God has revealed them through His Spirit. For the Spirit searches all things, even the deep things of God” (1 Cor 2:9-10).

So, with the onset of the Eighth Day, the Lord, taking Peter, James and John, went up on the Mount to pray. He always prayed alone, withdrawing from everyone, even from the Apostles themselves, as for example when with five loaves and two fish He fed the five thousand men, besides women and children (Mt 14:19-23). Or, taking with Him those who excelled others, as at the approach of His Saving Passion, when He said to the other disciples: “Sit here while I go over there and pray” (Mt 26:36). Then He took with Him Peter, James and John. But in our instance right here and now, having taken only these same three, the Lord led them up onto a high mountain by themselves and was transfigured before them, that is to say, before their very eyes.

“What does it mean to say: He was transfigured?” asks the Golden-Mouthed Theologian (Chrysostomos). He answers this by saying: “It revealed something of His Divinity to them, as much and insofar as they were able to apprehend it, and it showed the indwelling of God within Him.” The Evangelist Luke says: “And as He prayed, His countenance was altered” (Lk 9:29); and from the Evangelist Matthew we read: “And His face shone as the sun” (Mt 17:2). But the Evangelist said this, not in the context that this Light be thought of as subsistent for the senses (let us put aside the blindness of mind of those who can conceive of nothing higher than what is known through the senses). Rather, it is to show that Christ God, for those living and contemplating by the Spirit, is the same as the sun is for those living in the flesh and contemplating by the senses. Therefore, some other Light for the knowing the Divinity is not necessary for those who are enriched by Divine gifts.

That same Inscrutable Light shone and was mysteriously manifest to the Apostles and the foremost of the Prophets at that moment, when (the Lord) was praying. This shows that what brought forth this blessed sight was prayer, and that the radiance occurred and was manifest by uniting the mind with God, and that it is granted to all who, with constant exercise in efforts of virtue and prayer, strive with their mind towards God. True beauty, essentially, can be contemplated only with a purified mind. To gaze upon its luminance assumes a sort of participation in it, as though some bright ray etches itself upon the face.

Even the face of Moses was illumined by his association with God. Do you not know that Moses was transfigured when he went up the mountain, and there beheld the Glory of God? But he (Moses) did not effect this, but rather he underwent a transfiguration. However, our Lord Jesus Christ possessed that Light Himself. In this regard, actually, He did not need prayer for His flesh to radiate with the Divine Light; it was but to show from whence that Light descends upon the saints of God, and how to contemplate it. For it is written that even the saints “will shine forth like the sun” (Mt 13:43), which is to say, entirely permeated by Divine Light as they gaze upon Christ, divinely and inexpressibly shining forth His Radiance, issuing from His Divine Nature. On Mount Tabor it was manifest also in His Flesh, by reason of the Hypostatic Union (i.e., the union of the two perfect natures, divine and human, within the divine Person [Hypostasis] of Christ, the Second Person of the Most Holy Trinity). The Fourth Ecumenical Council at Chalcedon defined this Hypostatic union of Christ’s two natures, divine and human, as “without mingling, without change, without division, without separation.”

We believe that at the Transfiguration He manifested not some other sort of light, but only that which was concealed beneath His fleshly exterior. This Light was the Light of the Divine Nature, and as such, it was Uncreated and Divine. So also, in the teachings of the Fathers, Jesus Christ was transfigured on the Mount, not taking upon Himself something new nor being changed into something new, nor something which formerly He did not possess. Rather, it was to show His disciples that which He already was, opening their eyes and bringing them from blindness to sight. For do you not see that eyes that can perceive natural things would be blind to this Light?

Thus, this Light is not a light of the senses, and those contemplating it do not simply see with sensual eyes, but rather they are changed by the power of the Divine Spirit. They were transformed, and only in this way did they see the transformation taking place amidst the very assumption of our perishability, with the deification through union with the Word of God in place of this.

So also she who miraculously conceived and gave birth recognized that the One born of her is God Incarnate. So it was also for Simeon, who only received this Infant into his arms, and the aged Anna, coming out [from the Jerusalem Temple] for the Meeting, since the Divine Power illumined, as through a glass windowpane, giving light for those having pure eyes of heart.

And why did the Lord, before the beginning of the Transfiguration, choose the foremost of the Apostles and lead them up onto the Mount with Him? Certainly, it was to show them something great and mysterious. What is particularly great or mysterious in showing a sensory light, which not only the foremost, but all the other Apostles already abundantly possessed? Why would they need a transforming of their eyes by the power of the Holy Spirit for a contemplation of this Light, if it were merely sensory and created? How could the Glory and the Kingdom of the Father and the Holy Spirit project forth in some sort of sensory light? Indeed, in what sort of Glory and Kingdom would Christ the Lord come at the end of the ages, when there would not be necessary anything in the air, nor in expanse, nor anything similar, but when, in the words of the Apostle, “God will be all in all” (1 Cor 15: 28)? That is to say, will He alter everything for all? If so, then it follows that light is included.

Hence it is clear that the Light of Tabor was a Divine Light. And the Evangelist John, inspired by Divine Revelation, says clearly that the future eternal and enduring city “has no need of the sun or moon to shine upon it. For the Glory of God lights it up, and the Lamb will be its lamp” (Rev 21:23). Is it not clear, that he points out here that this [Lamb] is Jesus, Who is divinely transfigured now upon Tabor, and the flesh of Whom shines, is the lamp manifesting the Glory of divinity for those ascending the mountain with Him?

John the Theologian also says about the inhabitants of this city: “they will not need light from lamps, nor the light of the sun, for the Lord God will shed light upon them, and night shall be no more” (Rev 22:5). But how, we might ask, is there this other light, in which “there is no change, nor shadow of alteration” (Jas 1:17)? What light is there that is constant and unsetting, unless it be the Light of God? Moreover, could Moses and Elias (and particularly the former, who clearly was present only in spirit, and not in flesh [Elias having ascended bodily to Heaven on the fiery chariot]) be shining with any sort of sensory light, and be seen and known? Especially since it was written of them: “they appeared in glory, and spoke of his death, which he was about to fulfill at Jerusalem” (Lk 9:30-31). And how otherwise could the Apostles recognize those whom they had never seen before, unless through the mysterious power of the Divine Light, opening their mental eyes?

But let us not tire our attention with the furthestmost interpretations of the words of the Gospel. We shall believe thus, as those same ones have taught us, who themselves were enlightened by the Lord Himself, insofar as they alone know this well: the Mysteries of God, in the words of a prophet, are known to God alone and His perpetual proximity. Let us, considering the Mystery of the Transfiguration of the Lord in accord with their teaching, strive to be illumined by this Light ourselves and encourage in ourselves love and striving towards the Unfading Glory and Beauty, purifying our spiritual eyes of worldly thoughts and refraining from perishable and quickly passing delights and beauty which darken the garb of the soul and lead to the fire of Gehenna and everlasting darkness. Let us be freed from these by the illumination and knowledge of the incorporeal and ever-existing Light of our Savior transfigured on Tabor, in His Glory, and of His Father from all eternity, and His Life-Creating Spirit, Whom are One Radiance, One Godhead, and Glory, and Kingdom, and Power now and ever and unto ages of ages. Amen.

Concerning The Genealogy According To The Flesh Of Our Lord Jesus Christ And The Ever-Virgin Mother Of God Who Bore Him In Virginity

1. David indicates that our Lord Jesus Christ has no genealogy with regard to His divinity (Ps. 110:4), Isaiah says the same (Isa. 53:8), and later so does the apostle (Heb. 7:3). How can the descent be traced of Him "who is in the beginning, and is with God, and is God, and is the Word and Son of God" (cf John 1:1-2, 18)? He does not have a Father who was before Him, and shares with His Father "a name which is above every name" and all speech (Phil. 2:9). For the most part, genealogies are traced back through different surnames but there is no surname for God (cf. Gen. 32:29), and whatever may be said of Father, Son and Holy Spirit, They are one and do not differ in any respect.

2. Impossible to recount is Christ's descent according to His divinity, but His ancestry according to His human nature can be traced, since He who deigned to become Son of man in order to save mankind was the offspring of men. And it is this genealogy of His that two of the evangelists, Matthew and Luke, recorded. But although Matthew, in the passage from his Gospel read today, begins with those born first, he makes no mention of anyone before Abraham. He traces the line down from Abraham until he reaches Joseph to whom, by divine dispensation, the Virgin Mother of God was betrothed (Matt. 1:1—16), being of the same tribe and homeland as him, that her own stock might be shown from this to be in no way inferior. Luke, by contrast, begins not with the earliest forebears but the most recent, and working his way back from Joseph the Betrothed, does not stop at Abraham, nor, having included Abraham's predecessors, does he end with Adam, but lists God among Christ's human forebears (Luke 3:23-38); wishing to show, in my opinion, that from the beginning man was not just a creation of God, but also a son in the Spirit, which was given to him at the same time as his soul, through God's quickening breath (Gen. 2:7). It was granted to him as a pledge that, if, waiting patiently for it, he kept the commandment, he would be able to share through the same Spirit in a more perfect union with God, by which he would live for ever with Him and obtain immortality

3. By heeding the evil counsel of the pernicious angel, man transgressed the divine commandments, was shown to be unworthy, forfeited the pledge and interrupted God's plan. God's grace, however, is unalterable and His purpose cannot prove false, so some of man's offspring were chosen, that, from among many, a suitable receptacle for this divine adoption and grace might be found, who would serve God's will perfectly, and would be revealed as a vessel worthy to unite divine and human nature in one person, not just exalting our nature, but restoring the human race. The holy Maid and Virgin Mother of God was this vessel, so she was proclaimed by the archangel Gabriel as full of grace (Luke 1:28),"being the chosen one among the chosen, blameless, undefiled and worthy to contain the person of the God-man and to collaborate" with Him. Therefore God pre-ordained her before all ages, chose her from among all who had ever lived, and deemed her worthy of more grace than anyone else, making her the holiest of saints, even before her mysterious childbearing. For that reason, He graciously willed that she should make her home in the Holy of Holies, and accepted her as His companion to share His dwelling from her childhood. He did not simply choose her from the masses, but from the elect of all time, who were admired and renowned for their piety and wisdom, and for their character, words and deeds, which pleased God and brought benefit to all.

4. Note where this choice began. The excellent Seth was chosen from among Adam's children, because by his well-ordered conduct, his control over his senses and his glorious virtue he showed himself to be a living heaven and so came to be one of the elect, from whom the Virgin would spring forth, that truly heavenly and divinely appropriate chariot of the supra-celestial God, and through whom He would call men back to eternal sonship. Therefore all Seth's stock were called sons of God (cf. Gen. 6:2), because it was from this race that the Son of God was to become the Son of man. That is why the name Seth can be interpreted to mean "resurrection", or rather "a rising up from", which really refers to the Lord, who promises and gives eternal life to those who believe in Him.

5. And how worthy a type of Christ is Seth? "Seth was born to Eve", as she herself says, "instead of Abel" (cf. Gen. 4:25), whom Cain envied and murdered, whereas the Virgin's son, Christ, was born to the human race instead of Adam, whom the prince and father of evil killed out of envy. Seth, however, did not raise up Abel, as he was merely a pre-figuration of the resurrection, whereas our Lord Jesus Christ resurrected Adam, for He is the true life and resurrection of mankind (cf. John 11:25), through whom Seth's descendants were deemed worthy in hope, of divine adoption, being called sons of God. That they were referred to as God's sons on account of this hope, is demonstrated by the first person to be so called and to inherit God's election. This was Seth's son Enos who, as Moses wrote, "was the first to hope to be called by the Lord's name" (cf. Gen. 4:26 LXX).

6. Do you see clearly that it was through hope that he came to be so called? If the Seventy say "He was the first to hope to call upon the Lord's name", they are not at all in disagreement with the others; because Enos lived in a way that pleased God more than anyone else in his day and was the first to receive this hope from God. He called upon this hope and was called after it. Seth was chosen by God from among Adam's sons, and so Luke, in preparing his genealogy traces back to him the whole race from which Christ was born according to the flesh. Then Enos was chosen in preference to Seth's other children, as we have said. From his descendants Enoch was chosen, who proved through what happened to him that virtue does not go unrewarded, and that this fleeting world is not worthy of those who are well-pleasing to God, for he was translated because he pleased God (Gen. 5:24, Heb. 11:5). Lamech was chosen and preferred to Enoch's other descendants, and after him his son, Noah, attained to God's election and became the only father of everyone in the world after the flood. Only he and his entire family were found to live chastely at that time when the sons of God took wives from among the daughters of men, as Moses tells us (Gen. 6:1-2). This repentance, all ye that labour and are heavy laden with sins, and I will give you rest" (cf Matt. 11:211), bestowing freedom, ease and eternal life upon you.

10. Lamech, who gave Noah this name, because he saw in him Christ, who was later to come from their stock, and would be the comfort of all God-fearing people down through the ages, clearly prophesied through this name concerning Christ "He called his name Noah", says the Scripture, "saying; This same shall bring us rest from our works, and from the toils of our hands, and from the earth, which the Lord our God hath cursed" (Gen. 5:29 LXX). These words are not about the flood which came to pass, for Lamech's death preceded the flood, yet he says that Noah will "bring us rest", including himself as a partaker in the comfort he foretold. In those days it had not yet come about that in each man "every imagination of the thoughts of his heart was only evil continually" (Gen. 6:5) throughout his life, which was why the universal destruction of everyone on earth came upon the earth from God. So to whom do his words refer when he says, "He will bring us rest?" He also says, "He shall bring us rest from the earth, which God hath cursed". Who else gives us rest from this earth except Him who opened heaven, raised our nature thither and taught us, through words and deeds, the way up to heaven, calling us towards it? But if the flood too prefigured this rest, it did so by cutting off sins and laying them to rest, not by bringing comfort and ease to sinners.

11. In this way and for these reasons, Noah attained to God's election. Of his children, Shem was accepted among those chosen to be the blessed family of the Mother of God. That is why, although Japheth also appears to have been well-pleasing to his father, only Shem heard from his father, "Blessed be the Lord God of Shem" (Gen. 9:26), as his progeny was to be divine. For it was from him that Abraham was descended, who was preferred according to God's election above all Shem's offspring and was called to be part of the lineage of the Virgin Mother. He was given a new name by God, and received that great promise that all the families of the earth would be blessed in his seed (Gen. 17:5; 12:3). According to Paul, Christ our God, who was born of the Virgin, is his seed according to the flesh (Gal. 3:16). And who could describe the divine visions that Abraham experienced, or the signs and promises from God which foreshadowed and prophesied concerning the ever-virgin Mother of God and her ineffable childbearing? Let us, however, quickly pass over what happened next, as time does not permit us to speak at length. From among Abraham's children Isaac was chosen, then Jacob from among his sons, and the tribe of Judah from Jacob's offspring. From this tribe the root of Jesse was selected, and from those who sprang from this root, David the psalmist and prophet and king, of whom God says, "Thy seed shall endure for ever, and his throne as the sun before me; and as the moon that is established for ever, and the witness in heaven is faithful" (cf Ps. 89:36-37 LXX).

12. Who is this witness? Obviously He who sits upon the heavenly throne, of whom it says elsewhere: "His name shall be continued as long as the sun: and all the families of the earth shall be blessed in him" (Ps. 72:17 LXX). From this the lineage of the Mother of God and Joseph, to whom she was betrothed, seems somehow double, for both were of the same tribe and descent according to the law. Thus the family's ancestral line is twofold, made up both of natural children and children according to the law, often converging into one, but sometimes divided into two, so that the same child, strange as it may seem, might be the son of two fathers who are brothers, of the one from a legal point of view, as not having been begotten of him physically, and of the other, according to nature, as having been raised up as seed for his brother (cf. Matt. 22:24, Deut. 25:5-6, Gen. 38:8); inasmuch as the child traces his ancestry back to David through both his fathers. It is possible to see the dual nature of this lineage in another respect, because the royal line was united on many occasions and in numerous ways with the priestly one. Thus in the holy ancestral line of the Mother of God, Zerubbabel traces his lineage back to David through the descendants of Nathan, who was counted among the priests, as well as through those of Solomon, who inherited the kingdom. For this reason the Lord's genealogy according to the flesh is drawn up differently by the evangelists Luke and Matthew, because, one takes into account natural fathers, the other, fathers according to the law and one mentions only those of royal descent, whereas Luke brings in those of the Levitical race and those of the royal house, who were bound together by priesthood or marriage.

13. As for Zerubbabel, because he was also favoured among the Mother of God's forebears, he too prefigured Christ and was honoured with great titles and authority. Born in captivity, he was admired by Cyrus, king of the Medes and Persians, for his virtue and understanding. He taught both Hebrews and foreigners the power of the truth, set his race free from servitude and restored God's Temple (Esd. 4:33-63, Ezra 3:1-13). Later, Christ did something similar, not renewing the inanimate Temple, but that living, rational temple, our nature, and redeeming it, not from perceptible and temporary, but spiritual and primeval captivity. Nor did he move His followers from one country to another, but transferred them from earth to heaven. Zerubbabel was the forefather of both the Virgin and Joseph to whom she was betrothed, but whereas he was the Virgin's forebear by nature alone, he was Joseph's according to nature and the law. For Joseph had two fathers, Heli according to Luke (Luke 3:23), and Jacob according to Matthew (Matt. 1:16). Heli and Jacob were brothers descended from Zerubbabel, and when Heli died without children, Jacob fathered a child, Joseph, by his brother's wife, who according to the law belonged to Heli.

14. Now these things are examples and types of greater mysteries, since it was necessary that the royal line be united in many ways with the priestly race, which would bring forth the family of Christ according to the flesh; because in many ways Christ is truly the eternal King and High Priest. And the fact that adopted sons are counted as sons, that the law approves of adoptive fathers no less and sometimes more than natural fathers, and that the same, appropriately, applies to other kinds of kinship, was a clear example and type of our adoption by Christ, our kinship with Him and our calling according to the Spirit and the law of grace. For the Lord Himself says in the Gospels, "Whosoever shall do the will of my Father which is in heaven, the same is my brother, and sister, and mother" (Matt. 12:50).

15. Do you see that the family and kin of Christ are not engendered according to nature, but according to grace and the law that comes from grace? This law is so far superior to the law given through Moses that, whereas those called sons according to the law of Moses are neither born of God nor do they transcend human nature, those styled sons by the Law of grace are born of God, brought to perfection above nature and made sons of Abraham through Christ, more closely associated with him than sons according to blood. All who have been baptized into Christ have put on Christ, according to Paul (Gal. 3:27), and although they are other people's children according to nature, they are born supernaturally of Christ, who in this way conquers nature. For as He became incarnate without seed of the Holy Spirit and the ever-virgin Mary, so He grants potential and power to those who believe in His name to become children of God. For "as many as received him", says the evangelist, "to them gave he power to become the sons of God, even to them that believe on his name: which were born, not of blood, nor of the will of the flesh, nor of the will of man, but of God" (John 1:12-13).

16. Why, when he says, "which were born of God", does he not say "and became sons of God", but "received power to become" sons? Because he was looking towards the end and the universal restoration, the perfection of the age to come. The same evangelist says in his epistles, "It doth not yet appear what we shall be: but when he shall appear, we shall be like him" (1 John 3:2). Then shall we be children of God, seeing and experiencing God's radiance, with the rays of Christ's glory shining around us, and ourselves shining as Moses and Elijah proved to us when they appeared with Him in glory on Mount Tabor (Matt. 17:3, Luke 9:3)). "The righteous", it says, "shall shine forth as the sun in the kingdom of their Father" (Matt. 13:43). We receive power for this purpose now through the grace of divine baptism. Just as a newborn infant has received potential from his parents to become a man and heir to their house and fortune, but does not yet possess that inheritance because he is a minor, nor will he receive it if he dies before coming of age, so a person born again in the Spirit through Christian baptism has received power to become a son and heir of God, a joint-heir with Christ (cf Rom. 8:17). And in the age to come he will, with all certainty, receive the divine and immortal adoption as a son, which will not be taken from him, unless he has forfeited this by spiritual death. Sin is spiritual death, and whereas physical death is annulled when the future age arrives, spiritual death is confirmed for those who bring it with them from here.

17. Everyone who has been baptized, if he is to obtain the eternal blessedness and salvation for which he hopes, should live free from all sin. Peter and Paul, the leaders of the highest company of the holy apostles made this clear. Paul said of Christ, "In that he died, he died unto sin once: but in that he liveth, he liveth unto God", adding, "likewise we also ought to be dead indeed unto sin, but alive unto God" (cf. Rom. 6:10-11); whereas Peter wrote, "Forasmuch then as Christ hath died for us in the flesh, arm yourselves likewise with the same mind: that ye no longer should live the rest of your time by the lusts of men, but by the will of God" (I Pet. 4:1-2). If it was for our sake that the Lord lived His time on earth, to leave us an example, and He passed His life without sin, we too must live without sin, in imitation of Him. Since He said even to Abraham's descendants according to the flesh, "If ye were Abraham's children, ye would do the works of Abraham" (John 8:39), how much more will He say to us who have no physical kinship with Him, "If you were My children, you would do My works"? It is therefore consistent and just that anyone who, after divine baptism, after the covenants he made then to God and the grace he received from it, does not follow Christ's way of life step by step, but transgresses and offends against the benefactor, should be utterly deprived of divine adoption and the eternal inheritance!

18. But, O Christ our King, who can worthily extol the greatness of Your love for mankind? What was unnecessary for Him and what He did not do, namely, repentance (for He never needed to repent, being sinless (cf. Heb. 4:15), He granted to us as a mediator, for when we sin even after receiving grace. Repentance means returning once again to Him and to a life according to His will out of remorse. Even if someone commits a deadly sin, if he turns away from it with all his soul, abstains from it and turns back to the Lord in deed and truth, he should take courage and be of good hope, for he shall not lose eternal life and salvation. When a child according to the flesh meets his death, he is not brought back to life by his father; but someone born of Christ, even though he fall into deadly sins, if he turns again and runs to the Father who raises the dead, is made alive once more, obtains divine adoption, and is not cast out from the company of the just.

19. May we all attain to this, to the glory of Christ and of His Father without beginning and of the life-giving Spirit, now and for ever, and unto unceasing ages. Amen.

The Sparkling Stone

Prologue

THE man who would live in the most perfect state of Holy Church must be a good and zealous man; an inward and ghostly man; an uplifted and God-seeing man; and an outflowing man to all in common. Whenever these four things are together in a man, then his state is perfect; and through the increase of grace he shall continually grow and progress in all virtues, and in the knowledge of truth, before God and before all men.

Chapter IV - Of the Sparkling Stone, and Of the New Name Written in the Book of the Secrets of God

AND therefore the Spirit of our Lord speaks thus in the Book of the Secrets of God, which St John wrote down: TO HIM THAT OVERCOMETH, He says, that is, to him who overcometh and conquereth himself and all else, WILL I GIVE TO EAT OF THE HIDDEN MANNA, that is, an inward and hidden savour and celestial joy; AND WILL GIVE HIM A SPARKLING STONE, AND IN THE STONE A NEW NAME WRITTEN WHICH NO MAN KNOWETH SAVING HE THAT RECEIVETH IT. This stone is called a pebble, for it is so small that it does not hurt when one treads on it. This stone is shining white and red like a flame of fire; and it is small and round, and smooth all over, and very light. By this sparkling stone we mean our Lord Christ Jesus, for He is, according to His Godhead, a shining forth of the Eternal Light, and an irradiation of the glory of God, and a flawless mirror in which all things live.

Now to him who overcomes and transcends all things, this sparkling stone is given; and with it he receives light and truth and life. This stone is also like to a fiery flame, for the fiery love of the Eternal Word has filled the whole world with love and wills that all loving spirits be burned up to nothingness in love. This stone is also so small that a man hardly feels it, even though he treads it underfoot. And that is why it is called CALCULUS, that is, "treadling." And this is made clear to us by St Paul, where he says that the Son of God EMPTIED HIMSELF , AND HUMBLED HIMSELF, AND TOOK UPON HIM THE FORM OF A SERVANT AND BECAME OBEDIENT UNTO DEATH, EVEN THE DEATH OF THE CROSS.

And He Himself spoke through the mouth of the Prophet, saying: I AM A WORM, AND NO MAN: A REPROACH OF MEN AND DESPISED OF THE PEOPLE. And He made Himself so small in time that the Jews trod Him under their feet. But they felt Him not; for, had they recognized the Son of God, they had not dared to crucify Him. He is still little and despised in all men's hearts that do not love Him well. This noble stone of which I speak is wholly round and smooth and even all over. That the stone is round teaches us that the Divine Truth has neither beginning nor end; that it is smooth and even all over teaches us that the Divine Truth shall weigh all things evenly, and shall give to each according to his merits; and that which he gives shall be with each throughout eternity.

The last property of this stone of which I will speak is, that it is particularly light; for the Eternal Word of the Father has no weight, nevertheless It bears heaven and earth by Its strength. And It is equally near to all things; yet none can attain It, for It is set on high and goes before all creatures, and reveals Itself where It wills and when It wills; and, in Its lightness, our heavy human nature has climbed above all the heavens, and sits crowned at the right hand of the Father.

Behold, this is the sparkling stone which is given to the God-seeing man, and in this stone A NEW NAME IS WRITTEN, WHICH NO MAN KNOWETH SAVING HE THAT RECEIVETH IT. You should know that all spirits in their return towards God receive names; each one in particular, according to the nobleness of its service and the loftiness of its love. For only the first name of innocence, which we receive at baptism, is adorned with the merits of our Lord Jesus Christ. And when we have lost this name of innocence through sin, if we are willing still to follow God—especially in three works which He wishes to work in us—we are baptized once more in the Holy Ghost. And thereby we receive a new name which shall remain with us throughout eternity.

Chapter VI - Of the Difference Between the Hirelings and the Faithful Servants of God

NOW you may mark this: that some men receive the gifts of God as hirelings, but others as faithful servants of God; and these differ one from another in all inward works, that is, in love and intention, in feeling and in every exercise of the inward life.

Now understand this well: all those who love themselves so inordinately that they will not serve God, save for their own profit and because of their own reward, these separate themselves from God, and dwell in bondage and in their own selfhood; for they seek, and aim at, their own, in all that they do. And therefore, with all their prayers and with all their good works, they seek after temporal things, or may be strive after eternal things for their own benefit and for their own profit. These men are bent upon themselves in an inordinate way; and that is why they ever abide alone with themselves, for they lack the true love which would unite them with God and with all His beloved.

And although these men seem to keep within the law and the commandments of God and of Holy Church, they do not keep within the law of love; for all that they do, they do, not out of love, but from sheer necessity, lest they shall be damned. And, because they are inwardly unfaithful, they dare not trust in God; but their whole inward life is doubt and fear, travail and misery. For they see on the right hand eternal life, and this they are afraid of losing; and they see on the left hand the eternal pains of hell, and these they are afraid of gaining. But all their prayers, all their labour and all the good works, whatsoever they do, to cast out this fear, help them not; for the more inordinately they love themselves, the more they fear hell. And from this you may learn that their fear of hell springs from self-love, which seeks its own.

Now the Prophet, and also the Preacher, say: THE FEAR OF THE LORD IS THE BEGINNING OF WISDOM; but by this is meant that fear which is exercised upon the right side, where one considers the loss of eternal blessedness, for this fear arises from the natural tendency which every man has in himself to be blessed, that is, to see God. And therefore, even though a man may be faithless to God, yet whenever he truly observes himself from within, he feels himself to be leaning out from himself towards that blessedness which is God. And this blessedness he fears to lose; for he loves himself better than God, and he loves blessedness wholly for his own sake. And therefore he dare not trust in God. And yet this is that FEAR OF THE LORD WHICH IS THE BEGINNING OF WISDOM and is a law to the unfaithful servants of God: for it compels a man to leave sin, and to strive after virtue, and to do good deeds, and these things prepare a man from without to receive the grace of God and become a faithful servant.

But from that very hour in which, with God's help, he can overcome his selfhood—that is to say when he is so detached from himself that he is able to leave in the keeping of God everything of which he has need—behold, through doing this he is so well pleasing to God that God bestows upon him His grace. And, through grace, he feels true love: and love casts out doubt and fear, and fills the man with hope and trust, and thus he becomes a faithful servant, and means and loves God in all that he does. Behold, this is the difference between the faithful servant and the hireling.

Chapter VII - Of the Difference Between the Faithful Servants and the Secret Friends of God

WE must now observe the great difference which there is between the faithful servants and the inward friends of God. For through grace and the help of God, the faithful servants have chosen to keep the commandments of God, that is, to be obedient to God and Holy Church in all virtues and goodly behaviour: and this is called the outward or active life. But the inward friends of God choose to follow, besides the commandments, the quickening counsels of God, and this is a loving and inward cleaving to God for the sake of His eternal glory, with a willing abandonment of all that one may possess outside God with lust and love. All such friends God calls and invites inwards, and He teaches them the distinctions of inward exercises and many a hidden way of ghostly life. But He sends His servants outwards, that they may be faithful to Him and to His House in every service and in every kind of outward good works.

Behold, thus God gives His grace and His help to each man according to his fitness; that is, according to the way in which he is in tune with God, whether in outward good works or in the inward practice of love. But none can do and feel the inward exercises unless he be wholly turned inward to God. For as long as a man is divided of heart, so long he looks outwards, and is unstable of mind, and is easily swayed by joy and grief in temporal things, for these are still alive within him. And though he may live according to the commandments of God, inwardly he abides in darkness, and knows not what inward exercises may be, nor how these should be practised. But, since he knows and feels that he has God in mind, and in all his works desires to fulfil His dearest will, with this he may be content; for then he knows himself to be free from hypocrisy in his intention, and faithful in his service.

And by these two things he contents himself; and it seems to him that outward good works done with a pure intention are more holy and more profitable than any inward exercise whatever, for by the help of God, he has chosen an outward active way of virtue. And therefore he had rather exercise himself in the diversity of outward works than serve with inward love that same One for Whom he works. And that is the cause why his mind is more filled with the works which he does, than with God, for Whom he does them. And through this tendency to images in his works, he remains an outward man, and is not able to follow the counsels of God; for his exercise is more outward than inward, more of the senses than of the spirit.

Though he is indeed a faithful servant of God in outward works, yet that which the secret friends of God experience remains hidden from, and unknown to him. And this is why certain gross and outward men always condemn and blame the inward and contemplative men, because they have in mind that these are idle. And this was also the reason why Martha complained to our Lord of her sister Mary, because she did not help her in serving; for she believed that she was doing much service and much usefulness, and that her sister was sitting idle and doing nothing. But our Lord gave His judgment and decided between them: He did not blame Martha for her diligence, for her service was good and useful; but He blamed her for her care, and because she was troubled and cast down by a multitude of outward things. And He praised Mary for her inward exercise, and said that One Thing was needful, and that she had chosen the better part, which should not be taken away from her.

That One Thing which is needful for all men is Divine love. The better part is an inward life, with loving adherence to God. This Mary Magdalen had chosen, and this is chosen by the secret friends of God. But Martha chose an outward, unenclosed, and active life; and that is the other part, in which one may serve God, but which is neither so perfect nor so good. And this part is chosen out of love by the faithful servants of God.

But there are found some foolish men who would be so inward that they would neither act nor serve, even in those things of which their neighbour has need. Behold, these are neither secret friends nor faithful servants of God; but they are altogether false and deceived. For no man can follow the counsels of God who will not keep His commandments. And therefore all secret friends of God are also at the same time faithful servants, wherever this is needful; but all the faithful servants are not secret friends, for the exercise which belongs thereto is unknown to them.

This is the difference between the faithful servants and the secret friends of God.

Chapter VIII - Of the Difference Between the Secret Friends and the Hidden Sons of God

BUT further we find a more subtle and inward difference, between the secret friends and the hidden sons of God; and yet both these alike by their inward exercise maintain themselves in the Presence of God. But the friends possess their inwardness as an attribute, for they choose the loving adherence to God as best and highest of all that they ever can and will reach: and that is why they cannot with themselves and their own activity penetrate to the imageless Nudity. For they have, as images and intermediaries between God and themselves, their own being and their own activity. And though in their loving adherence they feel united with God, yet, in this union, they always feel a difference and an otherness between God and themselves. For the simple passing into the Bare and Wayless, they do not know and love: and therefore their highest inward life ever remains in Reason and in Ways. And though they have clear understanding and discernment of all virtues that may be conceived, the simple staring with open heart into the Divine Brightness remains unknown of them. And though they feel themselves uplifted to God in a mighty fire of love, yet they keep something of their own selfhood, and are not consumed and burnt to nothingness in the unity of love. And though they may desire to live for ever more in the service of God and to please Him eternally, they will not die in God to all the selfhood of their spirit, and receive from Him a God-formed life. And even though they esteem little and count as nothing all consolation and all rest which may come from without, yet they greatly value the gifts of God, and also their own inward works and the solace and sweetness which they feel within and thus they rest upon the way, and do not so wholly die to themselves, as to be able to attain the highest beatitude in bare and wayless love.

And even if they could practise and apprehend with clear discernment the perfection of loving adherence to God, and all the inward and upward going ways by which one may pass into the Presence of God; yet the wayless passing, and the glorious wandering, in the Superessential Love, wherein neither end, nor beginning, nor way, nor manner, can ever be found, would remain hidden from, and unknown of them.

And so there is a great difference between the secret friends and the hidden sons of God. For the friends feel nought else but a loving and living ascent to God in some wise, but, above this, the sons experience a simple and death-like passing which is in no wise.

The inward life of the friends of our Lord is an upward-striving exercise of love, wherein they desire to remain for ever with their own selfhood; but how one possesses God through bare love above every exercise, in freedom from one's self, this they do not feel. Hence they are always striving upwards towards God in true faith, and await God and eternal blessedness with sincere hope, and are fastened and anchored to God through perfect charity. And therefore good things have befallen them, for they please God, and God is complaisant unto them: yet for all this, they are not assured of eternal life, for they have not entirely died to themselves and to all selfhood.

But all those who abide and endure in their exercise and in that turning to God which they have chosen above all else, these God has chosen in eternity, and their names together with their works are written from eternity in the living book of the Providence of God. But those who choose other things, and turn their inward faces away from God toward sin, and endure therein (even though their names were written and known of God because of the temporal righteousness which they had practised before), their names shall be blotted out and erased from the Book of Life because they did not persevere unto death, and they shall never more be able to taste of God, nor of any fruit which springs from virtue.

And therefore we must needs observe ourselves with diligence, and adorn our turning towards God, from within with inward love, and from without with good works: thus we can await in hope and joy the judgment of God and the coming of our Lord Jesus Christ. But could we renounce ourselves, and all selfhood in our works, we should, with our bare and imageless spirit, transcend all things: and, without intermediary, should be led of the Spirit of God into the Nudity. And then we should feel the certainty that we are indeed the sons of God: for AS MANY AS ARE LED BY THE SPIRIT OF GOD, THEY ARE THE SONS OF GOD, says the Apostle St Paul.

Nevertheless, you should know that all good and faithful men are the sons of God; for they are all born of the Spirit of God, and the Spirit of God lives in them. And He moves and stirs them—each according to his own capacity—to virtues and good works, wherein they are well pleasing to God. But because of the inequality of their adherence and their exercises, I call some the faithful servants of God and others I call His secret friends, and others again His hidden sons: nevertheless, they are all servants, friends, and sons, for they all serve and love and mean one God, and they live and work only by the free Spirit of God. And God permits and allows that His friends do and leave undone all those things which are not contrary to His commandments; and for those who are bound by the counsels of God, then this bond also is a commandment. And so no one is disobedient or contrary to God save he who does not keep His commandments; but all those things which God commands and forbids in Scripture or by Holy Church, or in our conscience, all these things we must do and leave undone, or else be disobedient to God, and lose His grace. But if we fall into venial sins, this is suffered both by God and by our reason, for we cannot wholly guard against them. And therefore such failings do not make us disobedient, for they do not drive out the grace of God nor our inward peace: nevertheless, we should always lament such lapses, how small soever they may be, and guard against them with all our might.

And by these words I have explained to you what I said at the beginning: namely, that every man must needs be obedient in all things to God and to Holy Church and to his own conscience; for I do not wish that any should be unjustly offended by my words. And herewith I leave it even as I have said it.

Chapter IX - How We may Become Hidden Sons of God, and Attain to the God-Seeing Life

BUT I still longed to know how we may become hidden sons of God, and may attain to the God-seeing life. And as to this I have apprehended the following. As it has been said before, we must always live and be watchful in all virtues, and beyond all virtues must forsake this life and die in God; for we must die to sin and be born of God into a life of virtue, and we must renounce ourselves and die in God into an eternal life. And as to this ensues the following instruction: If we are born of the Spirit of God, we are the sons of grace; and so our whole life is adorned with virtues. Thereby we overcome all that is contrary to God; for St John says, WHATSOEVER IS BORN OF GOD OVERCOMETH THE WORLD. In this birth all good men are sons of God. And the Spirit of God kindles and stirs each one of them in particular to those virtues and to those good works for which he is in readiness and of which he is capable. And so they please God all in common, and each in particular, according to the measure of his love and the nobleness of his exercise; nevertheless, they do not feel established nor possessed of God, nor assured of eternal life, for they may still turn away and fall into sin. And that is why I call them rather servants and friends, than sons. But when we transcend ourselves, and become in our ascent towards God, so simple that the naked love in the height can lay hold of us, where love enfolds love, above every exercise of virtue—that is, in our Origin, of Which we are spiritually born—then we cease, and we and all our selfhood die in God. And in this death we become hidden sons of God, and find a new life within us: and that is eternal life. And of these sons, St Paul says: YOU ARE DEAD, AND YOUR LIFE IS HID WITH CHRIST IN GOD.

Now understand, the explanation of this is as follows. In our approach to God, we must carry with us ourselves and all our works, as a perpetual sacrifice to God; and in the Presence of God, we must forsake ourselves and all our works, and, dying in love, go forth from all creatureliness into the superessential richness of God: there we shall possess God in an eternal death to ourselves. And that is why the Spirit of God says in the book of the Divine Secrets: BLESSED ARE THE DEAD WHICH DIE IN THE LORD. Justly He calls them the blessed dead, for they remain eternally dead and lost to themselves in the fruitive Unity of God. And they die in love ever anew, through the indrawing transformation of that same Unity. Further, the Spirit of God says: THEY MAY REST FROM THEIR LABOURS, AND THEIR WORKS DO FOLLOW THEM . In the ordinary state of grace, when we are born of God into a ghostly and virtuous life, we carry our works before us, as an offering to God; but in the wayless state, where we die back into God in an eternal and blessed life, there our good works follow us, for they are one life with us. When we go towards God by means of the virtues, God dwells in us; but when we go out from ourselves and from all else, then we dwell in God. So soon as we have faith, hope and charity, we have received God, and He dwells in us with His grace, and He sends us out as His faithful servants, to keep His commandments. And He calls us in again as His secret friends, so soon as we are willing to follow His counsels; and He names us openly as His sons so soon as we live in opposition to the world.

But if above all things we would taste God, and feel eternal life in ourselves, we must go forth into God with our feeling, above reason; and there we must abide, onefold, empty of ourselves, and free from images, lifted up by love into the simple bareness of our intelligence. For when we go out in love beyond and above all things, and die to all observation in ignorance and in darkness, then we are wrought and transformed through the Eternal Word, Who is the Image of the Father. In this idleness of our spirit, we receive the Incomprehensible Light, which enwraps us and penetrates us, as the air is penetrated by the light of the sun. And this Light is nothing else than a fathomless staring and seeing. What we are, that we behold; and what we behold, that we are: for our thought, our life, and our being are uplifted in simplicity, and made one with the Truth which is God. And therefore in this simple staring we are one life and one spirit with God: and this I call a contemplative life. As soon as we cleave to God through love, we practise the better part; but when we gaze thus into our superessence, we possess God utterly. With this contemplation, there is bound up an exercise which is wayless, that is to say, a noughting of life; for, where we go forth out of ourselves into darkness and the abysmal Waylessness, there shines perpetually the simple ray of the Splendour of God, in which we are grounded, and which draws us out of ourselves into the superessence, and into the immersion of love. And with this sinking into love there is always bound up a practice of love which is wayless; for love cannot be lazy, but would search through and through and taste through and through the fathomless richness which lives in the ground of her being, and this is a hunger which cannot be appeased.

But a perpetual striving after the unattainable—this is swimming against the stream. One can neither leave it nor grasp it, neither do without it nor attain it, neither be silent on it nor speak of it, for it is above reason and understanding, and it transcends all creatures; and therefore we can never reach nor overtake it. But we should abide within ourselves: there we feel that the Spirit of God is driving us and enkindling us in this restlessness of love. And we should abide above ourselves. And then we feel that the Spirit of God is drawing us out of ourselves and burning us to nothingness in His Selfhood; that is, in the Superessential Love with which we are one, and which we possess more deeply and more widely than all else.

This possession is a simple and abysmal tasting of all good and of eternal life; and in this tasting we are swallowed up above reason and without reason, in the deep Quiet of the Godhead, which is never moved. That this is true we can only know by our own feeling, and in no other way. For how this is, or where, or what, neither reason nor practice can come to know: and therefore our ensuing exercise always remains wayless, that is, without manner. For that abysmal Good which we taste and possess, we can neither grasp nor understand; neither can we enter into it by ourselves or by means of our exercises. And so we are poor in ourselves, but rich in God; hungry and thirsty in ourselves, drunken and fulfilled in God; busy in ourselves, idle in God. And thus we shall remain throughout eternity. But without the exercise of love, we can never possess God; and whosoever thinks or feels otherwise is deceived. And thus we live wholly in God, where we possess our blessedness; and we live wholly in ourselves, where we exercise ourselves in love towards God. And though we live wholly in God and wholly in ourselves, yet it is but one life; but it is twofold and opposite according to our feeling, for poor and rich, hungry and satisfied, busy and idle, these things are wholly contrary to one another.

Yet with this our highest honour is bound up, now and in eternity: for we cannot wholly become God and lose our created being, this is impossible. Did we, however, remain wholly in ourselves, sundered from God, we should be miserable and unblest. And therefore we should feel ourselves living wholly in God and wholly in ourselves; and between these two feelings we should find nothing else but the grace of God and the exercise of our love. For out of our highest feeling, the brightness of God shines into us, which teaches us truth, and moves us towards every virtue and in eternal love towards God. If we follow this brightness without pause, back into that Source from whence it comes forth, there we feel nothing but a quenching of our spirit and an irretrievable down-sinking into simple and fathomless love. Could we continue to dwell there with our simple gaze, we should always so feel it; for our immersion and transformation in God continues without ceasing in eternity, if we have gone forth from ourselves, and God is ours in the immersion of love. For if we possess God in the immersion of love—that is, if we are lost to ourselves—God is our own and we are His own: and we sink ourselves eternally and irretrievably in our own possession, which is God. This immersion is essential, and is closely bound up with the state of love: and so it continues whether we sleep or whether we wake, whether we know it or whether we know it not.

And so it does not earn for us any new degree of reward; but it maintains us in the possession of God and of all that good which we have received. And this down-sinking is like a river, which without pause or turning back ever pours into the sea; since this is its proper resting-place.

So likewise when we possess God alone, the down-sinking of our being, with the love that belongs to it flows forth, without return, into a fathomless experience which we possess, and which is our proper resting-place.

Were we always simple, and could we always contemplate with the same recollection, we should always have the same experience. Now this immersion is above all virtues, and above every exercise of love; for it is nothing else than an eternal going out from ourselves, with a clear looking forward, into an otherness or difference towards which, outside ourselves, we tend as towards our blessedness. For we feel an eternal yearning toward something other than what we are ourselves. And this is the most inward and hidden distinction which we can feel between God and ourselves, and beyond it there is no difference any more.

But our reason abides here with open eyes in the darkness, that is, in an abysmal ignorance; and in this darkness, the abysmal splendour remains covered and hidden from us, for its overwhelming unfathomableness blinds our reason. But it enwraps us in simplicity, and transforms us through its selfhood: and thus we are brought forth by God, out of our selfhood, into the immersion of love, in which we possess blessedness, and are one with God.

When we are thus made one with God, there abides within us a quickening knowledge and an active love; for without our own knowledge, we cannot possess God; and without the practice of love, we cannot be united with God, nor remain one with Him. For if we could be blessed without our knowledge, then a stone, which has no knowledge, could also be blessed. Were I lord over all the world and knew it not, how would it profit me? And therefore we shall ever know and feel that we taste and possess; and this is testified by Christ Himself, where He speaks thus of us to His Father: THIS, HE SAYS, IS LIFE ETERNAL, THAT THEY SHOULD KNOW THEE, THE ONLY TRUE GOD, AND JESUS CHRIST, WHOM THOU HAST SENT. And by this you may understand that our eternal life consists in knowledge with discernment.

Chapter X - How We, Though One With God, Must Eternally Remain Other Than God

THOUGH I have said before that we are one with God and this is taught us by Holy Writ, yet now I will say that we must eternally remain other than God, and distinct from Him, and this too is taught us by Holy Writ. And we must understand and feel both within us, if all is to be right with us.

And therefore I say further: that from the Face of God, or from our highest feeling, a brightness shines upon the face of our inward being, which teaches us the truth of love and of all virtues: and especially are we taught in this brightness to feel God and ourselves in four ways. First, we feel God in His grace; and when we apprehend this, we cannot remain idle. For like as the sun, by its splendour and its heat, enlightens and gladdens and makes fruitful the whole world, so God does to us through His grace: He enlightens and gladdens and makes fruitful all men who desire to obey Him.

If, however, we would feel God within us, and have the fire of His love ever more burning within us, we must, of our own free will, help to kindle it in four ways:

We must abide within ourselves, united with the fire through inwardness.

And we must go forth from ourselves towards all good men with loyalty and brotherly love.

And we must go beneath ourselves in penance, betaking ourselves to all good works, and resisting our inordinate lusts.

And we must ascend above ourselves with the flame of this fire, through devotion, and thanksgiving, and praise, and fervent prayer, and must ever cleave to God with an upright intention and with sensible love. And thereby God continues to dwell in us with His grace.

For in these four ways is comprehended every exercise which we can do with the reason, and in some wise, but without this exercise no one can please God. And he who is most perfect in this exercise, is nearest to God. And therefore it is needful for all men; and above it none can rise save the contemplative men. And thus, in this first way, we feel God within us through His grace, if we wish to belong to Him.

Secondly: when we possess the God-seeing life, we feel ourselves to be living in God; and from out of that life in which we feel God in ourselves, there shines forth upon the face of our inward being a brightness which enlightens our reason, and is an intermediary between ourselves and God. And if we with our enlightened reason abide within ourselves in this brightness, we feel that our created life incessantly immerses itself in its eternal life. But when we follow the brightness above reason with a simple sight, and with a willing leaning out of ourselves, toward our highest life, there we experience the transformation of our whole selves in God; and thereby we feel ourselves to be wholly enwrapped in God.

And, after this, there follows the third way of feeling; namely, that we feel ourselves to be one with God; for, through the transformation in God, we feel ourselves to be swallowed up in the fathomless abyss of our eternal blessedness, wherein we can nevermore find any distinction between ourselves and God. And this is our highest feeling, which we cannot experience in any other way than in the immersion in love. And therefore, so soon as we are uplifted and drawn into our highest feeling, all our powers stand idle in an essential fruition; but our powers do not pass away into nothingness, for then we should lose our created being. And as long as we stand idle, with an inclined spirit, and with open eyes, but without reflection, so long we can contemplate and have fruition.

But, at the very moment in which we seek to prove and to comprehend what it is that we feel, we fall back into reason, and there we find a distinction and an otherness between ourselves and God, and find God outside ourselves in incomprehensibility.

And hence the fourth way of distinction; which is, that we feel God and ourselves. Hereby we now find ourselves standing in the Presence of God; and the truth which we receive from the Face of God teaches us that God would be wholly ours and that He wills us to be wholly His. And in that same moment in which we feel that God would be wholly ours, there arises within us a gaping and eager craving which is so hungry and so deep and so empty that, even though God gave all that He could give, if he gave not Himself, we should not be appeased. For, whilst we feel that He has given Himself and yielded Himself to our untrammelled craving, that we may taste of Him in every way that we can desire—and of this we learn the truth in His sight—yet all that we taste, against all that we lack, is but like to a single drop of water against the whole sea: and this makes our spirit burst forth in fury and in the heat and the restlessness of love. For the more we taste, the greater our craving and our hunger; for the one is the cause of the other.

And thus it comes about that we struggle in vain. For we feed upon His Immensity, which we cannot devour, and we yearn after His Infinity, which we cannot attain: and so we cannot enter into God nor can God enter into us, for in the untamed fury of love we are not able to renounce ourselves. And therefore the heat is so unmeasured that the exercise of love between ourselves and God flashes to and fro like the lightning in the sky; and yet we cannot be consumed in its ardour. And in this storm of love our activity is above reason and wayless; for love longs for that which is impossible to it, and reason teaches that love is in the right, but reason can neither counsel love nor dissuade her. For as long as we inwardly perceive that God would be ours, the goodness of God touches our eager craving: and therefrom springs the wildness of love, for the touch which pours forth from God stirs up this wildness, and demands our activity, that is, that we should love eternal love. But the inward-drawing touch draws us out of ourselves, and calls us to be melted and noughted in the Unity. And in this inward-drawing touch, we feel that God wills us to be His; and therefore, we must renounce ourselves and leave Him to work our blessedness.

But where He touches us by the outpouring touch, He leaves us to ourselves, and makes us free, and sets us in His Presence, and teaches us to pray in the spirit and to ask in freedom, and shows us His incomprehensible riches in such manifold ways as we are able to grasp. For everything that we can conceive, wherein is consolation and joy, this we find in Him without measure. And therefore, when our feeling shows us that He with all these riches would be ours and dwell in us for ever more, then all the powers of the soul open themselves, and especially the desirous power; for all the rivers of the grace of God pour forth, and the more we taste of them, the more we long to taste; and the more we long to taste, the more deeply we press into contact with Him; and the more deeply we press into contact with God, the more the flood of His sweetness flows through us and over us; and the more we are thus drenched and flooded, the better we feel and know that the sweetness of God is incomprehensible and unfathomable.

And therefore the prophet says: O TASTE, AND SEE THAT THE LORD IS SWEET. But he does not say how sweet He is, for God's sweetness is without measure and therefore we can neither grasp it nor swallow it.

And this is also testified by the bride of God in the Song of Songs, where she says: I SAT DOWN UNDER HIS SHADOW, WITH GREAT DELIGHT, AND HIS FRUIT WAS SWEET TO MY TASTE.

Chapter XI - Of the Great Difference Between the Brightness of the Saints and the Highest Brightness to Which We Can Attain in This Life

THERE is a great difference between the brightness of the saints and the highest brightness or enlightenment to which we may attain in this life. For it is only the shadow of God which enlightens our inward wilderness, but on the high mountains of the Promised Land there is no shadow: and yet it is one and the same Sun, and one radiance, which enlightens both our wilderness and the high mountains. But the state of the saints is transparent and shining, and therefore they receive the brightness without intermediary: but our state is still mortal and gross, and this sets up an obstacle which causes the shadow, which so darkens our understanding that we cannot know God and heavenly things so clearly as the saints can and do.

For as long as we dwell in the shadow, we cannot see the sun in itself; but NOW WE SEE THROUGH A GLASS DARKLY, says St Paul. Yet the shadow is so enlightened by the sunshine that we can perceive the distinctions between all the virtues, and all the truth which is profitable to our mortal state. But if we would become one with the brightness of the Sun, we must follow love, and go out of ourselves into the Wayless, and then the Sun will draw us with our blinded eyes into Its own brightness, in which we shall possess unity with God. So soon we feel and understand ourselves thus, we are in that contemplative life which is within reach of our mortal state.

The state of the Jews, according to the Old Testament, was cold and in the night, and they walked in darkness. And they DWELT IN THE LAND OF THE SHADOW OF DEATH, says the prophet Isaias. The shadow of death came forth from original sin; and therefore they had all to endure the lack of God. But though our state in the Christian faith is but still in the cool and morning hour; yet for us the day has dawned. And therefore we shall walk in the light, and shall sit down in the shadow, of God; and His grace shall be an intermediary between ourselves and God.

And, through it, we shall overcome all things, and shall die to all things, and shall pass without hindrance into the unity of God. But the state of the saints is warm and bright; for they live and walk in the noon-tide, and see with open and enlightened eyes the brightness of the Sun, for the glory of God flows through them and overflows in them. And each one according to the degree of his enlightenment, tastes and knows the fruits of all the virtues which have there been gathered together by all spirits.

But that they taste and know the Trinity in the Unity, and the Unity in the Trinity, and know themselves united therewith, this is the highest and all-surpassing food which makes them drunken, and causes them to rest in Its Selfhood. And This it was that the bride in the Book of Love desired, when she said unto Christ: TELL ME, O THOU WHOM MY SOUL LOVETH, WHERE THOU FEEDEST, WHERE THOU MAKEST THY FLOCK TO REST AT NOON, that is, in the light of glory, as St Bernard says; for all the food which is given to us here, in the morning hour and in the shadow, is but a foretaste of the food that is to come in the noon-tide of the glory of God.

Yet the bride of our Lord gloried in having sat under the shadow of God, and that His fruit was sweet to her taste. Whenever we feel that God touches us from within, we taste of His fruit and His food: for His touch is His food. And His touch is both indrawing and outpouring, as I have said before. In His indrawing, we must be wholly His: thereby we learn to die and to behold. But in His outpouring He wills to be wholly ours: and then He teaches us to live in the riches of the virtues. In His indrawing-touch all our powers forsake us, and then we sit under His shadow, and His fruit is sweet to our taste, for the Fruit of God is the Son of God, Whom the Father brings forth in our spirit. This Fruit is so infinitely sweet to our taste that we can neither swallow It nor assimilate It, but It rather absorbs us into Itself and assimilates us with Itself. And whenever this Fruit draws us inward and touches us, we abandon, forsake, and overcome all other things. And in this overcoming of all things, we taste of the hidden manna, which shall give us eternal life; for we receive the sparkling stone, of which I have spoken heretofore, in which our new names were written before the beginning of the world.

This is the NEW NAME WHICH NO MAN KNOWETH BUT HE THAT RECEIVETH IT. And whosoever feels himself to be for ever united with God, he possesses his name according to the measure of his virtues, and of his introversion, and of his union. And, that every one may obtain his name and possess it in eternity, the Lamb of God, that is, the manhood of our Lord, has delivered Itself up to death; and has opened for us the Book of Life, wherein are written all the names of the elect. And these names cannot be blotted out, for they are one with the Living Book, which is the Son of God. And that same death has broken for us the seals of the Book, so that all virtues may be fulfilled according to the eternal Providence of God. And so, in the measure in which each man can overcome himself, and can die to all things, he feels the touch of the Father drawing him inward; and then he tastes the sweetness of the Inborn Fruit, Which is the Son; and in this tasting the Holy Ghost teaches him that he is the heir of God.

But in these three points no one is like to another in every respect. And therefore each one has been named separately, and his name is continually made new through new graces and new works of virtue. And therefore every knee shall bow before the Name of Jesus, for He has fought for our sake, and has conquered.

And He has enlightened our darkness, and has fulfilled all the virtues in the highest degree. And so His name is lifted up above all other names, for He is the King and the Prince over all the elect. And in His name we are called and chosen, and adorned with grace and with virtues, and look for the glory of God.

Chapter XII - Of the Transfiguration of Christ on Mount Thabor

AND so, that the Name of Christ may be exalted and glorified in us, we should follow Him up the mountain of our bare intelligence, even as Peter, James and John followed Him on to mount Thabor. Thabor means in our tongue an increase of light.

So soon as we are like Peter in knowledge of truth, and like James in the overcoming of the world, and like John in fulness of grace possessing the virtues in righteousness; then Jesus brings us up on to the mountain of our bare intelligence to a hidden solitude, and reveals Himself to us in glory and in Divine brightness.

And, in His name, His Father in heaven opens to us the living book of His Eternal Wisdom. And the Wisdom of God enfolds our bare vision and the simplicity of our spirit in a wayless, simple fruition of all good without distinction; and here there are indeed seeing and knowing, tasting and feeling, essence and life, having and being; and all this is one in our transcendence in God. And before this transcendence we are all set, each in his own particular way; and our heavenly Father, of His wisdom and goodness, endows each one in particular according to the nobility of his life and his practice. And therefore, if we ever remained with Jesus on mount Thabor, that is, upon the mountain of our bare thought, we should continually experience a growth of new light and new truth; for we should ever hear the voice of the Father, Who touches us, pouring forth with grace, and drawing us inward into the unity.

The voice of the Father is heard by all who follow our Lord Jesus Christ, for He says of them all: "These are My chosen sons, in whom I am well pleased." And, through this good pleasure, each one receives grace, according to the measure and the way in which God is well-pleasing unto him. And therefrom, between our pleasure in God, and God's pleasure in us, there arises the practice of true love. And so each one tastes of his name and his office and the fruit of his exercise. And here all good men abide, hidden from those who live in the world; for these are dead before God and have no name, and therefore they can neither feel nor taste that which belongs to those who live indeed.

The outpouring touch of God quickens us with life in the spirit, and fulfills us with grace, and enlightens our reason, and teaches us to know truth and to discern the virtues, and keeps us stable in the Presence of God, with such a great strength that we are able to endure all the tasting, all the feeling, and all the outpouring gifts of God without our spirits failing us. But the indrawing-touch of God demands of us, that we should be one with God, and go forth from ourselves, and die into blessedness, that is, into the Eternal Love Which embraces the Father and the Son in one fruition. And therefore when we have climbed with Jesus on to the mountain of our bare thought; and if, then, we follow Him with a single and simple gaze, with inward pleasure, and with fruitive inclination, we feel the fierce heat of the Holy Ghost, burning and melting us into the Unity of God.

For when we are one with the Son, and lovingly return towards our Beginning, then we hear the voice of the Father, touching us and drawing us inward; for He says to all His chosen in His Eternal Word: THIS IS MY BELOVED SON, IN WHOM I AM WELL PLEASED. For you should know that the Father with the Son, and the Son with the Father, have conceived an eternal satisfaction in regard to this: that the Son should take upon Himself our manhood, and die, and bring back all the chosen to their Beginning.

And so soon as we are uplifted through the Son into our Origin, we hear the voice of the Father, which draws us inward, and enlightens us with eternal truth. And truth shows to us the wide-opened good-pleasure of God, in which all good-pleasure begins and ends. There all our powers fail us, and we fall from ourselves into our wide-opened contemplation, and become all One and one All, in the loving embrace of the Threefold

Unity. Whenever we feel this union, we are one being and one life and one blessedness with God. And there all things are fulfilled and all things are made new; for when we are baptized into the wide embrace of the Love of God, the joy of each one of us becomes so great and so special that he can neither think of nor care for the joy of anyone else; for then each one is himself a Fruition of Love, and he cannot and dare not seek for anything beyond his own.

Chapter XIII - How We Ought to Have Fruition of God

IF a man would have fruition of God, three things are needful thereto; these are, true peace, inward silence, and loving adherence.

Whosoever would find true peace between himself and God must love God in such a way that he can, with a free heart, renounce for the glory of God everything which he does or loves inordinately, or which he possesses, or can possess, contrary to the glory of God. This is the first thing which is needful to all men.

The second thing is an inward silence; that is, that a man should be empty and free from images of all things which he ever saw or of which he ever heard.

The third thing is a loving adherence to God, and this adherence is itself fruition; for whosoever cleaves to God out of pure love, and not for his own profit, he enjoys God in truth, and feels that he loves God and that God loves him.

There are still three other points, which are higher still, and which establish a man and make him able to enjoy and to feel God continually, if it be His good will to have it so.

The first of these points is to rest in Him Whom one enjoys; that is, where love is overcome by the lover, and love is taken possession of by the lover, in bare Essential Love. There love has fallen in love with the lover, and each is all to the other, in possession and in rest.

From this there follows the second: and this is called a falling asleep in God; that is, when the spirit immerses itself, and knows not how, nor where, nor in what it is.

And therefrom follows the last point that can be put into words, that is, when the spirit beholds a Darkness into which it cannot enter with the reason. And there it feels itself dead and lost to itself, and one with God without difference and without distinction. And when it feels itself one with God, then God Himself is its peace and its enjoyment and its rest. And this is an unfathomable abyss wherein man must die to himself in blessedness, and must live again in virtues, whenever love and its stirring demand it.

Lo! if you feel these six points within you, then you feel all that I have, or could have, said before. And introversion is as easy to you, and contemplation and fruition are as ready to you, as your life according to nature.

And from these riches there comes that common life of which I promised to speak to you at the beginning.

Chapter XIV - Of That Common Life Which Comes From the Contemplation and Fruition of God

THE man who is sent down by God from these heights into the world is full of truth and rich in all virtues. And he seeks not his own but the glory of Him Who has sent him. And hence he is just and truthful in all things, and he possesses a rich and a generous ground, which is set in the richness of God: and therefore he must always spend himself on those who have need of him; for the living fount of the Holy Ghost, which is his wealth, can never be spent. And he is a living and willing instrument of God, with which God works whatsoever He wills and howsoever He wills; and these works he reckons not as his own, but gives all the glory to God.

And so he remains ready and willing to do in the virtues all that God commands, and strong and courageous in suffering and enduring all that God allows to befall him. And by this he possesses a universal life, for he is ready alike for contemplation and for action, and is perfect in both of them. And none can have this universal life save the God-seeing man; and none can contemplate and enjoy God save he who has within himself the six points, ordered as I have described heretofore. And therefore, all those are deceived who fancy themselves to be contemplative, and yet inordinately love, practice, or possess, some creaturely thing; or who fancy that they enjoy God before they are empty of images, or that they rest before they enjoy. All such are deceived; for we must make ourselves fit for God with an open heart, with a peaceful conscience, with naked contemplation, without hypocrisy, in sincerity and truth.

And then we shall mount up from virtue unto virtue, and shall see God, and shall enjoy Him, and in Him shall become one with Him, in the way which I have shown to you. That this be done in all of us, so help us God. AMEN.

Chapter 14

The age of every man shall be acknowledged before him in Heaven, and every man shall be rewarded for his willing service and for his time.

After this our good Lord said: I thank thee for thy travail, and especially for thy youth.

And in this Shewing mine understanding was lifted up into Heaven where I saw our Lord as a lord in his own house, which hath called all his dear worthy servants and friends to a stately feast. Then I saw the Lord take no place in His own house, but I saw Him royally reign in His house, fulfilling it with joy and mirth, Himself endlessly to gladden and to solace His dear worthy friends, full homely and full courteously, with marvellous melody of endless love, in His own fair blessed Countenance. Which glorious Countenance of the Godhead fulfilleth the Heavens with joy and bliss.

God shewed three degrees of bliss that every soul shall have in Heaven that willingly hath served God in any degree in earth. The first is the worshipful thanks of our Lord God that he shall receive when he is delivered of pain. This thanking is so high and so worshipful that the soul thinketh it filleth him though there were no more. For me thought that all the pain and travail that might be suffered by all living men might not deserve the worshipful thanks that one man shall have that willingly hath served God. The second is that all the blessed creatures that are in Heaven shall see that worshipful thanking, and He maketh his service known to all that are in Heaven. And here this example was shewed.—A king, if he thank his servants, it is a great worship to them, and if he maketh it known to all the realm, then is the worship greatly increased.—The third is, that as new and as gladdening as it is received in that time, right so shall it last without end.

And I saw that homely and sweetly was this shewed, and that the age of every man shall be made known in Heaven, and he shall be rewarded for his willing service and for his time. And specially the age of them that willingly and freely offer their youth unto God, passingly is rewarded and wonderfully is thanked.

For I saw that whene'er what time a man or woman is truly turned to God,—for one day's service and for his endless will he shall have all these three decrees of bliss. And the more the loving soul seeth this courtesy of God, the likelier is to serve him all the days of his life.

Chapter 20

“For every man's sin that shall be saved He suffered, and every man's sorrow and desolation He saw, and sorrowed for Kinship and Love”

AND thus I saw our Lord Jesus languoring long time. For the oneing with the Godhead gave strength to the manhood for love to suffer more than all men might suffer: I mean not only more pain than all men might suffer, but also that He suffered more pain than all men of salvation that ever were from the first beginning unto the last day might tell or fully think, having regard to the worthiness of the highest worshipful King and the shameful, despised, painful death. For He that is highest and worthiest was most fully made-nought and most utterly despised.

For the highest point that may be seen in the Passion is to think and know what He is that suffered. And in this [Shewing] He brought in part to mind the height and nobleness of the glorious Godhead, and therewith the preciousness and the tenderness of the blessed Body, which be together united; and also the lothness that is in our Kind to suffer pain. For as much as He was most tender and pure, right so He was most strong and mighty to suffer.

And for every man's sin that shall be saved He suffered: and every man's sorrow and desolation He saw, and sorrowed for Kindness and love. (For in as much as our Lady sorrowed for His pains, in so much He suffered sorrow for her sorrow;—and more, in as greatly as the sweet manhood of Him was worthier in Kind.) For as long as He was passible He suffered for us and sorrowed for us; and now He is uprisen and no more passible, yet He suffereth with us.

And I, beholding all this by His grace, saw that the Love of Him was so strong which He hath to our soul that willingly He chose it with great desire, and mildly He suffered it with well-pleasing.

For the soul that beholdeth it thus, when it is touched by grace, it shall verily see that the pains of Christ's Passion pass all pains: [all pains] that is to say, which shall be turned into everlasting, o'erpassing joys by the virtue of Christ's Passion.

Chapter 21

“We be now with Him in His Pains and His Passion, dying. We shall be with Him in Heaven. Through learning in this little pain that we suffer here, we shall have an high endless knowledge of God which we could never have without that”

IT is God's will, as to mine understanding, that we have Three Manners of Beholding His blessed Passion. The First is: the hard Pain that He suffered,—[beholding it] with contrition and compassion. And that shewed our Lord in this time, and gave me strength and grace to see it.

And I looked for the departing with all my might, and thought to have seen the body all dead; but I saw Him not so. And right in the same time that methought, by the seeming, the life might no longer last and the Shewing of the end behoved needs to be,—suddenly (I beholding in the same Cross), He changed [the look of] His blessed Countenance. His "blisful chere," or blessed Cheer; lxxii. and Note. The changing of His blessed Countenance changed mine, and I was as glad and merry as it was possible. Then brought our Lord merrily to my mind: Where is now any point of the pain, or of thy grief? And I was full merry.

I understood that we be now, in our Lord's meaning, in His Cross with Him in His pains and His Passion, dying; and we, willingly abiding in the same Cross with His help and His grace unto the last point, suddenly He shall change His Cheer to us, and we shall be with Him in Heaven. Betwixt that one and that other shall be no time, and then shall all be brought to joy. And thus said He in this Shewing: Where is now any point of thy pain, or thy grief? And we shall be full blessed.

And here saw I verily that if He shewed now [to] us His Blissful Cheer, there is no pain in earth or in other place that should aggrieve us; but all things should be to us joy and bliss. But because He sheweth to us time of His Passion, as He bare it in this life, and His Cross, therefore we are in distress and travail, with Him, as our frailty asketh. And the cause why He suffereth [it to be so,] is for [that] He will of His goodness make us the higher with Him in His bliss; and for this little pain that we suffer here, we shall have an high endless knowing in God which we could never have without that. And the harder our pains have been with Him in His Cross, the more shall our worship; i.e. glory. be with Him in His Kingdom.

Chapter 22

"The Love that made Him to suffer passeth so far all His Pains as Heaven is above Earth"

THEN said our good Lord Jesus Christ: Art thou well pleased that I suffered for thee? I said: Yea, good Lord, I thank Thee; Yea, good Lord, blessed mayst Thou be. Then said Jesus, our kind Lord: If thou art pleased, I am pleased: it is a joy, a bliss, an endless satisfying to me that ever suffered I Passion for thee; and if I might suffer more, I would suffer more.

In this feeling my understanding was lifted up into Heaven, and there I saw three heavens: of which sight I marvelled greatly. And though I see three heavens—and all in the blessed manhood of Christ—none is more, none is less, none is higher, none is lower, but [they are] even-like in bliss.

For the First Heaven, Christ shewed me His Father; in no bodily likeness, but in His property and in His working. That is to say, I saw in Christ that the Father is. The working of the Father is this, that He giveth meed to His Son Jesus Christ. This gift and this meed is so blissful to Jesus that His Father might have given Him no meed that might have pleased Him better. The first heaven, that is the pleasing of the Father, shewed to me as one heaven; and it was full blissful: for He is full pleased with all the deeds that Jesus hath done about our salvation. Wherefore we be not only His by His buying, but also by the courteous gift of His Father we be His bliss, we be His meed, we be His worship, we be His crown. (And this was a singular marvel and a full delectable beholding, that we be His crown!) This that I say is so great bliss to Jesus that He setteth at nought all His travail, and His hard Passion, and His cruel and shameful death.

And in these words: If that I might suffer more, I would suffer more,—I saw in truth that as often as He might die, so often He would, and love should never let Him have rest till He had done it. And I beheld with great diligence for to learn how often He would die if He might. And verily the number passed mine understanding and my wits so far that my reason might not, nor could, comprehend it. And when He had thus oft died, or should, yet He would set it at nought, for love: for all seemeth for al thynketh him but litil in reward of His love" [in comparison with]. Him but little in regard of His love.

For though the sweet manhood of Christ might suffer but once, the goodness in Him may never cease of proffer: every day He is ready to the same, if it might be. For if He said He would for my love make new Heavens and new Earth, it were but little in comparison (MS. "Reward.") for this might be done every day if He would, without any travail. But to die for my love so often that the number passeth creature's reason, it is the highest proffer that our Lord God might make to man's soul, as to my sight. Then meaneth He thus: How should it not be that I should not do for thy love all that I might of deeds which grieve me not, sith I would, for thy love, die so often, having no regard (MS. "Reward.") to my hard pains?

And here saw I, for the Second. Beholding in this blessed Passion the love that made Him to suffer passeth as far all His pains as Heaven is above Earth. For the pains was a noble, worshipful deed done in a time by the working of love: but (MS. "and," probably here, as in other places, with something of the force of "but.") Love was without beginning, is, and shall be without ending. For which love He said full sweetly these words: If I might suffer more, I would suffer more. He said not, If it were needful to suffer more: for though it were not needful, if He might suffer more, He would.

This deed, and this work about our salvation, was ordained as well as God might ordain it. And here I saw a Full Bliss in Christ: for His bliss should not have been full, if it might any better have been done.

Chapter 23

“The Glad Giver”

“All the Trinity wrought in the Passion of Jesus Christ”

AND in these three words: It is a Joy, a bliss, an endless satisfying to me, were shewed three heavens, as thus: For the joy, I understood the pleasure of the Father; and for the bliss, the worship of the Son; and for the endless satisfying ("lykyng"; "lykith.") the Holy Ghost. The Father is pleased, the Son is worshipped, the Holy Ghost is satisfied ("lykyng"; "lykith.")

And here saw I, for the Third Beholding in His blissful Passion: that is to say, the Joy and the Bliss that make Him to be well-satisfied in it. For our Courteous Lord shewed His Passion to me in five manners: of which the first is the bleeding of the head; the second is, discolouring of His face; the third is, the plenteous bleeding of the body, in seeming [as] from the scourging; the fourth is, the deep dying:—these four are aforetold for the pains of the Passion. And the fifth is [this] that was shewed for the joy and the bliss of the Passion.

For it is God's will that we have true enjoying with Him in our salvation, and therein He willeth [that] we be mightily comforted and strengthened; and thus willeth He that merrily with His grace our soul be occupied. For we are His bliss: for in us He enjoyeth without end; and so shall we in Him, with His grace.

And all that He hath done for us, and doeth, and ever shall, was never cost nor charge to Him, nor might be, but only that [which] He did in our manhood, beginning at the sweet Incarnation and lasting to the Blessed Uprise on Easter-morrow ("Esterne morrow" = Easter morning) so long dured the cost and the charge about our redemption in deed: of [the] which deed He enjoyeth endlessly, as it is aforesaid.

Jesus willeth that we take heed to the bliss that is in the blessed Trinity [because] of our salvation and that we desire to have as much spiritual enjoying, with His grace, (as it is aforesaid): that is to say, that the enjoying of our salvation be [as] like to the joy that Christ hath of our salvation as it may be while we are here.

All the Trinity wrought in the Passion of Christ, ministering abundance of virtues and plenty of grace to us by Him: but only the Maiden's Son suffered: whereof all the blessed Trinity endlessly enjoyeth. All this was shewed in these words: Art thou well pleased?—and by that other word that Christ said: If thou art pleased, then am I pleased;—as if He said: It is joy and satisfying enough to me, and I ask nought else of thee for my travail but that I might well please thee.

And in this He brought to mind the property of a glad giver. A glad giver taketh but little heed of the thing that he giveth, but all his desire and all his intent is to please him and solace him to whom he giveth it. And if the receiver take the gift highly and thankfully, then the courteous giver setteth at nought all his cost and all his travail, for joy and delight that he hath pleased and solaced him that he loveth. Plenteously and fully was this shewed.

Think also wisely of the greatness of this word "ever." For in it was shewed an high knowing of Experience of loving (?) that He hath in our salvation, with manifold joys that follow of the Passion of Christ. One is that He rejoiceth that He hath done it in deed, and He shall no more suffer; another, that He bought us from endless pains of hell.

Divine Comedy: Paradise

(Summary of medieval Christian view of Heavenly Hierarchy)

After an initial ascension (Canto I), Beatrice guides Dante through the nine spheres of Heaven. These are concentric and spherical, similar to Aristotelian and Ptolemaic cosmology. The addition of a moral dimension means that a soul that has reached Paradise stops at the level applicable to it. Souls are allotted to the point of heaven that fits with their human ability to love God. Thus, there is a heavenly hierarchy. All parts of heaven are accessible to the heavenly soul. That is to say all experience God but there is a hierarchy in the sense that some souls are more spiritually developed than others. This is not determined by time or learning as such but by their proximity to God (how much they allow themselves to experience Him above other things). It must be remembered in Dante's schema that all souls in Heaven are on some level always in contact with God.

While there are different degrees of reward in heaven (the light shining more in some places, in other places less) the light of God still shines abundantly for all. This emphasis on light probably reflects the influence of the writings which go under the name of St. Dionysios the Areopagite, who was a Christian theologian of late antiquity quite influenced by Neo-Platonism.

Dante sees divisions of heaven; just as there are three parts to Hell and Purgatory, so there are three parts of Heaven. Dante also sees the nine orders of angels who are grouped in three groups of threes -- Seraphim, Cherubim Thrones -- Dominions, Virtues and Powers -- Principalities, Archangels and Angels. This classification of angels again owes much to Christian neo-Platonism and St. Dionysios the Areopagite.

Des Peines De L'enfer Et De La Gloire Céleste

Les peines éternelles de l'enfer, châtement des réprouvés, et la gloire du ciel, récompense des élus, suivront immédiatement le jugement général. De même qu'en ce monde il y a diversité de crimes, ainsi en enfer il y aura diversité de supplices. L'homme ici-bas par le péché mortel se détourne de son Créateur pour s'attacher à la créature, préférant ainsi à un bien immuable et éternel un bien fragile et éphémère, et, en s'abandonnant au désordre de sa volonté, il agit contre le sentiment naturel de la droite raison; c'est pourquoi dans l'enfer les supplices seront différents. Ainsi, parce que le pécheur se sera éloigné volontairement de Dieu, il sera privé à jamais de sa vue béatifique; parce qu'il se sera attaché aux créatures, il souffrira la peine du feu matériel qui le brûlera sans le consumer; enfin parce qu'il aura suivi le dérèglement de sa volonté et de sa raison, il subira un châtement général, universel, qui consiste dans les diverses afflictions dont il sera cruellement et perpétuellement accablé. Les damnés dans l'enfer souffriront tous les excès de la chaleur et du froid; environnés de toute part de ténèbres et de fumée, de soufre et de feu, ils auront sans cesse devant les yeux les affreux démons, instruments de leur supplice; au milieu des dragons et des serpents, ils entendront les gémissements, les plaintes, les cris horribles de leurs compagnons d'infortune; tourmentés intérieurement par le ver rongeur de leurs propres consciences, ils seront couverts de honte et de confusion à la vue de leurs péchés dévoilés à tous les yeux; ils seront en proie à la faim, à la soif, à toutes les privations, à l'envie, à la haine, à la tristesse, à la fureur contre eux-mêmes et contre les autres, et tout cela sans aucun espoir de consolation ni de salut. La vie elle-même qui fait l'objet des désirs de toutes les créatures, leur sera à charge, ils désireront, ils chercheront la mort sans jamais pouvoir l'obtenir. N'est-il pas conforme à la justice du souverain Juge, dit saint Grégoire (lib. IV, Dialog., cap. XLIV) que les damnés dans l'enfer soient soumis à des tourments, à des supplices sans fin, eux qui pendant cette vie mortelle n'ont jamais voulu mettre fin à leurs péchés? Et plus loin le même saint ajoute: Les pécheurs auraient voulu vivre éternellement en ce monde afin de pouvoir pécher éternellement; n'est-il pas juste que Dieu qui voit leur volonté les punisse aussi par des châtements éternels? Les pécheurs, dit saint Augustin (lib. XXI, de Civit. Dei, cap. xii), sont à juste titre dignes de supplices éternels, puisque par leurs péchés ils ont fait mourir en eux le bien par lequel ils eussent pu vivre perpétuellement avec Dieu.

Les damnés dans l'enfer se verront les uns les autres, et cette vue, loin d'être pour eux un sujet de consolation, augmentera au contraire leurs tourments. Le feu de l'enfer, dit saint Grégoire (lib. IX, Moral., cap. XLVIII), éclairera les damnés non pour les consoler, mais bien plutôt pour accroître leur supplice; ils verront associés à leurs propres châtements ceux dont ils auront, en ce monde, préféré l'amour infâme à l'amour de leur Créateur, et cette vue, loin d'adoucir leurs souffrances, les rendra plus violentes encore. Et saint Jérôme ajoute: Les douleurs qu'éprouveront les damnés dans l'enfer seront si horribles, qu'ils ne pourront penser à rien autre chose sinon à leurs propres malheurs. Si un damné dans l'enfer versait seulement chaque jour la moindre larme, ces larmes quotidiennes dans la suite des temps finiraient par remplir tous les vases qui sont dans cet univers, que dis-je, elles rempliraient tous les fleuves, toutes les mers de ce monde avant que ses supplices fussent terminés. O terrible et cruelle éternité de souffrances! Pensons-y sérieusement et pendant que nous en avons encore le loisir et le pouvoir, efforçons-nous de prévenir de si grands malheurs; pleurons, gémissons sur nos péchés passés afin d'en obtenir de Dieu le pardon. Ah! si le moindre de tous ces instants que nous perdons en cette vie si facilement et avec tant d'indifférence était donné à un damné, comme il en profiterait pour faire pénitence et pour obtenir sa grâce! Mais, hélas! par un juste jugement de Dieu, cet espoir même d'obtenir le moindre moment lui est enlevé. Voulez-vous vous faire une faible idée de l'éternité des peines de l'enfer? Supposez même des choses impossibles; supposez, par exemple, une meule de moulin assez grande pour occuper toute la circonférence des deux; supposez encore qu'un petit oiseau vienne tous les cent mille ans enlever de cette pierre une parcelle grosse comme la dixième partie d'un grain de millet et qu'au bout d'un million d'années il en ait par conséquent enlevé la grosseur d'un grain entier, eh bien! les damnés seraient consolés s'ils pouvaient espérer d'être délivrés de leurs maux quand cette meule serait entièrement détruite; mais, hélas! cette espérance même leur est refusée.

Parmi les supplices des damnés dans l'enfer, le plus grand de tous est la privation de la vue de Dieu. Quelques ignorants, nous dit saint Chrysostôme (Uomil. 47, ndpopul. Antiocli., tom. y), s'imaginent que le vœu le plus ardent des damnés dans l'enfer, c'est d'être délivrés de la peine du feu qui les dévore sans cesse; pour moi, je crois qu'il y a pour eux un supplice bien plus affreux, bien plus terrible encore, c'est celui d'être à jamais privés de Dieu et de la gloire éternelle. Oui, la pensée d'être à toujours exclus de la société des saints et du bonheur qui leur était réservé dans le ciel, produit dans le cœur des damnés un si grand regret, une si grande douleur, que même, seraient-ils exempts de toutes les peines, de toutes les souffrances extérieures, ce supplice seul suffirait pour les rendre éternellement malheureux; c'est le plus cruel qu'on puisse jamais imaginer. En ce monde, dit saint Augustin (litl. XXII, de Civit. Dei), et même dans les enfers, il n'est ni supplice ni tourment, quelque cruels qu'ils puissent être, qui soient comparables à la peine, à la douleur qu'éprouveront les damnés, lorsqu'au grand jour du jugement, ils seront à jamais bannis du royaume céleste, de la vue de Dieu de la gloire éternelle et de la société des élus. Mais, me direzvous peut-être, si la privation de la vue de Dieu est le plus grand de tous les supplices de l'enfer, il s'ensuit que les enfants morts sans baptême sont condamnés au plus cruel de tous les tourments, ce qui est contraire au sentiment de saint Augustin qui nous dit que la peine de ces enfants est très-douce. A cela je vous répondrai que cette privation de la vue de Dieu doit être considérée sous deux rapports différents: si elle est la punition de fautes personnelles et volontaires, elle est alors la plus terrible de toutes les peines; si au contraire elle est le châtement d'une faute involontaire et sans aucun démérite, elle devient une peine légère, et c'est celle des petits enfants morts avant le baptême. Malheur à nous si nous oublions ces châtements terribles réservés aux pécheurs dans les enfers, et si, indifférents à notre salut, nous nous exposons de gaité de cœur à y être un jour condamnés!

Parlons maintenant des joies du ciel; elles sont si nombreuses que nul calculateur ne pourrait les compter; si étendues que nul géomètre ne pourrait les mesurer; si incompréhensibles que nul rhéteur ne saurait les expliquer par ses discours. En effet, l'œil n'a jamais vu, l'oreille n'a jamais entendu, le cœur de l'homme n'a jamais compris ce que Dieu a préparé pour ceux qui l'aiment. Les saints dans le ciel seront comblés de joie par la vision béatifique de Dieu, par la beauté extérieure des cieus et de toutes les créatures corporelles, et par la glorieuse réunion des anges et des élus. Chacun se réjouira du bonheur d'autrui comme de son bonheur propre. Tous se connaîtront, tous liront dans la pensée les uns des autres. Nulle pensée, dit saint Grégoire (lib. IX, Dialog.), nul sentiment ne sera caché pour les élus; ils se verront tous tels qu'ils sont, et leur joie en sera plus grande; ils verront également les supplices des damnés, et cette vue augmentera leur reconnaissance envers Dieu qui les a préservés d'un tel malheur. Dans le ciel, nous verrons Dieu en lui-même, nous le verrons en nous et nous nous verrons en lui. Dieu sera tout en tous, c'est-à-dire, selon saint Augustin, qu'il sera tout à la fois, selon le désir des créatures, la vie, le salut, l'honneur, la gloire, la paix et tous les autres biens. La beauté de Dieu, dit saint Grégoire, est si merveilleuse et si désirable que les anges eux-mêmes qui sont sept fois plus beaux, plus éclatants que la lumière du soleil, désirent la contempler sans cesse et ne peuvent jamais en être rassasiés. Là, les sens intérieurs de l'homme, dit encore saint Augustin (lib. XX, de Civit. Dei, cap. xxx), seront rassasiés par la contemplation de l'humanité sainte du Sauveur, car Dieu ne s'est fait homme que pour béatifier tout à la fois l'âme et le corps de sa créature. La béatitude céleste, ajoute le même saint (Lib. de Vita beata), consiste surtout en deux choses: dans l'abondance de tous les biens et dans l'absence de tous les maux. Enfin, pour tout dire en deux mots, selon la pensée de saint Augustin (lib. XXII, de Civit. Dei) et de saint Grégoire (lib. XVIII, Moral, cap. xix), le ciel renferme tant de bonheur, tant de douces satisfactions, tant de gloire et tant de joies, que, ne dût-on y demeurer qu'un seul jour, pour ce seul jour on devrait sacrifier tous les biens, tous les trésors, tous les plaisirs et toutes les délices de la terre. C'est ce qui faisait dire au Psalmiste: Un seul jour dans vos tabernacles, ô mon Dieu, vaut mieux que mille ans passés sous la tente des pécheurs!

Le bonheur de la vie éternelle consiste surtout dans les qualités dont l'âme et le corps des justes seront revêtus. Les qualités de l'âme sont au nombre de trois: la claire connaissance de la souveraine Trinité qui succédera à la foi, l'entière jouissance de la Divinité qui remplacera l'espérance, enfin l'amour parfait de Dieu, qui ne sera pas détruit comme l'espérance et la foi, mais qui sera consommé dans l'Être divin. Les qualités du corps sont: la clarté, l'impassibilité, la subtilité et l'agilité. Les qualités de l'âme constituent la récompense essentielle des justes, celles du corps ne sont qu'une récompense accidentelle. La première qualité de l'âme est la connaissance ou l'intuition par laquelle les élus verront toute l'essence divine, mais non dans toute son étendue, puisqu'elle est infinie. Us la verront les uns plus, les autres moins, selon le degré de perfection qu'ils auront acquis en ce monde, et cette différence ne viendra que du côté des élus eux-mêmes et non du côté de Dieu, qui, essentiellement simple, n'admet aucune diversité. La seconde qualité de l'âme est l'amour; or, entre l'amour vertu et l'amour qualité il y a une grande différence; la vertu est ce qui nous fait passer de l'état de grâce à l'état de gloire; mais la qualité ou douaire (dos) est ce qui est donné à l'épouse sur tout le mérite qu'elle a pu acquérir en ce monde quand elle est conduite en la maison de son céleste Époux. Dans le ciel, la foi et l'espérance que nous avons en cette vie seront détruites, car alors tout ce qui est imparfait sera anéanti, mais la charité subsistera toujours et sera augmentée et perfectionnée, selon la pensée de saint Augustin lui-même (Serm. 53, de Tempore). La troisième qualité de l'âme est la compréhension ou la possession de l'objet qu'elle voit et qu'elle aime, parce qu'alors l'âme embrassant pour ainsi dire la Divinité, s'y attache comme à son propre bien; d'autres appellent cette troisième qualité de l'âme la jouissance. Ainsi, les principales perfections, les plus grands avantages des élus dans le ciel sont: la claire vision de Dieu, son amour parfait et sa possession, assurée, sans jamais craindre de le perdre.

Parmi les quatre qualités des corps dans le ciel, la première sera la clarté, laquelle doit s'entendre de deux manières. Ainsi l'on dit qu'un objet est clair quand il est transparent, diaphane, comme le verre à travers lequel on aperçoit les autres corps; l'on dit aussi qu'un objet est clair quand il est lucide, lumineux, comme les étoiles qui brillent au firmament. Les corps glorifiés réuniront ces deux clartés différentes; ils seront tout à la fois diaphanes et lumineux; ils brilleront d'une lumière sept fois plus éclatante que le soleil, et l'âme, revêtue comme d'un vêtement de son corps lumineux, brillera sept fois plus que lui. Les corps des saints ne brilleront pas tous de la même clarté, et seront plus ou moins lumineux selon le degré de perfection que les âmes auront atteint en cette vie. La seconde qualité du corps sera l'impassibilité; or, cette impassibilité procédera de la forme même de l'âme qui, par sa puissance, dominera tellement le corps que nul objet extérieur ne saura ni l'altérer ni lui nuire, en sorte que si un corps glorifié était placé en enfer il n'en ressentirait aucun mal, aucune douleur. La troisième qualité sera la subtilité qui résulte de la victoire parfaite de la forme sur la matière, laquelle enlève au corps la substance grossière produite par les divers éléments dont il était composé. Enfin la quatrième qualité des corps dans le ciel sera l'agilité, laquelle sera si grande, selon saint Augustin (lib. XXII, de Civit. Dei, cap. xxx), que là où l'âme voudra être, le corps y sera immédiatement. Toutefois, de même que les corps seront plus ou moins brillants et lumineux, selon que les âmes auront été plus ou moins parfaites en cette vie, ils seront également plus ou moins agiles selon le degré de perfection acquise. Pourtant, selon le même saint Augustin (ibidem), la volonté des saints sera toujours conforme à la droite raison, et ils ne désireront jamais rien qui ne puisse être digne d'eux.

Dans l'enfer, comme nous l'avons déjà dit, il y aura différents degrés de supplices, de même dans le ciel il y aura divers degrés de gloire. Quoique dans le royaume des cieux, dit saint Chrysostôme à ce sujet, il y ait plusieurs degrés de gloire, selon la différence des mérites, et que dans l'enfer il y ait divers degrés de châtiments proportionnés à la grandeur et au nombre des crimes commis; cependant tous les damnés seront enveloppés dans la même peine éternelle, et tous les élus qui ont travaillé à la vigne du Père de famille recevront pour salaire le même denier, c'est-à-dire la vie éternelle, Dieu lui-même, dont tous jouiront, mais d'une manière inégale. Les corps des élus dans le ciel différeront entre eux par la clarté dont ils seront revêtus, et les âmes différeront aussi entre elles par la gloire et la béatitude dont elles jouiront diversement. Comme au firmament une étoile diffère d'une autre étoile en clarté, de même dans le royaume des cieux, un juste sera différent d'un autre juste par la gloire de son âme et de son corps. Les uns contempleront la Majesté divine de plus près et plus clairement que les autres, et c'est cette différence que nous appelons degrés. Il n'y a qu'un paradis, mais il y a plusieurs demeures ou degrés, c'est-à-dire différence de gloire dans la béatitude, qui elle-même est une, est le souverain bien et la vie de tous. Nul doute, dit saint Augustin (Kb. XXII, de Civit. Dei, cap. xxx), que ceux qui entreront dans le ciel auront divers degrés d'honneur et de gloire, selon les divers degrés de mérite qu'ils auront acquis en ce monde, car les uns verront plus clairement que les autres la Majesté de l'Éternel, selon la pureté de cœur qu'ils auront eue en cette vie. Cependant chacun sera content de ce qu'il aura reçu sans porter envie à celui qui sera élevé plus haut, de même que dans le corps humain, le doigt n'envie pas la place que l'œil occupe.

Question 93. The Happiness Of The Saints And Their Mansions

1. Will the happiness of the saints increase after the judgment?
2. Should the degrees of happiness be called mansions?
3. Do the various mansions differ according to various degrees of charity?

Article 1. Whether The Happiness Of The Saints Will Be Greater After The Judgment Than Before?

Objection 1. It would seem that the happiness of the saints will not be greater after the judgment than before. For the nearer a thing approaches to the Divine likeness, the more perfectly does it participate happiness. Now the soul is more like God when separated from the body than when united to it. Therefore its happiness is greater before being reunited to the body than after.

Objection 2. Further, power is more effective when it is united than when divided. Now the soul is more united when separated from the body than when it is joined to the body. Therefore it has then greater power for operation, and consequently has a more perfect share of happiness, since this consists in action [Cf. I-II, 3, 2].

Objection 3. Further, beatitude consists in an act of the speculative intellect. Now the intellect, in its act, makes no use of a bodily organ; and consequently by being reunited to the body the soul does not become capable of more perfect understanding. Therefore the soul's happiness is not greater after than before the judgment.

Objection 4. Further, nothing can be greater than the infinite, and so the addition of the finite to the infinite does not result in something greater than the infinite by itself. Now the beatified soul before its reunion with the body is rendered happy by rejoicing in the infinite good, namely God; and after the resurrection of the body it will rejoice in nothing else except perhaps the glory of the body, and this is a finite good. Therefore their joy after the resumption of the body will not be greater than before.

On the contrary, A gloss on Apocalypse 6:9, "I saw under the altar the souls of them that were slain," says: "At present the souls of the saints are under the altar, i.e. less exalted than they will be." Therefore their happiness will be greater after the resurrection than after their death.

Further, just as happiness is bestowed on the good as a reward, so is unhappiness awarded to the wicked. But the unhappiness of the wicked after reunion with their bodies will be greater than before, since they will be punished not only in the soul but also in the body. Therefore the happiness of the saints will be greater after the resurrection of the body than before.

I answer that, It is manifest that the happiness of the saints will increase in extent after the resurrection, because their happiness will then be not only in the soul but also in the body. Moreover, the soul's happiness also will increase in extent, seeing that the soul will rejoice not only in its own good, but also in that of the body. We may also say that the soul's happiness will increase in intensity [Cf. I-II, 4, 5, ad 5, where St. Thomas retracts this statement]. For man's body may be considered in two ways: first, as being dependent on the soul for its completion; secondly, as containing something that hampers the soul in its operations, through the soul not perfectly completing the body. As regards the first way of considering the body, its union with the soul adds a certain perfection to the soul, since every part is imperfect, and is completed in its whole; wherefore the whole is to the part as form to matter. Consequently the soul is more perfect in its natural being, when it is in the whole--namely, man who results from the union of soul and body--than when it is a separate part. But as regards the second consideration the union of the body hampers the perfection of the soul, wherefore it is written (Wisdom 9:15) that "the corruptible body is a load upon the soul." If, then, there be removed from the body all those things wherein it hampers the soul's action, the soul will be simply more perfect while existing in such a body than when separated therefrom. Now the more perfect a thing is in being, the more perfectly is it able to operate: wherefore the operation of the soul united to such a body will be more perfect than the operation of the separated soul. But the glorified body will be a body of this description, being altogether subject to the spirit. Therefore, since beatitude consists in an operation [Cf. I-II, 3, 2, seqq.], the soul's happiness after its reunion with the body will be more perfect than before. For just as the soul separated from a corruptible body is able to operate more perfectly than when united thereto, so after it has been united to a glorified body, its operation will be more perfect than while it was separated. Now every imperfect thing desires its perfection. Hence the separated soul naturally desires reunion with the body and on account of this desire which proceeds from the soul's imperfection its operation whereby it is borne towards God is less intense. This agrees with the saying of Augustine (Gen. ad lit. xii, 35) that "on account of the body's desire it is held back from tending with all its might to that sovereign good."

Reply to Objection 1. The soul united to a glorified body is more like to God than when separated therefrom, in so far as when united it has more perfect being. For the more perfect a thing is the more it is like to God: even so the heart, the perfection of whose life consists in movement, is more like to God while in movement than while at rest, although God is never moved.

Reply to Objection 2. A power which by its own nature is capable of being in matter is more effective when subjected in matter than when separated from matter, although absolutely speaking a power separate from matter is more effective.

Reply to Objection 3. Although in the act of understanding the soul does not make use of the body, the perfection of the body will somewhat conduce to the perfection of the intellectual operation in so far as through being united to a glorified body, the soul will be more perfect in its nature, and consequently more effective in its operation, and accordingly the good itself of the body will conduce instrumentally, as it were, to the operation wherein happiness consists: thus the Philosopher asserts (Ethic. i, 8,10) that external goods conduce instrumentally to the happiness of life.

Reply to Objection 4. Although finite added to infinite does not make a greater thing, it makes more things, since finite and infinite are two things, while infinite taken by itself is one. Now the greater extent of joy regards not a greater thing but more things. Wherefore joy is increased in extent, through referring to God and to the body's glory, in comparison with the joy which referred to God. Moreover, the body's glory will conduce to the intensity of the joy that refers to God, in so far as it will conduce to the more perfect operation whereby the soul tends to God: since the more perfect is a becoming operation, the greater the delight [Cf. I-II, 32, 1], as stated in Ethic. x, 8.

Article 2. Whether The Degrees Of Beatitude Should Be Called Mansions?

Objection 1. It would seem that the degrees of beatitude should not be called mansions. For beatitude implies the notion of a reward: whereas mansion denotes nothing pertaining to a reward. Therefore the various degrees of beatitude should not be called mansions.

Objection 2. Further, mansion seemingly denotes a place. Now the place where the saint will be beatified is not corporeal but spiritual, namely God Who is one. Therefore there is but one mansion: and consequently the various degrees of beatitude should not be called mansions.

Objection 3. Further, as in heaven there will be men of various merits, so are there now in purgatory, and were in the limbo of the fathers. But various mansions are not distinguished in purgatory and limbo. Therefore in like manner neither should they be distinguished in heaven.

On the contrary, It is written (John 14:2): "In My Father's house there are many mansions": and Augustine expounds this in reference to the different degrees of rewards (Tract. lxxvii in Joan.).

Further, in every well-ordered city there is a distinction of mansions. Now the heavenly kingdom is compared to a city (Apocalypse 21:2). Therefore we should distinguish various mansions there according to the various degrees of beatitude.

I answer that, Since local movement precedes all other movements, terms of movement, distance and the like are derived from local movement to all other movements according to the Philosopher (Phys., liber viii, 7). Now the end of local movement is a place, and when a thing has arrived at that place it remains there at rest and is maintained therein. Hence in every movement this very rest at the end of the movement is called an establishment [collocatio] or mansion. Wherefore since the term movement is transferred to the actions of the appetite and will, the attainment of the end of an appetitive movement is called a mansion or establishment: so that the unity of a house corresponds to the unity of beatitude which unity is on the part of the object, and the plurality of mansions corresponds to the differences of beatitude on the part of the blessed: even so we observe in natural things that there is one same place above to which all light objects tend, whereas each one reaches it more closely, according as it is lighter, so that they have various mansions corresponding to their various lightness.

Reply to Objection 1. Mansion implies the notion of end and consequently of reward which is the end of merit.

Reply to Objection 2. Though there is one spiritual place, there are different degrees of approaching thereto: and the various mansions correspond to these.

Reply to Objection 3. Those who were in limbo or are now in purgatory have not yet attained to their end. Wherefore various mansions are not distinguished in purgatory or limbo, but only in heaven and hell, wherein is the end of the good and of the wicked.

Article 3. Whether The Various Mansions Are Distinguished According To The Various Degrees Of Charity?

Objection 1. It would seem that the various mansions are not distinguished according to the various degrees of charity. For it is written (Matthew 25:15): "He gave to every one according to his proper virtue [Douay: 'ability']." Now the proper ability of a thing is its natural power. Therefore the gifts also of grace and glory are distributed according to the different degrees of natural power.

Objection 2. Further, it is written (Psalm 61:12): "Thou wilt render to every man according to his works." Now that which is rendered is the measure of beatitude. Therefore the degrees of beatitude are distinguished according to the diversity of works and not according to the diversity of charity.

Objection 3. Further, reward is due to act and not to habit: hence "it is not the strongest who are crowned but those who engage in the conflict" (Ethic. i, 8) and "he . . . shall not be [Vulgate: 'is not'] crowned except he strive lawfully." Now beatitude is a reward. Therefore the various degrees of beatitude will be according to the various degrees of works and not according to the various degrees of charity.

On the contrary, The more one will be united to God the happier will one be. Now the measure of charity is the measure of one's union with God. Therefore the diversity of beatitude will be according to the difference of charity.

Further, "if one thing simply follows from another thing simply, the increase of the former follows from the increase of the latter." Now to have beatitude follows from having charity. Therefore to have greater beatitude follows from having greater charity.

I answer that, The distinctive principle of the mansions or degrees of beatitude is twofold, namely proximate and remote. The proximate principle is the difference of disposition which will be in the blessed, whence will result the difference of perfection in them in respect to the beatific operation: while the remote principle is the merit by which they have obtained that beatitude. In the first way the mansions are distinguished according to the charity of heaven, which the more perfect it will be in any one, the more will it render him capable of the Divine clarity, on the increase of which will depend the increase in perfection of the Divine vision. In the second way the mansions are distinguished according to the charity of the way. For our actions are meritorious, not by the very substance of the action, but only by the habit of virtue with which they are informed. Now every virtue obtains its meritorious efficacy from charity [Cf. I-II, 114, 4], which has the end itself for its object [Cf. II-II, 24, 3, ad 1]. Hence the diversity of merit is all traced to the diversity of charity, and thus the charity of the way will distinguish the mansions by way of merit.

Reply to Objection 1. In this passage "virtue" denotes not the natural ability alone, but the natural ability together with the endeavour to obtain grace [Cf. II-II, 23, 8]. Consequently virtue in this sense will be a kind of material disposition to the measure of grace and glory that one will receive. But charity is the formal complement of merit in relation to glory, and therefore the distinction of degrees in glory depends on the degrees of charity rather than on the degrees of the aforesaid virtue.

Reply to Objection 2. Works in themselves do not demand the payment of a reward, except as informed by charity: and therefore the various degrees of glory will be according to the various degrees of charity.

Reply to Objection 3. Although the habit of charity or of any virtue whatever is not a merit to which a reward is due, it is none the less the principle and reason of merit in the act: and consequently according to its diversity is the diversity of rewards. This does not prevent our observing a certain degree of merit in the act considered generically, not indeed in relation to the essential reward which is joy in God, but in relation to some accidental reward, which is joy in some created good.

Question 96: Of The Aureoles (Differing Circles Of Light Or Radiance Surrounding The Head Or Body Of Sanctified Beings, Saints, and Angels)

Article. 1 - Whether the aureole is the same as the essential reward which is called the aurea?

Objection 1: It would seem that the aureole is not distinct from the essential reward which is called the "aurea." For the essential reward is beatitude itself. Now according to Boethius (De Consol. iii), beatitude is "a state rendered perfect by the aggregate of all goods." Therefore the essential reward includes every good possessed in heaven; so that the aureole is included in the "aurea."

Objection 2: Further, "more" and "less" do not change a species. But those who keep the counsels and commandments receive a greater reward than those who keep the commandments only, nor seemingly does their reward differ, except in one reward being greater than another. Since then the aureole denotes the reward due to works of perfection it would seem that it does not signify something distinct from the "aurea."

Objection 3: Further, reward corresponds to merit. Now charity is the root of all merit. Since then the "aurea" corresponds to charity, it would seem that there will be no reward in heaven other than the "aurea."

Objection 4: Further, "All the blessed are taken into the angelic orders" as Gregory declares (Hom. xxxiv in Evang.). Now as regards the angels, "though some of them receive certain gifts in a higher degree, nothing is possessed by any of them exclusively, for all gifts are in all of them, though not equally, because some are endowed more highly than others with gifts which, however, they all possess," as Gregory says (Hom. xxxiv in Evang.). Therefore as regards the blessed, there will be no reward other than that which is common to all. Therefore the aureole is not a distinct reward from the "aurea."

Objection 5: Further, a higher reward is due to higher merit. If, then, the "aurea" is due to works which are of obligation, and the aureole to works of counsel, the aureole will be more perfect than the "aurea," and consequently should not be expressed by a diminutive ["Aureola," i.e. a little "aurea"]. Therefore it would seem that the aureole is not a distinct reward from the "aurea."

On the contrary, A gloss [Ven. Bede, De Tabernaculis i, 6] on Ex. 25:24,25, "Thou shalt make . . . another little golden crown [coronam aureolam]," says: "This crown denotes the new hymn which the virgins alone sing in the presence of the Lamb." Wherefore apparently the aureole is a crown awarded, not to all, but especially to some: whereas the aurea is awarded to all the blessed. Therefore the aureole is distinct from the "aurea."

Further, a crown is due to the fight which is followed by victory: "He . . . is not crowned except he strive lawfully" (2 Tim. 2:5). Hence where there is a special kind of conflict, there should be a special crown. Now in certain works there is a special kind of conflict. Therefore they deserve a special kind of crown, which we call an aureole.

Further, the Church militant comes down from the Church triumphant: "I saw the Holy City," etc. (Apoc. 21:2). Now in the Church militant special rewards are given to those who perform special deeds, for instance a crown to the conqueror, a prize to the runner. Therefore the same should obtain in the Church triumphant.

I answer that, Man's essential reward, which is his beatitude, consists in the perfect union of the soul with God, inasmuch as it enjoys God perfectly as seen and loved perfectly. Now this reward is called a "crown" or "aurea" metaphorically, both with reference to merit which is gained by a kind of conflict---since "the life of man upon earth is a warfare" (Job 7:1)---and with reference to the reward whereby in a way man is made a participator of the Godhead, and consequently endowed with regal power: "Thou hast made us to our God a kingdom," etc. (Apoc. 5:10); for a crown is the proper sign of regal power.

In like manner the accidental reward which is added to the essential has the character of a crown. For a crown signifies some kind of perfection, on account of its circular shape, so that for this very reason it is becoming to the perfection of the blessed. Since, however, nothing can be added to the essential, but what is less than it, the additional reward is called an "aureole." Now something may be added in two ways to this essential reward which we call the "aurea." First, in consequence of a condition attaching to the nature of the one rewarded: thus the glory of the body is added to the beatitude of the soul, wherefore this same glory of the body is sometimes called an "aureole." Thus a gloss of Bede on Ex. 25:25, "Thou . . . shalt make another little golden crown," says that "finally the aureole is added, when it is stated in the Scriptures that a higher degree of glory is in store for us when our bodies are resumed." But it is not in this sense that we speak of an aureole now. Secondly, in consequence of the nature of the meritorious act. Now this has the character of merit on two counts, whence also it has the character of good. First, to wit, from its root which is charity, since it is referred to the last end, and thus there is due to it the essential reward, namely the attainment of the end, and this is the "aurea." Secondly, from the very genus of the act which derives a certain praiseworthiness from its due circumstances, from the habit eliciting it and from its proximate end, and thus is due to it a kind of accidental reward which we call an "aureole": and it is in this sense that we regard the aureole now. Accordingly it must be said that an "aureole" denotes something added to the "aurea," a kind of joy, to wit, in the works one has done, in that they have the character of a signal victory: for this joy is distinct from the joy in being united to God, which is called the "aurea." Some, however, affirm that the common reward, which is the "aurea," receives the name of "aureole," according as it is given to virgins, martyrs, or doctors: even as money receives the name of debt through being due to some one, though the money and the debt are altogether the same. And that nevertheless this does not imply that the essential reward is any greater when it is called an "aureole"; but that it corresponds to a more excellent act, more excellent not in intensity of merit but in the manner of meriting; so that although two persons may have the Divine vision with equal clearness, it is called an "aureole" in one and not in the other in so far as it corresponds to higher merit as regards the way of meriting. But this would seem contrary to the meaning of the gloss quoted above. For if "aurea" and "aureole" were the same, the "aureole" would not be described as added to the "aurea." Moreover, since reward corresponds to merit, a more excellent reward must needs correspond to this more excellent way of meriting: and it is this excellence that we call an "aureole." Hence it follows that an "aureole" differs from the "aurea."

Reply to Objection 1: Beatitude includes all the goods necessary for man's perfect life consisting in his perfect operation. Yet some things can be added, not as being necessary for that perfect operation as though it were impossible without them, but as adding to the glory of beatitude. Hence they regard the well-being of beatitude and a certain fitness thereto. Even so civic happiness is embellished by nobility and bodily beauty and so forth, and yet it is possible without them as stated in Ethic. i, 8: and thus is the aureole in comparison with the happiness of heaven.

Reply to Objection 2: He who keeps the counsels and the commandments always merits more than he who keeps the commandments only, if we gauge the notion of merit in works from the very genus of those works; but not always if we gauge the merit from its root, charity: since sometimes a man keeps the commandments alone out of greater charity than one who keeps both commandments and counsels. For the most part, however, the contrary happens, because the "proof of love is in the performance of deeds," as Gregory says (Hom. xxx in Evang.). Wherefore it is not the more excellent essential reward that is called an aureole, but that which is added to the essential reward without reference to the essential reward of the possessor of an aureole being greater, or less than, or equal to the essential reward of one who has no aureole.

Reply to Objection 3: Charity is the first principle of merit: but our actions are the instruments, so to speak, whereby we merit. Now in order to obtain an effect there is requisite not only a due disposition in the first mover, but also a right disposition in the instrument. Hence something principal results in the effect with reference to the first mover, and something secondary with reference to the instrument. Wherefore in the reward also there is something on the part of charity, namely the "aurea," and something on the part of the kind of work, namely the "aureole."

Reply to Objection 4: All the angels merited their beatitude by the same kind of act namely by turning to God: and consequently no particular reward is found in anyone which another has not in some way. But men merit beatitude by different kinds of acts: and so the comparison fails.

Nevertheless among men what one seems to have specially, all have in common in some way, in so far as each one, by charity, deems another's good his own. Yet this joy whereby one shares another's joy cannot be called an aureole, because it is not given him as a reward for his victory, but regards more the victory of another: whereas a crown is awarded the victors themselves and not to those who rejoice with them in the victory.

Reply to Objection 5: The merit arising from charity is more excellent than that which arises from the kind of action: just as the end to which charity directs us is more excellent than the things directed to that end, and with which our actions are concerned. Wherefore the reward corresponding to merit by reason of charity, however little it may be, is greater than any reward corresponding to an action by reason of its genus. Hence "aureole" is used as a diminutive in comparison with "aurea."

Article. 4 - Whether Three Fruits Are Fittingly Assigned To The Three Parts Of Continence?

Objection 1: It would seem that three fruits are unfittingly assigned to the three parts of continence: because twelve fruits of the Spirit are assigned, "charity, joy, peace," etc. (Gal. 5:22). Therefore seemingly we should reckon only three.

Objection 2: Further, fruit denotes a special reward. Now the reward assigned to virgins, widows, and married persons is not a special reward, because all who are to be saved are comprised under one of these three, since no one is saved who lacks continence, and continence is adequately divided by these three. Therefore three fruits are unfittingly assigned to the three aforesaid.

Objection 3: Further, just as widowhood surpasses conjugal continence, so does virginity surpass widowhood. But the excess of sixtyfold over thirtyfold is not as the excess of a hundredfold over sixtyfold; neither in arithmetical proportion, since sixty exceeds thirty by thirty, and a hundred exceeds sixty by forty; nor in geometrical proportion, since sixty is twice thirty and a hundred surpasses sixty as containing the whole and two-thirds thereof. Therefore the fruits are unfittingly adapted to the degrees of continence.

Objection 4: Further, the statements contained in Holy Writ stand for all time: "Heaven and earth shall pass away, but My words shall not pass away" (Lk. 21:33); whereas human institutions are liable to change every day. Therefore human institutions are not to be taken as a criterion of the statements of Holy Writ: and it would seem in consequence that the explanation of these fruits given by Bede is unfitting. For he says (Expos. in Luc. iii, 8) that "the thirtyfold fruit is assigned to married persons, because in the signs drawn on the 'abacus' the number 30 is denoted by the thumb and index finger touching one another at the tips as though kissing one another: so that the number 30 denotes the embraces of married persons. The number 60 is denoted by the contact of the index finger above the middle joint of the thumb, so that the index finger by lying over the thumb and weighing on it, signifies the burden which widows have to bear in this world. When, however, in the course of enumeration we come to the number 100 we pass from the left to the right hand, so that the number 100 denotes virginity, which has a share in the angelic excellence; for the angels are on the right hand, i.e. in glory, while we are on the left on account of the imperfection of the present life."

I answer that, By continence, to which the fruit corresponds, man is brought to a kind of spiritual nature, by withdrawing from carnal things. Consequently various fruits are distinguished according to the various manners of the spirituality resulting from continence. Now there is a certain spirituality which is necessary, and one which is superabundant. The spirituality that is necessary consists in the rectitude of the spirit not being disturbed by the pleasures of the flesh: and this obtains when one makes use of carnal pleasures according to the order of right reason. This is the spirituality of married persons. Spirituality is superabundant when a man withdraws himself entirely from those carnal pleasures which stifle the spirit. This may be done in two ways: either in respect of all time past, present, and future, and this is the spirituality of virgins; or in respect of a particular time, and this is the spirituality of widows. Accordingly to those who keep conjugal continence, the thirtyfold fruit is awarded; to those who keep the continence of widows, the sixtyfold fruit; and to those who keep virginal continence, the hundredfold fruit: and this for the reason given by Bede quoted above, although another motive may be found in the very nature of the numbers. For 30 is the product of 3 multiplied by 10. Now 3 is the number of everything, as stated in De Coelo et Mundo i, and contains a certain perfection common to all, namely of beginning, middle, and end. Wherefore the number 30 is fittingly assigned to married persons, in whom no other perfection is added to the observance of the Decalogue, signified by the number 10, than the common perfection without which there is no salvation. The number six the multiplication of which by 10 amounts to 60 has perfection from its parts, being the aggregate of all its parts taken together; wherefore it corresponds fittingly to widowhood, wherein we find perfect withdrawal from carnal pleasures as to all its circumstances (which are the parts so to speak of a virtuous act), since widowhood uses no carnal pleasures in connection with any person, place, or any other circumstance; which was not the case with conjugal continence. The number 100 corresponds fittingly to virginity; because the number 10 of which 100 is a multiple is the limit of numbers: and in like manner virginity occupies the limit of spirituality, since no further spirituality can be added to it. The number 100 also being a square number has perfection from its figure: for a square figure is perfect through being equal on all sides, since all its sides are equal: wherefore it is adapted to virginity wherein incorruption is found equally as to all times.

Reply to Objection 1: Fruit is not taken there in the sense in which we are taking it now.

Reply to Objection 2: Nothing obliges us to hold that fruit is a reward that is not common to all who will be saved. For not only the essential reward is common to all, but also a certain accidental reward, such as joy in those works without which one cannot be saved. Yet it may be said that the fruits are not becoming to all who will be saved, as is evidently the case with those who repent in the end after leading an incontinent life, for to such no fruit is due but only the essential reward.

Reply to Objection 3: The distinction of the fruits is to be taken according to the species and figures of the numbers rather than according to their quantity. Nevertheless even if we regard the excess in point of quantity, we may find an explanation. For the married man abstains only from one that is not his, the widow from both hers and not hers, so that in the latter case we find the notion of double, just as 60 is the double of 30. Again 100 is 60 X 40, which latter number is the product of 4 X 10, and the number 4 is the first solid and square number. Thus the addition of this number is fitting to virginity, which adds perpetual incorruption to the perfection of widowhood.

Reply to Objection 4: Although these numerical signs are a human institution, they are founded somewhat on the nature of things, in so far as the numbers are denoted in gradation, according to the order of the aforesaid joints and contacts.

Article. 11 - Whether Three Aureoles Are Fittingly Assigned, Those Of Virgins, Of Martyrs, And Of Doctors?

Objection 1: It would seem that the three aureoles of virgins, martyrs, and doctors are unfittingly assigned. For the aureole of martyrs corresponds to their virtue of fortitude, the aureole of virgins to the virtue of temperance, and the aureole of doctors to the virtue of prudence. Therefore it seems that there should be a fourth aureole corresponding to the virtue of justice.

Objection 2: Further, a gloss on Ex. 25:25: "A polished crown, etc. says that a golden [aurea] crown is added, when the Gospel promises eternal life to those who keep the commandments: 'If thou wilt enter into life, keep the commandments' (Mat. 19:17). To this is added the little golden crown [aureola] when it is said: 'If thou wilt be perfect, go and sell all that thou hast, and give to the poor'" (Mat. 19:21). Therefore an aureole is due to poverty.

Objection 3: Further, a man subjects himself wholly to God by the vow of obedience: wherefore the greatest perfection consists in the vow of obedience. Therefore it would seem that an aureole is due thereto.

Objection 4: Further, there are also many other works of supererogation in which one will rejoice in the life to come. Therefore there are many aureoles besides the aforesaid three.

Objection 5: Further, just as a man spreads the faith by preaching and teaching, so does he by publishing written works. Therefore a fourth aureole is due to those who do this.

I answer that, An aureole is an exceptional reward corresponding to an exceptional victory: wherefore the three aureoles are assigned in accordance with the exceptional victories in the three conflicts which beset every man. For in the conflict with the flesh, he above all wins the victory who abstains altogether from sexual pleasures which are the chief of this kind; and such is a virgin. Wherefore an aureole is due to virginity. In the conflict with the world, the chief victory is to suffer the world's persecution even until death: wherefore the second aureole is due to martyrs who win the victory in this battle. In the conflict with the devil, the chief victory is to expel the enemy not only from oneself but also from the hearts of others: this is done by teaching and preaching, and consequently the third aureole is due to doctors and preachers.

Some, however, distinguish the three aureoles in accordance with the three powers of the soul, by saying that the three aureoles correspond to the three chief acts of the soul's three highest powers. For the act of the rational power is to publish the truth of faith even to others, and to this act the aureole of doctors is due: the highest act of the irascible power is to overcome even death for Christ's sake, and to this act the aureole of martyrs is due: and the highest act of the concupiscible power is to abstain altogether from the greatest carnal pleasures, and to this act the aureole of virgins is due.

Others again, distinguish the three aureoles in accordance with those things whereby we are most signally conformed to Christ. For He was the mediator between the Father and the world. Hence He was a doctor, by manifesting to the world the truth which He had received from the Father; He was a martyr, by suffering the persecution of the world; and He was a virgin, by His personal purity. Wherefore doctors, martyrs and virgins are most perfectly conformed to Him: and for this reason an aureole is due to them.

Reply to Objection 1: There is no conflict to be observed in the act of justice as in the acts of the other virtues. Nor is it true that to teach is an act of prudence: in fact rather is it an act of charity or mercy---inasmuch as it is by such like habits that we are inclined to the practice of such an act---or again of wisdom, as directing it.

We may also reply, with others, that justice embraces all the virtues, wherefore a special aureole is not due to it.

Reply to Objection 2: Although poverty is a work of perfection, it does not take the highest place in a spiritual conflict, because the love of temporalities assails a man less than carnal concupiscence or persecution whereby his own body is broken. Hence an aureole is not due to poverty; but judicial power by reason of the humiliation consequent upon poverty. The gloss quoted takes aureole in the broad sense for any reward given for excellent merit.

We reply in the same way to the Third and Fourth Objections.

Reply to Objection 5: An aureole is due to those who commit the sacred doctrine to writing: but it is not distinct from the aureole of doctors, since the compiling of writing is a way of teaching.

Whether one person has an aureole more excellently than another person?

Objection 1: It would seem that one person has not the aureole either of virginity, or of martyrdom, or of doctrine more perfectly than another person. For things which have reached their term are not subject to intension or remission. Now the aureole is due to works which have reached their term of perfection. Therefore an aureole is not subject to intension or remission.

Objection 2: Further, virginity is not subject to being more or less, since it denotes a kind of privation; and privations are not subject to intension or remission. Therefore neither does the reward of virginity, the virgin's aureole to wit, receive intension or remission.

On the contrary, The aureole is added to the aurea. But the aurea is more intense in one than in another. Therefore the aureole is also.

I answer that, Since merit is somewhat the cause of reward, rewards must needs be diversified, according as merits are diversified: for the intension or remission of a thing follows from the intension or remission of its cause. Now the merit of the aureole may be greater or lesser: wherefore the aureole may also be greater or lesser.

We must observe, however, that the merit of an aureole may be intensified in two ways: first, on the part of its cause, secondly on the part of the work. For there may happen to be two persons, one of whom, out of lesser charity, suffers greater torments of martyrdom, or is more constant in preaching, or again withdraws himself more from carnal pleasures. Accordingly, intension not of the aureole but of the aurea corresponds to the intension of merit derived from its root; while intension of the aureole corresponds to intension of merit derived from the kind of act. Consequently it is possible for one who merits less in martyrdom as to his essential reward, to receive a greater aureole for his martyrdom.

Reply to Objection 1: The merits to which an aureole is due do not reach the term of their perfection simply, but according to their species: even as fire is specifically the most subtle of bodies. Hence nothing hinders one aureole being more excellent than another, even as one fire is more subtle than another.

Reply to Objection 2: The virginity of one may be greater than the virginity of another, by reason of a greater withdrawal from that which is contrary to virginity: so that virginity is stated to be greater in one who avoids more the occasions of corruption. For in this way privations may increase, as when a man is said to be more blind, if he be removed further from the possession of sight.

Article. 12 - Whether The Virgin's Aureole Is The Greatest Of All?

Objection 1: It would seem that the virgin's aureole is the greatest of all. For it is said of virgins (Apoc. 14:4) that they "follow the Lamb whithersoever He goeth," and (Apoc. 14:3) that "no" other "man could say the canticle" which the virgins sang. Therefore virgins have the most excellent aureole.

Objection 2: Further, Cyprian (De Habit. Virg.) says of virgins that they are "the more illustrious portion of Christ's flock." Therefore the greater aureole is due to them.

Objection 3: Again, it would seem that the martyr's aureole is the greatest. For Aymo, commenting on Apoc. 14:3, "No man could say the hymn," says that "virgins do not all take precedence of married folk; but only those who in addition to the observance of virginity are by the tortures of their passion on a par with married persons who have suffered martyrdom." Therefore martyrdom gives virginity its precedence over other states: and consequently a greater aureole is due to virginity.

Objection 4: Again, it would seem that the greatest aureole is due to doctors. Because the Church militant is modelled after the Church triumphant. Now in the Church militant the greatest honor is due to doctors (1 Tim. 5:17): "Let the priests that rule well be esteemed worthy of double honor, especially they who labor in the word and doctrine." Therefore a greater aureole is due to them in the Church triumphant.

I answer that, Precedence of one aureole over another may be considered from two standpoints. First, from the point of view of the conflicts, that aureole being considered greater which is due to the more strenuous battle. Looking at it thus the martyr's aureole takes precedence of the others in one way, and the virgin's in another. For the martyr's battle is more strenuous in itself, and more intensely painful; while the conflict with the flesh is fraught with greater danger, inasmuch as it is more lasting and threatens us at closer quarters. Secondly, from the point of view of the things about which the battle is fought: and thus the doctor's aureole takes precedence of all others, since this conflict is about intelligible goods. while the other conflicts are about sensible passions. Nevertheless, the precedence that is considered in view of the conflict is more essential to the aureole; since the aureole, according to its proper character, regards the victory and the battle, and the difficulty of fighting which is viewed from the standpoint of the battle is of greater importance than that which is considered from our standpoint through the conflict being at closer quarters. Therefore the martyr's aureole is simply the greatest of all: for which reason a gloss on Mat. 5:10, says that "all the other beatitudes are perfected in the eighth, which refers to the martyrs," namely, "Blessed are they that suffer persecution." For this reason, too, the Church in enumerating the saints together places the martyrs before the doctors and virgins. Yet nothing hinders the other aureoles from being more excellent in some particular way. And this suffices for the Replies to the Objections.

Article. 13 - Whether One Person Has An Aureole More Excellently Than Another Person?

Objection 1: It would seem that one person has not the aureole either of virginity, or of martyrdom, or of doctrine more perfectly than another person. For things which have reached their term are not subject to intension or remission. Now the aureole is due to works which have reached their term of perfection. Therefore an aureole is not subject to intension or remission.

Objection 2: Further, virginity is not subject to being more or less, since it denotes a kind of privation; and privations are not subject to intension or remission. Therefore neither does the reward of virginity, the virgin's aureole to wit, receive intension or remission.

On the contrary, The aureole is added to the aurea. But the aurea is more intense in one than in another. Therefore the aureole is also.

I answer that, Since merit is somewhat the cause of reward, rewards must needs be diversified, according as merits are diversified: for the intension or remission of a thing follows from the intension or remission of its cause. Now the merit of the aureole may be greater or lesser: wherefore the aureole may also be greater or lesser.

We must observe, however, that the merit of an aureole may be intensified in two ways: first, on the part of its cause, secondly on the part of the work. For there may happen to be two persons, one of whom, out of lesser charity, suffers greater torments of martyrdom, or is more constant in preaching, or again withdraws himself more from carnal pleasures. Accordingly, intension not of the aureole but of the aurea corresponds to the intension of merit derived from its root; while intension of the aureole corresponds to intension of merit derived from the kind of act. Consequently it is possible for one who merits less in martyrdom as to his essential reward, to receive a greater aureole for his martyrdom.

Reply to Objection 1: The merits to which an aureole is due do not reach the term of their perfection simply, but according to their species: even as fire is specifically the most subtle of bodies. Hence nothing hinders one aureole being more excellent than another, even as one fire is more subtle than another.

Reply to Objection 2: The virginity of one may be greater than the virginity of another, by reason of a greater withdrawal from that which is contrary to virginity: so that virginity is stated to be greater in one who avoids more the occasions of corruption. For in this way privations may increase, as when a man is said to be more blind, if he be removed further from the possession of sight.

Chapitre 3 – La Fabrique du Corps Humain, & les facultez de l'âme Preschent une Divinite

D'Autant que la cognoissance qui est en l'entendement humain vient par les sens, de la se fait que nous avons de coustume souventesfois de iuger, & dire les choses qui sont les plus excellentes es corps être divince; & recerchons par les facultez des choses corporelles la puissance de Dieu: par l'ordre, sa sapience; & par l'utilité sa bonté, & miséricorde. Au chapitre précédent nous avons monstre que tous hommes par la religion, & sentiment qui est naturellement en eux preschent une divinité. Maintenant examinons les tesmoignages que la fabrique, & composition du corps de l'homme nous proposent; de la en apres nous viendrons au reste. Les Platoniques ont dit que l'ame est l'homme, Et pour le regard du corps qu'il est comme un vestement qui l'environne; ou plustost une prison. Mais c'est chose résolue que l'homme consiste de matière & de forme; & que par la matière, on entend le çorps, & par la forme l'ame. Suivant cela Saluste disoit ainsi, que toute notre faculte est au çorps, & en l'âme Nous vivons plustost du commandement de l'ame, & du service du çorps. Nous mons l'un commun avec les Dieux, & l'autre avec les bestes. Or & l'un, & l'autre preschent clairement la divinité. & ce n'est point sans cause que l'homme est appelé des Grecs « Petit Monde »: c'est la plus belle image, & la plus parfaites & un excellent tesmoignage, & indice de la puissance, sapience, & bonté de Dieu. Car il est façonné tellement qu'il semble qu'il veuille que par icelui, comme par un patron tresparfait, nous facions jugement de lui, tant il l'a efléué par dessus les autres créatures, de façon que pour trouver Dieu il ne faut point sortir hors de nous mesmes, pource que par lui nous vivons-, avons mouvement, & sommes, comme le Poet Aratus. Ce qui se cognoistra plus facilement si nous examinons les parties de l'homme l'une âpres l'autre.

Et commençans par le çorps nous trouverons que la science de l'anatomie nous fera comme une guide pour venir a la cognoissance de son facteur. Car comme disoit Galien nous sommes amenez a la cognoissance d'un Dieu par la beauté, & excellence de ses ceuvres. Or il y a quatre choses entre autres au çorps humain et quelles la grandi & admirable sapience de Dieu reluist. Car de dire que l'homme soit de soi même; c'est chose trop eslongnee de raison. Une petite image ne sera sans facteur, & l'homme qui est un ouvrage si parfait se fera il fait somesmes? Il y aen premier lieu la structure, & connexion des membres; de laquelle toutes les sciences ont emprunté les proportions; laquelle est tant ingénieuse qu'il est impossible de l'imiter parfaitement. L'homme à esté prins de terre, façonné droit, eslevé, regardant le Ciel pour par ce moien venir à la cognoissance de Dieu. Les hommes, dit Cicéron, sont de terre, & non en icelle comme habitans, ains comme spectateurs des choses supérieures & celestesl le regard desquelles ne compete a aucun autre genre d'animaux, & ce que Ouide a observé par ces vers.

Et neantmoins que tout autre animal

Jette toujours son regard principal
Encontre bas, Dieu a l'homme a donné
La face haute, & lui a ordonné
De regarder l'excellence des cieux
Et d'eslever aux Estoiles ses yeux.

START HERE

Les interprètes des sens, & messagers des choses sont mis au chef, comme en une forteresse pour les usages nécessaires. Les yeux comme spectateurs obtiennent une place fort haute de laquelle contemplant plusieurs choses ils puissent mieux faire leur devoir. Les oreilles, d'autant qu'elles doivent recevoir le son; lequel de nature monte en haut, sont mises en lieu esfleue. De mesme les narines, car l'odeur tend aussi en haut, & pource que leur jugement est grand touchant le manger, & le boire, ce n'es point sans cause, qu'elles font situées pres de la bouche. Le goust doit sentir les viandes dont nous usons, & a ceste occasion il habite en la partie par laquelle les viandes, & le breuvage entrent au corps. L'Atouchement est espars esgalement par tout le corps, de sorte que par icelui nous sentons tous les coups, les violentes chaleurs & les froidures. La structure du chef est orbiculaire & en rond sòubs lequel est le corps ayant la façon d'icelui fort longue pour marcher plus aisément. En outre au corps sont joints en long quatre membres droits, & flexibles par lesquels il se peut mouvoir facilement, & apprehender les obiects, demeurer debout, s'arrester, & cheminer, & pour cela les mains, & les jambes nous sont données. Il y a en âpres la forme du corps, & la beauté laquelle on ne sauroit exprimer. La teste seule ravira tous nos sens, il y a les futures y & commissures, les yeux ayans si admirables vertus, & qui sont de diverses çouleurs, & couvers, Il y a aussi la langue, & l'oreille: L'une pour parler, & l'autre, pour ouir. Le visage avec tant d'artifice, tout cela est il de soi mesme, ou a l'avanture? Les os du corps si solides se sont ils assemblez d'eux mesmes? Les nerfs liez, la chair couverte d'une si belle peau? Le pied se sera il eslargi ainsi de soi mesme pour soustenir le corps? Qui auroit ainsi presse la rate, & imprimé au cœur la forme qu'il a? Qui aura tissu les filets du foye, & engravé les tuyaux des poulmons? Le cœur, le foie, & le cerneau ont ils d'eux mesmes prins le lieu qu'ils tiennent pour estre les sièges des facultez irasible, concupissible & raisonnable? Si l'on dit que tout cela est de nature, je répondrai qu'il y a ordre, & raison qui ne peuvent estre sans sujet, & ainsi nature sera quelque chose participante de raison. L'Harmonie suit qui nous fait encores plus admirer l'ouvrier, & facteur d'icelui. Les doigts avec la main, la main avec le bràs, le bras avec le corps, le corps avec le chef. Mais singulièrement ce en quoi consiste la santé du corps, assavoir l'harmonie entre les quatre humeurs. Le sang, le flegme, la colere, & la melancholie; l'intemperie, ou exuperance desquelles cause la maladie, & en fin la mort. Finalement il y a la symmetrie, c'est a dire la proportion des membres, car les pieds, & les jambes, et toutes les autres parties ont leur proportion si bien mesurée, & compassée qu'il est impossible de mieux, estant le corps au milieu, & le chef au deflus, comme maistre. Au reste que pourroit on remarquer en icelui qui fut superflu? Quelle petite parcelle y a il qui ne rende, & exhibe utilement ce a quoi elle est destinée, qui ne se dispose pour soi-mesme, & pour les autres parties? Qui a il plus admirables que le plus grand secret de nature pour nous ravir, que de consider en la multitude infinie des hommes qui sont au monde la variété de leurs trtgestes, la différence de la physiognomie n'aiàs tous qu'une mesme forme, & neantmoins l'un ne semblera l'autre, & iàçoit que çous aient une langue, tant y a toutesfois qu'ils parlent, & chantent diversement, & ainsi de plusieurs autres telles choses. Mais voici qui surpasse tout, & n'y arien qui nous ravisse plus en admiration que la conjunction du corps & de l'ame. Et combien que leur nature soutane disemblable il y aye ce neantmoins entre eux une telle société & harmonie, brésil est entierement impossible de descrire les merveilles de ce corps. La multitude, & diversité des parties, l'accord des membres, l'artifice, & singuliere beauté d'iceux. Il faut donc, d'autant que cela ne peut estre de soi mesme, confesser & reconnoistre qu'il y a quelcun prudent, & merveilleusement sage qui y a mis la main: puissant di-je pour lui avoir donné être, & de tresgrande, si pience pour l'avoir fait, & forme en la façon que nous le voions.

Venons maintenant à la considération de l'ame laquelle estant de beaucoup plus excellente que le corps, & de nature plus divine, aussi demonstre elle plus evidemment, & amplement la Divinité. Vrai est qu'elle est bien eslongnée de ceste perfection en laquelle elle estoit avant la cheute de l'homme: Car c'est maintenant de l'homme, comme d'un excellent bastimens qui est tombé en ruine. L'on y apperçoit encores quelques vestiges marques, & restes de la pristine splendeur, & beauté, quelles mesmes se sentent de la ruine. Aristôte, Ciceron, & plusieurs autres ont bien recogneu cela quand ils ont dit que si nous fumions nature, que nous ne laudrions jamais. Car par nature ils entendent ceste première affection qui estoit en nous pour juivre le bien. Ils ont bien cogneu la corruption par les effets comme rexprime, au nom de tous, Ouïde, l.j. amor.

Le nostre naturel comme on void tousjours tend
A vouloir s'efforcer faire ce qu'on défend.
Conseillé fuis par l'esprit autrement.
Ce que le lmeilleur je cognoi, & approuve
Et toutes fois tout soudaine le reprove
En faisant choix du mals misirement.

Ils ont donc bien cogneu la maladie, & ruine: mais ils en ont ignoré la cause comme Catule le tesmoigne.

Le hayj ejr aime ensemble, oparavant un de demander pourquoi je le fait u as cure^ le te di n'en savoir la cause nullement.

Mais je le sens ainsi, ce qui m'est grand torment, l'estime que pour raison de ceste condition én laquelle est a présent l'homme, Áristote enseigne qu'en ceste vie nous ne pouvons parfaitement cognoistre Dieu. Car il rapporte la cause de cela a l'imbecillité qui est en nostre entendement. Or jaçoit que ceste infirmité tant pour suivre la vertu, que pour cognoistre ce qui de soi est clair, & facile soit en l'homme par le péché, tant y a qu'il lui reste allez deluhiicre pour le convaincre, tant d'ingratitude, que de paresse & d'infidélité. Car nous pouvons en nous mesmes comme toucher la sapience, & puissance de Dieu. Et par át il n'est j'ai besoin d'une longue, & laborieuse démonstration, ou recherche des tesmoignages qui servent pour illustrer la majesté Divine, veu qu'il s'en présente en nous une infinité. Mais singulièrement les facultez, & mouvemens tant agiles de nostre entendement, les dons d'i celui tant rares, le conseil, la prudence, la raison de laquelle celui est dit être justement privé, qui ne recognoist ces choses avoir esté parfaites de la main divine. Où nous rðe merit je vous prie, toutes ces faculté? Que dirons nous de la vertu intelleótive pour composer, pour denîer, pour ratiociner, pour contempler, & apprehender. Que sera ce de la puissance d'appeter, de mouvoir, de sentir & de végéter? Tout cela sera il de soi mesme? Que dirons nous de l'invention des arts, & sciences, de la perfection, & droit usage d'icelles, & de la dextérité que nous appercevons aux uns plus que aux autres, de l'administration des Royaumes, de la police des Republicues, des entreprises, & généreuses exécutions d'icelles, & autant ingénieuses, & voire des choies inusitées. Mais surtout de l'inquisition que fait l'homme de la Divinité, & des choses célestes, dira on que ces choses prouvennent d'un rencontre fortuit des atomes? Pourquoi ne produit il le mesme à présent? Au avoir mon si ce rencontre des atomes digérant la viande, & le breuvage en fait ceste prudéte, & sage dispersion, & séparation; pour en jeter une partie comme extremés; & l'autre comme nourriture aux membres pour exercer & opererieur office? Si quelcun est si effronté que de le vouloir dire ne le faudra il pas renvoyer avec les bestes & l'efster du rang común des homm., Mais oyons sur ce sujet :

Et A divers méfier sfin industrie efend.
Ce gentil animal qui régit toute chose.
En la terre habitable a sa demeure encloses
L'a donnée au labeur, les animaux a pris,
S'ejl fait chemin sur mer, & pour n'estre surprit.

S'efi retiré au chef, comme a la forteresse,
Ou dessus tous les sens la raison ejl maistre
Leve les yeux au Ciel, ces deux celestes yeúx,
Et de plus pres encor regarde dans les cieux,
Il cherche Jupiter, é" finese contente
Sans plus, du front des Dieux que le Ciel représente, il fouille jusqu'au fond, ejr tousjours s'approchant Comme un nu du Ciel, au Ciel je vais cherchant.'

Archkas de Tarente prononce son adieus en cès mots. Cela, dit-il, me semble avoir esté qui est aüssi, c'est que l'homme a esté créé par Dieu, par de lui a toutes les facultes. Circeron conclud ainsi. C'est animal, àk il prouviant sage ingénieux-, subtil, memorati forné de raison plein de conseil lequel nous appelions homme en excellente condition, a esté fait du souverain Dieu. Car lui seul entre tant d'animaux a esté formé de la raison de laquelle les autres ont été jriue. En Zenophon il y a un dis, auquel ií prouve qu'il y á un Dîeu: qui a fait l'homme, & à dispose & distingué toutes ses parties, & e par la figure du corps humain; par la perfection des organes sensitifs, par les affections naturelles, & par les admirables actions de l'esprit. Il n'est pas besoin d'insister sur ces choses d'autant qu'elles sont la & ailleurs amplement deduittes sèulement l'advertir ai que comme l'ignorance engendre orgueil: aussi plusieurs ne fache ce que c'est que de l'homme, & de ses facultez l'estiment semblable aux bestes, & mesprisent, avec desdain tour ce qu'ils n'entendent, ou plustost ne veulent pas entendre. Cependant en eux memes ils portent ce qui le» rendra inexcusables. Car outre le sentiment de Divinité qui est en eux de nature, leur corps, la composition de ses membres, leur ame, & ses facultez demonstrent assez manifestement que Dieu en est l'autheur, comme les sages des Gentils ont creu, tenues crit, & confessé.

Chapitre 4 - Le Monde en Général, & Notamment l'Ordre que Nous y Appercevons Preschent la Divinite, ce qut À estre Cogneu par les Philosophes

Nous avons monstre que l'homme, qui est appelle le petit monde, démonstreassez clairement par sa composition, & considération de sès parties qu'il y a un Dieu. Maintenant il faut recueillir les tesmoignages de cela que les autres créatures nous exhibent. Alcinoüs propose ces moiens. Quelcun, dit il, se prenant garde de la beauté du corps vient de la à celle de l'ame, en apres a celle qui estés ocèffices, & Les loix. Finalement a la fontaine de bonté, la ou est le bien qu'il faut desirer & aimer duquel les tesmoignages, & les traces apparoissent si clairement en la nature des choisis? Il ne faut aucunement douter que ceux qui suivront ce chemin ne parviennent là. Car il se manifeste si evidemment, & en l'homme, & en ce bastiment tant exquis du ciel, & de la terre 5 Se journellement s'y monstre, & presènre en telle sorte que nous ne saurions ouvrir les yeux qu'ils ne bien r,^ contraints de l'appercevoir. Son essence est a la vérité, & invisible,& incorhp'rehenmntñf ãible, mais de quelque couste du monde, & de qa'on jette les yeux, il n'y a si petite choie & par laquelle on n'apperçoive quelque estircclle de sa gloire. Que dirons nous donc de ceste grande machine du monde? Y a il chose plus claire, & evidente, âpres avoir contemplé le Ciel, les choses célestes, & terrestres, que de dire qu'il y a quelque souveraine sagesse par laquelle toutes ces choses sont régies, & contenues en cest ordre si excellent que nous y appercevons? Comme a dit Lucilius en Cicéron, vient en quelque maison, ou en quelque collège, ou en quelque palais, votant comment tout s'y comferte, la disciplines l'ordre qui y en juge que tout cela n.est sans cause, ainsi qu'il y a quelqu'un ayant intelligence lequel y préside, & auquel l'on obeits ; et plus forte raison il faudra voire nécessairement en tant de mounements, & vicissitudes, & changemens des choses, & les ordres desquels la vie Ile (se, n'a apforté aucun défaut,qu'on eifabliffe quelque suprême entendefituídment qui régisse gouverne tout cela. Chri'eflJe 6p?US adjoute ceste raison, S'il y a, dit il, gMment, quelque chose en la nature que l'entendement humain, la raison, ejr la puissance humaine ne peut faire, certes ce qui l'aurd faites plus que l'homme. Or es-~i ainsi que les choses celestes, tjr toutes celles desquelles í ordre ejl perpétuel ne seuvent estre faites par l'homme,par quoi ce qui les aura faites fera plus grand, & meilleur que l'homme. Qui pourra on dire estre celui si non Dieu? Si quelçun ne le peut croire d'autant que Dieu n'est point veu, qu'il est çoute ce que dit le même Philosophe, & en mesme ìicu. A savoir mon, àit i\,en votât vue moifon grade, dr excellate^ejrne [achat par qui elle aura ete faite si tu diras qu'elle a e fié faite des rats, & des fouriyt si tu fais cas d'un tel ornement du monde avec si grande variétés de la beauté des choses celestes-, de l'ample grandeurs puissance de la mer, et de la terre, tu dis, áit ìi3 cela efire ton domicile, et non celui de Dieu ne te montíreras pas hors de jugement, & de raison? Aristote, & les autres ont conclue pour ces raisons & autres qu'il y a un Dieu le quel gouverne le monde, & me£ rnement par la considération de la beauté du ciel, de k constance du mouvement des tours & changemens des temps, & des choses. Item par la considération de nostre vie, & de tout l'univers, toutes lesquelles choses ils ont cogneu ne pouvoir avoir esté faites, que par quelque principe tressages très-bon qui préside a toute ceste université. Or comme ci dessus nous avons examiné le petit môde par les parties d'autant que la puissance & sapience de Dieu y est mieux recogneue: aussi faut il qu'en cest endroit nous usiós de semblable méthode. Nous commencerons par les choses superieures, d'autant que comme disoit AIfames^ cinpusjò»w iv&w2k*c°i*ì3* &c. Nous admiKnoien.; ons au secours des Astres, & du Ciel, l'ouvrier de la nuict, & du jour, des mois, & des ans, par lesquelles comme par une voie propre, & naturelle nous paruielidrons au créateur. Euripide conformément. ', Splendeur du Ciel esielié qui tout couvre, D'un sage ouvrier admirable chef â'œuvre. Nous voyons premierement le soleil resplendiísant d'une très claire lumière le quel ne se destourne jamais de son cours ordonné, & ne passe auçuneméc les bornes qui lui sont prescripte si l'aprochement ou recullement duquel tépere les chaleurs, & froidures & selon qu'il approche, ou recule du septétrion & du midi sait l'hyuer; & l'esté, son movemét se fait de sorte qu'âpres avoir illuminé la terre de sa fplëdcuren âpres il l obrage d'une admirable façon.Car l'óbre de la terre estât opposeç au soleil lanmct se sait. En âpres la Lune fuit le cours annuel du íoleil,en l'espace d'un mois, laquelle d'au L* cause tant plus qu'elle s'en approche ía lueur ít ^"fl"*~ diminue, & au contraire, d'autantplus qu'el le s'en recule d'autant plus elle s'augmente, màn!' d'ou procèdent tant de mutations des humeurs. Le soleil aiát son cours l'imité tient comme le premier lieu ; & les autres corps célestes lui obéissent comme à leur Prince, & Roi. Et combien qu'il soit plus grand que toute la terre, il souffre neantmoins un nombre innumerable d'estoiles tournoier dessous lui. En outre l'on apperçoit diverses motions aux astres: les l'une de l'autre. D'ou viendra c'est accord discordant, & qui est ce qui le maintient, & conserve si long temps? Qui est ce qui aura alligné a un chacun son mouvement, & sa place ? Cestes ceste conversion admirable du soleil, & son mouvement si soudain, les ordres fermes, & arreztez des ailles, la liaison, & entresuite des jours & des nuicts la diversité des faisons, & des temps qui se fait tant par le soleil, que par les autres corps célestes pour le bien, & conservation de toutes choses excluent ouvertement la fortune, demonstrent manifestement qu'il y a quelcun souverainement sage qui régit, iefef- & gouverne toutes ces choses. Car ce n'est 'soUiiâ' Point í"ans l'ordonnance de quelcun que les âmes soleil estant pres de nous, nous eschauffe plus que quand il en est es longné, que la Lune croissante augmente les humeurs, & des croissante qu'elle les diminue ; que les t4»se pléiades, & hyades ordinairement donnée a la Lune & les planètes secs sont dés grav aux signes chauds on sent des véhémentes kurs**' cna^eurs, & au contraire. Ces choses actif sont elles ces vertuz d'elles mesmes? Pourquoi ne pleut il tousiours, ou fait beau temps? Pourquoi ne fait il tousiours chaud? Pourquoi ne contons nous trente íphatres píustost qu'avec Aristote & les autres huit seulement? La lune s'est elle mise d'elle même fhtm me en ^a première Mercure en la prochaiticux. nc, Venus en la troiziesine, le Soleil en la quatriesme Mars en la cinquiesse, Jupiter en la sixiesme, Saturne en la septiesme, & les estoiles fixes en la huitiesme? Ces choses manifestent assez ouvertement qu'elles sont ordonnées d'un Dieu. Car il n'y a rien qui puisse estre meu par raison & nombre sans conseil auquel il n'y a rien qui puisse çst reténéraire, ou fortuit. Nous dirons donc avec Trimcgiste, dire, il ya quelçun qui est facteur & seigneur de toutes ces choses . Car le lieu le nombre, & la mesure ne se peuvent consèrver sans le facteur.

Si de la nous descendons aux choses basics nous n'y trouverons gueres moins de tesmoignages de la divinité. Premièrement.

La terre qu'on contemple, la terre située, & nonobstant son poix subsister au milieu du mon -eJiueni' de, solide, roide, & vestue d'arbres, de plantes, de fleurs, de verdure, & de fruits hv"h' multitude infinie desquels est distingirée un ,f* par apparence diversité, & avec ce de fontaines, de ruissèaux, de rivieres, de montagnes grandes, & petites, de coustaux, de colines, & d'amples campagnes. Item d'especes infinies d'animaux. Qu'elle est la grandeur, & beauté de la mer? Tous fleuves en sortent & y retournent, & toutesfois elle ne redonde point ; & combien qu'elle soit quelques fois en furie espouvantable, voire tellement qu'il semble que la terre doive estre submergée, tant y a qu'elle ne passe pas ses bornes, Mais surtout la conservation des espèces demonstre que le monde ne peut estre par fortune, ou par une concurrence des atomes. Car nous voions un chien engendrer un chien, un bœuf procréer un bœuf, & ainsì des autres. Mais sur tout la constitution, composition, & ordre de toutes choses qu'on apperçoie ci bas. La nuict suit le iour, l'esté le printemps, la pluie le beau temps, les semailles la moisson, & les autres qu'on ne sauroie déduire par le menu. Davantage les elemens, & les parties du monde ne sont pas de mesme nature, & qualitez, ains contraires. Comment est ce donc que le monde peut tant subsistes? Nous voions par expérience qu'un bien petit nombre d'hommes ne peut demeurer gueres longtemps d'accord sans un supérieur, je ne parle point d'un Roiaume, d'une Prouince, ni d'une 'sfnl . Cite, ains d'une petite famille en laquelle encan- tout ira en confusion sans quelque cner, ou 'fHsitrn quelqu'un qui íbit comme chef. Comment est ce donc que la machine du monde qui est composée de substances qui ont des qualitez tant contraires pourroit demeurer, & si long temps subsister, & ces qualitez contraires unies si en la diversité d'icel les qui Font le corps d'íce lui il n'y avoit une harmonie, & accord admirable qui fait aux susdites diverses qualitez prester mutuellement leurs natures, & mouvemens, si elles n'estoient par deí"us cela conojntes & consèrvées en ceste conjonction harmonie & accord par quelque vertu plus excellente? En outre si le gouvernement du monde estoit delaissè, & que les natures contraires fussent dis-jointes, & qu'une chacune d'icelles demeurait en son lieu par quelle raison ou moien semefferoient elles pour la composition du corps? Que si elles se pouvoient messer il est certain qu'elles ne pourroient faire ce que porte leur vertu, a ssaoir eschauffer, refroidir, humecter & sècher. Mais jiulement l'ordre des formes, car mesmes les choses artificielles d'ordre des formes, figures, & revolutions ne procède de la matière, ainsi plustost de la pensée & volonté de Tourier. Et iaçoit que le ciel régisse en quelque façon les elemens, si est ce qu'il est facile de recueillir par la diversité des formes, & des mouvenemes qui soutien celui qu'il emprunte ceste vertu d'ailleurs, assaeioir de quelque vertu supérieure qui soit ferme, & stable qui ne depende d'aucune autre. Ceste considération a fait dire au Philosophe au livre du monument de que comme en une armée il y a tel ordre que combien qutlyait plusieurs regimens, & plusieurs bandes, toutes néant moins regardent a un chef & par lui sont ordonnées: Ainsi eji de Dieu & du monde. Et de fait aussi si cela n'estoit, & que Dieu comme chef n'y tint la main, tout iroit en horrible confusion. Il y a plusieurs causes au monde, comme plusieurs capitaines en une armée, mais qui se réfèrent, & qui dépendent de la première, autrement un poirier produiroit autres fruits que des poires, & ainsi de toutes autres natures: ou bien tout retourneroit en un Cahos. Finalement pourquoi est ce qu'un total seroit meilleur que ses parties s'il ne trouvoit une cause, & commune, & plus excellence que plusieurs causes par la vertu de laquelle plusieurs sont assemblez en un? Il y a donc une cause plus exellente que les choses ordonnées, & comme difoit A

L'entendement est celui qui dispose, & est cause de toutes choses. Ec Trismegiste, tu désires, dit il, de voir Dieu contemple l'ordre du monde, & le paremfc, & la beauté de l'ordre, considère la nécessité des choses apparentes, & la providence des choies qui sont faites, & qui sont a faire. Et cela non sans cause, Car comme nous avons desja dit, tout ordre présuppose raison, raison présuppose un sujet; & par ainsi il nous a mene a son autheur qui est Dieu. Les Philosophes, qui ont diligemment recherché, & examiné la nature, & propriété des choses, nous convient par leurs clerics de conclurre ainsi. Comme aussi d'un mutuel accord, & consentement il ont recogneu un Dieu souverain. Leur but principal a esté de ramener l'operation de nos entendemens des choses terrestres, & adveques aux célestes, & eternelles: de ce qui est mobile, a ce qui est immobile: des choses sensibles, aux insensibles, reduisans tout a une première cause, & voians que le monde ne peut subsister de soi mesme estant composé de tant de diverses, & contraires qualitez, ils nous rameinent à un gouverneur, & conservateur, perpetuel. Et notamment Platon, en son Timae, & Aristote au livre de sa Métaphysique. Au reste Epicure dr,t*'<, 'ciesine proposant ce qui est pour tendre la vie bienheureuse, ne dit il pas temoin Laeftius, qu'il faut tenir qu'il y a un Dieu immortel, comme le dict la commune intelligence & ne lui attribuer rien de ce qui ne convient a l'immortalité & a la félicité. Il est donc certain que tous hommes d'un mutuel accord & commune conception ont attesté, & conclud qu'il y a un Dieu. Pourtant comme ainsi soit que nostre consciences, nostre corps, notre ame, tout le inonde tous les Philosophes temoignent qu'il y a uné Divinité suprême, de là nous pouvons aisément juger que ceux la sont indignes d'estre tenus au rang des hommes; qui le ni en tj ou revoquent en doute. Concluons donc avec Sophocles:

De vrai n'y a qu'un seul grand Dieu qui si Tout l'universe, ejr- ces bas lieux a/fit, Tout le grand dos de la grand terre ferme; L'air, & le Ciel, qui en son tour enferme? & couvre tout flots et bagues marines sont de ses mains les ouvrages tres dignes. Et si donna aux vents le faussement l'on void en eux si fort, & véhément; Et l'Océan embellit de mainte onde. Enfemme il fit tout ce qui est au mondés.

Et disons, ce a quoi naturellement Raccordent les hommes est véritable, Or est ainsi que tous tèsmoigne ne qu'il y a un Dieu,&pourtant suivant l'aduis de Platon croiós qu'il y a un Dieu & ne nous laissons troubler par les opinions de ceux qui voudront tenir du contraire.

Chapter 5 - Les Amples Considerations des Facultés, de l'Ame, et des Autres Créatures qui Preschent la Divinité

Pource que Terreur, la folie, l'aveuglement, & l'ignorance ont introduit les noms de nature, & de fortune; & que ceux contre lesquels nous combatons sont estât de ces noms: afin qu'il soit notoire a un chacun que Cicéron a dit verité, outre ce, que nous avons proposé, nous adjoutons ce qui s'enfuit. L'onvoid qu'entre les choses qui sont en la nature, les unes estre simplement, les autres avec mouvement & vie, Aucunes avec mouvement, vie, & intelligence. Car il y en a qui sont endormies sânl tñu sentir leur mouvement, tousjours fermes en leur estat. Et d'autres se nourrir croistré sesn-'fi & decroistre. il y en a qui sont esmeuves par fimit . leur force & vertu, & d'autres qui ont sens interieurs, & extérieurs. Il y en a qui sent de raison. Ceste distinction tant admirable sera elle fortuite. Pourquoi est ce que les choses qui vivent de la vie qu'on dit vegetative, comme les Plantes ont besoin d'aliment tiré de la terre, & les poissons non? Nature aura elle orné l'homme outre le sentiment, & mouvement, de la faculté raisonnable, sans aucun conseil? En outré ceste diversité qui est entre les Plantes nori seulement de longueur, d'espesteur de forme, & de couleur: mais aussi de faculté á force, & de vertu ne presehe elle pas un autheur? Si quelque statue, ou effigie faite par Apelles, ou par Phidias est mise devant nos yeux, ne seront nous pas incontinent esmeús d'en louer l'Autheur? D'ou vient donc que lontemp sans ce grand, & tant excellent courage, du Ciel & de la terre nous ne sommes esmeus pour én louer, & exalter plus le Créateur? Quy mais dira l'aùtheur, & :d'une maison, & d'une effigie, mais ce n'est pas le mesme du monde, & de gifo Dieu. Je respns que nous pouvons aisément appercevoir l'architect de l'univers, des yeux de l'entendement si nous les ouvrons. Il est bien vrai que les essences naturelles des choses ne sont point veuës de nous, ainsi qu'elles demeurée cachées, si profondi des cachetés d'une chacune d'icelles. Car il est impossible à nos entèndeniens jestans chargez ; & appesantis de ceste masse dé corps, & enveloppez dé ténèbres qu'ils y puissent parvenir, & penetrer: & Jaçoit qu'il le receut erripeschement d'ailleurs, tant y a qu'il y en a assez en sa condition. Aucuriá ont jugé que comme l'Eternel voulant faire le monde, premièrement amis la màũ aux éléments & aux natures plus grossières: àinsi nostre esprit polit cognoistre les choses examine, & recherche en premier lieu, les accidenses actiôs des natures, les parties des choses, & les causes pair lesquelles: elles sont, & subsistent. Par quoi en la consideration des choses naturelles, c'est à dire les substances, il peut-estre notoire a chacun que le commencement se doit faite par les actions. Car une chacune chose a ses œuures, & ses actions selon la substance, & selon fâ nature. I I faut donc, comme àussi l'experiencè l'enseigne, commencer par lès sens, des sens venir a la fantasie, ôu de la a l'entendement, & raison. Or les accidens font les obiects des sêns. Mais la raison juge facilement que les natures n'ont pas d'elles mesmes leur action. Comme par exemple, s'il se présente quelque herbe, ou quelque racine devant nos yeux, premièrement on void l'exterieur, aũ àvoir la couleur, & la figure, & d'autant qu'on les met au rang des substances qui sont concrètes , l'on considère comment elle est en terre, ce que l'cau, le soleil, & la lumière Sí le reste y font : on la gouste austl, & de la iê recueillent, fes facilitez, qui font produitt'espar l'accord deselemens. Des choses extérieures se fait abstraction à l'entenderhent lequel raciocinant de ceci & de cela cet fin conclude estre plante, ou racine, estre de telle, ou telle vertu. Il use de mesme méthode en recherchant la nature & propriété des autres substances, observant qu'elles choses ont esté les premières & qu'elles les posterieures, quel est tords ej8i la fcktc des choies qu'il faut considérer & cest œuvre admirable. En outre d'autant que rien xf á ne peut éstre de foi simplement, & n'll point distingué des autres choses fortuitement, de la il recueille, & conclud qu'il a sa fâculté, & distinction de quelcu'un. Or Ceux la expérimentent combien grandes, & diuerfes conclusions se font en l'entcndement, en la contemplation des choiês, & use leurs actions; lesquels exercent la force: de leur esprit, & comment il ne peut estré contentm & acquiescer jusques a ce qu'il íbic parvenu a quelque parfâit. Car quand l'tfc prit médite, & examine l'òrigine des choses, & leurs parties, leurs causes, & offices distribuez en leur Ordre, & classe, il ne ccíié de chercher, & examiner jusques a ce qu'il soit parvenu á la consideratíon, & cognoissance d'un ouvrier parfait, & souverain. Par ceste méditation il observe la sagesse, puissance, & bonté de l'autheur, lèquel à ordonné toutes choses si sagement: & eh fírt il infere, & conclud, de quel ordè, & pour Ruelle fin il faut user de ces choses. Et pòustance l'on vient nécessairement des choses sensibles, de la fantasie, de l'entende mèn, & raison á a parfait.' Cela se cogvoit aisément en reputarît qu'il y a des choies plus parfettes les unes que les autres, en montant la vertu croist, & en descendant elle se diminue, tellement qu'elle est contrainte s'estant peu a peu débilitée de demeurer finalement en quelque lieu, comme en la génération d'un arbres des autres choies desquelles la génération se fait successivement, comme au mouvement des animaux, au commencement il est plus lasche, & plus tort au milieu ; & les choses eschaufées & agitées d'esprit, en descendant il est plus de bile, d'autant que les esprits sont consumez. Et de la il a pert qu'il n'y a point infinité de causes & d'effets, & qu'il en faut establir une de vigueur infinie & ne empruntât d'ailleurs ce qui est notoire par ceste deduction. Tout corps est mèii de quelque autre que de soi-mesme, pour ce que de sa nature il ne se peut mouvoie n'ayant de soi aucune action, ce que manifestement s'apperçoit quand l'ame est séparée du corps par la présence donc de l'ame le corps a mouvement, & vie, ce qu'il n'auroit autrement niant de sa nature telle propriété. Or l'ame a puissance de se mouvoir & ce qui a puissance de se mouvoir le peut distribuer aux autres. Or quand nous disons que l'ame a mouvement nous entendons cela absolument, comme quand l'on dit que le feu est chaud de soi, une chacune partie du feu, est feu, & est chaude. Car ce n'est point une partie qui meut, mais toute de soi, c'est a dire de sa nature elle a mouvement d'un a l'autre je le discourt par raison. Je ne veux pas m'arrester ici a remarquer la diversité des opinions sur ceci. Il sçai bien que Platon disoit, comme Plutarque itmc que a recueilli, que l'ame est tousjours mouvante, & l'entendement immobile quant au mouvement d'un lieu a l'autre. & Áristote que l'ame est immobile encores que ce soit elle qui régisse, ou mesme tout mouvement, mais bien en est elle participante par accidents sêlon que les divers corps se meuvent. il met trois raisons en avant pour réfuter Ptaton, Mais ceste diversité, & contrieté d'avis n'empesche point le fil de nostre propos. Car l'ame avant commencement, ce mouvement qui est par elle aura aussi eu son commencement. Et partant sur, & devant le mpuuement qui est par l'ame, il faudra nécessairement establir quelque substance stable. C'est une maxime recue sans contradiction & tfue tout ce qui a commencement a nécessairement quelque cause de celuy. Comme donc ce qui est parfait precede ce qui est imparfait, il faudra aussi mettre devant l'âme, une cause certaine, & continuelle, tellemét qu'ainsi que le corps a mouvement par l'ame, l'ame semblablement aura son commencement d'entendre de Dieu. Or comme il y a plusieurs choses qui sont obiessées aux sés qui ne peuvent estre perceues par ceux qui en sont privez : aussi y a il plusieurs choses qui peuvent seulement être appréhendées par la seule opération de l'entendement. D'ou viendra ces nécessités, & distinction? Comme donc les sens sont pour raison des choses sensibles semblablement l'entendement pour celles qui sont intelligibles. Or il y a plusieurs natures participantes des hommes sens , & n'y en a aucune d'intelligence ou jfcnifié' tre l'homme. C'est pourquoi Iamblique dit que Pythagoras suivant cela avoit bien licence. Parle, quand il a dit que tout homme a esté fait de Dieu, pour çognoistre, & entendre. Et de fait si l'ame de soi avoit telle faculté, on en pourroit autant dire des bestes, lesquelles toutesfois n'ont intelligence ni raison. D'ou procede ceste différence? Certes non fêuënient elle enseigne l'excellence de l'homme & son immortalité, mais aussi, voire principalement qu'il y a quelque parfait qui la douë de si belles, & excellentes qualitez. Pour confirmation l'adioure, l'ame ne peut aucunement douter de soi, car elle se cognoist. Et c'est une ignorance par trop grossiere, voire plustost une brutalité, de ne distinguer voire séparer l'ame du corps, & dire que ce n'est qu'une mesme chose, les admirables opérations de l'ame, & mesmement le corps estant endormi, démontrée assez le contraire. L'ame donc cognoit & sçait qu'elle est d'autre substance que le corps, & qu'elle à d'autres facultez. Or L'ame d'autant qu'elle ne se peut ignorer elle de la ams née a recognoistre qu'elle a commencé d'estre, n'estant de soi-mesme, & n'ayant commencement du père comme il sera vérifié ci apres, il faudra qu'elle conclue que c'est par quelcun plus excellent, plus pur, plus parfait & qui soit sans commeniennement. Outre plus entre les ames il y a une grande différence non pas de substance, mais pour ce qu'elles ont toutes une substance sukim-spirituelle, mais leurs qualitez sont grandement diversses. Qui causera ceste diversité? Cela ne s'apperçoit pas seulement ça l'ame, mais aussi on ne peut dire qu'entre tant de natures qui sont au monde, en ít grande quantité, & différence il n'y en ait quelques unes plus excellentes que les autres; Or la ou l'on trouve plus & moins on trouve aussi quelque supreme, & tres-grand. Comme aussi on ne trouve en ce monde aucune nature tellement excellerez & préeminente par dessus les autres qu'elle n'est point de supérieure. Nous voions le premier Ciel, lequel quelques uns appellent première intelligence, avoir neantmoins, d'autant qu'il est fini, & limité, quelque infini par dessus soi qui toutesfois est immobile, & ce d'autant qu'on ne peut aller en infinité de causes. Tout ainsi donc que toutes dimensions se rapportent au signe, tous nombres a l'unité, encores que le signe ne soit fait de dimensions, ni l'unité des nombres: semblablement toutes natures, & simples, & composées se rapportent à quelque principe qui ne peut estre composé, ainsest très-simple n'estant mesme avec aucuns accidens, voire sans qu'on y puisse etablir quantité ou qualité, mais plustost. convient reconnoistre que c'est unçfuMá*. çe indivisible. Et c'est Dieu très-bon, & très-grand lequel a ceste occasion est appellé par Aristote principe immobile, & stable pour le distinguer des Cieux, & autres natures qui sont sujettes a mutation, & altération. La liaison qui est entre les créatures comme nous auons dit nous a mesme là. Et par tât il faut reconnoistre une cause souveraine du corps, de l'ame & de toutes autres choses.

Chapter 6 - La Consideration de la Nature il faut Nécessairement Venir a une Première Cause Immobile et Immatérielle sans qu'on Puisse Passer Outre

Les Philosophes constituans par raison demonstrations, divers genres, diverses espèces, ou différences de formes ont déchiré une première, & principale cause qui maintient toutes les autres. Comme aussi la raison ameine l'entendement a conclurre que ce monde visible, dépend de quelque souverain, & très-excellent ouvrier. Et que comme l'ombre n'est sans le corps, de mesme le monde ne peut estre sans une cause efficiente, & souveraine. Car en ice l'n il y a plusieurs espèces la multitude desquelles se reduit à unité. Comme la multitude des hommes se reduit a ce qu'on dit nature humaine la multitude des brebis, & des bceiits de mesme, & ainsi des autres especes. Or toutes ces unitez qui sont finies, & ont nombre déterminé, ont necessairement une unité par dessus elles, assavoir Dieu qui est le premier, & Prince-des efpc? Tautn ccs* Car çomme la multitude des eboses sîngulieres estant quasi infinie est réduit nMfit rc a ^es c^PeCcs fiuics, & se rapportent a une qui est infinie non en nombre, ainsi en vertu. Comme aussi toutes matières sont reduites a une, toutes les parties du monde a un corps: semblablement toutes les créatures du monde, & toutes ses vices se réduisent a une, tous les moteurs a un qui meuve tout l'univers, & neantmoins soie immobile. Or que ce premier doive estre immobile, & de vertu infinie, il appert pour-ce que s'il avoit quelcun par dessus soi, il dependroit d'un autre, & celui d'un autre, & ainsi faudroit aller en infinité, et qui ne se peut faire. Et partant ce premier est distingué de toutes autres choses par cepe: ceste différence qu'il est simplement de soi-mesme, c'est a dire subsiste de sa propre vertu, & donne estre a toutes autres choses, plemnt Ce que les Hebrieux expriment par ce moi de Jehova. En outre nous voions les corps qui sont ci bas est reluicts a mutation d'estre à non estre, & au contraire d'un ils sont changez en un autre. Les choses célestes encores qu'elles soient les plus excellentes, tant y a qu'elles sont Arrettes a cela de se changer d'un a l'autre. Tout donc sera esgalcn ce naturel. S'il n'y a rien par dessus ces corps, ou ils n'avoient d'ailleurs leür estre, ou s'ils l'avoient eu & il y a long temps qu'ils avroient defailli, pource qu'ils sont fluides, coulans, & instables, il faut donc jusqu'ils aient leur estre de quelque substance stable, & simple. Ils ne l'avoient de le receu d'autre, pourceque s'il y avoit esgalité ils ne se pourroient aucunement déterminer a l'être, & eussent defailli d'autant qu'estans fluides, coulans, & inconstans de leur nature, ils fussent pieça reduits à tien, sinon que quelque substance stable les fust maintenuz, Cela a donné occasion au Philosophe de dire qu'il faut estimer que Dieu est en un degré supérieur, & que vertu est espadue par tout. Au 8.ode BfW l'audition naturelle il traite cest argument. Et me semble qu'il sera pour le meilleur de proposer ici sommairement ce qu'il en dit. Je sçai bien que plusieurs estiment qu'en ce passage il ne parvient que jusques au premier moteur, se mouvant soi-même ; & que c'est au lmre de la Métaphysique qu'il cherche i'immobile. Mais il est assez notoire que ceste ci est la proposition. En la nature des choses se trouve un moteur de vertu infinie, pource qu'il meut en temps infini: or pour premier cela, & pour parvenir à son prétendu il use d'une similitude fort propre, a savoir que le petit monde, c'est à dire l'homme nous enseigne comment le grand monde, & l'univers est gouverné. au petit monde il y a l'ame, & le corps qui font deux choses de diverse nature. L'ame est principe de mouvement au corps: Le mesme convient dire de Dieu, & du monde, seulement cela nous doit desplaire qu'il compare le moteur mouvant le monde au fnoUement vital de l'homme dequel il devoit plustost comparer au mouvement local. Car Dieu opere volontairement sens estre aucunement astraint ny lié aux causes lecodes. Certes l'opération est tres propre à Dieu par laquelle il ne deschet aucunement de son estât & ne diminue la vertu vérité, & simple nature & laquelle a ceste occasion est ditte opération de l'entendement pour la distinguer de l'operation naturelle, laquelle se commençant en l'agent se finit, & defaut en ce qui patit, comme la chaleur du feu au bois. Or l'pperation de l'entendement retient & l'un & l'autre, a raison de quoy Parmenides disoit Dieu estre immobile, encores qu'il face mouvoir les cieux. Mais il faudra traiter ceste matière ci âpres. Or Aristote pour prouver qu'il y a une premiere cause immobile, & immatérielle & le prouve en premier lieu qu'il y a mouvement en la nature, & par mouvement il entend que ceste agitation, substantielle, ou accidentelle qui est au sujet par laquelle agitation se sait, acquisition, ou perte de forme, qui peut estre receue, ou perdue. Car en toute fiatute il y a inclination ou vertu qui est née au corps qui est cause de mouvement, ou de reposition a aucuns corps qui ne tende; à mutation, c'est à dire a génération, ou corruption, augmenration, ou diminution, tnfti altération & mutation de lieu. Comme les ipuisse animaux, & les plantes tendent a gènereuse d* ti°nJ & diuer les arrections, & les corps cemoim- lestes à mouvement de lieu. Il provue donc qu'il y a mouvement en la nature des choses, & attribue au Ciel, eternal mouvemen, & repos a la terre: que le reste quelques fois est meü, quelques fbis no. La dessus il divise les choses qui sont meü's, & qui agitent, en celles qui sont agitées & agitent, par elles mesmes, & en celles qui le sont par accident, par autre, ou par accident celles qui sont és autres qui agitent ou qui sont agitées, & qui en partie. Grparleil ainsi pour monstrier que ce qui est meü par accident est en plusieurs sortes. Comme au mouvement local, quand le total s'esmeut par soi la partie s'eiment par accident au mouvement du total. Pareillement ce qui contient est meü par accident au mouvement du conten. Comme le Nautonnier ou celui qui sera assis dans la nature: & l'amé au corps. Si le navire est meü du vent, J'homme sera meü par accident. il adioute l'ex position de l'autre membre. Par celles,qui agitent ou sont agité espion pour être en Celles qui agitent & qui sont agitées, ne aussi pource que aucune de leve partie agite, ou fbit agicée. Entre celles qui sont agitées d'elle mesmes, aucunes donc esmeuës d'elles mesmes, aucunes par autre mouvement, & sont les unes agitées par nature, les autres par violence contre nature. Car ce qui est agité de joi mesme est agité par nature, comme un chacun animal: veu que chacun animal est agité de mouvement par luimesme. Par nature, i<jmme le corps par l'âme, par violence, comme quand l'homme îaulte, quand une pierre est kttec en l'air. Là dessus il dit qu'il faut diligemment distinguer ce qui agite, & ce qui est agité, & esmeu, comme cela s'apperçoit clairement des choses agitées par violence & des choses animées. Car l'ame est á l'endroit du corps, comme le Navtonnier à l'e droit du navire. Il dit le mesme des choses qui sont sans ame. Car elles-ont toutes, û elles ne fbnt empeschées, une vertu intérieure qui les pousse par manière de dire, en leur lieu. Comme le feu n'estant empesché tend en haut au concave du Ciel de la Lune; & la terre au centre; les plantes a la production de leurs semblables ainsi des autres. Puis il dit qu'il y a deux sortes de i.strtti puissance. L'une prochaine, comme le feu dipuïs-peut eschauffer, & le pèsent tendre en bas. L'autre plus esloignée, comme le froid est en puissance estrange, & esloignée pour eschauffer ce qui ne se peut faire sâns mouvement par accident. Córhe l'eau eschauffée, combien que de la nature elle soit froide, & humide toutes fois par accident elle peut eschauffer, àssavoir par l'operation du feu. Or ce qui est cause, que la puissance eslongnée, est en âpres puissance prochaines sans doute est áussi cause de mouvement; Par quoi quand nous dtsorts que le feu s'efleuve, & que la terre de ualc, il faut que cè ttipi. Par ^uc'eun. Finalement il monstre que ce qui est agité l'est nécessairement flrpt Par une autre, & ce en deux façons; que** - ou par celui qui est agité d'autre, ou parifictnt CC^U1 n e^ P^nt d'aurre. Et combien qu'il soit esmeu par celui qui est ágiré d'autre, il est nécessaire qu'il y ait quelque premier mouvement qui ne soit agité ni esmeu par autre, òu bien il n'y auróit point de fin. Que s'il y a tel premier moteur il n'en faudra point requérir d'áuéré par dessus. Car il est impossible que ce qui est qui cil agité par autre procède en infinité, veu qu'il n'y a aucun premier, entre les infinis. Si donc tout ce qui cil agité l'est de quelque retouvement, il faut necessairement venir a un premier moteur immobile. Et de la il confirme l'opinion d'Anaxagore qui disoit que N£v c'est a dire Dieu estoit sans aucune commixtion, ou meflange, qui ne peut reccuoir extérieurement aucune choié,ains est principe,& fontaine de vie,& de mouuemét. Voila le sommaire de ce paísage, par lequel le Philolophe veut direeí ntj Tomme. Sion donnoit proerez, & continuation en inimité, es caules mouuantes ii upbys.

faudroit que tous les corps fussent infinis. Car puis que tout corps mouuant est agité, ce qui meut en mouuant feroit aussi meü par quòí ces corps finis se mouueroient en temps infini, ce qui est impossible, pourcè qu'il faut que ce qui est mouuant, & ce qui est meü soient énsiblement. Or est ainsi que les corps ne peuvent estre en semblér rien que par continuation, ou contiguátion, c. attouchement de l'un & l'autre, & par ainsi en temps fini il y adroit mouvement infini. Et de h Ton peut ainsi côclur têYlly ámoituemenc, il y a donc un Dieu.

Car tout cc qui est rheu est meü par autre agtt'tjt d'autant que rien ti'est meü qu'il né soit en î<í puiffanceàcequoíilcstmeü.Pourcequé mosMir mouuojr c>efl. mencr quelque chose de puisfánce à l'acte,ce qui rie íe peut que par quelque chose qui estdefair.Oronne donne point progresz en infinité. Il faut donc venir à Dieu première cause, & immobile. Et de sait és choies mouuantes qui sonc meues, & ordonnées, desquelles l'une est meüè par l'autre par ordre, il faut par nécessité en venir là, qu'en ostant le premier moteur, ou bien cessant de sa motion, il n'í en ait aucun qui soit mouuant, né qui soit meü, pource que le premier est cause du mouvement à tous les autres. Que si elles font mouuantes, & meüès par ordre en infini il n'í aura aucun premier mouuant, ains tous seront moiens, & au millieu, & ainsí nul ne pourroit mouvoir l'autre: & sien ne scroit meü au monde, ce qui est absurde. Simili esclarci par la similitude d'un t*ie horloge. Il y a en premier lieu l'horlogeur & qui note, & marque les heures, le mouvement commence par vhC rouë laquelle en esmeut un cautre, & icélfé une autre ainsí sonc cause de mouvement l'une à Tauf rc. Or void on qu'il n'y a pas une roue qui ait mouvement de soi-mesme. Car la première roue I*a du maistre, encores qu'il ne soit meü d'un autre, autrement il faudroit aller en infinité. Le mesme se void quand òn iette une pierre contre quelcun qui est mouvement vólent ; on dira que Iá main & le bras eri sont cause, puis on viendra a la cause de ce mouvement, & de la à la cause de ceste cause, & d'autant qu'en ce coupí fini en temps, il faudroit chercher une infinité de causes, ce qui ne se peut, de là l'on void qu'il faut par nécessité confesser une première cause de mouvement qui n'en ait point pâ dessus foi.

Chapitre 9 - l'Ordre Admirable est au monde 5 ejr les tuenemens contre tefi ordre Enseignent la Création du Monde

PLaton en son Timee par ceste démonstration enfeigne, que le monde a eu cÓ- 5£ mencement & qu'il ne peut estre ecernel. wfc.i* Tout ce qui est touché, & veu, a corps^a e- vtUmsté fait quelques fois, or est ainsi que le monde est tel, car il est veu, & a corps: & partant quelque iour il prendra fin, comme il a eu cōmencemēt.or tout ce qui a cōmccemér. l'a de quelque chose. Et partat il faut establir vue cause du monde: laquelle soit inuisible, & încorporelle,dc soy, & qui ne soie engendrce, ny ne dépende d'aucune autre* ccst argument est fort clair. Il a basti sa demonstration sur la nécessité de la cause procreante, comme Aristote l'a fait de l'ordre des mouvemens: par laquelle tous deux nous meinent a une première cause de toutes choses. Nous dirons donc, Toute substáappre- ce qui est appréhendée par les sens est concre & de forme, comme de fens'est ses parties. Or tout ce qui est compose, & astmpsé semblé des parties ne peut estre de soi mesme, car il seroit avant qu'estre sait il aura donc une cause efficiente. Car cela ne se vhit & compose, qui n'est principe d'actió, & d'union, pource que qui fait quelque chose le fait par quelque faculté qui est en soi, & unir appartient a une vertu totalement induisible: dont appert que les parties du monde, & du composé par un sien mouvement,ne se font point assemblées en la composition. Si doncques ce qui est corporel De peut subsister de soi mesme, ni se contenir, ni agir soi mesme:il faudra que ce soit d'ailleurs, il faudra donc donner une cause de lâ composition qui est de soi, se contiens & est entièrement indivisible, & qui ne íbit par autre, a ce qu'il n'y ait progresz en infinité. Mais examinons les parties du monde, car il n'y arien en celui í abject qui ne presche un auteur, il n'y a rien si difforme auquel Dieu n'ait départi quelque faculté. En outre nous expérimentons que toutes choses ne í font point de chacune semence, de la vigne on n'a point vfeu de pommes produittes. un Loup nc fait point un agneau. Item nous voions que les elemens í changent l'un en l'autre. Car nous voíos que par la vertu du soleil, de l'eau qui est froide, & humide l'air estre fait, quand la froidure s'est départie, & que l'humidité demeure, d'icelle se fait l'air.& quand de l'air le feu est fait, l'humidité se perd par la mesme opération &I* siccité suruient.Ceste matière laquelle est, & exténuée seulement par raréfaction & eclaircíscment monté a la forme du feu. semblablement elle descend espessie, elle f enfle enaer, puis s'epessit en eau, & finalement s'appeíantit en terre, or ceste viciÊ ít ude,& tour se fait en temps : au temps il y a mesure, il y aura donc commencement de mefûre.& par quelqu'vn. Nous voions le meíme des parties de l'annee,car le pnn temps suitL'hyuer,& iceluy l'Esté, & puis l'Automne :qui est ce qui ne void ces rau» tarions se faire en temps,& par ordretergo dequelqu'vn.Lamerauflia son flux & reflux. L'aer a ses vens, maintenant cestui ci, otescestuilà: ily a donc commencement de flux, & une borne de vent, & par quel«ju'vn. Or est il facile decognoistre qu'es choies ou il y a neceífité,concatenation,& liaison il faut recourir a quelque commencement. Nous voions que les parties de Tannée dépendent du mouucment du solcilje flux & reflux de la mer de celui de la lune, & que la lune emprunte fa vertu du soleil: on apperçoit auífi que les mouuemens des corps célestes ne font pas semblables. Carilyamouuement par lequel l'estoile va d'une part a l'autre, qui fuit pat un cours droit, ily a áuflídesestoiles errantes, & qui retournent leurs cours, ce qu'on dit auoir esté premièrement obíeruc par Apollonius Pergaeus.

La lune faitfòn cours au Zodiaque tous les mois, Mars passe par le ciel des signes en 2 ans & 5 mois.Ciceró tiét que c'est en tietm. 24. moys moins six iours. Mercure le fait presque au mouuement du Soleil. Iupiter en 12 .ans. Venus (qui est ditte í)t?«©<Lucifer quand elle va deuant le soleil3& «w--' t& quand elle le fuit au coucher ) prelcq de mcíme;& Saturne en tréte ans. le soleil fait son cours naturel au zodiaqueentre les deux tropiques en ^j.iours six heures,& parfait l'annec. ces six heures assemblées font un iour lequel avec la nuict consiste en 2 4.heures;lequel il faut necclíairement intercaler de quatre en quatre ans. & c'est ce que nous appellós bilíexte. pource que ceste annee la Ion conte deux fois le 6. des calédes de Mars. Au reste les Astrologues ne sont pas bien d'accord touchât le mouuement du soleil. car aucuns veullent qu'il y ait outre les 3 6^ .iours six heures quelques minutes, pour raison desquelles l'Euefque de Rome a retranché il y a quelques annees dix iours.De ces choses nous pouons inférer en premier lieu qu'il fauc decerner .certain point du mouuement auquel tout a commencé a mouuoir. Comme aussi lesEgyptiens disent qu'au premier iour du monde Aries estoit au milieu du ciel, la Lune au Câcer, & le soleil au Lion. Dauantage comme difoit Algazel, file inonde estoit éternel il faudroit donner un infini plus grand l'un, que l'autre: d'autant qu'il y a beaucoup plus de reuoirions de la Lune, que de Saturne. Et partant nous dirons avec Trismegiste qu'il y a quelqu'un qui est facteur, & Seigneur de toutes ces choses. Car le lieu, le nombre, & la mesure ne peuuent estre conseruez sans le facteur, ceste constance es estoiles, ceste grande conuenance des temps par tant de diuers cours en toute éternité ne peut estre entêdu sans entendement, raison, & conseil, Dauantage il n'y a rien qui puisse estre es' ineu, par raison, & nombre, îâns conseil. L'ordre qui est aux corps célestes reiette îa fortune, comme ennemie de constance, & fermeté. Parquoy Tordre fera de quelcun, & le conseil en quelcun. ce que Cicéron remarque & décrit au long. Nous voy* ens dit il, premièrement la beauté lueur du Ciel) en âpres U légèreté à tournement telle que me/me nous ne la p ornions pas penser/en afres les viciffitudes^dr tours des nnifis, & des tours, les commutations » ejr changement des temps, partis en quatre pour amener les fruits a maturité, ejr pour tempérer les corps le modérateur de toutes ces choses ejr leur conduc* tcur le soleils ejr lal/tnes laquelle par Accroissement & âecroiffemet de lumière, comme marquant & signifiant les iours des fa/les, & un mesme cieldijlribué en douze, que cinq efoiles sons séparées gardant me/mes cours trescon- ^ flamme n t par dissemblables mouuemens entre elles , ejf que la face du ciel de nuicl eft ornée de tous coufie7jí'efloiles, en âpres le globe de U terre éminent fur la mer au milieu de l'univers habitable & cultiuee ayant deux parties dtfiantes & ejlongnees l'une de l'autre. II adiout Cjun peu âpres. Jet ou nous habitons l'on voit la terre reluire de netteté) les arbres produire feuilles, les vignes qui refiouiffent, ietter les feuilles, & bourjons : les branches des petits arbres courbées, tant ils font chargez de fruits; les terresensemencées produire les bleds; en abondance: tout fleurir: les fontaines bâillonner, ejr les pre^veHus d'herbes : En âpres la multitude du beíail, en partie pour manger, en partie pour cultiuer la terre, en partie pour charrier, & porter, en partie pour ueffir le corps : or l'homme comme contemplateur du ciel\ & les champs & la mer obéi (fan s a ce qui ejl pour l'utilté dr profit de l'homme. Quand donc, dit il, nous votons ces choses, & une infinité d'autres, pouvons nous douter, qu'il n'y ait un créateur de ces choses qui les régisse & gouverne ; voila ou l'ordre admirable, qui est au monde Ta amené, & tous les hommes de jugement, a sa voir a recognoistre un créateur de l'univers qui est infini, & tout puissant. Maintenant voyons ou il faut rapporter les mutations & changemens de cest ordre, car ils scruent de beaucoup pour confirmer nostre proposition estans considerez comme il faut. Ceste maxime est assez familière entre tous, que tout ce qui est éternel n'eft point sujet a mutation, & changement. Car toute altération apelle la fin comme l'immortalité est l'argument d'éternité: aussi la mutation l'est des choses qui doivent prendre fin ; & ce qui n'a point de fin n'a point aussi de commencement. Parquoy puis q plusieurs choies de ce mode sont sujettes a mutation, & que les parties donnent démonstration de la nature du total, il s'enagtc'ejr fuiura quele monde ne peut estre éternel, que mu- ains plustost qu'il a eu commencement. Or est il facile de prouuer qu'il y a plusieurs choses, sous le concaue de la Lune fubiettes a mutation, or appelions nous mutaÍÍQst non pas l'alteration qiii aduient a la chose par la priuation de la forme, mais rincerruptiõ de Tordre de nature. Ârlstotc au l. de la gcne. dit ainsi. Puisque nous confcisons que nature appelle tousiours ce qui est plus excellent, & que l'estre est plus excellent) que le non estre, afin que cela aduienne a toutes choses, d'autant que plusieurs choses se font grandemet cllongnees du principe. Dieu au reste a repli l'univers, ayant ordonné une continuelle procréation & de la nous voyons que l'hómc engendre un homme: un cheual, un cheual: un bœuf . < un bœuf; & ainsi fe fait une continuelle conseruation des espèces, pource que en * toutes les espèces, semblables choses sont procréées, ce qui est, comme nous auons dit, un euident tefmoignage que le monde n'est pas par cas fortuit, toutes-fois nous voyons que l'homme n'engendre pas tous iours un homme semblable a luy, ni va bœuf un bœuf. dont appert que ceste ordi- 1 nation n'est pas éternelle. Car plusieurs choses sont engendrées contre, & outre Tordre de nature, tât en l'air qu'en la terre, que parmi les animaux: voire fouuent fans aucunes causes naturelles, comme ce qui sonna la trompeté au Rubicon à Iules Czar, ne peut estre cfclairci par cause naturelle, non plus qu'ç qui s'apparut a Dion & a Brutus leur prédisant ejr jsojT. ## Livre Seconde – De la Creation Du Monde - Solution des Arguments qui Semblent Inférer l'Eternité du Monde Eux qui acquiesceront à la vérité des argumens,& raisons, que nom auons - proposées, & déduites : non seulement rccognoistront, que ce monde a Dieu pour auteur, & créateur: mais aussi pourront aisément faire euanouir tous les brouillards» que les Epicuriens pourroict ietter dessus, pour rembrouiller,& obscurcir:& les conuaincre de mensonge, & de fausseté, mais il ne faut pas demeurer là. Car nous ne deiffit uons aucunement douter, que Dieu ne dtU nous veuille occuper en ceste sainte medi'(iùmôn- cation,assauoir qu'en ses creatures,comme en des miroirs , nous contemplions les richesses infinies de fa bonté,fageise,& puissance; non pas seulement pour en prendre quelque mémoire, mais a cc que nous les raeditions,&ruminiós a bon esçient, pouc en auoir perpétuelle íbuenance: & pas meíne moien,que nous entrions çn la con* fiderationdenous mefmes, reputantque le tout a esté fait pour nous. Ce théâtre donc tant beau a ceste occafion a esté basti avec tant d'artifice, & orné de beauté, & distribué avec tel ordre: a ce qu'il noús fut un illustre tefmoignage de Dieu,qui en est le facteur.Et l'homme qui est mes^y-©a esté mis en ce domicile, ayant un sentiment de diuinité emprainten son ame:afirt que íê regardant & ouurant les yeux pour cõtémpler Tordre qui est en icelui,& considérant le conseil de telle construction, il cognoifl Dieu créateur de toutes choses, souuerainementpuissant,iustc & bon. C5me de fait il n'y a rien en vain en la nature, & les créatures estant diuerses,il y a diuerscs fins d'icelles. quelque diuersité qu'il y ait d'autant, qu'elles ont esté faites par la sapience de Dieu: nous deuons conclurre; non seulement que les fins font diuerses, mais aussi qu'elles font bonnes,& que c'est a nous de les fauoir, afin;que ce qui est faic pour nostre profit ne nous tourne a ruine, & perdition. Vrai est que l'imbecilité de nos entendemens ne peut paruenir a telíe perfection, a cause des ténèbres qui y font íúruenucs,par le pçchéj& ne péut bien entendre les causes des choses,ny les rapporter a leur droite fimitáty a que leur regard, 6 la considération de Tordre, qui est parmi elle nous peut grandement aider a la cognoissancc de Dieu, & de la vertu, c'est à dire pour aimer, & conseruer ordre, & moyen en toutes actions. Par ce que nous team- auonstraitc tantau premier liure.qu en cc de de foi fécond la sentence de S.Augustin est veriprescbit fice qUi est au i>{je ja cjté de Dieu. 11. c.S. on excepte, dit il, les paroles Prophétiques^ Le monde par fa mutabilité, mobilité ejr viabilité trefparee'.&defa forme treÇoelle, voire se taisant,pi'esche, ejr crie qu'il a esté fait, & que ce ne peut eíre que de Dieu souuerainement grand, & beau. Voici donc le premier enseignement de la foy, fuiuant Tordre de nature, íaçoitque ce ne soit leprincipal, aífauoir que de quelque costé- que nous íettions les yeux,il nous faut souuenir,que tout ce qui se présente est ceuvre de Dieu: Secondement il faut avec une religieuse péTee mediter,la fin pourquoy toutes choses font faites de Dieu. Les Stoiquesonc recogneu que les hommes, ont esté crééz pour Dieu,& le monde pour Thomme.suitiant cela Platon nous admoneste de mectre peine,que nous nous cognoiflions nous mesmes, & que nous nous íouuenions que touc ce qui est sous le cócauc de la Lune nous est assubiecti,par l'ordónáce de Dieu: a ce que quclquesfois,concre nostredevoir & dignité,nous ne nous assubiectisliós aux choses qui nous sont inférieures. Ces Philosophes , dont nous auons parlé, en sont venus là par ceste ràtiocination. Ce qui est fait, l'est pour quelque occasion necessairement. Car qui est celui tant inepte, & tellement oiseux qui s'essaie de faire quel- r°u" que chose pour néant dequoy il n'eíperc ^£ rapporterny vtilité,ny plaisir, ou commo ditéfcela se void par l'excmple de ceux qui. battissent des maisons, des villes, des nauires, ils commencent tousiours par la fin; & rapportent leur ourage a quelque fin. Si cela se void es hommes íages, qui a il au monde plus (âge que Dieu ? n'est ce pas la sapience mesme? Parquoy comme ainsi soit qu'il n'y ait rien en la nature des choses en vain, & que rien ne soit fait fans cause, il faut que ceci soit ferme, que l'Architecte de cest vniuers n'a entrepris témérairement, c'est à dire sans aucune cause destinée, de , parfaire cest ourage tant grand, & adrairable. Les tours, & conuersions, des cieus, le tour inuariable, & certain des choies, estas toutes séparées en genres, & espèces, admonestét, & enseignent qu'une chacune d'icellesa fa caufê. La sapience diuine donc a ordonné une fin ferme, & certaine. Que si les sens nous enseignent les fins des chofí m*- fcs ^es P^us petites, & les vsages admirables de fait combien au pris d'icelles deuous nous estimer ^a ^n ^c l'nornrslC excellente? Nous voions par expérience que le ciel, & la terre íêruent a la commodité, & vie des animaux: de la donc il est notoire que Dieu 2 fait lcCiel & la tere pour l'homme? Nous receuillons aussi que les animaux ont este faits pour l'homme, par cela qu'ils seruent aux hommes > tant pour les garder, & desendre, que pour leurs vsage, & nécessitez. Dont est aduenue, non íans cause, il a esté dit le Prince, & le chef de tous monobstant que pour raison du peché, íà códition lóit misérable, entánt qu'il est en son natufeuteit- rel. Si doneques l'homme est le Prince, & tenouchcf des creaturesj & si pour lui tout a esté créési íà condition est plus excellente, que celle des choses, qui ont corps, il est vrai semblable que non feulement fa. fin est plus , excellente , mais aussi qu'il a plu? grandes, & meilleures facilitez pour paruenir a. la íîn pour laquelle il a esté créé. icy nous au* rions deux points a traiter, l'un quelle est la íîn de l'homme 5 & de quels instrumens il doit vscr pour paruenir a ceste fin : mais nous en traiterons amplement au liure fuiuant, maintenant ce peu que nous auons touché suffira. Au reste il appert aslez clairement pour raison de l'vsage de ceste vie, & l'excellence de la nature de l'homme, qu'il n'a pas esté fait simplemêt pour ceste vie, car fa códition regarde bien plus haut que ceste nature. Cela s'apperçoit véritable en ce que rien ne doit estre prins pour l'vsage, & fin d'un autre qui soit meilleur, & plus excellent que ce pourquoi il est prins, comme si quelcun depend de Target pour paruenir aux honneurs, & dignitez. L'appetit de l'homme naturellement est porté a cela qu'il iuge lui estre profitable , & bon : a cela donc qu'il estime meilleur, & lui estre plus commode, il enclines & est porté avec plus de véhémence^ Parquoy il iugera lui estre meilleur ce pourquoy il fait quelque chofe. Or Dieu estant souucreinement sage a mis en foucraire degré, ce qui est plus excellent, & meilleurs 6 le reste pour cela. Dauátage ce en quoy acquiesce l'appetit d'une chacune choiê, agile efl digne, qu'a iceluy se rapportent toutes fl!*ci* les autres choiês. ce donc en quoy acquieffítíe ce l'éíprit de l'hóme a ce que bien lui soit, ceja cera ja gn principale d'icelui. Comme ainsi soit qu'il n'y ait rien en quoy, l'entendement & la cognoísance de l'homme puisse acquiesçer, que Dieu corne son bien: -il s'ensuit que la fin de l'homme est la cognoísance de Dieu. Nous disons dóc, que l'homme est orné d'une condition plus excellenteja ce quel'inclination de ía fin soit mise dans ía volonté, & soit instruite par l'entendemet de ceste fin laquelle cognoísance raugmente , & se monstre par vsage, expericnce, & doctrine, & parla considération de ce monde, & de ce qui est dedans, & dehors l'homme. Et de la vient que nous pouóds dire avec les Stoiques que l'homme a esté créé pour Dieu, assauoir a ce qu'il y eust qui entédíst, & cogneust ses ceu ures qui peust admirer, & par paroles exprimer ceste admirable prouidence, & raison de faire, & vertu de consommer toutes chosesfle sommaire dequoy est qu'il honore Dieu avec reuerence, & lc loue. Ec de saie l'homme contemplant les choses créées est amené par icelles a cela, qu'il est contraint de confesser qu'il y a quelqu'vn, qui les a faites, par la vertu duquel elles sont administrées : & de la il est nécessaire qu'il íbit eleué a la considération de la puissance, & diuinité éternelle. Car il faut que celui qui a tout créé íbit plus ancien que les créatures, & par ainsi éternel, & d'une incroyable vertu qui puisse suffire pour régie une si grande machine, & c'est ce que nous appelions Dieu. Premieremêt donc l'homme tant aítúTefprit dur, & pesant, par le seul regard des créatures & en l'ourage du monde, comme en un théâtre peut lire les marques de la gloire de la diuinité, voire les aueugles en cartonnant le peuuent attoucher, & trouuer, pource que par lui nous viuons, & auons rnouement, & sonv mes. Dieu est voiremen* inuisible, & incorporel: mais les choses invisibles d'icelui asavoir îa puissance eternelle, & îa diuinité se voient par la création du monde, que nous nous îouuenions donc, toutes fois & quantes que nous considérons les natures des choses, qu'il y a un Dieu auteur d'iceiles : lequel non feulement se monstre puis fane en creant de rien un si grand & si admirable bastimé"t3mais qui se présente journellement pour estre considéré de nous, car nous voyons par fa conduite maintenant que le ciel est esbranlé par la violence des tÓnerres,& la terre aulî,ores plusieurs choses estre bruflees, & consumées par les foudres, & feus qui tombent du ciel, tantost l'air estre tout enflamhé par l'efclair que fait le tonnerre, ou bien troublé de diuerses sortes de tempestes, & icelui quand il plait a Dieu en un momét sera in & beau. Item la mer laquelle semble menacer la terre d'un continuel degast par fa hauteur, comme suspendue en l'air estre réprimée: maintenant d'une façon espouventable par un mouuement impétueux & bruiant estre csineuë, & troublée, tantost estre rendue calme les ondes estant appaisees. Il seroit par trop long de reciter ceste infinité de choses tant au ciel qu'en la terre, qui tefmoignent fa fapienccCar celui qui obseruera les mouuemens des Astres, leurs sièges^ proprieté, trouuera aisément l'excellncedela science diuine. Semblablement en U structure 3 connexion, proportion, & beauté du corps humain, & viage d'icelui on n'en trouuera moins de eémoignages.Secondcmcntlaconfideration des choies, qui aduiennent contre le cours ordinaire de nature, ne nous suggèrent pas des argumens plus obscurs de fa vertu.Car nous voyons, qu'en l'administration de la société humaine il tempère tellement fx prouidence, que comme il est en vnc infinité de façons bénin enuers tous: tant y a qu'il demonstre fa clémence par indices manifestes a l'endroit des gens de bien, & a l'endroit des mesehans ía feuerité. Car les vengeances qu'il prend iouuellement des forfaits énormes ne font point obfcures,comme aussi fa fauegardej& deliurance a l'endroit des debonnaires.quand il fait prospérer leur voie par fa benediction,leur assiste en leur necessité,adoucist leurs douleurs , & les soustient en leurs afflictions, bref a foin de leur salut. & combien que tous les mesehans ne soient punis en ce monde, & que tous les gens de bien ne soient assistez d'enhaut, selon nostre iugement: tant y a que nous deons faire iugement, en la punition de quelques vns, qu'il gçn hupçle péché & ini<iuicé.Ôc a l'oppo; site du reste, & deons conclurreque puis qu'il est foucraïnemét iuste, qu'il reserue le loier& la punition a une autre vie aîàuoir au iour qu'il fera generale rétribution & rémunération. Au rcstesi l'on demande la cause qui a esmeu Dieu de creer le monde jce qui nous doit d'autat plus elmou uoir a l'aimer. Or ceste bonté se monstre manisestemér, en ce que estant tresbon& bienheureux, il a voulu neántmoins communiquer a ses créatures ceste béatitude: car la .nature du bon est telle,qu'elle s'expand, & se communique a plusieurs.Dieu dôcques présente a toutes ses créatures la participation de ía bonté, & béatitude autant que le capacité d'une chacune le peut porter, ceste communication se fait diuersment. Car celle qui se fait aux choses qui n'ont point de vie estfort petite: voire celle qui est faite aux animaux. Mais celle qui est faite aux hommes est plus notoire, & manifeste, or ceste communication ne se fait par aucune diuision, ou partage, d'autant que Dieu est împlc,& indiuisible: il communique donc quand il s'adiointJ& appli que tellement qu'il les engloutit, s'il íaut ainsi parler, en foi qui est infini, pour les rendre un avec soi. Car lors estans faits semblables a la nature,& condition diuine, & comme déifiez, ils font vraiment faits participans de ccste félicité inestimable, or a il créé les hommes propres pour ceste conionction jastauoirafonimage,c'estàdi- ^ . reil a donné aux hommes raison, intelli- \Maiîn gence,iugemenr, conseil, & les autres ver- , «**« tus par lesquelles il peut entendre quel est D^>i! son vrai bien, pour l'appetter,& désirer, & t*eUule désirant le chercher désirant d'estre conjoint avec lui.ccste vnion, & conionction ne se fait pas feló la chair,ou selon le corps: pource que Dieu n'est pas corporel, & l'homme aussi n'est pas dit homme selon le corps ains selon l'entendement qui habite au corps, & est participant de raison, & se fait par un íeul moyen; aflsauoir par amour,comme aussi la séparation se fait par la haine. L'amour donc l'a efmeu de nous créer,il nousrapelle par ramour,& rameiue a lui. Au demeurant il n« faut pas penser que Dieu ait créé le monde par quelque nécessité. Car Dieu estant trefparfait pouuoic demeurer en fa perfection íans icclur, mais il Parfait poussé de fa bóté,& clémence, ceste amour de la création se manifeste en la conseruation. Ces choses ont este veues,& cogneues: mais obscurement,par les Philosophes comme par Mercure, Orphée , Hésiode, Parmenides & les autres: juoint tenul'amour estre trefomeien de oy, & mis au sein du chaos auparauát que le monde futereé. Or que nous puissions paruenir a ceste vnion, & connexion, ta qualité & condition de nostreamen en est argument, & le monstre laquelle est faite & formée, de forte que naturellement elle désire le bon & le beau lequcl mouuement est appelle amour, que si l'intelligence est donnée a l'homme il cognoit ces choses obscurément a cause du péché,mais neantmoins il cognoit quelques choses, & qu'il ne peut penser rien plus excellent, plus grand, ny meilleur, & incontinent que ce iugement est fait l'amour s'enflambe a l'endroit de celui qui est tel.Mais il est nécessaire d'observer ceci,iaçoit que le regard des créatures nous inuite a cognoistre Dieu, & qu'en l'ouuragedu monde il y ait tant de lampes allumées qui nous eclairenc de toutes pars,pour manifester fa gloire,que toutesfois de foy elles ne peuuent pas nous amener a la droite voie, nous voions bien par expérience qu'elles produisent en nous quelques estincelles, mais qui sont suffoquées auparauant qu'elles espendent leur pleine splendeur. Car qui est celui d'entre nous lequel efleuant les yeux au ciel, ou bien regardant les régions de la terre, ou la cõposition ingénieuse du corps humain rapporte fa mémoire au créateur, & qui plustost laissant arriére le créateur ne s'arresteauxcreatures?qui est celui qui ne rapporte plustost a fortune, qu'a la prouidence de Dieu les choses qui aduiennent outre le cours ordinaire de nature? que si par la conduite de ces choses nous sommes menez a la considération de la Maiesté Diurne, toutesfois incontinent<[ue nous auons quelque sentiment de la diuinité, incontinent nous tombons, és resueries de nostre chair, & corrompons par nostre vanité la pure vérité de Dieu. Ce n'est point donc îans cause que 1* Apostre escriuant aux Hebrieux & aiant dit, que les siècles ont esté ordonnez pour estre faits demonstres des choses (nuisibles, adoute, que nous l'encendons par foy .signifiant par cela que voirement la Diuinité est représentée par tels spectacles, mais que nous n'auons pas des yeux pour l'appercevoir s'ils ne font illuminez par vue intérieure reuelation par foy. ceux donc qui font douez du dó de foy que ceste voye par les créatures leur soit droite pour chercher Dieu, non pas qu'avec une audace & curiosité ils essayent de pénétrer iufques a son essence, laquelle il faut plustost adorer., que curieusement «"/M rechercher: mais comme enseigne S.Au•44<sup>e</sup> gustin, d'autant que nous ne le pouuons appréhender defaillans sous fa grandeur, il nous faut auoir recours a ses oeuvres,asin que nous soyons rassasiez de fa bonté, & que nous le contemplions tellement en ses ceuvres, par lesquelles il ferend prochain, & familier,qu'avec un sentiment d'efficace il donne iufques a nostre esprit ravi en admiration. Sachons donc que lors nous appréhendons par vraye foy que Dieu est créateur du ciel & de la terre, si nous fui, uonscestc première règle vniuerfelle,quád apperceuans les notables marques que Dieu nous monstre en ses créatures nous ne les laissons, par un ingrat oubli, & mefcognoiffàncc. En aptes que nous apprenons de les nous appliquer tellement que nous en soions viuement touchez en noi cœurs. Saint Paul,escriuát aux Ephesiens, ¶6<sup>e</sup> spécifie ceste fin entre autres, quand il die 15 ainsi , Dieu nous a éleuz deuant la fondation du monde afin que nous soyons saints, & irrépréhensibles deuant lui en charité', le quel nous a predeñine\ pur mus adopter a soiparlesus chrifselon le bon plaisir de sa volonté a la, louange de la gloire de sa grâce, voila quand a nous, les autres choses comme elles sont diuersesraussi ont elles diuerses fins.Tant y a que c'est pour nous.Car Dieu acréé choses diuerses a ce, comme il a esté dit,que fa sapièce nous fust plus familière, & que par ce moyen nous eussions plus d'occasion de nous humilier pour le glorifier quand nous voions que cela est pour nostre profit, & vtilité. Outre plus afin que voians ceste diuersité de créatures fuiure neâtmoins cc pourquoy elles font,nous fussions d'autant plus aiguillonnez a fuiure ce pourquoy nous sommes faits, asiauoir la gloire de nostre créateur. Et comme nous voyons qu'il y a des créatures qui font bien , & les autres mal;de la nous deuous recueillir l'enormité du péché, & l'auoir en horreur comme estant cause de ce malheur. Au teste combien qu'il y en ait de petites, voire qui semblent estre de petite, ou nulle importance, si est-ce qu'il faut estre resoluz que rien n'est sans cause. Souuentcequi est petit, & en apparence contemptible, aura neantmoins grande vertu, & efficace. Ceux qui cognoiffent la nature,& propriété des herbes,des pierres,& autres créatures en peuuent rendre tefmoignage. Quand a celles qui font venimeuses,ou autrement nuisibles aux hommes/achons en premier lieu que le péché en est cause, & que ces animaux font produits de la terre íriant esté maudite» Dauantage iaçoit qu'elles soient nuisibles en une façon,clles font toutes-fois profitables en une autre. L'experience qu'en font journellement les Médecins en fait foi. Mais fur tout nous dcuons profiter en la fin desia touchée, &: reputer pour nostre consolation que Dieu a créé le monde, & en iceluy les hommes afin que d'iceux il recueillist une Eglise enuers laquelle il demonstrest fa bonté, justice, & miséricorde: par laquelle il fut serui, honoré, & inuoqué iuíqucs a la cósoœmation des siecles.tafchons donc de nousrengcr a ce troupeau,& si nous auons tefmoignage, & assurance d'en estre gardons que par nostre ingratitude nous n'en soions chassez.Car hors icelui il n'y a point de salut. Au reste vsions librement, & fans scrupule,& avec action de grâces des créatures , pource que tout ce qui est au ciel & en la terre a esté fait pour nous, ainsi qu'il appert par Tordre de la création, & par la déclaration qu'en a fait le créateur en fa . parole.Gar ce n'est point fans cause qu'il a distribué en six ioursla fabrique de cest vniuers, attendu qu'il ne lui eustpas esté plus difficile de le creer tout en un momét,. & le mettre en \i perfection qu'il est, que de l'amcner par degrez,& peu a peu en l'estat qu'il est: mai s il nous a voulu recommander fa prouidenec, & soin paternel en, ce que deuant que former l'homme, il lui a préparé tout ce, qu'il a preucu lui estre salutaire. Finalement toutes fois,& quante* que nous nommós Dieu créateur du Ciel, éc de la terre, qu'il nous vienne en memoire.que la difpefation de tout ce qu'il a créé est en fa main, & que nous sommes iês cnfansdefquels il a receus en fa protection,& îauuegarde,& pour lesnourrir,& entretenir: afin que nous attendions de lui la somme de tout bien, & espérons avec assurance qu'il ne nous lairra iamais auoir sau^ te des choies qui feront nécessaires pour noslrc salut, que nostre attente ne tende point ailleurs.Surtout que nostre cœur ne soit pas attaché ci bas, mais recognòiffans que nous y sommes comme pèlerins, & estrangers nostre principal but soit la vie bien heureuse & eternelle avec Iesus Christ nostre chef auquel aveclePere & le S.Esprit íoithonneur,lóuange, & gloire es siécles des siécles, amen.

Chapitre 10 - forter U considération^ & cognoijjance de la création du monde.

The Effects of the Divine Graces in the Soul. The Inestimable Greatness of One Degree of Glory

It is painful to me to recount more of the graces which our Lord gave me than these already spoken of; and they are so many, that nobody can believe they were ever given to one so wicked: but in obedience to our Lord, who has commanded me to do it, and you, my fathers, I will speak of some of them to His glory. May it please His Majesty it may be to the profit of some soul! For if our Lord has been thus gracious to so—miserable a thing as myself, what will He be to those who shall serve Him truly? Let all people resolve to please His Majesty, seeing that He gives such pledges as these even in this life.

In the first place, it must be understood that, in those graces which God bestows on the soul, there are diverse degrees of joy: for in some visions the joy and sweetness and comfort of them so far exceed those of others, that I am amazed at the different degrees of fruition even in this life; for it happens that the joy and consolation which God gives in a vision or a trance are so different, that it seems impossible for the soul to be able to desire anything more in this world: and, so, in fact, the soul does not desire, nor would it ask for, a greater joy. Still, since our Lord has made me understand how great a difference there is in heaven itself between the fruition of one and that of another, I see clearly enough that here also, when our Lord wills, He gives not by measure; and so I wish that I myself observed no measure in serving His Majesty, and in using my whole life and strength and health therein; and I would not have any fault of mine rob me of the slightest degree of fruition.

And so I say that if I were asked which I preferred, to endure all the trials of the world until the end of it, and then receive one slight degree of glory additional, or without any suffering of any kind to enter into glory of a slightly lower degree, I would accept—oh, how willingly!—all those trials for one slight degree of fruition in the contemplation of the greatness of God; for I know that he who understands Him best, loves Him and praises Him best. I do not mean that I should not be satisfied, and consider myself most blessed, to be in heaven, even if I should be in the lowest place; for as I am one who had that place in hell, it would be a great mercy of our Lord to admit me at all; and may it please His Majesty to bring me thither, and take away His eyes from beholding my grievous sins. What I mean is this,—if it were in my power, even if it cost me everything, and our Lord gave me the grace to endure much affliction, I would not through any fault of mine lose one degree of glory. Ah, wretched that I am, who by so many faults had forfeited all!

6. This is almost the same as the silent music. For though the music is inaudible to the senses and the natural powers, it is a solitude most full of sound to the spiritual powers. These powers being in solitude, emptied of all forms and natural apprehensions, may well receive in spirit, like a resounding voice, the spiritual impression of the majesty of God in Himself and in His creatures; as it happened to St. John, who heard in spirit as it were “the voice of harpers harping on their harps.”(Rev. 14):2 St. John heard this in spirit: it was not material harps that he heard, but a certain knowledge that he had of the praises of the blessed, which every one of them, each in his own degree of glory, is continually singing before God. It is as it were music. For as every one of the saints had the gifts of God in a different way, so every one of them sings His praises in a different way, and yet all harmonize in one concert of love, as in music.

7. In the same way, in this tranquil contemplation, the soul beholds all creatures, not only the highest, but the lowest also, each one according to the gift of God to it, sending forth the voice of its witness to what God is. It beholds each one magnifying Him in its own way, and possessing Him according to its particular capacity; and thus all these voices together unite in one strain in praise of God’s greatness, wisdom, and marvelous knowledge.

10. I now resume the explanation of the stanza, and inquire what day is meant by the “other day,” and what is it that God then gave the soul, and what that is which it prays to receive afterwards in glory? By “other day” is meant the day of the eternity of God, which is other than the day of time. In that day of eternity God predestined the soul to glory, and determined the degree of glory which He would give it and freely gave from the beginning before He created it. This now, in a manner, so truly belongs to the soul that no event or accident, high or low, can ever take it away, for the soul will enjoy for ever that for which God had predestined it from all eternity.

11. This is that which He gave it “the other day”; that which the soul longs now to possess visibly in glory. And what is that which He gave it? That what “eye has not seen nor ear has heard, neither has it ascended into the heart of man.” (1 Cor. 2:9) “The eye has not seen,” says Isaiah, “O God, beside You, what things You have prepared for them that expect You.” (Isa. 64:4) The soul has no word to describe it, so it says “what.” It is in truth the vision of God, and as there is no expression by which we can explain what it is to see God, the soul says only “that which You gave me.”

12. But that I may not leave the subject without saying something further concerning it, I will repeat what Christ has said of it in the Revelation of St. John, in many terms, phrases, and comparisons, because a single word once uttered cannot describe it, for there is much still unsaid, notwithstanding all that Christ has spoken at seven different times. “To him that overcomes,” says He, “I will give to eat of the tree of life, which is in the paradise of My God.” (Rev. 2:7) But as this does not perfectly describe it, He says again: “Be faithful to death; and I will give you the crown of life.” (Rev. 2:10)

Preface

LAST year, for my own spiritual benefit especially, I composed a “Gradual to ascend unto God from the Contemplation of created objects.” Now, since it hath pleased God to prolong my old age a little longer, I wish to meditate on that heavenly country to which all the sons of Adam ardently aspire, who dwell, lamenting and weeping, in this valley of death; and these meditations I desire to write, lest they perish. Wherefore in the Holy Scriptures, which may be compared to “Consoling Letters” sent unto us in this our exile from heaven by our Father, I find four names mentioned, from which we may in a manner learn what are the good things of that land. The names are: Paradise, Mansion, City, and Kingdom. Of Paradise St. Paul speaks: “I know a man in Christ above fourteen years ago such an one rapt even to the third heaven that he was caught up into paradise,” &c. Of the “Mansion” the Son of God himself speaks: In my Father’s house there are many mansions.” Of the “City” St. Paul speaks in his Epistle to the Hebrews: “But you are come to Mount Sion and the city of the living God, the heavenly Jerusalem.” Of the “Kingdom” there is mention made in St. Matthew: “Blessed are the poor in spirit, for theirs is the kingdom of heaven.” This name is continually occurring in the Holy Scripture. The abode of the saints in heaven is called a "Paradise," because it is a most beautiful place, abounding in delights. But because men might suppose that paradise was a garden placed near a house, which could contain but few people, the Holy Spirit has added the name, "House," because it is a royal mansion, a great palace, wherein, besides a garden, there are halls, couches, and many other excellent things. But because a house, however large, cannot contain many people, and lest we should think that very few will possess eternal life, the Scripture adds the word "City," which contains many gardens and many palaces. But since St. John, speaking of the number of the blessed, saith: "After this I saw a great multitude which no man could number." And as, moreover, no city can contain an innumerable multitude, the word "Kingdom" is used, to which is added, "the kingdom of heaven," than which no place in the whole universe is more boundless and extensive. But, again, since in a most extensive kingdom there are many who never see each other, nor know their names, nor whether they ever existed; and since it is certain that all the blessed behold each other, and know each other, and converse familiarly with one another as friends and relations: therefore the Scriptures, not content with the name of "Kingdom," added that of a "City," that we might know its inhabitants are truly citizens of the saints, and as familiar, and as closely united together, as the inhabitants of the very smallest city. But, in order that we might likewise remember, that these happy men are not only citizens of the saints, but also friends of God, therefore the Holy Spirit calls that a "House," which it also named a "City." In fine, because all the blessed in heaven abound in delights, it is likewise called "Paradise." Hence these four words: Kingdom, House, City, Paradise mean one and the same thing; and the Paradise is so extensive, that it can truly be called a House, City, and Kingdom. Wherefore, concerning this most blessed place I will first, under the word "Kingdom; then under that of a "City;" afterwards under that of a "House;" and, lastly, under the word "Paradise" meditate in the chamber of my heart; and, with God's assistance, commit to writing what He shall please to suggest unto me.

Book I (the Kingdom of Heaven)*Chapter I

The Extent Of The Kingdom Of God WE may learn How important is a knowledge of the kingdom of heaven from this circumstance, that Christ, our heavenly Master, began His preaching with these words: "Do penance, for the kingdom of heaven is at hand." He also delivered nearly all His parables concerning the kingdom of heaven, saying, "The kingdom of heaven is likened" &c. And after His resurrection, during the forty days before His ascension, appearing to His disciples, He spoke to them of the kingdom of God, as St. Luke mentions in the Acts of the Apostles. This kingdom therefore formed the beginning, continuation, and end of the discourses of Christ. But I do not intend to enter upon all the points connected with heaven, but only to explain those that relate to the "place and state" of the Blessed. In the first place, I will endeavour to show why the "habitation" of the blessed is called the "kingdom of heaven" in the Holy Scriptures. The habitation of the saints is called a kingdom for many reasons. First, because it is a land the boundless extent of which cannot be conceived by human imagination. This earth, though but a point, as it were, in comparison with heaven, contains many and great kingdoms that can scarcely be numbered: how great, therefore, must that “one kingdom” be, which extends throughout the length and breadth of the heaven of heavens! But the kingdom of heaven does not only include the heavenly region, but also the whole extent of it. This heavenly country, which is properly called the kingdom of heaven, is the first “province,” as it were, of the kingdom of God, in which the highest princes reside, who are all the sons of God. The second province may be called aetherial, in which the stars dwell; all of which, though not animate, yet are so obedient to the voice of their Creator, that they may be said to be living creatures, according to Ecclesiasticus, “Come, let us adore the King, for whom all things live.” The third province is aerial, in which winds and clouds pass, and storms, rain, snow, hail, thunder, and lightning are produced, and where birds of various kinds sport and fly. The fourth province is watery, and contains seas, fountains, and lakes, in which fishes multiply, “that pass through the paths of the sea.” The fifth is earthly, which, emulous as it were of heaven, contains the most noble inhabitants, but not the most blessed; I mean men, endowed with reason, but mortal; these have dominion over the beasts of the earth and the fishes of the sea. The last province is subterraneous, which, like the desert of Arabia, produces no good fruit whatever, but only thorns and briars; there wicked spirits dwell on account of their pride; they wished to be the first, but they became last; they strove to exalt their throne above the stars of heaven, but they were cast down to the lowest hell. And here, also, those will be confined, who, having imitated the wickedness of those bad spirits, die without true repentance. Now, all these provinces God rules by His power, of whom the Psalmist speaks, “All things serve Thee.” This vast and mighty kingdom God will share with those that love Him. Wherefore, Christian soul, rejoice, and be not confined within the narrow limits of things present. Why dost thou labour and toil so much, merely to gain a small part of this world, whilst, if thou wish, thou canst possess the whole? Truly, if men would seriously aspire after this kingdom, if they would attentively meditate upon it, they would blush to wage war for such narrow portions of the earth. Man! God offers thee the possession of His immense and eternal kingdom,, whilst thou fightest for one small city, wherein many crimes are committed, and other innumerable sins, by which the King of Kings is justly provoked to anger. Where is thy prudence? Where thy judgment? But I do not speak in this manner as if I supposed, that it was unlawful for Christians to enter into war for the defence of their cities. I know that just wars are allowed, not only by the holy Fathers, (especially St. Austin and St. Thomas, the prince of scholastic writers,) but also by the precursor of our Lord “greater than whom hath not arisen amongst those born of woman.” He said to the soldiers not that they should desert their service as being unlawful, but that, being content with their pay, they should “do violence to no man.” In my “Controversies” I have also defended just wars. I do not therefore speak against war simply in itself; but I exhort you to follow that which is more perfect, and often more useful, according to what St. Paul says to the Corinthians: “Already indeed there is plainly a fault among you, that you have lawsuits one with another. Why do you not rather hate wrong? Why do you not rather suffer yourselves to be defrauded?” (1 Epist. to Corinthians v. 7.) And St. James adds in his Epistle: “From whence are wars and contentions among you? Are they not hence from your concupiscence? You covet, and have not: you kill, and envy, and cannot obtain. You contend and war, and have not, because you ask not.” (chap, iv.) Whoever earnestly aspires after the kingdom of heaven, would not easily be moved to war by the loss of one city; but he would seek after those who could settle the dispute without expense and danger. But let us proceed to other points.

Chapter II

The Inhabitants Of The Kingdom Of God

THE kingdom of heaven is called a “Habitation” because it contains such a multitude of different inhabitants; no palace or city, but only large kingdoms contain such numbers. There, as St. Paul tells us in his Epistle to the Hebrews, are many thousands of angels; there also are “the spirits of the Just made perfect,” to whom belong all who have departed in the Lord from Abel, even to the last good man that will die at the end of the world. But not only will the souls of the Just be there, but also their glorious bodies, each of which shall shine like the sun in the kingdom of their Father, as our Lord assures us in St. Matthew. With regard to the angels, we who live on this earth scarcely know anything of them but their names. We learn from the vision of the prophet Isaias, (chap, vi.) that some are called Seraphim, and others Cherubim: some Thrones, others Dominations: some Principalities, others Powers, as St. Paul mentions in his Epistle to the Colossians: (chap. i. ver. 16.) in his Epistle to the Ephesians he also speaks of "Virtues," and in another place, Archangels are spoken of: Angels are finally ranked amongst them, of whom there is so frequent mention throughout the Holy Scriptures. From these nine names, it is the unanimous opinion of learned doctors, that there are nine "orders" of angels, each of which contains many thousands, according to the prophet Daniel: "Thousands of thousands ministered to him, and ten thousand times a hundred thousand stood before him." (chap. vii. 10.) And Job asks: "Is there any numbering of his soldiers?" But although all the angels are doubtless most happy, and wonderfully resplendent (according to Alban Butler, Sept. 29th, on St. Michael, These are two pure Hebrew words; the first means "to burn, or burn up;" the second, "to be like the Most High) with the glory of every divine gift, yet those are called "Seraphim" who burn with the flames of love: the others "Cherubim" who shine with the splendour of knowledge: those are named "Thrones" who enjoy an inexpressible tranquillity in the divine contemplation: those "Dominations" who rule this lower world, as the ministers of a mighty commander: others "Powers," because they do signs and wonders by the command of their Almighty Lord: others "Principalities," because they have power over the kings and princes of the world: some again are named "Archangels," because they assist the prelates of the Church: and many, in fine, are called "Angels," since they are the guardians and protectors of all that live upon the earth. But these are not the only significations of the names of the angels:" they are also images or representations of the greatness of God: thus the seraphim, by their burning love, represent as it were in a glass, the infinite love of God which alone induced Him to create the angels, man, and all other creatures, whom He still preserves. The cherubim in like manner represent the infinite wisdom of God, which hath regulated all things by number, weight, and measure. The thrones also, by a perfect image as it were, show us that profound "rest" which God enjoys on His throne; who, whilst all things are in motion, remains unalterable, tranquilly ruling and directing events. The dominations too tell us, that it is God who alone truly rules all things, because He alone can either preserve them, or annihilate them. The virtues convince us, that it is God "who alone doth wonderful things" and who hath reserved to himself alone to renew signs, and to multiply wonders. The powers signify by their name, that God alone is absolutely and truly powerful, to whom nothing is impossible, because in Him alone true power resides. The principalities signify, that God is the Prince over the kings of the earth, the King of kings, and Lord of lords. The archangels signify, that God is the true High Priest of all the churches. The angels, that God is the true Father of orphans; and that although He hath given His angels to be our guardians, He himself is present with each one, to guard and protect him. The prophet who has said, "He hath given his angels charge over thee, to keep thee in all thy ways," introduces the Almighty thus speaking: "I am with him in tribulation, I will deliver him, and I will glorify him." (Psalm xc.) And our Lord, who had said, "their angels in heaven always see the face of my Father who is in heaven" has also added: "Are not two sparrows sold for a farthing; and not one of them shall fall upon the ground without your Father. But the very hairs of your head are all numbered. Fear not therefore; better are you than many sparrows." (St. Matthew, chap. x. 29, &c.) Such are the few points that we know about the angels, concerning whom you may read St. Bernard on "Consideration" from whom I have taken these details. With these nine orders of the angels, correspond on the other hand that multitude of holy men, which no one can number, as we learn from the Apocalypse. This multitude contains also nine "orders;" for some are patriarchs, some prophets, some apostles, some martyrs and confessors; whilst others are pastors, doctors, priests, Levites, monks, and hermits, holy women, virgins, widows, or married people. Wherefore, my soul, I beseech thee to consider what great happiness it will be, to be united with such great saints! St. Jerome mentions, that he visited many provinces, and many people, and crossed many seas, that he might see and hear those celebrated men, whom he had known by their works. Queen of Saba came from the ends of the earth to hear the wisdom of Solomon; and to St. Antony, the hermit, men hastened from all parts, being moved by the fame of his sanctity: even Emperors themselves courted his friendship. But what will it be to behold hereafter so many angels, so many just men, to be united with them in the closest friendship, and to be made partakers of their happiness? Were we to behold, in this our exile, one angel arrayed in all his beauty, who would not eagerly wish to meet him? What therefore must it be, to behold all the angels in one place? And if only one of the prophets, apostles, or doctors of the Church were to descend from heaven, with what curiosity and attention would he be heard! Now in the kingdom of God, we shall be allowed to behold not one only, but all the prophets, apostles, and doctors, with whom we shall continually hold sweet converse. How greatly does the sun rejoice the whole earth: but what will be the glory from innumerable Suns in the kingdom of God, all animate, intelligent, and exulting in their joy! This union with the angels and men, all of whom are most wise and excellent, appears to me so delightful, that I consider it alone will be a great happiness, and on this account, would willingly be deprived of all the pleasures of this life.

Chapter III

The Monarchical Form Of The Kingdom Of God

THE third reason why it is called a "Kingdom" is, because there alone is to be found a perfect form of government. There is this difference between a kingdom and a republic: in the former the supreme power is possessed by one person: in the latter it is divided amongst many. But in the kingdoms of this world, supreme power in the true and proper sense of the word, cannot exist. For although a king, without the advice or consent of others, can command something to be done; yet it cannot be accomplished without the approbation of his subjects. It even often happens that he cannot give a command, or at least will not dare to do so, should all his subjects be against him. How many great kings and emperors have there been, who were either deserted by their army, or put to death! History is full of such examples. Supreme power therefore is useless to the kings of this world, because they can never execute anything, unless their subjects approve of it. But the power of God, who is truly and essentially King of kings, dependeth upon no one, but His own will: and since He is omnipotent, He can do all things; neither doth He stand in need of soldiers, arms, or any external aid. And when He makes use of the ministration of angels, men, or even inanimate things, He does so because He wills, not because he requires them. For He who without any assistance made heaven and earth, and all things therein, by His only word, and who preserves them by His will, can also govern them by His power alone. But God reigns in the truest sense of the word, not only because He possesses supreme power; but also because He alone knows how to govern: He stands not in need of any council, or ministers of state. "Who hath known the mind of the Lord? or who hath been his counsellor?" says St. Paul: and before him the prophet Isaias: "Who hath forwarded the Spirit of the Lord? or who hath been his counsellor, and hath taught him? With whom hath he consulted, and who hath instructed him, and taught him the path of justice, and taught him knowledge, and showed him the way of understanding?" (chap. xl. 13, 14;) Wherefore a monarchy, which is the best form of government, is to be found in God alone in its true and perfect nature. He is not only "terrible over all the kings of the earth," as it is said in the Psalms; but He is also "King above all gods," as it is expressed in another place. Others are false gods or rather devils, according the prophet: "All the gods of the Gentiles are devils." (Psalm xcv.) Some are gods by participation, as the kings of the earth and the angels of heaven, thus "I have said: You are gods and all of you the sons of the Most High." (Psalm lxxxii.) But all these gods are under the power of that God, who reigneth in heaven: He alone then is truly a great king. This Nabuchodonosor, king of Babylon, acknowledged in these words, after he had suffered a most severe punishment for his pride: "Now at the end of the days of Nabuchodonosor lifted up my eyes to heaven, and my sense was restored to me: and I blessed the most High, and I praised and glorified Him that liveth for ever: for his kingdom is an everlasting power, and his kingdom is to all generations. And all the inhabitants of the earth are reputed as nothing before him: for He doth according to his will, as well with the powers of heaven, as among the inhabitants of the earth: and there is none that can resist His hand, and say to him: Why hast thou done it?" (Daniel, chap. iv. 31, &c.) Thus he spoke, giving us all an example to humble ourselves under the powerful hand of God, as St. Peter admonishes us: and to be more delighted with serving the King of kings, that we may experience His goodness, than proudly to resist His will, lest we be forced to feel the weight of His avenging hand.

Chapter IV

All The Blessed Are Kings

THE fourth reason (and a very powerful one) why heaven is called a kingdom is because all the Blessed in heaven are kings, and all the conditions of being such most aptly apply to them. For although the saints in heaven serve God, as it is mentioned in the Apocalypse, yet at the same time they reign also; for in the same book, and in the same chapter, where it is said, "His servants shall serve Him a little lower we are told that "They shall reign forever and ever." (chap. xxii.) But all the Blessed will not only serve and reign at the same time; they will also be called servants and sons. Thus God speaks in the Apocalypse: "He that shall overcome shall possess these things, and I will be his God, and he shall be my son.” (chap. xxi. 7.) Wherefore, as they can be both servants and sons, so also they can be both servants and kings; they are servants because they were created by God, to whom they owe obedience, and from whom they receive their being, and all things else; and David makes no exception when he says: “All creatures serve him.” They are also the sons of God, since they were born of God by water and the Holy Spirit; they are kings, too, because they have received the dignity from the King of kings, who is called by this name in the Apocalypse, “King of kings, and Lord of lords.” (chap. xix. 16.) But it may perhaps be said, that it is not difficult for one to be both a king of the earth, and a servant of God, for thus the Psalmist speaks: And now, ye kings, understand, receive instruction, you that judge the earth. Serve ye the Lord with fear: and rejoice unto him with trembling.” (Ps. ii.) But to be a king in the kingdom of heaven, and a servant of the King of heaven who can understand or comprehend this? And yet such is the truth, which faith believes and understands. The just, therefore, will also be kings in the kingdom of heaven, because they will be made partakers of the royal dignity, and power, and riches, &c., of that kingdom. This is what the Holy Spirit clearly teaches us, especially in three passages from the Scripture; the first of which occurs in St. Matthew: ”Blessed are the poor in spirit, for theirs is the kingdom of heaven.” (chap. v.) In another part: ”Come, ye blessed of my Father, possess you the kingdom prepared for you from the foundation of the world.” (St. Matthew, chap, xxv.) The third passage is from the Apocalypse: “To him that shall overcome I will give to sit with me on my throne: as I also have overcome, and have sat down with my Father in His throne.” (chap, iii.) What can be clearer than these words? The kingdom of heaven is promised the possession of it will be given to us at the last day we shall have a seat on the royal throne of the Son of God, and of His Father, our eternal King: what is this but a participation of the same kingdom, which God possesses from eternity? St. Paul also adds his testimony: “If we suffer, we shall reign with Him;” and St. John likewise, in the beginning of the Apocalypse: “I, John, your brother, and your partner in tribulation, and in the kingdom.” &c. And St. James, in his Epistle: ”Hath not God chosen the poor in this world, rich in faith, and heirs of the kingdom which God hath promised to them that love Him?” (chap. ii. 5.) But the kingdom of heaven is not lessened, because it is divided amongst innumerable angels and men. This kingdom is not like the kingdoms of the world, which cannot well be divided; but should they be distributed into parts, the division weakens them, and at length they are destroyed. But not so with the kingdom above, which is perfectly possessed by all, and wholly by each one, just as the sun is seen by all and each of the inhabitants of earth, whom it equally enlightens and vivifies. But this point will be more easily understood when we explain the good things that are to be found in the kingdom of heaven. We must now dwell on the conditions or qualities which are required in kings, so that we may be convinced the saints and blessed spirits can justly be called the Kings of the kingdom of heaven. There are two qualities especially necessary for kings: Wisdom and Justice. But with wisdom the Scripture joins prudence and counsel, and all other things that relate to intelligence; with justice are united mercy, clemency, and other virtues that adorn and perfect the will. Wisdom, therefore, is required that the king may have knowledge; justice, that he may govern his subjects with equity. On this account, Solomon, in the beginning of his reign, being admonished by God to ask for what he wished, asked for wisdom, which is the chief of all the virtues required in kings. His petition was acceptable before God, as we read in the third Book of Kings, and therefore he obtained what he prayed for. Would that he had asked for justice also: perhaps he would not then have fallen into so many crimes. But more justly does David speak in that psalm, where he prays for blessings on Solomon his son: ”Give to the king thy judgment, God; and to the king’s son thy justice.” (Psalm Ixxi.) From these words it appears that he fore saw Solomon would ask for wisdom, and therefore David prayed that “justice and judgment” might be given to him, which without wisdom cannot exist, although wisdom, though but imperfectly, may exist without justice. The Book of Wisdom, which was written for the instruction of kings, thus speaks: ”Love justice, you that are judges of the earth.” (chap, i.) It commences from “justice,” because it is not only in itself necessary for kings, but also because it disposes us to receive wisdom. Thus, a little lower, it adds: ”For wisdom will not enter into a malicious soul, nor dwell in a body subject to sin.” In fine, Jeremias, foretelling the virtues of Christ, the eternal King says: ”Behold, the days come, saith the Lord, and I will raise up to David a just branch: and a king shall reign and be wise, and shall execute judgment and justice in the earth.” (chap, xxiii. 5.) Truly, therefore, are “wisdom and justice required in kings.” Now every one must acknowledge, that all the blessed in heaven, though they may have been whilst on earth simple and ignorant, are now possessed of the deepest wisdom, and so eminently endowed with the virtue of justice, that they might justly become kings of any kingdom. For all the blessed behold the very essence of God Himself, which is the "first cause" of all things; and thereby, from this fountain of uncreated wisdom, they drink in such wisdom as neither Solomon nor any other mortal possessed, except our Lord Jesus Christ, who, even during the time of His mortal life, saw God, for in Him "were hid all the treasures of wisdom and knowledge." But, besides the wisdom which the blessed possess, there is also given to them a full measure of justice, so that they can never sin, nor even wish to sin; thus St. Augustin speaks: "The first liberty of the Will was, to be able not to commit sin, but the last will be much greater, not to be able to sin." But he who cannot commit sin, cannot be unjust; and since perfect charity is the same as perfect justice, as St. Augustine asserts, "he who loves not God with the greatest and most perfect love, cannot possess the perfect justice. Now, they who behold God that infinite and pure Being cannot certainly turn away from Him, but they must ever love Him with the most ardent love; whence it follows, that all the saints in heaven are perfectly wise, perfectly just, and therefore most proper to reign. Arise then, my soul, and as far as possible consider, what happiness it will be to reign with God! And thus -to omit other considerations penetrate heaven itself on the wings of contemplation, and behold that glorious throne of which our Saviour speaks: "To him that shall overcome, I will give to sit with me on my throne, as I also have overcome, and have sat down with my Father in His throne" (Apoc. chap. iii, 21.) How great will the glory be for that just soul to be placed with such an infinite multitude of angels, on the very throne of Christ and of God! And by His just judgment to be proclaimed a conqueror over the world, and the rulers thereof, and all invisible powers! And how will this soul exult with gladness, when, delivered from every toil and danger, she shall behold herself gloriously triumphant over all her enemies! What more will she desire, when she shall be made a partaker of all the gifts of her Lord, even of a participation of His throne and Kingdom? Oh, how zealously do they fight on earth, and with what patience do they bear all things for the love of Christ, who, with a lively faith and a sure hope, contemplate such divine honours in heaven!

Chapter V

The Happiness Enjoyed In The Kingdom Of God

THE fifth reason, it appears to me, why heaven is called a kingdom is, because the good things enjoyed by the blessed seem something like those possessed by the kings of the earth; but they are so much greater and more excellent as heaven is superior to earth. Wherefore, the kingdom that is prepared for the blessed is not simply called a "kingdom," but the "kingdom of heaven," that so we may understand the difference between the pleasures of each: the one being limited, base, mean, and temporal; whilst the others are boundless, noble, spiritual, and above all, eternal. The goods of an earthly kingdom are considered to be, power, honour, riches, and pleasures. An earthly monarch can command his subjects; and if they obey him not, he can imprison them, banish them, fine them, scourge them, or put them to death. Hence kings are feared by the people, for they appear, as it were, to be gods. Again, kings wish to be honoured with almost a supernatural veneration, by the knee being bent before them, as if in adoration; and often they will not deign to listen to us, unless we bow down to the earth; and whenever they appear in public, they wish every one to make way for them. In addition to this, they require a large "exchequer," full of gold and silver; neither do they count their money by hundreds or thousands of pounds, but by ten hundred thousands; and with reason, since they are obliged to support, not ten or twenty servants, but to lead whole armies forth against their enemies. Lastly, they do not condescend to indulge in ordinary amusements, but only in those which they suppose become their royal majesty such as banquets, hunting, and the theatre on which they squander immense sums of money. Now these are the chief pleasures which earthly princes possess; and all of them are short and fading, since they begin with life, and end in death; unless it should sometime happen, that their life was of longer continuance than their kingdom. But, moreover, these pleasures are not pure, because power is joined with infirmity, honour with ignominy, riches with poverty, and joy with sorrow and affliction. The power of a prince is such, that the people should depend on the will of their prince; but power is infirm, because the prince depends on the strength and resources of his people. What can a king do in capturing or defending a city, if the people are either unwilling or unable to assist him? But a prince depends not only on the resources of his subjects, but also on walls, fortifications, arms, engines of war, and "money," which is called the nerves of war. Wherefore the people depend on the pleasure of their prince, and serve him alone; the prince, on the contrary, depends on many men and many things, all of which he is obliged to employ. In fine, a king can imprison, banish, or put to death his subjects; but a king also (I speak de facto, not de jure) can be imprisoned, banished, &c. Julius Caesar, Caius, Nero, Galba, Yitellius, Domitian, Commodus, Heliogabalus, &c., afford examples of this truth. And not only these who were so wicked, but also those of much milder dispositions, such as Alexander Mammssas, Gordianus the younger, Pertinax, Tacitus, Numerianus, Probus, Gratian, Valentinian the second, not to mention St. Edward the Confessor, St. Wenceslaus, king of Bohemia, St. Sigismund, king of Burgundy, St. Canute, king of Denmark, &c. Let us now speak of their honours. Whilst kings are present before others, they are certainly honoured and respected; but when absent, they are often ridiculed and spoken against: even when present, many praise them with their lips, whilst they despise them with their heart, so that, if the number of those that praise them and those that revile them could be counted, the latter would be found more numerous than the former. Truly, therefore, the ignominy of kings is often greater than their glory, since few are those who honour their dignity when present, but many accuse them when absent of avarice, and others of cruelty, others of luxury, &c. But perhaps the riches of kings are pure, without any admixture of poverty. No, for none are so poor as kings; they have immense incomes and great treasures, but their debts and expenses are much greater. He that possesseth little is not so poor as one who desireth many things, because he stands in need of them. And is it not a great proof of poverty when kings beg a mite, as it were, from the poor themselves, by exacting as taxes what is necessary for their support? I do not speak thus as if I wished to blame the exaction of tributes, for I know it is just they should be paid to kings, according to what St. Paul says in his Epistle to the Romans: "Wherefore be subject not only for wrath, but also for conscience's sake. For therefore, also, you pay tribute. For they are the ministers of God, serving unto this purpose. Render therefore to all men their dues. Tribute to whom tribute is due, custom to whom custom is due" (chap. xiii.) But I merely wished to show the miserable condition of kings, who, although they abound in riches, are yet compelled to collect a part of them from the poor and destitute. But what shall we say of their pleasures? Kings have certainly gardens, orchards, sumptuous banquets, hunting, &c., and whatever else can amuse them; but they also have the gout, head-aches, complaints in the liver; and what is more distressing, the most painful cares of the mind, which deprive them whole nights of sleep, together with suspicions, fears, and anguish. If the doors of their chambers creak at night, they suspect treachery; if an armed multitude have been seen, a desertion is apprehended. Thus, joy is mixed with sorrow, and rest interrupted by care; this is the reason why many have resigned their crown, that they might lead a private life. But let us hear how St. John Chrysostom, in one of his Homilies to the people of Antioch, speaks of the kings of his time: "Look not at the diadem, but at the multitude of cares; look not at the purple, but at the soul, blacker than the purple itself. The crown does not so much circle the head, as cares do the soul. Neither consider the troops of attendants, but the multitude of troubles. For no private house can be found so full of cares as a palace: every day deaths are expected, but in the night one cannot tell how often the soul is terrified, and thinks it is about to depart. And all this in time of peace. But when a war breaks out, what can be more miserable than life? How many dangers befall friends and subjects!" The royal pavement is always sprinkled with the blood of relations. If you wish me to relate some facts, you will perhaps acknowledge them. I will tell you some that happened in our own time. One king having suspected his wife of adultery already the mother of many kings, bound her naked, and delivered her to the beasts of the mountain. What a life do you suppose he must have led? He would not surely have taken such a terrible revenge, unless he had been consumed by some disease. This same person murdered his own son also, but being seized, he destroyed himself. After this, another was taken away by poison; and his son, although he had done no injury, was deprived of his sight for fear of the future consequences. Another (but I cannot mention his name) ended his life very miserably; he was burned to death with his chariots and horses, &c. No one can express the sorrows he was obliged to endure, when he came to the throne. And the present king who now rules, when he was crowned with the diadem, did he not begin to be surrounded with toil, danger, sorrow, and treachery? But such is not the state of the kingdom of heaven.

The state of the kingdom of heaven, we shall now see. The kings of the kingdom of heaven, who all live in happiness with God, possess power without infirmity, honour without ignominy, riches without poverty, pleasure without pain; for of them the Psalmist speaks: "There shall no evil come to thee: nor shall the scourge come near thy dwelling" (Psalm xc.) And in the Apocalypse: "God shall wipe away all tears from their eyes; and death shall be no more, nor mourning, nor crying, nor sorrow shall be any more, for the former things are passed away.” (ch. xxi. 4.) Wherefore exceeding great is the power of these heavenly kings, without the least admixture of infirmity. One angel, without an army, without swords and spears, instantly slew one hundred and eighty-five thousand Assyrians; neither was he afraid of being wounded by any of the soldiers. St. Gregory relates in his Dialogues that a certain holy man, when the executioner with uplifted arm was about to behead him, exclaimed, “St. John, save me!” and immediately the executioner could neither move nor stir his hand in any way. St. John therefore heard the prayer of his client; and with such quickness was the executioner struck, that the stroke, though just falling, was prevented. Such then is the power of the kings of heaven, that neither the distance of place, nor the situation in which this just but defenceless man was placed, nor the multitude of armed enemies, could prevent St. John from delivering him from instant death. Numerous examples of the like nature could be mentioned. The honour these heavenly kings possess is so great, that not only good men, but the wicked also, and even devils, are forced to respect them. Many there are who despised and spurned these holy men whilst they were upon earth; but afterwards they honoured and venerated them when translated to heaven, especially if the Church by a public decree numbered them among the saints: and even the demons themselves, who were wont to harass the saints with temptations when living in the flesh; and even, by the permission of God, to beat them with many stripes, now fear their relics and images since they reign with God. What shall I say of the riches these kings enjoy? “Their great treasure is, to want nothing, because God is all in all.” He is not rich who possesseth many things; but he who desireth nothing, because he standeth in need of nothing: the soul ought to be rich, but not the coffers; heaven and earth and all things therein, contribute to the riches of the saints, for what do not they possess who are “heirs of God, and joint-heirs with Christ?” and whom the Father hath appointed “heirs of all things?” There now remain but the pleasures which the blessed enjoy in heaven: these are pure and sweet, without any ingredient of sorrow or affliction: we have already heard from the Apocalypse, that God will wipe away all tears from their eyes, and that sorrow and mourning will be no more. But on this point we shall dwell more at length, when we speak of Paradise. We have now seen, that the good things which the blessed and all the saints will enjoy in heaven together, are such, that they can in no way be compared with the pleasures of earth; especially since the latter are temporary, the former eternal.

What Importance Men Attach To Earthly Kingdoms, And What Importance Ought To Be Attached To The Kingdom Of Heaven

LET us now consider with what eagerness men seek after earthly kingdoms; though insignificant, frail, and full of care and trouble, that hereby we may be convinced with what ardour our heavenly Kingdom ought to be desired and sought after. The passion for dominion, without doubt far exceeds all other passions; for a kingdom is not one individual “good,” but a collection of all those pleasures which are so much prized by men. These are, power, honour, riches, and delights, as we have already seen; there is the liberty of living just as we please, which is naturally pleasing not only to man, but also to beasts; there is excellence, and a kind of divinity as it were, on account of which kings have no equals in their government, but are superior to all, above all, and are revered by all. Hence it is, that when kings wish to make a promise, they can find nothing greater than half of their kingdom. Thus Assuerus addressed Esther: “What wilt thou, Esther? What is thy request? If thou should even ask one half of the kingdom, it shall be given thee.” (Esther v. 3.) And Herod said to Herodias: “Whatsoever thou shalt ask I will give it thee, though it be the half of my kingdom.” Hence it is, that to possess or extend kingdoms, men consider it lawful to throw aside every right; nor is there anything so sacred which they will not violate for the sake of reigning. The very first individual who unjustly waged war against his friends and neighbours, was Ninus: he broke through every law, just and unjust, that he might enlarge his kingdom, as St. Augustine testifies. Julius Caesar was the first to oppress his country, which he did for the sake of being emperor. Maximinus the Thracian slew Alexander by his soldiers, that he might succeed to the empire, although he had received from him many and great benefits. Philip the Arabian did the same also to Gordian the emperor. But the lust of reigning arms man, not only against neighbours and benefactors, but also against brothers, nephews, and even fathers. Thus Romulus killed his brother Remus, and Caracalla his brother Geta. Athalia slew all the children of Ochozias her son, who was king, that so she might obtain the crown. Thus the desires of sovereignty impels not only men, but also females to commit the most shocking crimes. Sinochus, a Persian, contrived to murder his father and brother, in order that he alone might reign. But why do I mention these instances? the mother of Nero, when the astrologer told her that her son would be emperor, but that she would be destroyed by him, is reported to have exclaimed, "Let him destroy me, provided he may reign!" Wherefore, this ambitious woman considered the kingdom to be of such importance to her son, that she preferred it to her own life. But this thirst for ruling not only makes injustice, to be justice, and arms man against a brother, nephew, and parent, but it also violates the sacred obligation of an oath, (which has always been considered most obligatory by every nation, even by the most cruel enemies,) when a throne is in view. If we are to give credit to Cicero, we are told that Julius Caesar was always accustomed to repeat these words of Euripides: "If an oath is to be violated, it may be violated for the sake of reigning: in other matters, cultivate piety." I omit innumerable other examples which demonstrate to all ages, that nothing what ever is prized more by men than a kingdom; and yet, not only do kings reign but for a short period, but also every kingdom will quickly be utterly destroyed; whilst the kingdom of the blessed shall alone remain for ever. Hear the prophet Daniel: "But in the days of those kingdoms, the God of heaven will set up a kingdom that shall never be destroyed, and his kingdom shall not be delivered up to another people; and it shall break in pieces, and shall consume all these kingdoms, and itself shall stand for ever." (ch. ii. 44.) This prophecy will be fulfilled at the end of the world; for then not only all great monarchies, but also small states, cities, and all the temporal power of princes will vanish away; but the kingdom of Christ and his saints will be eternal, according to the words of St. Luke: "And of His kingdom there is no end" Now if an earthly kingdom, which passeth quickly away, and which is obtained but by few, and full of many sorrows, be so ardently loved, sought after, preferred before every thing else, and acquired only by great dangers and bloodshed: why do so few love their heavenly kingdom, and so negligently seek after it? And yet, if the Holy Scriptures are to be believed, we are certain that this kingdom is open to all men, can be possessed without the effusion of blood, and is without any comparison superior to all earthly kingdoms. If I should say, Despise this kingdom that you may obtain a small farm or a vineyard, you would justly be astonished and laugh at me: but when I say, or rather when God says, Despise this vile and contemptible kingdom, and seek that which is noble and great, (which you may obtain, if you wish, by the grace of God which is never wanting,) why do you not desire it, and hasten to obtain it? I do not know what answer to make, except that the glory of this earthly kingdom is always before our eyes, and is touched, as it were, with our hands; whilst our heavenly kingdom can neither be seen, nor touched, nor even conceived by faith. This, indeed, is true; but if we attentively consider what force the authenticity, truth, and inspiration of Scripture carry with them, and how forcibly and clearly this same Scripture speaks on this point, which is confirmed by the powerful testimony of many ages, not only by miracles but also by blood, we shall certainly exclaim: "Thy testimonies, Lord, are become exceedingly credible." (Ps. xcii.) The obscurity of our faith, therefore, is not the reason why we are not inflamed with a desire for this heavenly kingdom. But being occupied by exterior things, and weighed down by the force of custom, we have no time to think and consider what is expedient for us. We do not follow the advice of our Lord, by entering into our chamber and shutting the door of our heart; we do not earnestly beseech God to direct us in so important an affair. But if, throwing aside for a time all minor cares, we were seriously to think on the kingdom of heaven; how easily and securely it can be acquired. And what an immense difference there is between things temporal and things eternal; between that which is most insignificant and that which is most excellent; between what is of very little importance and what is of the utmost importance; in fine, between an earthly kingdom and a heavenly kingdom. Did we, I repeat, consider these truths, doubtless we should have such a contempt for all earthly thrones, crowns, and sceptres; and, on the other hand, such an ardour for the heavenly things would rise in us, that, so far from being difficult, it would be a most easy task for us to employ all our strength in seeking and acquiring the kingdom of God, for which, as our true and last end, we were made by our wise Creator.

Chapter VII

The First Means Of Attaining To The Kingdom Of God

LET us now consider what is necessary to be done, in order that we may possess this most blessed and happy kingdom. But we need not say much on this point, since the King of heaven himself came upon earth to teach us; and thus, as our Master and Leader, he has pointed out to us four most excellent and secure means.

The first is: "Seek first the kingdom of God and his justice, and all these things shall be added unto you." Our end is the kingdom of God, which kingdom will be given to us if we arrive there by the way pointed out to us by our Leader. Now, the "justice" of this kingdom is the mark at which we ought to aim, if we wish to gain the reward. For Cassian, in his first "Colloquy," teaches the end is one thing and the mark another; the mark is the sign to which the arrows are directed, the end is the reward which those receive who reach that mark. Now, the mark proposed by God for our actions is "justice," and the reward the kingdom of heaven. But the justice of God is not goods and evils of this life with those of the next, the world would become a desert, because there would be no one that would attend to the affairs of this life. (See the "Spirit" of St. Liguori.) the justice of the Scribes and the Pharisees, which consisted merely in the external observance of the law; nor is it the justice of the philosophers, which, corrupted by sin, did not extend beyond the light of reason. But it is the justice of the Gospel which teaches us, "to love God with our whole heart, with our whole soul, with our whole strength, and our neighbour (though our enemy) as ourselves." Of this end St. Paul speaks: "You have your fruit unto sanctification, and the end, life everlasting." (Romans, chap. vi. 22.) This is the lesson, therefore, which our Master teaches us, "First of all to seek the kingdom of God and His justice:" that is, our chief concern and only desire should be directed, not towards temporal goods, but to obtain the kingdom of heaven, by a perfect and most diligent observance of this first and greatest commandment. But because few do this, therefore "many are called, but few are chosen;" for many live in such a manner that the kingdom of heaven is but a secondary consideration with them, and the justice of God an indifferent object, as if our Lord had said, "Seek first the kingdom of this world and its pleasures, and the kingdom of God shall be added unto you." But not so insignificant is the kingdom of God, that it should be forced or those who prefer everything else to its possession. But if we wish to learn an easy way to obtain the justice of God, which most truly and certainly leads to this kingdom, let us hear Christ, our Teacher: "Blessed are they that hunger and thirst after justice, for they shall have their fill." Is it then, O Lord, so easy to find justice with thee, that it is sufficient only to "hunger and thirst" after it? Truly blessed would all the poor be, if, merely by being hungry and thirsty after money, they could be so filled with it as to desire nothing more. But one is quite different from the other. For they who hunger and thirst after justice; that is, they who seek justice as anxiously and as eagerly as those who suffer from thirst and desire water, or from hunger and desire food these always think of justice, they aspire after it and what is far better, they ask it of God with many and unceasing tears. Such petitions God always listens to with joy; and He so fills them with the riches of His justice, that, being satiated thereby, they produce the words and the works of justice. But money is not such a good that he who desires it, or asks it of God, is immediately heard; for many abuse their riches, but justice no one can abuse. In fine, justice is like wisdom, of which St. James speaks: "If any of you want wisdom, let him ask of God, who giveth to all men abundantly, and upbraideth not: and it shall be given him." Unspeakable clemency of our Lord, who more easily and willingly grants what is necessary for us, than we ask or desire it from Him! If, therefore, we stand in need of the wisdom of the saints, or of the gifts of justice, both of which are necessary for us to obtain the kingdom of heaven, let us ask them of God from our heart, seriously, with sighs and tears, and we shall surely obtain them. God giveth to all that ask in this manner; nor doth He repel any one, or give covetously or moderately, but bountifully: neither doth He rebuke us, as if He were angry that we besought Him so often. What can we say, then? Who can bring excuse for his ignorance or infirmity in the day of judgment? Seek only after justice, and ask it of God, and thou shalt be so filled that no more wilt thou desire the delights of the flesh, nor the allurements of honours, or of any other earthly good; but thou wilt live in this world so justly, soberly, and piously, as to arrive in the next at an eternal kingdom.

Chapter VII

The Second Means Of Attaining The Kingdom Of God

ANOTHER road, which our Leader has pointed out to us is this: "Blessed are the poor in spirit, for theirs is the kingdom of heaven." Here we are not commanded to keep our coffers entirely empty, but our heart and affections free from the desire of external things. Our Lord offers to us immense treasures, but He will not give them, unless we offer Him our heart completely disengaged from creatures. "The desire of money is the root of all evils" (1 Tim. vi. 10.) In Greek it is called the love of money. But the root of all good is charity, and these two can never remain together. Wherefore, unless we truly and perfectly become "poor in spirit," so that we are neither affected by riches nor by poverty, and unless we readily give something to the poor, and do not convert it to our own use, except through necessity, we cannot obtain the justice of the kingdom of God, and, consequently, we cannot enter heaven. This is the true way that leadeth to life eternal; upon this road our Saviour Himself was the first to enter, "Who being rich, became poor for your sakes, that through His poverty you might be rich." (2 Epist. to Cor. chap. viii. 9.) And although He kept a purse, yet He entrusted it to Judas, who He knew to be a thief, that so we might comprehend how free His soul was from the love of money. Upon this path the Apostles also entered, though it would not have been difficult for them to have enriched themselves, since they were renowned for signs and wonders, and spoke the languages of many nations, and were admired by the whole world for their wisdom. But they who had once spoke the words, "Behold we have left all things, and have followed thee;" who had tasted how sweet it was to be free from the love of money, having food and wherewith to be covered, they considered virtue and the justice of God to be their great gain. On this road also walked, not only monks and hermits, but even kings and pontiffs who have thus arrived at the kingdom of heaven. St. Lewis, King of France, was certainly rich; but because he was at the same time poor in spirit, he used common garments, fasted frequently, was liberal to the poor, and severe to himself alone: he did not spend his money in banquets and pageants. St. Gregory also, who was a Pope, possessed many and large estates belonging to the Church; but because he likewise was "poor in spirit" he was so liberal with his alms, though parsimonious in his own regard, that he seemed to exceed the bounds of liberality towards others, and of neglect towards himself and his friends. But this is the way that leadeth to life. St. Paula, was a Roman lady, whose life is written by St. Jerome. See his epistle to Eustochium, the daughter of Pailla. It is perhaps one of the most interesting and instructive amongst his letters. His account of her leaving Toxotius and Ruffina her children, and how they endeavoured to stay her departure, is most affecting, as is the description of her death and burial in Jerusalem. She was a woman as poor in spirit, as she was rich in wealth. Though of most noble descent, she spent her money in erecting monasteries, and supporting the poor with such liberality, that it seemed to be her desire to be reduced to such poverty, as to compel others of their charity, to defray her funeral expenses. And how much she mortified her own body, we may be convinced by the fact, that she abstained from flesh, eggs, and wine; for a linen garment, she wore sackcloth; she slept on the bare ground, and with frequent prayers and tears, endeavoured to wash away even her trifling faults. St. Hedwiges also, Queen of Poland, though rich in worldly goods, was richer by her poverty of spirit, being content with only one mean garment, which she wore even in the depth of winter; she fasted daily, Sundays and great festivals being excepted; and with stripes, watchings, and all kinds of mortifications, she thus subdued her body. From these circumstances we may learn to what purposes she applied her riches, and what little affection, if any at all, she had towards them. It is not then truly edifying and wonderful, that this woman arrived so quickly at the kingdom of heaven, being so poor in spirit, and so free from all other cares.

Chapter IX

The Third Means Of Attaining The Kingdom Of God

THE third way pointed out by our Leader is this: "Blessed are they that suffer persecution for justice sake; for theirs is the kingdom of heaven" (St. Matthew, ch. v. 10.) Truly admirable is the doctrine of Christ our teacher, which however is hidden from the "wise" of this world. For who would have believed, unless God had said it, that it is a blessed thing to be poor, but rich in afflictions? And yet truly hath He spoken. Nothing is more calculated to acquire the true riches which merit the kingdom of heaven, than a mind free from all affection to money, and at the same time full of a desire to suffer for Christ. Hear our Lord in St. Luke: "Woe to you that are filled; woe to you that are rich, for you have your consolation; woe to you that laugh." (chap. vi.) And again in the same place: "Blessed are ye that hunger now, for ye shall be filled. Blessed are ye that weep now, for ye shall laugh. Blessed shall ye be when men shall hate you, and when they shall separate you, and shall reproach you, and cast out your name as evil, for the Son of man's sake. Be glad in that day and rejoice; for behold, your reward is great in heaven." (verses 21, 22, &c.) Hear what St. James says of riches and tribulations: "My brethren, count it all joy when you shall fall into divers temptations; knowing that the trying of your faith worketh patience; and patience hath a perfect work." (chap. i.) Here he does not say: Bear, endure, be patient; but, Rejoice, yea, "count it all your joy:" that is, receive your tribulation, not as an affliction, but as matter for great joy. On the other hand, he thus speaks of riches: "Go to, now, ye rich men, weep and howl in your miseries which shall come upon you:" and in the preceding chapter he adds:

“Be afflicted, and mourn, and weep: let your laughter be turned into mourning, and your joy into sorrow.” (ch. iy. 9.) But whence is it, that persecution makes a man happy, which ought rather (one would suppose) make him miserable? Much could be said on this point: but I will make only one remark, that persecution is like a furnace of burning fire. And as fire prepares our food, clears silver of its dross, and proves gold; so also does persecution, if patiently endured, prepare sinners for receiving grace; it purges the imperfect, and proves the just, and thus all are wonderfully benefited. A sinner is “raw flesh” as it were, which, unless it be properly cooked, is cast away as not fit to be eaten by man. For a sinner is full of bad humours of the concupiscence of the flesh, which is Luxury: of the concupiscence of the eyes, which is Avarice: and of pride, which is Ambition. But if he pass through the furnace of persecution, he is “cooked” in such a manner, as to be fit to be presented at the table of the Lord. When persecution or tribulation comes, then we forget our passions, our avarice, ambition, &c.; and we begin to be entirely different men. But a just man, though imperfect, and not subject to enormous crimes, may yet be indulgent to his flesh, a lover of pleasure, a lover of gain, and of the vanities of the world. He is therefore like to silver full of much dross. But if the furnace of persecution should overtake him, and he bear it with patience, then the dross will gradually be separated from the silver; he will begin to be recollected, to meditate on heavenly things, to abstain from carnal desires; in fine, to live justly, soberly, and piously in this world, and to expect that blessed hope, and the coming of the glory of the great God. Lastly, a man perfect in charity is gold; but he has to be proved by the fire of persecution, lest others (and he himself) should suspect, that he was debased gold, not pure gold; for when it is seen that he patiently endures the fire of persecution, not only is he acknowledged by others to be what he appears to be, but he himself also acquires a greater hope, and a more secure expectation of the kingdom of heaven. “Tribulation,” saith the Apostle, “worketh patience; and patience trial; and trial hope; and hope confoundeth not.” (Epistle to the Romans, chap. v. 3, &c.) Thus God daily more and more exalts his friend that is proved by tribulation, till at length He brings him to a share of his kingdom and happiness. Behold what is the fruit of patience in affliction! But it is strange to see how few make use of these advantages, although they are open to all. Affliction is everywhere to be found, everywhere to be met with at home, on a journey, in the forum, in the temple, for in all places the wicked oppress the good. Wherefore, most true are the words of the Apostle: “All that will live godly in Christ Jesus, shall suffer persecution.” But we, delicate soldiers, either fly from this proving furnace, or when we have received an injury we throw it back on our adversary: so that we not only refuse to suffer persecution, but we even cause it. And those are to be found a man’s enemies of his own household that applaud him who retaliates an injury, (as it is called,) and yet such people who despise the precepts of Christ, wish to be called Christians!

Chapter X

The Fourth Means Of Attaining The Kingdom Of God

BUT because this doctrine is very difficult, and very few understand it, and much less wish to experience it, therefore our Leader hath pointed out the fourth “way,” and this very narrow. He says: “The kingdom of heaven suffereth violence, and the violent alone bear it away.” (St. Matthew, chap. xi. 12.) As if He had said: I am aware that it will appear a paradox to men, that those should be happy who are poor, and those miserable who are rich; on the contrary, that we should rejoice in afflictions, and weep in prosperity; neither was I ignorant, that few are they who would wish to lose present goods, in order to acquire future ones; and to choose present evils, that so they might avoid those to come. But I who am Truth, must speak the truth; therefore I now add, that the kingdom of heaven can be taken only by the violent; therefore have I said in another place: “How hardly shall they that have riches enter into the kingdom of heaven. For it is easier for a camel to pass through the eye of a needle, than for a rich man to enter into the kingdom of heaven.” And again: “How narrow is the gate, and straight is the way that leadeth to life, and few there are that find it!” And in another place I have said, that the kingdom of heaven is like unto a treasure hidden in a field; and to a precious pearl which cannot be purchased unless we sell everything; hence it is necessary for us to be deprived of everything on earth, if we wish to possess in heaven this heavenly treasure and precious pearl. In St. Luke I have likewise plainly assured you: “Every one of you that doth not renounce all that he possesseth, cannot be my disciple” (chap. xiv. ver. 33.) And although this “renunciation” is to be understood as relating to the affection of the mind; yet since a real disposition to part with all temporal goods, should the honour of God or our own salvation require it, is no easy matter, and which few accomplish, I have therefore added other similitudes concerning him who wished to build a tower, and had not wherewith to finish it; and of a king who was about to wage war against another king, and had not sufficient forces to engage with him, with any hope of victory. Now if the erection of a tower, without a great sum of money, and a war against a powerful king, without a great army, be difficult and almost impossible things, how much more difficult will it be to accomplish both of these at the same time? But we must accomplish both, if we wish to gain heaven; for a tower is to be built which must reach to heaven; that is, good works are to be performed which will merit eternal life: and at the same time, we have to fight against numerous and powerful enemies, viz. impure spirits, who with all their might endeavour to hinder the building of the tower. We have a figure of this conflict in the children of Israel, who, when they wished to rebuild Jerusalem that had been destroyed by the Chaldeans, were obliged with incredible toil and anxiety, to build with one hand and to fight with the other, on account of the neighbouring nations that attacked them: "Of them that built on the wall and that carried burdens, and that laded; with one of his hands he did the work, and with the other he held a sword." (2 Esdras, chap. iv. 17) From these considerations it is manifest, that the kingdom of heaven can not be obtained without great toil and labour, by those who are wedded to earthly objects, who do not tame the concupiscence of the flesh, nor have learned to fight with their invisible enemies. But he who wishes seriously to apply, by the grace of God, to Christian perfection; to consider, not carelessly, but most attentively, the words of Christ; and to follow His example and that of the saints, gradually the way will be opened before him; his strength will increase; his enemies diminish; and by the charity of God in Christ Jesus, his yoke will begin to appear sweet and his burden light; and then will be accomplished the words of Isaias: "They that hope in the Lord shall renew their strength, they shall take wings as eagles, they shall run and not be weary, they shall walk and not faint." (chap. xl. ver. 31.) And they will exclaim with the royal Prophet: "I have run the way of thy commandments, when thou didst enlarge my heart." It was not truly a difficult thing for St. Antony to spend so many sleepless nights; nay, even the night appeared too short through the sweetness he enjoyed from the divine contemplation, for he complained of the sun, saying: "Why dost thou hinder me by rising at this time, and withdrawing me from the brightness of my true Light?" Neither was it difficult for him (as well as many others like him) to prolong their fasting through a whole week, since they were refreshed with the heavenly bread of divine contemplation. Neither was it painful for St. Austin, to be deprived of those carnal pleasures to which he had been addicted from his youth, when once he began to taste the sweetness of divine love, and the delight of inward contemplation. Wherefore no one, whoever he may be, ought to despond; but rather to hope in the power of the Most High, who, as He hath made us for Himself, will also draw us to Himself and place us in His kingdom, by merits of His Son, by whose precious blood we have been redeemed. Wherefore, Christian soul, thou shouldst not despond on account of the difficulty of the way, but hope in the Lord, who would not have invited thee to seek His kingdom in the first place, unless He had been prepared to aid thee by His most powerful assistance. Courageously therefore commence the journey. There is no occasion here for deliberation. If the labour be great, great also is the reward; and if the numerous forces of the enemy hinder thee, greater is the power of God who assists thee. And if many of every age and sex have been enabled to arrive at the kingdom by this way, why mayest not thou also obtain the same? They were not made of stone or iron, but of flesh; they were mortal and frail, and therefore they could do nothing of themselves, but only by the Lord their God. Canst not thou therefore, though weak and infirm, do the same by the Lord thy God? "Cast thyself upon Him," says St. Austin, "fear not; He will not withdraw Himself, that thou shouldst fall: securely cast thyself upon Him; He will receive thee, and will help thee." God is faithful, He cannot deceive. Two things only are required of thee; one, that thou most firmly resolve to prefer the glory of God and thy eternal salvation before all things else; the other, that thou confide not in thy own strength, or in thy own wisdom, but in the power of God and His infinite love. If thou wilt comply with these two conditions, "the crooked shall become straight, and the rough ways plain" to thee; and thou wilt serve the Lord with joy and exultation, and "wilt sing in the ways of the Lord; for great is the glory of the Lord."

Book II (The City of God)
Chapter I
On The Beauty Of The City Of God

“GLORIOUS things are said of thee, O city of God:” wherefore I have desired to behold thy glory, meditating upon it through a glass in an obscure manner. But our first consideration is, why the happiness of the saints, which in the Holy Scripture is called the kingdom of heaven, is also called the “City of God.” This appears to me to be the reason; because as it is called a kingdom on account of its extent, so also it ought to be called a “City,” on account of its beauty. One might suppose, when he heard of a vast and extensive kingdom, that there are in it many deserts, many wild uncultivated places, and mountains fit only for the habitation of beasts, besides inaccessible rocks, forests, and precipices, &c. But since all these are far removed from the happiness of the saints, the Holy Spirit therefore teaches us, that the kingdom of heaven is like to a most “beautiful city;” and although it is of a boundless extent, yet the whole is so glorious as to appear a most populous and opulent city. In large cities especially are to be seen beautiful temples, splendid palaces, most delightful gardens, noble forums, fountains, columns, pyramids, obelisks, theatres, towers, and other buildings for the use of the public. How beautiful would Italy be, if the barren Apennines were removed, and all the country shone like Rome did (not as it appears now) under Augustus Caesar! From being of brick, he made it of marble. And how beautiful would Syria have been formerly, if all parts had been like Jerusalem such as it was before its destruction by the Romans! Josephus gives such a description of it, that its magnificence must have been the admiration of the whole world; and of it the Prophet justly sings, “Glorious things are said of thee, O city of God;” and yet it had not then arrived at that eminence to which Herod the Great carried it, after the reigns of David and Solomon. How beautiful also would Chaldea, and all Assyria and Mesopotamia, and the whole East have been, had these been enclosed within the walls of Babylon! Pliny and Strabo give such descriptions of its magnitude and beauty, that they seem incredible: hence Babylon was considered one of the seven wonders of the world. Now, what must that city above be, the heavenly Jerusalem, which embraceth the whole kingdom of heaven? This kingdom so far excels all other kingdoms in glory, majesty, and extent, that the whole appears but one city, most beautiful, most noble. Truly, then, this heavenly city is such, that no one can seriously think of it without frequently aspiring after it; and no one can desire it without immediately leaving all things to possess it, and never resting till he find it. Hear how Tobias, exulting in spirit, speaks of this city: “Thou shalt shine with a glorious light, and all the ends of the earth shall worship thee. The gates of Jerusalem shall be built of sapphire and of emerald, and all the walls thereof round about of precious stones. And all its streets shall be paved with white and clean stones; and Alleluia shall be sung in its streets.” (chap, xiii. 21, 22.) And St. John also, in his Apocalypse, agrees with Tobias: “The building of the wall thereof was of jaspar-stone; but the city itself pure gold, like to clear glass. And the foundations of the walls of the city were adorned with all manner of precious stones and every several gate was of one single pearl; and the street of the city was pure gold, as it were transparent glass.” (chap, xxi.) But we must not suppose the heavenly Jerusalem to be in reality adorned with gold and precious stones; but by this mode of expression we are to understand, that the heavenly city is as much superior to earth as gold is to dirt, as pearls to common stone, the stars to candles, the sun to a torch, and mortal architects to God, the immortal Creator of all things. But as we intend to speak of the beauty of all the parts of the city of God, we shall dwell no longer on this point.

Chapter II

On The Concord And Peace Of The City Of God

ANOTHER reason why the kingdom of heaven is called the “city of God,” appears to be this, because a kingdom usually contains an almost infinite number of people, differing one from another in their language, manners, and laws; where many have never seen each other, and much less formed any acquaintance. But a city includes those only who are of the same language, the same customs, and who are governed by the same laws. Wherefore, heaven is called both “a kingdom” and “a city” because, although the inhabitants of this heavenly kingdom are almost innumerable, and as St. John tells us, are collected from “all nations, and tribes, and peoples, and tongues,” and also divided into angels, archangels, principalities, powers, dominations, thrones, cherubim, and seraphim, who are much more numerous than men, and are distinguished, not by nations, and peoples, and tongues, but by a specific diversity of nature; yet all these are true citizens, living in concord and unanimity, and governed by one only law of charity. Wherefore, all have but one heart and one soul. And because charity is contrary to hatred, envy, contention, discord, strife, and other vices, therefore anger, contention, envy, &c., are far removed from this holy city of Jerusalem: charity alone reigneth, and with it justice, peace, and “joy in the Holy Ghost.” In the beginning of creation there was a great battle in heaven between Michael, the archangel, and the dragon; but Michael, and the angels who remained firm with him in faith and obedience to their Lord, gained the victory over the dragon and his angels, who by their pride had fallen away from God. “And that great dragon was cast out, that old serpent who is called the devil and Satan, who seduceth the whole world; and he was cast unto the earth, and his angels were thrown down with him.” (Apoc. chap. xii. 9.) From that time the holy city of Jerusalem “hath placed peace in its borders;” nor has the sound of the war-trumpet been heard therein, neither will it be heard there for ever. What then can be sweeter, what more blessed than this city? They who know the evils of war, its depredations, slaughter, rapine, sacrileges, &c., can easily imagine the sweetness of peace. But, leaving aside war, who has not experienced in his own city, and even in his own house, how disagreeable it is to have anything to do with passionate men, who take the worst view of all our actions? “Depart from the unjust, and evil shall depart from thee,” saith Ecclesiasticus. But where shall we go, and not find the unjust? and if they are everywhere to be found, evils will certainly be found also, as long as we remain in this land of exile. Hear how the same Ecclesiasticus speaks of a wicked woman: “It will be more agreeable to abide with a lion and a dragon than to dwell with a wicked woman.” (chap. xxv.) Now, if the partner of one’s life becomes a lion and a dragon on account of her wickedness, to how many afflictions are men exposed! “All that will live godly in Christ Jesus shall suffer persecution,” says the apostle. (2 Timothy, chap. iii. 12.) How unhappy, therefore, is the city of this world, wherein we are obliged to bear with so many enemies, and to fight our way. If we wish to be devout, we shall be persecuted by men; and if, to avoid their persecution, we become wicked, we shall then incur the indignation of our supreme and almighty King, who will punish us, and, both alive and dead, will take vengeance, for His anger no one can resist. Oh, unfortunate and miserable country, where no one can escape from war or persecution, where no one can find true peace! Let us therefore, with our whole heart, love and praise that heavenly city, from which alone every affliction is banished, and where no war, no hatred, no strife, can ever gain admittance.

Chapter II

On The Liberty Of The City Of God

A THIRD reason why the kingdom of God is called a “city,” is because a kingdom is in the form of a monarchy, and this seems opposed to liberty. But all the citizens of heaven are free, and Jerusalem, our mother above, is also “free,” according to St. Paul in his Epistle to the Galatians. This blessed Apostle knew what he was speaking of, since he had been rapt up into the third heaven, into paradise, and became acquainted with the nature of the city. Wherefore, as a kingdom implies “servitude,” and a city “liberty,” that kingdom alone may be called a city where they who obey the king are free. But the blessed in heaven possess not one simple liberty, but one that is manifold. In the first place, all the inhabitants are free from the servitude of sin, because the first liberty, possessed in the earthly paradise, was “to be able not to sin;” but the second, enjoyed in heaven, is far more excellent: “not to be able to sin,” as St. Austin teaches. Another liberty (like the former) is being free from the servitude of death. Adam in the earthly paradise was free, so that he could have escaped death: the Sons of Adam in the heavenly paradise are free, so that they cannot die. You must not be surprised at our making liberty to consist in not being able to do anything; because “not being able to sin” and “not being able to die” indicate the height of liberty from the servitude of sin, and the servitude of mortality. For he who cannot sin, is not only free from sin, but is also so far removed from its servitude that he feels a sure security sin will never prevail within him; and he who cannot die is not only free from death, but he is so far removed from it that he feels confident death will never approach him. This liberty God alone naturally enjoys, for the Apostle says: “Who alone hath immortality.” And although the angels and souls endowed with reason are said to be naturally immortal, because they have within them no principle of corruption; yet God, who made them, can also destroy them. But, as we have already remarked, the angels and blessed spirits are certain that they will never sin and never die, and therefore they are completely free from the servitude of sin and of death; this is a most honourable participation in the Divine liberty. The third liberty consists in being free from “necessity” in general. Now man is obliged to eat, drink, sleep, and labour, at one time to stand or walk, and at another to lie down. But the saints in heaven are not subject to any such necessity, but are free from every necessity, which is the liberty of the glory of the Sons of God, as St. Paul expresses it in his Epistle to the Romans. How great this liberty is, first poor people, then spiritual men, and thirdly the rich of this world bear witness. What labour the poor endure that they may provide food and clothing for themselves and children! and how greatly would they thank those who would free them from such a state of servitude! Many even rob and plunder others, and suffer themselves to be led into bad habits, to be enabled to support themselves; for they say with the unjust steward in the Gospel, "To dig I am unable, to beg I am ashamed; I know what I will do: I will defraud my Master;" that is, by theft and injustice I will free myself from His servitude. But by this mode of acting we fall into a far more grievous servitude, viz., the servitude of sin and the devil, the most bitter enemy of the human race. Holy men, who give themselves up to heavenly contemplation, consider the servitude of attending to the body to be a grievous burden, because it standeth in need of many things, and steals a great part of their time from other more important concerns. Eusebius, in his "Ecclesiastical History," relates from Philo that the first Christians of Alexandria, living under St. Mark the Evangelist, were so taken up with their heavenly meditations as never to taste any food until after sunset, that thus they might give the whole day and a great part of the night to such spiritual employment: scarcely did they allow any portion for the refreshment of the body. The same historian tells us, that some forgot their food for three days together, and others continued their fast for six days. Cassian in his Colloquies, and Theodoret in his History, testify that many holy hermits were accustomed to the same thing. Wherefore, to all these the servitude of the body was most grievous, and with the Apostle they exclaimed: "Unhappy man that I am, who shall deliver me from the body of this death?" But to the inhabitants of this world, and especially to those who are rich, this servitude does not appear grievous, but were they wise they would think differently. They are addicted to excessive eating and drinking, and love to sleep on soft couches, and when they exceed the bounds of moderation, they fill their bodies with diseases, and to get free from them they are obliged to take bitter medicine, and to endure many sharp pains. Wherefore they are necessitated, whether willing or unwilling, either to remain enemies to God and to bear His terrible wrath, or to fight against the concupiscence of the flesh by temperance and sobriety. This is doubtless a most laborious and dangerous war; but thus both poor and rich, the good and the wicked, would be free from a most painful "necessity" and miserable servitude. The fourth liberty consists in being free from obedience to the law and the divine precepts, for "the law is not made for the just man, but for the unjust," as St. Paul mentions in His Epistle to Timothy. None are more just than the blessed, who are confirmed in justice, and cannot therefore become unjust. It is true, indeed, that to the just living in this world, the law is not a threatening one, because of their own accord they willingly obey it; nevertheless, it cannot be denied but that it is a law which directs and binds them to do that which is commanded, and to avoid that which is forbidden. But the just, who enjoy the liberty of the Sons of God, stand in need of no law, because they behold all justice in the divine "Word," and, being confirmed in perfect charity, they cannot but accomplish the will of God. Great, then, is this liberty which frees them from every solicitude, and which is so opposed to captivity and the servitude of those unhappy beings, who, with their hands and feet bound, are "cast into the exterior darkness" and into the "furnace of fire," which they can neither endure nor avoid. And yet either one or the other of these abodes will be the lot of every son of Adam. But, alas! many are so blinded by the smoke of present honours, or by the dust of earthly goods, that they see not these things, neither do they consider them, "until sudden destruction" come upon them: then their torments open their eyes, which before their sins had shut.

Chapter IV

On The Situation And Form Of The City Of God

BUT let us now turn toward the Celestial city, and attentively consider its situation, form, foundation, gates, walls, and streets. It is situated on the holy mountains: thus we read in the Psalmist, "The foundations thereof are in the holy mountains;" with this St. John agrees in the Apocalypse, where he says: "And he took me up in spirit to a great and high mountain: and he showed me the holy city Jerusalem, coming down out of heaven from God." (chap. xxi. 10.) The situation of a city on a mountain is very convenient and useful, both for the purity of the air, and as a fortification. But what mountains are higher than heaven? and what mountain is exalted above all mountains, except the heaven of heavens, of which David speaks, "The heaven of heavens is the Lord's." This is that mountain for which the same Prophet sighed when he said, "Who shall ascend into the mountain of the Lord, or who shall stand in His holy place?" And from this he implored and expected assistance, saying, "I have lifted up my eyes to the mountains, from whence help shall come to me.” Wherefore, the situation of the city of God is so high as to shut out everything that could in any way disturb its peace and harmony. It is higher than dust, thorns, and briars, or the poisonous bite of animals can reach: it is so high that neither vapours nor clouds, neither hail, nor thunder, fire, nor lightning can terrify it: in fine, it is so high that those impure birds, which St. Paul, in his Epistle to the Ephesians, calls “The spirits of wickedness in the high places,” can never reach it. The form of the City of God is square, for thus St. John tells us: “And the city lieth in a foursquare, and the length thereof is as great as the breadth.” This expression signifies nothing more, than that admirable and perfect justice which is to be found in the city, where nothing unjust, nothing contradictory, nothing deformed can gain admittance. Thus St. Austin explains the Psalm, “Mirabile in eequitate,” that is, injustice. And truly wonderful will it be, to behold the innumerable inhabitants of this city, all endowed with perfect free-will; and yet throughout all eternity nothing wrong or imperfect will be found in any one of them, either in thought, word, or deed. Justly, therefore, does this city lie in a square, so that the breadth should not, in the least point, exceed the length, nor the length the breadth. This figure of a square may also signify, that the breadth of its heavenly treasures is equal to their length; because as the abundance of goods will be infinite, so also will their duration. In the Scripture, breadth is applied to multiplicity, length to the duration of a thing. Thus, in the third Book of Kings, the great wisdom of Solomon is said to be “largeness of heart as the sand that is on the seashore:” and in the 90th Psalm, duration of time is called “length of days.” There will, therefore, be in the city of our God, as much breadth as length, because there will be an immensity of good things, together with an eternal duration of them. St. John also adds, that the height of the city is as great as its breadth, (so that it is square in every part) because the goods of the heavenly Jerusalem will not only be great and eternal, but also most noble and sublime. It is of little consequence, that Vitruvius and Yegetius do not approve of a square for the situation of a city: they speak of a city that feareth an enemy. But the Scripture speaketh of that holy city, which hath placed peace in its borders, and to which no evil can come on account of its height.

Chapter V

On The Foundations And Gates Of The City Of God

THE foundation is of such a nature, that the city alone may justly be called the foundation. Thus speaks St. Paul in his Epistle to the Hebrews, “For he looked for a city that hath foundations; whose builder and maker is God” (chap. xi. 10.) The Apostle gives the reason, why Abraham did not build a city in the land of promise, but dwelt therein as a stranger: the reason was, because he knew that the land of promise was but a figure of a better land of promise; and, therefore, he was unwilling to build a house or city that would perish, because he looked for a city that had a strong foundation, “whose builder and maker is God.” Wherefore, this heavenly city alone truly and properly hath a foundation, since it was built by God to endure for ever. The cities which Cain, Nimrod, Ninus, Nabuchodonosor, Romulus, &c., founded, have often fallen, and at the last day will entirely be destroyed: this proves that they had no solid foundation. Hence, we may understand how much wiser were the Patriarchs than we are, who, although they lived more than double the number of our years, and were obliged to wait so many thousands of years before they could enter the heavenly city; yet they built neither cities nor houses, but dwelt in tabernacles, as strangers and pilgrims, believing with an assured hope that they were destined to inhabit an Eternal city in heaven, and that all things on earth would quickly perish. But we, who live to such a short period, and who can, if we wish, immediately after death, enter into that most blessed city, so labour in erecting and adorning buildings on earth, as if we were either never to die, or else had no expectations of entering Heaven. In this point, we certainly imitate not the faithful Patriarchs, but unbelieving Infidels: and yet we are Christians, and we know that Christ and his Apostles built neither a city, nor a tower, nor had even a house; neither did they wish for one. But still, I do not blame the princes of this world, although Christians, for building new cities: nor private individuals for erecting houses for their own convenience. For we know that David, a pious king, enlarged the city of Jerusalem, and built in it a royal palace, as we read in the Second Book of Kings. We also know that St. Lewis, king of France, erected in Palestine, at his own expense, several cities for the Christians: neither are we ignorant, that it is but just Princes should possess more magnificent habitations than private men, and patricians more than the common people. But we only require moderation, and condemn extravagance, especially when individuals wish for the palaces of princes; and princes, not content with their palaces, erect immense buildings that look like towns: in fine, we blame a too great affection for temporal goods, as if our chief happiness consisted in them: but we praise a contempt for the world, joined with the humility of Christ. The gates of this city are said by St. John to be made of precious stones, and the walls of the jasper-stone; but the whole city itself of pure gold. All this signifies that every part is precious, pure, and transparent; for we know that pearls are both precious and white: the jasper-stone is sometimes found white, and other times green. But St. John says: "And the light thereof was like to a precious stone, as to the jasper-stone, even as crystal:" he adds, "as crystal," to show that he is speaking, not of a green jasper, or any other colour, but of a white and clear one. Thus also when he says, that the streets are of pure gold, he adds, "like to clear glass;" that is, transparent and white like crystal. Wherefore, whether we consider the whole city, or the gates, the walls, or the streets, all is precious: nothing is mean, unbecoming, fading; but every thing is beautiful, every thing visible, because there nothing can be found to be hidden or concealed: all behold all things: there no suspicions nor stratagems are admitted. This perhaps is the reason why St. John says in the same place, "And the gates thereof shall not be shut," because no darkness, no robbers, no enemies are there, on account of which the gates should be closed at night. This verse is not opposed to the words of the Psalmist, where he praises the heavenly Jerusalem: "Praise the Lord, O Jerusalem, because he hath strengthened the bolts of thy gates." (Psalm cxlvii.) Both the Psalmist and the Evangelist mean this only that in the heavenly Jerusalem, no danger is to be apprehended from enemies or robbers. By the gates being always shut, the one signified, that the divine protection would never permit any enemy to enter the beloved city of God: the other meant, by the gates being always open, that the city was so secure from every evil attack, there was no need of keeping the gates shut, nor of employing any guards. But what do the gates, the walls, and streets signify? The gates always open signify, that by the passion of Christ admittance has been given to all men, of entering the city of God, and of His angels; "Christ having overcome the sting of death, hath opened to believers the kingdom of heaven." And not one only, but twelve gates are there, by which Christians can enter the city: thus St. John tells us: "On the east, three gates; and on the north, three gates; and on the south, three gates; and on the west, three gates." Therein enter, not the Jews alone, as they imagine; but all nations from every quarter of the earth: nay, so few Jews enter, as to bear no comparison with the others. Thus our Lord predicted when He spoke of the centurion: "Amen I say unto you, I have not found so great faith in Israel. And I say to you, that many shall come from the east and the west, and shall sit down with Abraham, and Isaac, and Jacob in the kingdom of heaven: but the children of the kingdom shall be cast out into the exterior darkness." And in the parable of the vineyard, "Therefore I say to you, that the kingdom of God shall be taken from you, and shall be given to a nation yielding the fruits thereof." But this is most clearly expressed in St. Luke: "There shall be weeping and gnashing of teeth, when you shall see Abraham, and Isaac, and Jacob, and all the prophets in the kingdom of God, and yourselves thrust out. And there shall come from the east and the west, and the north and the south, and shall sit down in the kingdom of God." Three gates are said to be from every part of the world, making in all twelve, because an entrance will be open, not only from the east and the west, the north and the south, but from the beginning of the east, from the middle, and from the end of the east, and so of the other parts. Another explanation may perhaps please us more, that the three gates are fixed to each part of the heavenly city, to express the mystery of the Trinity and the three most necessary virtues: for all those enter from the four quarters of the globe, who being baptized in the name of the three divine Persons, have persevered to the end in Faith, Hope, and Charity.

Chapter VI

On The Walls And Streets Of The City Of God

THE walls of the city signify nothing more, than the divine protection, which alone is sufficient to guard the city, without the aid of soldiers, arms, or towers. "And I will be, saith the Lord, a wall of fire round about: and I will be in glory in the midst thereof." (Zacharias ii.) Truly admirable promise! "I will be a wall of fire round about" to restrain the enemy: "and I will be in glory in the midst thereof" to honour the citizens. As if He had said: Fire burns and shines: I will there to burn mine enemies, and enlighten my friends: thus will I be a "fire round about," and a "light of glory in the midst thereof." This St. John explains where he says: "And the city hath no need of the sun, nor of the moon to shine in it. For the glory of God hath enlightened it, and the Lamb is the lamp thereof." The brightness of God, as a sun, illumines their souls; and Christ, the Lamb of God, illumines the body. But Christ is said to be a "lamp," not because it is necessary in the night, but with reference to his divinity: for if the just shall shine like the sun in the kingdom of God, as our Lord tells us in St. Matthew; how much more glorious will Christ appear not as a lamp, but as the chief Sun enlightening the city of God! And, therefore, St. John adds, "For there shall be no night." The streets of the city comprehend the whole space which is within the circumference of the walls. This is the habitation of the heavenly citizens - all of which is pure gold; that is, an ardent and pure charity which embraceth all, and by which all live in each through mutual love: and not only all in all, but all dwell in God, and God in all: "for he that abideth in charity, abideth in God, and God in him." (1 St. John iv. 16.) And that this might be accomplished, Christ our Lord asked of His Father in that prayer which he made before His passion, in presence of all His apostles, saying: "And not for them only do I pray, but for them also who through their word shall believe in me: That they may all be one, as thou Father in Me, and I in Thee; that they also may be one in Us." (St. John xvii. 20, 21.) O blessed city which, placed on the highest mountain, enjoyest the purest air! Thou art founded on a rock, that thou mayest have eternal strength: thy gates shine as pearls, and are always open to those that enter: God is thy wall, that continually surrounds thee by His protection, and adorns thee as a precious jasper-stone: thy street is charity, purer than any gold, clearer than any crystal, which maketh all that dwell within thee, to be of one heart and one soul; which filleth them with ineffable joy, and crowneth them with eternal peace: "My soul longeth and fainteth for thy courts." "What can be sweeter to one labouring and groaning amidst a corrupt nation -amongst false brethren in a world "seated in iniquity," than to flee away to a kingdom wherein the sweetest peace is found, wherein charity alone reigneth? "When shall I come and appear before the face of my God?" (Psalm xli.) What more desirable for a soul that loves God, than to behold her Beloved to be seen by her Beloved and by an intimate and most joyful union, to dwell within Him, and He in her! It may indeed appear an intolerable boldness, that dust and ashes should sigh after thy courts, O holy city, and a still greater audacity, that a vile creature should aspire to the embraces of his Creator. But He will excuse this boldness, since He hath given it unto us, when he asked the Father, that "all might be one;" and that as the Father is in the Son, and the Son in the Father, so also we might be one in both.

Chapter VII

On The Temple Of The City Of God

BUT there is something else wanting in the city, viz: a temple to praise God, and to take our meat and drink: of garments we shall stand in no need. For if in the earthly paradise Adam and Eve required none, much less will the Saints want them in their heavenly paradise, where all are clothed with light as with a garment. And not only Adam and Eve required food, but also the angels themselves, as Raphael saith: "But I use an invisible meat and drink, which cannot be seen by men." (Tobias xii. 19.) And so also in relation to this temple, St. John thus speaks in his Apocalypse: "And I saw no temple therein. For the Lord God Almighty is the temple thereof, and the Lamb." (chap, xxi.) That St. John saw no temple in the holy city, must not appear strange to us: in the church militant temples are erected, for four reasons: That the word of God might be preached to the people; that the sacraments and sacrifices might be celebrated; that public prayer might be offered to God, and Psalms sung to the Lord with joy and gladness. Now the preaching of God's word will cease in heaven, where the uncreated Word itself will clearly speak unto all, according to the prediction of Jeremiah the prophet: "And they shall teach no more every man his neighbour, and every man his brother, saying: "Know the Lord: for all shall know me from the least of them even to the greatest, saith the Lord." (chap. xxi. 34.) Sacraments and sacrifice likewise will not be necessary there, where neither sin is to expiated, nor signs are required, because the thing signified will then be made manifest. Prayer and praise are here on earth given to God in sacred temples dedicated unto Him, because He hath promised to have His eyes and ears open to the prayers of those who should gather together in His name; thus He spoke to Solomon in the 2nd Book of Paralipomenon: "My eyes also shall be open, and my ears attentive to the prayer of him who shall pray in this place." (chap. vii. 15.) But since in the heavenly city, God will be seen and heard by all, there is no necessity for a temple in that place. Thus we can easily understand what St. John saith: "And I saw no temple therein:" but why has he added, "For the Lord God Almighty is the temple thereof, and the Lamb." If no temple be required, why is God himself said to be the Temple of that city, and not only God, but the "Lamb" also? Or who shall explain for us, how God and the Lamb are called "Temples" in heaven? And what use hath this temple in heaven? In the holy Scripture it is usual for one sentence to serve as an explanation of another, or an obscure passage to be made intelligible by another that is clearer. In the 90th Psalm it is said: "He who dwelleth in the aid of the Most High, shall abide under the protection of the God of heaven." The meaning of these words is: he who is united to God by a sure confidence, abides as it were in God, in whom he dwells securely, and is protected from all evil. The same may be said of prayer and praise; for he that by an intimate reverence is joined to God, makes, as it were, a house for himself in God, that so whilst living in it, he may praise God and pray unto Him as he ought. Thus, therefore, the Lord God Almighty is the "Temple" in heaven of the holy city, since these blessed citizens, most attentively considering the omnipotence of God, and thus united to Him by an intimate reverence, dwell in Him, and offer Him worthy praise. So also when they consider the merits of Christ, who as an innocent Lamb delivered himself an oblation, and a victim to God as an odour of sweetness, they are intimately united with Him by love: and reposing in Him as in a temple, they pray for us, and doubtless find the eyes and ears of God open, so that whatsoever they ask they obtain for us. But if, to praise God and to intercede for us, these blessed citizens dwell in Him and in Christ, as in a temple, what must we do who neither see God nor Christ? I would that by the grace of God, we could so praise Him and pray unto Him, that being first united to Him by true humility, and a deep reverence from the consideration of His Supreme Majesty, we could dwell in Him as in a most sacred temple! Then not carelessly or with distraction, but most attentively and devoutly should we sing our grateful praises to God, and offer up to the Lord prayers that would benefit ourselves and our brethren; then would these words be fulfilled: "The sacrifice of praise shall glorify me: and there is the way by which will show him the salvation of God." (Psalm xlix.) The divine praises, offered up on the altar of the heart by the fire of charity, ascend as an odour of wonderful sweetness; and they obtain for us, that our path may be opened and our heart enlightened, to behold the salvation which God hath prepared for those that love Him. But all these benefits those miserable men lose, who pray and sing the divine praises with distraction, and a voluntary dryness of heart; they participate with others in the labour of singing and praying, but they enjoy not the divine consolation, nor a foretaste of heavenly happiness.

Chapter VIII

On The Meat And Drink In The City Of God

CONCERNING the meat and drink of the city of God, we find these words in the Apocalypse: "And he showed me a river of the water of life clear as crystal, proceeding from the throne of God and of the Lamb. And in the midst of the street thereof, and on both sides of the river was the tree of life, bearing twelve fruits, yielding its fruits every month; and the leaves of the tree were for the healing of the nations." (chap. xxii.) I am afraid, that some, judging from these words, may wonder at the scantiness of food in heaven, and think that more substantial meat is to be found in this land of our exile; since in the Apocalypse we read of nothing, but the fruit of one tree for food, and the water of a river for drink. But those who suppose such a thing should remember, that in the terrestrial paradise, where doubtless there was better food than we have now, Adam was only allowed to eat fruit and herbs, and drink water; but this fruit and water were far superior to all the food and wine of this life, though not so in any degree, to the "tree of life" and the living water of the heavenly paradise. In this vale of misery, all men are sickly and have their sense of taste corrupted by a kind of bitterness, and therefore to remove this nausea, they have invented various kinds of food; but this variety so lessens the nausea, as to increase the disease. In the terrestrial paradise however, men were healthy, for the sweetness and wholesomeness of the food and of the water were such, as to be able perfectly to nourish them, and to their great delight, to keep them in continual health; we may add also, that their food was abundantly supplied, without the labour and toil of procuring it. But the living water and "the tree of life" in the city of God, are not like the meat and drink of man in common with animals, such as we have in this world; but so excellent, so great, so divine are they, that the Prophet sings, "They shall be inebriated with the plenty of thy house, and thou shalt make them drink of the torrent of thy pleasure." (Psalm xxxv.) Neither is this meat or drink any thing corporal, but it is spiritual and divine, of which we read in Ecclesiasticus: "She will give him the water of wholesome wisdom to drink;" and the tree of life is that bread, of which it is written in the same place, "with the bread of life and understanding she shall feed him." (chap. 15.) And as St. Augustine teacheth, "in corporal things food is one thing, and drink another," but in spiritual matters, food and drink are the same; that is, wisdom, or understanding, or intelligence, which signify the same thing, is food that nourishes and drink that extinguishes thirst. But by the "living water," wisdom also may be signified, and by the "tree of life," charity; thus St. John in his first Epistle, "We know that we have passed from death to life, because we love the brethren. He that loveth not, abideth in death.” (chap, iii.) To love as well as to understand, are both spiritual actions; wherefore, the drink of the saints in the city of ^God, is to drink of the living river that springs from the fountain of life, which is God; this means, to enjoy a participation of that wisdom by which God is wise, and which is most profound, high, and unspeakable. The food of the same saints is to eat of the “tree of life;” that is, to enjoy a share of that ineffable love, whereby goodness itself being clearly seen can be loved, and by which God loves Himself, who is infinitely good, and the fountain of all goodness. What these signify, we cannot, nor shall we be able to understand, until we arrive at this blessed city. But when St. John says, “that on both sides of the river is the tree of life, yielding its fruit every month,” we must understand the passage metaphorically, that by a comparison taken from corporal things we may understand the spiritual. The blessed Evangelist intended to point out to us the tree of infinite goodness; and that he might do this, he described the tree which grew at the bank of the river, and which from its excellence, being continually watered, produced fruit every month, not every year as others do. Neither does he wish to intimate, that there is only one tree, but many of the same kind, which are so planted on both sides of the river flowing through the middle of the city, that there is little space between the one and the other; and in this manner, the view of the whole city can be enjoyed, and the flow of the water as well as the fruit of the tree. The goodness of the tree is signified by the words “tree of life;” its fruitfulness by the production of new fruit every month. Hence it is, that the inhabitants of the city always have fresh and ripe fruit fresh, from having it every month ripe, from having had it the month immediately preceding: it is never rotten, never dry, never insipid. All this signifies, that the food of the blessed, (that is, the wisdom by which they perfectly see God, and the charity whereby they perfectly love Him,) is the best, .and never faileth. That which the holy Evangelist adds concerning the leaves of the tree, “for the healing of the nations” seems to mean, that in this our exile, the fruit of the tree of life itself will never be given unto us, but only its leaves; these, however, although they confer not eternal life, are yet useful in “healing” our disorders, the concupiscence of the flesh, the concupiscence of the eyes, the pride of life, &c., by which all men are enfeebled more or less. These leaves are the divine revelations of the prophets and apostles, sent to us from heaven! how sweet an odour would these leaves scatter, if we had the spirit of the Lord. Read the Prophets, the Psalmist, the Gospels, the Epistles of SS. Peter, Paul, John, James, Jude, all these breathe humility, charity, and continency, of which the philosophers make no mention. Wherefore, Christian soul, diligently peruse these leaves, make unto thee from them a daily medicine; and imagine what must be the fruit thereof. And, then despising the husks of swine, ardently sigh for the fruit of Eternal life which is above; think of it, and as long as it is deferred, let the memory of it never depart from thee.

On The Mystical Foundation Of The City Of God

WE have already considered one part of the heavenly Jerusalem, let us now consider another part of the structure. A city not only includes foundations, gates, walls, streets, but also a body of citizens, who according to the variety of their functions, are called the foundations, gates or walls. Hence perhaps a city may more properly be named a collection of citizens under the same laws, rather than a collection of houses within the same walls. Thus Cicero speaks in the Dream of Scipio: “An assembly of men united by laws are called citizens.” Now concerning the heavenly city, which consists of citizens, not only St. John mentions it, but also St. Peter in his first Epistle, and St. Paul in his Epistle to the Ephesians. We have read in the Apocalypse, that in the twelve gates were twelve angels, and thereon were inscribed the names of the twelve tribes of the children of Israel, and in the twelve foundations the twelve names of the twelve apostles of the Lamb. In the first Epistle of St. Peter we read, “Unto whom coming as to a living stone, rejected indeed by men, but chosen and made honourable by God; be you also as living stones built up.” (chap, ii.) And in St. Paul’s Epistle to the Ephesians, “Now therefore you are no more strangers and foreigners, but you are fellow-citizens with the saints, and domestics of God, built upon the foundation of the apostles and prophets, Jesus Christ himself being the chief corner-stone.” (chap. ii. ver. 19.) In the first place, therefore, the city of God has for its foundations the apostles and prophets, because their doctrine supports the whole fabric. Faith is the beginning of salvation, but faith has been revealed by the prophets and apostles, either by writing or preaching the mysteries of the blessed Trinity, the incarnation, the resurrection of the dead, everlasting glory, eternal torments; others also, which are above human reason, we have learned from the apostles and prophets, to whom God had revealed them. But although faith has no place amongst the blessed, since what they believed they see, and what is seen is not believed, but known and understood; yet the apostles and prophets are called the “Foundations” of the heavenly city, because faith being the beginning of salvation, is consequently the beginning of beatitude. But since St. Peter saith, that we as living stones are built upon Christ, and St. Paul in his first Epistle to the Corinthians, “For other foundation no man can lay, but that which is laid, which is Christ Jesus;” therefore there is but one foundation, because in the twelve foundations of the apostles Christ existed, as St. Austin teacheth in his explanation of the 86th Psalm. He himself or His Spirit spoke by them and taught them: hear the apostle Paul, “Do you seek a proof of Christ that speaketh in me:” hear Christ himself, “He that heareth you, heareth me;” and again, “It is not you that speak, but the Spirit of your Father that speaketh in you.” It is certain that the Spirit of the Father and the Son is one and the same; hence we may conclude, that not only the twelve Apostles are to be included in “the twelve foundations,” but all those likewise who first preached the same faith; otherwise St. Paul himself and St. Barnabas, and the seventy disciples who were not in the number of the Apostles, could not be called foundations, nor even the Prophets themselves; and we should make the apostle a liar, (which God forbid,) who hath said, “that we are built on the foundation of the apostles and prophets.” But here occurs a rather difficult question; how can Christ be truly the foundation of the building, when he is called by the apostle “the chief corner-stone;” and David says of Him, that He is exalted to be the “head of the corner?” How can the same stone be in the foundation and at the top? But if we remember that these expressions are metaphorical, we shall easily understand, that to one person contrary names may be applied, on account of the diversity of his functions. Now not only Christ, who is both God and man, but every prelate is the foundation and the head of his Church, because as “the foundation,” he ought to bear the weight of the building, the infirmities of all, and therefore he ought to be below all; and yet as “head” of the building, he is appointed to rule all, command all, and be supported by all. Much more justly, therefore, can Christ our Lord be called the foundation of the Church, because He supports us all, and rules us by His power and authority; at the same time, He is placed as the “Head,” to connect the two points, and of the Jews and Gentiles to form one people, to rule and govern all.

Chapter X

On The Mystical Gate Of The City Of God

LET us now in order consider the gates of the heavenly Jerusalem. According to the general exposition of interpreters, the twelve Apostles are to be understood by the gates: in this explanation they follow St. Augustine in his exposition of the 86th Psalm. But when St. John in the Apocalypse speaks of the “gate,” he mentions twelve angels and the twelve tribes of the children of Israel, whose names are written on the twelve gates of the city of God: but in that verse he makes no mention of the apostles. But the opinion of St. Augustine and of those who follow him is not therefore erroneous, for St. John speaks mystically, not literally as a prophet, not as an historian. The whole description is full of mystical significations. The land of promise, according to all interpreters, was a figure of the heavenly Jerusalem. Abraham was the first to whom the promise was made: “All the land which thou seest, I will give to thee, and to thy seed for ever.” (Genesis xiii. 15.) And St. Paul, in his Epistle to the Galatians: “To Abraham were the promises made, and to his seed;” and a little lower he adds: “But God gave it to Abraham by promise.” Isaac alone was the heir of Abraham, Ismael being excluded, who was the son of the free woman. Thus the Scripture, “For the bond-woman shall not be heir with my son Isaac.” Jacob alone was the heir of Isaac, Esau, his brother, being excluded, who sold his birthright. Hence the prophet Malachias says, “I have loved Jacob, but have hated Esau;” and these words the apostle repeats in his Epistle to the Romans. The heirs of Jacob were all his sons, twelve in number, not one of whom was excluded; and thus the land of promise was divided amongst the twelve tribes of Israel, as we learn from the Book of Josue. This is, therefore, the reason why St. John said in the Apocalypse, that on the twelve gates were inscribed the names of the twelve tribes of the children of Israel; because the entrance into the promised land was a right of inheritance, which belonged to all the children of Israel alone. But, as we mentioned above, St. John speaks figuratively, so that by the twelve tribes of Israel are meant the true Israelites, not according to the flesh, but according to faith and the spirit; and therefore the twelve Apostles are included, as well as their spiritual children. For, as St. Paul clearly teaches us in his Epistle to the Romans: “All are not Israelites that are of Israel, neither are all they that are of the seed of Abraham, children.” (chap. ix. 6.) The same Apostle compares Israel to a tree, whose many branches are broken on account of unbelief, and others ingrafted by reason of faith. Thus, when the Gentiles were converted, they began to be children of Israel, and many of the Jews ceased to be true Israelites. St. Augustine thus proves this point at length: “Is not this a wonderful and deep mystery, that many, not born of Israel, should belong to Israel, and many not children, though they were of the seed of Abraham? How are they not? How are they sons? It is, that they are not sons of promise, belonging to the grace of Christ, but sons of the flesh, bearing an empty name; and thus, neither are they of Israel as we are, nor are we of Israel like they are: for we are according to a spiritual regeneration, they according to a carnal one. In the grandchildren of Abraham, the sons of Isaac viz., Jacob and Esau this great and profound mystery appears, of which the Apostle speaks when he had mentioned the sons promised to Abraham as belonging to the grace of Christ. This the apostolic and catholic doctrine clearly teaches, that the Jews belong to Sara, according to the flesh, but the Israelites to Agar; and, according to the spirit, Christians belong to Sara, Jews to Agar; to Esau likewise, according to the flesh, who is also called Edom, the nation of the Idumeans; to Jacob, who is also called Israel, the nation of the Jews; but, according to the mystery of the Spirit, the Jews to Esau belong, to Israel the Christians.” Thus St. Augustine clearly proves, that Christians are true Israelites, not according to the flesh, but according to the Spirit; and that thereby they are heirs of the land of promise, which is in heaven. Wherefore, the gates of the heavenly Jerusalem have inscribed on them the names of the twelve tribes of Israel, because the gate by which we enter the land of promise is the inheritance of the Sons of God, who alone are true and sincere Christians, the children of the blessed Apostles. These are signified by the true Israelites, that is, the sons of the patriarch Jacob; and when St. John adds, that on the gates were twelve angels, he means that angels are the guardians of those gates, whose office is to prevent any one entering, that has not the right of inheritance. For this reason, perhaps, St. Michael, the archangel, is represented with scales in his hands, because by the angels under him he examines the merits of those who aspire to this heavenly city.

Chapter XL

On The Mystical Stones Of The City Of God

THE rest of the building consists of stones; and these are all the faithful, who are “built up,” according to the expression of St. Peter and St. Paul in their Epistles; and since this part of the building regards every one, it will be very desirable for us to remember the conditions or qualities which those must possess who desire to be built on the foundation of Christ and the apostles, under the chief corner-stone, Christ Jesus; that so they may not only be in the heavenly city, but may also themselves become the highest and most happy city of God. Three conditions are requisite to be built on so noble a foundation: 1st. That we be stones; 2nd. That we be living ones; 3rd. That we be well polished, and be cut square. We must therefore be stones, not wood, or hay, or stubble, that we may make the wall solid that is, we should be sober and firm, persevering in faith, in charity, in humility, and obedience to the Commandments, and not allow ourselves to be carried about “by every wind of doctrine,” as heretics do; neither should we be carried away by various inordinate desires, as bad Catholics are very often. These are not used as stones by the builders of the eternal city, for they serve only for cottages which are easily destroyed. In the second place, we should be “living stones,” as St. Peter admonishes us, that is, full of charity and spiritual life, such as Christ is, “the corner stone,” who, although He died once according to the flesh, yet He always lived according to the Spirit, and after death rose again to die no more. Dead stones build dead edifices, that is, corporal; but a spiritual house, or rather the city of our great King, which is spiritual and celestial, requires spiritual stones, and therefore “living” ones. Thirdly, we must be square and polished stones, not unpolished or shapeless, because thus it becometh the building of a city that is superior to all others. So Arphaxat the king built the city of Ecbatana of square and polished stones, as we read in the book of Judith; and if King Solomon erected a temple to the Lord so beautifully adorned, what ought to be the building of that Eternal city, which so far exceeds all other cities? But this beautifying of our building must be done on earth, not in heaven; and of this the temple of Solomon was a figure. Thus we read in the third book of Kings: “And the house when it was in building was built of stones hewed and made ready, so that there was neither hammer nor axe, nor any tool of iron heard in the house when it was building.” (chap. vii. 7.) The reason was, because the stones were cut and prepared at a distance from the house of the Lord; and thus they were so perfectly polished, that, when they were brought to the temple, they were laid in their proper places with out the sound of the hammer being heard. In the heavenly Jerusalem, also, the sound of the hammer will not be heard, because there no persecution will be, no tribulation no penitential labour, no sighing, no sorrow, no sadness. Wherefore, those stones that are chosen for the glory of the heavenly mansions, ought in this vale of tears to be well cut and polished: thus the Church sings: “Tusionibus, pressuris, Expoliti Lapides, Suis coaptantur locis, Per manus Artificis, Disponuntur permansuri, Sacris sedificiis.” Here penitential labour is necessary for us, because “we all offend in many things,” as St. James affirmeth: here our carnal concupiscence must be tamed, our self-will conquered, our body chastised and brought into subjection: here with indefatigable diligence must we oppose the “shield of faith” against the fiery darts of impure spirits. Therefore, if we cannot bear the stroke of the hammer, how can we, being unpolished, be admitted by the heavenly Architect to form part of the building? If men could but comprehend how much good they deprive themselves of by flying from this hammer, and being unwilling to endure anything that is difficult, bitter, and contrary to their inclination, assuredly they would then alter their mind, and fast often instead of having their banquets; throwing aside their soft garments, they would put on sackcloth, and give themselves up to watching and prayer, instead of indulging in vain talk; and if they received any injury from false brethren, or from open enemies, they would not think of revenge, but would give thanks to God, and earnestly pray to Him for their calumniators and persecutors: this they would do, because “The sufferings of this time are not worthy to be compared with the glory to come, that shall be revealed in us;” and again, “That which is at present momentary and light of our tribulation, worketh for us above measure exceedingly an eternal weight of glory.” And truly, if we consider the “living stones” that have preceded us in the heavenly building, we shall see that all were polished by many strokes of the hammer. Christ Himself, “the corner-stone,” and most precious, who stood in need of no polishing, yet suffered for us that He might leave us an example: “Who, when He was reviled, did not revile; when He suffered, He threatened not.” All the Apostles could say with St. Paul: “Even unto this hour we both hunger and thirst, and are naked and are buffeted, and have no fixed abode: and we labour, working with our hands: we are reviled, and we bless; we are persecuted, and we suffer it. We are blasphemed, and we entreat; we are made as the refuse of this world, the off-scouring of all even until now.” (1 Epistle to the Corinthians, chap. iv.) What shall I say of the martyrs? Did not all ascend unto the city of the heavenly Jerusalem, after they had been “cut and polished” by many tribulations and most cruel deaths? I omit mentioning the holy confessors, anchorets, virgins, widows, and all others who served God. Unless these had crucified their flesh, with its vices and concupiscences, and had waged war against themselves, they would not have been admitted to the heavenly building. But this polishing of “living stones” was necessary, not only after the coming of our Saviour, but before also, and from the beginning of the world itself. The first living stone was Abel, cruelly slain by his brother Gain; afterwards came the holy patriarch Joseph, sold by his brothers. The angel Raphael said to Tobias also: Because thou wast pleasing to God, it was necessary that temptation should try thee.” He did not say, because thou wast a sinner, and hateful to God, it was necessary that you should be punished with blindness and poverty; but he said, because thou wast pleasing unto God, being just and holy, therefore, as a living stone destined for the heavenly building, it was necessary that you should bear the stroke of the hammer. Who amongst the prophets did not suffer persecution from the impious? What torments did not the holy Machabees endure? Let us hear the apostle Paul speaking of the saints in the old Law, in his Epistle to the Hebrews: And others had trials of mockeries and stripes, moreover, also, of bonds and prisons. They were stoned, they were cut asunder, they were tempted, they were put to death by the sword, they wandered about in sheep-skins, in goat skins, in mountains, and in the dens and caves of the earth.” (chap. xi. 37, 38.) What wilt thou say, Christian soul, to these words? If the hammer of the builder did not spare those of whom the world was not worthy, on account of their great sanctity, that so they might be fitly polished for the celestial building, what will become of thee, and of those like thee, who indulge in sin, and consider penitential labours too heavy? One of these two things is necessary: either that thou suffer in this life or in purgatory, or be deprived of a place in that Edifice above, and made to bear for ever the hammer of hell. Why, therefore, dost thou not choose (if thou be wise) rather to endure the short and momentary tribulations of this life, than to be condemned to future ones, eternal and intolerable? Despise not the purgatorial punishments of the world to come; although they are not eternal, yet are they more grievous, and often of longer duration, than any torment of this life. Hear St. Augustine’s Expiation of the 37th Psalm: “It is said, thou shalt be saved, yet so as by fire; and be cause it is said, grievous than any torment a man can endure in this life.” He also adds, “that the torments will be more severe than the punishments of robbers and the torments of the martyrs:” wherefore, those are mad who despise the fire of purgatory, and dread the tribulations of this present life.” And because in the mouth of two or three witnesses every word shall stand, hear St. Gregory on the third penitential Psalm: “I consider this transitory fire to be more intolerable than all present tribulations;” hear St. Bernard in his Sermon on the death of Humbert, a monk: “But this know, that, after this life, in purgatory will be required a hundred-fold what hath here been neglected, even unto the last farthing.” Hear, in fine, St. Anselm, in his Explanation of the third chapter of St. Paul’s First Epistle to the Corinthians: “We must know that this fire is more grievous than anything a man can endure in this life; all the torments of the world are mild in comparison with it, and yet men to avoid them will do whatever they are commanded by others. How much better would it be to do what God commands, that so we might not suffer more grievous torments!” St. Teresa mentions in her “Life,” having seen in Purgatory the souls of many persons of remarkable virtue; some in a secular, others in a religious state, of her ovvr, nunnery and of several other orders; though she says, their penitential and holy lives, their patience, their great regularity in their convent, their tears and humility at their death, had persuaded her they would be admitted straight to glory. “But,” (she continues,) “amongst all the souls I have seen, I have not known any one to have escaped purgatory except three, F. Peter of Alcantara, F. Peter Ivagnez, a religious man of the order of St. Dominic, and a Carmelite Friar.” (See her own life, chap. 38, translated by the pious Mr. Woodhead. 1669.)

Chapter XII

On Flying From The City Of This World

HAVING spoken of the city of God, it only remains that we now explain in a few words what is especially required, as the condition of our being enrolled citizens of this most blessed kingdom. This can be mentioned in one word; that we renounce the world, and live in it as strangers and pilgrims. We cannot be citizens of the world and of heaven at the same time; and there is no one who flies from the world, who is not immediately received into the midst of the city of God. But let us consider the whole subject more at length. Two cities are mentioned in the Holy Scripture; the city of this world which commenced in Cain, for he was the first who founded one, as we read in the book of Genesis; and the city of heaven which began in Abel, the founder of which was not Abel, but God, as St. Paul mentions. Babylon was a figure of the first, which signifies “confusion; but of the latter, Jerusalem was typical, the City of our great king, which means the “vision of peace.” Those are inhabitants of the earthly city who dwell therein, not only in body, but also in heart, who love the earth, pant after its pleasures, struggle for them, contend for them. Of this city the devil is prince, who having been cast down from heaven, possessed the government of the earth. For although our Lord said when his Passion drew nigh, “now is the judgment of the world, now shall the prince of this world be cast out;” and although He truly cast him out by His cross, and triumphed over him, according to St. Paul in his Epistle to the Colossians, “And despoiling the principalties and powers, he hath exposed them confidently in open show, triumphing over them in himself;” yet we must not suppose that the devil was entirely “cast out” of the world, or that he has completely lost the dominion of the world, but only that he was cast out of all those, and has lost dominion over them who united themselves with Christ and his heavenly city, and fled from this earthly one. But that the devil hath yet power over the city of this world, the Apostle teaches us in his Epistle to the Ephesians: “For our wrestling is not against flesh and blood, but against principalities and powers, against the rulers of the world of this darkness, against the spirits of wickedness in the high places.” (chap. vi. 12.) Wherefore Satan, together with his satellites, yet has power in the world, and is the “ruler” thereof; that is, of earthly-minded men, inhabitants of this earthly city, of which St. John says, “It is seated in wickedness.” As if he had said, the world is united with its chief, who is wicked, or the world is under the power and dominion of a “wicked” demon. But the inhabitants of the heavenly city, are those who reign happily in its kingdom, and those also, who although they dwell on earth in their mortal body, are far from it in their heart, for their conversation is in heaven, and “they desire to be dissolved and to be with Christ.” But because whilst on earth they are mixed up with its citizens, therefore the Holy Scripture saith, that they are in the world, but not of the world, and in the world, not as citizens, but as strangers and pilgrims; thus St. Peter teacheth, “Dearly beloved, I beseech you as strangers and pilgrims to refrain yourselves from carnal desires which war against the soul;” on the contrary, the citizens of the world are said in Holy Scripture to be, “Strangers to the Testament, having no hope of the promise, and without

God in this world.” These words St. Paul makes use of in his Epistle to the Ephesians. Since, then, this is the truth, let no one deceive himself, let no one imagine that he can be a citizen of the world and a citizen of heaven at the same time. Citizens of the world are of the world, citizens of heaven are not of the world. To be of the world, and not to be of the world, are contradictory terms, therefore they cannot be united. Hence those whom earthly objects delight, can have no place in the heavenly city, unless they first flee from the world, unless they renounce it, unless they despise its pleasures. And since these considerations are important and understood by few, or not considered as they ought to be, therefore that no one may plead ignorance at the Last day, the apostles and evangelists inculcate and repeat them over and over again; hear our Lord: “You are of this world, I am not of this world;” and to the Apostles He says, “If you had been of the world, the world would love its own: but because you are not of the world, but I have chosen you out of the world, therefore the world hateth you;” hear St. Paul: “The wisdom of this world is foolishness with God;” and again, “You must needs go out of this world that we be not condemned with it;” hear St. James: “Know you not that the friendship of this world is the enemy of God? Whosoever, therefore, will be a friend of this world, becometh an enemy of God;” and St. Peter saith: “Fly the corruption of that concupiscence which is in the world;” and St. John; “Love not the world, nor the things which are in the world. If any man love the world, the charity of the Father is not in him.” Hear, in fine, our Lord himself, in his prayer to his Father: “Pray for them, not for the world do I pray; but for them whom thou hast given me And the world hath hated them, because they are not of the world, as I also am not of the world.” Here we can most clearly perceive, that the world is thus condemned and excommunicated by God, that Christ does not pray for it all. But if Christ does not pray for the world, how can He say in another place, “God so loved the world as to give his own beloved Son?” Doth the Father love the world, and the Son hate it? Or how doth the Son exclude the world from His prayer, whom the Father doth not exclude from His love? St. Augustine, explaining this question, says, that the world for which Christ did not pray, signifies only the wicked, as St. Paul mentions in his first Epistle to the Corinthians; “That we be not condemned with this world.” It may also be said that Christ did not pray for the world, because what He then was asking for the Apostles, did not in the least regard the world; for He prayed for the gift of perseverance: “Keep them in thy name.” And at the same time He prayed that they might possess eternal glory, when He said, “Father, I will that where I am, they also whom thou hast given me may be with me, that they may see my glory.” (St. John, chap. xvii. 24.) Now these words cannot apply to the world, for it is not fit for the kingdom of heaven, unless it be first purified; as a man covered with dirt and mire, would not be fit to enter the chamber of a king. But God loved the world, and delivered his Son for it, that he might cleanse it, and make it fit for his kingdom. Wherefore Christ prayed for his enemies, not that they might remain in their wickedness, but that his Father might pardon them, and thereby cleanse them, that so they might not be of the world. This our Saviour observed in his prayer, when he said, “Not for the world do I pray,” for he added a little lower, “That the world may believe that thou hast sent me.” The conclusion, therefore, is, Christ prayed for his friends, not for the world, because unless we first leave the world before we leave the body, we cannot arrive at the kingdom of God. Wherefore, whoever loveth this heavenly city, let him hasten to depart from the world, lest the last day suddenly come upon him, and he be snatched from life, when there will be no hope of his salvation. And when in spirit he shall have left the world, let him forget it and its pleasures, and remember continually the city of the Lord alone, vowing with the prophet David: “If I forget thee, Jerusalem, let my right hand be forgotten. Let my tongue cleave to my jaws, if I do not remember thee: if I make not Jerusalem the beginning of my joy.” (Psalm cxxxvi.) This is a true mark of being citizens of the eternal city, if truly from our heart we prefer rather to be deprived of our tongue and of our hands, than to do or say any thing against the love of God our Father, and our heavenly country: and if “the beginning of our joy” be indeed that City, which maketh its inhabitants so blessed as not to take pleasure in any earthly happiness, and the mere remembrance and expectation of future joys, be alone sufficient to gladden our heart in this our exile. We will now conclude this with a passage from St. Augustine, that those who may not perhaps believe my words, may at least credit those of so great a man. In his Explanation of the 61st Psalm, he mentions what are the true marks of the citizens of the world, and of the inhabitants of the city of God: “All who seek after earthly things,” he saith, “all who prefer the happiness of the world before God, all who mind their own interests, and not those of Jesus Christ, belong to that city which is mystically called Babylon, and have for their king, the Devil; but all who mind the things that are above; who meditate on heavenly truths; who live in the world with fear lest they should offend God, and who when they do offend him, are not ashamed to confess their sins; the mild, the holy, and just, and good, all these belong to that city which hath Christ for its King.”

Book III (The House of the Lord)

Chapter I

All The Blessed Are The Familiar Sons Of God

“I REJOICED at the things that were said to me: We shall go into the house of the Lord.” (Psalm cxxi.) That good and faithful servant has abundant and unspeakable cause to rejoice, who hath either diligently laboured in the vineyard, or multiplied his talents in business, or was the first to win the prize in the race, or who hath gained a crown in war or single combat, who hath carefully fed the flock entrusted to him, and courageously defended them from the wolves: and now having completed all his labours, he enters with joy into the house of his Lord. But let us consider why that is called a House which before was named a city: it is not because the house is narrow, and therefore doth not deserve the name of a city: on the contrary, it is infinitely more extensive than any city or kingdom. Hear how the prophet Baruch exclaims: “Israel, how great is the house of God, and how vast is the place of his possession! It is great, and hath no end: it is high and immense.”(chap. iii. 24.) But why is the House so great? The first reason is, because the blessed although occupying every part of the kingdom of heaven, are all the familiar friends and domestics of God. For if mention were only made of a kingdom or city, it might be supposed by some, that there would be many in the city of our God, who could never see him, never speak unto him, except they gained admittance by other greater saints. But this is not the case; for all behold God always; they hold converse with Him, they speak with Him face to face whether seraphim or cherubim, apostles or prophets, or inferior angels and saints. Of our angel-guardians who belong to the last order of spirits, our Lord saith: “Their angels in heaven always see the face of my Father who is in heaven.” And St. Paul, writing to the Ephesians, tells us, that all the blessed are not only citizens of the saints, but also “domestics of God.” Wherefore, their habitation is not only called a city, but likewise a House. There are many mansions in heaven, some high, some low; there is also a diversity of crowns, some great, some inferior, according to the degree of merit: but yet all the citizens are blessed and happy, and all clean of heart, and full of charity. Wherefore, every one in that House sees God, and converses with him as a domestic and friend; although in earthly kingdoms and cities, there are many who can never see the king, and very few who are admitted to his friendship, or to an interview. Another reason appears to be, because although in a city many do see the king and speak to him, yet all are not his sons and heirs, but only those who live in the palace, and are acknowledged to be his sons and heirs. But in the kingdom of heaven and in the city of our God, all the saints, without any exception, are true sons of God, brothers of Christ, heirs of God, and co-heirs with Christ: neither do the great despise the inferior, nor is there any envy or jealousy amongst them. And when our Lord taught us to recite daily the “Our Father,” he therein excluded no one: and when he will say at the last day, “Come, ye blessed of my Father, possess you the kingdom prepared for you from the foundation of the world.” he will not exclude any one of the just: and when the Apostle said to the Romans, “Whosoever are led by the Spirit of God, they are the sons of God;” and again, “For the Spirit himself giveth testimony to our spirit, that we are the sons of God. And if sons, heirs also; heirs indeed of God, and joint heirs with Christ,” no one is excluded, neither great nor little, provided he possess the Spirit of God, and suffer himself to be led by him. This is also given to all who have been regenerated in Christ, and who shall persevere in faith, hope, and charity. St. Peter also, in his first Epistle, promises to the regenerated “an inheritance incorruptible and undefiled, that can not fade, reserved in heaven.” In fine, St. John in his Epistle says to all the Just, without exception: “Behold, what manner of charity the Father hath bestowed upon us, that we should be called, and should be the sons of God.” (chap. iii.) Justly, therefore, is the habitation of the blessed called a House and not merely a city and kingdom, wherein all are sons and heirs of our great King, and all beloved by Him as his sons, and by Christ as his brothers: with reason may they exclaim with the prophet: “How good and pleasant is it, for brethren to dwell together in unity.” What greater happiness can be conceived, than to converse with innumerable angels, to be loved by them with a most sincere love, to be treated as a brother, to be embraced as a brother!

Chapter II

The Magnitude And Beauty Of The House Of God

ANOTHER reason may be assigned, why the habitation of the saints is called a House, because it has especially if the abode of royalty ornaments, consisting of halls, chambers, and other apartments, which a city does not possess. For who can number the carpets, tapestry, pictures, precious vests, and gold and silver vessels which adorn the palaces of kings? And not only the interior decorations are of a great value, but the building itself also is admirable, on account of the precious marble, the pillars, the gilded or painted courts, the hanging gardens, and other things which it would be too long to enumerate. After Solomon, king of Jerusalem, had built a temple to the Lord of suitable magnificence, he also erected a palace for himself of such extent, that the building thereof took thirteen years; though at the same time he employed many men, and had at hand an abundance of precious stones and cedar-wood. With the same expense and industry, he built a palace for his wife, the daughter of the king of Egypt, and the house “of the forest of Libanus,” of which a description is given in the third Book of Kings: and so sumptuous was it, that it seems incredible. Wherefore, when the sacred Scripture calls that the House. which before it had called the city of God, the meaning is, that both the city and the kingdom shine as resplendent as a royal palace doth shine. For the prophet Baruch hath told us, “the house of God is so great, that it occupies the whole extent of the kingdom of God. If a whole kingdom possessed as much magnificence as its chief city, this would indeed excite our admiration. Who will not therefore be astonished, when he recollects that the kingdom of heaven is called the House of God, because all the beauty and value of its ornaments are the same, as the house of God itself? Justly doth the prophet David exclaim: “My soul longeth and fainteth for the courts of the Lord.” (Psalm Ixxxiii.) Who will not then desire with his whole heart, to see and to possess this royal and most noble palace, which equals in its extent a whole kingdom? And, on the other hand, to see and to possess this boundless kingdom, which equals any royal palace in beauty and magnificence? But not only would our souls desire such a house and such a kingdom, were it attentively to consider, and faithfully believe these words; but it would even be quite ravished by the consideration of the beauty and magnitude thereof. But alas! being solicitous for earthly goods, we deem those objects alone great, which we see on earth, and therefore we think not of invisible things: we act just as children do, who never having left their father’s house, love it beyond all others, and never think of the palaces of kings; or like rustics who have never visited any great city, they are solicitous only about the cultivation of the fields, about the repair of their thatched cottages: but no cares ever disturb them about palaces, towers, forums, theatres, honours, dignities, riches, or splendid banquets. And, perchance, these rustics and children are more happy than rich citizens and great princes, because those things which appear grand, bring with them more trouble and danger than solid utility and dignity. But the good things in the heavenly House of God our Father, are both truly great and cause no trouble unto us, nor danger: they will free us from every evil, not for a time only, but for ever and ever. Wherefore, St. Paul saith, who was neither a child nor a rustic, who had known the goods of this world, being a most learned man, and intimate with the Wise; who had been in the house of God, and had visited the heavenly city, being rapt into paradise and the third heaven he saith of himself: “While we look not at the things which are seen, but at the things which are not seen. For the things which are seen are temporal; but the things which are not seen, are eternal;” and again: “Our conversation is in heaven. Seek the things that are above, where Christ is sitting at the right hand of God. Mind the things that are above, not the things that are upon the earth.”

Chapter III

The Chambers Of The House Of God

THERE is another reason why the kingdom of heaven is called the house of the Lord: it is derived from these words of our Master, “In my Father’s house there are many mansions.” In earthly dwellings there are dining-rooms, couches to sleep on, and halls or courts for various purposes, which cannot be performed outside the house. Now in the house of the Lord there are many chambers, wherein all the saints not only feast on royal banquets, but what is most wonderful, and not possible to be credited, had not the Holy Spirit revealed it to us, the King himself ministers unto them, being girded! Thus our Lord speaks in St. Luke: “Blessed are those servants, whom when the Lord cometh he shall find watching. Amen I say to you, that he will gird himself, and make them sit down to meat, and passing will minister unto them.” (chap. xii. 37.) What a banquet is this, I ask thee! Who ever heard of such a feast? The Lord stands, the servant reclines; the Lord is girded, that He may “minister” without impediment, the servant is ungirded, that he may recline more freely; the Lord passeth bringing food, the servant eateth with pleasure the royal food! O! did we but consider and understand these things, how insignificant would all earthly pleasures become! Our Lord on one occasion girded himself with a towel, that he might wash the feet of his disciples. But Peter was astonished, and could not endure to see his Lord wash the feet of servants. And with reason was Peter thus astonished, because he beheld majesty humbling itself to give an example of humility. But in our celestial house, this ministering of the Lord is not an humiliation, but a favour; for the servants of God in heaven, where the proud will not enter, stand not in need of an example of humility, for all are confirmed and made perfect in every kind of virtue. Wherefore the girding of the Lord signifies, that He will as freely and as readily be a Lord unto each one of his servants, by loading and refreshing them with every blessing, as if He had nothing else to do, and were alone with each one of them! O Christian soul! what doth this mean? Would that thou wert wise, and couldst understand with what honour and joy the Lord will fill his servant for ever! If these truths could descend deeply into thy heart, truly thou wouldst become fervent in spirit; and with thy loins girt, thou wouldst joy fully devote thy whole being to the service of so sweet a Lord. And if any one of his poor brethren met thee, not only wouldst thou not despise him, or look angrily at him; but with the bowels of charity enlarged, thou wouldst relieve him and nourish him, mindful of these words: "Amen I say to you, as long as you did it to one of these my least brethren, you did it to me." (St. Matthew, xxv. 40.) Where it is said, "He will make them sit down to meat," signifies, that the blessed being now admitted into their Father's house, can sit down without the least danger or solicitude, and enjoy all the good things with which the house of the Lord is filled. From henceforth, no one will be able, either by force or by fraud, to hinder them or forbid them enjoying every good most freely. Lastly, where it is said that, "passing he will minister unto them," this signifies, there is a special banquet for the saints in the Lord himself, for he is the bread of life; he is the fountain of wisdom; he is a hidden manna, which no one knoweth of but he that receiveth. Wherefore, He passeth unto all, he giveth unto all ineffable banquets, that satiate without loathsomeness, and fill with out satiety.

Chapter IV On The Couches In The House Of God

LET us now pass from the chambers to the couches. "The saints shall rejoice in glory," saith David, "they shall be joyful in their beds." (Psalm cxlix.) These "beds" signify nothing more, than the eternal rest of the saints, and that "sleep" of which the prophet speaks in other places, "When he shall give sleep to his beloved; behold the inheritance of the Lord," &c. And again, "In peace in the self-same I will sleep, and I will rest." In fine, this is that rest of which St. John makes mention; "Write, blessed are the dead who die in the Lord. From henceforth now, saith the Spirit, that they may rest from their labours; for their works follow them." (Apocalypse, chap. xiv. 13.) Great is this blessing, possessed only by the saints; for in this life no one is entirely free from labour, and those who seem at rest, such as nobles and rich men, are often oppressed with the greater troubles. Not without reason hath our Lord compared riches to thorns, in the parable of the sower; and Job saith; "Man's life upon earth is a warfare," and one of his companions: "Man is born to labour and the bird to fly." But Ecclesiasticus is the clearest of all on this point: "Great labour is created for all men, and a heavy yoke is upon the children of Adam, from the day of their coming out of their mother's womb, until the day of their burial into the mother of all. Their thoughts, and fears of the heart, their imagination of things to come, and the day of their end: From him that sitteth on a glorious throne, unto him that is humbled in earth and ashes. From him that weareth purple and beareth the crown, even to him that is covered with rough linen: wrath, envy, trouble, unquietness, and the fear of death, continual anger and strife." (chap, xl.) Thus Ecclesiasticus most beautifully teacheth us, that no mortal can enjoy rest at any time. But I will briefly explain these words, that all may understand how great is the "sleep." that is, the rest of the blessed. "Great labour is created for all men, and a heavy yoke is upon the children of Adam." Occupation is opposed to rest: but because many are occupied in pleasant things, in hunting, in games, in music, in dancing, it is added "A heavy yoke," to show us that he speaks of laborious and troublesome labours with which no one is pleased, and which all fly from. But these troublesome labours are "created for all men," that is, destined for men from their creation, as their individual and inseparable companions. This Ecclesiasticus explains, lest perhaps he might not be understood by some, "From the day of their coming out of their mother's womb, until the day of their burial in the mother of all." Wherefore, oxen that sometimes bear a heavy yoke, but rest at night, are better off than man who is compelled to carry his "heavy yoke" day and night. He then briefly mentions a part of the troublesome occupations, which like unto a most heavy yoke, press upon the neck of mortals. "Their thoughts and fears of the heart, their imagination of things to come, and the day of their end." The first portion of their labour is the thought of the future, for they are always solicitous about to-morrow, saying within themselves, What will happen after this? Shall we lose the little we possess? From this solicitude proceeds a continual fear, which does not suffer man to be at rest. This solicitude, with its offspring, which is fear, is two-fold: one which the mind imagines to itself; the other which is certain, and which one can avoid. Of the first Ecclesiasticus speaks, "Their imagination of things to come:" of the latter, "The day of their end." Men imagine, that is, represent to themselves various future contingencies, which no less disturb them than if they were certainly to happen. But the thought and fear of death especially frightens them, which is called "the day of their end:" all await this with so much terror, that St. Paul in his Epistle to the Hebrews, calls it a continual "servitude:" for the expectation of death can embitter all the pleasures of life. Lastly, Ecclesiasticus adds, that this laborious occupation is so common to all the sons of Adam as to be long to all men, from the first unto the last; "from him that sitteth on a glorious throne, that weareth purple and beareth the crown, unto him that is humbled in earth and ashes." Thus all men, since the sin of Adam, are more miserable even than the beasts of the field: for these live without fear, and are not solicitous for to-morrow, neither do they remember past labours, nor are they disturbed by the imagination of things to come. And therefore hath Ecclesiasticus said, that this yoke is upon "all the children of Adam," in order that he might both exclude the beasts of the field, and show us that the cause of all this misery, was the sin of our first parent. But the lot of those who aspire not after their heavenly home is the most miserable of all, because, after having carried a heavy yoke in this life, they will be forced to bear a still more heavy one in hell. In this world our troubles are often united with some consolations; but in hell there will be labour and sorrow, without rest or consolation: for, in the blessed House of God alone can there be rest without labour, and consolation without sorrow. With reason doth the prophet say: "The saints shall rejoice in glory: they shall be joyful in their beds." (Psalm cxlix.) They rest not as those that sleep, who do not feel their rest, but they rest with great joy, knowing and feeling with eternal gratitude their most happy rest, free from labour, pain, fear, and trouble. Truly, if there were nothing else in the House of the Lord but this eternal rest, would it not be worthy of being purchased by all the sorrows and labours of this life? and if in hell there were no other torment but an everlasting want of rest, would it not be worthy of being redeemed by the daily prayers and tears of a whole life? As it will be consoling to the saints to be hold, at their departure from this world, the end of all their labours and sorrows, so, likewise, will it be bitter for the wicked to reflect, at their death, that henceforth they can hope for no rest from their sorrows. Death is said to be the chief of all terrible things; and yet, because it appears to bring some rest, therefore most miserable are they who shall descend into hell, for "They shall seek death, and shall not find it: and they shall desire to die, and death shall fly from them." (Apocalypse ix. 6.) Wherefore, the being deprived of all rest will be a more grievous evil than even death itself. And yet, so great is the blindness of men, that they think nothing of losing eternal rest, and of descending into that pit wherein their torments will never admit of consolation.

Chapter V

On The Courts Of The House Of God

IN earthly houses certain places are set apart for various purposes. But, in the courts of the blessed, all are occupied in one occupation alone, the praise of their great King. Here, in this world, some are occupied in gaming money, in acquiring dignities, in acquiring knowledge, either to teach or to learn; whilst others devote themselves to mechanical arts, in order to provide the necessaries of life. But amongst the living, immortal inhabitants of heaven there will be no wants, no ignorance, no necessity, no ambition: all being content with their state, neither desire nor require anything more - they are entirely devoted to the enjoyment, love, and praise of their "chief Good." But some one may say, that the duty of praising God in psalms and hymns, and especially in reciting the canonical hours, is laborious and tiresome; and some there are who even consider it a heavy burden imposed upon them to spend so much time in singing in the Churches, and in praising God. To whom we answer, that "praising" God in this life is a meritorious act, but in the next it will be a reward. Hence it is, that what may be to many laborious here, in heaven will be a sweet occupation to all the saints. Now, we read and sing many things which we do not understand, whilst we labour much in driving away vain thoughts, which are like so many trouble some flies. Moreover, our body, which is mortal, cannot for any long space of time attend to the functions of the mind without being fatigued. But, in our blessed country, the body will be immortal and impassible; vain thoughts will depart; we shall most perfectly understand what we sing; and, what is the greatest of all, the divine praise will be nothing more than the exercise of our happiness. Wherefore, if eternal happiness will not be troublesome, neither can the eternal praising of God be. That the praising of God is an exercise of beatitude, the prophet teaches thus: "Blessed are they that dwell in thy house, O Lord: they shall praise thee for ever and ever." (Psalm lxxxiii.) As beatitude consists in always loving and beholding the "chief Good," so the exercise of beatitude consists in always admiring and praising God; and as no one will be wearied in loving Him, so no one will be wearied in praising Him. And again: we shall not only not grow weary in seeing and loving God, but we shall never be tired in seeing and praising the works of God, which will always be before us, showing forth His wonderful beauty, Nor can we praise the beautiful works of God without our praising the Author of them at the same time, for they will ever cry out unto us: "He made us, and not we ourselves." In fine, as we can never forget the benefits with which God hath loaded us, so we cannot but exult with the most grateful hearts in the praises of our most bountiful Benefactor. Let us then conclude with St. Augustine, and say: "What else could be done, where neither any sloth will be admitted, nor any want shall labour? God Himself will be the end of our desires: He will be seen without end, loved without weariness, praised without fatigue. This gift, this love, this exercise, will be truly shared by all, as eternal life itself will be common to all. There we shall rest and see: we shall see and love: we shall love and praise. Behold, what will be in the end without end. What other end have we than to arrive at that kingdom which hath no end?"

Chapter VI

On The First Gate Of The House Of God, Which Is Faith

HAVING explained these points, it now remains for us to consider what is the gate by which we shall be enabled to enter that most blessed House. But our Lord Himself, in the Gospel, not only makes mention of the gate, but also tells us that it is very narrow, for, being asked, "Lord, are they few that are saved?" He answered: "Strive to enter by the narrow gate, for many, I say to you, shall seek to enter, and shall not be able. But when the Master of the House shall be gone in, and shall shut the door, you shall begin to stand without, and knock at the door, saying: Lord, open to us. And He shall say to you: I know not whence you are: depart from me, all ye workers of iniquity." (St. Luke, chap, xiii.) Thus our Lord plainly teaches us, that the "gate" of the house of God, which is in heaven, is very narrow, although the House itself is most extensive; and that, because it is narrow, many will not enter therein who otherwise would; that they indeed desire to enter, but will not strive for it, nor be willing to suffer any violence. But we will explain how it is that the gate of this most extensive House is narrow. The gate has four divisions: the threshold, the inner court, and two side passages that is, four stones: one below, another above, and two at the sides; which, in our gate, are four virtues, essentially necessary in order to enter the heavenly house. These are faith, hope, charity, and humility. Faith and hope are the two lateral stones, charity is the inner court, humility is the threshold on which we walk. But all these stones that is, all these virtues have their length and breadth so small, that in them selves they are narrow, and, accordingly, they make the gate very narrow.

Let us begin with faith. True Christian faith is so narrow that, unless the mind do violence to itself, and suffer itself to be reduced as it were into captivity, to be bound and trampled upon, no one can enter by it. This is what St. Paul means in his Second Epistle to the Corinthians: "Bringing into captivity every understanding unto the obedience of Christ." (chap, x.) The Christian faith proposes many things to be believed, which are so beyond all understanding that it is most difficult to give our consent to them; and yet are we commanded to believe them so firmly that we should be prepared (if necessary) to die a thousand times rather than deny one article of faith. This is a difficult duty, and no wonder so few comply with it. This is the reason why so many go over to Mahometanism and other heresies, because they cannot bear the strictness of faith, but have made the gate very wide, which nevertheless leads, not to life, but to destruction, according to the words of our Lord in St. Matthew: "Wide is the gate, and broad is the way that leadeth to destruction, and many there are who go in thereat." (chap, vii.) Every one naturally desires knowledge, but all do not readily assent to a proposition, unless it be demonstrated, or a probable reason for it be given. St. Paul, the Apostle, experienced this; for, although he eloquently preached from an infused and acquired learning, and by the gift of tongues, yet when he spoke of the Resurrection of the dead many laughed at him, and others said, "What is it that this word-sower would say?" And when he preached "Christ crucified," it appeared foolishness to the Gentiles, and to the Jews a stumbling block, as he mentions in his First Epistle to the Corinthians. Hence, the ancient heretics, in order to widen the narrow gate, invented various errors. Some denied the mystery of the Trinity, as the Sabellians and Arians; others the mystery of the Incarnation, as the Nestorians and Eutychians; others the Resurrection of the dead, as the Origenists, &c. But all these gates (besides many more) being built by human architects, and wanting a solid foundation, fell in a short time, so that now we scarcely know their names: and these even would not have reached us, had we not read them in the works of those who exposed them, as St. Irenaeus, Philaster, St. Epiphanius, St. Augustine, Theodoret, &c. The Mahometans, whose sect is now so widely extended, have cast away nearly all the most difficult points in the Christian faith: the blessed Trinity, the Incarnation of the divine Word, the death and resurrection of the Son of God, the sacrament of Penance, and the holy Eucharist. These being thus cast aside, the gate is widened to admit an innumerable multitude. But the heretics of our own time have endeavoured to enter by another way, for they have taken away those narrow barriers which relate not so much to the understanding as to action. The Christian faith teaches that all sins are to be avoided; that we shall have to give an account even of every idle word; that if we fall into mortal sin, we must confess it to a priest, and blot it out by serious contrition and satisfaction; that good works, though laborious and difficult, are to be performed if prescribed by our superiors; that the kingdom of heaven can be acquired by good works, as a crown of justice, and a reward of labour; that "celibacy" is to be observed by priests; that monks and nuns are obliged to keep their vows. These and other points, which make the gate narrow, the heretics have so taken away as to make it very wide. For they assert, that faith alone is necessary for salvation, so that a Christian could not perish, though denied with every sin, provided only he believed; that there is no need of confessing our sins to a priest, but only to God; that contrition is not required, a certain terror of the mind being sufficient; that works of penance and satisfaction are not necessary; that a priest is at liberty to marry, and monks and nuns to violate their vows; that superiors cannot oblige the faithful to perform good works, &c. These and other doctrines of faith being taken away, the heretics made the gate of salvation very wide for themselves: but they opened a way that leadeth to destruction, and through it they brought to perdition, together with themselves, an immense multitude of foolish men. But neither do all Catholics keep within the narrow boundaries of faith, for, although they believe what their faith teaches them, yet because they live differently from what their faith commands, they are proved to be in the number of those of whom St. Paul speaks where he says: "They profess that they know God, but in their works they deny him." Thus, these likewise enter in at the wide gate that leads to destruction. Wherefore, with regard to faith, when our Lord was asked, "If they are few who are saved?" we answer, few there are; and hence all must strive to enter in at the narrow gate.

Chapter VII

On Hope, Which Is The Second Gate Of The House Of God

HOPE likewise has its difficulties, whether we consider the greatness of the reward promised, or our own weakness and nothingness. If an ignorant rustic, without experience were commanded to hope that in a short time he should possess the wisdom of Solomon, or that of Plato and Aristotle, and at the same time the kingdom of Alexander the Great or of Augustus how, I ask, could such a humble individual be persuaded to hope for such great things? But this is much more easy than that a mortal man could hope to possess the wisdom and power of the angels in heaven, who are pure intelligences. For this rustic, and Alexander, and Aristotle, were of the same nature, and alike mortal; and the wisdom of Aristotle did not exceed all human wisdom, neither did the empire of Alexander occupy a third part of the globe. But Christians are commanded to hope for an equality with the angels, according to the words of our Lord: "But they that shall be accounted worthy of that world, and of the resurrection of the dead, shall neither be married nor take wives. Neither can they die any more: for they are equal to the angels, and are the children of God, being the children of the resurrection." (St. Matthew, chap. xx. 38.) Again: if a man that crawls upon the ground were commanded to hope that in a short time he would fly through the air, or subsist in the water for some time, and go here and there, how could he be induced to believe these things? And yet large birds, as cranes and storks, fly through the air as swiftly as eagles; and large ships, heavy laden, sail up and down the waters just as the pilot directs them. But Christians are without doubt commanded to hope, that with their bodies they will one day ascend above the heavens; and that from heaven to earth they can descend without the least danger of falling, and contend with the sun itself in its course from east to west, with the certain hope of victory. In line, if some poor orphan were commanded to hope that he would be adopted as a son by a great king unknown to him, truly it would take much labour to induce him to think this could be possible; and yet both are men, children of the earth, and doomed to die. But Christian hope teaches us, that every one, provided he be baptized in Christ, and observe his commandments, will have the “spirit of adoption” from God, will be truly chosen His son, and made heir of all things which God Himself possesseth co-heir with Christ, who is His natural and only Son, and whom the Father hath appointed Heir of all things. If these great and sublime hopes were entertained by Christians as they should be, they would certainly make them fearless as lions, so that no dangers or terrors could conquer them; and they would exclaim with the prophet: “The Lord is my keeper: I will not fear what man can do unto me If armies in camp should stand together against me, my heart shall not fear;” and with the apostle: “I can do all things in Him who strengtheneth me;” and again: “If God be for us, who shall be against us?” But few there are who hope for such aid as they ought; whilst many are found who do not look even for temporal blessings from God, but trust more to their own cunning, to theft and lies, than in the aid of the Most High. Our Lord Himself, in St. Matthew and St. Luke, admonishes the faithful by most beautiful parables, not to be too solicitous about food and raiment, because our heavenly Father, who nourishes the birds that neither sow nor reap, and clothes the lilies of the field that neither labour nor spin, will much more take care of His children for whom He intends an eternal kingdom: but yet, so little confidence have many people in God, that often in their troubles they rather have recourse either to human fraud or diabolical arts, than to the Almighty. Wherefore, if these do not hope to receive from God what He gives to the birds of the air, and the lilies of the field, and which He hath, promised to give them if they trust in Him, this is a great proof that their hope is not of that character which belongs to the sons of God, who hope to receive a share in His eternal kingdom. And since no one can attain salvation without a certain and living hope, which is a part of the gate of the heavenly “House.” therefore few are they that are saved. There are also other and greater difficulties in the virtue of hope. It commands us to despise present things, which are seen, and to hope for future goods, which are not seen; to give alms to the poor, that, being multiplied, they may be returned to us in heaven, though no one here can see them, or conceive what we shall there receive, if we sow them on earth. A rustic can indeed be easily persuaded to sow his seed in the ground, because the experience of many years teaches him that what is sown with labour will be reaped with joy. But no experience teaches us that what is given to the poor will be received back again with interest in heaven. Therefore, it Appears difficult to men to lose present things, which are seen, and to hope for future blessings, which are not seen. Lastly, it is an evident proof that a firm confidence in God is a very narrow gate, to behold such a great number that weep, lament, murmur, blaspheme, and despair. Those who confide in God, He either takes away from them their afflictions, or gives them patience, united with such great consolation, as to enable them to exclaim with the Apostle: “I am filled with consolation, I super-abound with joy in all my tribulations.” They, therefore, that immoderately weep and lament in their troubles, prove as St. Basil shows in his Explanation of the 45th Psalm that they may exclaim in words: “The Lord is our refuge and our strength;” but that few truly and earnestly say so in their hearts.

Chapter VIII

On Charity, Which Is The Third Gate

LET us now speak of charity, which is the court of the heavenly gate. Charity is the queen of virtues, and on one side seems boundless, because it extends to God, to the angels, to men even those who may be unknown to us, and our enemies; but, on the other side it is made “narrow,” on account of the incredible difficulties it brings along with it, since its precepts are to be observed, not only in word and in tongue, but “in deed and in truth.” For what, I ask, doth this queen command? First, that we love God “with our whole heart, with our whole soul, with our whole strength.” We are reduced to great difficulties when we endeavour to fulfil these commands. For, to love God with our whole heart and strength, what else is it but a true and earnest love? “With our whole heart and soul” signifies, that our love must be real, not feigned; not in word and in tongue, as St. James saith, but in word and in deed. “With our whole strength” signifies, that our love of God ought to be supreme. The force of the precept, therefore, consists in loving God with a true and perfect love, so that we should prefer nothing before Him, but be prepared with the patriarch Abraham, if the glory of God required it, to sacrifice our only begotten and most beloved son. And not this merely; but also, as our Lord commands us in the Gospel, to hate father and mother, wife and children, brothers and sisters, even our own soul, and to renounce all that we possess: that is, we should be ready to be deprived of all these things with such promptitude as we should have, if we hated them in reality. This is truly a severe command, and who can understand it? But how easily will men be found, and these not a few, who would rather renounce God and his promises than their riches and temporal honours, and much less their life or that of their sons! St. Cyprian, in his Treatise on the “Lapsed,” beareth testimony, that in the primitive Church, when the fire of charity was much more ardent than now, there were many deserters, who preferred their riches and their lives before God; and Eusebius, in his Ecclesiastical History, testifies the same. But what shall we say of charity towards our neighbours? What doth charity command us to do with regard to our neighbours? That we love them as we love ourselves; and that what we wish to be done to ourselves, we do to our neighbours also. Who therefore is there, being much in need, would not wish the rich to give him something out of their superabundance? Neither would he consider it as an excuse, if the rich man answered, “That he was encumbered with debt, that he had purchased a villa at an enormous sum, that he was building a sumptuous palace, or, at least, adorning it with precious marble.” But these were perhaps not necessary, and therefore charity does not allow our indigent neighbours to be deprived of subsistence. On this point I beseech the reader to consult St. Basil in his “Sermon to the Rich;” and also St. Bernard on the words: “Behold, we have left all things.” He will see, and be terrified at the danger of those who do not think they will have to render an account to God of their riches, but live according to their own pleasure, not according to the will of God, and in charity towards their neighbours. If we shall have to give an account of “every idle word,” much more shall we of money ill-spent. But let us hear St. John the apostle, and from him learn how extensive is the duty of charity. He saith: “In this we have known the charity of God, because He hath laid clown His life for us: and we ought to lay down our lives for the brethren.” (1 Epist. chap. iii. 16.) Christ laid down His life for His servants: can it, therefore, be a great thing if we lay down our life for our brethren? The apostle does not say we can, but “we ought to lay down our life for the brethren;” neither did he say, I think, I advise, but absolutely, “We ought.” And if we ought to give our life, why not our riches much more? Wherefore, St. Gregory justly concludes: “Since our soul, by which we live, is incomparably superior to our earthly substance, which we possess, who will not give his substance when he ought to lay down his life?” The same may be said on other points; for he who ought to lay down his life for the brethren, ought much more to pardon an injury or an affront. And ought he not also to be on his guard, lest he injure his brother in word or in deed? But, because this precept of charity towards God and our neighbour is so difficult that few comply with it; therefore, when our Lord was asked, “If few are saved,” with reason did He answer, “Few:” we must then endeavour, with our whole strength, to enter with the few the narrow gate.

Chapter IX

On Humility, Which Is The Fourth Gate

THERE now remaineth humility, which also hath its difficulties, and these not a few. What doth our Master command, who hath most truly said of Himself: “Learn of me, because I am meek and humble of heart. Go, sit down in the last place”? When He came into this world, he was born in a stable, and died on a cross. Truly, no one, when born, could have found a more lowly place; nor, dying, a more disgraceful one. And whilst He lived, He was poorer, not only than men, but even than the beasts of the field: for the foxes had holes, and the birds of the air their nests, “but the Son of man had nowhere to lay His head.” But what means, “Sit down in the last place”? This is the meaning: wherever thou art, how ever great thou mayest be, always consider thyself worthy of the last place. St. Paul, in his Epistle to the Galatians, gives a reason for this where he says: “If any man think himself to be something, whereas he is nothing, he deceiveth himself.” (ch. vi. 3.) He did not say, he who thinks himself to be great, or superior to others, either in wisdom, or power, or virtue; neither did he say, if any one think himself not to be great, or superior to others, but only equal to them; he said, “If any man think him self to be something.” In fine, he did not say, since he is poor, or unlearned, or ignoble, but, “Whereas he is nothing.” Thus the apostle could not descend lower, in order to designate the “lowest place,” and to give a worthy explanation of the words of our Lord. But it may be said, it is necessary that men should be in high stations such as, prelates, princes, kings, emperors, and pontiffs. Be it so: but yet each one ought to sit down in the lowest place, until the Lord shall say, “Ascend higher.” Of this St.

Augustine gives us an illustrious example, which I will mention in his own words: “From these that love the world I have separated myself: with those who govern the people I have not considered myself equal, nor at the banquet have I chosen the highest place, but the lower: but the Lord said unto me, Ascend higher. But so much did I fear the episcopacy, that I would not have approached it, since amongst men the fame of a certain name had spread; and in this place I knew there was no bishop. I was on my guard, and endeavoured, as far as possible, to be saved in an humble situation, not to be in danger in a high one. But, as I have said, the servant ought not to contradict his Lord.” Oh, that all men would imitate such an example! we should then have many good prelates, many good princes, many excellent magistrates. But, because many push themselves forward, not waiting for a vocation from the Lord, the Almighty is oftentimes angry; and for an example to others, He compels many to sit down in the lowest place, that all may learn how honours and riches, as well as spiritual blessings, depend on Him alone. Hence, we frequently see very rich men reduced in a short time to extreme poverty, and great princes cast down from their thrones. But it is not sufficient to wait for a vocation from God; but we ought also, in the prelacy or sovereignty, not to be overwise, but, according to the advice of the Wise man, the more we are elevated, the more humble should we be unto all: not in demeanour, but in heart, as St. Gregory teacheth in his pastoral, and St. Augustine more clearly in his 109th Epistle: “Let your dignity,” he saith, “be honourable before men; but, before God, place it under your feet.” Each one ought to think others better, and therefore higher than himself. For he is properly and truly the greatest, who is the greatest in the sight of God; and he is the greatest who is the best; and he is the best who excels in virtue, whatever may be his dignity, riches, titles, &c. Virtue alone makes a man good, not dignity, riches, or titles; and if virtues make a man good, greater virtues make him better, and the greatest make him the best. And they who possess virtue in a higher degree excel all others. Now, we may know that humility is one of these great virtues, because our Lord Himself says: “He that shall humble himself shall be exalted,” which words the blessed Virgin follows in the Cantic: “He hath scattered the proud in the conceit of their heart, and hath exalted the humble.” And St. Peter saith: “Be you humbled, therefore, under the mighty hand of God, that He may exalt you in the time of visitation;” and St. James: “Be humbled in the sight of the Lord, and He will exalt you.” In fine, St. Paul says of Christ: “He humbled Himself, and therefore hath God exalted Him.” Since, therefore, these virtues, and especially those of charity and humility, make men good before God; and since again, no one truly knows what he is in the sight of “the Almighty, or what others are or will be therefore, it is dangerous to prefer ourselves to others, but most useful to humble ourselves before all men. Wherefore, our Lord absolutely saith: “Sit down in the lowest place.” But how many comply with this divine precept? For what do men contend more than for precedence? What labours do those endure who endeavour to reconcile men that quarrel about a point of honour! How many do we often hear using these words of Scripture, “I will not give my honour to another?” And yet the Most High speaks thus in Isaiah, to whom alone such words belong. God alone ought not to be humble, since humility is the virtue that restrains a man from desiring to ascend above himself, but since God dwelleth in the highest heaven, nothing can be above Him. Wherefore, pride is intolerable, because a worm of the earth dares to say, “I will not give my glory unto another.” And yet, these same worms whom pride so swells that they say with God, “I will not give my glory to another,” humble themselves as to acknowledge they are the slaves of honour that is, of a false esteem. And so faithfully do these serve their master, honour, that they rather prefer to be cruelly slain in single combat, and to descend into hell, (and thus lose eternal life, and their temporal one at the same time,) than suffer any affront to be given to the idol of their honour. vanity of vanities! Oh, how much doth this smoke of honour blind the eyes of the soul! And yet we call ourselves Christians, and know that Christ heard from His enemies: Behold a man that is a glutton and a wine-drinker; Thou art a Samaritan, and hast a devil; He casteth out devils, by Beelzebub, the prince of devils;” and yet no one heard Him exclaim, “Thou art a liar;” but, because He was meek and humble of heart, When He was reviled, He did not revile; when He suffered, He threatened not, &c. From these considerations, it is manifest that the “gate” of life is narrow, both on account of humility, as well as of the theological virtues, faith, hope, and charity: “Few” enter this gate; and therefore, when the question is asked, “If few are saved,” most truly must we answer, “Few;” because few there are who endeavour, with their whole strength, to enter in at this narrow gate.

More Considerations On Faith

BUT lest we should seem, by too much severity, to drive men away from entering the gate, I will show (since in this book it has been our endeavour to inflame the minds of the faithful with a desire of our most delightful and happy country) that the “gate” which on one side appears most narrow, on account of the perfection of virtue required; on the other is very wide and easy to enter, by reason of the omnipotence, truth, and mercy of God, if we be truly desirous of entering it. Let us begin again with faith. Faith certainly proposes for our belief mysteries most difficult, far above our reason and understanding, and sublimely exalted even above the natural capacity of the angels themselves. But since the doctrine of faith admonishes us, that these mysteries are to be believed on the authority of God, who cannot deceive, and not on that of angels, or of men, then the bounds begin to be enlarged. If faith said, “Believe in one God, and three persons; believe that the Son of God was born of the blessed Virgin; believe that Christ rose immortal from the dead on the third day by His own power:” believe all these points most firmly because SS. Peter, Paul, and John, Isaias, Jeremias, and Ezekiel, have said so, I should hesitate, not daring to believe men like myself on such difficult subjects. It is said, “Every man is a liar;” and therefore it is that we require oaths and witnesses, before we put our trust in men. But since faith says, “All these things hath God revealed;” and neither Peter, nor Paul, nor John, nor the other apostles and prophets, taught them on their own authority, but learned them from God; and since they preached His word, not their own, then my heart enlargeth itself, and is prepared to believe. And that it was God who spoke by the apostles and prophets, hath been manifested unto us by Him in so many signs and wonders, that it would be foolish and rash not to believe. Thus speaks the apostle to the Hebrews: “Which having begun to be declared by the Lord, was confirmed unto us by them that heard Him. God also bearing them witness by signs and wonders, and divers miracles, and distributions of the Holy Ghost according to His own will.” (chap. ii.) What God says, who will gainsay? God cannot lie, for if He could, He would not be God. But these mysteries, which are proposed to our belief, are above our reason. They are: but they are not above the power and wisdom of God. Therefore, saith St. James, “God is greater than our heart;” because He can do what we cannot understand, and His essence and existence are more elevated than our mind can comprehend. If an unlearned man easily believes the many incredible things philosophers and astronomers mention concerning the magnitude of the sun and of the planets, why should not man readily believe also whatever God hath deigned to reveal, since there is an infinite distance between the wisdom and power of the one, and the small spark of reason with which the other is endowed? They therefore, who consider these remarks, will find no difficulty in believing what the Church proposes.

CHAPTER XI

More Considerations On Hope

WE may say the same of the virtue of hope: for if what we hope to receive in the life to come, were said to depend on the promises of man, justly should we be rejected as vain impostors, because men can both deceive, and are quite unable to give such great rewards. But we say, they are not to be hoped for from man, but from God, who can neither lie, since He is truth, nor deceive us, since He is goodness: nor is anything impossible with Him, since He is omnipotent. Wherefore, justly would that rustic think himself mocked at, were any one to promise him the wisdom of Solomon or the power of Augustus, because he that would promise such things would be a man, deceitful and weak. But ought not a Christian to hope, to whom God promises eternal life, the kingdom of heaven, and a paradise of every pleasure? Perhaps we want pledges of this bountiful intention of God. But, as a figure of present things, did not God lead His people through a dry path across the Red Sea? Did He not rain down upon them manna from heaven? Did He not conduct them by Josue into the promised land? Should such a remarkable figure be considered vain and useless? Moreover, if “God so loved the world, as to give His only-begotten Son,” hath He not “with Him given us all things?” That which we hope to receive from God, is it not excelled by the “gift” which He hath given to us, when we neither hoped nor asked for it? If He hath given to sinners and to His enemies the death of His Son, will He not give to the justified and to His friends the life of the same divine Son? But, not content with this, the Holy Spirit is added as a pledge of our inheritance. He crieth in our heart, “Abba (Father); and giveth testimony to our spirit, that we are the sons of God; and if sons, heirs also heirs indeed of God, and joint-heirs with Christ: yet so, if we suffer with Him.” (chap. viii. Epistle to the Romans.) Wherefore, if the magnitude of the things promised seems beyond our hopes, yet they cannot exceed the power of the Promisor; and since this power is infinite, it can easily strengthen our hopes, that we shall without doubt receive the promises. And this promise God hath confirmed with an oath, as the apostle proves in his Epistle to the Hebrews: so that by two certain things, .by the promise of Him who cannot lie, joined to an oath, we can rest our hope, as on a safe Anchor, of approaching even within the veil where Jesus hath entered for us, being a priest for ever according to the order of Melchisedech.

Chapter XII

Other Considerations On Charity

BUT what shall we say of charity? It is very narrow, on account of the difficulty of fulfilling its precepts; but, because of the divine goodness, to which it directs us, it may be said to be very wide. For why should it appear difficult to love God with our whole heart, and, soul, and strength, since He is most beautiful, most wise, and most worthy of infinite love? It is not difficult to love that which is excellent and beautiful on the earth; but it is not to love. Doth God, then, seem to do us an injury when He so strictly commands us to love Him, as if we were not bound to love Him of our own accord? We ardently love what is beautiful in the world, because we clearly see it, but “God no one hath ever seen.” Thus we do not see God, but we daily behold His works, which are so beautiful, and of which the Wise man speaks: “With whose beauty if they, being deceived, took them to be Gods, let them know how much the Lord of them is more beautiful than they: for the first Author of beauty made all these things.” (ch. xiii. 3.) We also experience His goodness in His daily benefits to us; and we have Him for a testimony who beholds us, and who cannot deceive: viz. the Holy Spirit, who speaks by the apostles and prophets in the holy Scripture. God, therefore, is so good and beautiful, that He alone deserves to be called good and beautiful. But you will say, it is hard that we should, for the love of God, be sometimes compelled to lose our property, friends, and even life itself. I acknowledge that it is so to those who love not God: but to those who do love Him, and desire to possess Him, I assert that it is very easy, especially since, if we despise temporal goods for the love of God, we shall possess those that are incomparably superior to them. And what are these? You lose corruptible riches, but you will acquire an eternal kingdom; you lose father, brothers, and friends, but you will possess God for your father, Christ for your brother, and all the angels and saints for your friends and companions: you lose a temporal life, full of misery, but you will gain an eternal one, full of happiness. Hear the Canticle of divine love: “If a man should give all the substance of his house for love, he shall despise it as nothing;” and a little above:”Many waters cannot quench charity, neither can the floods drown it.” Hear, again, a lover of God; “Who then shall separate us from the love of Christ? Shall tribulation? or distress? or famine? or nakedness? or danger? or persecution? or the sword? But in all these things we overcome, because of Him that hath loved us.” (Epistle to the Romans, chap. viii. 35.) But so to love my neighbour as to share my goods with him; and, even though he were my enemy and had grievously injured me, I should be obliged not only to pardon him, but also to be kind towards him: this seems to be against nature. It may be against nature corrupted by sin, but not against nature regenerated by the grace of Christ. Does not God himself share His blessings with His enemies, and daily pardon them, and return them good for evil? “He maketh His sun to rise upon the good and the bad, and raineth upon the just and the unjust.” Now, if God thus acts towards His enemies, it is not against the nature of God, nor the nature of men created after His image, to love his enemies, and do them good. But it is opposite to the nature of beasts, and of those, “who, when they were in honour, did not understand; but they are compared to senseless beasts, and are become like to them.”

Chapter XIII

Other Considerations On Humility

I NOW come to humility, which, like its other sisters, is hard to be acquired by the proud and the arrogant; but to those who attend the School of Christ and wish to learn of Him, it is very easy of attainment. “And first, we should humble ourselves ... under the powerful hand of God,” as St. Peter admonishes us, and his co-apostle St. James confirms. But what difficulty can there be, in a mortal man humbling himself before his Immortal and Omnipotent God? Secondly, we should choose the last place amongst men, because “each one should esteem others better than them selves,” as the apostle tells us in his Epistle to the Philippians. They who know themselves and are conscious of their own infirmities, and know not those of their neighbour, find no difficulty in esteeming all others before themselves, and conceding them a higher place. For as pride springs from ignorance, so does humility from a knowledge of one's self. The heart of the proud man easily sees the vices which others have, because they are all outside him; but his own vices, often very numerous, he sees not, because they are within him; just as the eye does not behold what is within, but only what is without. Of this the Pharisee is an example for us, who gave thanks to God, that he was not as the rest of men a thief, unjust, an adulterer. He did not observe these vices in himself; but there were others concealed within; pride, blindness of soul, and impenitence, which he did not see; therefore he preferred himself to the publican praying in the same temple. But the publican, who had better eyes, saw his own faults, and not his virtues; therefore he sat down in the lowest place, and standing afar off, struck his breast, imploring the mercy of God: by His judgment, the one went home justified; the other condemned. Wherefore, if we seriously endeavour to know ourselves, we shall find no difficulty in entering the "gate" of the House of the Lord. But to all this we must add, that the gate which appears so very narrow, and almost impenetrable, to those who are heavy and corpulent, or covered with many garments, or that attempt to enter with an erect body; this same gate is broad and wide to those who enter unencumbered, naked, and lowly. Wherefore, we are to blame, if we cannot easily enter at the same gate, through which so many saints have before us, without any difficulty or trouble. Begin then, Christian soul, to cast aside the burden of riches: remember that your riches have been given you by God, as to a steward, not as to a master, in order that you should distribute them amongst the poor, but not to hoard them up carefully for yourself alone; and thus your soul being free from the love of riches, having thrown aside as it were a great burthen, will easily enter the "narrow gate." Cast away also a love of carnal pleasures, or rather cast out those noxious humours that produce wind, and inflate the body. In fine, reject the opinion of your own excellence; put on the humility of Christ; bow down your neck to the obedience of His commands, and then complain, if you cannot easily enter in at the gate of salvation.

Chapter XIV

The Necessity Of Entering This Gate, However Narrow, If We Wish To Be Saved

BUT whether this gate be broad or narrow, we must necessarily strive to enter by it: for after this life, which passeth as a shadow, there is no other place where we can well remain, except within this gate. Therefore our Lord admonishes us, saying, "Strive ye to enter in at the narrow gate," because, as He adds in the same place, those who remain without, will all be banished to a place where there will be eternal weeping and gnashing of teeth: these signify the greatest torments with a despair of any remedy; and thence comes a madness that impatiently endures what it does not wish to endure, and will always be compelled to endure. But how much better is it to strive to enter in at the narrow gate, where rest and joy will be found, after we have borne a little labour and sorrow? If indeed men could escape the narrowness of the "gate," and the pains of hell at the same time, perhaps their frailty might excuse them from using violence to enter. But since we are compelled, either to labour here for a time by doing violence, or to fall hereafter into eternal sorrows, what judgment, what reason can we have that would induce us to avoid minor evils, and so to find those that are intolerable and most grievous! But even if no evils would follow after this life, but being deprived of the House of God, where alone are eternal joys, this ought to induce us to strive to enter, not only through the narrowness of the gate, but through briars and thorns, and fire and the sword. And though during this life we cannot feel what a loss it is to be deprived of beatitude, yet after the separation of the soul from the body, the eyes of the mind will be opened and will most clearly see what a loss, what an infinite loss it is, not to have obtained the end for which we were created. This desire is signified by those words which are mentioned in the Gospel, as being used by those who shall remain outside: "Lord, Lord, open unto us;" "The desire of their last end will ever torment these wretched beings, and the remorse of conscience will never rest:" thus the words will be fulfilled, "Their worm will never die, and their fire shall never be extinguished." Oh! if we could now seriously think with what ardour these men will then exclaim, "Lord, Lord, open unto us:" as if they said, we cannot live without entering into the House of the Lord, and yet we cannot die! Wherefore we exist not to live, but to be for ever miserable. Wherefore "open unto us," because we are prepared to suffer everything, provided only we can enter. But He will answer: "I know you not. The year of jubilee has ended; when you could have entered, you would not; now therefore it is but just, that when you wish to enter, you cannot." Thus though deprived of all hope, they will never cease exclaiming, being impelled by a natural desire, "Lord, Lord, open unto us." But because in their lifetime they were deaf to the exhortations of the Lord crying out to them, “Strive ye to enter in at the narrow gate,” now the Lord will turn a deaf ear to them exclaiming, “Lord, Lord, open unto us.” Wherefore, if we be wise, let us now consult our own welfare whilst we have time: let us do now, while we are able, what we shall then wish to have done, and shall not be able to do it.

Book IV (The Paradise of Delights)

Chapter I

True Joy Is To Be Found In Heaven

PARADISE is a name of pleasure and delight, for it signifies a garden, or most beautiful orchard, suitable both for recreation and amusement. In the book of Genesis this paradise of pleasure is not once named, when the terrestrial paradise is the subject of the discourse. But in the prophet Ezechiel speaking of the heavenly paradise, it is said of the chief angel who afterward fell and became the devil: Thou wast in the pleasures of the paradise of God.” But since the Holy Scriptures mention nothing of Paradise, but that there were in it many trees and the fountain of living water, therefore it is my intention under the word “Paradise,” to explain the joys and pleasures which the blessed possess in heaven. And this will be, unless I am deceived, a useful contemplation to excite our minds to seek and reflect upon the things above: and thus so to regulate our life, that when we depart hence, it may not be to sorrow and darkness, but by the divine assistance, to Eternal light and happiness. All men, with few exceptions, are influenced more by pleasure, than by any thing else. And the Church in one of her prayers says, “There may our hearts be fixed, where our true joy is.” And first we shall consider what the Holy Scripture says of the heavenly Paradise, whence we shall prove that in it are true joys; then we shall endeavour to explain what these joys are: and lastly, by various reasons, or rather comparisons, we shall prove that these joys are far more excellent than we can either comprehend, or think, or even imagine. First, then, the name of paradise signifies pleasure and delight, as we have already seen from the Book of Genesis. And that there is a Paradise in heaven, Ezechiel testifies. Our Lord also testifies in the gospel, when he said to the thief hanging by him: “This day thou shalt be with me in paradise,” He used the word paradise for the kingdom of God, and its essential beatitude: for the good thief had said, “Lord, remember me when thou shalt come into thy kingdom.” St. Paul testifies in his second Epistle to the Corinthians, where he says, “I know a man in Christ Such an one rapt even to the third heaven, and was caught up into paradise.” St. John testifies in his Apocalypse, where he introduces the Lord thus speaking: “To him that overcometh I will give to eat of the tree of life, which is in the paradise of my God.” From these passages it is evident, that the region of the “blessed” is a place of happiness and delight. And when our Lord says to the good and faithful servant, “Enter thou into the joy of thy Lord,” does He not most clearly declare, that the house or city of God is a place of joy, to which good and faithful servants are admitted when they leave this world? Our Lord in many places compares the kingdom of heaven to a supper, as we read in St. Luke, where it is said: “A man made a great supper.” And again, “I dispose to you, as my Father hath disposed to me, a kingdom: that you may eat and drink at my table, in my kingdom.” And when likewise we are told in the Apocalypse, “Blessed are they that are called to the marriage supper of the Lamb.” The Scripture, by the figure of the supper, certainly points out the pleasure and delight of the heavenly paradise; unless some one assert, that there is no pleasure in the sense of taste. In addition to these passages, the kingdom of God both in the Gospels and the Apocalypse is compared to royal nuptials: as we learn from the parable of the king, who made a marriage for his son; and from the parable of the wise and foolish virgins, of whom the wise went with the bridegroom to the marriage; but the foolish virgins remained without. The same also is found in the Apocalypse, where many things are said of the “marriage supper of the Lamb” celebrated with great magnificence in the kingdom of heaven. Now the beatitude of the saints may be compared to a royal marriage, because on such occasions every variety of pleasure is experienced and enjoyed. But of this we shall treat in the following Book. In fine, in the Apocalypse St. John sees a choir of virgins who followed the Lamb wheresoever He goeth, and sang a new canticle which no one else could sing. Which passage St. Augustine explains in his Book on “Holy Virginity” as having relation to certain joys and holy pleasures, which virgins alone will enjoy. Thus it is manifest, that in our heavenly kingdom and city, there are many true joys and most abundant pleasures.

Chapter II

On The Joy Of The Understanding

SINCE it has been proved from Holy Scripture, that in the kingdom of heaven there is true joy, we will now explain what those joys are. And first, we will briefly explain the joys of the Understanding, of the Will, and of the Memory, which relate to the mind: afterwards the joys of the other senses which relate to the body. We do not here mean to assert, that the understanding, memory, and the senses of the body are the proper seat of joy; since we are not ignorant that joy as well as desire, properly belong to the will in the superior part, and to the appetite in the inferior. But we speak as men generally do - who hesitate not to say, "The eye is delighted with the beauty of colour, and the ear with the harmony of sound." By the joy of the understanding, therefore, or of the memory, or external senses, we mean the pleasure which men experience from those objects, which they either understand, or remember, or derive from their external senses. The chief joy of the "Blessed" then will be, to behold with the eyes of the soul God face to face, as St. Paul mentions in his first Epistle to the Corinthians: and to behold Him as He is, according to St. John. And how great this joy will be, we can conjecture from what the prophet Isaias and the apostle Paul testify, that it exceeds all the joys which we have seen, or heard, or desired, or can imagine: "Eye hath not seen, nor ear heard, neither hath it entered into the heart of man, what things God hath prepared for them that love Him." (1 Corinth, ii. 9.) The holy Scripture also speaks of a particular and essential happiness which consists in seeing God according to the words of our Lord: "Blessed are the clean of heart, for they shall see God:" and also: "Now this is eternal life: that they may know thee, the only true God, and Jesus Christ whom thou hast sent." (St. John, xvii. 3.) This truly seems a great privilege, that no one can see, or hear, or desire, or imagine any good equal to that which the sight of God will convey to us; and yet this is no exaggeration, but the simple truth, because the eyes, the ears, and the heart of man are accustomed to finite and limited joys: but the sight of God is a vision of light inaccessible, of an infinite Good which contains every good, according to what the Lord said to Moses when he had asked, "Show me thy face." He answered, "I will show thee every good thing." But that we may prove this from reason, we learn from St. Thomas that delight which comes from knowledge requires three things: power, a sensible object suitable to that power, and an union of the object with this power; and that in proportion as the power is capable of knowledge, and the object more noble, and the union more intimate, so much the greater pleasure is derived. But no one can doubt but that the mind is much more pure and noble, and more capable of knowledge than the exterior senses. Now, all must admit that God is the highest and most noble object, placed not only above all objects of sense, but also above those of the mind, being infinite Goodness itself. But it is also equally certain, that a union of the mind with God by a clear vision is so intimate that the essence of God will penetrate the whole soul, whilst the soul herself will be transformed into God as if she were plunged into a great sea. Who, therefore, can imagine the greatness of this joy? The sweetness of this embrace from an infinite Good, from a Spouse of infinite beauty? From the beautiful union of colour with the sense of sight, and the sweetest sounds with the sense of hearing, we certainly experience great pleasure; and often it is so great, that many by it almost lose their senses. And yet the sense of feeling is material, and common to us with beasts: the objects also are corporal, and deceive us as often as they delight us. In fine, the union is superficial and external; and in many of the senses it is not an union of the object itself, but of its image with the mind. But the spiritual union of God with the understanding is more firm, durable, and complete; whilst corporal pleasures that are derived from the senses, because they are mutable, cannot be durable nor complete, being given to us as it were by drops. Wherefore, without doubt, the pleasure of the mind is greater than that of the senses. Wherefore, Man! recollect thyself, and weigh impartially the pleasure which the world offers thee, with that which God offers thee, when He promises Himself to those that love Him: choose what thou wishest for. If thou love pleasure which is certainly pleasing to thee, thou wilt choose the greatest, rather than the least; the ever-enduring, rather than the momentary. But not only the sight of God is promised to the good in heaven, but also the sight of all those things which God hath made. Here on earth we perceive by our eyes the sun, moon, stars; the sea, rivers, animals, trees and minerals. But our mind does not know the substance of these created things, their essential difference, their properties or power: we cannot see even our own soul, but like blind men we feel for effects, and by reasoning, acquire a little knowledge. What then will be the joy, when our mind in the vision of God, will clearly see the substance of all things, their difference, properties and power! And what great exultation will be ours, when we shall behold the innumerable army of angels, not one of whom resembles another, and shall clearly see the difference of all! What unbounded joy will it be, when we shall behold those holy men, who have been from the beginning of the world even unto the end, united together with all the angels! When we shall behold the merits of each, their crowns and palms of victory! We shall also see with feelings of pleasure, the crimes and torments of the damned, in which the sanctity of the good, and the justice of God will wonderfully shine forth; for then the just will wash their hands in the blood of the wicked, as the prophet saith. And what doth “washing their hands in the blood of the wicked” signify, but that the good works of the blessed will shine more Brightly, in comparison with the works of the wicked? The virginity of some will be more resplendent, when compared with the adulteries of others: and the fasts and alms-deeds of many, when compared with the gluttony and revellings of others. It will then be said: this young man was beautiful, and yet he observed perpetual chastity: this other youth was beautiful also, but not content with his own wife, he often committed adulteries and sacrileges. This man was rich and of noble extraction, and yet he fasted and prayed often, and gave abundant alms: another was equally rich and of noble extraction, but being addicted to gluttony and drunkenness, he spent his money in pleasures, so that he had nothing to give to the poor. Hence it will be, that the joy of the Just will be increased, by knowing the crimes of the wicked. At the same time, their joy will also be great, from the contemplation of the justice which will be so conspicuous, in the rewards of the blessed and the punishment of the wicked. Now, in human affairs, we perceive a great anomaly, because crime is often united with reward, and virtue with punishment, so that the justice of God seems in a manner to be obscured amongst men. But then every crime will have its punishment, and every virtue its reward, so that the beauty of God’s justice will excite incredible joy in the minds of the blessed.

On The Joy Of The Will

THERE are three things which produce the greatest love in the will. One is a most ardent and inextinguishable love of God and of our neighbour; for love is the chief ingredient of every thing loved. He that loves, thinks that every thing which he loves, is most beautiful and excellent; and therefore he rejoices greatly when he sees them; and when absent from them grieves inconsolably. We see parents, who naturally have great love for their children, consider them the most beautiful, talented, and prudent, although they are often deformed and devoid of judgment and knowledge. And if a choice were given to them, they would not exchange their sons for any others, however superior to their own in the judgment of men. We often, too, behold people, either by chance or any other cause, in love with deformed persons; to converse with whom they consider a great pleasure, and to be separated from them a great calamity. This would certainly not be the case, unless, as we have said, love is the ingredient of every thing loved. And since this is the case, how great will be the joy of the saints, to converse with God and all the blessed, whom they will ever love with the most ardent affection, and who not falsely, but very truly, are most beautiful and excellent, and from whom they know they will never be removed. On the other hand, one of the greatest torments of hell will be, to be united with those whom we shall hold in the utmost horror, and who we know circumvented us with a thousand artifices. Another circumstance that will cause great joy in the mind of the blessed, will be a certain inexpressible repose, and satiety without fulness, which will make them happy and contented in every way. Here on earth no one is contented with his lot, no one but wishes for more than he has, which he cannot obtain. Hence all are hungry, all thirsty, all live in discontent. Nor ought this to appear wonderful to us, since our soul is capable of an infinite and eternal good, and created things are frail and insignificant, which cannot last long. What then will be the joy of that man, who shall see himself in a place where he will live quite contented! where he will desire nothing, fear nothing, require nothing, nor seek for any thing more! Peace! that exceedeth every pleasure which the world can give, and which alone is found in the heavenly Jerusalem, the city of our great and peaceful King! “For thee my soul sigheth, full of troubles and temptations: in the recollection and expectation of thee alone, it resteth for a little time.” The third circumstance that will give joy to the blessed, is perfect justice, and that more perfect than original justice was in Adam. The one subjected the inferior part to the superior, till the latter was subject to God: but the other will subject the inferior to the superior, and the superior to God, by a most firm and indissoluble union. The one was like a woollen or linen vest: but the other will be all of gold or silk, which will make the will most beautiful and lovely to God, to itself, to the angels, and to all the blessed. This is that perfect justice which hath no stain, not even a venial one; so that of such a soul clothed with such a garment it may be said: “Thou art all beautiful, my be loved, and there is no spot in thee.” This includes all those virtues which admit of no imperfection, and how great joy and pleasure this justice brings with it, the wise man beareth witness in the Proverbs, “A secure mind is like a continual feast.” (chap, xv.) That mind alone is secure, whose conscience never stings, and which by perfect justice is so established in good that it cannot fall, even for a moment. Of this St. Paul beareth witness when he says, “The kingdom of God is not meat and drink; but justice, and peace, and joy in the Holy Ghost.” (Epistle to the Romans, chap. xiv. 17.) Here the holy Apostle plainly teaches us, that the kingdom of heaven possesses in itself great joy; but that it does not consist in the pleasure of meat and drink, as carnal men might perhaps wish, but in justice, which produces in the mind a solid peace and true joy. For he that is perfectly just, hath not in his heart any thing to reprehend him, nor in his actions what others might reprehend. Hence arises a solid and sweet peace with God, with himself, and with all others: hence, an unspeakable joy in the Holy Ghost, with which no earthly or temporal pleasure can bear any comparison.

Chapter IV

On The Joy Of The Memory

THE memory will supply no small matter for joy, from the recollection of the past. First, the recollection of the benefits of God in the spiritual and corporal, the natural and supernatural life, as well as the temporal and eternal, will bring incredible joy, when the just recollect in how many ways the blessings of heavenly sweetness were given to them. Then the recollection of the dangers from which God delivered them so wonderfully, in every age and every state, will be a source of unbounded joy. And amongst other dangers I consider this the chief, that often they were near committing mortal sin, and therefore near hell, and yet that God, moved by His goodness alone, prevented the sin. This singular mercy of God being often considered by the elect in their most peaceful kingdom, will give them the greatest delight. And if the saints had not the recollection of these things in heaven, how could they, as the Psalmist saith, “sing the mercies of the Lord for ever”? “Nothing will be sweeter in the city,” says St. Augustine, “than this canticle for the glory of the grace of Christ, by which we were redeemed.” What shall I say of the course of ages from the beginning, even to the end of time? What pleasure will the remembrance of so many vicissitudes bring, of such a variety of things, which the wonderful providence of God so wisely governed, ruled, and conducted to their proper ends! This perhaps is “the stream of the river which maketh the city of God joyful.” What is the course of ages flowing with so great velocity and never interrupting its course, except the stream of the river that rolls its waters continually, till they disappear and are lost in the ocean? And then, whilst the stream floweth and time flieth, many doubt of the providence of God: and some even of His servants are disturbed by this “stream of the river” which often brings evil to the good, and blessings to the wicked; which takes away the good land from the just, and carries it to the camp of the wicked, and brings them so many temptations, that they seem to complain of the providence of God. Hear the royal Prophet: “But my feet were almost moved: my steps had well nigh slipt. Because I had a zeal on occasion of the wicked, seeing the prosperity of sinners:” and a little lower: “Behold these are sinners; and yet abounding in the world they have obtained riches. And I said: then have I in vain justified my heart, and washed my hands among the innocent. And I have been scourged all the day.” (Psalm Ixxii.) Hear Jeremias: “Thou indeed, Lord, art just, if I will plead with thee, but yet I will speak what is just to thee. Why doth the way of the wicked prosper: why is it well with all them that transgress, and do wickedly? Thou hast planted them, and they have taken root: they prosper and bring forth fruit: thou art near in their mouth, and far from, their reins.” (chap, xii.) Hear the prophet Habacuc: “Why lookest thou upon them that do unjust things, and boldest thy peace, when the wicked devoureth the man that is more just than himself? And thou wilt make men as the fishes of the sea, and as the creeping things that have no ruler.” (chap, i.) But when the course of time shall be accomplished, and the river shall be lost in the sea, then the saints in heaven, calling to mind all its revolutions, shall clearly read the reason of its vicissitudes in the book of divine providence, and thereby it is incredible, how the stream of this river, represented to them by memory, will make joyful the city of God! There they will see, why God permitted the first angel and the first man to fall: why the mercy of God liberated man, and did not liberate the angel. There they will see, why God chose for His peculiar people the children of Abraham, who, nevertheless, he foresaw, would be a stiff-necked people: and how great blessings he was preparing, on account of their obstinacy, for the Gentiles. In fine, to omit speaking of His universal providence, there they will see why He permitted many, and nearly all the just, to suffer afflictions; it was, that He might crown them more gloriously. And thus, from the remembrance of them, they will bless with great joy all those crosses which they suffered, since they see them changed into eternal crowns, and they will exclaim with the Prophet: "According to the multitude of my sorrows in my heart, thy comforts have given joy to my soul."

Chapter V

On The Joy Of The Eyes

LET us now consider the joys of a glorified body.

And first, there will be the joy of the sense of "seeing," which amongst corporal senses is the most noble, and its office the most extensive. This sense then will rejoice at the splendour and beauty of its own body in heaven; for it will see the body "reformed by Christ, and made like to the body of His glory," as St. Paul mentions in his Epistle to the Philippians. Nor will its brightness be less than that of the sun, for the Apostle testifies in the Acts of the Apostles, that he saw Christ (to whose splendour we shall be made conformable,) shining above the brightness of the sun: and our Lord himself in St. Matthew says: "Then the just shall shine as the sun in the kingdom of their Father." What a glorious spectacle therefore will be presented to the eyes of the blessed, when they shall behold their hands, their feet, and all their members, sending forth rays of light; so that they will no more stand in need of the sun, or of the moon, or of any other inferior light, to dissipate the darkness! But not only will their own bodies shine as the sun, but the bodies of all the saints also, and especially the body of Christ himself and of His most blessed Mother. How doth one sun rejoice at his rising - the whole earth! What then will it be, to behold innumerable suns, most beautiful not only by their brightness, but also by the variety and glory of the members! Nor will the blessed be here obliged to close their eyes, lest they should be injured by the dazzling splendour: for the eyes themselves will be blessed, and therefore made impassible and immortal. For He who will make the eyes of the soul like to His glory, lest seeing God face to face they should be overpowered, will also endow the eyes of the body with impassibility, that they may behold not one sun only but many without injury. It will also be an addition to the joy of the eyes, as St. Augustine teaches us in his "City of God," that the blessed martyrs will display the most illustrious marks of their virtues, in those particular parts of the body in which they endured torments. What joy, therefore, will it be to see St. Stephen adorned with as many illustrious jewels as he endured blows of the stones in his body! What to see St. John the Baptist, St. James the Great, and St. Paul the Apostle besides others almost infinite in number, who suffered for Christ all shining in unspeakable beauty, more resplendent than any gold! What to behold St. Bartholomew, who was flayed alive, then so glorious beyond the beauty of the richest purple! And, not to mention others, what will it be to behold St. Peter and St. Andrew, and many others who endured the punishment of the cross, now with their hands and feet shining like stars in the greatest splendour! And with regard to Christ, the King of the martyrs, who for His own glory, and for our comfort, hath deigned to bear the marks of the cross, no tongue can express with what glory these most sacred marks will shine! And all the glory of the saints, when compared with that of Christ, is less than the beauty of the stars when compared with the beauty of the sun. But what shall I say of the pleasure which the eyes will derive from viewing this most extensive city, which Tobias and St. John, not being able to find sufficient words to express, have described it as adorned with gems and precious stones! What of this new heaven and new earth, which is promised us in the Holy Scripture after the last day? What of the renovation of this whole universe into a better state? For, as these things are unknown to us, so will they delight the eyes of the blessed, when their beauty shall be seen.

On The Joy Of The Ears

THAT the sense of hearing will be an instrument of speech in heaven, we cannot doubt, for the bodies of the blessed will be truly animated and perfect in every part; such was the body of Christ after His resurrection, which all the apostles, many of the disciples, and many women clearly saw. They heard Him speaking, and He answered their questions. St. Paul also tells us, that he heard Christ speaking from heaven, and that he answered Him. That there will likewise be "Canticles" sung in heaven, and especially that of "Alleluia," Tobias and St. John testify. From them it is evident, that there will be in that city many most sweet canticles, by which God will be praised, and the ears of the blessed wonderfully delighted. And if everything be in proportion, there can be no doubt but that this canticle will be as sweet and excellent as the cantors themselves are learned, as He who will be praised is so holy, and as the place wherein the canticle will be sung is so glorious, and the choir of hearers so intelligent and numerous! What then will it be amidst a most profound peace, in such concord of mind, and ardour of charity towards their great Benefactor, to hear the most melodious voices singing "Alleluia!" If St. Francis, as it is related by St. Bonaventure, was so moved by the sound of a harp touched by an angel for a moment, that he supposed himself to have been in another world, how will our ears be delighted when thousands of harps and cantors shall praise God with most melodious voices! when other thousands, with the like harmony, shall repeat the same canticles again and again! But the praises of God only will not be sung in this city; for the triumphs of the martyrs also, the merits of the confessors, the glory of the virgins, and the victories of all over the snares of the devil, will be celebrated in song: all these praises will redound to the glory of God. Ecclesiasticus says: "Who hath been tried thereby, and made perfect, he shall have glory everlasting. He that could have transgressed, and hath not transgressed; and could do evil things, and hath not done them: therefore are his goods established in the Lord, and all the Church of the saints shall declare his alms." (chap, xxxi.) Now, although these words are to be understood as relating to the praises of those who dwell in the Church on earth; yet nothing prevents us from applying them to the blessed in heaven, and the Church triumphant. For there the saints will have true and eternal glory: there truly the Church of the saints. And since in the Gospel our Lord saith, that faithful and prudent servants will be praised by God in heaven in these words: "Well done, good and faithful servant, because thou hast been faithful over a few things, I will place thee over many things: enter thou into the joy of thy Lord;" what prevents us from supposing that these words of our Lord will be taken up by the whole choir of the celestial city, and most sweetly repeated again and again? The Catholic Church has not hesitated to say of St. Martin: "Martin, here poor and mean, now rich, enters heaven, and is honoured with heavenly hymns." In fine, St. Augustine, in the last book of the "City of God," affirms the same in these eloquent words: "There will be true glory, where no one will be praised, either by the error or flattery of the praiser. True honour will be there, that will be denied to no one who is worthy of it, nor given to any unworthy of it. Nor will any unworthy person aspire to it there, where none but the worthy are admitted." Oh, thrice blessed then will those be, who in this place whence flattery is banished, and where no deceit is found, shall hear their praises sung without danger of pride, but not without an increase of their joy!

Chapter VII

On The Joy Of The Nostrils

ON the other senses only a few remarks must be made; not because they will not have great and peculiar pleasures, but because the Holy Scripture does not inform us what these pleasures will be. But this is sufficiently evident, that many bodies of the saints, immediately after their death, began to send forth a most sweet odour, such as no one had perceived before. This St. Jerome relates of the body of St. Hilarion, for he affirms that ten months after his burial his body was found perfect, as if he were still living; and so fragrant was it, that it seemed to have been embalmed. St. Gregory, in his "Dialogues," relates the same thing of the body of St. Servulus, a paralytic. These are his words: "At the departure of his soul such sweet fragrance was scattered, that all who were present were filled with an inconceivable sweetness; and until the body was buried, every one felt the fragrance." Other examples of a like nature are to be found, both in ancient and modern times. From these cases we may argue, that if the bodies of the deceased saints, after the soul was assumed to glory, breathed such a sweet odour, much more will these bodies breathe the same when they shall be glorified and alive. St. Gregory in his "Dialogues" also speaks of the body of our Saviour, in the following manner: "Then Tarsillathe virgin, looking up, beheld Jesus coming; and suddenly with such a wonderful fragrance was she covered, that it was a proof to all the Author of sweetness was present." And thus, if the glorified body of our Saviour breathed such an odour of sweetness, it is certain that all the bodies of the saints will send forth the sweetest odours: for it is meet that the members should be conformable to their head, not only in their glory, but also in the sweetness of their fragrance. Let those, therefore, who are delighted with odours, think with what sweetness they will be filled, when in that divine garden, adorned with thousands of heavenly flowers, they will inhale such various and sweet odours.

Chapter VIII

On The Joy The Senses Of Touch And Taste Will Have

ON the sense of taste theologians write, that the blessed will not use earthly food; but yet that this sense will have a certain pleasure, lest it should appear to be superfluous; but this pleasure will be suitable to the state and condition of the just. On the sense of touch, all agree that it will be possessed in heaven, since the bodies of the blessed can certainly be touched, being true and animated bodies, according to the words of our Lord: "Handle and see: for a spirit hath not flesh and bones, as you see me to have." But we do not wish to enter on those points which are disputed in the schools. We believe, however, that the sense of touch will derive no small pleasure from the perpetual beauty of the body endowed with glorified properties, of which St. Paul speaks in his First Epistle to the Corinthians: "It is sown in dishonour, it shall rise in glory. It is sown in weakness, it shall rise in power. It is sown a natural body, it shall rise a spiritual body." (chap, xv.) Of these four endowments or privileges of a glorified body, that concerning its splendour relates to the sense of sight, as we have already mentioned; the other three seem properly to relate to the sense of touch. For as, when the body is attacked with any disorder, or receives a wound which is mortal, it is the sense of touch that suffers; so also, when the body is in health, the same sense rejoices. Greatly, therefore, will the sense of touch rejoice in heaven, when, after the resurrection, the bodies of the blessed will be immortal and impassible, and, consequently, endowed with perpetual health. What would not men give, and especially princes, if, during their whole life, they could be free from the gout, the head-ache, or any other pains? What then will be the joy in heaven, from which not only death, but every disease and sorrow will be far removed! Wherefore, those endowments by which a corruptible body will rise incorruptible, and that which is infirm will become impassible, relate to the sense of touch. The endowments of agility and subtilty, by which what is corporal will be spiritual, seem also to relate to the same sense. It will be a spiritual and glorified body; not because it will not have truly flesh and bones, but because it will be so subject to the spirit, that, by the mere nod of the soul, it will be able without difficulty to move with the greatest velocity, to ascend and descend, to go and to return, to penetrate any place, as if it were not a body but a spirit. As, therefore, the sense of touch suffers when a heavy body is forced to ascend upwards, or to be moved from place to place quickly; so, on the contrary, it rejoices when the body without labour either ascends or passes quickly from place to place. Behold, then, from what a servitude of corruption the "blessed" will be free, when they will no more stand in need of horses, or chariots, or arms, or servants, or any other thing; but their bodies will of themselves go wherever they wish, and everywhere be free from danger, even in the midst of armed forces. Would that those who cannot enjoy spiritual delights because they have a vitiated taste, would at least consider these corporal endowments, which are so excellent and desirable, and seek after them! And thus they might be induced gradually to ascend higher; and by these steps, they would at length, by the divine assistance, reach unto eternal joys.

Chapter IX

The Joys Of Heaven Compared With Those Of Earth

WE have already explained, according to our ability, what joys are prepared in heaven for those that love God; we will now, by certain external arguments, endeavour to show how great they are. And, first, we shall consider the pleasures which God often gives, even to his enemies, in this life. And truly, so great joys are found in riches, honours, power, and various other pleasures, which God gives to those that even blaspheme Him, or believe not in Him, that nearly all men consider them happy beings. David exclaims: "They have called the people happy that hath these things." (Psalm cxliiii.) Who amongst the lovers of this world does not envy Solomon, who reigned forty years, and abounded in riches and every delight, besides having seven hundred wives and three hundred concubines? And yet, according to the opinion of S. Augustine, it seems that he was lost, for thus he speaks: "Solomon himself was a lover of women, and was cast off by God." And in his book on the "City of God," he says of Solomon what Sallust said of Cataline, "He began well, but ended badly." St. Gregory also follows St. Augustine in the 2nd Book of his "Morals." Not unlike Solomon are, in our own times, the kings of Turkey, Persia, China, and Tartary, who possess the most extensive kingdoms, and are addicted to carnal pleasures; they indulge their heart, their eyes, their ears, and palate in every thing they desire. But not to dwell on these pleasures, which belong only to a few, how great are the joys which God gives to mortals in general, the greater part of whom neither know, nor love, nor fear God!

Hath He not given to all the earth with its riches and pleasures, animals, fruit, flowers, and metals? Hath He not given to all men in general the sea, fountains, rivers, and lakes, filled with so many kinds of fishes? Hath He not outspread the heavens, to be as it were the roof of His great house, adorned with innumerable stars? Doth not this same great and most bountiful Lord command His sun to rise and His rain to fall, both upon the just and the unjust? Now, if He hath given so many pleasures to reprobate sinners and ungrateful slaves, who are deserving of the severest punishments, is it not just that He should reserve for His friends and children joys infinitely greater? Hear St. Augustine: "To sinners that blaspheme His name daily, He gives the heavens and the earth: fountains, fruits, health, children, riches, abundance. He who giveth such to sinners, what thinkest thou will He not give to His faithful servants?" It is mentioned in the Life of St. Fulgentius, that when he once saw the glory of the Roman senate he exclaimed: "how beautiful must the heavenly Jerusalem be, if earthly Rome be so glorious! And if in this world so much honour be given to those that love vanity, what honour and glory will be given unto the saints, who behold truth itself!" St. Augustine, who was such a wise judge of things, does not hesitate to assert there is such a difference between heavenly and earthly joys, that the enjoyment of celestial pleasures for one day only, would be more desirable than the enjoyment of earthly pleasures for thousands of ages. These are his words: "So great is the glory of eternal life, that, supposing we could only enjoy it for one day for this alone countless years of this life, full of earthly goods and happiness, should justly be despised; for not without reason has it been said, 'Better is one day in thy courts above thousands.' What then shall we say? If these words are true, as they most certainly are, is it not reasonable that we should now at length begin to be wise?" Hitherto we have been accustomed to exhort you to despise earthly goods because they are momentary, and to love heavenly things because they are eternal. But now we hear St. Augustine, a most learned doctor, affirming that although earthly goods were eternal, and heavenly ones only momentary, yet that the latter should be preferred to the former! Are we not therefore deaf, blind, stupid, and foolish, if, on account of earthly goods, which are not only vile, but frail and transitory, we despise heavenly treasures, which are most precious and eternal? Cure, O merciful Lord! our deafness: enlighten our blindness: rouse our stupidity: heal our madness. Why is the light of thy countenance shined upon us, Lord, if we discern not things so great and so necessary? And why hast thou given unto us the judgment of reason, if we see not objects so evident?

Chapter X

The Earthly And Heavenly Paradise Compared

WE have compared the joys of this world with the joys of the kingdom of heaven: we will now compare in a few words the joys of the earthly paradise, with those of the heavenly one. We may know how great were the pleasures of the terrestrial paradise from this circumstance, that it was a garden of pleasure given to men, who were created according to the image and likeness of God, whilst the other parts of the earth were given to the animals. But when Adam by his sin had lost the honour in which he had been placed by God, and had become like senseless beasts, he was then cast out of paradise into this place. St. Alchimus, in his poems on Genesis, and others describe paradise as a most beautiful region, and very temperate; where neither the heat of summer could burn, nor the cold of winter injure, but a perpetual spring of flowers flourished, and autumn gave its fruits of every kind. St. Basil thus speaks of it in his book on Paradise: "God planted paradise where there is no violence of wind, no in clemency of seasons, no hail, nor thunder, nor storms; no cold of winter, nor damp of spring, nor summer's heat, nor autumn's dryness: but the seasons are temperate, and in peace among themselves, for they dance around that place; yea, the pleasures of spring, the nourishment of summer, the joy of autumn, and the rest of winter meet there together with their blessings. Clear are its waters, affording great joy to the eye, but possessing more utility than joy. God, therefore, created this place at first as worthy to receive His plants. Afterwards he planted therein a variety of beautiful trees, most pleasing to the sight, and by them He bestowed a most sweet enjoyment." St. Augustine, in his "City of God," thus speaks of paradise: "What could these fear or grieve for, being in possession of such an abundance of good things; where neither death was feared, nor any distemper of the body, and every thing was present which the will could desire; nor could anything enter to injure the body or soul of those that lived so happily? Their love of God was undisturbed, and they lived together in a faithful and sincere friendship: from this love came great joy. There was a tranquil avoiding of sin, which, while it remained, no evil could happen to give them sorrow. How happy, therefore, were these first men, whose minds were agitated by no fears, nor their bodies injured by any evils! The whole human race would have been as happy, had not these committed sin, which they passed to posterity, and had not every one of their descendants sinned, and thus brought damnation." So far St. Augustine. I omit others who have written on the wonderful beauty and fruitfulness of the earthly paradise, such as Claudius Marius Victor, St. John Damascene, St. Isidore, &c. But whatever we may think of these particular accounts, we learn from the Holy Scripture itself that paradise was doubtless a more happy place than this our habitation, since, as a punishment for sin, it was said to Adam: "Because thou hast hearkened to the voice of thy wife, and hast eaten of the tree whereof I commanded thee that thou shouldst not eat, cursed is the earth in thy work: with labour and toil shalt thou eat thereof all the days of thy life. Thorns and thistles shall it bring forth to thee," &c. And to the woman He said: "I will multiply thy sorrows and thy conceptions; in sorrow shalt thou bring forth children, and thou shalt be under thy husband's power, and he shall have dominion over thee." (chap, iii.) In paradise, therefore, there would not have been sterility of the earth, neither would its cultivation have required labour, nor would it have brought forth briars and thorns; women would always have conceived with fruit, and although they might be subject to their husbands, the subjection would not have been despotic, but mild and moderate. These, therefore, would have led a happy life, without fear or sorrow, without labour and trouble. Now, if the earthly paradise, had not sin been committed, would have been free from every evil, and have abounded in all good, what ought we to think of our heavenly Paradise, which must be so much more beautiful as it is more excellent, being created for more excellent beings? The heaven of the blessed is, without any comparison, much more sublime than the paradise of Adam; and the blessed inhabitants therein, as they cannot sin or die, are therefore far, far better off than the inhabitants of this earthly paradise, who are exposed to sin and to death. This, then, being the truth, let us give thanks to God that by the Passion of His Son, instead of the terrestrial paradise snatched from us by the envy of the devil, we have now gained a celestial one, far more excellent than the other; and lest we should be ungrateful to so great a Redeemer, let us strive with our whole strength to enter the heavenly paradise, and to open its gates for ourselves by a lively faith, by a sincere hope, perfect charity, and good works.

Chapter XI

The Goods Of This World, And Those Of The Earthly Paradise Compared With The Joys Of The Heavenly Paradise

WE will now advance further, and compare all the goods of this world, as well as those of the earthly paradise, with the joys of the heavenly paradise alone; and these being united together, we shall see which preponderate. To accomplish this, let us imagine that the riches, power, pleasures, and glory of Solomon, and of other like fortunate men, could be acquired without labour, and retained without fear: let us also suppose, that these men could never sin, nor ever die. These points then being granted, I affirm that the joys of the heavenly paradise alone far excel all the goods of this world and those of the terrestrial paradise united together. And hence I conclude, that all these joined together can never fill the soul, can never satisfy her desires, because the heart of man is capable of an infinite good: but these are finite. Wherefore, the words of St. Augustine, which are to be found in the beginning of his "Confessions," will always be true: "Thou hast made us, O Lord, for Thyself; and our heart cannot rest until it rest in Thee." True also are the words of David, "I shall be satisfied when thy glory shall appear." (Psalm xvi.) But as long as the heart is not at rest, it will be miserable, and if miserable, it will not be happy. Now, our heavenly paradise will both satiate the soul, and take away all fear and uneasiness. For what can he desire who will be like unto God, because he will see Him as He is? What can he desire, whom God "shall place over all his goods?" What can he desire who will reign with God, and be a co-heir with Christ, "whom the Father hath appointed heir of all things?" More over, because the goods of this world, and those of the earthly paradise also, may be lost, however great they are, they are not therefore perfect goods; nor can they satiate and satisfy the soul; and, on this account, they cannot make it blessed and happy. But the goods of the heavenly paradise are, in every way, perfect and secure: they cannot be lost, nor diminished in the least. For the saints, placed on their most blessed thrones, can neither die nor sin, and are most certain of their eternal happiness! May mortals therefore open the eyes of their soul, and seriously ponder how important it is, not to lose their heavenly paradise. The subject is truly of the deepest interest, and not concerning things; for the wisdom of God hath said, "What doth it profit a man if he gain the whole world, and lose his own soul?"

Chapter XII

On The Price That Paradise Was Purchased At, Compared With Paradise Itself

THE last comparison will be on the “price“ by which Christ purchased paradise for us, and by which we also ought to purchase it with all its goods. Christ, at the price of His blood, purchased paradise for us, which the envy of the devil had snatched from us; not that he might possess it himself, but that he might deprive us of it. For this purpose he seduced Eve, and by her Adam, that he might make them both partakers of his punishment. Christ therefore is that wise merchant, who sold all that he had to purchase the precious pearl, by which is clearly signified the kingdom of heaven, as He himself teaches, of whom St. Paul speaks: “You are bought with a great price;” and St. Peter says, “Knowing that you were not redeemed with corruptible things as gold or silver .... but with the precious blood of Christ, as of a lamb unspotted and undefiled:” and again, “They deny the Lord who bought them.” Christ at the same time that He bought paradise, bought us also; for we were captives, and had lost paradise by sin: but Christ redeeming us from our sins, and from the captivity of the devil, made us sons and heirs of God at the same time, and by this means restored paradise to us. Hence, the greatness of paradise is shown to us, by appearing to the wisdom of God worthy of an infinite price. If amongst men, some wise and very rich merchant were to purchase a precious pearl by selling willingly all his goods, certainly no one would doubt but that this pearl was so wonderful and valuable, that scarcely a sufficient price could be given for it. How greatly therefore ought we to value, if we possess any judgment, the possession of heaven, which the wisdom of God, the Word incarnate, by all his labours, sufferings, and sorrows for the space of thirty years purchased for us, at the price of His most precious death! We must truly be quite senseless, if we sell for the vile value of any earthly goods whatever, that which Christ our Lord deemed worthy of an infinite price. But not only Christ purchased paradise for us by His blood; all the saints likewise taught by Him, most joyfully gave up whatever they possessed whatever they were worth whatever they were, in order to purchase this same paradise. St. Paul exclaims, “I reckon that the sufferings of this time are not worthy to be compared with the glory to come, that shall be revealed in us.” (Epistle to the Romans, viii. 18.) But although the blood of Christ was not only a worthy price for paradise, but also (if I may so speak) more than worthy, being super-eminent and exceeding the dignity of the thing purchased; yet He wished to purchase us also, that He might honour and exalt us. Great is the glory of man, because he can obtain paradise, not only through the merits of Christ, but also by his own merits, which however derive their efficacy from Christ. He therefore that is unwilling to purchase paradise by doing good and avoiding evil, is expelled from the inheritance of Christ, as a wicked and slothful servant in the parable of the Talents. And the apostle seriously admonishes us where he says: “And if sons, heirs also; heirs indeed of God, and joint heirs with Christ: yet so, if we suffer with him, that we may also be glorified with him.” (Epistle to the Romans, viii. 17.) But lest we should perhaps complain that we have not a worthy price, we must know that nothing is required of us but what we already have. St. Augustine thus speaks: “The kingdom of God is worth as much as you possess:” he proves this by examples from the Holy Scriptures: “What so vile, what so earthly, as to break our bread for the hungry? The kingdom of heaven is worth as much; for it is written, Possess ye the kingdom of heaven, because I was hungry, and you gave me to eat. The widow purchased it by her mite: Peter purchased it by leaving his nets: Zaccheus by giving away the half of his patrimony.” With these words of St. Augustine, Venerable Bede also agrees when he says: “The kingdom of heaven requires nothing else but thyself: it is worth as much as thou art: give thyself, and thou shalt possess it.” Poor Lazarus had nothing to give but his patience in affliction, and he was carried by angels to Abraham’s bosom: the good thief had nothing in this world of his own, besides that voice by which he exclaimed, “Remember me when thou shalt come into thy kingdom” and immediately he heard, “This day shalt thou be with me in paradise.”! truly great is the goodness of God!! ineffable happiness of man, who can so easily pass over every thing most precious, with the price of his Lord! Dost thou wish, O man! to obtain from God a paradise of every pleasure? Give thyself to Him, and thou wilt possess it. What meaneth “Give thyself?” Love God with thy whole heart: humble thyself under His powerful hand: praise Him at all times: be willing to do His will, whether He wish thee to be rich or poor illustrious or not illustrious in health or in sickness. His will is adorable, and just are all His judgments. Say then unto God, I am thine: do with me according to thy pleasure: I do not resist, I do not murmur, I obey thy commands. “My heart is ready, O Lord! my heart is ready. Not my will, but thine be done.” This holocaust is beyond all value in the sight of God, who standeth in no need of our goods. “Doth the Lord desire holocausts and victims,” saith Samuel,

“and not rather that the voice of the Lord should be obeyed?” This holocaust of obedience Christ daily offered to His Father, according to His own testimony: I do always the things that please Him.” And St. Paul, the true imitator of our Saviour, saith: “And therefore we labour, whether absent or present, to please Him.” This perfect renunciation of all things we possess, or desire to possess: this denying of one’s self in order to please God alone, is the “true price of paradise.” And he who gives himself in this way to gain paradise, does not lose himself; but most truly finds himself, according to our Lord: “He that findeth his life, shall lose it; and he that shall lose his life for me, shall find it.” But since this truth is hidden from the wise and prudent of this world (who are fools before God;) and since the number of fools is infinite, therefore “Many are called, but few are chosen.”

Book V (The Happiness of the Saints in the Parables)

Chapter I

On The Treasure Hidden In A Field

HITHERTO I have spoken what God hath suggested to me in my meditations, concerning the happiness of the saints, under the names of those places wherein they who are truly happy and blessed dwell; that is, concerning the Kingdom of Heaven, the City of God, the House of the Lord, and the Paradise of delights. I will now add a few remarks on the same subject, under the name of those things by which our Lord hath described the happiness of the Saints, in the parables. But we must first be informed, that these words of our Lord, “The Kingdom of Heaven is like,” &c., which He continually makes use of in the Parables, do not always refer to the words immediately following: as if when our Lord saith, “The kingdom of heaven is like unto a merchant,” He meant that it was like to this man: the words relate to the whole narration, in which by a similitude the way to the kingdom of heaven is pointed out. And sometimes the happiness of this heavenly kingdom is described obscurely; sometimes clearly, and at other times it can in no way be comprehended. I will explain each part of this division. When our Lord, in St. Matthew, proposes the parable of the Sower, He describes the fruit which the preaching of the Gospel produces according to the various dispositions of the land, and this is called the “Mystery of the Kingdom of God:” but He mentions nothing of the happiness of the saints. But when in the same place, He adds the parable of the cockle, He alludes briefly to the happiness of the saints, when He saith, “The wheat gather ye into my barn, but bind the cockle into bundles to burn.” But when in the same chapter He speaks of a merchant seeking good pearls, and of one that found a treasure hidden in a field, He then clearly compares the kingdom of heaven to the pearl and the treasure. I find only six parables of this kind: the first being of the treasure hidden in a field; the second of the precious pearl; the third of the labourers in the vine yard; the fourth of the talents; the fifth of the supper; the sixth of the marriage-feast. To which I shall add two similitudes from the Apostle Paul; one concerning those that run for the prize, the other concerning those that contend in the race. Thus there will be eight “Considerations” in the blessed life of the saints, taken from the parables. The first parable, therefore, (which is found in St. Matthew,) makes “the kingdom of heaven like unto a treasure hidden in a field;” and it briefly teaches us how it may be acquired, in these words: “Which a man having found, hid it, and for joy thereof goeth and selleth all that he hath, and buyeth that field.” (St. Matthew, xiii. 44.) A treasure signifies an immense sum of gold, silver, and precious stones; and it ought to be so old, that no memory of it exists, and therefore not having a proper owner, it belongs of right to him that finds it. Now this “treasure” is the Divinity itself, which is hidden in the field of the humanity of Christ, according to the Explanations of St. Hilary, and of St. Jerome in his Commentary on the 13th chapter of St. Matthew; for in Christ, as the Apostle saith, “are hid all the treasures of wisdom and knowledge.” But the Divinity is the truest treasure of all good, and so ancient is it, that no memory remaineth of it, because it is eternal and before all ages: nor had this great treasure ever any owner, since He is himself the Lord of all things. But it is said to belong to those that find it, because He willingly gives it to them, who having sold all their goods, hasten to purchase it. But it is said to be “hidden” in the humanity of Christ, as if buried in a field; because although the Divinity be every where present, yet nowhere is it more so, than in the humanity of Christ, with which it is so united, as to make God and man but one person. Wherefore the Apostle saith: “God was in Christ, reconciling the world to himself.” And although he was nowhere more than in the humanity of Christ, yet he appeared to be so hidden, that a “Light” was necessary to show God was in Christ. This Light was St. John the Baptist, who, as St. John the Apostle writes, “Was a burning and shining light,” and of whom David spoke in the person of God the Father, "I have prepared a lamp for my anointed." (Psalm cxxxi. 17.) St. John made Christ manifest, and truly proved Him to be the only-Begotten Son of God, where he says: "No man hath seen God at any time; the only-begotten Son who is in the bosom of the Father, he hath declared Him." (chap. i. 18.) And again: "He that cometh from heaven, is above all;" and a little lower, "The Father loveth the Son; and He hath given all things into his hands. He that believeth in the Son, hath life everlasting; but he that believeth not the Son, shall not see life; but the wrath of God abideth on him." (chap. iii. 35, 36.) But although this "burning and shining light" so clearly proved Christ to be the Son of God; yet the blind Jews could not, or would not, acknowledge the Divinity hidden in Christ; for, as the Apostle saith: "If they had known it, they would never have crucified the Lord of glory." He therefore, who, being divinely enlightened, findeth the treasure, "hides it, and for joy thereof goeth and selleth all that he hath, and buyeth that field." To hide the found treasure, is nothing more than under the veil of humility, to conceal the grace we have received; not to be elated by the light given to us from above, nor to boast of our divine consolations and revelations, lest vain glory corrupt our true glory. Wherefore, the Prophet Isaias was accustomed to say, "My secret to myself;" and the Apostle Paul, "If I must glory (it is not expedient indeed): but I will come to the visions and revelations of the Lord. I know a man in Christ above fourteen years ago," &c. (2 Epist. to Corinth, xii.) The wonderful revelations he received when rapt into paradise, he passed over in silence for fourteen years; and forever would he have concealed them, had he not been obliged to reveal them. He plainly says, "it is not expedient" to make known such gifts; and under a feigned name he reveals them, to show how greatly it was against his inclination. Something like this happened to St. Francis, when the sacred "Stigmata" were miraculously impressed upon him, as St. Bonaventure relates in his life: "he was always accustomed to conceal his divine revelations, and to exclaim with Isaias, 'My secret to myself:' but yet when he perceived it could not be concealed, he related the whole case with great fear to his inquiring brethren." "With joy to sell all that we possess, and to purchase the field where the treasure was concealed," means that he who wisheth to enjoy God and Christ in the kingdom of heaven, must be entirely free from all affection to temporal things, and deliver himself and all that he possesseth, to the disposal of God; and this he should do, not in sadness or through necessity, but with great joy, for "God loveth a cheerful giver." But he that truly understandeth how great will be the treasure to enjoy Christ in His eternal country; to see with the eyes of the mind His divinity, and with those of the body His humanity, and to be made a partaker of all the good things of God and of Christ, and to possess these securely for ever, to him it will not appear a great sacrifice to despise all temporal goods, and life itself, for the love of God and of eternal happiness. Of this St. Ignatius the martyr is witness, who in his Epistle to the Romans, thus writes: "Let fire and the cross; let the companies of wild beasts; let breaking of bones and tearing of members; let the shattering in pieces of the whole body, and all the wicked torments of the devil come upon me: only let me enjoy Jesus Christ." He that could speak thus, would much less fear want, ignominy, exile, and the prison, in order that he might not lose that incomparable treasure. He therefore who truly desireth to possess the treasure of eternal life, should seriously consider again and again, whether he be prepared to despise all other goods; otherwise he will never obtain, either living or dead, that treasure without which he will be eternally poor and miserable. But whence is it, that so many anxiously seek after treasures of gold and silver; and not content with human diligence, employ the aid of evil spirits, to the great changer of their life and character? But why do so few seek after Thy treasure, O Lord, my God, who alone canst make men rich, and which can be found without labour, without cost, or danger? I find no other cause, except either the slender faith of Thy people, or their being too occupied in temporal things, which leave them not any time for considering Thy divine promises to men. Wherefore, dear Lord! increase our faith in Thy promises, and extinguish the thirst of acquiring temporal riches: thus we shall be enabled with greater ardour to seek after Thy treasure; and when found, with Thy especial assistance to purchase it, by selling all our goods.

On The Precious Pearl

THE next parable, on the precious pearl, is like to the preceding one: this also comes in St. Matthew. (chap. xiii.) In the former was a treasure, and in this is a pearl which may be considered like a treasure. In the former parable, it was necessary by the sale of all our goods, to purchase the hidden treasure; in this one likewise, the merchant sold all his goods, in order to buy it. Wherefore, it will only be necessary to explain in what point this parable differs from the other. It differs in two things; for in the one a treasure is mentioned, in the other a pearl: and whilst the treasure is accidentally found, the pearl is diligently sought for by the merchant. In this parable, the heavenly beatitude, or Christ himself, is named a “pearl,” as the holy fathers St. Ambrose and St. Gregory Nazianzen teach. But that which in the preceding parable is called a “treasure,” in this is named a “pearl,” that we may understand how the divinity of Christ is indeed a treasure, but not divided into many parts of gold, silver, and precious stones, for it is one containing within itself the value of an infinite treasure. A pearl is one substance: but according to Pliny, it contains the essence of all precious things. Besides, a treasure consists in money alone, in immense sums; and it tends not to pleasure and beauty, but to utility only. Wherefore, lest from the preceding parable any one might suppose, that heavenly beatitude was only useful, and not beautiful nor glorious, our Lord added this other parable; in which He teacheth us, that the divinity of Christ and our happiness are like unto the precious pearl, which, beside the utility of it as a treasure, possesses also the beauty and splendour that adorn and delight us. I will also remark, that a pearl is a symbol of Christ, both as the Son of God, and as the Son of the Blessed Virgin. For as a pearl is produced by the light of the sun, and from the dew of heaven, as Pliny and others remark; so the Son of God also, as regards His divinity, is begotten of the Father of Light, the uncreated Sun; and therefore we say in the creed, “Light of Light, true God of true God.” Again, Christ according to His humanity, was born of the dew of heaven, that is, conceived of the Holy Ghost, not by man. In fine, a pearl is white, shining, solid, pure, light and round. Now, the humanity of Christ, and much more His divinity without any comparison, is white by innocence; shining by wisdom; solid by constancy; pure, because without spot; light, because meek and mild; and round, because perfect in every part. But the pearl is not found by “chance,” but is diligently sought after by the prudent merchant. And yet, this parable is not contrary to the preceding one, in which the treasure is said to be found by chance: both are true, but the persons are different: and therefore our Lord, in His divine Providence, joined this parable to the former one, lest we should think all men may find the treasure as it were by chance. Some there are, whom God, by a particular grace, suddenly enlightens, so that neither seeking, nor desiring, nor thinking, they arrive at the true faith and a most ardent charity, and therefore have a certain hope of obtaining eternal life. These find indeed, as regard themselves, the treasure by chance: but God pre-ordained them to this grace and to future glory, not by chance, but by His eternal Providence. Others there are whom God prevents by His grace, but not suddenly doth He show them the treasure, for He inspires them with a desire of seeking the truth: He makes them careful merchants, and then aids and directs them till they find the precious pearl. St. Paul and St. Augustine are examples in this respect. St. Paul sought not the true treasure which is Christ, but persecuted Him as a seducer, and the Christians as men deluded. And when he was on his journey, “breathing out threatening and slaughter against the disciples of the Lord,” our Lord appeared unto him; and at the same time that He blinded the eyes of his body, He illuminated those of the soul with such great light, that immediately he became a preacher, from being a persecutor. And although this was a fortunate event to him, yet what appeared chance, was in God Providence. For thus he speaks in his Epistle to the Galatians: “For you have heard of my conversation in time past in the Jews religion; how that beyond measure I persecuted the Church of God, and wasted it. And I made progress in the Jews religion above many of my equals in my own nation, being more abundantly zealous for the traditions of my fathers. And when it pleased him who separated me from my mother’s womb, and called me by his grace, to reveal his Son in me, that I might preach him among the Gentiles, immediately I condescended not to flesh and blood.” (chap, i.) Wherefore, St. Paul was separated from the womb of his mother by Divine providence, that he might preach the Gospel of Christ; yet he did not seek this precious pearl himself, nor the treasure in the field; but the treasure was offered to him, and he became so much in love with it, that he spared no labours; yea, he endured every danger, and counted all things as dung, that he might gain Christ.” On the other hand, St. Augustine began from his youth to burn with a desire of finding the “precious pearl,” that is, true wisdom and eternal happiness. But when he fell into the sect of the Manichees, long and greatly did he labour, complaining to himself and disputing with others, that he might discover the truth of the Christian religion. But when he had discovered in that sect nothing but fabulous and lying accounts, he then almost despaired of finding the truth having spent many years in seeking it. Thus he speaks in his Confessions: “I had come into the depth of the sea, and despaired of finding truth.” But yet it pleased God that he should at length discover the “precious pearl:” and then without any delay, having sold all things that is, having rejected carnal desires by which he was strongly bound, and despising honours and
